30 DECEMBER 1984—5 JANUARY 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 ISSUE 9 RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

The Quest

Five people—Rajiv Gandhi, Chandra Shekhar, Atal Behari Vajpayee, Charan Singh and Jagjivan Ram—have been striving for five years to become the Prime Minister. Shubhabrata Bhattacharya and Madhu Jain outline how each of them has been working to achieve this goal.

SPECIAL REPORT 30

Sunil Gavaskar Vs Kapil Dev

The simmering differences between the two Test stars, Sunil Gavaskar and Kapil Dev, surfaced after India lost the Delhi Test to England. Ashis Ray reports.

BOOK EXTRACT 38

The Tragedy of Punjab

We publish the concluding part of the extract from M.J Akbar's book, India: The Siege Within.

Page 14

Page 30

SUNDAY SPECIAL 36

Royal Battles

Alongside filmstars, kings and princesses of yesteryear lent colour to the recent Lok Sabha elections. Madhu Jain profiles some of these royal personages.

COMMENT

Guest Column Chanchal Sarkar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 8
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12

NEWS 49

Laldenga Forecasts Peace
NSCN's Terror Tactics

VARIETY

Khaas Baat 65
This India 66
Sundayweek 67
Chess/Bridge/Quiz 69
Teasers 70
Peanuts 72

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Delhi Diary 74

PUNCHLINE/KUTTY

r illustration by ata Ganguly

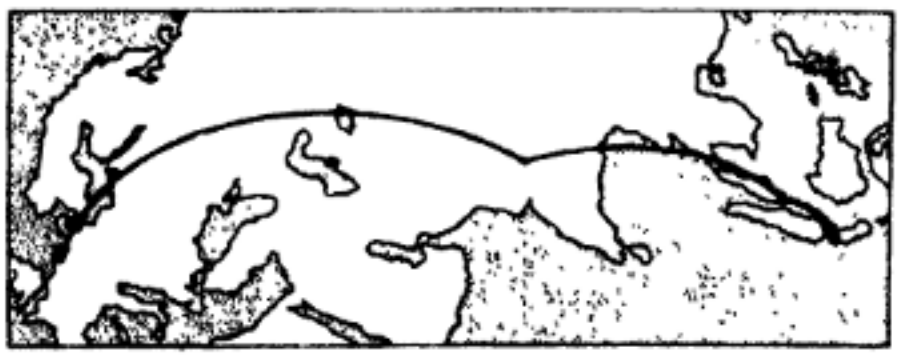
Editor M.J. Akbar



Associate Editor Tooshar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K John, Gouri Salvi, Henry Jacob, Rajiv Bagchi, Srinjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay
Olga Tellis
Bangalore
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati
Seema Guha
Trivandrum
Venu Menon
Srinagar
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar Jk-Delhi

"Don't say that's Amsterdam down there already!"

"Yes – KLM's new non-stop flight gets you there so much quicker."

The shortest way to Holland is from Delhi to Amsterdam on KLM's new direct flight. It gets you there in just 9 hours — a whole 2½ hours less than before!

For every passenger flying to Amsterdam from outside Europe, there's Holland-on-the-House*. That's one night in Amsterdam all paid for — including breakfast, free entrance to museums and the Casino at Scheveningen, discount rates on canal cruises, city sightseeing and guided tours. Plus major discounts on car rentals, shopping & hotel rates for subsequent nights.

Then there's Win-on-the-Way* for Royal Class and Business Class passengers. If you're in transit and catching an onward flight from Amsterdam the same day, your ticket enters you for a draw in the sky! So when you arrive at Schiphol, you could have won a Volvo. Or a brilliantly faceted diamond. Or 15 Dfl worth of tax-free shopping.

As you can see, the best reason to fly KLM to Amsterdam is not just the shortest flight!

* Offered by the Holland Promotion Foundation. Valid upto 31st March 1985

For Information call us at:
Bangalore 28703, Bombay 221013, Calcutta 441221, Delhi 343998 and Madras 86356.

The Reliable Airline KLM Royal Dutch Airlines

CLARION D 398

GUEST COLUMN/CHANCHAL SARKAR

Civil Rights in a Democracy

Why are civil rights bodies in Delhi trying to nudge the courts about the anti-Sikh riots? It is to try and wrest a remedy from an unwilling government. Though the writ petitions have asked for the prosecution of named police recalcitrants and political agents provocateurs and asked for pension for the women made widows, there is always a prayer attached—the appointment of a commission of inquiry or at least a probe by the CBI. An enquiry should have been natural (see Bhopal) but it hasn't yet been ordered. The presumption is that the findings would be thorny for the government and the ruling party which have their eyes cocked towards the elections.

Meanwhile relationships between Sikhs and Hindus have turned to one of unspoken reserve. Far too many thinly-veiled ethnic remarks are now heard. Sikh children in Delhi schools are asking for transfers away from the city, Sikh property is on the market for sale and even if a recent estimate (150,000) is an exaggeration, some Delhi Sikhs have definitely migrated to the Punjab.

Public interest litigation lawyers hope that they can convince the courts that there is a case for investigation and get directions from the court to the government. At least three petitions have been put before the Delhi High Court. One on behalf of the Nagrik Ekta Manch sought the recognition of refugee camps which the government was ignoring. The court ordered the recognition. Another, filed by a journalist, wanted the prosecution of some policemen allegedly neglecting their duties. The third, moved on behalf of the People's Union for Civil Liberties and the People's Union for Democratic Rights carries the names mentioned in the PUCL-PUDR report Who Are The Guilty. The list has been expanded (and the areas covered) and prosecution sought of those named.

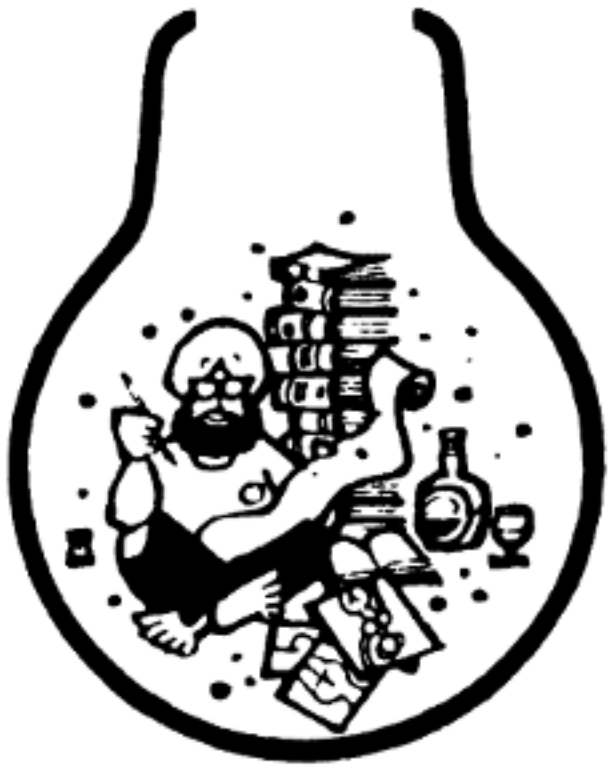
Actually the prima facie case is sound. The people at the top swithered over calling in the army and declaring a curfew. For the first two days the curfew was nominal and the violence careened on. The lieutenant governor (then Gavai) declared that he thought refugee camps would not be required! The home secretary (then Wali) gave figures of casualties that were absurd (like 5 on the first day). Police were not just absent, in places they joined in the arson and loot. Pointers show that the wrecking, looting and killing were not spontaneous but organised and some Congress(I) 'leaders' from the under-side of politics seemed to have had a guiding role.

The evidence for all this will have to be wormed out of witnesses who still fear for their lives and livelihood. But it can be done. As the government seems coy about appointing a commission into the riots (Mr Justice Thakkar is to enquire, in camera, into the assassination, Mr Anand Ram into the question of the police and the security of VIPs) seven good men and true have started an inquiry themselves. The chairman is S.M. Sikri, former Chief Justice of India, and the others are Air Chief Marshal Arjan Singh, Jajeshwar Dayal, Govind Narain, Badruddin Tyabji, S. Srinivasavaradan and Gurbachan Singh. They have started work at the Vishwa Yuvak Kendra, visiting the blitzed areas and listening to whoever wants to speak to them. But they fear they will find the pinning of responsibility difficult without access to official papers.

If one looks at the range of investigative journalism done by the American, British, Japanese, as well as a number of Indian instances, it is clear that non-official enquiries can ferret out a great deal of information. There would be little charm in a democracy if they didn't.

Nevertheless they are surely on to a worthwhile inquest. If one looks at the range of investigative journalism done by the American press (Watergate is only one example), the British (the thalidomide case and Kim Philby cases) and Japanese (Kakuei Tanaka's finances) as well as a number of Indian instances in the last three years (Kuo Oil, Dhirendra Brahmachari's affairs) it is clear that non-official enquiries can ferret out a great deal of information. There would be little charm in a democracy if they didn't.

In turning up clues from the reactions of individual policemen, army officers, administrators and citizens of Delhi, the press did an excellent job. Having just done a survey of the first seven days' coverage in Delhi's English dailies, I am full of admiration. The signal failure of judgment of the people at the top, the delay in tamping down the violence, the misplaced confidence that everything would subside in a few days, the incompetence and worse of the police and the failure of the telephones and hence of the machinery of seeking help, the doings of the politicians, the overwhelming importance given to the lying-in-state of Mrs Gandhi and the internationally attended funeral—all these stand out in sharp relief.



To depend exclusively on press accounts would, of course, be a mistake. Tapped out for next morning's paper, there are generalisations and perhaps even some errors crept in. It is for systematic enquiry to winnow and check them out. But the information and the reactions reported are invaluable source material. It is the press, too, which reported the remarkable response of the ordinary public with relief articles like warm clothes, medicines and food and the quite splendid work done by voluntary agencies like the Nagrik Ekta Manch, especially by young people.

What chances are there of the Supreme Court or the Delhi High Court taking an unconventional innovative and path-breaking line? Paradoxically a human situation, the composition of a bench, is often the deciding factor—and the stature of the advocate arguing the issue.

Jinnah's Love Life

The image of the Qaid as a cold, austere, single-minded lawyer-politician has persisted largely because little is known of his emotional life. Stanley Wolpert, author of Nine Hours to Rama, the story of Mahatma Gandhi's assassination which was banned in India has now written Jinnah's biography, Jinnah of Pakistan (Oxford University Press). It reveals quite a lot of Jinnah's married life and the mess he made of it.

In 1916 when Jinnah was 40 and generally acknowledged as the outstanding politician of India and the symbol of Hindu-Muslim unity, he was invited by his client, friend and admirer, Sir Dinshaw Maneckjee Petit, to spend a few days with them in their chateau in Darjeeling. The Petit's only child, Ratanbai or Ruttie, was then a vivacious and pretty girl of 16. Jinnah and Ruttie fell in love. A few months later, Jinnah asked Sir Petit what he thought of inter-communal marriages. He expressed enthusiastic approval of such marriages as a step towards national integration. Jinnah promptly asked for his daughter's hand. And was as promptly turned down by the very irate Parsi baronet and forbidden to see Ruttie ever again. He did not know his self-willed daughter nor his more self-willed son-in-law to be. Two years later when Ruttie came of age, she converted to Islam, took the name Mariam and married Jinnah on 19 April, 1918 in his house South Court, Mount Pleasant Road, Bombay. Sir Dinshaw never saw his daughter again. The Jinnahs spent a short honeymoon in Naini Tal in the house of Nawab of Mahmudabad who had earlier given the groom a wedding ring for his bride.

Despite Jinnah being more than twice her age, Ruttie was very happy and enjoyed her husband's eminence. At the time the only Indians of the same stature were Tilak, Gokhale and Moti Lal Nehru. Gandhi had returned to India and was busy recruiting volunteers for the Red Cross to serve with the British army Jinnah was the revolutionary and hero of Indian youth and the only one who could give the English bara sahibs as good as he got from them. Soon after their honeymoon, the Jinnahs were invited to dinner by Willingdon who was then governor of Bombay. Ruttie turned up in a very low cut Parsian evening gown displaying much of her bosom. Lady Willingdon ordered one of her lackeys to bring a "wrap to cover up Mrs Jinnah." Jinnah leapt up from his seat and snapped at his hostess: "When Mrs Jinnah feels cold, she will say so and ask for a wrap herself." The two stormed out of Government House never to re-enter it till after the Willingdons had left.

Ruttie enjoyed the rough and tumble of political life. A year later she and her husband were manhandled at a public meeting. Bombayites raised funds to build a People's Jinnah Memorial Hall to mark his triumph over conservative elements in the Congress. Next summer, they were in London. Diwan Chaman Lal recalled Jinnah's "uninhibited laughter when telling a funny story" and Ruttie's vivacity. It was in London that their only child, Dina, was born on 15 August, 1919.

Jinnah made friends with Lloyd George, Ramsay MacDonald and Montagu but earned the hatred of Willingdon, Chelmsford and the new governor of Bombay, George Lloyd who described him as "fair of speech and black of heart."

Soon after the birth of their child, the Jinnahs began to drift apart. This coincided with the emergence of Gandhi as the supreme leader and Jinnah's breach with the Congress. He began to resent Ruttie's brash ways: she would turn up in her husband's chambers improperly dressed. At one meeting when Jinnah was fighting an election from a purely Muslim constituency, Ruttie turned up with a tiffin basket and in front of everyone said: "J, guess what I have brought you for lunch ! I have brought you some lovely ham sandwiches." Although Jinnah observed no religious taboos regarding food or drink, he was put out by this faux pas. However, till 1925 being Indian was more important to him than being Muslim. He told the Nawab of Mahmudabad: "My boy, you are an Indian first and then a Muslim."

Jinnah's total absorption in law and politics drove Ruttie to cultivate other interests. She began attending seances to communicate with the dead, wearing charms that had been magnetised and started taking drugs. Instead of confiding in her husband she began to confide in his friend Kanji Dwarka Das. She admitted to him, "I don't profess any creed nor do I subscribe to a belief." Her health began to fail. She turned to Theosophy and called on Mrs Annie Besant. Mrs Besant wrote to Dwarka Das : "Don't you see unhappiness in her eyes? Look at her!" Ruttie was then 25, in the prime of her youth and hankering for a full life; her husband was an ageing 50 immersed in his work with no time for her. The love that Ruttie could not get from her husband nor dared to get from other men, she got from her pets: she kept numerous cats and dogs, pampered and nursed them as her own children.

Mohammad Ali Jinnah (left) with Mahatma Gandhi

The Jinnahs went abroad together but only to keep up appearances. In 1928 when Ruttie returned to Bombay, she did not go to her husband's home, South Court on Malabar Hill but rented a suite of rooms in the Taj Mahal Hotel. When her husband came back from London, she was not there to receive him. Thereafter they never slept under the same roof.

Ruttie's health declined rapidly. She was in Paris when her temperature shot up to 106 and was reported to be dying. Jinnah rushed to her bedside. By the time he got there, she had got over the crisis and soon after returned to Bombay ahead of her husband. Thereafter she was bedridden most of the time. Her only companions were Kanji Dwarka Das and her pets. Jinnah would drop in briefly in the evenings. The last words she spoke were to Kanji Dwarka Das: "Look after my cats and don't give them away." Two days later she died on her 29th birthday.

Jinnah was in Delhi when his wife died in Bombay. Kanji Dwarkadas met him at the railway station and told him that Ruttie had expressed her wish to be cremated. Jinnah ignored the plea. Ruttie was buried with Muslim rites in a Muslim graveyard. M.C. Chagla who was present describes the scene. Jinnah maintained his reserve till the body was lowered into the grave and as the closest relative he was asked to throw the first clod of earth on the corpse. Then suddenly he broke down, sobbed and wept like a child. "There were actually tears in his eyes. That was the only time when I found Jinnah betraying the shadow of human weakness."

When Thousands Die

When people die in the thousands, victims lose their personal identity. It was only a month after the event that I came to know that amongst the victims of the anti-Sikh riots in Delhi was an old friend of my Lahore days, Giani Kuldip Singh (72) and his son Ravinder (37). They lived in the Trans-Yamuna colony known as Shakkarpur—appropriate name for Kuldip's locality as amongst his many other habits was to fill his pockets with candy before stepping out of his house to give to street urchins: he was a mobile Shakkarganj (sugar market of Shakkarpur—sugar town. Kuldip Singh had done many things in his life. He worked for Reuters, The Tribune, Sainik Samachar and taught journalism before he retired to devote the remaining years of his life to organising Punjabi litterateurs and providing amenities in his colony. He was much respected and loved by his neighbours.

On the 1st of November the mob came for the aged Giani and his family. Hindu neighbours hid his women folk and children in their homes and padlocked his door from the outside. Giani and his son decided to stay inside hoping their kindly neighbours would persuade the vandals to spare their home. They did their best: they lied to the thugs that the Giani and his son had fled to safety. "In that case we will burn down their house," they said. They set it on fire. Father and son ran out of the blazing inferno into the frenzied mob and were battered to death.

Kuldip Singh

Ravinder Singh

Giani Kuldip Singh was one of the rare species of humans who had made 'not hurting peoples feelings' into an article of faith. His death hurt the feelings of thousands of his friends.

Ambar Field Pvt. Ltd.
G-55 Connaught Place
New Delhi-110 001.
Telephone: 323147
2/1 Loudon Street
Calcutta-700 016.

Sole Party exclusively authorised to operate and maintain within the territory of India a service organisation for Omega and Tissot watches.

Omega Models are available at Duty Free Shops in India (Bombay, Calcutta, Delhi, Madras) and Nepal (Kathmandu).

For Further Information write to New Delhi

dw/ar-5

"Sweetex helps me stay slim. It saves me 2600 calories a week . . . without actually fasting."

Any doctor will tell you, overweight is mostly due to overeating. And thus excess calorie intake. Remember this simple formula. Six cups of tea a day equals twelve teaspoons of sugar. That's 384 calories daily.* If you cut out sugar in tea and coffee alone, you can save up to 2600 calories a week without actually fasting.

Replace sugar with Sweetex. Invisibly. Effortlessly. It doesn't give you licence to gorge. It isn't a magic formula. But it helps you to cut out calories. It lends support to your calorie controlled diet. And helps you control your weight.

(* One rounded teaspoon of sugar = 32 calories)

Sweetex

SUGAR FREE SWEETENER

FOR THE WEIGHTWATCHER!

Trikaya B.REV.1.84

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Wanted: A Consensus

All that is said by leaders of political parties during an election campaign is not to be taken seriously. But many things said during the present poll campaign have been unfortunate and should not have been said. The Congress(I) has particularly erred more in this than the others. The party's advertisement blitz in the print media—the bill runs into several crores of rupees—were in bad taste; those who wrote the copy seem to have allowed words to creep in which are not in good taste: for example, they have used bhangi to refer to a harijan and "taxi driver" to suggest a Sikh.

Still worse has been Rajiv Gandhi's depiction of the opposition parties as forces threatening the country's unity and integrity. He has blamed them for encouraging the extremists in Punjab and anti-national forces in Kashmir and elsewhere, suggesting that there is no great difference between them and traitors. These are observations not worthy of a Prime Minister. Moreover, the Congress(I) is to blame for most of the problems facing the country. And at times one wondered why he had reduced the election to a referendum on the Anandpur Sahib resolution which, he erroneously, equated with the demand for Khalistan.

Leaders of the other political parties may have been provoked to retaliate, but that can be no excuse for some of the unfortunate remarks they have made. Both sides have given the impression that one is not really to concede even an inch to the other. The result is that an atmosphere of confrontation has developed. This cannot but cause concern. For, from whichever angle one looks, the country has to have a consensus on major issues. Now that the poll is over, this exercise must begin.

The practice of narrowing differences by dialogue among political parties, which was an integral part of Nehru's policies, was made meaningless during Mrs Gandhi's regime. She did call opposition parties at times for a discussion and even associated them with the talks on Punjab and Assam. But these exercises always turned out to be part of her strategy to show that even the opposition parties had no solution to offer or that they too were exasperated over the demands made.

Seldom were they taken into confidence or given a role; the effort was to score points. Perhaps, the opposition parties had their views and did not want the ruling party to get the credit for a settlement and so did not try to find one; perhaps, they were divided among themselves and found it more convenient to make the Congress(I) a scapegoat to be blamed for all the ills of the country.

But whoever is to blame, some kind of togetherness on tackling certain problems has to be developed for the country's sake. One does not know from where to pick up the thread, but it has to be picked up; the warring posture that all the parties without exception have adopted cannot alone solve the problems that the nation faces.

Take Punjab and Assam. In Punjab, the problem is not as intractable as the Congress(I) has made it out to be. In his poll speeches, Rajiv Gandhi has himself said that the territorial and water problems are solvable and these are the main issues. As regards the Anandpur Sahib resolution, which is vague and at places objectionable, it should not present any difficulty in reaching a settlement though the Prime Minister has said that it cannot even be considered.

The Akalis have themselves gone on record as having said that the Anandpur Sahib resolution should be referred to the Sarkaria Commission which is now looking into centre-state relations. This is unexceptionable. In fact, it was Swaran Singh, Mrs Gandhi's emissary, who had made them agree to it. That was more than two years ago and Longowal has repeated this assurance in a tape-recorded interview with me.

As regards Assam, it is the government that has gone back on its word. It announced time and again that the cut-off year would be 1971, that is, all those who had crossed into India from Bangladesh after that period would be deleted from the electoral rolls and deported from Assam. The All Assam Students Union (AASU), which launched the agitation, did not agree to it at that time, but is now willing to do so . Political parties have agreed to this and the Election Commission too has endorsed the proposal to have a poll in the states on the basis of the 1971 electoral rolls.

But now, the government of India has opted for the 1979 electoral rolls; in fact, the rolls are under revision. The Congress(I) has done this with an eye on its votebank comprising a majority which has come into India from Bangladesh.

The Assamese would feel alienated further. And, the problem which now is near solution on the basis of the 1971 electoral rolls would again be reopened. Already New Delhi has divided the Assamese on communal and other lines. H.C. Sarin, now India's high commissioner in Kathmandu, did enough harm while he was adviser to the Governor of Assam in the late Seventies.

The new government should settle the Assam and Punjab problems because on this depends the future of India's polity. The people will certainly not accept the dismemberment of the country, but if to keep the country together we have to accept an authoritarian government, the remedy would be worse than the disease. It is only by consensus at this time that a way out can be found.

The new government should settle the Assam and Punjab problems because on this depends the future of India's polity. The people will not accept the dismemberment of the country.

A Colossal Waste

The cover story, The Selling of a Prime Minister (SUNDAY, 9 December), made interesting reading. The Congress(I) is going ahead full steam in an effort to launch its image-boosting exercises. And judging from the advertisement campaigns, it appears that the Congress(I) may walk away with a bulk of the votes in the elections.
Sumit Mukherjee, Jamshedpur

• I agree with the statement that "style makes the man and the party." But, spending crores of rupees on advertisements that "may be a little too heavy for the breakfast" for the people is a colossal waste.
Sujit Ghosh, Calcutta

• The article, It's Congress(I) Time, by Behula Chowdhury and Roma Ghosh, shows that Doordarshan has become a spokesman for the ruling party. Should the Congress(I) win in the ensuing elections, I feel that we should switch off our television sets, since most of the programmes will be dull, being Congress(I) programmes.
A. Mitra, Delhi

• Question: "Will your groceries list in the future include acid bulbs, iron rods, daggers?" My answer: "No. These have been always given to us free of cost by politicians and their parties. We have no evidence to believe that this practice will be stopped, either now or in the future.
V. Durga Prasad, New Delhi

Perceptive

Madhu Limaye's analysis of the Punjab crisis (Communal politics of the Akalis, 25 November) was impressive and illuminating. But while referring to the army operation in the Golden Temple, the author implies disapproval. Was it a rule by force? Can any government worth the name tolerate conversion of the holy temple to a terrorist base?
P. Subramaniam, Madurai

Apt Analysis

M.J.Akbar's Dateline (11 November) was logical, scholastic and thought-provoking. However, I do not agree with him that the Delhi riots were masterminded by Hindu fanatics. Such a view is biased.
Dibyendu Ghosh, Siliguri (West Bengal)

A Heinous Act

Khushwant Singh's At the Receiving End (Gossip sweet and sour. 25 November—1 December) pained me. While no words can be sufficient to condemn the gruesome assassination of Mrs Indira Gandhi, it could be complacency on our part to take the ensuing eruption of senseless violence and communal madness as a momentary and sudden outburst of emotion and grief over the grim tragedy. The orgy of violence, loot and arson will have serious repercussions. Though we have options available at the moment, the time is ripe for introspection. It will be helpful to us if we learn from our past mistakes and view matters in their proper perspective. Communal politics has come of age and a majority of us are passive spectators to communal incidents. We have been critical of the role of Sikh intellectuals vis-a-vis Operation Bluestar. Now, let all intellectuals irrespective of caste, creed or community rise to the occasion and rededicate themselves to the cause for which Mrs Gandhi made the supreme sacrifice.
Abida Samiuddin, Aligarh

• For the first time Khushwant Singh has understood how the Jews felt in Nazi Germany and how Muslims must have felt in Bhiwandi and Moradabad. But how insecure the Hindus must have felt in Punjab before Operation bluestar is not mentioned. What has Mr Singh done for the Hindus killed by the Sikhs led by Bhindranwale?
Santosh Sinha, Berhampore (West Bengal)

• Khushwant Singh's statement that "such things never happened during British rule" is ridiculous. It is surprising that a journalist should have such little knowledge of history or of the state-engineered communal riots of British days. Perhaps, this yearning for the British raj and for "things phoren," explains why he preferred to take shelter in the Swedish Embassy than with his Hindu friends. It is astounding that not a single Hindu friend of his was ready to help him, whereas in our locality, no Sikh was harmed because their Hindu neighbours protected them.

What turned some Hindus away from Sikhs (I am not talking of goondas, touts and political agents who were responsible for the killings) was not the crime committed by two Sikhs but the irresponsible statements made by the so-called Sikh intellectuals who condoned the murder of Hindus in Punjab, putting a temple above human lives and alleging that only Punjabi Hindus helped the Sikhs during the recent riots. This policy of creating a rift between communities is typical of British rule, of which Khushwant Singh is an avid admirer. His statements to the BBC and the local press smack of opportunism.
Mridula Garg, New Delhi

• A much deeper vision is expected of a writer like Khushwant Singh. However, his statements suggesting that the Sikhs were sheltered by only a particular section of the Hindus can be equated with Giani Kirpal Singh's denial of having issued a statement expressing griet at Mrs Gandhi's massacre.

It is clear that there are no Sikhs with rationale and vision in the Akali Dal or other Sikh organisations. Otherwise, how could they allow a murderer like Bhindranwale to occupy the Golden Temple?
B. C. Biswas, Siliguri (West Bengal)

• Mr Khushwant Singh's article, At the Receiving End had certain objectionable paragraphs. He claims that the Granth Sahib was burnt by Hindus. That can never be the case because the Granth Sahib is also a holy book for the Hindus. Is he aware of the fact that many Hindus saved Sikh lives by hiding them in their own houses? To compare the Sikhs with the Jews in Nazi Germany is nonsense. All Jews in Nazi-Germany were removed from important posts and treated as sub-humans. In India, many Sikhs occupy top positions and are given equal opportunities.
Surendra Prasad Tripathi, Santragachi, Howrah

Unreliable

There cannot be any behaviour more condemnable than conspiracy against the country (The Conspiracy, 25 November—1 December). The Delhi police, like other policemen all over the country, are to be blamed.

Rajia Ashraf, Kanpur

• Since independence, the police have lost all credibility. People today are certain that they can live peace fully and safely even without them as their presence in sensitive areas creates more problems. I do not hesitate to say that a trained dog squad would have served more faithfully than Satwant Singh and Beant Singh.

A.A. Alvi, Aligarh

Praiseworthy

Madhu Jain's article, Sikhs: Still Refugees (25 November 1984) was praiseworthy. The wave of violence has ended and it is time for us to come forward and heal the wounds. Compensations should be given without delay.

Vezopra, Kohima

JP's Only Mistake

Kuldip Nayar in his column, A Commission for Revenge (Exclusive, 2—8 December 1984) has rightly asserted that the Kudal Commission has been appointed to undo all that Jayaprakash Narain did. JP, who is widely respected all over the country, committed only one mistake in his life: the formation of the Janata Party. It is only due to this that the ruling party is trying its best to undo what he did. The Kudal Commission's area of inquiry and terms of reference should be widened to go into the irregularities of all the government departments and projects.

S.C. Mathur, Agra

Informative

The cover story, Ready, Steady, Go... (2—8 December 1984) by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya was very informative. Only the Congress(I) is ready and steady to face the coming elections, though how successful the party will be is questionable.

V.N. Narayanaswamy, Madras

Unique Organisation

SEWA women at work

In The Good Samaritans (2 December), Tushar Bhatt presents an interesting picture of SEWA, a unique organisation for improving the conditions of women. SEWA sets an example not only for the Gandhians but also for the non-Gandhians. Under the able leadership of Ela Bhatt, SEWA will add a new dimension to the concept of womanhood. Its long-term programmes will be fruitful, provided they are not politicised.

Kartikeswar Behara, Keonjhar (Orissa)

Hypocritical

In his article, I am Ashamed Today (11 November), the veteran journalist, Kuldip Nayar, bravely announces that he is ashamed of being an Indian. It is no doubt a great thought by a great man in the wake of Mrs Gandhi's assassination and the communal flare-up that followed.

The point is: Has Mr Nayar just woken up after a long slumber, like the legendary Rip Van Winkle, to find himself "ashamed today"? Since 1947 there have been mass killings in India on some pretext or the other. The worst killings in recent history took place in Assam in early 1983 when about five thousand innocent people were butchered. Mr Nayar did not find sufficient reasons to be "ashamed of being an Indian" then. Did he not feel any concern for the thousands killed and hundreds of thousands rendered homeless in Assam? Did he not feel the same way when hundreds were killed in Tripura? Why these double standards? This is most sickening, especially when it comes from senior journalists of national repute who are supposed to be builders of healthy public opinion. This is not only duplicity, but also hypocrisy and smacks of communalism. It is expected that responsible people should be more consistent in their approach and more so while they write for public consumption.

Indrajit Gupta, Guwahati

Revealing

M. J. Akbar's essay, Religion, Life and Death (11 November) was highly revealing. In India, politics is very much entwined with religion. Unfortunately, today, religion is dividing the people instead of acting as a cementing force. As Marx rightly said, it has become the opium of the masses. Mrs Gandhi was murdered simply because she wanted to protect religion. In a country like the United States, where Christians form 88 per cent of the population, the Supreme Court held that children should not be compelled to participate in Christian prayer meetings. In India, soon after independence, the Constituent Assembly advocated a total ban on political parties formed on communal lines, but nothing has been done to that effect. With religious extremism assuming abnormal proportions, it is high time that communal parties were banned.

Thomas Kutty, Hyderabad

THE QUEST

How five men have been striving for five years to become Prime Minister

BABU JAGJIVAN RAM

For Babu Jagjivan Ram, the senior-most parliamentarian in the country, the quest for prime ministership has been a two decade-long dream. He almost made it to the coveted office in March 1977 and again in July 1979, but on both occasions there was the ironical slip between the cup and the lip. Babuji is now 76 years old, but his name has again cropped up as a prime ministerial probable, albeit hypothetically. The chairman of West Bengal's ruling Left Front and CPI(M) leader, Saroj Mukherjee, has gone on record recently saying that if a coalition government is formed at the centre, he would prefer Babu Jagjivan Ram as the Prime Minister. Whether a coalition is likely at the centre in the immediate future is debatable. Equally debatable is the CPI(M) leader's contention that Babu Jagjivan Ram would be acceptable to many. However, when a national party like the CPI(M), which is a major opposition force, makes a commitment, it cannot be taken lightly.

Babu Jagjivan Ram's quest for prime ministership began in 1964. After the death of Jawaharlal Nehru, Babu Jagjivan Ram, who had quit his ministerial post a year ago under the Kamaraj plan, became a serious contender for prime ministership along with Morarji Desai. Babuji had been a cabinet minister at the centre since 1946. He was elected to the Central Legislative Assembly in 1946 and by virtue of the election became a member of the Constituent Assembly. Between 1950 and 1952, after the Constituent Assembly had finished its work, he was a member of the provisional Parliament and has been elected to the Lok Sabha without break since 1952. (Only the Revolutionary Socialist Party leader, Tridib Choudhury, can match Babuji's unbeaten record in the Lok Sabha.) The candidatures of both Babuji and Morarjibhai were opposed by the powerful syndicate in the Congress. They preferred Lal Bahadur Shastri. (The syndicate, which was dislodged from its predominant position in the party by Mrs Gandhi following the 1969 split, had as its important members K. Kamaraj, the then AICC president, S.K. Patil, Neelam Sanjeeva Reddy, Atulya Ghosh and Chandra Bhanu Gupta.) Such was the importance of Babuji's bid for prime ministership in 1964 that the day Lal Bahadur Shastri was elected leader of the Congress Parliamentary Party, he went to Babuji's residence at 6, Hastings Road (now called Krishna Menon Marg) at 8.20 am and accompanied Babuji to Parliament House, where the leader was to be elected. As per the party's wishes, Morarji Desai proposed Lal Bahadur Shastri's name and Babuji seconded it. Thus ended his first quest for prime ministership.

Babu Jagjivan Ram first became a minister in 1937. He was made a parliamentary secretary in Bihar that year. He had been nominated to the Bihar Legislative Council a year earlier. Between 1937 and 1946, he was a member of the Bihar Legislative Assembly. Thereafter he shifted to elective posts in Delhi. He joined Nehru's cabinet in 1946 as the labour minister, a post he held till 1952. Between 1952 and 1956 he was the communications minister (the ministry then controlled the railways and the transport departments). He was the transport and railways minister in 1956-57 and when the railway ministry was first formed, he became the minister (1957 to 1962). In 1962-63, he was the transport and communications minister, till he was dropped under the Kamaraj plan. Prime Minister Shastri did not make him a minister.

When Shastri died in January 1966, along with Morarji Desai, Babuji made his second bid for prime ministership, though he realised his lack of support soon enough and did not fight a losing battle against Indira Gandhi like Morarji Desai did. While the syndicate had supported Lal Bahadur Shastri in 1964, this time the leading role in making Indira Gandhi the Prime Minister was played by D.P. Mishra, the then chief minister of Madhya Pradesh. Mishra rallied as many as 14 chief ministers to Mrs Gandhi's side. The syndicate fell in line and Babu Jagjivan Ram also supported her.

Jagjivan Ram with JP in Bombay in 1979

In 1966, Mrs Gandhi rehabilitated Babuji in the cabinet. He was given the labour, employment and rehabilitation portfolios. After the 1967 elections, he was given the ministry of food and agriculture and after the 1969 split he held additional charge of the labour, employment and rehabilitation portfolio. Between 1970 and 1974, he was the defence minister and along with Prime Minister Indira Gandhi shared the laurels for the 1971 Bangladesh victory.

At the time of the 1969 Congress split, Babuji supported Mrs Gandhi. So crucial was his support that when the Congress (Requisitionist), the party of Mrs Gandhi, held its plenary at Bombay in 1969, Babuji was made to preside over the historic session and was elected the Congress president at Bombay. For two years, amidst controversy regarding dual posts, he was both the party president and a cabinet minister. In 1971 he, as the Congress president, led the party to the massive Lok Sabha victory which ushered in the golden period of Indira Gandhi's regime.

After the 1971 victory, Mrs Gandhi realised the threat which could be posed to her if Babu Jagjivan Ram continued to hold dual posts o. party chief and a cabinet minister. Taking advantage of the hue and cry over the dual posts held by him, he was eased out of the Congress presidentship. In 1974, he was divested of the defence portfolio and assigned the ministry of food and agriculture instead. While he was the food and agriculture minister, the crisis of 12 June 1975 shook the country. Mrs Gandhi had been unseated from the Lok Sabha by a verdict of the Allahabad High Court. The news of the verdict was flashed on the United News of India (UNI) teleprinter at Babuji's residence at two minutes past ten that morning. By 10.10 am Babu Jagjivan Ram had reached 1 Safdarjung Road and extended support to Mrs Gandhi at her hour of crisis. He remained with her till around one in the afternoon and then returned home. Ministers then had not become totally subservient to the high command as they are now. As in the case of the 1966 switchover, some chief ministers tried to play a role in June 1975 as well. Maharashtra chief minister V.P. Naik, S.C. Shukla of Madhya Pradesh and Hemvati Nandan Bahuguna of Uttar Pradesh had reached Babuji's residence by the afternoon that day and they pleaded with him to become Prime Minister for the "interim" period, till Mrs Gandhi's appeal to the Supreme Court was disposed of. A strong lobby of senior MPs was also actively working for Babuji. He, however, chose to maintain a low profile. While the lobbying for an "Interim PM" (there is no such provision in the Constitution of India which says, "There shall be a council of ministers headed by the Prime Minister") went on, Babuji kept on reassuring Mrs Gandhi. "Unless Mrs Gandhi herself wants to resign, there is no claim from my side," was Babuji's line. Ultimately the laws were amended. The PM was put above the purview of the courts. The Emergency was imposed on 26 June 1975, a fortnight after the Allahabad judgement. In retrospect, Babu Jagjivan Ram's political maturity paid him dividends. Though he was close to Jayaprakash Narayan, he did not protest when Emergency was proclaimed. When Parliament reassembled for the monsoon session in August 1975 (with most opposition leaders in jails) Babu Jagjivan Ram moved the resolution endorsing the presidential proclamation of 26 June 1975.

Jagjivan Ram: perturbed by the Janata crisis?

After the elections were declared on 20 January 1977, Babuji pleaded with Mrs Gandhi to lift the Emergency. His relationship with Mrs Gandhi had always been cordial. Mrs Gandhi, in fact, used to take more care of Babuji than any other political colleague. For example, in every meeting of the party's high command where as per Congress custom members sat cross-legged on the floor, Mrs Gandhi used to ensure that a chair was brought for Babu Jagjivan Ram. In the early Fifties, while he was on his way to Geneva, Babuji's aircraft crashed and he fractured a leg. Since then he has difficulty in sitting on the floor.

When the Congress Parliamentary Board

Such was the importance of Babuji's bid for prime ministership in 1964 that the day Lal Bahadur Shastri was elected leader of the Congress Parliamentary Party, he went to Babuji's residence and accompanied Babuji to Parliament House, where the leader was to be elected. As per the party's wishes, Morarji Desai proposed Lal Bahadur Shastri's name and Babuji seconded it. Thus ended his first quest for prime ministership.

met on the morning of 2 February 1977 at 1 Akbar Road, Mrs Gandhi looked around for the chair which was to be placed for Babuji. The chair was there, but it was empty. She asked her aide, R.K. Dhawan to telephone Babuji's residence and ask him to come for the meeting. Only the night before the two leaders had met. Though Babuji had insisted that the Emergency be lifted, there was no hint that he was unhappy. When Dhawan telephoned 6, Krishna Menon Marg, he was told that Babuji would be reaching the meeting soon. In fact, at that very moment Babuji's letter of resignation was being typed At 10.30 am Babuji's aide, O.P. Arora, drove to 1 Akbar Road and handed over a letter addressed to the Prime Minister to R K. Dhawan. Arora and Dhawan were together in school. Without opening the sealed letter, Dhawan knew of its contents. He rushed to Mrs Gandhi and gave her the letter There was dismay in the meeting. Could Babuji be asked to rescind? Mrs Gandhi was upset. But hawks like Bansi Lal were of the opinion that the old man should be allowed to go. (It was Bansi Lal's stray statement that youth should be accomodated by denying tickets to old men like Babuji which had triggered off the process, which was later termed the "J-bomb.") After O.P. Arora reported back at 6, Krishna Menon Marg, Babuji drove to Rashtrapati Bhavan, to brief President Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed about the developments. He had resigned both from the government and the party. At 11.45 am, while Babuji's car was leaving Rashtrapati Bhavan, Mrs Gandhi drove in The two leaders crossed each other on the road; neither stopped. Babuji, who had stood by Mrs Gandhi since 1966, had opted out. That evening, along with two former chief ministers, H.N. Bahuguna of UP and Nandini Satpathy of Orissa, Babuji launched the Congress for Democracy (CFD), a party which contested the 1977 polls on the Bharatiya Lok Dal symbol (chakra-haladhar, the present Janata Party insignia). The formation of the CFD was the first indication of how the Congress would fare in the elections. The events which unfolded in the

"Indira Gandhi Was Supreme"

Siddhartha Shankar Ray told SUNDAY

After the Allahabad High Court judgment which set aside Mrs Gandhi's election, nobody else in the Congress wanted to become the Prime Minister. Everybody wanted Mrs Gandhi to continue as the Prime Minister. In fact, I remember we immediately issued a statement—there were 30 or 40 members of the working committee and the parliamentary board including Jagjivan Ram, Swaran Singh and Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed—saying that Mrs Gandhi must continue as the Prime Minister. When the judgment came over telex, I was at 1, Safdarjang Road and the Prime Minister took me to her dining room and said, "Siddhartha. I must resign. This judgment is against me." I told her, "You must not resign. There is no occasion for you to resign."

Within minutes, another telex message came intimating that the judgment had been stayed by the same judge who had set aside her election. I told her: "There is no question whatsoever of your stepping down We shall not have it. You must continue." Thereafter, K.C Pant and I prepared a statement sitting in the Prime Minister's dining room The statement was signed by all the leaders. Nobody thought for a second that somebody else should replace her

There was no question of Babu Jagjivan Ram making moves to become the PM. I think the people who hated Babuji tried to spread false propaganda to make him look ridiculous. I do not think that Babuji tried to become the Prime Minister. As far as I remember, the only thing Babuji said was that if Mrs Gandhi resigned on her own, she should not nominate a Prime Minister. Babuji also said that in case Mrs Gandhi thought of resigning, the next Prime Minister or in this case, the acting Prime Minister until the Supreme Court appeal was decided, should be elected by the parliamentary party and not be nominated by anybody. Perhaps, Babuji wanted to contest for the post of Prime Minister in case such a contest arose. However, whether he wanted to contest or not, I cannot tell you. But he signed our statement unhesitatingly, when I along with V.V. Raju and C.M. Stephen took it to his residence.

In such circumstances, the parliamentary party could have authorised Mrs Gandhi to nominate her successor. Babuji was not willing to accept that but was willing to accept Mrs Gandhi as Prime Minister. There was certainly no question of any race for prime ministership. Though Mrs Gandhi dropped Swaran Singh and Uma Shankar Dikshit from her cabinet after the declaration of Emergency, I do not think these were pointers to a power struggle in the Congress when Mrs Gandhi was the Prime Minister. I was in the Congress then. I think Swaran Singh was made the chairman of some very important committee. In fact, when Mrs Gandhi was the Prime Minister, until 1977, I was then in the Congress Working Committee and the Parliamentary Board and I did not even have the faintest notion of a power sruggle. Indira Gandhi was supreme and nobody questioned her authority, leadership and wisdom. In so far as the Allahabad judgment was concerned, there was no question of choosing anybody because Mrs Gandhi continued as Prime Minister. After her assassination, there was no Prime Minister. The Parliamentary Board had to move in the quickest possible time as the country could not remain without a Prime Minister. I am not in the Congress and I do not know what happened. Perhaps, because to call a parliamentary party meeting would take some time, the Parliamentary Board said that Rajiv Gandhi should become the Prime Minister in anticipation that theparliamentary party would fully endorse its view.

Interviewed by Tapan Mukherjee days following 2 February 1977 can certainly be attributed, at least partially to Babu Jagjivan Ram. The formation of the CFD on 2 February was followed by a massive rally on the Boat Club lawns in the capital on 5 February. Mrs Gandhi's aunt, Jawaharlal Nehru's younger sister, Vijaylaxmi Pandit, joined Babuji in criticising the Emergency regime: the Janata wave had begun.

Babuji made a serious bid for prime ministership after the defeat of Mrs Gandhi in the 1977 elections. Had a ballot been held among the newly-elected Janata MPs, Babu Jagjivan Ram would have polled more votes than both Chaudhary Charan Singh and Morarji Desai (in that order). But history could not record the massive support enjoyed by him in March 1977 because not entirely democratic methods were used while selecting the first non-Congress Prime Minister. Initially, Chaudhary Charan Singh was not averse to anyone selected by the party MPs. He was ill and had been admitted to the Willingdon Hospital (later renamed Dr Ram Manohar Lohia hospital). His group, the Bharatiya Lok Dal faction of the Janata Party, had the maximum number of MPs. The Bombay lobby, which had seen in Kanti Desai, the businessman son of Morarji Desai a good ally ever since Morarjibhai had come to Delhi as the commerce minister in the Fifties, worked overtime to ensure that Babuji's massive support did not ensure him the prime ministership. The Jana Sangh faction (predecessor of the present Bharatiya Janata Party) was supporting Babuji. A large section of the erstwhile Socialist Party members too favoured him. And Babuji had at his disposal the services of the astute political manipulator, H.N. Bahuguna, who had been Mrs Gandhi's star-performer during the 1969 split.

The decision, however, was not left to the party MPs but to the wishes of the moving spirit behind the Janata Party, the late Jayaprakash Narayan. The ailing Sarvodaya leader was camping at the office of the Gandhi Peace Foundation (GPF) on Deen Dayal Upadhaya Marg in Delhi. The GPF secretary, Radhakrishna, the owner of the Indian Express chain of newspapers, Ramnath Goenka, former Socialist Party leaders Madhu Limaye and Surendra Mohan and the Orissa stalwart Biju Patnaik, were by the side of JP in his sickbed. The RSS leader, Nanaji Deshmukh, seemed to be present everywhere. While Madhu Limaye (who was being relied upon heavily by JP) and Nanaji Deshmukh favoured a secret ballot, the rest were advocating a "consensus" or, in other words, favouring manipulations to a democratic election.

On the night of 23 March 1977, Babuji hosted a dinner at his residence. Atal Behari Vajpayee, Nanaji Deshmukh, Biju Patnaik, Madhu Limaye, Chandra Shekhar, H.N. Bahuguna, Madhu Dandavate, Chand Ram, Mohan Dharia, Mohammad Yunus Saleem, Ram Dhan and Nandini Satpathy were the prominent invitees to this dinner which lasted till around midnight. The consensus among the distinguished diners at 6, Krishna Menon Marg that night was that ballotting was the best way to elect a leader. Babuji was reassured. He knew what the outcome of a voting in the Janata Parliamentary Party could be His quest for prime ministership seemed to be in its final, successful phase.

A cheerful Babu Jagjivan Ram drove to the Gandhi Peace Foundation at 8.45 am on 24 March 1977. The Janata Party's MPs were to meet that day to elect the new leader. As he walked into the GPF, many party MPs congratulated him, in anticipation of his impending election. Babuji had gone to the GPF to meet JP. He was informed that JP was too ill to meet him and instead Acharya

CNS

Jagjivan Ram with his wife

J.B. Kripalani met him. Babuji and J.B. Kripalani never got along well. Babuji insisted on meeting JP. He was told that JP would meet him at Parliament House later that day.

Raj Narain, the man who had defeated Mrs Gandhi at Rae Bareili, had played a game that morning. He had gone to the sickbed of Charan Singh and got from him a letter for JP, in which the BLD faction's support was ensured for Morarji Desai. While JP personally did not favour Morarji Desai, he had no option but to take into account the views of the leader of the predominant group in the new ruling party. Secret ballot or open voting was given the go by.

Babuji returned home from the GPF. Before the MPs met, JP reached Parliament House. He sat in the office of the erstwhile Babuji's relationship with Mrs Gandhi had always been cordial. Mrs Gandhi, in fact, used to take more care of Babuji than any other political colleague. In every meeting, for example, of the party's high command where as per Congress custom members sat cross-legged on the floor, Mrs Gandhi used to ensure that a chair was brought for Babuji.

Jagjivan Ram (first row, second from right) with other Congress leaders at Bhubaneswar in 1964

A cheerful Babuji drove to the Gandhi Peace Foundation at 8.45 am on 24 March 1977. The Janata Party's MPs were to meet that day to elect the new leader. As he walked into the GPF, many party MPs congratulated him, in anticipation of his impending election. Babuji had gone to meet JP but he was informed that JP was too ill to meet him and instead Acharya J.B. Kripalani met him.

Congress(O), which was now turned into the Janata Parliamentary Party office. He telephoned Babuji and asked him to come to Parliament House. Babuji took sometime to leave home. By the time he reached Parliament House, it was too late. The decision, based on "consensus" had been taken in Morarji Desai's favour.

When the Janata Party split in July 1979 Babuji, then a deputy Prime Minister (a post which was given to him and Charan Singh in January that year) asked Morarji Desai to step down from the leadership of the truncated Janata Party in Parliament. He wrote a letter to Morarji Desai, which reached the PM's house around ten at night. By then, Desai had gone to bed. United News of India had managed to get a copy of the letter and it had been flashed on the wire service network that night. So, when Morarji Desai was given Babuji's letter the next morning, he had before him newspapers which carried the text of the letter, as reported by UNI. In that letter, Babuji had sought Morarji Desai's clarification on some aspects of the government's functioning and said that unless he got specific replies, it would be difficult for him to interject on the government's behalf in the no-confidence debate the next day. Morarji Desai refused to oblige Babuji. In the process, the Janata Party went out of power. Morarji Desai resigned from the prime ministership but for a while retained the leadership of the Janata Parliamentary Party. Later, with the support of party president Chandra Shekhar, Babuji became the JPP leader.

When it became clear to President Neelam Sanjeeva Reddy that Charan Singh was not in a position to command a majority in the Lok Sabha despite the support extended to his party, the Janata (Secular), by the Congress (Reddi), predecessor to the present Congress(S), he called Babuji and asked him if he could command a majority. The day the Lok Sabha was dissolved on 21 August 1979, accompanied by Chandra Shekhar, Babuji went to Rashtrapati Bhavan. The President told him that he had 24 hours to prove his majority and become the Prime Minister. Babuji agreed. His secretaries, O.P. Arora and Triveni Sahai, started getting signatures of most MPs on identical letters which had been prepared for the occasion. At 10.45 am that day Babuji met the President. At 11.45 am, when the prime ministerial aspirant had just reached Parliament House to supervise the operations in which he had managed to get the support of 245 Lok Sabha members, the radio announced the President's decision to dissolve the Lok Sabha. Charan Singh continued as the interim Prime Minister with the support of the Congress(I). Babu Jagjivan Ram's last serious bid for prime ministership was foiled.

When the Janata Party was routed in the 1980 Lok Sabha elections, Babuji was the parliamentary leader. He parted company with Chandra Skekhar's party within a fortnight of the election debacle. He initially joined the Congress(R) and later formed his own party, the Congress (Jagjivan Ram). He contested the recent Lok Sabha polls as the president of his own party, named after him. The Congress(J) is reckoned as a force in parts of UP and Bihar. In coalition politics, the Congress(J) could play a role if the ruling combination requires less than ten seats to form a government. One does not know if the CPI(M) leader Saroj Mukherjee's fancy for Babuji can make him the PM. But one thing is certain: If at any stage Babuji were to become the PM, he would get overwhelming support from the bureaucracy. Even at the height of the Janata crisis days, when he toured the length and breadth of the country for partywork, files in the defence ministry did not pile up. And, the remarkable thing was that Babuji disposed of the files in his own handwriting: the neat notes written in good English and red ink are popular with the bureaucrats who run this country. Babuji knew too well as a minister that a handwritten note from the minister ensures that the bureaucracy does not take things for granted. Babuji outside the government certainly is a loss for the administration.

CHARAN SINGH

K.M. Kasan

Charan Singh with JP

"How can you tell me to go back and work for Morarji Desai, when the nation wants me to be Prime Minister?" Chaudhary Charan Singh triumphantly asked his wife Gayatri Devi, in August 1978, while nursing his illness and a few grievances. He had parted company with the Janata government headed by Morarji Desai (his critics called it defection) and had just welcomed a journalist who told him something which pleased him no end. The taxi driver who took the journalist to the jat leader's house refused to accept any money: how could he take money from somebody who was going to see the only kisan leader India had. Moreover, the driver said that he would go to the Bangla Sahib gurudwara and pray that the leader of the kisans would soon become Prime Minister. Charan Singh was very keen to have the story repeated to his wife who, perhaps, did not then believe that her husband could be Prime Minister one day.

Charan Singh has never stopped dreaming of becoming a Prime Minister ever since, not even after the shortlived rule of six months when he finally sat on the much sought-after prime ministerial gaddi propped up for him by Sanjay Gandhi, from July 1977 to the end of that year. He did not even have the honour of attending a session of Parliament as Prime Minister.

The jat leader has always been in search of an ally in his quest for prime ministership over the years. Although he has a mass base, it is a portable one which travels with him from party to party. Actually, all he really does is to change the name of his party.

In this complicated quest, added to the usual additionandsubstraction of caste votes which Charan Singh is so fond of carrying out, he was willing to consort with anyone, even the devils of the past. Thus, in 1983 he formed the National Democratic Alliance (NDA) along with the BJP, conveniently forgetting the fact that he himself had made it a point to demonstrate his aversion for the BJP. He had wanted the former Jana Sangh constituent out of the Janata Party on the issue of dual membership and he broke away from the Janata Party on this issue. The jat leader who has not slipped up on his caste arithmetic had concluded that his followers along with the BJP's would make a winning combination. When this combination proved to be still-born, the Chaudhary began to covet other pastures.

The opposition unity efforts in 1984, in fact, turned out to be the longest political serial of the country. The story is still not over, with many components in the opposition to bring out their trump cards and begin the bargaining. The Chaudhary continues to be looked upon with suspicion till today. The most blatant, of course, was the remark of the vice-president of the BJP, Ram Jethmalani, in Solapur this August; "If this aged leader who is unable to stay awake after eight pm decides to retire from politics, opposition unity can be achieved in a mattter of minutes..."

The BJP president, A.B. Vajpayee had to apologise for Mr Jethmalani's remarks, even though he must have considered the NDA an unholy alliance of sorts. Much as many opposition leaders may dislike Charan Singh, they cannot do without his votes. The farmer's man has consolidated his base among the peasantry, "other backward castes" and artisans and extended his fiefdom beyond Uttar Pradesh to Bihar, Haryana and parts of Rajasthan. In this move to extend his base, Charan Singh had to consort with H.N. Bahuguna whom he once described as a KGB agent. Thus on 21 October 1984, the Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party was born, with Mr Bahuguna as the DMKP spokesman.

The return of Devi Lal, Karpoori Thakur and Kumbharam Arya to the DMKP was described as an act of "political piracy" by the Janata Party. Until then, there had been frantic efforts for a merger of the United Front and the Lok Dal. The elusive unity among the opposition parties was almost achieved many a time, but Charan Singh wanted complete control over the distribution of tickets for the 1984 election. He did not want to share that election duty with United Front chairman, Chandra Shekhar.

But, of course, the Chaudhary stands out. He has never contested a Lok Sabha election from the same party. After he left the Congress and formed the Bharatiya Kranti Dal—he left along with 17 of his followers—he contested the 1967 elections. (In fact, in the 1967 UP byelections, the BKD won 99 of the 425 UP Assembly seats.) In 1974, he contested as a member of the Bharatiya Lok Dal. In 1977, it was the Janata Party. In 1980, the Lok Dal and in 1984 the famous DMKP. The party remains the same, as does its leader, his politics and his ambitions. Only the name changes, and what, after all, is there in a name?

ATAL BEHARI VAJPAYEE

"It shall be an objective of Jana Sangh policies to end the separation of India and Pakistan and to bring the two together..."
—National policy statement in the party documents of the Bharatiya Jana Sangh, 1951.

"Jana Sangh is not prepared to recognise English and or Urdu as Indian languages. It will take steps to remove Urdu from the list of languages recognised in the Constitution..."
—From Bharatiya Jana Sangh party manifesto, 1954.

In 1978, when Atal Behari Vajpayee, the then foreign minister, described the Simla Pact as a "bedrock of Indo-Pakistan relations" at a press conference in Islamabad, a Pakistani journalist had then questioned him on how he who had led a "torchlight procession to Delhi" to protest against the Pact could make such a statement. The foreign minister, never at a loss for words, had replied: "That was the stand of the Jana Sangh, which is dead now. I belong to the Janata Party, which has a different policy..."

Not only had the former Jana Sanghi (he took over as the president of the party after Deen Dayal Upadhyaya was murdered in a train in February 1968) proved that he was a statesman, he also showed that he had come a long way from being a proponent of Akhand Bharat, and more important still, was a possible contender for the prime ministerial gaddi one day. A.B. Vajpayee, unlike some opposition leaders has never made a direct bid for prime ministership. He stood apart while the struggle for the kursi took place in 1979. It is only after the reincarnation of the Jana Sangh (which was dissolved when the Janata Party was born) into the Bharatiya Janata Party—BJP—in April 1980, that the grooming of its president as well as the party as a "national alternative" to Indira Gandhi and the Congress(I), respectively began.

The turning point was the first BJP national convention, held in Bombay in December that year. In his presidential address, Mr Vajpayee made a significant departure from the previously-held party line: the BJP, he said, "has accepted the concept of Gandhian socialism after due deliberation." The BJP, he promised, would "mobilise itself" to have Gandhian socialism accepted as a "third alternative" since communism and capitalism, the twin brothers, were both decaying. Gandhian socialism was then to take the BJP down this third path which would transform the party, limited thus far to the northern Hindi belt, to Hindus and to the urban population.

In its efforts to become broad-based, the BJP began a thrust southwards, beyond the Vindhyas. The party took in more Muslims (in Delhi the BJP had five Muslims in the civic bodies compared to Congress-I's two) and it has also rapidly shed its conservatism and stretched its umbilical links with the RSS to a near-breaking point.

During the BJP national convention held in Cochin, Kerala, in April 1981 (the convention was held in the south to demonstrate its all-India character), Mr Vajpayee reiterated that the BJP was no longer a party of the north. He also said that although Hindi was good as a link language, the south could retain English for as long as it wanted. A far cry indeed from 1954. It was at this convention that Mr Vajpayee advocated the three-language policy. And, most important, BJP leaders, including the party president declared emphatically that their party did not take "dictations" from the RSS, which was a "social and cultural organisation."

The BJP also passed a strong resolution to "integrate harijans into the main body of the country." To demonstrate how it had now spread its base to include the interests of minorities, the BJP leaders stressed the point that Muslim merchants had also contributed to the holding of the national session in Cochin.

This apparently acceptable face, that the BJP is trying to put forward was in full evidence at the national study camp held in Vrindavan in September 1981 where the strategy to enable the BJP to "share" power after the next general elections was outlined. By 1981, the BJP had grown confident of its growing clout in national politics.

The Vrindavan document defined the BJP as a "national alternative party" in Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Himachal Pradesh and Delhi, the "number two party" in Gujarat," a "major force" in Maharashtra and a "complementary party" in Haryana, Kashmir and Punjab. In Punjab, the document admitted it was lagging behind, although there was a "fund of goodwill" for it in Assam. It was nowhere, said the document, in Orissa and in West Bengal.

Atal Behari Vajpayee with Gen Zia

It's a hard day's night
I've been walkin' the town
Makin' a living
And I'm feelin' down
I've been on the move
'Cos I got money to make
But after it's all over
A man needs a break
So here's to the good times
It's gotta be said
I'm ready for a Royal
I'm lookin' for the Red

Yeah, I'm lookin' for the Red

WHEN YOU'RE LOOKIN'
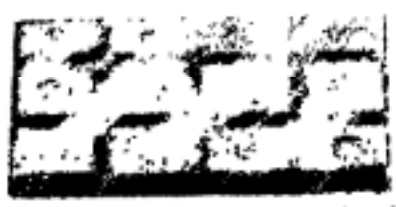
FOR A LIFT



RAO/EUR/AMC/1-83

NEW!

Amul Chocolates in attractive cartons

Soft and creamy, like Swiss chocolates ...

its creaminess sealed in silver foil ...

and foil-board carton to keep it fresh.

Amul CHOCOLATES

A gift for someone you love

Atal Behari Vajpayee with Nanaji Deshmukh

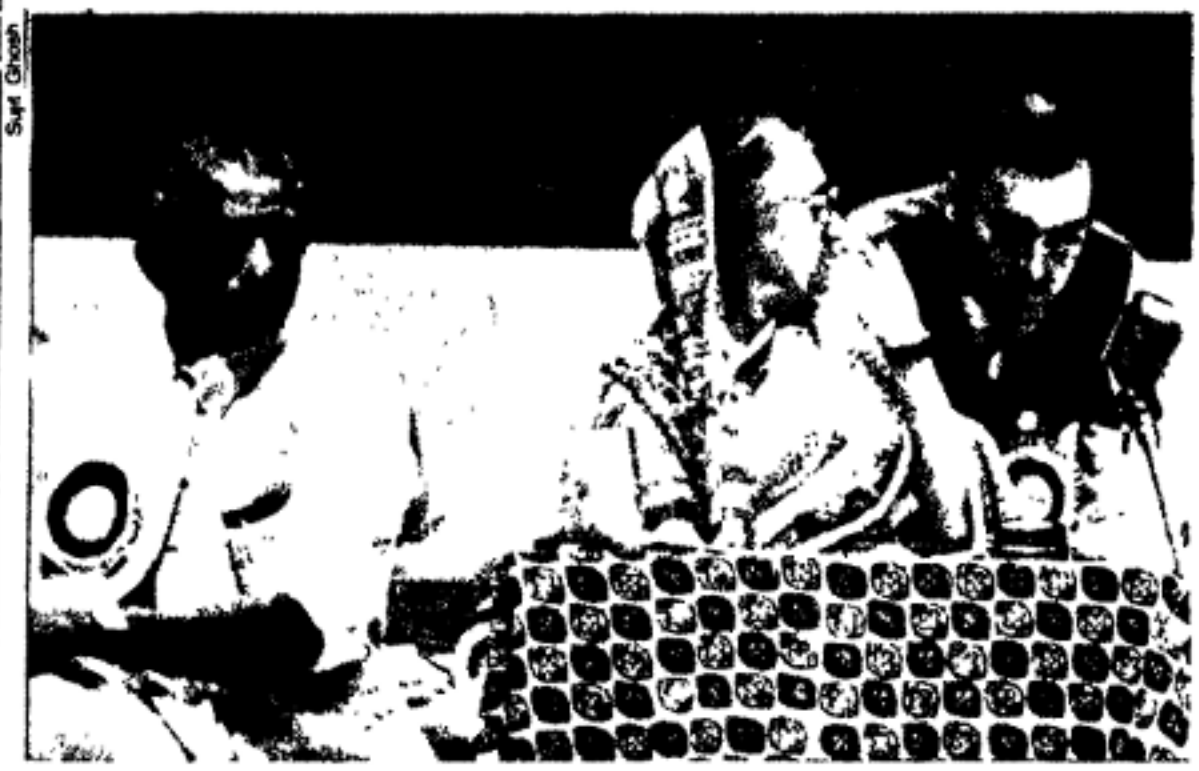
Even the CPI(M) in its party Congress in Vijayawada revealed that it was not averse to including the BJP in its anti-Congress(I) thrust. The BJP was after all emerging as the only party which had a charismatic leader, who could challenge Mrs Gandhi, a growing national following and a newly-found non-sectarian appeal. By 1982, the BJP's party membership had been expanded to 3.5 million, a million more than in 1980. When, on 28 March 1982, Arif Beg, then BJP secretary, said that his party was trying to bring in non-Hindus and to "spread the organisation in the rural areas" and that there was a favourable response to its initial overtures among the Muslims in the south and the Christians in Kerala, it was clear that the BJP was attempting to increase its base nationally.

The BJP could pat itself on the back because it had in the almost 100 parliamentary and Assembly byelections held since June 1980, gained two Lok Sabha seats and as many Assembly seats. A.B. Vajpayee had been described by the eminent M.C. Chagla as the best foreign minister, and even the future Prime Minister. In Karnataka, the party increased its strength from 4 to 18 seats, in Andhra Pradesh, it added one more seat to its existing three. By 1983, however, the situation had changed. The balloon was first pricked after the BJP defeat in the Delhi civic elections held in February 1983. Mr Vajpayee resigned as party president, though he was reinstated a few days later. The BJP fared badly in the municipal elections in Madhya Pradesh and in Jammu. In fact, it was all but wiped out. By mid-1983, the euphoria of being the only "national alternative" (Vajpayee in Vrindavan had even said: "We are not power hungry but we want power to change the social structure...") had evaporated. A.B. Vajpayee then began to talk about a national democratic front and electoral adjustments with opposition parties.

This the hardliners within the BJP were reluctant to accept for they believed that this would further dilute the identity of the BJP. In fact, Mr Balraj Madhok, president of the Bharatiya Jana Sangh made a call to all "genuine Jana Sanghis" to come back to the "Jan Sangh and the Bhagwa flag...otherwise the BJP would fall between two stools."

Mr Madhok might in the end prove to be right. The more universally acceptable face of the BJP was not soft enough or convincing enough for the minorities. Moreover, the Congress(I) had taken some of the thunder out of the BJP in its increasingly pro-Hindu postures (especially in Jammu and Kashmir in 1983 and in Punjab in mid-1984). Nor was this new image acceptable to the party hardliners. But the downward turn had begun. On 8 August 1983 the National Democratic Alliance was formed between the BJP and Mr Charan Singh's Lok Dal. The two parties would sit as one block in Parliament and in the state legislatures.

But Mr Charan Singh has never been a dependable ally. And so, while the BJP was holding its national council in Bombay in October this year, Mr Charan Singh announced the formation of yet another party, the Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party. Mr Vajpayee unilaterally dissolved the NDA, but many dreams must have been shattered.



At the close of the historic Bombay convention in 1980, Mr Vajpayee had said: "Standing on the shores of this ocean beneath the Western Ghats, I can say with confidence about the future: darkness will be dispelled, the sun will rise, the lotus shall bloom." Today it is darkness at noon, the sun looks as if it is setting and the lotus has begun to wilt.

At the close of the historic Bombay convention in 1980, Mr Vajpayee had said: "Standing on the shores of this ocean beneath the Western Ghats, I can say with confidence about the future: darkness will be dispelled, the sun will rise, the lotus shall bloom." Today it is darkness at noon, the sun looks as if it is setting and the lotus has begun to wilt.

D V Javer

RAJIV GANDHI

Rajiv Gandhi's quest for prime ministership must be the envy of every politician in democratic countries. Till 11 May 1981 he was reluctant to come into politics. And, on 31 October 1984, he became the Prime Minister of India. In no democracy has a politician made such rapid strides to the highest executive office of the land. The 40-year-old Rajiv Gandhi is not only the youngest ever Prime Minister of a major democracy, but one of the few personalities whose record in political success is unparalleled A tragedy has put the mantle of the government on his shoulders. It has to be seen how long the young shoulders can carry the responsibility, not only of the government but also the party he leads. The beginning has not been impressive. Though there were apprehensions about Mrs Indira Gandhi as well when she first became the Prime Minister in 1966, this time the fears are great as there are too many disparities between the personalities of Mrs Gandhi and her elder son.

Sujit Ghosh

Rajiv Gandhi with his mother at the Calcutta plenary session

Rajiv Gandhi cannot be a match for Mrs Gandhi due to a simple factor: politics, while being the art of the possible, requires long commitment, and the understanding of the problems of a great country like India is not an easy task. Mrs Gandhi was actively associated with Jawaharlal Nehru's political life over the years. Neither of her sons took a similar interest in her activities. Sanjay Gandhi jumped into politics when his unsavoury deals of the Maruti Ltd was attacked on the floor of Parliament. Having been attacked politically, Sanjay Gandhi came into politics and the phase of dynastic succession in Congress politics began. While his younger brother was getting enmeshed in politics and emerging as the heir-apparent to Mrs Gandhi, Rajiv Gandhi remained aloof. He never asserted his right as the elder son. Even when Sanjay Gandhi died and Mrs Gandhi eagerly wanted Rajiv Gandhi to join politics, he wavered. Had it not been for the fact that Menaka Gandhi was to turn 25 on 26 August 1981 and she would have become eligible to contest the Lok Sabha byelections from Amethi, Rajiv Gandhi would have remained reluctant to join politics. In effect, he entered politics not for his own sake, but for the sake of ensuring that Menaka Gandhi did not have a chance to contest Lok Sabha elections as soon as she turned 25.

Rajiv Gandhi entered politics not for his own sake, but for the sake of ensuring that Menaka Gandhi did not have a chance to contest the Lok Sabha elections as soon as she turned 25.

The events of the first week of May 1981 are worth recalling. Mrs Gandhi was to go on a tour of the Gulf. The Air India Boeing 707, Makalu, which was to fly her abroad was suddenly found to be sabotaged a few days before the scheduled departure on 5 May. (Till today the Makalu case has not been solved. No one has been convicted, though en masse some Air India employees in Bombay lost their jobs after the "sabotage" was detected.) Mrs Gandhi pleaded with Rajiv Gandhi to realise the threats to her life and to join politics so that stability could be ensured. Partymen also sang Hallelujahs in praise of dynastic politics. But the pilot-son of Mrs Gandhi was unmoved. In the meantime, the Prime Minister decided to fly abroad not in an Air India aircraft but a Boeing 737 of the Indian Airlines. The reliability of the Indian Airlines was thus established. Within a week of Mrs Gandhi's departure, on 11 May, while she was in the Gulf, Rajiv Gandhi entered politics. He contested the byelection at Amethi and trounced the opposition rival Sharad Yadav of the Lok Dal. In the June 1981 byelection, Rajiv Gandhi's performance was excellent. Sharad Yadav was no ordinary candidate. He had made history in 1974 by being the first ever "Janata" candidate, who won a byelection from Jabalpur, wresting a traditional Congress seat. He was a strong opponent to defeat but he had to forfeit his deposit.

The real test for Rajiv Gandhi will be after the elections. If he is able to lead his party to a massive mandate, by winning over 350 Lok Sabha seats, then one cannot see any possibility of anyone stopping Rajiv Gandhi in the next decade. If, however, the mandate is not massive, things will be different. Mrs Gandhi faced pressures from the powerful syndicate leaders in the undivided Congress after she failed to get over 300 seats in the 1967 elections. In her case, political experience made her utilise the debris of the Congress after the 1969 split and build up her charisma in such a way that today after her death her son, who is a novice in politics, has been accepted as the unquestionable leader by Congressmen. Partymen rallied around his mother for votes. Her vote-getting ability made many parasites and less popular personalities, in addition to the powerful politicians in the Congress, surround her. Rajiv Gandhi too has been accepted as the leader because Congressmen feel that he can get them votes. If he fails in this acid test, then his problems will begin.

The way tickets were distributed in the Lok Sabha elections have left many wounds in the hearts of partymen. The arrogant behaviour of Arun Kumar Nehru, the powerful general secretary of the AICC(I), has made many partymen disgruntled. These will surface in case the majority in the Lok Sabha is small. Many personal ambitions will have to be accommodated if the party gets less than 300 seats. Assembly elections in major states are round the corner. When tickets are distributed, either in March-April or in May, a lot of heat will be generated. The possibility of a split in the party cannot be ruled out as a result of the dissensions which Rajiv Gandhi will have to face on the eve of the Assembly polls.

If he starts relying on political elements, both young and old, then things can be different. Mrs Gandhi allowed D.P. Mishra, H.N. Bahuguna and their likes to run the party apparatus in her initial days. She never slighted the elders. In the first days of the Rajiv Gandhi regime, many elder statesmen have been hurt and their silence during the elections should not be taken as a sign of surrender. If the opposition was not in its present state of disarray, then a Jagjivan Ram-type move on the election-eve by some elders could have been possible. The tragedy of Rajiv Gandhi is that he is surrounded by people who do not have much of a mass base. Buta Singh cannot contest elections from his home state. P.V. Narasimha Rao has to seek a mandate from Maharashtra. Pranab Mukherjee, while being a Rajya Sabha member, cannot represent his own home state, West Bengal.

The organisation of conducting the campaign from the AICC(I) office at 24 Akbar Road was handed over to people who had no experience of elections before. A military-style control room was set up and its running entrusted to retired armed forces officers. Their rough behaviour matched the mood in the AICC(I) office, controlled by Arun Nehru. Many senior partymen protested about the way the control room was responding to their calls. For example, Sitaram Kesri, the party's treasurer, had to intervene one day and tell the ex-servicemen how to behave in politics.

Vishwajit Singh, a cousin of the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary, Arun Singh, was entrusted with the distribution of the publicity material from the control room. Vishwajit Singh may be known for his suave manners, but he has no previous experience of a general election. There were many mishaps in the distribution process and from many places there were frantic calls because the material did not reach in time.

Even in his election campaigns, Rajiv Gandhi's meetings were much different from Mrs Gandhi's. He kept on harping on the Anandpur Sahib resolution, which many people in the villages never understood. There were no political speeches made from the podium before Rajiv Gandhi reached the meetings. No political songs were sung to keep the audience occupied till the VIP arrived. Only the local police bosses went up on the dais occasionally to ask the people to maintain order till the PM came. Rajiv Gandhi does not seem to have understood the reason for the inattentive crowds at many places. Ironically, at a public meeting he addressed at the Kayasth Pathshala grounds in Allahabad on 18 December, the crowds started leaving when he rose to speak. Reason: The microphones were not effective and Amitabh Bachchan, the star-attraction of the Congress(I), had already finished speaking. (People apparently had gone to see the filmstar and not to hear speeches.) If such lapses had taken place in Mrs Gandhi's campaign, then a few heads would have rolled soon after the meeting.

Rajiv Gandhi's composition of the new cabinet will show the way his mind is working regarding the future of the party. There is a whisper campaign going on in the capital that the people who had for a while aspired to become the "acting" Prime Minister on 31 October, Pranab Mukherjee and P.V. Narasimha Rao, may not be in the new council of ministers. Delhi is a city which produces 365 rumours in an equal number of days round the year. So, one cannot comment on the veracity of this story, but there certainly is a strong lobby around Rajiv Gandhi which wants some of the old faces out. Already, the two principal aides of the PM, parliamentary secretary Arun Singh and special assistant Rajinder Kumar Dhawan, have had a confrontation. The bone of contention was the car parking space outside the PM's office in South Block. Arun Singh wanted his car to be parked at the spot where Dhawan has been parking his car over the years. Dhawan bowed to the wishes of the parliamentary secretary. Such instances are bound to multiply. When inexperienced hands run the show, infantile disorders are bound to occur. Though experience has not played any role so far in Rajiv Gandhi's quest for prime ministership, unless it is utilised in good measure in the coming days, his quest may be shortlived.

Rajiv Gandhi (back to camera) with Arun Nehru

The tragedy of Rajiv Gandhi is that he is surrounded by people who do not have much of a mass base. Buta Singh cannot contest from his own state. Narasimha Rao has to seek a mandate from Maharashtra.

Among Congressmen even today, there are many who admire Chandra Shekhar. His admirers, of course, are those who were in politics before 1975, before the advent of Sanjay Gandhi on the political scenario and before neo-politicians began controlling the politics of the Congress party.

CHANDRA SHEKHAR

"Chandra Shekhar has great acceptability both at home and abroad," Mrs Indira Gandhi told journalist Harish Chandola in an interview in September 1984. She was not paying a compliment to the Janata Party president. Instead, she told Chandola (this was published in the Indian Express of 11 November 1984) that "outside forces seeking to oust me must surely support Chandra Shekhar. Several outside forces and countries want to see me out of office. Some Muslim countries (and she named a few, which Chandola did not name in his report) are trying to turn our Muslims against me. An European country, the Christians and a superpower—they are all one in seeing to it that I lose." Mrs Gandhi's repeated references to the "foreign hand" had acquired paranoid proportions. Whenever she saw a threat to her power, she blamed the "foreign hand," which was never specified. By referring to Chandra Shekhar as the possible beneficiary of the "foreign hand," Mrs Gandhi, in fact, expressed her apprehension that he was a person who was capable of replacing her. In the same interview, she had dismissed the chances of opposition stalwarts like Charan Singh, H.N. Bahuguna and even N.T. Rama Rao. In Chandra Shekhar, not only in 1984, but even a decade earlier, Mrs Gandhi saw a person who had the potential to challenge her. Though Chandra Shekhar had yet not made a serious quest for prime ministership, his ability to become the Prime Minister was recognised by no less a person than Mrs Indira Gandhi.

Chandra Shekhar is 57 years old and by Indian political standards, despite Rajiv Gandhi having become the Prime Minister at the age of 40, 57 is considered to be "young." Mrs Gandhi had been the beneficiary of his vociferous support as the leader of the band of "Young Turks" during the 1969 Congress split. The Janata Party president could have been a top Congress leader today, had he not been expelled from the party for six years in 1975,soon after he was arrested under the Maintenance of Internal Security Act (MISA), during the Emergency. The six-year period of expulsion was over in 1981. Technically, he is entitled to be a Congress leader even today. His wide acceptability among Congressmen was a matter for concern in the Indira Gandhi camp in the early Seventies. If Mrs Gandhi singled out Chandra Shekhar as the most dangerous person in her interview with Chandola, then there was good reason for her doing so. Among Congressmen even today, there are many who admire Chandra Shekhar. His admirers, of course, are those who were in politics before 1975, before the advent of Sanjay Gandhi on the political scenario and before neo-politicians (those who became active in politics not in their student days, but later) began controlling the politics of the Congress party.

Chandra Shekhar had been an elected member of the Congress Working Committee between 1969 and 1975. In 1971, he created a flutter by contesting the elections for the membership of the Central Election Committee of the Congress against the wishes of Mrs Gandhi. He was elected although he was not in the official panel sponsored by Mrs Gandhi. This victory of Chandra Shekhar was the last occasion in the history of the Congress when in an inner party election, a rebel won. In May 1977, after the election defeat, the Congress witnessed a rebellion again, but it was not successful. In the AICC session held at the Mavlankar Hall in New Delhi, Siddhartha Shankar Ray challenged Mrs Gandhi's nominee, K. Brahmananda Reddi, but lost. (The election was necessitated due to the resignation of Dev Kanta Barooah from the Congress presidentship.) Among the old Congressmen, if there is admiration for Chandra Shekhar today, it is because they remember his feat at the Simla session of the party in 1971. At that time, he had defied the might of Mrs Gandhi when she was at the height of her glory.

Chandra Shekhar, then a member of the Congress high command, was arrested under MISA after the Emergency was proclaimed in 1975. He was the only political detenue who was kept in solitary confinement. Such was the anger of Mrs Gandhi against him that she singled out her own party member for one of the worst punishments in those days. Here too Chandra Shekhar's popularity among partymen became evident. He was kept in a jail in Haryana. The then chief minister, Bansi Lal, who has been well known for his rough behaviour was soft towards Chandra Shekhar. He sent word to

Chandra Shekhar (middle) with Morarji Desai and Jagjivan Ram

Chandra Shekhar that if he required an air conditioner or any other comforts, it would be provided. Chandra Shekhar refused these comforts, but this gesture of a hawk like Bansi Lal in the days of the Emergency amply showed the popularity of the Young Turk leader among Congressmen.

When the Janata Party was formed in May 1977, Chandra Shekhar was JP's nominee for the party presidentship. He did not have any powerful party faction behind him at that time. The other constituents of the Janata Party, the BLD, the Jana Sangh, the Congress(O), the Socialists and the Congress for Democracy readily accepted Chandra Shekhar as the party chief. The Janata Party has undergone many changes since May 1977. But its president has remained the same. Chandra Shekhar has not rushed to any opportunistic alliances although there have been times when his isolation in politics has been near total, with one stalwart after another leaving the Janata ranks. Chandra Shekhar can, perhaps, take some pride in pointing out that Chaudhary Devi Lal, Karpoori Thakur, Biju Patnaik, George Fernandes and many such leaders returned to the Janata fold after having deserted him in 1980. It is another matter that Devi Lal and Karpoori Thakur deserted him again on the eve of the elections this year. But that did not affect the consistent political line of Chandra Shekhar. In the defection-dominated opposition scenario, Chandra Shekhar is the only major leader who did not get bogged down in the quicksand of defection politics. His stable political line in the Janata too has won him admirers among his former partymen in the Congress.

The Karnataka election of 1983 was a turning point for Chandra Shekhar. After the 1980 debacle, the Janata Party had looked like it had to be written off politically. Somehow during the election campaign in the winter of 1982 he had gauged the popular mood. He had planned out his padayatra from Kanyakumari to Delhi, which was to begin on the day the polling was to be held in Karnataka. This correspondent met Chandra Shekhar on the flight from Hyderabad to Bangalore on the eve of 1983. He was in a jubilant mood. "We are winning in Karnataka," he said. At that time, his statement sounded incredible. When the results were announced, the impossible had been achieved. But Chandra Shekhar did not rush to Bangalore to join in the celebrations and the exercise of government-making was left to the state leadership under Ramakrishna Hegde. When the news of victory was announced in Bangalore, Chandra Shekhar had completed his padayatra upto Nagercoil in Tamil Nadu. He continued with the Bharat Yatra confidently.

There was some criticism of Chandra Shekhar on account of the Bharat Yatra. While he was the president of the Janata Party and the Janata flag was used throughout the long march, the programme was not attributed to the party. The reason was simple. At that time Chandra Shekhar was facing vociferous opposition from a section of the party leadership which, while not in a position to control the party, was making loud statements against him and seeking his ouster from the presidentship. If Chandra Shekhar has been the party president without a break since May 1977, then the reason is not that there is lack of inner-party democracy in the Janata Party. There have been party elections during this period and Chandra Shekhar's hold on the party organisation has been tested by the ballot box.

H.R. Raja Shekhar

Chandra Shekhar with Hegde in Bangalore

Chandra Shekhar may look lonely today, with a galaxy of opposition leaders having lined up behind the Charan Singh-Bahuguna-Karpoori Thakur-Devi Lal combine known as the DMKP (Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party). The process of opposition unity which began with the Vijayawada conclave in May 1983 received a setback on 21 October 1984 when the DMKP was formed with its "dominant" outlook. The Janata Party as it is constituted today, by itself may not look like a force which can return to power at the centre. Only in a phase of coalition politics can Chandra Shekhar make his bid for prime ministership.

The only time Chandra Shekhar expressed his desire to become the Prime Minister was when the Janata split took place in July 1979. For a while he had been in the run to take over the leadership of the truncated parliamentary party of the Janata Party. After sometime he decided to remain the organisation head and let Babu Jagjivan Ram lead the party in Parliament and make his bid for prime ministership. Had Chandra Shekhar tried to become the PM in July 1979, his reputation among politicians would not have been what it is today.

In the quest for prime ministership, Chandra Shekhar seems a sure bet in the next few years. His elevation to the high office cannot be foreseen in the immediate future, but two or three years is not a very long period in politics. So far Chandra Shekhar has shown exemplary patience as a politician. One will have to see if this patience pays him dividends in future.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya and Madhu Jain, Delhi

The Karnataka election of 1983 was a turning point for Chandra Shekhar. After the 1980 debacle, the Janata Party had looked like it had to be written off politically. Somehow during the election campaign he had gauged the popular mood...He was in a jubilant mood. "We are winning in Karnataka," he said.

The Run for Prime Ministership

The ambition of every opposition leader to become Prime Minister brought about the failure of the Janata experiment, writes Arun Gandhi

I was with Morarji Desai at his Marine Drive residence a few days before Chandra Shekhar was due to arrive in Bombay in the course of his gruelling cross-country padayatra. There were some friends who were trying to persuade Morarji Desai that he should meet Chandra Shekhar at the city limits.

"Why should I go?" Morarjibhai asked with undisguised irritation.

"After all he is the Janata Party leader and if you don't receive him you will be feeding grist to the rumour mills. It will be taken as a confirmation that there is indeed a rift between you two," they argued.

Morarji Desai remained adamant. "The Janata Party has nothing to do with this padayatra," he countered vehemently. "He didn't seek the party's advice before embarking on the padayatra. He is pocketing all the money and the publicity for himself because he cherishes ambitions of being the next Prime Minister." He spelt out unequivocally the fundamental problem that has decimated the opposition parties: The consuming ambition of every leader to become the Prime Minister of the country not excluding Morarji Desai.

Among opposition leaders, it is only a question of depth of the ambition and the extent to which each is willing to go to see the fruition of their passionate dream. Of them Charan Singh will go down in history as the man who subjected Indian politics to international ridicule. His inglorious term of six months as caretaker Prime Minister has only served to whet his appetite for a full term and his fulminations only bring into sharp focus the bankruptcy of the opposition parties. However, two obstinate men—Atal Behari Vajpayee and L.K. Advani—will have to bear the cross with Charan Singh for ruining the only chance the opposition parties had to change the complexion of Indian politics.

L.K. Advani now claims they did not know Charan Singh well enough until it was too late. Had they known they would never have supported him. He expects the people to believe this patently transparent and reprehensible lie. Charan Singh's reputation was well known since the early Seventies to anyone who was even remotely connected with politics. How can one believe that two stalwarts, whose main political sphere has been the northern Hindi belt for as long as anyone can remember, were unaware of Charan Singh's consuming ambition?

Assuming they were naive or blind or both, what about all the indications that Charan Singh gave from the very inception of the party? What about their colleague Nanaji Deshmukh who had known Charan Singh closely and had, in fact, helped him in many of his nefarious activities like toppling ministries? If these were not indications enough what about the warning administered by Shyam Nandan Mishra in Bangalore jail when Advani, Mishra, Vajpayee and Dandavate were discussing the possibilities of forming a federal party? Let Advani himself say it from his book, The People Betrayed: "One party?" Shyam Babu asked incredulously. "With Chaudhary Charan Singh? Only those like you who do not know him can think of such a proposal. It is impossible to work in the same party with Chaudhary Charan Singh." Did they forget this denouncement so easily? The fact is they had their own unpleasant designs.

In January 1977, when it was suggested that Charan Singh become the general secretary (of the Janata Party), he screamed: "What? Me become a munshi?" It seemed as though the birth of a new party was going to be aborted.

The unseemly tussle for leadership began the moment the leaders were released from jail following the announcement of elections. On 20 January 1977, when the opposition leaders met in New Delhi to forge a new alliance, Charan Singh made it known he wanted to be the boss. He threatened to walk out if this was not conceded. Morarji had already staked his claim for the chairmanship and this was more appealing to others because of his vast experience, sincerity, reputation and the manner in which he had handled the Janata Morcha in Gujarat.

When it was suggested that Charan Singh become the general secretary with all executive powers, he screamed: "What? Me become a munshi?" It seemed as though the birth of a new party was going to be aborted. Vajpayee claims he suggested that Charan Singh be made the vice-chairman with the powers to deal exclusively with the selection of candidates for the entire northern belt. This was acceptable to Charan Singh because it was a step towards the ultimate goal.

Morarji, however, denies there was ever such a suggestion. He says Vajpayee is lying. "It was I who suggested that Charan be made the vice-chairman because of his seniority and there was no talk of selection of candidates," Morarji says quite categorically and adds, "How can I acquiesce to something so patently undemocratic? How can one person be given the sole charge of selecting candidates for more than half the Indian Parliament?" Morarji says that there must have been a deal struck privately between Charan Singh and Vajpayee. He was absolutely positive that he was not a party to any such understanding.

Having resolved this thorny issue, the question of prime ministership was deferred until after the elections not because they wanted to avert any unpleasantness but because each constituent party wanted to see how strong they were to strike another bargain. As it turned out, the Jana Sangh group and the BLD had the most number of seats, and neither were in favour of Morarji Desai as the Prime Minister. He could be tolerated as a party leader, they felt, but the sanctimonious old man was just not their idea of a Prime Minister.

The Jana Sangh on the other hand. under the pretext of giving the country the first Harijan Prime Minister, proposed the name of Jagjivan Ram. Morarji was so sure that he would be selected that he was blissfully unaware of what was going on until, as he says, he went to pay a courtesy call on Jayaprakash Narayan and found Jagjivan Ram sitting in the lounge. JP told Morarji Desai what was happening and said, "You must help us get out of this situation." This came as a shock to Morarji but he withstood it stoically and says he told JP: "There is nothing I can do to help. This is your problem and you must solve it as best as you can."

When Charan Singh heard about what the Jana Sangh group had done, he unabashedly blurted out: "I will not support that chamar (harijan)." He immediately shot off a letter to Jayaprakash Narayan saying he would support Morarji Desai for prime ministership and tilted the balance. This is why he kept boasting that it was he who had made Morarji Desai the Prime Minister and on that coun: forced Morarjibhai to give him the second slot in the cabinet: the home ministry. Having left the decision of the leadership to JP and J.B. Kripalani there was nothing the various factions could do. Even Jagjivan Ram swallowed his pride and accepted a lower grade. Morarji Desai himself was determined not to allow Jagjivan Ram to become the Prime Minister and it is believed the moment he learnt of the move, knowing Charan Singh better than anyone else, leaked the information to him. Morarji Desai says: "How could I allow him to become the Prime Minister when I know of his corrupt attitude and his moral turpitude? His own daughter-in-law had complained against him when Nehru was the Prime Minister and Nehru had sent the complaint to me asking for my advice. Knowing this how could I put the affairs of the country into the hands of a man like him?"

The battle for prime ministership, however, did not end there. "Everyone in the cabinet behaved as though he was the Prime Minister," complains Morarji Desai and adds, "It was difficult to make them understand there was such a thing as collective responsibility."

Others say that Morarji Desai was supercilious and kept aloof from the rest of the team and that he did not take them into confidence on many issues. Perhaps he was, but still he was less offensive than Charan Singh and there were numerous instances which should have sounded warning bells among all those who were genuinely interested in seeing the Janata experiment succeed. That no one noticed the warning signals indicates that no one was really interested in the Janata Party.

There was yet another instance that should have served as a warning. Advani recalls a cabinet sub-committee meeting in late 1977 when he and Shanti Bhushan were made to wait for the arrival of Charan Singh. When he finally arrived 15 minutes later, he was ranting about an altercation he had had with a journalist who accused him (Charan Singh) of being ambitious. "What's wrong with wanting to be the Prime Minister?" Charan Singh had asked the journalist. "Don't you aspire to be the chief editor in your own set-up? Well, if you don't, you are a worm." Then Charan Singh went on to make some shockingly uncouth remarks in the presence of officers. He said, "After all he is 83 years old: he will die one day. Can I not become Prime Minister after his death?" Everyone was stunned and flabbergasted.

Advani had still not heard the warning bells. When Charan Singh finally made the notorious Suraj Kund statement condemning the whole cabinet as being "impotent," Morarji Desai called a cabinet meeting at which everyone unanimously—including Advani and Vajpayee—agreed that both Charan Singh and Raj Narain should be asked to resign from the government. Which is what Morarji did. However, soon after that Advani and Vajpayee were overcome by compassion (or was there some design?) and embarked on a relentless campaign to get them both back. Why? No one but Morarji Desai offers an explanation.

Morarji says they were clearly afraid he would override them. They wanted somebody in the cabinet who could keep him in check and they thought Charan Singh was the only person who could do so effectively. They were both so adamant that they made it impossible for the government to function until Morarji relented and took Charan Singh and Raj Narain back into the cabinet. What happened thereafter is so unpleasant that it is best forgotten.

If these two stalwarts, who never lose an opportunity to speak of their sacrifices to keep the Janata Party together, had kept better counsel the party would not have been blown to smithereens. Charan Singh and Raj Narain would have been consigned to the political garbage dump where they belong and the Janata Party may have been the elusive national alternative the country has been looking for. Above all, the party and the people of India would not have to hide their faces in shame in international forums when confronted with the cruel joke perpetrated on the people.

Two obstinate men—Atal Behari Vajpayee and L.K. Advani—will have to bear the cross with Charan Singh for ruining the only chance the opposition parties had to change the complexion of Indian politics.

SPECIAL REPORT

Sunil Gavaskar Vs Kapil Dev

Kapil Dev's sacking is an extension of the north zone – west zone rivalry in cricket

Sunil Manohar Gavaskar is the greatest batsman India has produced. And Kapil Dev Nikhanj is the most explosive all-rounder the country has thrown up. Both have emerged in an age in which cricketers are treated like demi-gods.

Gavaskar hit the headlines in his very first series—scoring 774 runs in only four Tests—and has been something special ever since. Kapil began less impressively, in 1978, but within 15 months of his Test debut, had carved out an exceptional niche for himself by capturing 11 wickets in the Madras match against Pakistan, apart from etching out a more than useful 80-odd runs. That ensured two series wins in a row, in course of which he had played a no mean part.

But with the advent of the Eighties, relations began to sour between the two extraordinary men of Indian cricket. Both, by this stage, had developed king-sized egos, which was hardly a help. More crucially, the Bombay and Delhi newspapers, not to mention some motivated cricket officials, started putting ideas into their heads. Both, to their discredit, were gullible enough to be influenced by such misguided advice, in addition to being greedy for power and the purse. Result: the falling out of the two which is now international knowledge, and a most embarrassing experience for Indian cricket.

To be more specific, however, why and where did these two prized possessions of Indian cricket differ? The origins of this dispute, if one is to be truthful and analytical, date back to the sacking of Bishen Singh Bedi, when Kapil Dev was but a fledgling Test player. Bedi, as it might be recalled, was eased out of the scene after the England tour of 1979, at which point Gavaskar regained the captaincy and introduced Dilip Doshi into the squad.

In Gavaskar's opinion, Bedi was past his prime and, therefore, no longer a force to reckon with. He was right. But in the north zone this move, not unfomented by Bedi himself, was interpreted as a "conspiracy" by his Bombay colleague, allegedly with the object of removing a strong man and a rival. More tragically, the unity that had developed among Indian Test players probably for the first time disintegrated completely, giving rise to a new hostility between the north zone and the west zone, especially Delhi and Bombay. Bedi, because of his enormous contribution to the projection of the game in his zone was, not surprisingly, regarded as some sort of a folk-hero in his part of the country, while being quite popular elsewhere as well. A blow to him was received rather personally by pressmen in the north, while scribes in the west went out of their way, and unnecessarily, to justify Gavaskar's stand. And, from this messy business was created a rift, which has not healed till date.

Next came the issue of Mohinder Amarnath, another northerner, with the additional clout of being Lala

Kapil Dev in the second Test against England: an appeal for justice

Amarnath's son. In 1979, a damaging defect cropped up in his technique—his penchant to hook over his shoulder and into the air. Not only that, he became physically susceptible to the bouncer after he was hit in a county match in England, and again in the Bombay Test against Australia, in which, in fact, his solar hat—fashionable in his father's days—fell on his stumps to mark his departure. But Amarnath through sheer weight of runs in domestic cricket, and a conspicuously altered stance soon began to knock at the door of Test cricket once more. For the '80-'81 tour of Australia, however, he was unofficially offered an opener's berth, which he seemingly refused, for he went away to participate in club cricket Down Under, thus absenting himself for the trial games before the party was picked.

Two years later, though, he was recalled for the trip to Pakistan on his own terms, i.e. as a middle order exponent and emerged out of it as the most successful visiting batsman, and that too in a team containing Gavaskar and Gundappa Vishwanath. The skipper, of course, was never given any credit for the readmission of Amarnath. On the contrary, it was said that the choice had been forced on him by the selectors, particularly the now quite-powerful Bedi. Indeed, if anything, the volley of absue from the north about Amarnath's long exclusion gained ground.

Significantly enough, throughout these battles between Gavaskar and representatives of the north, a simple and self-effacing young man from the dusty plains of Haryana was perfecting his trade, and lending yeoman service to the helmsman from Bombay. The most potent weapon in the policy switch from spin to pace, Kapil Dev finished as the highest wicket-taker against Kim Hughes' Australians and Asif Iqbal's Pakistanis to virtually spearhead victories in both series. In Melbourne, he made light of an injury to demolish the home side. A year later, in Bombay, he flattened English hopes by assisting in another win. And then, in England itself, he conjured up the most devastatingly consistent batting performance and a fiery bowling display at Lord's to earn a place in the Wisden Almanack's short-list of five cricketers of the year. Indeed, what Asif Iqbal had stressed in early 1980—that Kapil was the best all-rounder in the world—had become fairly unanimous by the summer of 1982. And all this had happened under Gavaskar and not without a degree of cooperation between the leader and his right hand man.

However, all along this same period there was one major irritant, which surfaced in public from time to time. Gavaskar favoured a disciplined approach to batting. Kapil was instinctively impetuous. Gavaskar believed that Kapil had ample talent as a batsman and, therefore, could be a regular run-getter if only he curtailed his belligerence and organised his defence. The latter largely ignored such suggestions. Gavaskar flared up on this from time to time, once pronouncing in print that Kapil "would never get another half-century in Tests." The dazzler from the north remained unmoved by such criticism and, in fact, went on to demonstrate in England in 1982 that he could succeed in defiance of Gavaskar's orders by hitting 89 off 55 balls at Lord's and then 97 off 92 deliveries at the Oval.

There was another reason for discord. This was the fundamentally different outlooks of the two players. Gavaskar believed in a thoughtful and considered handling of situations and detailed discussions at team meetings. Kapil was not interested in theorising, but believed in instinctive response in the "mid dle." Indeed, after the disastrous tour of Pakistan two years ago, Gavaskar complained that he had no one to turn to as the crisis deepened.

Gavaskar turning one down the leg side in the Delhi Test against England: egoistic?

Kapil had at that time gone as his vice-captain.

Upto this point, however, there was no real animosity between the two. The hostility, in fact, commenced the moment Gavaskar lost the captaincy and the mantle was handed over to Kapil.

The new captain, according to his assessment, got no assistance from the deposed skipper during the difficult tour of the West Indies. The former felt that Gavaskar was not only not exerting himself both as a batsman and a fielder, but was also not available for consultation as regards strategy. The senior professional, on the other hand, denied that he was not putting forwardhis best and declared himself as having been perfectly willing to actively partake in team meetings as well as offer his viewpoint at the start of a match, if approached. But he was disinclined towards becoming a full-time member of the "think tank " set up by the manager, Hanumant Singh, and in which Srinivasan Venkataraghavan was quite prominent. Gavaskar was, in fact, resentful of the fact that the veteran off-spinner was part of this planning unit, more so because Venkataraghavan's appointment had preceded the invitation to the Bombayite. Actually, Gavaskar joined the tourists a fortnight or so late, by which stage Hanumant Singh's operations were well underway.

Basically, Gavaskar had taken his removal rather badly. Apart from being convinced that he had been given a raw deal and, perhaps, felt that Bedi had engineered the whole thing, he was, strangely, upset about Kapil Dev succeeding him. He, of course, explained this reservation in cricketing terms by saying: "How can you appoint a man as captain for a tour of the West Indies when he has never visited that region?"

As for Kapil, he silently stomached his part-mentor's supposed non-cooperation while in the Caribbean; but with success coming his way in the World Cup, he gradually began to assert his authority. He was clearly displeased about Gavaskar's relative lack of effort in the field and coupled as this was with the maestro's total lack of form, he proceeded to drop him from the team for two of the league games. This, if anything, worsened the friction between he two stalwarts, for Gavaskar maintained that no one had even the decency of informing him in advance about his exclusion.

Then, as the euphoria over the sensational victory in the competition boiled over, Air India went overboard in not only dishing out free tickets to the players, in order to accommodate a preplanned unofficial tour of the United States, but by extending the same courtesy to the cricketers' wives. One spouse notably omitted from the junket was Marshneil Gavaskar.

Following this, in the last season, the opener par excellence not just

The North – West Divide

At the root is money: The rift in the Indian cricket team over sharing the prize money first showed up when Mohinder Amarnath refused to share his prize money totalling Rs 90,000 he won in the West Indies and Pakistan, with his teammates. Till then, the practise of sharing the prize money in true sportsman's spirit which was started in India by Ajit Wadekar worked quite well. Amarnath set the precedent which other players followed. Kapil Dev, pointing to Amarnath, refused to share the prize money he got. And so did Anshuman Gaekwad. The three between them earned approximately Rs 1,70,000 last year.

Then it was Sunil Gavaskar's turn. He refused to share the huge purse he got from President Zia-ul Haq after he completed his hundredth Test match in the last series in Pakistan. Gavaskar's logic was that the purse was for his performance since 1971 and if he was to share it he would have to give a share to every player who played with him since 1971.

Kapil needed no convincing that Gavaskar was instrumental in his sacking although he did not say it in as many words. When reporters told him that the selectors had made up their minds even before Gavaskar joined them, Kapil retorted: "The captain has more say in the selection of his team." He justified his style of batting in the Delhi Test, saying that just before going in to bat he had told Gavaskar that he would be using the long handle and Gavaskar had replied, "Play your natural game but don't attempt any Vishwanath style cuts." Kapil said he felt it safe to play as he liked as four batsmen were to follow him. Kapil later told a Delhi daily: "I have no grouse or complaints against anyone if I am dropped if I don't deserve a place in the team. But, if I am sidelined on grounds of indiscipline then I should know the reasons because I don't think I have ever been guilty of misbehaviour on or off the ground." He felt that he could not ascribe the selector's decision "either to his performance or behaviour."

The former Indian captain also refuted Sandeep Patil's charge in the editorial in Ekatch Satkar emphasising that no player invited to play at Varanasi was told what amount would be paid to him. What surprised the cricket lovers was Kapil's decision to join the Congress(I) hoping, perhaps that the President of the BCCI and union minister N.K.P. Salve would back him. At the time of going to press the minister was closetted with the two players trying to patch up the differences.

The north-south divide in Indian politics has been creeping in on Indian cricket also for a while now. Actually it is Bombay versus the north. Since 1932, Bombay players have been dominating Indian cricket. Bombay's decline started with the exit of industrialist and former captain Vijay Merchant from the selection committee. Soon Bishen Singh Bedi was brought along by Lala Amarnath and Eknath Solkar had to give way. The Varanasi incident that placed Gavaskar and Kapil Dev on a collision course is as much a manifestation of the great divide in Indian cricket as it is of how money spoils sportsmen.

Gone are the days when team members shared their booty and shared alike. Kanath Sansgiri, executive editor of Ekatch Satkar recalls an incident narrated to him by Gavaskar in 1974. When the captain of the visiting English team Tony Grieg came to know that the prize money was being equally shared by the Indian players he introduced the practise in his team also. As things turned out India lost every match in the series and received none of the prizes. Even then, Tony Greig shared the prize money that his players received with the Indian team.

Olga Tellis, Bombay and Lokesh Sharma, Calcutta

returned among the runs and firmly rehabilitated himself in the Test side, but also branched out into a new demeanour, that of negotiating the fire of the West Indian pacemen with the fire of his willow and otherwise of "enjoying" his cricket. His supporters reacted to this role with sympathy. For, Gavaskar had, undoubtedly, carried a most heavy burden during all his earlier years as a Test player. But his detractors, Bedi and Kapil among them, deemed this change in character as downright irresponsible, if not as being cunningly aimed at creating instability in the Indian batting.

But the wheels of fortune were beginning to turn once again. Kapil, the undisputed star of the World Cup triumph, was sans the Midas touch in the home series against the West Indies. And with Gavaskar, coming back as captain for what transpired as a flawless campaign in the Asia Cup, the time had arrived for Kapil to be unseated.

However, the bad blood between the two leading cricketers of India became all but irreconcilable during the first Test of the current series. Kapil, in course of the match, accused Gavaskar of not parting with his deserved share of money for an exhibition tournament in Varanasi, while levelling the additional charge that the latter had made an astronomical sum from the same tourney. Gavaskar refuted this by saying that Kapil had been duly paid what had been promised him. Obviously, what irked the all-rounder was that the organisers should disburse so much more to the Bombay batsman than to him. The figure earned by Gavaskar has been reported as varying between Rs 50,000 and Rs 75,000, while the amount handed out to Kapil is said to be a mere Rs 7,000.

But why this public outburst? The background to the mudslinging is believed to be the contents of Gavaskar's latest book, Runs 'N Ruins in which he had named Amarnath as being a principal defaulter in terms of sharing the prize money won by him with his teammates, as is the general practice. The book is also not effusive in its praise for Kapil.

All said and done, it would be a mistake to link the years of escalating disagreement between Gavaskar and Kapil Dev with what occurred at

Sandy's Storm

SANDEEP PATIL's editorial in the Marathi weekly, Ekatch Satkar

The Bombay Test was getting interesting. We saw hope for the first time after 31 Tests. As we and each Indian were looking forward to victory I read a news report in a Bombay newspaper—'fraud by Indian players', it said. My name was also included in it. It must be a dastardly conspiracy as the news appeared when the Test match was in progress. The gossip and discussion in this connection was heard within the team as well as outside. I had participated in the cricket match that was held at Varanasi and my name had also appeared in the report. Hence I feel I must reveal the true facts.

The Varanasi match had been organised almost two months ago. The member of Parliament, Shyamlal Yadav, had requested, and Sunil and other players agreed to play. Such festival matches are nothing new to us, nor is the remuneration we get for them. Then why did the complaint about money arise this time?

I recollect that Sunil and Ashok Yadav (son of Shyamlal Yadav), had negotiations in our Nirlon office at Worli. We players share the entire "prize money" that is generated in such matches. Sometimes a specific sum is allotted and then the division is done in a different way. This is well known and accepted by all the players.

Sunil was given Rs 50,000 to distribute for the Varanasi match. He had indicated what would be my share almost a month in advance. In this sense, other players were given their assigned amount as per their standard, before leaving Delhi for Varanasi.

Sandeep Patil

We went to Varanasi as usual. Last time the Varanasi match could not be played because of the rains. Even then we got our share of money for nothing. Such festival cricket matches are organised at places where Tests, one day internationals or first class cricket matches cannot be played. This is done in order to promote cricket and some honorarium is also paid to participating players.

The single wicket tournament at Varanasi was won by Yashpal Sharma. Everything went off very well. But in the evening when we were returning, Kapil started asking everybody what amount they got. In fact he did not have any right to ask what others got. But some people are very curious! Kapil went to the room of Dilip (Vengsarkar) and (Balwinder Singh) Sandhu that night and discussed these money matters. He demanded to know why they got such paltry amounts, when Sunil got Rs 75,000 instead of Rs 50,000. That day Kapil had played at best, six overs and was given Rs 7,000 for that. The craze for money is bad, but worse is keeping an eye on somebody else's money! He did not have any need to do chambharchokshi (cobblers' gossip) about what Sunil got and what we got. Had he felt that the amount given to him was too low he could have told Sunil so, before the match began. To accept in the first place and then spread discontent, is like stabbing someone in the back. The most despicable thing was to give this news to the press at the time of the Test match so as to generate dissidence in the team and create difficulties for winning the match. At least Kapil should not have dared to provoke the Bombay players against Sunil. In case he is not aware, I am writing explicitly: Bombay players will do anything free of charge for Sunil, leave alone play a match. It needs just one word from Sunil.

There is going to be a little bitterness between Kapil and me after this explanation. But the truth hurts everybody and is it not better for the team to get the truth exposed rather than letting false hoods ring in the ears of the public?

21ST JANUARY '85 MAY BE A RED LETTER DAY IN YOUR LIFE

ANDHRA LAXMI

DELUXE BUMPER

CHANCES ON EACH TICKET

DRAW 21/1/85

WIN MORE THAN

9 CRORES

TICKET
RS. 500 ONLY

RS.

WIN IN MAIN DRAW

1ST PRIZES (40) Rs. 10,00,000 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 4 DIGITS)
2ND PRIZES (40) Rs. 1,00,000 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 4 DIGITS)
3RD PRIZES (400) Rs. 10,000 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 3 DIGITS)
4TH PRIZES (4000) Rs. 1,000 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 2 DIGITS)
5TH PRIZES (40000) Rs. 500 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 1 DIGITS)

WIN IN MINI DRAWS

20 1ST PRIZES Rs. 5,00,000 EACH
(ONE IN EACH DRAW)
8,000 2ND PRIZES Rs. 1,000 EACH
(400 IN EACH DRAW)

20 MINI DRAWS START FROM 18 DEC. ONWARDS. NUMBER OF TICKETS ARE LIMITED. BUY YOUR LUCKY TICKET TODAY TO AVAIL ALL 21 CHANCES

ORGANISING AGENTS
CHANDRA AGENCIES
17, HOTEL CONTINENTAL ANNEXE, REGAL BUILDING
NEW DELHI-110001. PHONES: 312202, 311204

CONVENOR, RAFFLE COMMITTEE,
D.D. HOSP. HYDERABAD.
IN AID OF DEVELOPING DR. C.D. DESHMUKH CARDIO VASCULAR INSTITUTE AND RESEARCH CENTRE.

SHARAD 722

A TICKET IS ENTITLED FOR ALL PRIZES DRAWN ON IT

Delhi on the final day of the second Test. On that occasion, Kapil batted almost irresponsibly in the second innings—not for the first time in his career—to virtually pave the way for an Indian defeat. A few hours later, the selection committee comprising Chandu Borde, Bishen Bedi, Hanumant Singh, Kripal Singh and Ambar Roy, ordained that he should cool his heels for the next one-day international in Cuttack and the Test match in Calcutta.

It has been widely remarked that Gavaskar was behind this move and that he even threatened to resign if his demand was not complied with. The fact is, the selectors are not bound by the recommendations of a captain, who has no voting right in any way. The responsibility for doing away with Kapil must, therefore, rest with Borde and company or, as the case might have been, with the majority who decreed against the former skipper. But, of course, it goes without saying that Gavaskar could not have opposed the measure in the least.

An endeavour to impose discipline is always laudable. But such action is best executed after prior caution. And so, this correspondent strongly feels that Kapil should have been given a warning instead of being sacked. The decision also does not make much sense when one takes into account the fact that Kapil is still India's best seamer in what is considered a rather weak attack. This is not to condone recklessness, but to come down in favour of a realistic policy.

Wadekar introducing Gavaskar to Mrs Gandhi: two eras, two attitudes

Kapil Dev receiving the Padma Shri award from President Reddy in 1982 : height of glory

Also, not very healthy in the climate of things are the utterances of Sandip Patil who too, got the axe as part of what has been seen as a balancing act by the confused selectors. His statement of loyalty in favour of Gavaskar reflects nothing but svcophancy and a tactless move to further complicate the already vexed relationship between the north and the west.

And, finally, the Indian Cricket Board president should desist from interfering with selectorial wisdom (or the lack of it). Just as much as two bad decisions by an umpire do not correct a situation, two mistakes by the authorities will not rectify the present unhealthy atmosphere. In other words, Mr N.K.P. Salve should not insult his selectors by rescinding their decision. Ethics demand that the president of the Board accepts the conclusions of an elected body of experts, irrespective of whether these have widespread approval or not.

Ashis Ray

Vasundhara Raje campaigning in Bhind

Royal Battles

Several members of royal families fought the recent Lok Sabha elections

Socialism has replaced feudalism decades back, but kings and princes still occupy a special place in the hearts of the Indian electorate. They still command considerable sway over the masses. It is therefore natural for political parties to woo them to their side. The Lok Sabha as well as some state Assemblies, Uttar Pradesh, Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh and Orissa in particular, are packed with royal personalities. Shivendra Bahadur Singh, Congress(I) MP from the royal house of Khairagarh in the Chattisgarh region of Madhya Pradesh, remarked that he had "about 35 relations in Parliament...there could be [illegible] MPs with a feudal background in the seventh Lok Sabha." The eighth Lok Sabha elections saw besides filmstars, many kings and princes trying their luck at the hustings. In the rural areas these royal personalities inspire no less awe than filmy superstars in the cities. If Amitabh Bachchan was sermonising to capacity crowds in Allahabad, Madhav Rao Scindia was mesmerising his listeners in Gwalior.

In Madhya Pradesh, for example, the Congress(I) had fielded no less than six members from the royal family. The opposition was not far behind. The daughter of Vijaya Raje Scindia, Vasundhara Raje, contested from the Bhind parliamentary seat on a BJP ticket while Narendra Singh, the scion of the house of Panna, was the BJP candidate from the Damo constituency.

In Uttar Pradesh, which has over 1,200 royal families, political power and influence was the birthright of kings. Most members of royal families in UP continue to back the Congress. This time, however, an interesting development was noticed in the feudal politics of the state: while the elders remained loyal to the Congress, the younger generation was lured away by Menaka Gandhi's Rashtriya Sanjay Manch. In fact, many a royal house was sharply divided with regard to political affiliations. Zulfiqar Ali, the nawab of Rampur and a Congress(I) candidate was opposed by his bhabi (sister-in-law) who contested as an independent candidate.

The late Sanjay Gandhi, astute politician that he was, packed the state Assemblies of northern India with members of the royal and landed classes. The Congress(I) in 1980 gave over 106 party nominations to zamindars for the UP Assembly elections, of which nearly 80 were returned.

Rajiv Gandhi followed his younger brother's footsteps. Initially, the Congress(I) tried to woo some of the bigwigs: Bhawani Singh of Jaipur, Gaj Singh of Jodhpur, the scion of the house of Jhalwar and the Rajmata of Alwar. The Rajput princes—some of them who have not quite recovered from the experiences of the Emergency shied away from politics.

The Congress(I), however, did manage a coup: the party roped in the distinguished Martand Singh of Rewa. Known as the king of kings in the Baghelkand region he had always contested as an Independent. He polled over 74 per cent of the votes in the 1980 Lok Sabha elections. The other influential prince in the Congress(I) was the scion of the house of Mysore.

Nowhere was the fact that feudalism is still an integral part of the polity more in evidence than in Bhind. The area full of ravines, reverberating with tales of dacoits and their heroic deeds, was the setting of a "battle royal." One of the protagonists in this epic was a princess: Vasundhara Raje, the daughter of Vijaya Raje Scindia (the Rajmata, as she is called, is a revered figure in the Chambal valley. Kings and dacoits in the past have had relationships bordering on mutual respect). The other was a prince: the Maharaja of Datia, Kishan Singh. The princess was contesting on a BJP ticket, while the prince was a Congress(I) candidate. The other person in the fray was the formidable, Rama Shankar Singh of the DMKP, who projected himself as the son of a poor farmer. Pitted against the raja and rani Mr Ramashankar's one-point programme was to banish the royalty. The contest was for him a "continuation of the freedom struggle of the Chambal valley." From Bhind to Lahar—all through the ravines—Mr Singh's message was scrawled on the mud huts and walls of the villages and towns: "Raja, Rani mahal ko jao, Rama Shankar ko vijayi banao (Go back to the palaces, king and queen, make Rama Shankar victorious)." Loudspeakers in Bhind blared out: "Mahalwala ayash karne wale hai (palace-dwellers live a life of luxury and ease)."

In Katha, a village near Lahar, Rama Shankar was heard telling his listeners: "Half of the Madhya Bharat seats are reserved for rajas and ranis...Look at the Scindias. The Maharaja is contesting from Gwalior, his sister from Bhind, his former aide-de-camp from Guna and another prince from Rajgarh. This is not lok tantra." To add punch to his attacks on the royalty, Mr Singh had distributed pamphlets describing how the maharajas of Datia, Dhaulpur and Scindia helped the British during and after the sepoy mutiny.

(Above and below) Madhav Rao Scindia campaigning in royal style in Gwalior

Vasundhara Raje remained undaunted by the criticism: "Yes, I am a princess...I am wealthy and I live in a palace but unlike politicians I am not greedy to make more." Most of the posters in her favour showed her along with her mother. And, in most of her meetings Vasundhara Raje referred to the inseparable bond between the people of Gwalior and the Scindia royal family.

In Gwalior, 39-year-old Madhav Rao Scindia carried out his campaign in royal style. He went from village to village in his helicopter. Wherever Mr Scindia went he was welcomed with open arms. Some of the people who came to meet him even touched his feet. Feudalism is too strongly embedded in the soil of Gwalior. The son of a maharaja always succeeds his father and no one questions his right to rule. The huge blue poster in Bhind depicting Rajiv Gandhi embracing his son seemed to subtly convey this lesson: Apres moi, mon fils (After me, my son).

Madhu Jain

INDIA: THE SIEGE WITHIN

CHALLENGES TO A NATION'S UNITY

M.J. AKBAR

BOOK E

The Tragedy

Why was there no settlemen the Akalis and the centre? W the face of rising extremism?
India: The Siege Within, M.J.
Delhi allowed the wound to published by Penguin Book
706 Eros Apartments, 56 Ne

The tempo of the violence kept rising. On 18 July 1982, the authorities finally arrested two leaders of the Bhindranwale faction, Bhai Amrik Singh and Baba Thara Singh, the manager of Bhindranwale's headquarters at Chowk Mehta. Bhindranwale now decided that discretion was the better part of valour. He ran away to hide in the Golden Temple—safe from the reach of policemen. Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale did not leave the sanctuary—until the army brought out his corpse

The Akalis had become bystanders in all this drama They did not want to associate with the secessionist cry and the violence of Bhindranwale, but they were terrified of being left behind. If anyone else ever managed to lead a successful Sikh movement then utility in the community would be destroyed Nor could they rule out the possibility that the Congress (Indira) leaders were playing a double game. Supposing the Congress government negotiated with Bhindranwale and "conceded" a few of his demands, where would the Akalis be then? It was, as events have proved, a tragic case of mischievous governance and weak, unsure response which stoked a fire which soon went out of control.

The extremists had stolen a march by starting an agitation without asking the Akalis for permission or even cooperation However, the Akalis refused to take the option of grand gestures like demanding secession. When on 12 and on 15 August 1981, a general secretary and MLA of the Akali Dal, Sukjhinder Singh, asked for a referendum in Punjab on the Khalistan issue, the party forced him to resign. The Akalis had three options open to them. The first was to work closely with the extremists; this was advocated by SGPC president Tohra. On the other hand, the former chief minister, Badal, continued his silent efforts to take the party gradually away from the militant theocrats, completely rejecting Bhindranwale and his ilk. And the president of the Akali Dal, Sant Harchand Singh Longowal, tried to steer a middle course depending on the issue involved and the political environment in which a decision had to be taken. However, all the leaders were agreed that the party would have to do something if they were not to be totally isolated. They began talking of a "holy war" to win realisation of the demands listed in the Anandapur Sahib Resolution.

What were they, specifically? First, Chandigarh must come to Pun-

Sant Bhindranwale on the terrace of the complex: low ambition

XTRACT

of Punjab

of Punjab's problems despite a series of talks between y did the moderate Akalis fail to assert themselves in n the concluding portion of the extract from his book, KBAR analyses how the Congress(I) government in come septic, instead of healing it. The book is
d. (represented in India by Penguin Overseas Ltd.
u Place, New Delhi 110 019, price Rs 46.60).

Sondeep Shankar

jab, without any territorial compensation to Haryana. Second, Punjabi-speaking areas left outside Punjab should be brought into the state. Third, the control of the Punjab irrigation headworks should be in the hands of the Punjab government, as should be the management of the Bhakra-Nangal dam. Fourth, Punjab, being a riparian state, must be allowed much more than the 24 per cent share of the waters it gets (the rest went to non-riparian states like Haryana and Rajasthan). Fifth, there should be greater industrialisation through a larger investment of central funds in Punjab. Sixth, the centre, accepting the principle of genuine federalism, must surrender some of the power it had usurped from the states. Seventh, army recruitment should be on merit, not population percentage. Eighth, Sikh farmers in the Terai region of Uttar Pradesh should not face any harassment. Then there were the religious demands: the installation of a radio station to relay hymns from the Golden Temple; election to the managements of all gurdwaras in the country; and a ban on the sale of tobacco and liquor around the Golden Temple area, that is, in the precincts of the walled part of Amritsar. These demands were presented in 1981.

In the autumn of 1982, the government of India staged, at a prohibitive cost, the Asian Games. Such was the paranoia of a frightened Delhi that special security measures were mounted to prevent any sabotage by Sikh extremists. This included arbitrary body searches on Sikhs. Not even senior ex-servicemen (including generals) were exempt. Calling this the ultimate humiliation, the Akalis started a "holy war" to achieve their demands. It was quite a while later, more than a year, in fact, that the Akalis got a brainwave and added one more demand to their list.

Article 25 of the Constitution of India guarantees the fundamental right of every Indian to freedom of religion: "Subject to public order, morality and health and to the other provisions of this part, all persons are equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate religion." A second clause said: "Nothing in this article shall affect the operation of any existing law or prevent the State from making any law (a) regulating or restricting any economic, financial, political or other secular activity which may be associated with religious practice; (b) providing for social welfare and reform or throwing open of Hindu religious institutions of a public character to all classes and sections of Hindus." Two explanations followed. First, "The wearing and carrying of kirpans shall be deemed to be included in the profession of the Sikh religion." Second, "In sub-clause (b) of clause (2), the reference to Hindus shall be construed as including a reference to persons professing the Sikh, Jaina or Buddhist religion, and the reference to Hindu religious institutions shall be construed accordingly."

Red rag. To the Akali Dal, which was formed in 1920 precisely to rescue the Sikh faith and identity, the inclusion of the Sikh in the "classes and sections of Hindus" was nothing short of sacrilege. The "holy war" was intensified, and senior Akali leaders publicly burnt Article 25 of the Constitution and went to jail in

The Akali leaders with P.C. Sethi during the talks at Delhi

March 1984. But the surprise was not that the Akalis were raising demands, but that there had as yet not been any solution to the Akali-Delhi confrontation. What the moderate Akalis really wanted was a "victory" over Delhi which could enable them to take the initiative away from the extremists by restoring their credibility as "champions of the Sikhs." Even a blind government in Delhi could have seen that and offered a way out as Nehru did so often when dealing with Master Tara Singh and Sant Fateh Singh. But instead of healing the wound, Mrs Gandhi allowed it to become septic.

The truth was that, at one time or another, a solution had been worked out to each one of the Akali demands. And the moderate Akalis, eager to make matters easier for Delhi, were only too willing to leave the unresolved issues to the discretion of either the Supreme Court or an acceptable third party. The Akalis were as anxious to get off the back of the tiger as anyone else. Whatever may have been their contradictions, whatever their political ploys, they understood that this time around there was a dangerous element to the confrontation over which they had no control: the violent, well-armed well-financed secessionists, who were not responsible to majority Sikh opinion or to reason, and were fanatic about their dream.

The government had indicated that it was willing to concede the religious demands. There remained the political side. The biggest issue was Chandigarh. But Mrs Gandhi herself as early as in 1970, had categorically awarded Chandigarh to Punjab. As far as Fazilka and Abohar were concerned, in order to transfer them to Haryana, a ten-mile long and four-mile wide corridor would have to be created since the areas were not even contiguous to Haryana. They could easily be left in Punjab. The Akalis suggested a way out of the boundaries, headworks and water distribution impasses by suggesting third party arbitration. As for centre-state relations, Delhi had appointed a commission to examine the matter. Army recruitment and the problems of the Terai region were not important enough to become stumbling blocks. As for Article 25, the government was willing to let a panel of judges consider the proposed amendment. Then why was there no settlement? The answer did not lie only in intransigence, of which of course we had ample evidence. It also lay in a new, and very untypical policy that influenced Congress(I) decision-making in the post-1980 spell of Mrs Indira Gandhi's rule.

A feeling had begun to grow, towards the end of the Seventies that since Independence the minorities had been pampered at the cost of the Hindu majority. The charge of appeasement for electoral gain was brought particularly against the Congress, which had always sought and got the vote of the minorities. Nehru of course was the arch villain of this "plot," but his daughter was held no less guilty. The highly publicised conversions to Islam of a few hundred untouchables in the Tamil Nadu village of Meenakshipuram in 1981 was propagated as the final straw. Hindu revivalists began saying that in Hindu-majority India Hinduism, not Islam, was now in danger. Organisations like the Vishwa Hindu Parishad and Virat Hindu Sammelan (headed by the descendant of Gulab Singh Dogra, Karan Singh) doubled and redoubled their efforts to "save Hinduism." And such was the impact that Mrs Gandhi also began to believe that there was bound to be a "Hindu backlash" against any further "pampering" of the minorities. Far from challenging such revivalism, she decided to ride it as far as it would take her. And so, there was not even the minor consolation of words of sympathy from Mrs Gandhi after Moradabad saw in 1981 one of the worst instances of violence against Muslims in independent India. The Hindu revivalists reached their high point when in 1983 they organised cross-country marches to "Save Hinduism."

Mrs Gandhi often displayed a strong antiminority stance. Pakistan became a favourite target for her rhetoric. She did not stop at that. She kept hinting that the Muslims in India had still not given up their destructive games; there was always talk of a "foreign conspiracy" behind any problem related to Muslims. The same suspicions were continually aroused about the Sikhs, and with the latter it became a self-fulfilling prophecy to an extent. Mrs Gandhi did not, therefore, have a Punjab policy; she had a minorities policy which she extended to the two minority states, Punjab and Jammu and Kashmir. The Sikhs, and particularly the Akalis, were painted in the speeches made by her and her son, Rajiv Gandhi, as potential secessionists. And the Muslims of Jammu and Kashmir, along with their leader Dr Farooq Abdullah, had to face even more blatant accusations of treachery and worse. It was radical departure from traditional Congress behaviour. In the past, if and when a section of the Sikhs or the Muslims tended to make anti-patriotic noises, it used to be deliberately played down by the centre, while those Sikh and Muslim leaders who showed faith in the Constitution of India were given prominence. Now we had just the opposite scenario. While it was National Conference leader Dr Farooq Abdullah who kept insisting every minute that he was an Indian first and last, that Kashmir was an integral part of India, it was Indira and Rajiv Gandhi who kept making snide and open references to the quality of Farooq Abdullah's patriotism. It was a disastrous exercise in a centrifugal internal policy, born out of a misinterpretation of the popular Hindu mood of north India.

And so in Punjab, instead of cooperating with the Akalis to isolate the Sikh extremists, Delhi played into their hands. Fanatic Hindu organisations were encouraged to "teach" the Sikhs a lesson. A Hindu Frankenstein, who would not listen when Delhi eventually began seeking peace, was encouraged: the Hindu Suraksha Samiti (Hindu Safety Organisation) led by Pawan Sharma rose to the "defence" of Hindus. The price which this Frankenstein extracted began to be paid evidently in February 1984, when after successful private negotiations the government was ready to sign a settlement with the Akalis at a formal tripartite meeting which included the opposition parties. On the very day of this meeting the chance of peace was sabotaged by the Samiti, which had become nervous about what the Akali-Congress deal might mean for it. While the talks were in progress, the Hindu Suraksha Samiti indulged in daylong violence against the Sikhs in Haryana, humiliating, terrorising, injuring and killing innocent, isolated Sikhs. The talks collapsed. And Bhindranwale, sitting in the comfort of the Golden Temple, was particularly delighted. Not only had Hindus destroyed the chance of a settlement, but he had more fodder for his anti-Hindu communalism.

But the most unique thing about the long tale of terror in Punjab from 1981 to June 1984 was that, despite all the provocation and opportunity, despite all the engineered tension and suspicion, there was no outbreak of mass mayhem and rioting on the 1947 pattern. It is the age of the semi-automatic now, not the sword, and any such riots would have led to massacres. The Sikh masses did not respond to Bhindranwale's efforts to create anti-Hindu riots. The Akalis, caught in a cleft, remained unsure about when to break publicly and openly with Bhindranwale. By May 1984 they were edging in that direction. The Akal Takht, the highest authority of the Sikh faith, began to prepare charges against Bhindranwale. The secessionist Sant responded by saying that he would not listen to the Akal Takht; the Akal Takht warned that never in the history of Sikhism had the Akal Takht been disobeyed, and it would not tolerate disobedience now.

The five Sikh headpriests in the complex after it was handed over by the army

Bhindranwale's problem was not only an uncertain Akali leadership, but also the fact that the large majority of the Sikhs were simply not interested in breaking India's unity. It was not only the urban or the Mazhabi Sikhs who felt this way—but also the Khalsa Jats, including most of Bhindranwale's neighbours in his birthplace, the village Rode, when I visited it in February 1984. The young man I spoke to reacted sharply when I suggested that perhaps Rode should get ready to enjoy celebrity status as the new spiritual capital of Khalistan: "Where do you stay?" he asked me. "In Calcutta," I replied. "Could you rent me a room in Calcutta?" he asked. I asked why. "To live in, if Khalistan ever becomes a reality," he said. "Who would want to live in a country ruled by this mad Sant?" he asked. The unanswered question is how many people have changed such views after the Army action in the Golden Temple three months later, how many of those who spurned the living Bhindranwale have become followers of the dead secessionist.

A sharp man sitting on a roof, dreaming of becoming the preacher/warrior/king, talking already as a head of state, saying that if the government of India or its Prime Minister Mrs Gandhi wanted to talk to him they could come to the Golden Temple, he would not go to Delhi: was his death a victory: Was he afraid of anything, I asked, including death. "I am not afraid of death," he had answered. "A Sikh cannot be afraid of death; if he is afraid, he is not a Sikh." There was the glow of adulation on the surrounding faces while the Sant looked most pleased with his impromptu proverb. The many threads of convinction, emotion, honour, identity, fear, growth, prosperity, dependence, opportunism, chincanery, greed, nobility, helplessness, fanaticism, ambition will knot and purl as Punjab goes through yet another upheaval. The quadrangular war between a volatile if divided Sikh majority, the determined secessionist, a hardened Hindu and an elected government influenced by many variables will test secular, democratic India as never before. If India proves larger than the petty ambitions of passing leaders, Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale will lose.

ANALYSIS

The River Waters Dispute

Successive central governments have not made sufficient efforts to solve the problem, writes Madhu Limaye

The Anandpur Resolution does not contain any elaborate discussion regarding the distribution of river waters among Punjab, Haryana and Rajasthan. In the section on agricultural sector there is only a cursory reference to this problem. The Resolution says that the Akali Party will "make special efforts to bring the Thein Dam and the Bhatinda Thermal plant to a speedy completion" so that increased and cheaper power and irrigation facilities are made available. In the Resolution, there is also a demand for the establishment of an atomic power station in Punjab. And yet distribution of the river waters has become a main issue of contention. Majority of the peasants have become extremely conscious, and are easily swayed by the prospect of both increase and cut in supplies of irrigation water.

A view of the Bhakra dam

The roots of this problem go back by many decades. When the waters of the Indus and its tributaries began to be tapped on a large scale, both the provinces of British India as well as the native princely states began to press their claims for more water. The partition of India and the splitting up of the Indus territories between two sovereign and often antagonistic states gave a new turn to the problem. There was a long period of negotiations between the two governments as also sustained third party mediation. The result of these long-drawn-out parleys under the auspices of the World Bank was the Indus Waters Treaty signed in 1960. India's representatives, the foremost among them Niranjan D. Gulhati, played an outstanding role in effectively putting across India's case for a large share of these waters. They argued the country's case not as Punjabis, Haryanvis or Rajasthanis—they argued the matter as patriots free from all parochial taints.

The Indian representatives made use of modern ideas in the matter of development of river resources: multiple purpose plans and river basin concepts. They forcefully argued that there was need for an integrated basin development programme because of the interrelationship "between the availability of water and its possible uses in the various sectors of a drainage area." (U.N. Panel of Experts Report, p.50 and p1). Optimum development of water resources was "to be treated on the basis of a whole drainage basin or an entire river system." The focus was on "the basic hydrologic unity of the basin". (Development of Inter-State Rivers By. N.D. Gulhati, pp.49-50). The idea of bringing large tracts of arid and desert areas under irrigation and the prospects of growing food and other crops, of feeding and clothing the hungry millions could not fail to appeal to the humanitarian instincts of the World Bank mediators. A narrow approach would have failed to move them. It would not be out of place here to give some idea of the vision that moved India's chief negotiator:

> A river basin is a topographic entity. While political boundaries may change from time to time and the governments which exercise control over a basin may change in number or in nature, the limits of the watershed of a river remain fixed for all time. In case of scarcity of water in relation to requirements, the watershed boundary provides a definite area within which to ration the waters; otherwise there would be no end to the claims that may be made on the scarce resource.
>
> The water resources of a river basin are directly related to the area within the watershed. The volume of surface-flow into the river is a direct result of the rainfall within the limits of the watershed. The quantum of ground waters within a basin is, in most basins and, in any case, over all or most part of a basin, also related to the natural or artificial application of water within the area bounded by the watershed line. (Development of Inter-State Rivers, by N.D. Gulhati, p.89).

What constitutes the Indus basin has always been a debatable question. The Indian Irrigation Commission of 1901-1903 joined the Luni basin to that of the Indus. It then demarcated this more broadbased concept of the Indus basin from the Jamuna-Ganga basin. Gulhati himself thought it improper to add the Luni basin to the Indus basin. It is not disputed that eastern Rajasthan does not fall in the Indus basin. It comes within the limits of the Jamuna-Ganga basin. But Gulhati's concept of the Indus basin definitely included the western parts of Rajasthan (Jaisalmer and Bikaner) in this river system. In making the final allocation of the Indus waters between India and Pakistan the mediators were profoundly influenced by the concept of integrated development of the entire Indus basin and, in particular, the idea of making the Rajasthan desert bloom.

The demarcation line between the Indus and the Ganga basins in Haryana is very thin. "The watershed between the Sutluj and the Jumuna," in what was then southernmost Punjab, "is so flat as to be virtually indistinguishable" (The Indus Rivers, By Aloys A. Michel, p.318).

The Bhakra-Beas-Rajasthan project did not suddenly spring into existence in 1955. It grew gradually. Nevertheless since it was fully realised that the Sutlej waters stored at Bakra would be inadequate for the Rajasthan project, investigations were started on the Beas, both at the Pong dam site and at the Pandoh diversion site, as early as 1955 (Ibid, p.321). Michel wrote that "no hard" data on the drainage aspects of the Rajasthan project was available. "With most of the laterals or distributaries pointing towards the Bahawalpur (Pakistan) border," he thought that the Indian assumption was that "the sub-soil water will drain in that direction." (Ibid, p.336) Although Michel is by no means sympathetic to India and is in fact a critic of the Rajasthan project, his criticism itself shows that western Rajasthan is indeed a part of the Indus basin. He has devoted almost two pages to a discussion of the definition of "catchment area," of drainage and whether it includes only surface flows or also sub-surface flows. He has further analysed the relevant treaty provisions (Ibid, pp.336-40). Michel lamented that the Indus Water Treaty did not solve the problem of the irrigation affluents of the Rajasthan project (Ibid, p.336).

A study commissioned by the Indian Law Institute, basing itself on modern developments, has observed that apart from the tributaries there may be "other waters including underground waters" which contribute to the total flow of an international river. The words "river" and "riparian states" have been substituted in international law by "drainage basin" and "basin states." The international drainage basin is defined by Helsinki rules "as a geographical area extending over two or more states determined by the watershed limits of the system of waters, including surface and underground terminus...if there is to be international law governing use of international waters, the law must apply to all the waters of drainage basin and the states whose territories lie within its basin" (Quoted in Inter-State Water Disputes in India. An Indian Law Institute Study, Tripathi, 1971, p.93).

The purpose of the foregoing discussion is to show that since the distribution of the Indus waters between India and Pakistan had the development of Rajasthan as one of its main objects, it would be quite wrong for the successor states of the former state of East Punjab to deny the rightful claims of Rajasthan to be taken into consideration in any final settlement of the Indus water dispute in north-western India.

Throughout the Indo-Pakistan negotiations under the World Bank auspices, the Indian representatives had a very difficult task to perform. These difficulties can be appreciated by having a look at the initial position of the governments of India and Pakistan. We have to bear in mind the known Western sympathy for Pakistan. The plans presented by the two governments. even after mutual concessions, "differed widely":

Indian Plan

Useable supplies allotted to

India • All of the Eastern rivers and 7% of the Western rivers.

Pakistan • None of the Eastern rivers and 90% of the Western rivers.

Pakistan Plan

Useable supplies allotted to

India • 30% of the Eastern rivers and none of the Western rivers.

Pakistan • 70% of the Eastern rivers and all of the Western rivers.

(Indus Waters Treaty, by N.D. Gulhati, pp. 134-35)

These were the original claims of the parties. The Treaty, as it finally emerged, said: "All the waters of the eastern rivers shall be available for the unrestricted use of India (Article III)." It also made certain allocations to Pakistan during atransitionperiod which was to terminate in 1970. Pakistan was to receive "for unrestricted use" all the waters of the western rivers flowing into Pakistan subject to certain limited and specified uses for India. But India was not to construct any storage reservoirs on these rivers (Article III). If we look at the original claims and the final allocations it will be perceived that India's case was so cogent and its claims so modest that India could secure a just allocation for itself. For developing alternative sources to the waters which were being used by Pakistan at the time of partition, India had "to make a fixed contribution of Pounds Sterling 62,060,000 towards the cost of these works (Article V)." It is alleged by the concerned states that all these factors have been ignored by some narrow-minded politicians and experts in Punjab while advocating the claims of their own state.

The definition of the term "tributary" in the Treaty is so comprehensive that it obviously bears the imprint of Gulhati and of his way of thinking. Let me quote Gulhati:

> "The term 'tributary' of a river means any surface channel, whether in continuous or intermittent flow and by whatever name called, whose waters in the natural course would fall into that river, e.g., a tributary, a torrent, a natural drainage. an artificial drainage, a nadi, a nallah, a nai, a khad, a cho. The term also includes any sub-tributary or branch or subsidiary channel, by whatever name called, whose waters, in the natural course, would directly or otherwise flow into that surface channel. (Indus Waters Treaty, by N. D. Gulhati, pp.376-77).

Paul Singh Dhillon, former chief engineer, Irrigation Works, Punjab, has contested the validity of the Indus basin and integrated development of the whole Indus catchment area and has invoked the doctrine of riparian states to exclude Haryana and Rajasthan from the use of irrigation waters of the three eastern rivers allocated to India. Though a champion of the Punjab monopoly over these waters, he had to concede that Gulhati's concept of "the indivisible hydrologic unit" played an important part in shaping the Indus Waters Treaty and its provisions with regard to final allocation. In a footnote to his book, A Tale of Two Rivers, Dhillon writes:

> The hypothesis of Ghaggar basin being a part of the Indus basin, a pet child of Gulhati, had to be adopted in the national interest in the context of negotiations with Pakistan for the division of waters of the Indus system so as to magnify the Indian part of the Indus basin and thereby prop up what, at that time, appeared to be our sagging requirements of these waters. This was necessary to strengthen our bargaining position in the said negotiations. Pakistan's designee is said to have contested this hypothesis on the basis of pre-partition records, but the post-partition records of government of India, prepared and fielded by Gulhati with sure effect, proved more than a match for the former.

This question has now assumed crucial importance in the context of Ravi-Beas water dispute between Punjab, Haryana and Rajasthan, because it is only by the extension of the Indus over the Ghaggar basin that the two latter states can normally become entitled to a share in Ravi-Beas waters on the basis of the basin concept, as described hereafter. (A Tale of Two Rivers, by Paul Singh Dhillon, pp.6-7).

It was thus proper for India to advance the concept of Indus as an indivisible hydrologic unit in order to win a larger share of its waters for itself, but it is wrong to use that concept to justify allocation of water to Rajasthan and Haryana. The former, Dhillon justifies in the name of "national exigency" or as "extra-scientific considerations" advanced "in national interest." But he has no compucation in denying the validity of the concept to refuse a share of the waters, jointly won in the name of all, to the sister states of Rajasthan and Haryana. Could anything be more immoral? (A Tale of Two Rivers, Paul Singh Dhillon, pp6-8). Disputes over distribution of river waters between states are not a new phenomenon. The fathers of our Constitution realised this and so they empowered the Parliament to pass legislation on this subject to tackle the problem. Two laws were in fact made by Parliament with a view to resolving these disputes. Even before these laws were passed the government of India realised the urgency of reaching an inter-state agreement and of according sanction to some of the proposed new works. Gulhati wrote from Washington (January 1955) emphasing the necessity of bringing "home to the visiting World Bank and Pakistani groups the need for, and the importance we attached to the full utilisation in India of the waters of the eastern rivers." An agreement was secured among Jammu and Kashmir, the PEPSU states, Punjab and Rajasthan. The largest share of water was allocated to Rajasthan. (Indus Water Treaty, Gulhati, p. 358). R. S. Gill in his foreword to Dhillon's book argues that this was done for the "digestion" of the World Bank. Thus a case is cynically being built for violating the sanctity of an inter-state agreement which it must be remembered, had an international ramification.

Morarji Desai

My object in examining the various aspects of the river water problem is not to refute Punjab's case for more water. I am not pleading any state's case. I am only pleading for fair play, for putting national interest above parochial considerations. River water distribution is a highly technical and complex matter. The American Supreme Court thought that instead of a judicial adjudication, mutual agreement was preferable in a matter like this. Party politics and rivalries, however, preclude adoption of this salutory suggestion in India's case. So let there be recourse to a tribunal. But must we not have the assurance that its decision will not be challenged and sought to be overthrown by extra-constitutional means?

Prakash Singh Badal

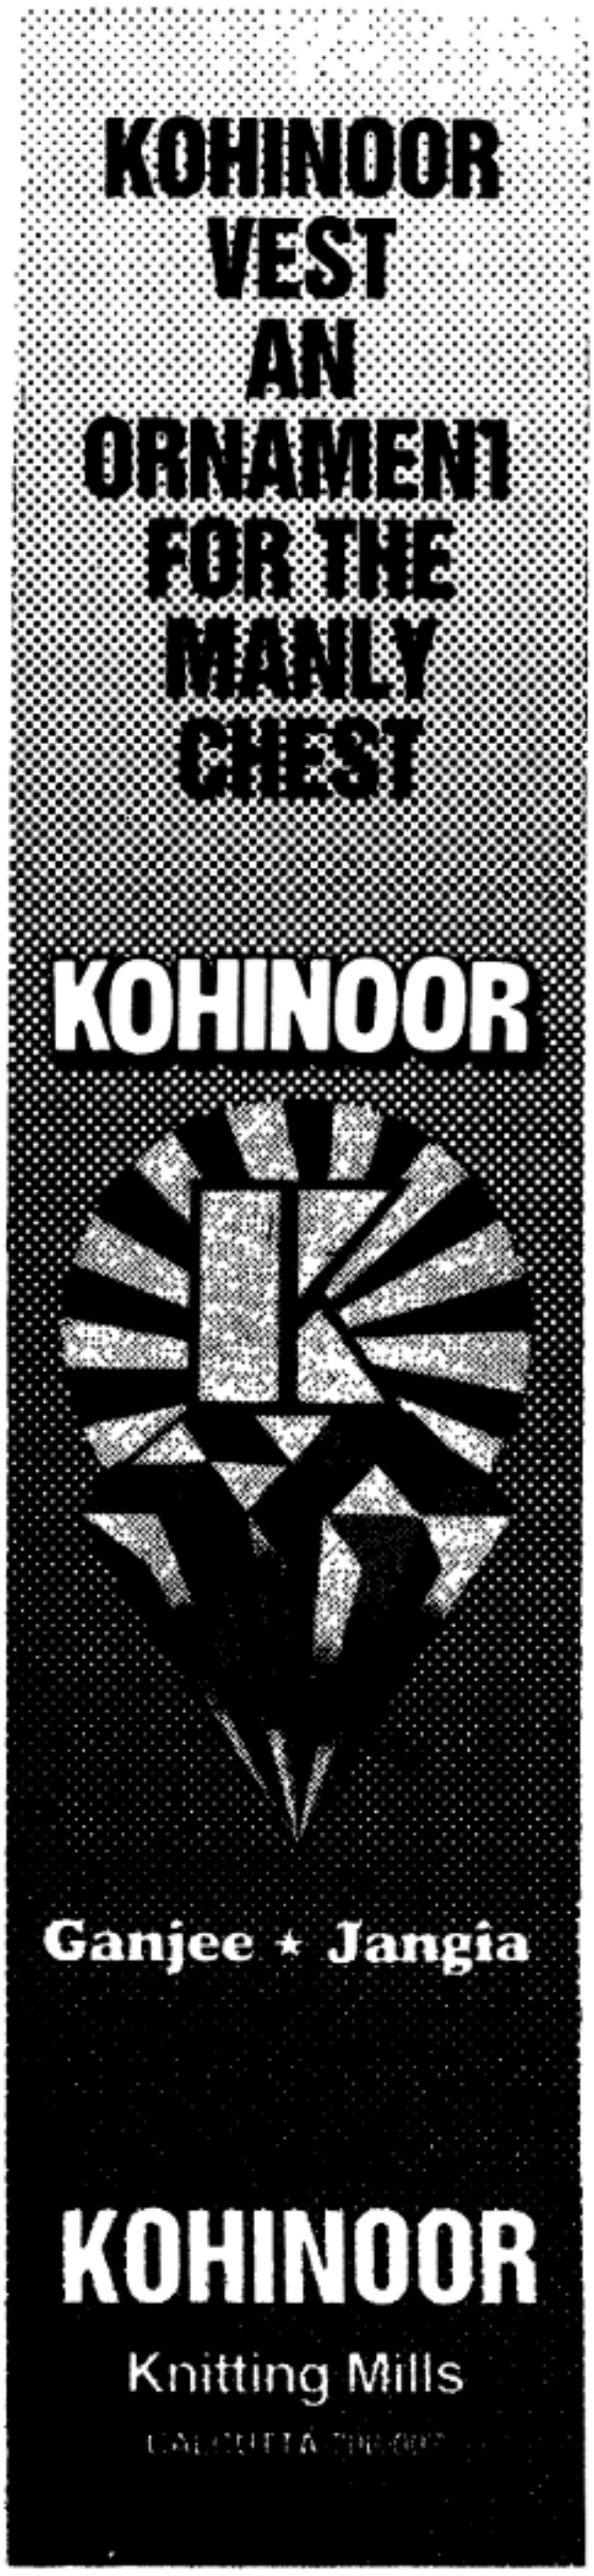
The reorganisation of Punjab caused fresh difficulties. The dispute continued through the Seventies. There were fact finding committees, Planning Commission interventions and also recommendations by the chairman, Central Water Commission. Finally, the central government issued a notification on 24 March 1976 under the powers conferred to it by the Punjab Reorganisation Act. Throughout, the Punjab government disputed these findings, recommendations and orders.

In the general election of 1977 the Congress was defeated from Punjab to Orissa. An Akali-Janata coalition came to power in Punjab. Two Akali ministers were included in the central council of ministers. It was widely expected that the induction of the non-Congress governments both at the centre and in the states would not only have a moderating effect on the conflict but also result in a settlement of all outstanding issues. For a time it seemed that a new era in Sikh-Hindu amity and centre-state relations had been inaugurated. But the Janata government failed to settle the dispute.

The draft of the Anandpur Resolution had been adopted on October 1973. It was finalised on 1 August 1977. The resolution was passed at the Ludhiana Conference of the Akali Party in October 1978. It is not as if the grievances and demands of Punjab originated in 1980 after Indira Gandhi returned to power. The question is legitimate as to why the Janata-Akali government did not work out a settlement regarding the reasonable Akali demands, persuading the Akali party to drop the rest. Why did they not set a noble example before the country in the matter of national integration?

The late Indira Gandhi can certainly be held responsible for the crisis in Punjab. But is the opposition free from criticism? Mrs Gandhi was quite fair when she told the BBC



A view of the Panchna dam canal project in Rajasthan

interviewer:

> Firstly, the Akali Dal, which is a political party, with whom we were talking, did not raise or press their demands for three years when they were in power in Punjab and had two of their ministers in the central government. The agitation started only when they lost the election rather badly to my party. (Patriot, 20 June 1984).

Among the important crisis arising out of the formation of the Punjabi Subha was this issue of distribution of the waters of Ravi and Beas. Could the Janata Prime Minister have taken the stand that since he was opposed to the formation of the Subha he was not concerned with its fall-outs? He could not do that. But that seemed to be his attitude to the problem. The problem was of course, placed before Morarji Desai by the Punjab and Haryana chief ministers. It was discussed threadbare at several meetings held in which Morarji Desai participated. The Haryana government was insisting on the implementation of the Central Government's Order of 1976. The Punjab government wanted a revision of the order. Morarji at one stage threatened to use sanctions against the Punjab government should it fail to execute its part of the Sutluj-Jamuna Link Canel. But he did not carry out his threat. He always wanted that the two governments should appoint him as the sole arbitrator and accept his award. Morarji Desai emphatically declined to refer the water dispute to a tribunal which could have been set up under the Inter-State River Water Disputes Act. He asked the concerned states to file suits if they felt like doing so. Law suits were filed by the two governments: Punjab challenged the validity of the 1976 order and Haryana pressed for its implementation. The real reason why Morarji Desai did not intervene was different. His principal private secretary, V. Shankar, once told chief minister Devilal's cabinet colleague that the Prime Minister was not keen on deciding the question because Devilal was not in his good books. When Prakash Singh Badal asked Morarji Desai to hand over the Bakra-Nangal headworks to Punjab, the Prime Minister flatly refused. Surjeet Singh Barnala was the irrigation minister in Morarji's cabinet. He is not known to have resigned on the issue.

SUFI POETRY

Poems of Peace and Tolerance

By DR NAZIR AHMAD

Anyone looking at the Muslim institutions of Indo-Pakistan would be struck by the fact that from Haryana eastwards, there are well-established theological institutions like Deoband, Bareili, Lucknow and Azimabad, etc., from where thousands upon thousands of molvies have graduated and later worked for spreading theological knowledge all over the subcontinent. But to the west of Haryana, in Punjab, Sind, Baluchistan and the Frontier, there are hardly any comparable institutions. Instead, there are khanqahs and dargahs of sufi saints like Hujveri, Mian Mir Shah Husain and Bullhe Shah (Lahore); Baba Farid (Pakpattan); Shah Latif (Bhit, Sind) and Rahman Baba (Frontier). Most of them are also poets of the first rank whose verses are known by heart by the common folk. It is this poetry rather than the sermons of the mullah and molvi which has given the folk here their aims and ideals of life. This, perhaps, will be regarded as a simplistic picture of the east and west social institutions for, as a matter of fact, there are sacred shrines at Ajmer, Kalyer and Delhi and there are theological madressahs at Lahore and Multan. But it is undeniable that the poetry of sufi saints has influenced the lives of the folk in the west much more than in the east and relegated the madressah to a second position.

The Sufi creed

Before discussing this influence, we should first know what a sufi is and what it is that he teaches. Briefly, a sufi is a Musulman who emphasises the importance of the content, meaning and the spirit of Islamic religious practices as against their formal observance. Not that he denies the obligation of saying prayers or the giving of zakat alms. Rather, he thinks that the genuflexions of the prayers without the feeling of God's presence while at them are no prayers at all. Similarly, he would say that zakat is not the giving away of 2½ per cent of what a man has saved from a year's earnings, but it is rather keeping 2½ per cent for himself and giving away the rest in charity. A sufi's conception of God, too, is different from that of the mullah who thinks of Him as a distant Being in the high heavens. To a sufi, God is near, nearer even than his jugular vein and residing in the believer's heart. Again, while a mullah's main concern is to make people fear God, the sufi dwells more on God's forgiveness of sins that man cannot help committing.

Not long ago, many western and Indian critics of Islam used to say that the liberal ideas of sufism were alien to original Islam and had been borrowed from Neo-Platonism of the west and Vedanta of India. Lajwanti Ramakrishna of Lahore in her book, Punjabi Sufi Poets, took much malicious pleasure in pointing out that the highest in sufism was but a second-hand copy of Advaita, the Hindu term for the Unity of Being. However, all modern authorities on Islam, both east and west, are now unanimous that tasawwuf is an indigenous movement in Islam which began as asceticism, which in turn was a reaction against the sudden influx of wealth that resulted from Islamic conquests in its very first century. Later, when ideas of love and God's immanence got emphasised, it became Islamic mysticism, i.e., tasawwuf.

To a sufi, God is near, nearer even than this jugular vein and residing in the believer's heart...the sufi dwells more on God's forgiveness of sins that man cannot help committing.

The name "sufi" is derived from the Arabic word suf which means wool. Rough woollen garments were being worn by Christian ascetics before Islam, and these were adopted by the Muslim ascetics too. Those Muslim ascetics who adopted them began to be called sufis.

When Sufism first came to the subcontinent, it was already a well-developed doctrine of Tariqat (the path), and was divided into many silsilas or brotherhoods, as attested by Hujveri in his classic, Kashf-ul-Mahjub. He was the first notable Sufi master who came to the subcontinent, having migrated from Ghazni to Lahore in the 11th century. Lahore at that time was a centre of Islamic learning.

Another notable figure of the time was Masud Sa'ad Salman of Lahore, a distinguished Persian poet, of whom it is said that he also wrote Punjabi "si-harfis," which shows that Muslims and non-Muslims were already meeting each other intimately. Hujveri also was a Persian poet but he wrote no Punjabi. His influence in the Punjab was mainly due to his personal character and the khanqah that he set up. The Gujjar tribes around Lahore were the first to become his disciples. Even to this day the Gujjars of Lahore make an offering of the entire produce of their day's milk at Hujveri's shrine on his annual "urs." It would be useless to look for milk in the markets of Lahore on that day.

Central Asian emigrants

While Islamic armies were rapidly advancing in northern India at the beginning of the 13th century, unexpected changes were taking place in Central Asia. The Mongol hordes had begun invading the Muslim homelands to the east till they had completely destroyed the Abbasid caliphate. Muslims who escaped with their lives from the Central Asian countries migrated to Fgypt, Africa, India and other far-off countries. Among the waves of Muslim migrants to India were included some who founded sufi institutions there. For instance, the Chishti silsila, which was to bring profound changes in Indian society, was founded by Khwaja Moeen-ud-Din Chishti, who arrived and settled in Ajmer in 1223 A.D. A learned divine, Shoaib, had migrated earlier from Kabul and was appointed a Kazi in Multan, where his grandson, Farid-ud-Din Masud, better known as Baba Farid, was born in 1175.

Baba Farid established a sufi circle of jama'at khana at Pakpattan, then known as Ajodhan. Although his mother tongue was Persian, he produced most remarkable sufi poetry in Punjabi and became the first known poet of this language. In his time Ajodhan was surrounded by wild country and wilder Jat and Rajput tribes. These tribes were Hindu and believed in the congenital inequality of castes, the burning of widows, depriving daughters of inheritance and in worshipping idols. They flocked round this man, Baba Farid, who though belonging to the ruling race, considered them as his equal and preached the unity of godhead. Among his mulfuzat (diaries) there is no mention of his exhorting people to get into the Islamic fold, but it seems that whole tribes from the 'bar' areas of Punjab joined Muslim society under his influence Today these tribes remember Baba Farid with the deepest gratitude and visit in great hordes his mausoleum on the "urs" days.

Baba Farid's verse

Baba Farid's Punjabi verse has been saved for us by a lucky incident. It happened that towards the close of the 15th century or the beginning of the 16th, Baba Nanak, the founder of Sikh religion, was collecting verses of sufis and 'bhagats' to put them together in a volume for the instructions of his disciples, or Sikhs. During his search he came upon the gaddinishin of Baba Farid's khanqah at Ajodhan, who gave him the Punjabi verse of the Baba. These verses, which were written more than seven centuries ago, remain unexcelled in depth of feeling and the beauty of diction. Baba's main themes are the universality of pain, the inevitability of death, the transitoriness of worldly pomp, the uselessness of the most austere penances for discovering God and much else besides. Here is an example of what he says about the universality of pain:

مَیں جاناں دُکھ مجھی کو دُکھ سبھائے جگ
اُچّے چڑھ کے دیکھیا گھر گھر ایہا اگّ

"I thought that pain was my portion alone. But no, it is the fate of all. I had only to go up a height to discover that every home was sending up the smoke of pain."

Note the concentration of meaning in the phrase 'uchhey charh ke dakhia' which can mean both the physical ascent on a hill or the elevation of soul that will see the pain of others.

On the inevitability of death:

آیو بندہ دُنی وِچ وت آسونی بنّھ
مَلک الموت جد آوسی سب درّ وجّھے بھنّ
تِنھاں پیاریاں بھائیاں اَگّے دِتا بنّھ
دیکھو بندہ چلیا چھُوں جنیاں دے کنّھ

"Man has come into the world with bundles of hopes. When the Angel of Death comes smashing through all doors your own dear ones tie you up in a shroud for him. Look, there goes the man, carried on the shoulders of four pall bearers."

Note here the terrific sound effect of sabh darwajjey bhann in the second line. You almost hear the ramrod striking the solid closed doors. Also note its contrast with the passive yielding sounds of dekho banda chalya describing the mournful final departure of man.

Baba Farid is universally regarded by sufi masters as having undergone the most severe "chilla" penances possible. And yet he of all the sufis was bold enough to admit that these failed to reveal God to him. Here is a shlok testifying to his failure:

تن سُکا پنجر تھیا تلیاں کھونڈن کاگ
اجے سو رب نہ بوہڑیو، دیکھ بندے دے بھاگ!

"The body has dried up and become a mere skeleton by doing penances. Crows begin pecking at it, thinking it to be a dead body. Yet God has not revealed Himself to man—look that is Man's destiny."

Counterforce to tyranny

Baba Farid's generosity, love and teachings resulted in expanding the fold of Islam, just as the examples of Hujveri and Moeen-ud-Din Chishti had done before him. The need for instructions in the basic Shariat rules for the growing Muslim populations gave undue importance to the mullahs and pesh-imams who really have no locus standi in Islam. Contrasted to the sufis, who shunned the courts of kings, governors and officialdom, the mullahs sought their nearness. They justified the actions of those in power by false fatwas and hair-spliting legal quibbles. Naturally they won favour with the ruling powers and in their own turn exercised their power against the Muslim society. Their tyranny had to be met, and in the Punjabi it was the Punjabi sufi poets who met it.

After Baba Farid, these poets were Shah Husain of Lahore (1538-1599), Sultan Bahu of Jhang (1630-1691), Bullhe Shah of Kasur (1680-1750), Khawja Ghulam Farid of Bahawalpur (1844-1901), and some others. It would not be possible in this short article to discuss them all and show how their poetry countered the dry formalism and tyranny of the mullah in religious and social matters. There should really have been no conflict between Islam and tasawwuf because form and content imply each other. It is the mullah and his selfish power-seeking proclivity which have been at fault and have forced separation between them.

Bullhe Shah's jehad

Of all the poets named above, Bullhe Shah provides the best example of battling with the mullah. His verses which ridicule the mullah's hair-splitting quibbles, stupidity and greed, bring a breath of fresh air in an atmosphere which would otherwise be hemmed in by irrational restrictions. His verses have become so popular with the common folk that they get frequently quoted as proverbs. Here is a verse satirising the mullah and others of his habits:

وارے جایئے اُنھاں توں جیہڑے مارن گپ شڑپ
کوڈی لبھی دے دیون تے نُچّے گھاو گھپ

"I bow before those who preach and talk big. They will return a cowrie they have found, but keep back a money bag."

Here is a verse admonishing the mullah and his patron whether he be a lord or a landlord:

جس ٹھانے دا مان کریں توں
اوہنے تیرے نال نہ جانا
ظلم کریں تے لوک ستاویں
کسب پھڑیو لُٹ کھانا

کرلے چاوڑ چار دیہاڑے
اوڑک توں اُٹھ جانا

"The station of which you feel so proud will not go with you (into the grave). You persecute and oppress people.

To loot others in your living.

Rejoice, if you must, for four days you are sure to go away humbled."

Following is a daring piece on the uselessness of saying prayers which mullahs and pundits show off for the benefit of their followers. If somebody were to write it today, the contemporary mullahs would lynch him. That Bullhe wrote it in the 18th century Mughal Punjab and escaped shows that his adversaries were, after all, not as strong as they are today:

وید قراناں پڑھ پڑھ تھکے
سجدے کردیاں گھس گئے متھے
نہ رب تیرتھ نہ رب مکے
پھوک مصلے بھن سٹ لوٹا
نہ پھڑ تسبیح، عاصا، سوٹا

"I am tired of reading the Vedas and the Quran.

My forehead is worn off by constant prostrations in the mosque. But the Lord is neither at the Hindu Shrine nor at Mecca.

Burn the prayer mat, break the bucket and touch not the beads or the stave or staff."

The vanity of knowledge is another favourite subject of Bullhe, who in the following verses is thinking of the hair-splitting lawyer-divines who occupied well-paid government posts of Kazis and Muftis and whenever the occasion demanded, sided with the government and were hard on the people. Bullhe calls them executioners rather than judges and warns them of the punishment awaiting them in the next world:

کیوں پڑھنا ایں گڈ کتاباں دی
کیوں ہوئیں شکل جلاداں دی

سر چانائیں پنڈ عذاباں دی
اگے پینڈا مشکل بھارا اے
اِک الف پڑھو چھٹکارا اے

"Why do you read cart-loads of books?

Now you look like a hangman.

On your head is a huge load of sins.

The journey ahead is hard and arduous.

Read Alif alone, it will liberate you!"

In the same vein is another, better known, kafi-poem of which the refrain is, "Learn no more knowledge, O friend!" Bullhe is an enemy of knowledge that helps the learned ones (divines or otherwise) to become tyrants and exploit the illiterates to their own advantage. Such knowledge lights only their exteriors but their hearts remain devoid of light and human feelings:

علموں بس کریں او یار!
پڑھ پڑھ لکھ لکھ لاویں ڈھیر
ڈھیر کتاباں چار چوفیر
گردے چانن وچ انھیر
پڑھ پڑھ شیخ مشیخ کہاویں
اُلٹے مسلے گھر دیں نباویں
بے علماں نوں لُٹ لُٹ کھاویں
علموں بس کریں او یار!

"Learn no more knowledge, O friend!

You read and write and pile your books in heaps.

These piles be on all your four sides.

There is light around you but in your heart is darkness.

You read and read, and are acclaimed as a shaikh.

You affirm perverse rules of your own making.

You rob and exploit the poor illiterate people.

Learn no more knowledge, O friend!"

Finally, it has to be admitted that though Bullhe and others of kindred spirit may have kept up a veritable jehad against the tyranny of establishments, that tyranny has not ended. In the last resort a man has to fall back on his own inner resources (tawakkal, according to the sufis) and adjust himself to the environment. This is possible when he realises that men, universe and God are facets of one Reality (Wahdat-ul-Wujud of the sufis). This is brought out in the following verses of Bullhe:

"You cannot push back the true word once it has come up to the tongue! Bullhe! God is not separate from Man.

None exists apart from God;

Only the seeing eye is lacking

Only for that lack does your self suffer pangs of separation."

Tolerance, peace

In the Indian subcontinent, where the population is deeply divided by numerous religions, creeds and castes, sufism has brought tolerance, harmony and peace among them, a truly great achievement. Among the Musulmans, it has brought joy of life to those who would be afraid that indulging in song and dance was against the tenets of Islam and hence fit to be shunned. By allowing same (listening to music) the sufis of the Chishti order have not only made music popular among the Muslims but have also helped the evolution of classical music.

In the lives of individuals, sufism has stressed the precedence of spirit over form in religious practices, thus making them more meaningful and satisfying. Sufism, moreover, lays stress on individual spiritual experience though it warns that the experience of no person can cancel the injunctions of the Quran and Hadith, or become valid for another person. Its emphasis on tawakkal, or relying solely on God in all situations, has given dignity to the lives of even poor people, who would not ask for help of another person even when that is permissible under the custom. Also, it has given an inward direction to the struggle or jehad against the evil forces lying outside man.

The enlarging of the Muslim fold in India and Punjab has been mainly due to the loving conduct and sublime character of individual sufis, the Muslim governments having seldom shown any interest in it.

(Translations of Bullhe Shah are by Atam Singh.)

This article has been reproduced from Viewpoint, a Lahore weekly

MIZORAM

Truce in Sight

Laldenga is optimistic about current negotiations

Peace is finally in sight in troubled Mizoram. For 58-year-old former Indian army combatant clerk Laldenga, who raised the underground Mizo National Front (MNF) in 1966 demanding independence for the Mizo tribe, it has been a long journey from war to peace. Fresh hopes of peace were raised with the arrival of Laldenga in New Delhi on 29 October 1984, to resume truce talks which broke down in January 1982, because the two sides could not agree on a solution within the parameters of the Indian Constitution. As his guerrilla band resumed its hit-and-run raids in Mizoram after the talks failed, a bitter Laldenga with his wife Biakdiki and their two children flew out of New Delhi on an Indian passport and settled down in Woking, Surrey.

This time too, at the end of his talks with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's principal aide on foreign affairs, G. Parthasarathy, chairman of external affairs ministry's policy planning committee, Laldenga flew out of New Delhi to be with his family members in England during Christmas. But on this occasion he went a happy man. He could finally reach a truce/agreement with New Delhi and he himself announced that a solution had finally been found within the framework of the Indian Constitution. By his reckoning a formal agreement is expected after the talks are resumed on his return to New Delhi next month. And the people of Mizoram can now look forward to a splendid New Year gift.

Laldenga's decision to resume talks with New Delhi follows the Congress(I)'s coming to power in Mizoram for the first time and the defeat of his arch-rival, a retired Indian army brigadier, T. Sailo in the Assembly elections early this year. The talks broke down in 1982 as the government of India refused to accommodate Laldenga on his demands of immediate dismissal of the then Mizoram chief minister Brig Sailo and his installation as the chief minister without even holding an election. Laldenga contributed substantially to the Congress(I) victory at the polls by urging his people through pre-recorded cassettes to vote for the Congress(I) for stability and prosperity of Mizoram. The present Congress(I) chief minister, Lal Thanhawla has been a close associate of Laldenga for a long time and is one of the promoters of the 300-strong well-trained and highly motivated MNF guerrilla band. It is mainly due to his initiative and predominantly Christian Mizoram's church leaders that negotiations were reopened.

The church leaders succeeded after several attempts. The Mizoram Church Leaders' Council, a forum of nine denominations, in its first attempt wrote identical letters to Mrs Gandhi and Laldenga in June 1982 urging them to resume the talks. While Mrs Gandhi ignored the appeal, Laldenga sent a polite thank-you note to the church leaders. Again, on the eve of the April 1984 Assembly elections, Rev. Lalswama, the secretary of the Mizo Presbyterian Synod, called on K.V. Panniker, the all India Congress(I) joint secretary, at the Aizawl circuit house pleading for the resumption of the talks. It was the late Prime Minister Indira Gandhi who set the ball rolling when she announced at a public meeting in Aizawl on 16 April that she was ready to resume talks if Laldenga agreed to a solution within the framework of the Indian Constitution and his guerrillas ceased armed hostilities.

Laldenga

In May, a 19-member Mizo choir group led by Rev. Lalswama and Rev. Zaithanga while on a tour of England visited Laldenga at Surrey. Laldenga told them he was ready and willing to accept Mrs Gandhi's terms for the talks. In July he wrote a letter to Mrs Gandhi formally accepting her terms. On 15 August, chief minister Lal Thanhawla got a call from the union home minister P.V. Narasimha Rao summoning him to New Delhi. There he had a series of meetings with the home minister, the Prime Minister and senior government officials and discussed the ground rules for the talks. Laldenga wanted an assurance from the government of India on his safe passage to India and suspension of all punitive action against his outlawed MNF followers. In return, he instructed his guerrillas to hold their fire.

The stage was thus set for a fresh round of truce talks in New Delhi. The talks, however, suffered a setback even before they started because of the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. She was to meet Laldenga on the day she was assassinated. The threads were, however, picked up soon by her son and successor Rajiv Gandhi and apparently enough progress has been made to encourage optimism in Laldenga of a peace agreement next month. The government of India also shares his optimism but is cautious about acknowledging it publicly because of past frustrations in dealing with Laldenga. The first time the hopes of peace were raised in February 1971 was when one of Laldenga's close aides, Zoramthanga, walked into the Shillong office of the Indian secret service agency, Research and Analysis Wing (RAW) administered by the cabinet secretariat, carrying a peace proposal from Laldenga. By then Laldenga had deserted his camp in Bangladesh and settled down in Karachi. Zoramthanga again met the military attache posted at the Indian high commission in Kabul in 1973 with the same set of proposals. Two years later, in September 1975, the RAW agents smuggled Laldenga from his Karachi residence at Asghar Mall Chowk and sent him to Europe. The escape was planned when a joint director of RAW, Hasanwalia met him a Geneva hotel on 20 August where Laldenga typed out a letter on the Hotel du-Lac's letter head offering to settle the Mizo problem within the framework of the Indian Constitution.

After some hectic parleys with Indian officials at Cologne, West Germany, Laldenga agreed to come to New Delhi for further talks with the representatives of the government of India. Laldenga arrived in Delhi on 24 January 1976 and was put up at a house rented from a Times of India columnist at Gulmohar Park. A cease-fire was announced after Laldenga met other underground leaders in a five-star hotel in Calcutta for nine days from 24 March. The negotiations with India government representatives, however, failed to make much progress and got bogged down on procedural wranglings. Finally, the talks were discontinued in March 1978 and Laldenga's followers renewed insurgency in Mizoram. In July 1979, Laldenga was arrested for violence by his followers and put in Tihar jail till his release by Mrs Gandhi on her return to power.

Mrs Gandhi again set the ball rolling. On 13 April 1980, Laldenga met Mrs Gandhi and offered to negotiate peace. On 2 June, an Indian airforce Mi-4 helicopter flew Laldenga's elder son, David, and two of his aides to the Mizoram border village Parva, from where they trekked to the underground MNF headquarters located in the Chittagong Hill Tracts in Bangladesh to seek the approval of the 12-member MNF executive council to Laldenga's peace proposals.

Laldenga himself made two trips to the MNF headquarters—first in March 1981 and again in September the same year—to finalise the truce terms.

But negotiations floundered again as Laldenga started raising demands which the Indian negotiator G. Parthasarathy refused to concede on the ground that they were of an extra-constitutional nature. A fresh spurt of violence in Mizoram finally sealed the fate of the negotiations which were terminated on 20 January 1982. Before the talks were called off, the Indian officials were so optimistic about the outcome that they even told newsmen that an accord had been reached with Laldenga. It is because of this that Indian officials are cautious this time.

A truce between Laldenga and New Delhi will also mean peace for another disturbed northeastern state, Tripura. The Tribal Tripura National Volunteers (TNV) guerrillas responsible for widespread disturbances in the state have been drawing sustenance from the MNF and sharing its base since the TNV's inception in 1978. Laldenga has now instructed his followers to dissociate themselves from the TNV. However, a section of the MNF is still not reconciled to the idea of signing a truce agreement with New Delhi.

Toosher Pandit, Calcutta and Suntanu Ghosh, Aizawl

"Much Will Depend On How Fast Parliament Can Act"

Laldenga tells SUNDAY

Q: You arrived for the third round of talks on the Mizo problem on 29 October. Were you able to meet Mrs Gandhi before her tragic death? Has Mrs Gandhi's death dislocated the process towards a final settlement?*

A: The day after my arrival I met Mr G. Parthasarthy who had been detailed to handle the government side of the negotiations. He has often played the role of a trouble shooter for Mrs Gandhi and was also in charge of the 1981-'82 negotiations. It was arranged that I would meet the Prime Minister on 31 October and as you know she was unfortunately assassinated on that very day. A new government was framed and although it was from mother to son it was nonetheless a different government. So I had to make sure whether it would continue the same policies. I contacted the home minister and Mr Narasimha Rao assured me that they would continue what the previous government had started. In fact, they stressed that they were committed to "conclude" in the way that Mrs Gandhi had wanted the problem to be settled.

Q: Did you have ay detailed discussions with Rajiv Gandhi? Was there any difference in his attitude from that of his mother towards the Mizo problem?

A: Sometime in mid-November I met the Prime Minister. I was accompanied by my delegation including the commander of the MNA (Mizo National Army), Brig. Tawnlui. Rajiv was assisted by Mr G. Parthasarthy. It was decided that irrespective of whatever transpired in their present talks, the final round would take place after the new government was formed. Rajiv told me that the pressure of elections would probably not permit him to meet me again till after the elections.

In any case, once an agreement is reached, legislation would have to be necessary and this will have to be done by the new Parliament. Rajiv was very positive and understanding in his approach. Of course his mother had been more firm during the talks, more certain of the issues involved but then she was aware of the intricacies of the Mizo problem. Rajiv had certainly been well-briefed on the subject but nonetheless it was a new field for him. But he was most attentive.

Q: After your meeting with Rajiv Gandhi were there any more talks with Mr Parthasarthy?

A: I continued to have a series of meetings with Mr G. Parthasarthy. We were able to come to an understanding on 14 points. A handful still remain to be settled but we have decided to refer these to the Prime Minister.

Q: What are the broad outlines of the understanding that you have reached? Is it different from that envisaged by you during the 1976 and 1981-'82 rounds of talks?

A: I do not want to elaborate on the understanding reached because it might appear that I am pressurising the government through the press. I have not forgotten that in 1976 the Indian government, or may be certain zealous bureaucrats went to the press and claimed that an accord had been reached when we had yet to make known our proposals. Subsequently the government acknowledged that no accord had been reached, rather it was a "deceit" practised upon us.

However, the accord that is now being worked out is very much along the lines of the one being negotiated in 1981-'82. Then it had been agreed that Mizoram would be upgraded to a state with autonomy in the line of Article 371A and not Article 370 which applies only to Jammu and Kashmir. It is Article 371A that provides for special provisions to be made for Nagaland.

(According to constitutional lawyer Gobinda Mukhoty, while the article does provide for special rights for the Naga people it also provides for special pow-

"The neighbouring states have a lot of Mizo areas. Of course when de-limitation takes place, the representatives of other states will have to be present" ers to the district commissioner and the Governor. For example, it provides for regional councils but the chairman of these councils is always the deputy commissioner. Therefore, despite the existence of the Assembly, the centre exercises substantial control in this sensitive state. Mr Laldenga appears to be negotiating with the government for a more balanced relationship between the centre and the state in an area which he recognises as "sensitive".

Q: What are some of the special provisions that you feel would be necessary? Would they be similar to those existing in Nagaland, Manipur and Assam?

A: There are certain peculiarities of the Mizoram situation which have to be provided for. It is a sensitive area bordering Burma in the east, Bangladesh in the west, where there is the problem of the Chakma tribals, which has spilled over into Mizoram. There is a high rate of illegal immigration and there are thousandsof refugees in camps there. In such a situation there has to be absolute trust between the centre and the state. The Naga problem is a very different matter.

Q: What role would you expect the army to play in the area? Here I have in mind the situation in Nagaland where the army is extensively deployed.

A: There is no question of the army being deployed here (in Mizoram) to aid the civil authorities because wherever there has been a large army presence, friction between civilians and armed force personnel has developed. As regards the border, of course, the army must be there to protect them, but it must be strictly for border protection and not to aid the civil authority.

Q: In an earlier interview you had said that you were keen to ensure that the Sixth Schedule no longer apply to Mizoram. Has the government adapted this during the current negotiations?

A: The Sixth Schedule was meant for the protection of the Assamese tribals from the "plains people." Mizoram was then a tribal area of Assam. However, since then it has been made a union territory and will soon be granted statehood. We have therefore demanded that the Sixth Schedule no longer apply. The government has not yet conceded to this demand. At present the Sixth Schedule applies only in certain areas of Mizoram but we want it to be withdrawn altogether. It is still the subject of talks with the government. (The Sixth Schedule, framed under Article 224 and 275 of the Constitution provides for extraordinary powers to the Governor of the area. In effect, it is an enabling provision for virtual central rule despite the existence of the Assembly.)

Q: What are some of the other areas of understanding that you have been able to arrive at in the present round of talks?

A: Given the fact that we are a different ethnic group and indeed we feel alienated even in Delhi, special provisions have to be made to ensure adequate representation in the state and central services. It is a small place and politically and economically backward. We need some constitutional protection. If it (Mizoram) is completely opened up, the (Mizo) population will be like a drop in the ocean. Certain protection has therefore to be provided to trade and commerce within the state so that big traders do not take advantage of us. The land tenure system has to be safeguarded. To be good and happy Indians we need certain safeguards to feel secure. We also want that our Mizo language, spoken in the adjoining border regions as well, be recognised as one of the languages of India.

It has also been agreed that the underground Mizos will be rehabilitated and whatever cases were registered against them during the insurgency will be dropped. Understanding has also been reached on the delimitation of the state of Mizoram. The neighbouring states have a lot of Mizo areas. Of course, ultimately when delimitation actually takes place the representative of the other concerned state governments will have to be present.

Q: Regarding the points of differences still persisting, would you describe them as major or minor?

A: Well, it depends upon who interprets them. From my point of view they are all minor but it will depend upon the new government. Essentially, they have to do with constitutional matters and certain administrative problems. No, I cannot elaborate. But I do not believe that they will be a major stumbling block when negotiations are resumed next January. The points still remaining are but a handful

"There is no question of the army being deployed here..wherever there has been a large army presence, friction between civilians and armed force personnel has developed."

Q: When do you expect the agreement to be finalised and fresh elections held?

A: We hope that by January something can be accomplished. Much will of course, depend upon how fast Parliament can act. Legislation has to be brought before the Parliament. Constituencies will have to be delimited because the size of constituencies in a union territory are different. I do not think that it can all be done in less than six months or may be a year.

Q: Are you confident that whatever agreement you arrive at will be acceptable back home, especially by the MNA?

A: Certainly, I would otherwise not be negotiating on their behalf and the government would not take me seriously. I enjoy the support of every rank and file and not only of the MNF. It was on the basis of this proposed agreement that the village council elections were recently fought. We swept the polls with Brig Sailo and the combined opposition winning only 28 villages as against 309 won by us. There is not a single person in the MNF who is against the agreement. There are a few other people who have expressed reservations, but they are negligible.

Q: Are there any differences between the MNF and the MNA regarding the talks?

A: Firstly, there is no difference between the MNF and the MNA. Brig. Tawnlui is taking part in the negotiations but not as a representative of the MNA but as a representative of the underground government. Do you think that when the government of India enters into negotiations, the army represents itself?

Q: What progress have you made on the question of reciprocal ceasefire. Earlier, you had made a representation to the government that a cease-fire to be observed only by your side could not continue. Has the centre ordered a ceasefire on their side?

A: Yes, but just yesterday I got a report from Aizwal that the Indian army was not observing cease-fire orders. Some of them complain that they have not received any such orders. Recently an incident occurred somewhere between Aizwal and Lonk town. There were fortunately no casualties. So far, I have told my people not to retaliate but if there are casualties it will be most difficult. I have made this known to the home ministry.

Interviewed by Rita Manchanda

MOUNTAINEERING

Himalayan Stigma

Sherpas protest against "unfair" criticism

Matters seem to be hotting up in the cool climes of the Himalayan Mountaineering Institute (HMI) at Darjeeling, the training school for many a Sherpa who has accompanied expeditions to the Himalayas. A recent statement made by Dr Meena Agarwal, the team doctor of the 1984 Everest expedition, that the Sherpas who have traditionally accompanied expeditions to the Himalayas had become unreliable and were always after money, has raised a storm of protests from the Sherpas. Addressing the Bombay branch of the Indian Medical Association (IMA), Dr Agarwal has said that the old world values of the Sherpas had changed; they were disloyal and not particularly helpful during crises. Retorted an indignant Sherpa Nawang Gombu, field director of the HMI and the first person in the world to scale Mt. Everest twice, "It is a Himalayan stigma.... this is the height of injustice." Gombu maintains that the experience of one person with the Sherpas does not reflect on the community as a whole.

Gombu goes on to say that the Sherpas in India are gradually giving up mountaineering as a profession; today, they are taking up less hazardous and more steady jobs. He recalled that the Sherpas in the early 1920s, when the idea of climbing the world's pinnacle had just dawned on the Everest pioneers, used to get a wage of 25 paise per day. Today, the average expenses involved in hiring a Sherpa for the entire duration of an Everest expedition is Rs 60,000. The circumstances have justifiably changed, Gombu maintains. After all, more Sherpas have died on the mountains than others. According to him, all but three or four of his 1963 colleague Sherpas have died, mostly on the mountains.

Gombu

It is a regrettable fact, says Gombu that some Indian mountaineers are getting into the habit of publicly criticising the Sherpas and then apologising privately for it.. A couple of years ago, Brig. Gyan Singh, an eminent mountaineer and former principal of the HMI had made scathing remarks in newspaper articles against its Sherpa instructors, even though he was then an executive council member of the mountaineering institute.

Gombu is determined not to let Dr Agarwal's remarks pass. He went to see the HMI principal, Col D.K. Khullar, leader of the 1984 Everest expedition. Col. Khullar has expressed regrets for the accusations. Col Khullar told SUNDAY, "Those are Dr Agarwal's personal views. She did not have my permission to say such things."

Tapas Mukherjee, Darjeeling

TAMIL NADU

Jayalalitha: MGR's Successor?

The ex-actress draws massive crowds

Jayalalitha has emerged as a surrogate MGR in the hinterlands of Tamil Nadu. The villagers were flocking to her public meetings with the belief that in the absence of MGR, she is their next best leader. The crowds that were attending the former film actress's meetings surpassed the ones at the meetings of other political leaders in the state, including the DMK stalwart M. Karunanidhi. Jayalalitha finds it advantageous not to emerge as a leader in her own right: she is MGR by proxy. Very subtly she deliberately mentions her association with MGR. By seeing her, people are automatically reminded of MGR. As far as the rural population is concerned, Jayalalitha is the "truest and most sincere representative" of MGR and his successor.

Jayalalitha chose to tour only ten districts: Tirunelveli, Salem, West Ramnad, Madurai, Coimbatore, Periyar, Tiruchy, Pudukottai, Thanjavur and South Arcot. Even at her wayside meetings, in remote villages and taluk headquarters the crowds which turned up to see and hear her were massive. One specific instance can be cited to prove that Jayalalitha commands bigger crowds than Karunanidhi. Even in a tiny village—Vellakoil, the crowds that attended her meeting was bigger than the one that were present at Karunanidhi's meeting in Perambular, a small town. As the DMK chief refuses to "stoop to the level" of treating Jayalalitha as a rival, the DMK propped up T. Rajendar as a foil to Jayalalitha. Rajendar, a popular Tamil film actor and director was effective in his role in the AIADMK byelections. But, in the rural areas, Jayalalitha remained unrivalled. At Dharmapuram, a crowd of about 10,000 waited for seven hours in the chill of the winter night to see and hear Jayalalitha.

Even more impressive than the size of the crowds that Jayalalitha attracts is the spontaneous enthusiasm she managed to arouse in the people. The milling crowds, particularly the women and youth talk excitedly about her. Though she takes great pains to reaffirm that she has come to them as MGR's emissary, Jayalalitha today has evolved a charisma of her own. Evidently, after Periyar, Kamaraj, Annadurai, Karunanidhi and MGR, Jayalalitha is going to be the next most charismatic leader in Tamil Nadu.

The size of the crowds reminded this correspondent of N.T. Ramarao's debut in politics in Andhra Pradesh in 1982. The scenario was similar except, perhaps, that it was on a slightly reduced scale. At that time people dismissed the crowds NTR attracted loftily pronouncing that it would not turn into votes. It did turn.

The same drama appeared to be unfolding this time in Tamil Nadu with Jayalalitha as the protagonist. Jayalalitha travelled around in her well-equipped, year-old blue van that even has a toilet. As she neared a village, she emerged out of the trap door on the roof of the van. The lights were turned on and the star was framed dramatically in a warm soft orange glow. She was always clad in a white sari with a black, white and red border, the three AIADMK colours. As the waiting crowds spotted her, they ran forward, leaping and shouting, and threw garlands at her which she, like MGR and NTR threw back at them. Jayalalitha smiled, waved her hand, did namaste and repeatedly raised her hand with the 'V' sign denoting the two leaves symbol of the AIADMK emulating MGR. Intelligent and a keen observer that she is, Jayalalitha had made a study of the gestures and mannerisms that is part of the MGR legend.

Jayalalitha is a good orator. On the dais she was able to establish an instant rapport with the people. She spoke effortlessly and fluently using colloquial expressions well-understood by the crowds. As a speaker, she was infinitely superior to MGR who relied entirely on his face and appearance not on his speech, to arouse the people. She used a conversational tone, constantly ensuring mass participation by posing questions: "Don't you all want to hear the latest news about MGR ?" She asked. The crowds answered with an enthusiastic, "yes." To that she made the "happy announcement" that MGR would return in January. Making a jibe often at Karunanidhi, she asserted that the DMK chief was tailing her, "Isn't he coming here tomorrow?" she asked the crowd.

To understand why people waited in such numbers and over such long periods, this correspondent spoke to a number of villagers They said they were very curious to see the ex-actress because they had seen a number of her films and because she had acted with MGR. Now she was in his party following his policies. She was "the truest representative of MGR in the party," the only one who they were confident would faithfully follow the path chosen by MGR. Only she, like MGR, would give paramount importance to the poor and the downtrodden. To this correspondent's specific question, the villagers said they saw Jayalalitha as MGR's successor.

Kannan, the AIADMK Lok Sabha candidate for Tiruchengode told SUNDAY that people flocked to see Jayalalitha because of her "good personality." This was a local euphemism for her good looks. Jayalalitha was the beautiful girl of Tamil cinema for several years. She has not lost her looks and more than anything else her fair, unblemished complexion has the people gaping at her. Kannan pointed out the fact that she was known to be close to MGR added to her appeal. Moreover, as the propaganda secretary of the party, she had several opportunities to mingle with the masses.

Jayalalitha's political career graph has been quite erratic. Her rapid rise in the party hierarchy was offset by her equally rapid downfall when MGR was hospitalised. While MGR looked on benignly (or helplessly as some would put it), Jayalalitha rode roughshod over the party elders, earning the resentment of a sizable section of the party. She become so powerful at one stage that she was the de facto chief minister. The AIADMK partymen recoiled at the idea of tolerating such treatment from MGR's paramour. When MGR fell ill, these partymen lost no time in venting their anger against Jayalalitha by openly humiliating and insulting her. She was pushed out of the limelight, and if the AIADMK high command had its own way, Jayalalitha would not even have been allowed to campaign this time. Fortunately for her, Rajiv Gandhi stepped in. He did not want any infighting in the AIADMK to interfere with the combine's victory at the hustings. Intelligence reports had reached him that next to MGR, Jayalalitha would be the biggest crowdpuller in the AIADMK. It was indicated to the state's finance minister V.R. Nedunchezian that Jayalalitha should be inducted for electioneering. The command was conveyed to P.U. Shunmugam AIADMK general secretary, who had little choice but to oblige. Thus, Jayalalitha was given the much-needed opportunity to demonstrate her popularity and mass appeal. Now that she is once again active in the party, Jayalalitha is doing everything in her power to consolidate her position. Her biggest hurdle is the animosity of the AIADMK ministers who lobbied to prevent her from campaigning in their home bases, afraid that she would threaten their hold over the locals.

Jayalalitha

Instead of going on a whirlwind tour all over the state which would entail only a superficial coverage, Jayalalitha chose to cover only ten districts intensively. This was an idea mooted by her friend and political adviser Mr Solai. Just as there are several prominent persons in the AIADMK who are against her there are others within the party who are supporting her. Jayalalitha's staunchest supporter was S. Thirunavukkarasu, the young and energetic commercial taxes minister in the MGR cabinet. He is also the secretary of the AIADMK youth wing. The AIADMK youth wing has done a commendable job mobilising people, making arrangements, ensuring publicity and so on.

Jayalalitha has to live down her past. Since she was a glamourous filmstar, people automatically assumed that she was neither intelligent nor shrewd. On her part, Jayalalitha selected her slogans with care. Her two main slogans were; "Puratchi selvi (revolutionary girl)," complementing MGR who is popularity called "Puratchi Thalaivar (revolutionary leader)." She is also called "Chintanai selvi" which roughly translated means "girl with brains and ideas."

Jayalalitha is going to find it an uphill task to realise her ambitions within the framework of the party. How she is going to mobilise the senior partymen and get them to accept her as MGR's successor remains to be seen. According to sources close to her, she is also toying with the idea of forming her own party should she find herself stifled in the AIADMK. In that case, just as in the Seventies one found both the DMK and the newly formed AIADMK, both raving about Anna, one would probably see in future the AIADMK and its splinter faction led by Jayalalitha (perhaps, named MGR-ANNA DMK) both hailing MGR.

Anita Pratap, Madras

An Interview With Jayalalitha

Jayalalitha waves to cheering crowds

Q. What do you have to say about the public response to you?

A: Wherever I've been I can say the response from the public, the turnout and the sheer magnitude of the masses is something that has created history. This is what people themselves say. I have been to all these districts (the ten districts where she campaigned) before two or three times, so it is not that I am new to the people or that they have not seen me before. In fact, I have covered these districts village by village. But the crowds this time have been unprecedented; it has set a new record.

Q: Do you feel that MGR's lack of physical presence for the election campaign is a severe setback to the AIADMK?

A: Well, I am there. But you must not take this in the wrong sense, because as far as the public are concerned they don't see any difference between MGR and me. When I come to them they think they are seeing him. To that extent I have made up for his absence—now don't get me wrong. I am not talking about the leadership or the administration of the party. I am only talking about the election campaign. You asked me about the setback because of MGR's absence. There is no setback because people don't think that MGR has not come. When they see Jayalalitha they don't see me as Jayalalitha. They think MGR has come.

Q: Your explanation for the large crowds at your meetings is that it is because people see MGR in you. But why would people equate you with MGR?

A: You are the political analyst. It is up to you to analyse why this is so. I can only give you facts. The meetings that have taken place were on my route; this time we have not been concentrating on public meetings. We keep stopping all along the route so that we can see the maximum number of people. We go through residential areas. Very often we have been told that people themselves were not aware that so many people lived in a particular area. From the time history has been recorded I can say that people have not seen such huge crowds. The reason for such a huge turnout is the sympathy for MGR. The whole of Tamil Nadu worships him as a god. They deify him. They do not come to see Jayalalitha. They are coming because they feel so many people are telling them lies, only Jayalalitha speaks the truth. They want to know how MGR is. Is he really recovering? Is he really going to come back? That is why there is such a massive turnout. The people believe what I tell them. They do not believe anyone else. Mr Karunanidhi is saying so many things. Other party people are saying so many things. But the people feel only I'll give them the true picture.

Q: What are the crucial issues for the Assembly and Parliament elections in Tamil Nadu?

A: There is no crucial issue as such because you see, the MGR government has given good administration, has initiated so many welfare schemes which no other government has even thought of doing. Hence the people don't want a different government. People are not bothered about promises or plans or anything like that. The people want to know whether MGR will come back. They want him as chief minister again. The people are not dissatisfied. They are happy with the meal schemes, free electricity for the poor farmers and all the other schemes that MGR has introduced.

Q: Will MGR come back fit enough to be chief minister again?

A: The American doctors who have been treating him have assured that he will be fit once again.

Q What is your reaction to the allegation made by a section of the AIADMK that the party high command has chosen a number of wrong candidates thereby undermining the chances of the party?

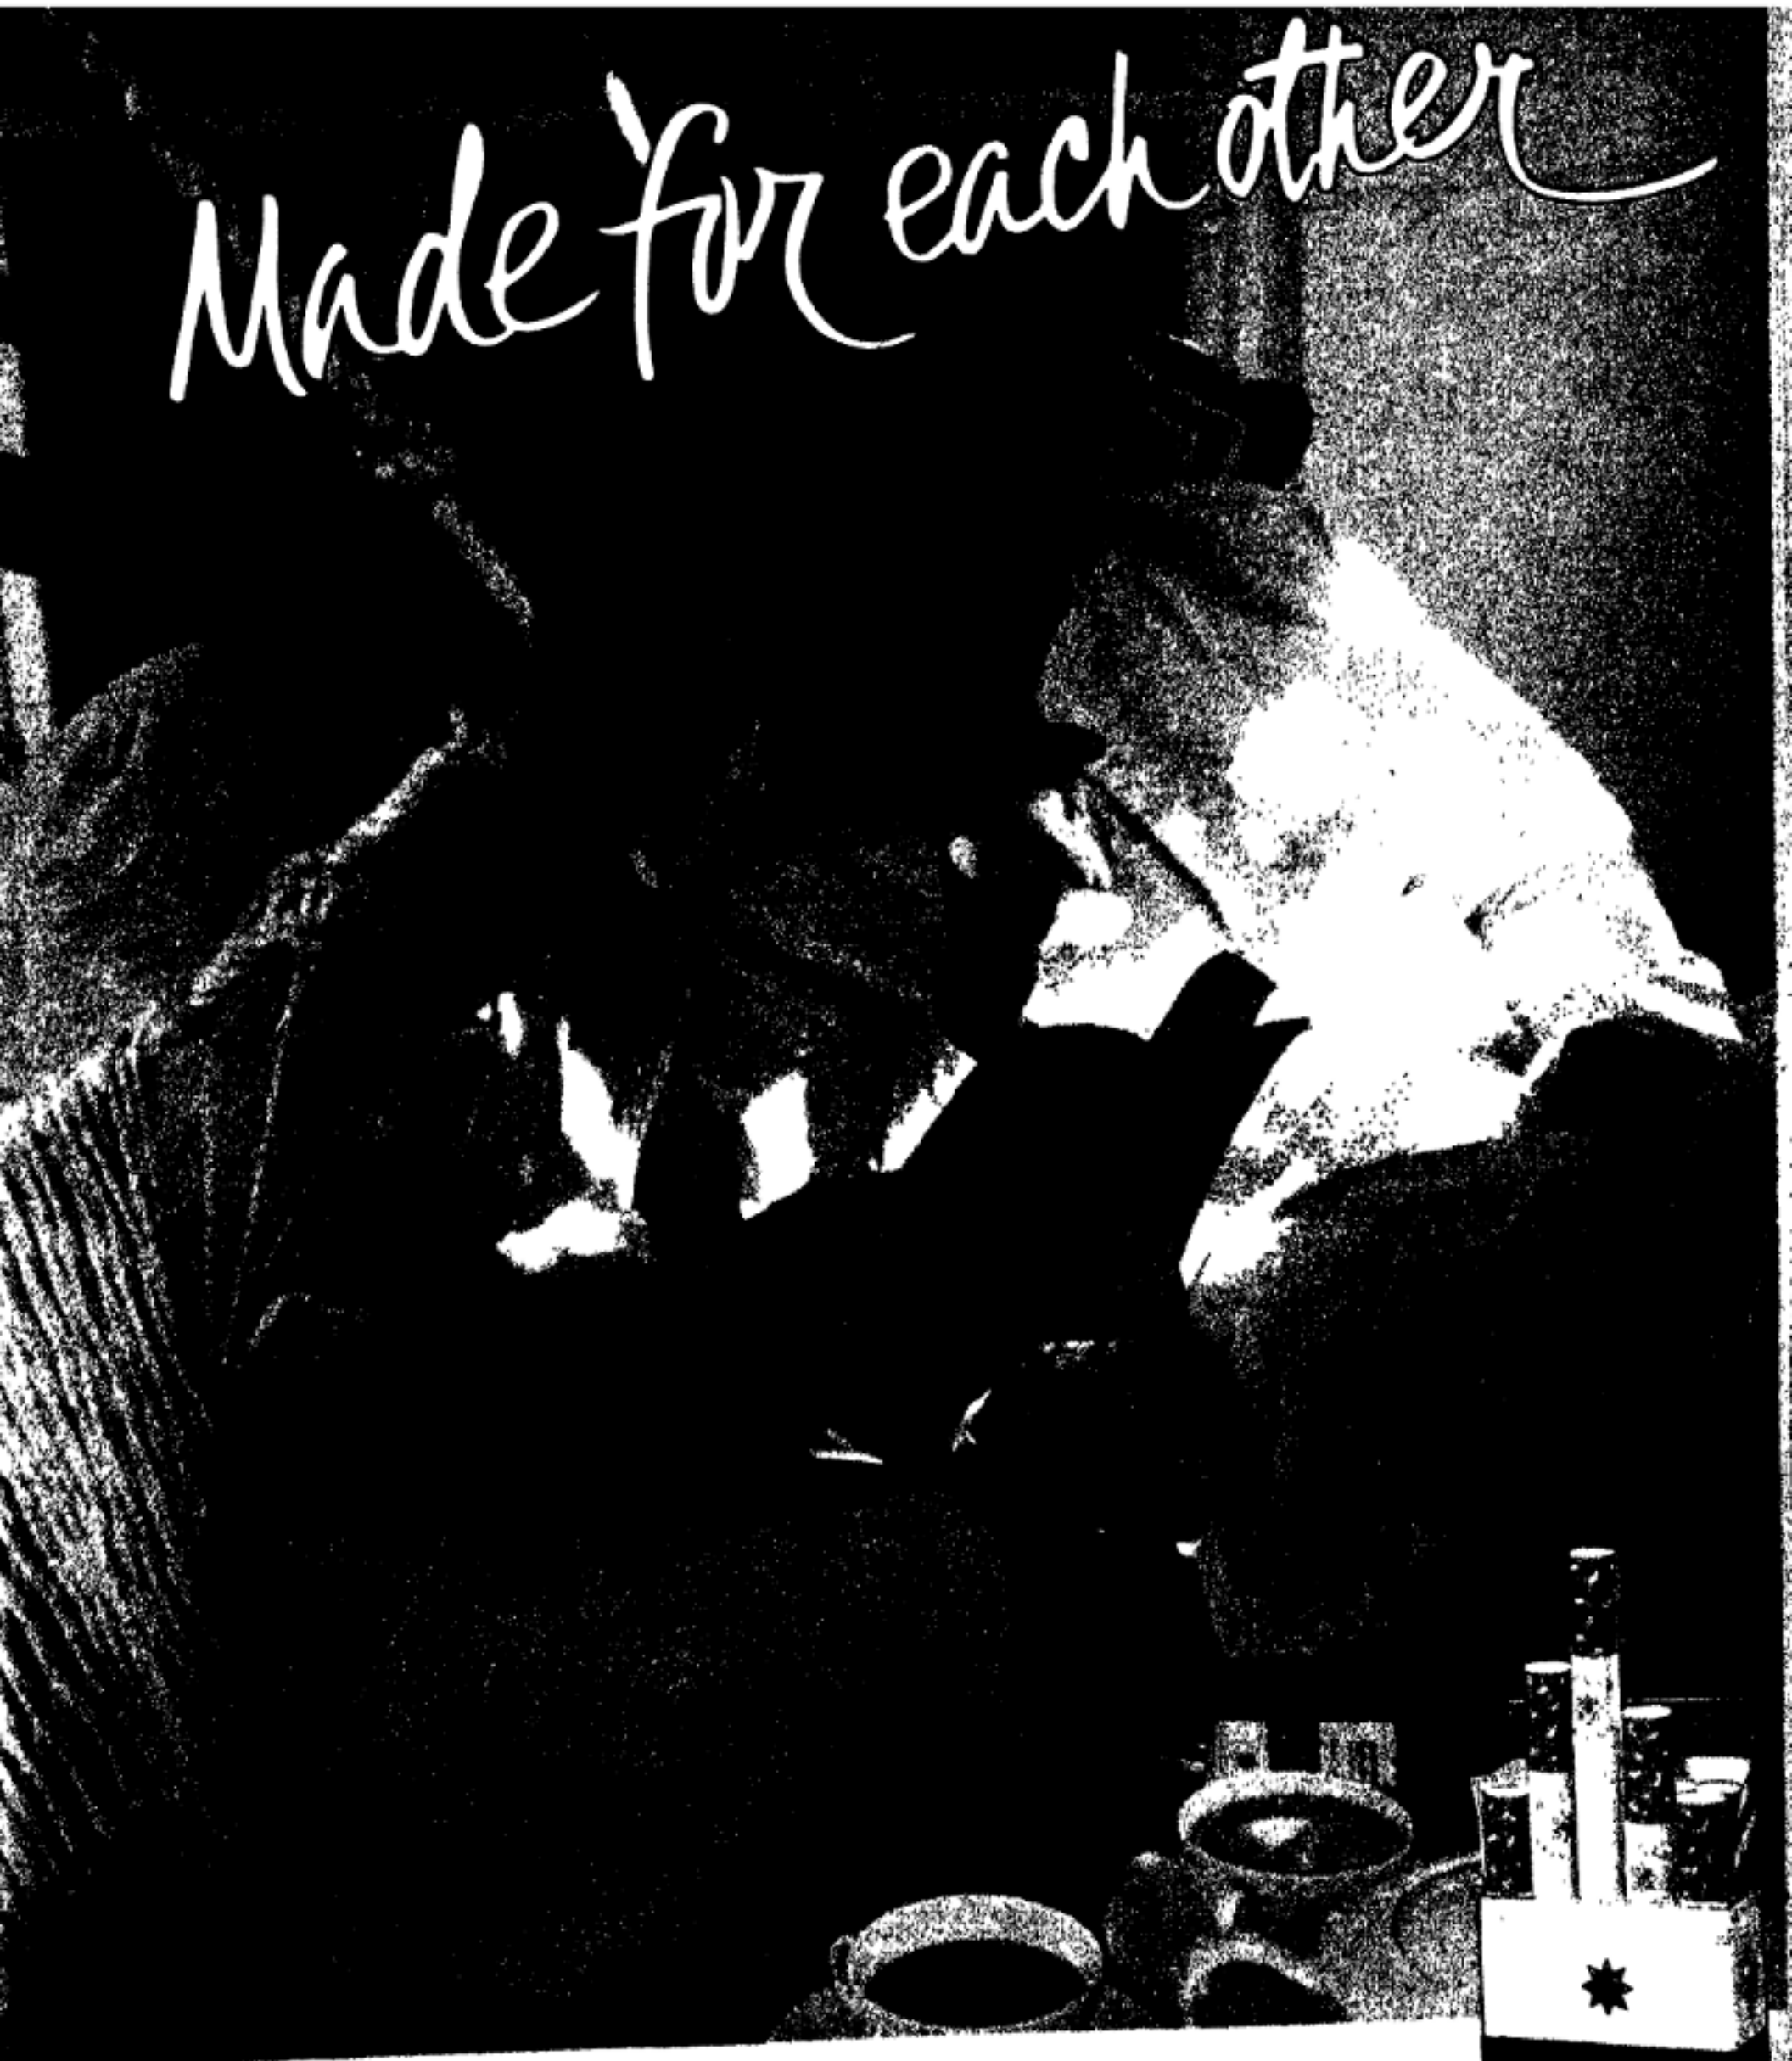
A: I can't comment on that because as far as I am concerned I am only an ordinary party member I had nothing to do with the choice of candidates. The parliamentary board has selected the candidates and as far as possible, as an ordinary member of the party, I am doing my duty by going around canvassing for votes for the AIADMK-Congress(I) candidates

Q: Do you think that the Congress(I) and the AIADMK are relying heavily on the sympathy factor.

A: We cannot ignore the sympathy factor...

Q But making that an issue...

A: We aren't making that an issue. It is the people who don't want us to talk about anything else The only question people ask is "Will MGR come back."



Q: What is your reaction to Mr Karunanidhi's plea to the electorate to forgive his sins and vote him back to power? At Madurai he even said that if he became CM and it MGR returned he would relinquish power to MGR.

A: (laughs mockingly) That only shows how desperate he is. No sensible politician could have said something like that. The chief minister can only be from the party that gets the majority. How can he relinquish power to someone from another party. It doesn't make sense. It is a very stupid statement.

Q: It is said that the AIADMK high command was forced to make you canvass for their candidates because you are a crowd puller in the party. But there is a lot of animosity towards you. Once the elections are over and you have served your purpose, it is felt that you will be sidelined again.

A: Look, I live for the day. I am doing my duty. God will take care of the rest.

Interviewed by Anita Pratap

Wills Filter set the filter trend in cigarettes long years ago. Today it's still the finest. In taste, in satisfaction. Hand-picked virginia tobaccos married to an efficient filter make it so. Millions of smokers have discovered it, then stayed with it.

WILLS FILTER
Filter and tobacco perfectly matched

STATUTORY WARNING
CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

MANIPUR

NSCN's Terror Tactics

Muivah warns the Nagas

The security forces have spread a wide net in Manipur's Naga-inhabited East District to nab two leaders of the pro-Maoist trans-border Naga insurgent outfit, the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN). The two are believed to be the masterminds behind the abortive attempt to kill Manipur chief minister Rishang Keishing near Leishi village in the East District on 8 December 1984 in an ambush. In what is described as a breakthrough in the investigation into the daring ambush, sleuths have identified "Captain" Livingstone and his assistant Angelus Shimray, the foreign secretary of the NSCN as the kingpins in the plot to assassinate the CM.

The security drill to preempt such wayside ambushes as well as to round up the suspects was further strengthened as General Kanwar Chiman Singh, GOC-in-C of the Eastern Command conferred with top brass of the Eighth Mountain Division at Imphal on 12 December. According to sources in the security forces, 15 NSCN gunmen, hidden in a jungle-clad hillside, kept up a barrage of automatic fire on Keishing's motorcade of jeeps in the mid-noon ambush. That the guerrillas were in a hurry to finish the job was evident from their random shooting. They did not have the patience to identify the jeep in which the chief minister was travelling. One plausible reason for it was that Keishing, who set out from Imphal in his official Contessa car, switched vehicles in between. He moved into a Manipur Rifles jeep when the motorcade reached a vulnerable section of the Ukhrul road. Four Manipur Rifles men, drawn from its second and sixth battalions, were killed on the spot. With DIG (Hills) Chandra Bihari Singh injured and perplexed jawans merely returning the fire without even making the necessary forays into the adjacent hillside terraces, the rebels managed to make an easy getaway.

CM Rishang Keishing

The ambush is seen by counter-insurgency experts as a part of the terror campaign by Muivah, the Burma-based messiah of the NSCN, to instill fear among the rural people about the revolutionary movement and at the same time weaken their confidence in the centre's authority. With this intention, Muivah periodically updates a "hit list" with clear instructions to his sharp-shooters to eliminate those who figure in it. A top army source told SUNDAY that a few weeks ago, it stumbled upon an NSCN document which stated that Keishing had been placed on top of the "hit list." Keishing earlier disclosed to SUNDAY that 31 persons, who figured in a hit list containing 40 names, had already been liquidated by the NSCN. The former Manipur chief minister, Yangmasho Shaiza, also a Tangkhul Naga like Keishing and Muivah, who was slain in January last year in Imphal by two NSCN gunmen, figured prominently in one such list.

By such killings, Muivah also wants to put into practice a text-book guerrilla tactics, now well-known as disruptive terrorism. It is designed to provoke the authorities into taking harsh repressive measures, which are likely to result in alienating the local population from the administration. The NSCN scored a psychological victory when Tangkhuls in Ukhrul registered their protest against the alleged tortures on many of them by the Army after a grisly NSCN ambush on a Sikh Regiment convoy in February 1982, which left 21 infantrymen dead. The alleged death in army custody of a Tangkhul Naga hotel-owner, K.S. Esua, within 12 hours of his arrest by Assam Rifles following combing drives to mop up suspects involved in the ambush of Keishing's motorcade, led to a bandh

Angelus Shimray

Muivah

"Captain" Livingstone

in Ukhrul town on 11 December.

To neutralise the government's politico-military offensive, Muivah is now reportedly in favour of creating an overground political infrastructure, which will be in a position to whip up a favourable political climate for the rebels. A pro-underground outfit, the Peoples' Independent Block (PIB), which contested the District Council elections, forged links with a few independents, who took part in the last Assembly polls from three East District seats. The poll-eve ambush is seen as a subtle warning by Muivah against the Tangkhul's voting for the Congress(I). The Tangkhul, Sema and Konyak Nagas are the mainstays of the 1,500-strong NSCN active in Manipur's Ukhrul, Nagaland's Mon and Tuensang and Arunachal Pradesh's Tirap areas through selective killing and extortion of taxes. The NSCN, surprisingly, also has contradictory attitudes towards the Congress(I) governments in Nagaland and Manipur. While Nagaland chief minister S.C. Jamir is secretly in league with Muivah's men, the NSCN has no love lost for Keishing and his family. Keishing's younger brother Nambuting, a contractor, had a brush with death when two NSCN assassins attacked him at his Imphal residence two years ago.

There are indications that Muivah, in his next course of action, may engage his cohorts in running duels with pro-Phizo Naga Federal Government (NFG) elements, who are in favour of a constitutional settlement of the Nagaland issue. After its feelers to NFG leaders, sent in May last year in the form of an open letter to "surrender gracefully" had failed to evoke any response, the NSCN circulated in last June a seven-page Angami language document in Kohima, warning the NFG leadership with dire consequences.

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is understandably concerned about the NSCN moves. He held a half-hour-long closed-door meeting with Major General V.K. Sood, commander of Manipur-Nagaland Area at Imphal's Rajniwas on 5 December. According to a top Manipur government source who does not wish to be named, Mr Gandhi is not averse to the idea of banning the NSCN under the Unlawful Activities Act, even as he has not scoffed at the idea of talking with the NSCN leaders if they throw in the towel and agree to solve their problems within the ambit of the Indian Constitution.

Santanu Ghosh, Silchar

SMUGGLING

The Trail Leads to Sangli

Associate of Maharashtra CM's son implicated

The mystery of the landing of contraband goods worth Rs 75 lakhs on the Raj Bhavan beach in Bombay in October and the unsuccessful attempt at taking the truck loaded with the contraband goods out of the sprawling premises of the Raj Bhavan still remains unsolved. The customs and excise officials at that time had told the metropolitan magistrate that very important people were involved and there were serious ramifications to the whole episode. Yet to date, neither the people of Maharashtra nor the rest of the country have been told who is behind this daring landing.

CM Patil: fears a scandal D V Jayner

Ten people including two police sub-inspectors and an SRP guard at Raj Bhavan were arrested by the customs and excise officials. The alleged kingpin, Mr Madhavrao Bhosale, a youth Congress(I) activist who had unsucessfully contested a municipal corporation election on the Congress(I) ticket was also arrested. Bhosale was released on bail but rearrested under the COFEPOSA. At that time it was thought that Mr Jambuwantrao Dhote was connected with the episode because Bhosale was allegedly arrested from the bungalow of former minister Nanabhau Embadwar, where he took refuge as Mr Embadwar was on tour.

However, in the second week of December the whole incident took yet another dramatic turn with a Congress(I) activist close to the chief minister Mr Vasantdada Patil being brought into the picture. It is very reliably learnt that the Governor Air Chief Marshal Latif fearing that the local authorities may not be in a position to handle the potentially explosive situation, got in touch with the union finance ministry people to follow up the matter. This resulted in a raid by the Pune customs and excise officers on a shop and residence of Mr Jaideo Nanwani. The customs authorities seized imported wristwatches, tape recorders and contraband worth Rs two lakhs. The officers had acted on information that some of the goods were being sent to Sangli from Bombay. This information was allegedly gathered from incriminating documents found in the possession of Bhosale. It is also pertinent that three packages were missing from the truck that was seized at Raj Bhavan.

Jaideo Nanwani is the vice-president of the "Vasant Prakash Vikas Pratisthan," a trust that was formed in Sangli on 6 April 1984. The president of the trust is Mr Prakash Vasantdada Patil, the son of the chief minister and his address is given as "Varsha," the residence of Maharashtra's chief minister. His shop, Asian Radio, which was raided, is a partnership concern with one Dilip Shinde and Pike. Mr Dilip Vasantrao Shinde is also the general secretary of the Vasant Prakash Vikas Pratisthan.

In fact, in Sangli these three and Prakash Patil, who is seeking election to the Lok Sabha from the Sangli constituency, are known as the 'Gang of Four.' They created a major controversy in April-May this year when they organised a "Shatrughan Sinha Night" for the benefit of the Vasant Prakash Vikas Pratisthan. They could not, however, account for Rs four lakhs collected on this occasion. The controversy raged for quite a while before dying down, though privately it is still the talk of the town. Added to this is the fact that two months later all the four bought four identical Hindusthan Contessa cars.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

NAXALITES

In the Wilderness

Splintered groups attempt to solve differences

The Naxalite movement in the country which has had an aimless and splintered existence is now at the crossroads following the death of two of its pioneers in quick succession: Satya Narain Singh on 21 October 1984 and Chandra Pulla Reddy on 9 November 1984. Even though Reddy and S.N. Singh were leading different groups, they had a standing among all the extremists and could have played a crucial role in the unification move among the various groups. Of the pioneers of the movement in the country during the Sixties, only Nagbhushan Pattanayak and Kanu Sanyal are alive today but they stopped spitting fire long time back.

S. N. Singh died a sad man seeing his group—the Provincial Central Committee (PCC)—on the verge of yet another split. A group in the PCC led by Bhaskar Nandi had started labelling Stalin as "fascist" and maintained that Stalin decimated the Bolshevik party, got 2.5 million people butchered, and that he was 70 per cent incorrect and might have been 30 per cent correct. This basically anti-Marxian line first surfaced in the party during a PCC meeting held in Calcutta in May 1983. Though the thought did not receive much backing, the Nandi group stuck to its stand. The anti-Nandi group maintains that Nandi and Santosh Rana (a former MLA) get foreign money. Nandi was for some time married to an American who has returned to her country, and visited India recently, according to top party sources.

In a confidential letter dated 25 September 1983, the late S.N. Singh asked Nandi to drop his anti-Stalin tirades. The stand, Mr Singh said in the letter, "is obviously an attempt to tear away the party from its ideological moorings. After jettisoning Stalin and making Mao stand on his head on the question of Stalin, how much remains of our ideology?" Mr Singh also requested Nandi to produce a document on Stalin. The document was not presented but at later meetings the Nandi group tried to backtrack. The bitterness remained. Result: the reported split in the Provisional Central Committee in September 1984.

If the PCC today is broken, the condition of the other groups is no better. Most of them are trapped in the ideological quagmire. The most radical among the groups—the Central Reorganising Committee (CRC)—based in Kerala and led by K. Venu, adopted basic changes in its outlook early this year. K. Venu was in hiding for a long time after he was wanted in connection with the Kumbalangi murder case, but surrendered in April this year before the Kerala High Court in which he, a few years back, did not have any faith. This correspondent had met him while he was "in hiding" but he did not then show any signs of "giving up the struggle." After taking bail for the case he told the "bourgeois" newsmen that class war should go hand in hand with the struggle for the development of independent national aspirations. The present concept of national unity was only "a false unity." Their main enemies, he added, were not after all the landed class but imperialist forces.

Ashim Chatterjee — Sujit Ghosh

The union home ministry had in a document released early this year, said that there were 26 CPI(ML) groups in the country and that all groups except the Kondappalli Sitaramiah group, based in Andhra Pradesh, (known as the People's War Group) and the K.Venu group have dropped the annhilation theory. Venu's surrender and his changed outlook leaves only the Sitaramiah group in the "red list." Sitaramiah who was arrested recently in Hyderabad escaped dramatically from the hospital after shooting dead a sentry, allegedly with the help of a medical student.

Most of the other groups have faith in the elections. The PCC has fielded three candidates for the Lok Sabha elections—Bayas Tiwari in Jamshedpur, Bihar, Nityananda Murha in Jhargram, West Bengal and V.H. Master in Raichur, Andhra Pradesh more in the Olympic spirit of participating than winning. But once they manage to merge into the national political mainstream, how will they function?Will they be able to capture the imagination of the people from street-corner platforms rather than by taking arms for the underdog? This continues to be their dilemma.

Many Naxalite groups still function in the tribal belts and have managed to muster considerable support among the tribals in some areas of Maharashtra, Andhra Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh. In March this year, the police had to intervene to prevent a massive meeting organised by an extremist group, the Adivasi Ratuhuli Sangathana in Kamlapur in Maharashtra from taking place. In the forests of Bastar district in Madhya Pradesh—bigger than the state of Kerala—there are strong pockets of extremists working wholeheartedly for the spread of Marxism-Leninism. Most of the tribals go to them for redressal of their grievances and "immediate justice" is meted out.

The unity moves among the major groups of the CPI (M-L) had reached an advanced stage. On 19 August this year, S.N. Singh had stated that serious efforts were on to bring together the groups of Kanu Sanyal, Bolshevik Party of Kerala, the Kolla Venkataiah group C.P. Reddy and Ashim Chatterjee. The talks have been stalled after the death of Singh and Reddy but a senior leader of the PCC was optimistic about the unity, though he said it would take time. Nagabhushan Pattanayak now in his sick bed, was also striving for unity but had stated that the "ivory tower mentality" of some leaders was hampering the unity moves. Insiders feel that the stand of most of these groups against China's de-Maoification campaign could be a catalyst.

Among the new generation of Marxist-Leninist leaders only K. Venu and Ashim Chatterjee have the calibre and power to infuse new life into the dying movement. After many years in the wilderness (literally and metaphorically) the extremist leaders have realised that unity is the only factor that will ensure their continued existence. But as of now the "spring thunder" that once burst over India is a whimper.

Binoo K. John, Calcutta

WOMEN

Up in Arms

Feminists fight prejudice

The International Feminist Network (IFN) has given a solidarity call in support of the struggle in India against the Muslim personal law which discriminates against women. In December 1983, Shehnaz Sheikh, a young Sunni Muslim woman of Bombay had challenged the Constitutional validity of the Muslim personal law and in January 1984, the Supreme Court had issued a notice to the Union of India. Shehnaz's petition is being backed by the Women's Centre and Lawyer's Collective of Bombay and a nationwide signature campaign was launched in May to mobilise public opinion and support.

Shehnaz's petition in the Supreme Court has caught the attention of the world feminist movement. The IFN, whose campaigns are co-ordinated by the Geneva-based women's group, ISIS, has included Shehnaz's struggle in its latest list of campaigns round the world for which solidarity is being urged. Two other cases taken up by IFN will be of interest to Indian readers. One is the campaign by Pakistan's Women's Action Forum which is protesting against the new discriminatory laws passed by the Zia regime last August. The laws relate to compensation for murders and the value of a woman's evidence in court. The second is a call for letters of support for Shahila, a Sri Lankan house-maid in the United Arab Emirates, who has been sentenced to death by stoning for adultery with an Indian cook. At the time of the sentence she was pregnant and the execution is to be carried out after the birth of the baby or after she finishes breastfeeding.

IFN solidarity calls also relate to the slave trade in Thailand's houses of prostitution and repression of political activists in the Philippines, Chile and Peru. Included among its latest appeals are several of those sponsored recently by Amnesty International which had adopted Women Prisoners as its theme for the 1984 Prisoners of Conscience Week.

Vimal Balasubrahmanyan,
Secunderabad

PORTS

New Port Management Institute

Madras is the controversial location

The maiden training course for leading port executives in the country by the prestigious National Institute of Port Management (NIPM), Madras, concluded on 5 December ending the controversy over the location of the National Ports Institute between the Madras Port Trust and the Indian Institute of Port Management (IIPM), Calcutta.

The 13-day training course on 'management of container terminal operations' was organised within just two days of the formal inauguration of the institute, at the borrowed premises of the Madras Port Trust, on 22 November. The course was co-ordinated by the United Nations Commission on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) representative and the Shipping Adviser, Mr Bala K. Subramaniam under the "Trainmar" (Training of Maritime Managers) project of the UN agency.

"The institute does not really belong to one port or the other. The facilities are common for all the major ten ports and the other 130 or so minor ports officers," assured Mr P.M. Abraham, Additional Secretary, Ministry of Shipping and Transport at the valedictory function of the training programme. The IIPM, Calcutta had been staking a claim for the prestigious port management institute, arguing that it had the necessary infrastructure as well as proximity to the first container port in the country, Haldia. However, the Madras Port Trust claimed that because the port was located at a key point and had all the required facilities including an ultra-modern container handling facility set up at a total cost of Rs 40 crores in 1983, it should be given the priority in locating the port institute. The issue was finally clinched in favour, when the non-official UN study team on port training submitted its report at the beginning of this year. Interestingly, both the port cities were supported by UN bodies—the International Labour Organisation (ILO) supporting Calcutta's claim and the UNCTAD supporting Madras.

The union government has agreed to meet the entire capital cost of around Rs 6 crores for the institute. The recurring expenses estimated at between Rs. 50 lakhs and one crore is to be met by the respective user ports by pooling in their resources with the Indian Ports Association. The UNCTAD for its part has agreed to give away free of cost, equipment worth Rs 6 lakhs.

An estimated 2,600 executives are employed by all the ports in the country. Almost all of them would need to undergo some form of training or the other to keep up with the modernisation and sophistication of port techniques. The training facilities available in India are not comprehensive enough and every year at least 40 to 50 executives are sent abroad for lengthy periods involving huge expenditure. The NIPM is expected to solve such problems and save foreign exchange. The training courses which are being developed in the institute are based on the 'Trainmar' techniques being popularised by the United Nations Development Programme and UNCTAD. At present, work on seven courses covering various areas of port operations including port management information systems, materials management, equipment management techniques for engineering and non-engineering port officers is going on.

Trainmar activities had started in January 1980 in the form of a pilot project financed by the division for Global and Interregional projects of the UNDP and executed by the UNCTAD Secretariat. The Narottam Morarjee Institute, Bombay and the Management Training Centre at the Bombay Port Trust are signatories to this scheme. So far two 'Trainmar' projects, Trainmar 1 and II, have been completed and over 2,000 managers and supervisors have been given training.

'The NIPM's inauguration has come at the right time when the country is going ahead with ports modernisation, promotion of the containerisation concept and the inland container depots," says Mr. Bala K. Subramaniam, who has been the main driving force behind the scheme.

Movement of cargo through the major ten ports has gone up very rapidly in the last three years. It went up from 101 million tonnes in 1983 to 114 million tonnes in 1984. The target for 1985 is 130 million tonnes. Of this, hardly 25 million tonnes would be containerised. "When the worldover containerisation is the 'in thing' in India it has been late in coming," says Mr Subramaniam. However, some pragmatic changes have taken place in the list of priorities within the Shipping Ministry and 22 inland container depots (ICDs) are being set up. Work on the fully containerised modern Nhava Sheva port (to be ready by 1988) is going on and purchase of more container handling equipment for the four container ports, Madras, Bombay, Haldia and Cochin has been decided upon. "Once all this comes into full operation, the training needs will be acute and NIPM would be a great help then," adds Subramaniam. Once the Institutestarts functioning from its ownpremises—there is some problem of acquiring land for it—it will go ahead offering consultancy services to user ports and companies and contribute greatly to management research, particularly in the maritime sector.

T. Raman, Madras

THE INDIAN OCEAN

No Zone of Peace

The superpowers are maintaining strong forces

A US aircraft carrier enters the Indian Ocean

The debate on making the Indian Ocean a "zone of peace" has been continuing since 1970, but the chances of a successful demilitarisation appear to be remote. The issue, first brought up at the 1970 Non aligned conference at Lusaka, is being ignored by the superpowers. It is now doubtful whether the thrice-postponed UN conference on the Indian Ocean will be held in Colombo in 1985.

Apart from superpower indifference, the UN has also been dragging its feet on the issue. Only 14 years ago the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution proposed by Sri Lanka and supported by 11 other littoral countries demanding that the Indian Ocean "should be a zone of peace." That resolution, as well as other similar and commendable exercises, seems to have been forgotten.

Recent developments in the Indian Ocean area have not strengthened the cause of peace and international understanding. Instead, the region has become a victim of the nuclear arms race between the superpowers. Most of the coastal and hinterland Indian Ocean states view the military build-up at Diego Garcia as a dangerous development. Diego Garcia, a US naval complex about 1,100 miles south-west of Cape Comorin, poses a major challenge to the peace and security in the whole region.

Diego Garcia apart, the USA has followed a policy of girdling the entire ocean with a network of multi-purpose bases, staging-posts and rapid deployment centres capable of serving its strategic interests in the region. For the United States, the Indian Ocean bases are "strongholds" to check what Washington calls "Soviet expansionism."

The Soviet Union also maintains a strong presence in the area. The Russians have their own interests, both political and economic as well as their global aspirations to fulfil. They are as concerned about the strategic balance of power in this area as the Americans. It is difficult to dispute that the Russians, since Czarist times, have been keen on "opening up for themselves warm water ports in the Mediterranean and in the Indian Ocean." The Soviet flag-waving exercises first began in 1968 and Soviet warships regularly patrol the Indian Ocean. Despite not being as strong enough as the U.S. Seventh Fleet, it is an effective presence.

The naval build-up in the Indian Ocean has placed the super power rivalry at India's doorstep. According to some experts, India's efforts to keep the superpowers away from the Indian Ocean are not solely because of its efforts to maintain peace in the area. These experts believe that India is interested in becoming the dominant power in the region after the superpowers leave. Other experts claim that India's interest in making the ocean a zone of peace is in the interest of the Indo-Soviet friendship ties

However, it has to be remembered that the realisation of the "peace zone" concepts depends on a unanimity of interests. But not all Indian Ocean countries share a similar approach to the issue, and each country appears to have a different and unyielding view. Some countries look upon the Seventh Fleet as a bulwark against their potential enemies, while others feel that the Soviet Navy is a friend.

However, unless the all-powerful superpowers are persuaded to make the Indian Ocean a zone of peace, there is little the UN or the countries can do. At present, neither the superpowers are prepared to move from the Indian Ocean and if the USA is convinced that the Indian Ocean has "become the area with the potential to produce major shifts in the global power balance," it will make its presence stronger and more permanent. To maintain the balance of terror the Soviet Union will do the same and peace will be lost in the Indian Ocean for ever.

Bhola Chatterjee, Calcutta

St. Xavier's School and College (Calcutta) announces the inauguration of the 125 year celebrations at 30, Park Street, Calcutta-16, on January 16th 1985, by His Excellency, the President of India. School and College alumni who wish to participate may kindly write to us. The inaugural celebrations will cover four days.

On this occasion funds are being collected for (A) Endowments/Scholarships for meritorious/needy students (B) A new computer centre (C) Extension of our free medical clinic run by volunteer Xaverian doctors (D) Renovation of the Auditorium and (E) Life membership (US$100).

Endowments/Donations carry the Benefit of Section 80G of The Indian Income Tax Act. Cheques may be sent in favour of "Alumnorum Societas A/C. 125 year fund account number 5836" at the Hong Kong Bank, 31, B.B.D. Bagh, Calcutta-700 001, under advice to Tuhin Das, Hony, Secretary, St. Xavier's O.B.A. Calcutta, C/o. J. Thomas & Co., Nilhat House, 11, R.N. Mukherjee Road, Calcutta-700 001, India.

Nihil Ultra.

Headache?

The one solution
ANACIN

Trust its extra pain relieving power.

Anacin contains more of the pain reliever doctors the world over recommend.

Effective for the aches and pains of colds and flu, headache, toothache, backache and muscular pain.

Trust only Anacin.

Now in a protective foil pack.

India's No. 1. pain reliever.

GM-2-R-84

* Licensed user of T.M : Geoffrey Manners & Co. Ltd.

A Refuge from Toil and Care

Various theories on sleep emerge

A man takes a nap: 'closing down for a while'

There are two kinds of sleep. Much of the night, you are in deep sleep: the brain is unresponsive, and long slow waves of electricity pulse through it, instead of the frantic scramble of signals found during wakefulness. But, from time to time, and especially towards morning, you switch to shallow sleep: the brain is active, the heart beats quickly and the eyes flicker about under their lids. People woken during such rapid-eye-movement (REM) sleep report they have been dreaming.

There is general agreement that the two kinds of sleep serve different functions. If you deprive people of deep sleep, they become tired. If you deprive them of REM sleep, they do not feel sleepy but they gradually become neurotic. They will then indulge in extra REM sleep, which suggests that they need it as much as they need deep sleep. But why do they need either? Theories of sleep can be roughly divided into two classes. One says that sleep is a vital restorative for body and brain; the other that it spares animals the dangers of being up and about too much.

Most people assume that the body carries out physiological repair work during sleep. Yet it was not until the late Seventies that the first coherent theory of sleep's restorative powers was proposed. Professor Ian Oswald and his colleagues at Edinburgh university suggested that only during sleep can the body make proteins. Proteins, of which body tissue is made, consist of chains of amino acids. Prof. Oswald's group theorised that during the day the body builds up amino acids produced by the digestion of food. Only during sleep does the body have time to synthesise proteins from them.

This theory was wrecked by a single experiment. Dr Peter Garlick and his colleagues at London university plotted the progress of amino acids through the body. They found that amino acids do not accumulate during the day ready for protein synthesis at night; they are either broken down straight away or quickly converted to protein.

A more promising repair theory is that sleep restores the brain rather than the body. Your body can rest while you are wide awake, but the brain seems to be on call most of the time. Sleep deprivation appears to have little effect on bodily function, but strong effects on behaviour. People not only feel sleepy; they also become irritable and even paranoid or hallucinatory. The brain seems to shut down at night. Normally, a brief flash of light produces a change in the brain's electrical activity. These "evoked potentials" are not found in sleeping brains. It is not that messages from the eyes do not reach the brain, but that the brain does not respond. Dr Margaret Livingstone and Professor David Hubel of Harvard Medical School have shown that in cats the surface layers of the brain, where sensory information is first processed, are still active in sleep. But the messages never get through to the deep layers, where the high-level perceptual processing goes on.

It is this unresponsiveness that the second class of sleep theories focuses on. Professor Bernie Webb of the university of Florida and Dr Ray Meddis of Britain's Loughborough university theorise that sleep has no important physiological function. Instead, they suggest, sleep's purpose is simply to ensure that an animal is out of harm's way. Better that creatures like man, whose most important sense is sight, should tuck themselves away in a cosy cave for the night rather than blunder around in the dark. Dr Meddis points to the wide variations in sleeping times. Giraffes need only two hours of sleep, sloths 20. He also asks why; if sleep deprivation is so debilitating, a person who goes ten days without sleep needs only ten or 12 hours of extra sleep to make it up.

There are problems with the idea that sleep is just a way of closing down an animal for a while. Some animals go to surprising lengths to get sleep. Dr Jim Horne of Loughborough university points out that dolphins dare not sleep long because they would risk drowning. By the Meddis argument, they should not sleep at all. Instead, they have developed extraordinary ways of getting their sleep. Indus river dolphins catnap, for less than 90 seconds at a time, throughout the day. A bottlenose dolphin allows only half its brain to sleep at a time.

One of sleep's most mysterious elements gives rise to another theory: that you sleep in order to dream. Dreaming is a puzzle in itself. Some believe it has purely neurophysiological functions. One idea is that dreams cleanse the brain's information-processing apparatus of error-causing impressions recorded in waking hours—vaguely analogous to sophisticated computer software debugging itself. Others believe that dreams have psychological purposes: Dr Nick Humphrey of Cambridge university has suggested that they are used to explore and test imagined futures. Both of these theories claim support from the fact that new-born babies spend most of their sleeping hours in REM sleep, while adults dream for less than two hours a night. But nobody has begun to explain why the brain has to be asleep to perform such functions.

By arrangement with* The Economist

Wise Infants

Babies are much more intelligent than what we consider them to be. Research at Exeter university, England, shows that babies are born with the ability to differentiate between simple shapes, can recognise and remember objects in 3-D and even distinguish colours. According to Dr Alan Slater of the department of psychology, the aim of the research is "to explore in detail the extent to which the newborn baby can make sense of what he sees. The technique is known as habituation and is dependent on the baby remembering what he or she sees." In most tests—each test takes about five to ten minutes—astatic or changing visual pattern is shown to the baby until it no longer attracts his attention. At this point it is replaced by different patterns, one of which is similar in some respects to the one that he had previously seen. If the baby looks more at the new pattern it indicates that he can not only distinguish between the two but also remember some of its features.

More Clues to Leprosy Control

A research work going on in England could lead to clues to the control of leprosy in the Third World. The £23,805-research is being carried out by Dr Keith Manchester of Bradford university and could reinforce his theory that there is a direct link between the decline of leprosy in Britain from the 13th century and the subsequent growth in the incidence of tuberculosis. It should be noted here that the bacterium which causes leprosy is closely related to that which causes TB. Dr Manchester is analysing the disease history of leprosy by means of examining the skeletal changes of leprosy sufferers in Britain from the Roman period to the Middle Ages. Over 10,000 skeletons will be examined. A recent report issued by the World Health Organisation suggests that as many as 15-20 million people suffer from the disease in India, Pakistan, the Far East, Africa and some Mediterranean countries, and that the disease could be on the increase.

The Life-saver

In Scotland, an industrial wrapping material has turned out to be a life-saver. Doctors at the intensive care unit of the Queen Mother's Hospital, Glasgow, found that plastic bubble film, which is normally used to protect fragile goods, acts like a very light duvet, or continental quilt, and keeps premature babies warm and protected from draughts. Dr Tom Turner, consultant paediatrician, says: "It is warm, light and cheap and because it is transparent we can see what is happening to the baby. We used to tear the wrapping from parcels, wash it carefully and use it in the intensive care cots."Now it is manufactured in a sterile condition specially for the job.

Guinea Pigs: Rich in Proteins

Guinea pigs are a valuable protein source. In Peru alone, 70 million guinea pigs are eaten in a year. Such pocket-sized pigs, deer, tropical rats and miniature ruminants could provide an increasing protein for millions of people in the Third World. They are so much in demand that even in highrise apartments in Lima residents keep them in cardboard boxes under their beds. Two male and 20 female guinea pigs could feed a family of six with an adequate year-round diet of meat.

As Good as Concrete

If you combine cement and a synthetic material called polypropylene, you get a material which is as good as reinforced concrete. Moreover, it is lighter and also has insulating properties. It is thought that the researchers of Ulster's Polytechnic, Northern Ireland, who discovered polypropylene, may have also discovered the material for the cheap manufacture of pipes in developing countries. The material was used on some roads as an experiment and it was found that the road surface had withstood the pressure of heavy lorries.

A Mad March Hare?

It was May in wonderland, so Alice figured there would be no harm in visiting the mad March hare. Said she, "It won't be raving mad—at least not so mad as it was in March." Wait, say two British researchers Anthony Holley and Paul Greenwood. With apologies to Lewis Carroll they reported in Nature that the idea that hares are madder in March is nonsense. While studying brown hares in the fields southwest of Bristol, they found that although the animals do "go mad" in March, they do their frenzied chasing and pumelling with their forelegs through the January-to-August mating season. The scientists inferred that the battles are not fought between males competing for female favours, but by females fending off unwanted suitors.

Computer Project for Doctors

Hundreds of doctors are taking part in a project under way in London in which computers are being used to speed up diagnoses and the effects of prescribed drugs. Known as Sentinel, the project was devised by Prof. Paul Grob of the epidemiology and health cure unit at Surrey university in England. Dr Grob has recruited some 400 doctors in the southwest Thames health region of London and the neighbouring area into a network connected by micro-computers. A further stage has been achieved by means of the Harley Chip, where medical findings can be stored.

Illustrations: Prabir Sen

Malayalam actress Seema, now trying for a comeback into films egged on by her husband and director I.V. Sasi, has done the 'Dharmendra act' of beating up a film journalist. She did so on the sets of Manyamahajanagalee being shot in Cannanore, North Kerala. Those who witnessed the drama include Prem Nazir, whose slow reflexes could not prevent the incident from happening. According to Seema, the freelance journalist Mohan Akkipalli, had tried to blackmail and threaten her mother. And Seema was for sometime on the lookout for him when he walked into the room in which the filmstars were relaxing. Seema cornered and slapped him till her fury abated. Mohan said that he did not retaliate because the attacker happened to be a lady and that he felt humiliated because it happened in front of Prem Nazir. The ferocity and agility with which Seema vent her fury might land her a few roles of the 'bad girl' type.

Seema: tit for tat

Many producers in the south have been trying to rope in Sridevi's younger sister Srilatha, who has got something of her elder sister's baby-faced "innocence." But Sridevi is opposed to it and is planning to get her sister married early next year. Sridevi surely knows the disadvantages of having an 'innocent' baby-face, yet having to play not-so-innocent roles.

The numero uno of Malayalam films Mammuty, recently requested a script-writer to let him die on the screen, instead of the heroine. "Too late," said the writer who promised to 'kill him' in his next movie. But his fans are not letting him die so soon.

Jeetendra: at the top

Prabhat Kumar

Though Amitabh Bachchan's political aspirations have plunged the industry into gloom, it has sent the fortunes of Jeetendra sky-rocketing. Bombay producers who had 'given him' up to South Indian producers are now running after him. His new position at the top has made him dizzy. "I don't know how I will be able to do justice to the faith they have put in me. Frankly, I am no great actor. I am confused," said Jeetendra.

Rohini Hattangady: ecstatic

Durgaprasad

The real test of Jeetendra's acting ability about which he also has expressed doubts will come in the film he is doing with Dilip Kumar. Says Jeetendra, "It was very terrifying to face the thespian who has mesmerised people for three generations but he put me at complete ease. I am dying to see the results." The producers had a lot of difficulty finding the right type of actress to match Dilip Kumar's personality. They thought of Rekha who had been teamed with him in Aag ka darya, then Sharmila Tagore and Waheeda Rehman, but dropped all three. They finally chose Rohini Hattangady, catapulting her to the front-line. Rohini is now dripping ecstasy, "Now I feel I have really arrived as an actress. Isn't it every actress's dream to work with that great actor?" But little does she know that it could also turn into a nightmare if she slips.

VARIETY

THIS INDIA

Illustration: Debasish Deb

MADRAS: Three policemen, who felt that four jail birds in hand were worth two in a bus have been placed under suspension. The three cops, attached to the Armed Reserve, were escorting six remand prisoners to the Central Jail from the metropolitan magistrate court, Egmore. But two of them gave the slip and boarded a fast-moving bus. The policemen decided to hold on to the remaining four. Now, other policemen are in search of the missing two—Indian Express (N. Chakraborty, Calcutta)

MACHILIPATNAM: Heard of the herbivorous cow turning carnivorous? This historic town can boast of such "non-vegetarian cows" roaming about in the local fish market and snatching away fish and meat. Another peculiar feature is that these cows refuse to eat grass or bran water. Unless they are fed with fish and other items, they refuse to yield milk. They don't even allow their owners to approach them for milking—Indian Express (V.R.N.Naidu, Hyderabad)

NEW DELHI: The elections have caused an acute shortage of coins. The lighter rupee coin has made supporters of various parties a nervous lot because they have to arrange for quite a lot of these to weigh their favourite leaders. Still, many leaders are being weighed against coins, a popular ritual during electioneering. Mr Madan Lal Khurana, the BJP nominee from the Sadar parliamentary constituency, was taken by surprise when residents of Madan Park handed him currency notes of about Rs 10,600. Mr Khurana was, however, weighed with ordinary cast-iron weights and 2,500 one-rupee coins—Indian Express(A.V.Ramamurthy, New Delhi)

ITANAGAR: The highly prized mithuns, a semi-domesticated species resembling bulls, are being slaughtered in droves in Arunachal Pradesh as part of the poll campaign by candidates to provide feats to woo the electorate. The animals are not only held for sacrifice during religious festivals, but their possession determines status. An affluent candidate has already killed 200 of the beasts for holding community feasts in his constituency. Mithuns cost about Rs 4,000 each—The Hindu(C.S.N.Murthy, Bangalore)

CHIKMAGALUR: After fake currency notes and certificates, tricksters appear to have turned to the fourth estate to come out with a fake newspaper. According to a complaint lodged by Mr H. V. Ramappa, the editor of a Kannada fortnightly, Kadur Patrike, published from Kadur town near here, the latest issue of his newspaper was a fake. He said it was scheduled to be published on 9 December but was surprised to find the fortnightly already in the readers' hands—Deccan Herald (R. M. Pillai, Chikmagalur)

THANJAVUR: With the airstrip in this town blocked by the overflowing bumper kuruvai crop of paddy, the authorities recently chopped down scores of fully grown trees and demolished a compound wall between a women's college campus and a government office here to prepare a helipad, on account of the proposed visit to the area by the Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi. Over 20 tamarind and mango trees which were about 40 years old were cut down during the past two days on the Thanjavur Women's Art College campus in record time. About 100 metres of the compound wall separating the college campus and the revenue divisional office were also demolished—The Hindu (S. Murali Krishnan, Tanjore)

GUWAHATI: Believe it or not, in a government school in Nagaon town a student who later became a teacher retired from service even before his teacher did. In fact, the teacher under question who later became the headmistress of the school will retire only in 1989. As per records of her age she must have passed her matriculation at the age of eight and this position seems to have been accepted by the education department —The Assam Tribune (Gauri Prasad Sarma Bezbarah, Guwahati)

WITHOUT COMMENT

I stopped flogging them (the opposition). Once they are dead, it is no use flogging them—Rajiv Gandhi

The only experience he (Rajiv Gandhi) has is of flying and he is indulging in kite-flying in politics—Morarji Desai, quoted in The Telegraph

There is nothing like genuine non-alignment. Truth is truth, there is no genuine or non-genuine truth—H.N. Bahuguna in Blitz

The Arun Singhs and the Arun Nehrus do not know the difference between Mahatma Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru, or, for that matter, between socialism and capitalism—Jay Dubashi in Organiser

Some people say we are pro-West and some people say we are pro-East. Somebody may say you are Left, some say you are Right. Basically, we are pro-Indian—Arun Nehru in Link

I am what I am. Kindly don't compare me with Indira Gandhi—Ramakrishna Hegde, Karnataka CM, when newsmen asked him whether he was the Indira Gandhi of Karnataka, quoted in The Hindu

The presidential system is no substitute for national character. It does not offer any alternative to vision, knowledge and moral standards in political life—Nani Palkhivala, eminent constitutional lawyer, in Gentleman

If the world felt especially close to Bhopal...it may be because the world is Bhopal, a place where the occupational hazard is modern life—Roger Rosenblatt in Time

BEGINNING 30 DECEMBER 1984 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) A week of mixed fortunes. If you are in love, avoid arguments with your beloved minor tiffs may lead to an estranged relationship. On the financial front, you will incur heavy losses. Businessmen should check documents meticulously before signing them. Avoid speculative ventures and gambling. However, a friendship which will blossom this week will be of immense help to you

Good dates: 30, 31 and 1
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: South-west

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) This is an extremely lucky week for businessmen and professionals Artists and sportsmen too, will gain rare recognition during this phase Lovers will also find this period favourable this is the right time to execute marriage plans On the domestic front, your children will do extremely well in their examinations However, your economic prospects look bleak this week avoid extravagance

Good dates: 2, 3 and 4
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 3
Favourable direction: North

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) A week of hectic social activity lies ahead of you An unexpected visitor is likely to visit you during the weekend. Professionals and businessmen will make steady headway. At home, an elderly member of your family may fall ill Financially, this is not a bright period avoid gambling. Those above the age of 40 should keep a sharp eye on their health avoid spicy food

Good dates: 1, 2 and 3
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (15 July—14 August) The stars foretell a lucky week for all of you For those in business, this is the right time to go ahead with new deals and contracts. Professionals, a promotion is in the offing: some of you may even be posted to a place of your liking On the financial front, you may gain money through unexpected sources. The domestic front will remain peaceful. This is also a good time for love and marriage.

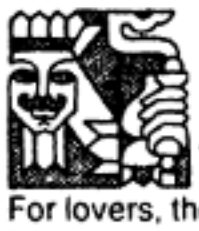
Good dates; 2, 4 and 5
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: North-west

LEO (15 August—14 September) The prospects of businessmen and professionals look bright this week: new opportunities will come their way Lovers, this is the opportune time to get married For those of you who are still single, a member of the opposite sex will be very helpful to you On the financial front, you may incur losses if you gamble or indulge in speculative ventures The home front will be demanding

Good dates: 30, 1 and 3
Lucky numbers: 6, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: West

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) Students are advised to be more serious about their studies Professionals, especially those in government service, should be careful while dealing with their superiors. However, this is a good period for businessmen Lovers too will find their parents extremely compromising. You will be able to overcome most of your emotional problems this week Your health will also improve

Good dates: 31, 2 and 4
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: South



LIBRA (15 October—14 November) This is a week of mixed fortunes However, on the professional front, be prepared for setbacks. Some of you may come in for severe criticism from your employers if you do not devote yourself to your work Businessmen should be wary of deception However, this is a good week for love and marriage negotiations This is also a favourable phase for students

Good dates: 2, 3 and 4
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) Success in all your ventures is a certainty for most of you this week Push your efforts to the utmost and do not waste time on socialising Businessmen will get opportunities to expand their business while a promotion is in store for professionals. On the economic front, you may gain money through an unexpected source Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans

Good dates: 31, 1 and 5
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: South-east

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) This is a good week for businessmen do not squander away opportunities that come your way. For lovers, the period is equally favourable. However prospects look bleak for professionals. be diplomatic while dealing with your colleagues Financially, you are in for a bad phase you will have to borrow money to tide over this period The health of your children will add to your worries.

Good dates: 30, 3 and 5
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: South-west

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) This week servicemen may come in for severe criticism from their employers: exercise restraint in dealing with such a situation. Try and avoid legal problems during this phase. But doctors and politicians will find this period favourable. At home, your children will do well in their examinations. Some of you may inherit property but do not be extravagant Keep a sharp eye on your health.

Good dates: 1, 4 and 5
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 6
Favourable direction: North-west

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) For those in love and intending to get married, this is the right time to do so. Those connected with the arts are likely to find the phase favourable. On the domestic front your children will come out with flying colours in competitions. On the professional front you may face opposition from your colleagues A close friend is likely to let you down. Your health too will worry you.

Good dates: 30, 1 and 5
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 5
Favourable direction: East

PISCES (15 March—14 April) If you are unemployed, there are chances that you will find a job this week. Those employed will get better opportunities. Businessmen, however, should be wary of deception. Lovers should refrain from taking hasty decisions. At home, your children will be demanding, but deal with them tactfully. The health of an elderly member of your family will cause concern. A letter will bring good tidings.

Good dates: 2, 4 and 5
Lucky numbers: 4, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: West

For those born on the 1st, 2nd or 3rd of any month:

Most of you are born leaders. You will do well if you join politics or take up the legal profession. You have a charming personality and your power of oratory is remarkable. Your benevolent nature will make you popular. Most of you are extravagant but a word of advice: do not squander away money. Females born during this period are extremely good-looking which at times will make you proud. Most women born during the period are emotional by nature.

BANGALAKSHMI MONTHLY LOTTERY

ಬಂಗಲಕ್ಷ್ಮಿ ബംഗലക്ഷ്മി
बंगलक्ष्मी বঙ্গলক্ষ্মী
வங்கலக்ஷ்மி బంగలక్ష్మి
ବଙ্গলକ୍ଷ୍ମୀ ਬੰਗਾਲਖਸ਼ਮੀ
بنگا لکشمی

BANGALAKSHMI

First Prize — (1) Rs. 5,00,000/-

2nd Prize — (5) Rs. 50,000/- each
One in each series

3rd Prize — (60) Rs. 10,000/- each
One in every 50,000 tickets in each series

4th Prize — (30) Rs. 1,000/- each
One in every 1,00,000 tickets in each series

5th Prize — (300) Rs. 500/- each
One in every 10,000 tickets

6th Prize — (3,000) Rs. 50/- each
One in every 1,000 tickets

7th Prize — (3,000) Rs. 20/- each
One in every 1,000 tickets

8th Prize — (30,000) Rs. 10/- each
One in every 100 tickets

Attractive Commission and many other Prizes (Bonus) for Agents & Sellers.

DRAW EVERY 2ND FRIDAY

TICKET Rs. 2/-

For Further Details Please Contact

WEST BENGAL STATE LOTTERY

69, Ganesh Chandra Avenue, Calcutta- 700013

Paradise

OUR AUTHORISED STOCKISTS :- (1) Agrani Enterprises, 4/1, Bhabanath Sen Street, Calcutta-4, (2) A. Karmakar, 10, Armenian Street, Calcutta-1, (3) Dhar Agency, 27, Mahatma Gandhi Road, Calcutta-9, (4) P K.Pal, 13/3, Dr. Debendra Mukherjee Row, Calcutta-9, (5) Maa Tara Distributors, Bidhan Market, Siliguri, (6) Nirala, N. S. B. Road, P.O. Ranigunge, Dist: Burdwan, (7) S. Kundu, 128, Kerani Bazar, Bankura.

Agents/Sellers may contact any of these Stockists for tickets.* 1st. draw on 11.1.85

VARIETY

CHESS

White: Speelman. Black: Kudrin. Queen's Indian Defence. Hastings 1984.

1 N–KB3 P–QB4 2 P–QB4 N–KB3
3 N–QB3 P–QN3 4 P–K3 P–K3
5 P–Q4 PxP 6 PxP B–N2
7 B–N5 B–K2 8 B–Q3 O–O
9 P–KR4!?

An adventurous idea in a classical Queen's Indian position. Regardless of its objective merit, it certainly poses Black "uncomfortable problems at a moment when he is least likely to expect them.

9 . . . N–K1

Understandably nervous of 9 . . . P–Q4 (normal) 10 BxN BxB 11 BxP+ KxB 12 N–N5+, though it is unclear how White will continue after 12 . . . K–R3.

10 P–Q5! N–R3 11 Q–K2 P–KR3

An ugly move, but maybe not so bad.

12 R–Q1 N–B4 13 B–N1 PxB

Much criticised, but unfairly so. Black must take some action before his knight is evicted by P–QN4.

14 PxP DIAGRAM

A fascinating position. How does Black fend off the threats on the KR file? 14 . . . P–N3 fails cutely to 15 Q–K5 N–N2 16 Q–R2! etc, but he has other options.

14 . . . BxNP?

The wrong one. His chance lay in 14 . . . P–B4! leading to massive complications

Kudrin (Black) to move

Speelman (White)

after 15 N–K5 BxNP 16 PxP R–B3 (not 16 . . . NxP 17 RxQP) 17 PxP N–B2 (17 . . . N–Q3 18 RxN! RxR 19 R–R8+!) which I would prefer not to evaluate

15 B–R7+ K–R1 16 NxB QxN
17 B–B2+ K–N1

Black trusts that there is no more than perpetual check but his hopes are ill founded. White only has to drive the black queen off the QB1–KR6 diagonal to force mate thus.

18 R–R5! Q–B5 19 P–KN3 Q–B3
20 B–R7+ K–R1 21 B–N6+! Resigns.

It is mate in 3 after 21 . . . K–N1 22 R–R8+!

This year's Hastings Premier saw some splendid performances by the home players, in particular that of Andrew Martin, who completed his qualifications for the international master title with disarming ease. Even in the absence of the Soviet Russians, who preferred not to compete in the presence of the ex-Soviet Russians (Alburt, Kudrin, Ivanov and Gurevich), the tournament was amply strong, as can be evidenced by the fact that the bottom four places were all finally occupied by grandmasters who featured very prominently in the last Interzonal tournaments.

From the many fine games played it is difficult to select just one, but the following, which was awarded the brilliancy prize, shows Speelman at his most belligerent. Without knowing the names of the players one could easily attribute such a game to Alekhine.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE

Somehow one can always be caught by those hands where a suit has to be played in an unusual way. This one deceived a strong player:

Dealer South Love all

	♠ 7 4 2 ♥ Q J 10 8 ♦ K J 6 5 ♣ Q 10
♠ 8 3 ♥ A 9 6 2 ♦ A 10 9 8 ♣ 7 5 4	N W E S	♠ A Q 10 9 5 ♥ K 7 4 ♦ 4 2 ♣ 8 6 3
	♠ K J 6 ♥ 5 3 ♦ Q 7 3 ♣ A K J 9 2

South played in 3NT after East had overcalled in spades. West's lead of the 8 of spades ran to the jack and at trick two South led a low diamond. West played a slightly deceptive 9, the jack won, and a diamond was returned. Judging the situation well, West did not play the expected spade but established a second trick in diamonds, which gave the defence two diamonds, two hearts and a spade.

It is a little odd that the queen of diamonds from hand at trick two is safe against any defence.

Hugh Kelsey's latest is called Test Your Match Play (Gollancz, £3.50). It is billed as a continuous match, but this is just by-play.

West	East
♠ A 6	♠ Q J 5 2
♥ A K 9 8 7 5 2	♥ J 4
♦ 7	♦ 8 6 5 3
♣ Q 9 5	♣ K 10 3

West plays in Four Hearts and North begins, in effect, with two top diamonds. Trumps break 2-2. What next? To make sure you have a chance for both finesses, you must run the 9 of clubs. If you lead the queen first it may be allowed to hold, and your chances are reduced.

A new book that I have written in partnership with Roger Trézel, The Mistakes You Make At Bridge, (Gollancz £7.95, £4.95 paperback), is divided, like Gaul, into three parts: The Worst Mistakes, The Commonest Mistakes, and Mistakes That May Be Forgiven.

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. What do Gregory, Pius, Leo, Benedict and John Paul have in common?

2 The Punic Wars were fought between which two great powers between 264 B C and 146 B C.?

3 What is the title given to someone who has learnt the Koran by heart?

4. The Nutcracker Suite, Swan Lake and The Sleeping Beauty are ballets written by which well-known composer?

5. What was the religion of the Celtic peoples of Britain and Gaul (ancient France)?

6. The Asiatic Lion is found in only one wildlife sanctuary in India. Which one?

7 The Bessemer Process is used in the manufacture of which industrial product?

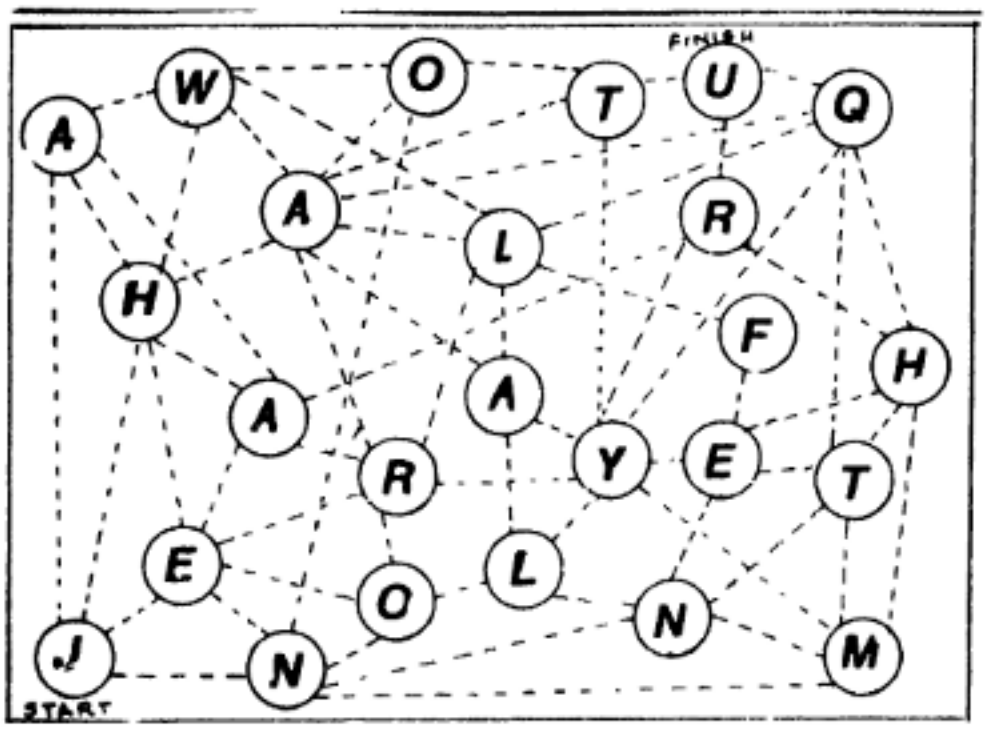
8. What is the study of plant and animal tissues called?

9 What is the warm and dust-laden southerly wind which originates in the Sahara Desert and blows across Southern Europe called?

10. Name the infectious disease known as "jail fever" which is carried from one person to another by lice.

11. The treaties of Purandhar in 1776 and Salbai in 1782 ended which wars?

12. What is ambergris?



ANSWERS

1. They are all names of Popes.
2. Rome and Carthage
3. A Hafiz
4. Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky
5. Druidism.
6. The Gir forest in Gujarat.
7. The production of steel
8. Histology
9. The Sirocco
10. Typhus
11. Wars between the Marathas and the British
12. A waxy substance produced in the intestines of the sperm whale. It is widely used in the manufacture of perfumes.

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Personality Plus

The name of a famous person can be spelt out in the maze above by proceeding from the start and moving on to any adjacent letters without backtracking. The clues given below may help:

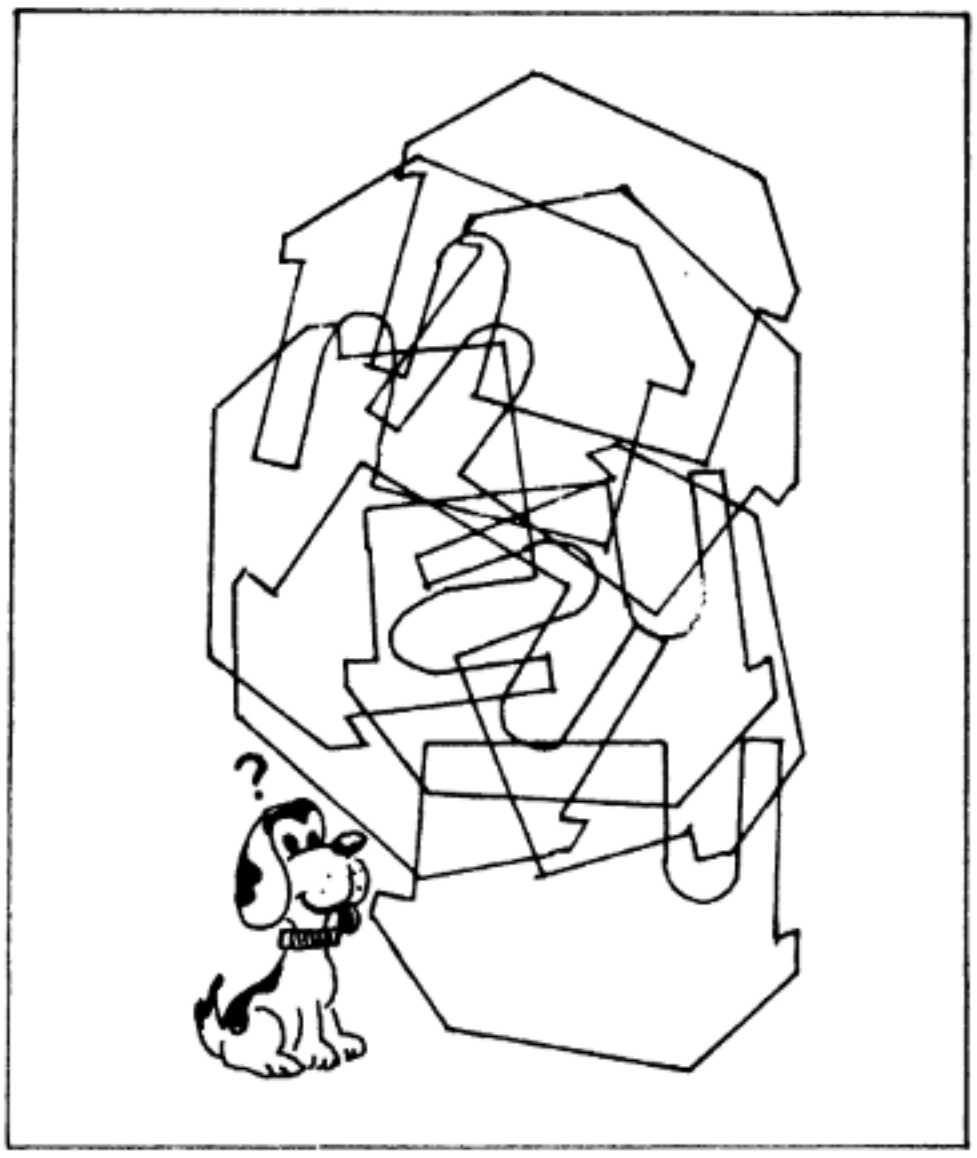
1. The colour of his favourite flower is a part of his name.
2. Two women very closely related to him were as well-known, internationally, as him.
3. A university has been named after him.
4. He died in 1964.
5. He was a freedom fighter for India and a close associate of Gandhiji.

Give yourself points according to the chart:

Without any clue (within a minute)	30
Without any clue (longer than a minute)	26—29
With first clue	21—25
With second clue	16—20
With third clue	11—15
With fourth clue	6—10
With fifth clue	1—5

Blankagrams

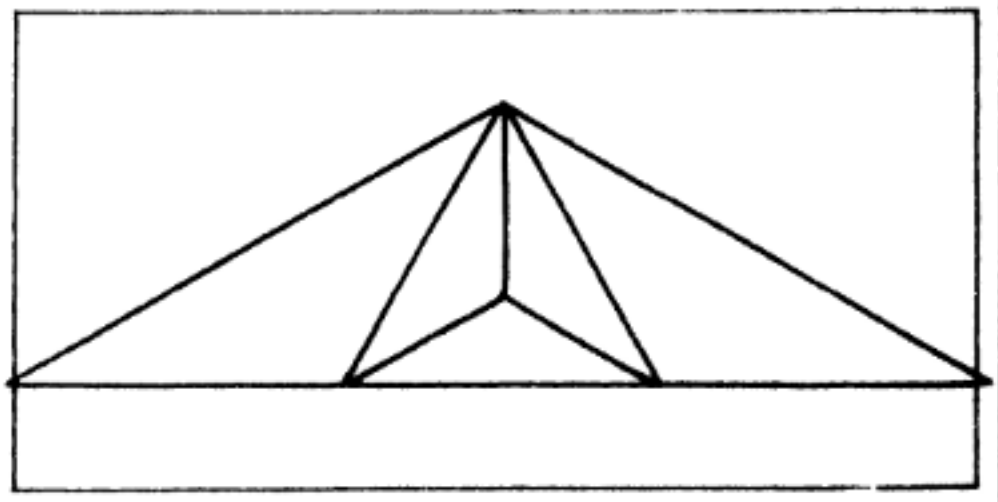
Limber up your vocabulary! Find a single word which is a synonym for both the words against each number. One word has been done for you.



1. CLOTH BIRD DUCK
2. BEAK NOTE —
3. SKIN CONCEAL —
4. DRAMA SPORT —
5. FARMER POTHOLDERS —
6. INSECT FISHHOOK —
7. HILL HORSE —
8. MARK ARACHNID —
9. UNTIL CULTIVATE —
10. BOW DRAW —

Quizzbizz

Which of the following applies to light?

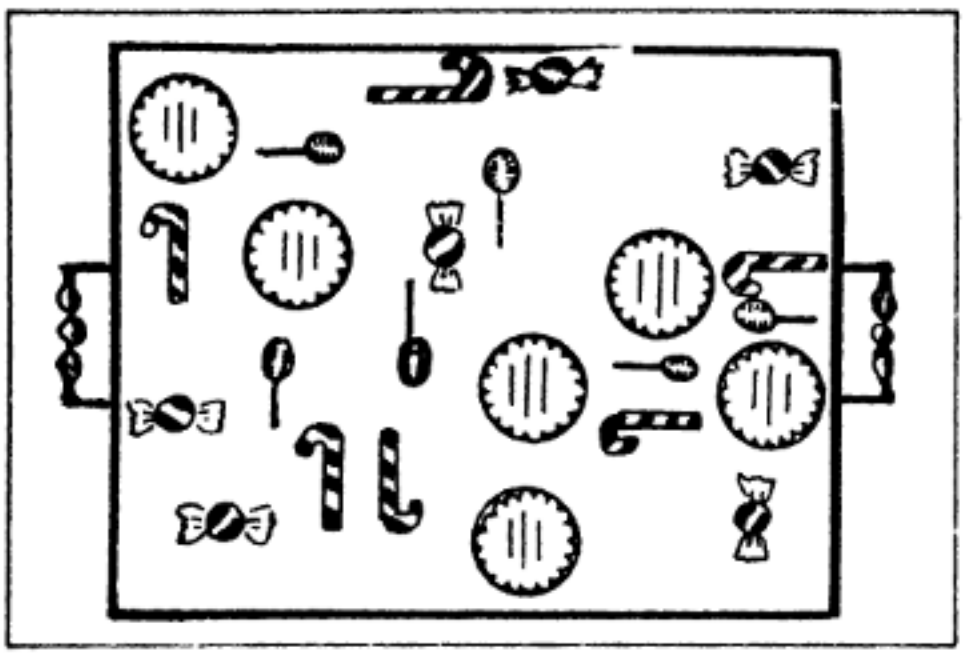


a) It always travels in straight lines.
b) It cannot travel through solids.
c) It can travel in vacuum
d) It can travel at infinite speed.

Quickthink

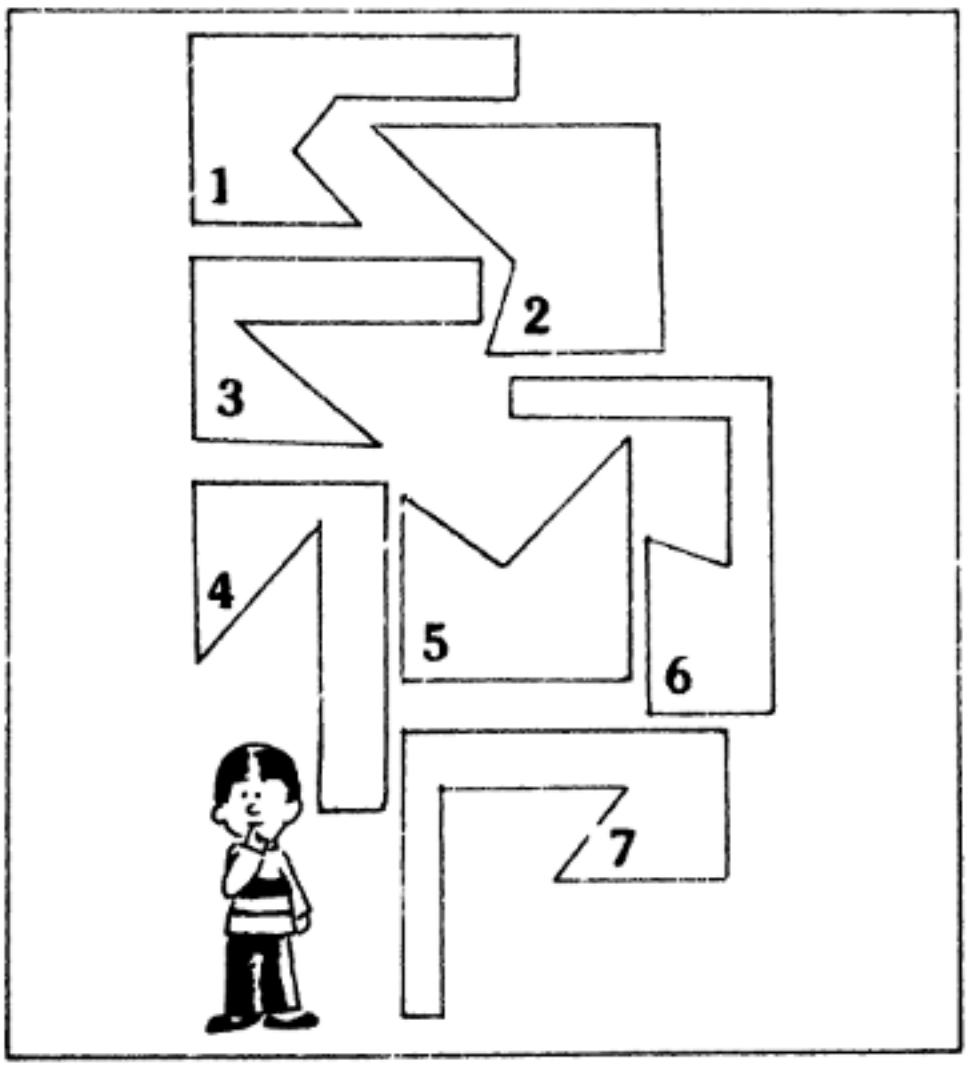
How long does it take you to count the number of kennels for this dog?

Shape Sleuth



In this illustration, the large triangle is made up of five smaller triangles each one of which is similar to the large triangle (i.e. all the triangles have angles of the same size). Can you find another triangle which can be made up of five smaller triangles, each one similar to it?

What's in a Word



There exists in English language a common, everyday, five-letter word, the pronunciation of which is not changed by removing four of the five letters. Which word is it?

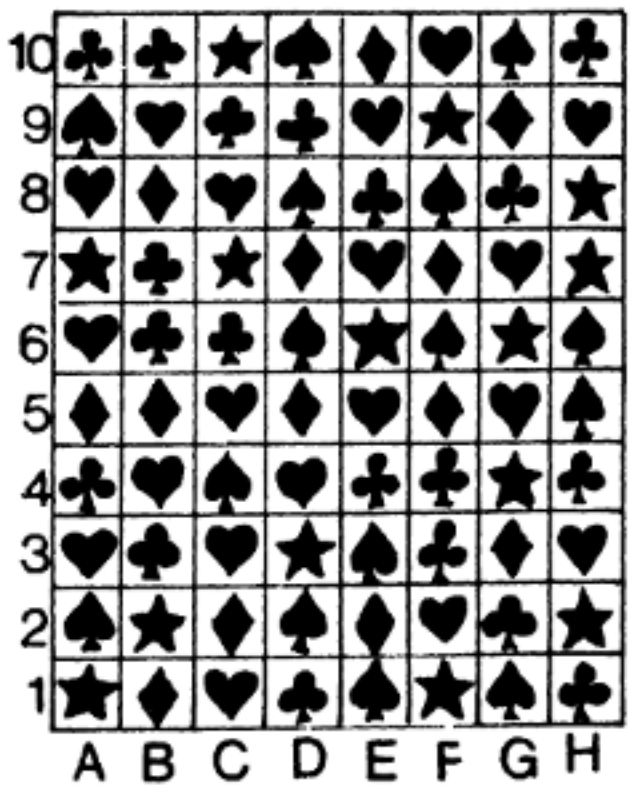
Mindbender

A tray is set for a birthday party with gifts which are to be shared between six children, equally. Can you divide the tray surface into six equal and identical sections so that each child receives the same gifts?

Shape Sleuth

Three pieces out of these six fit together to form a square. Can you figure out mentally which three these are?

Wordpower



These nine letters spell a word:

M M I
U S E
H E P

Find this word, and make as many kangaroo words as you can out of these nine letters, e.g. mime, pie, me, etc.

A score of 20 words is excellent, in this case.

Think Again!

In this illustration, in which box is a Heart placed to the right of a Club, to the left of a Spade, above a Diamond and below a Spade?

Sharpen Your Wits

Here is a trick which can match Shakuntala Devi's wits! To square a two digit number, e.g. 85, instantly, work like this:

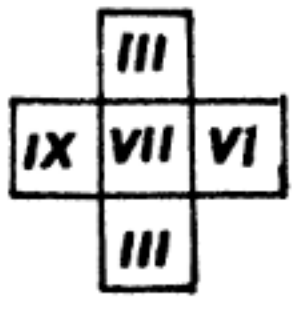
Add 1 to the ten's digit, i.e. 8+ 1 = 9
Multiply 8 and 9; i.e. 8 X 9 = 72
Attach 25 to 72; i.e. 7225.
Now, $85^2 \times 7225$.

Similarly, the square of 35 will be "(3 X 4) 25" or 1225; square of 105 will be "(10 X 11) 25" or 11025.

This trick works only when the unit digit is 5.

Solutions to last week's Teasers:

Witsharpener:
Anju, Beena and Cathy went to the Tower of London, the Tate Gallery and to the play, but did not visit Madame Tussaud's.



Blankagrams:
Birds of a feather flock together; curiosity killed the cat; don't count your chickens before they are hatched; too many cooks spoil the broth; silence is golden; familiarity breeds contempt; penny wise pound foolish; look before you leap.

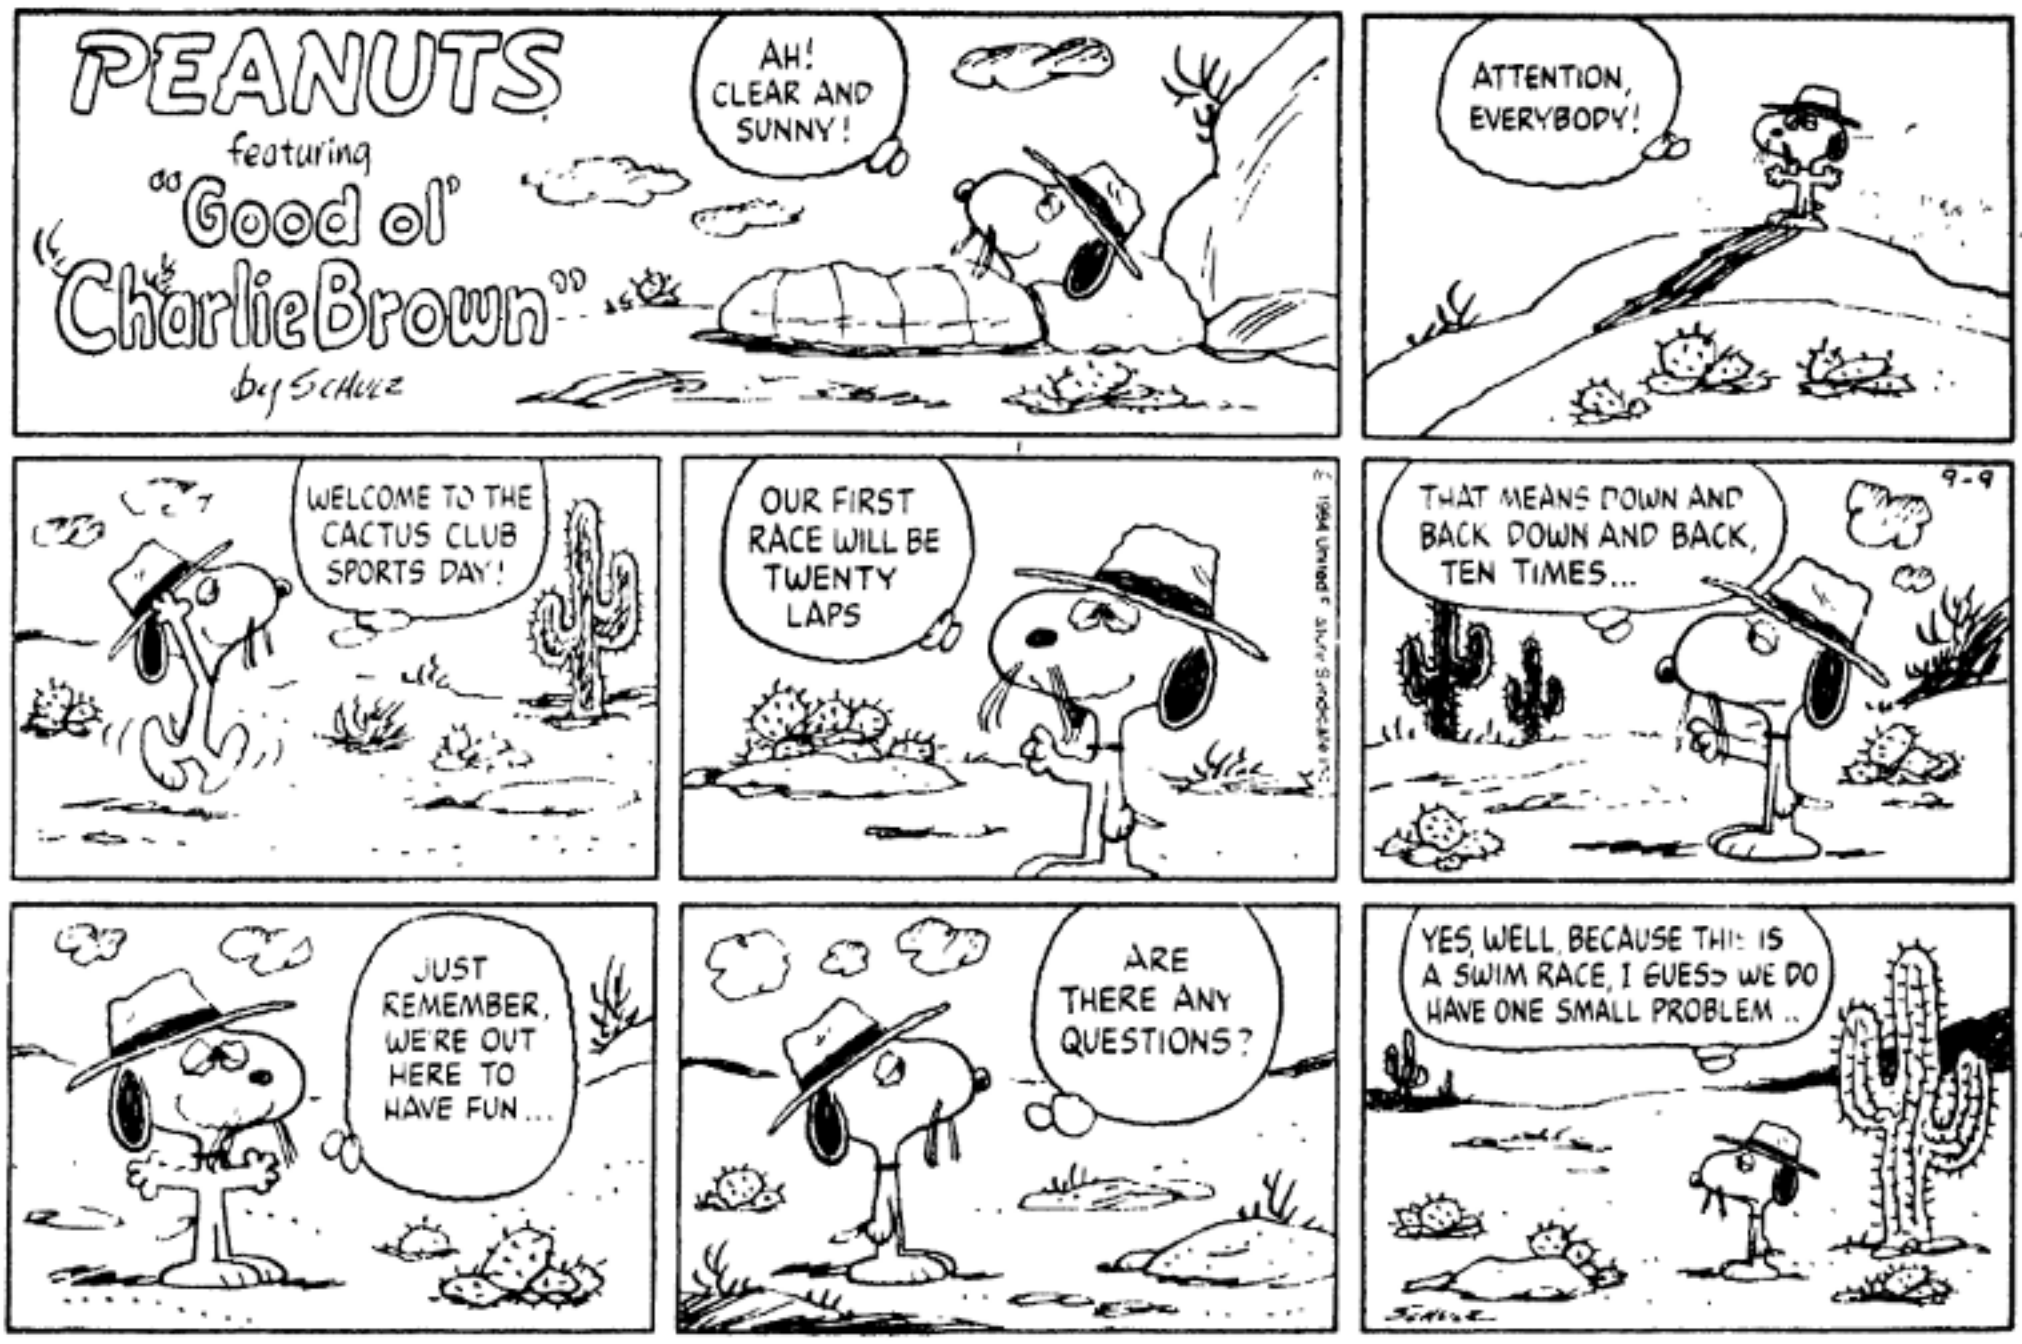


Figure it Out:
a) The Pelican (b) The Puffin (c)The Penguin. They are found on the covers of books published under the Penguin Books banner.

Missing Link:
i) 126 ii) 11

Personality Plus:
ALBERT EINSTEEN

Mind Bender:

Prosperity Vysya Bank way

You cannot survive on hopes alone

You need money when you retire.

Retired life can be made more pleasant through our PARAMPARA DEPOSIT SCHEME Rs 100 a month, saved in the scheme for 120 months will get you a permanent monthly income of Rs 197-80 or Rs 21,772-00 in lumpsum And help you lead a happy retired life!

See how our Parampara Deposit Scheme works for you

Monthly Deposit Rs	Period of Deposit	Amount saved Rs	Amount payable by us after 121 months per month or Rs	in lumpsum Rs
100-00	120	12 000-00	197-80	21,772-00
200-00	120	24 000-00	395-60	43,544-00
400-00	120	48 000-00	791 20	87,088-00

For details contact your nearest branch

Let us grow together

THE VYSYA BANK LTD

Regd Off: Avenue Road Bangalore - 560 002.
Admv Off. 72, St. Marks Road Bangalore - 560 001.
CHAIRMAN: Ramesh Gelli

COMICS

Asterix

THE GLADIATOR BY GOSCINNY AND UNDERZO

DELHI DIARY

Principal Posting

Presuming that Rajiv Gandhi will be the Prime Minister after the polls, who could be the new principal secretary to the PM? The term of Dr P.C. Alexander is to expire soon. An extension is unlikely. Finance secretary Pratap Krishna Kaul could be the next man. He has been the defence secretary and commerce secretary earlier and has held top posts like the chief controller of imports and exports previously. The appointment of a Kashmiri Pandit may raise some eyebrows, but opinion in the bureaucracy is that Kaul would be the fittest person for the post. He has the reputation of being an upright officer. One reason why Kaul's appointment may be hailed by the IAS lobby is that Dr Alexander has, of late, been reputed to be at loggerheads with senior secretaries. Recently, even the foreign service had him on the wrong side.

Dr P. C. Alexander (right)

The foreign secretary designate, Romesh Bhandari, had a heated argument with Dr Alexander on the eve of the Iranian foreign minister Vilayati's visit to Delhi. Bhandari, who had been the aide to a stalwart like V.K. Krishna Menon in his younger days, squarely told Dr Alexander to let the foreign service run the external affairs ministry.

Unreported

On 13 June, one of the personal security guards of a union cabinet minister disappeared from duty. No one in the security hierarchy took note of the sudden disappearance of Manjit Singh Jalbera, the guard of Jagannath Kaushal, the law minister. On the face of it, Kaushal, who had won the last Lok Sabha polls from Chandigarh, should have been on the top-security list after Operation Bluestar in the first week of June. The next time the authorities heard of Jalbera was when the Indian Airlines Airbus on a Srinagar-Delhi flight was hijacked and taken to Lahore on 5 July. The name of M.S. Jalbera in the hijackers' list set off the alarm. Enquiries revealed that it was none other than the missing bodyguard. But this report was suppressed. No one informed the Prime Minister or the members of the cabinet committee on political affairs about this major development. It is said that Mrs Gandhi had learnt about this incident sometime in late August and had soon afterwards changed the home minister, P.C. Sethi. One wonders how many such reports are there in the security cupboards. Soon after the Jalbera incident, a scrutiny of the ministerial bodyguards should have taken place. But in this country, leave alone ministers, even the Prime Minister's security was treated like a farce. The cost of ignoring the Jalbera incident is being borne by the nation today.

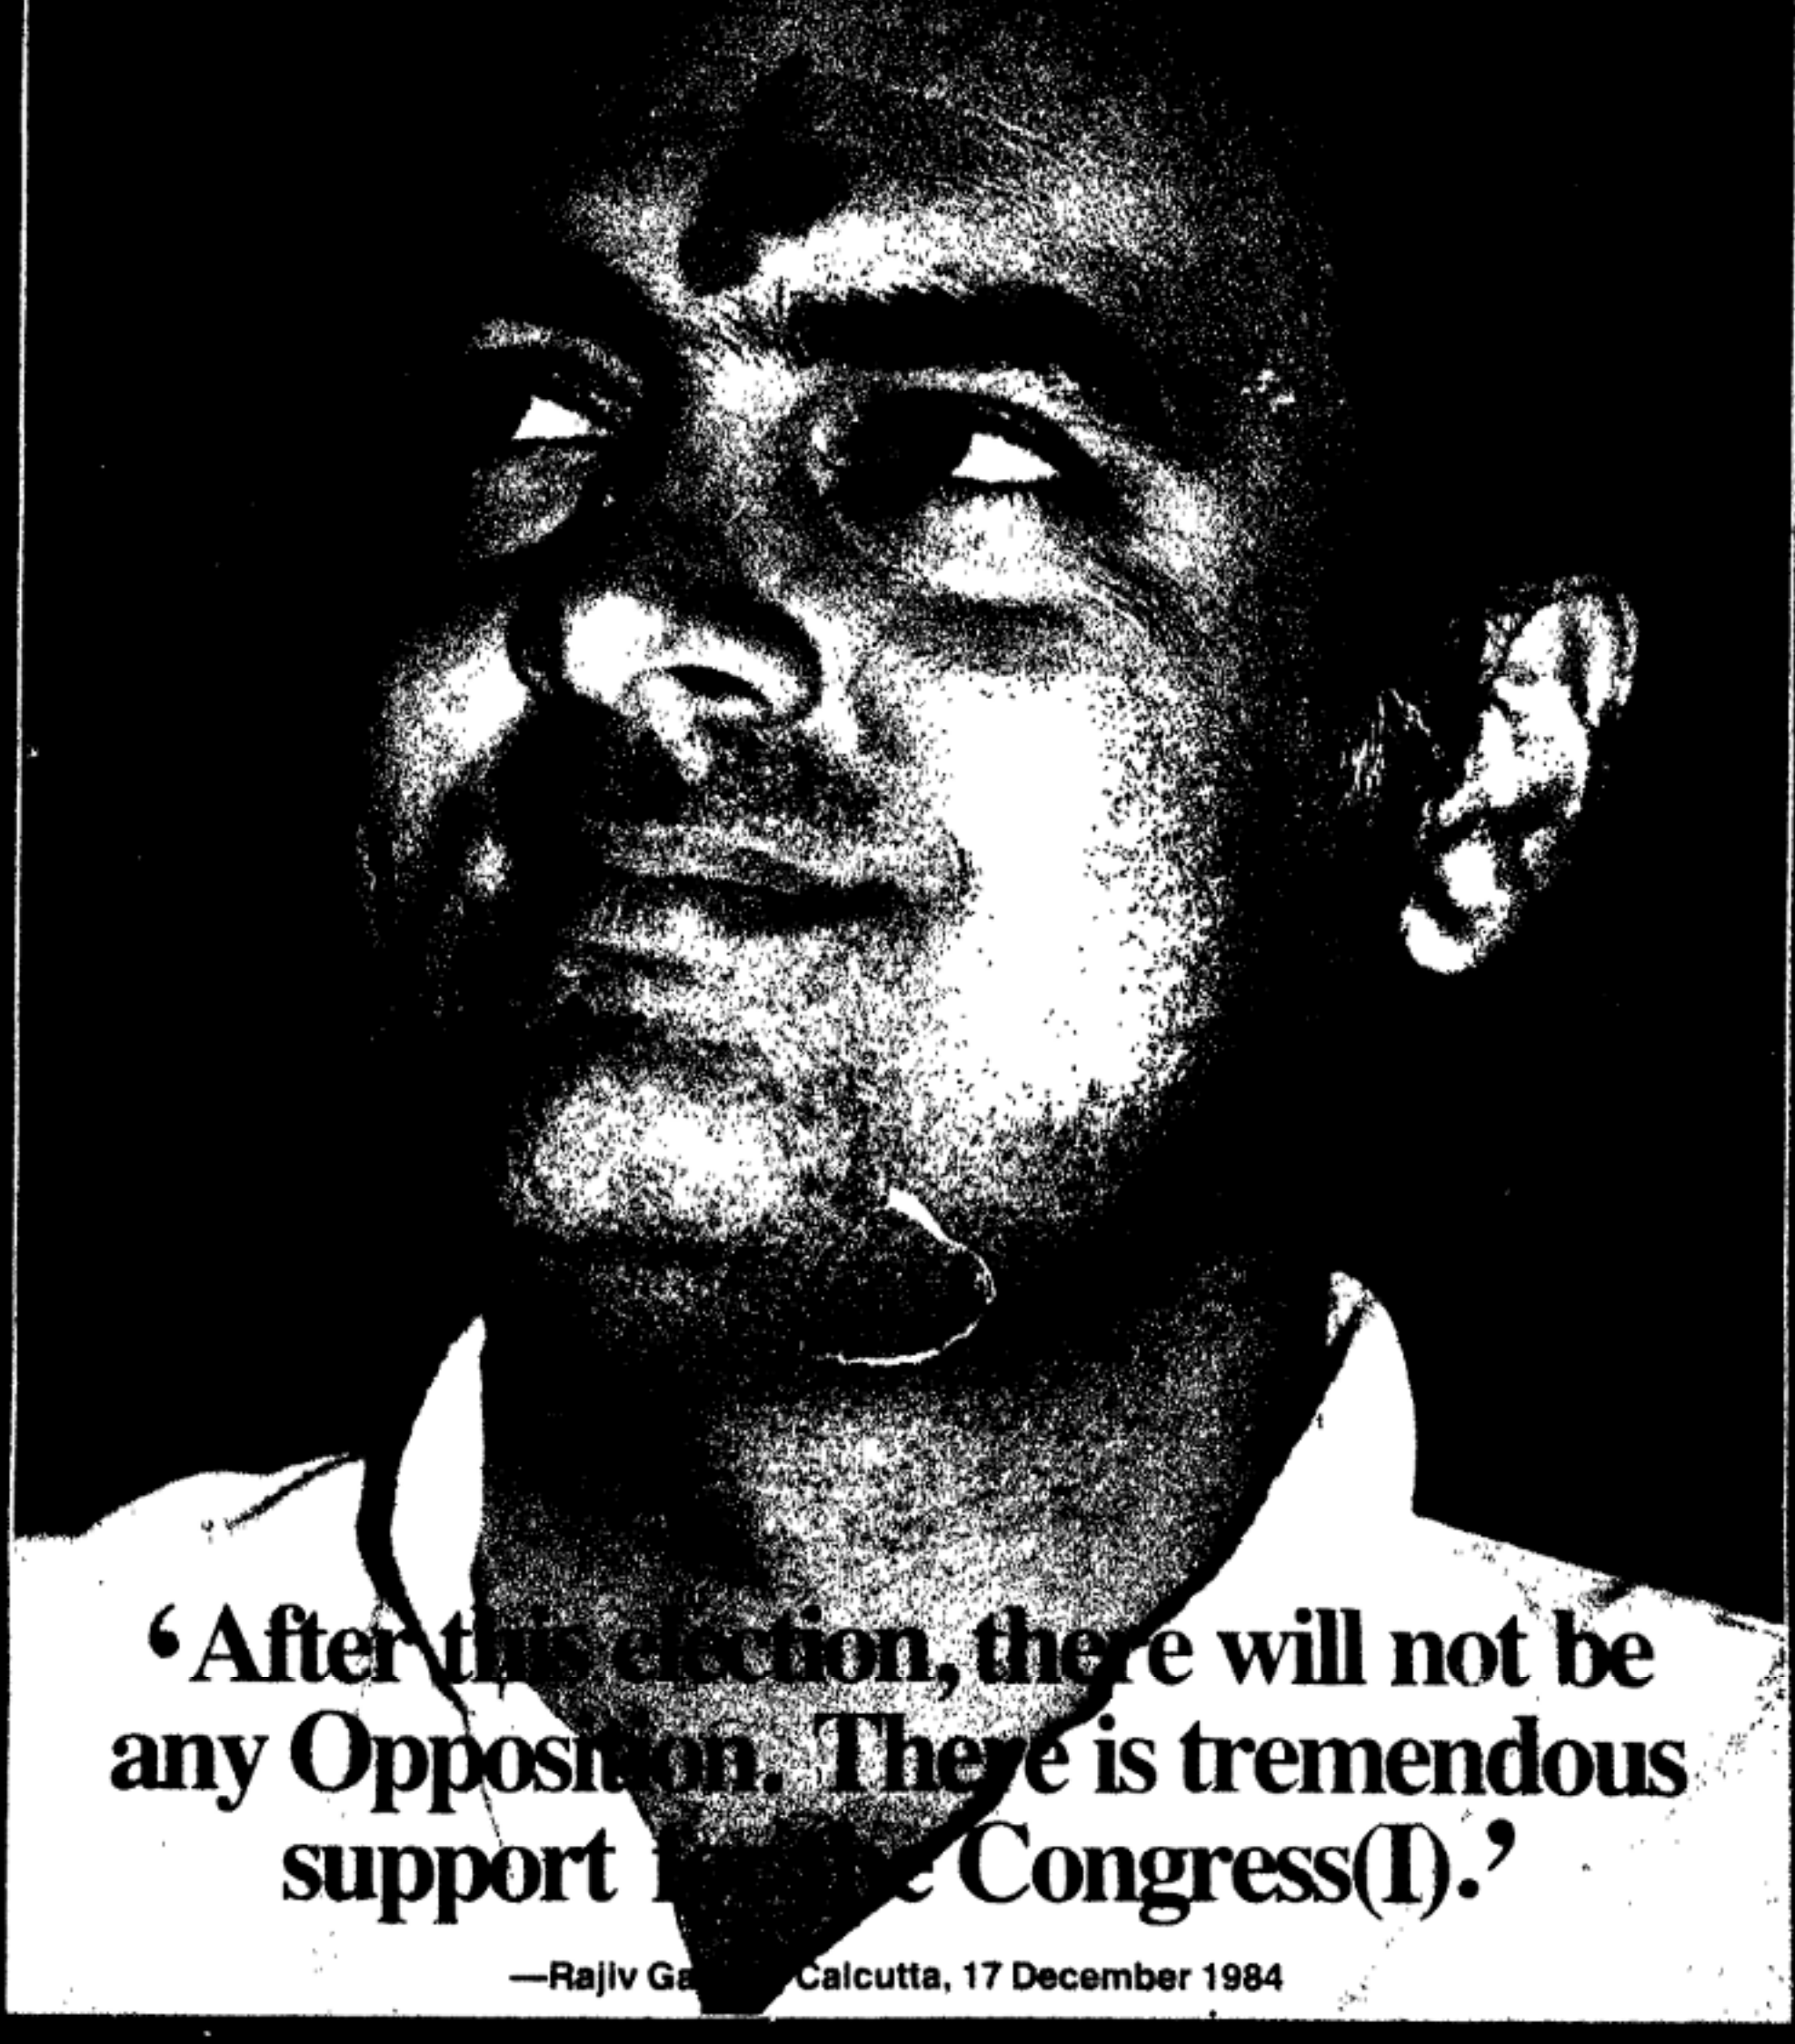
Police to Policy

The appointment of R.N. Kao as the member of the external affairs ministry's policy planning committee has surprised many. Only recently Kao, the doyen of Indian intelligence, had bid goodbye to service by resigning from the post of senior adviser to the cabinet secretariat. His presence in the committee is likely to be resented most by none other than the chairman, G. Parthasarathy.

Vijay, Not Victory

Vijay Shankar Tripathi, the bureaucrat-turned-political aide in the Prime Minister's office, is not a victorious man these days. He was being tipped for a Lok Sabha ticket initially. That did not come about. With the appointment of Arun Singh as the parliamentary secretary to the PM (who never faced Parliament in 1984), Tripathi was deprived of the prestigious room in the South Block, adjacent to the Prime Minister's office. The room beside the PM's is occupied by the special assistant, R.K. Dhawan. The room next to the PM's was Tripathi's till Arun Singh moved in. Now, Tripathi sits in a much smaller room, which till recently was occupied by a deputy secretary, K.L. Dang. (At the time of quitting the IAS in 1983, Tripathi was a joint secretary; the post of "Adviser" is equivalent to that of an additional secretary.) Not only this, even in his designation Tripathi has been demoted. In Mrs Gandhi's regime, he was the political adviser. Now he is the personal adviser in the PM's office. Politics in any case is personality-oriented, isn't it?

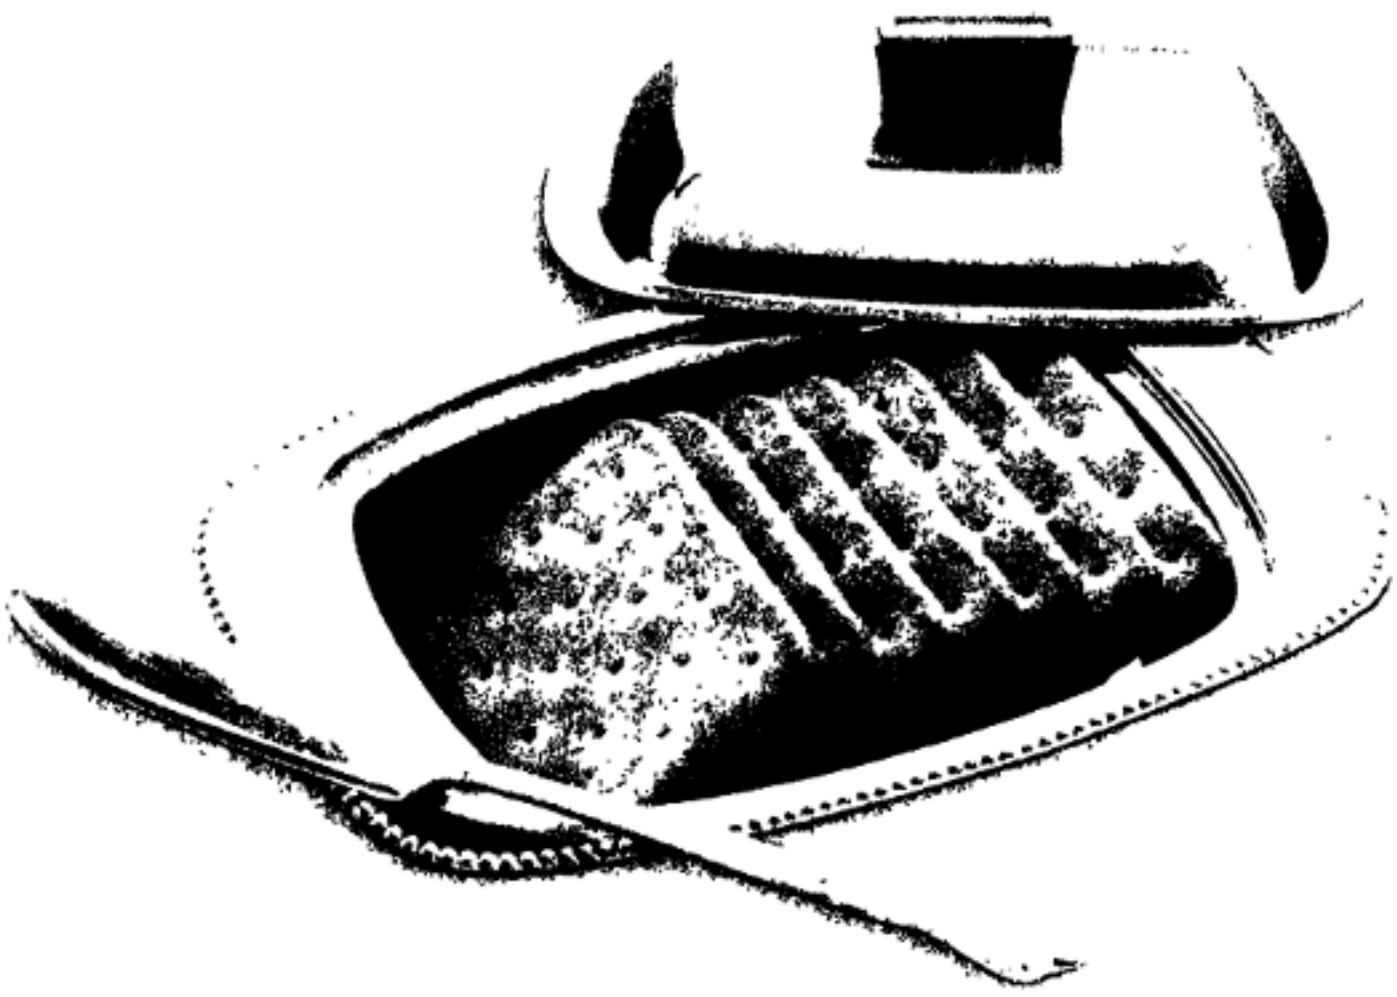
Computer Deductions



The control room set up in the AICC(I) office on 24 Akbar Road, which is monitoring the state-wise party reports, is manned by retired military personnel. These formerly uniformed gentlemen are good at taking orders and passing on information untainted by political thought. There is an array of telephones at their command and these receive reports from state capitals round-the-clock. By the time these lines appear in print, election results should start coming in. A joke which went round the capital during the campaign may not become stale by then. According to the grapevine, the reports of the control room were fed into a computer. The Congress(I) is contesting 494 seats (the rest have been left for parties like the AIADMK and other allies) out of the total of 515 at stake. Based on the control room data, the computer said that the total seats to be won by the Congress(I) would be 494 minus 74. If you know your arithmetic you can calculate the computer results yourself.

D.E. Nizamuddin

6—19 JANUARY 1985 | AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION | RS 4.00



The New Wave Government

SUNDAY

'After this election, there will not be any Opposition. There is tremendous support for the Congress(I).'

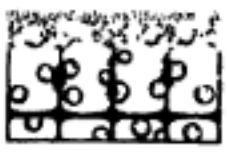
—Rajiv Gandhi, Calcutta, 17 December 1984

"Butterlicious"

Britannia Top

LINTAS BIN TOP 4 2316

Stop bad breath. Fight tooth decay.



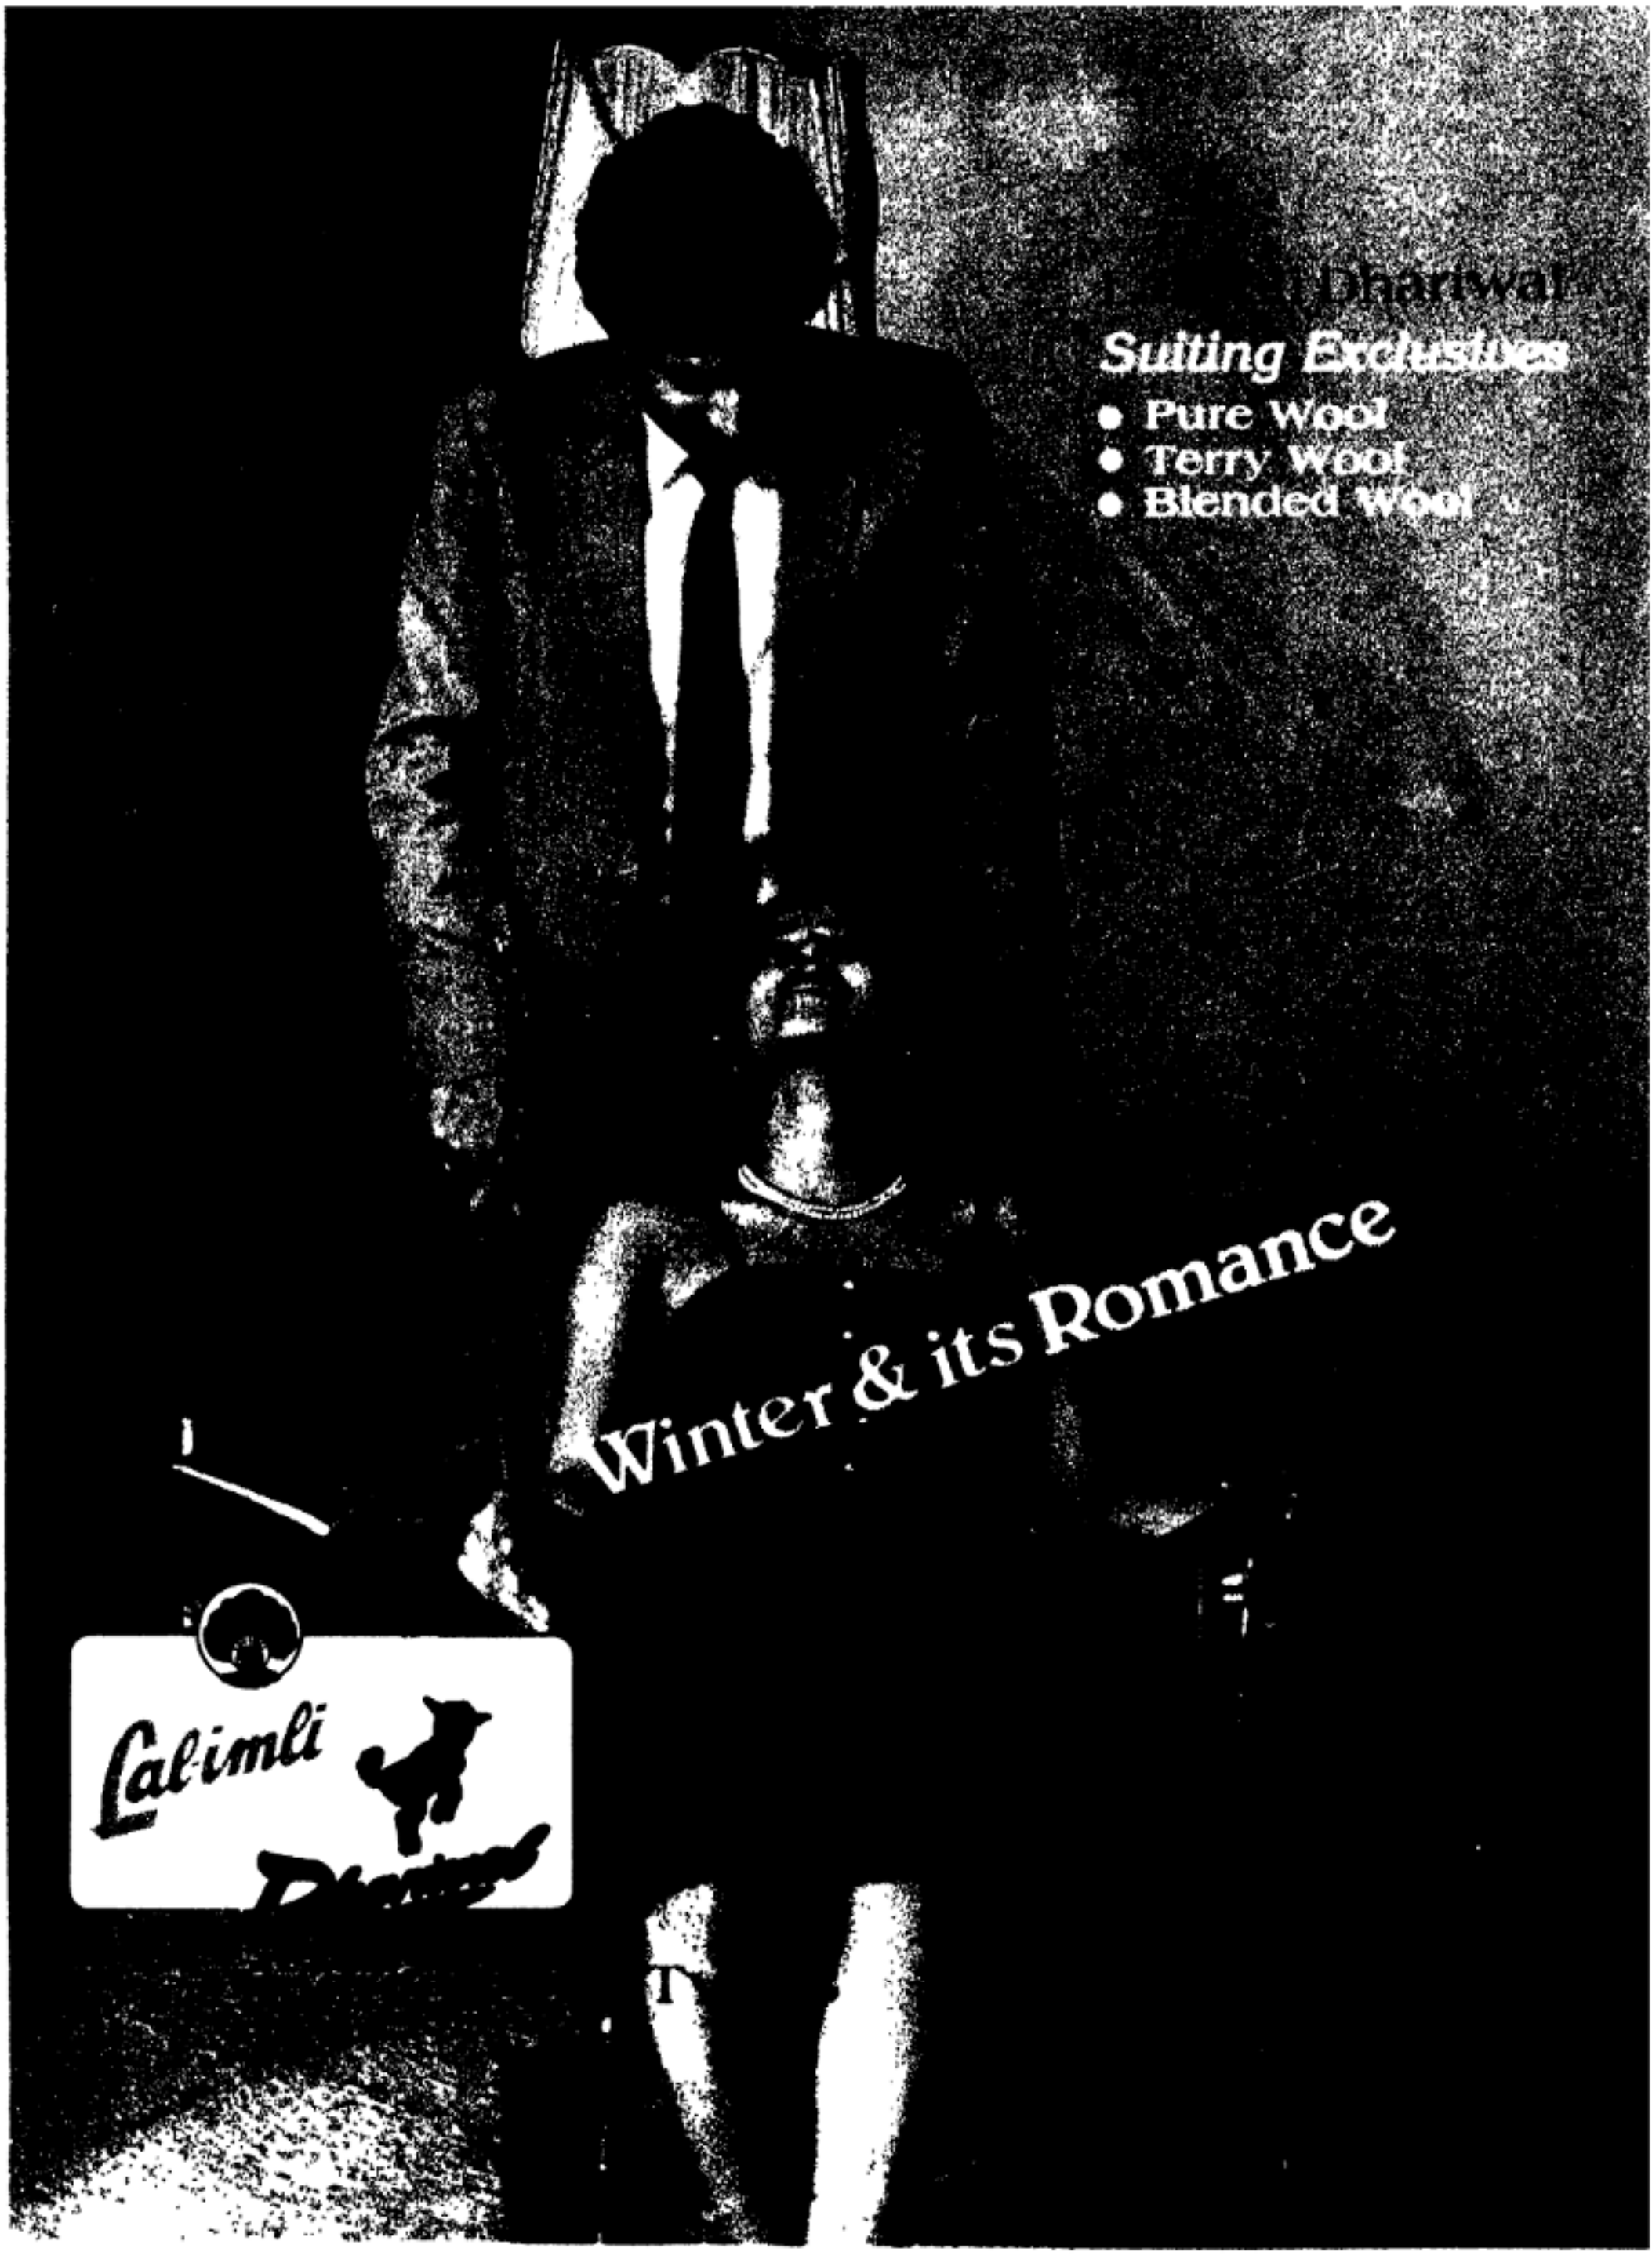
Give them the Colgate Ring of Confidence!

Regular brushing with Colgate gives your family clean, fresh breath, strong healthy teeth. That's the Colgate Ring of Confidence.

This is how Colgate's trusted formula works for you every time you brush

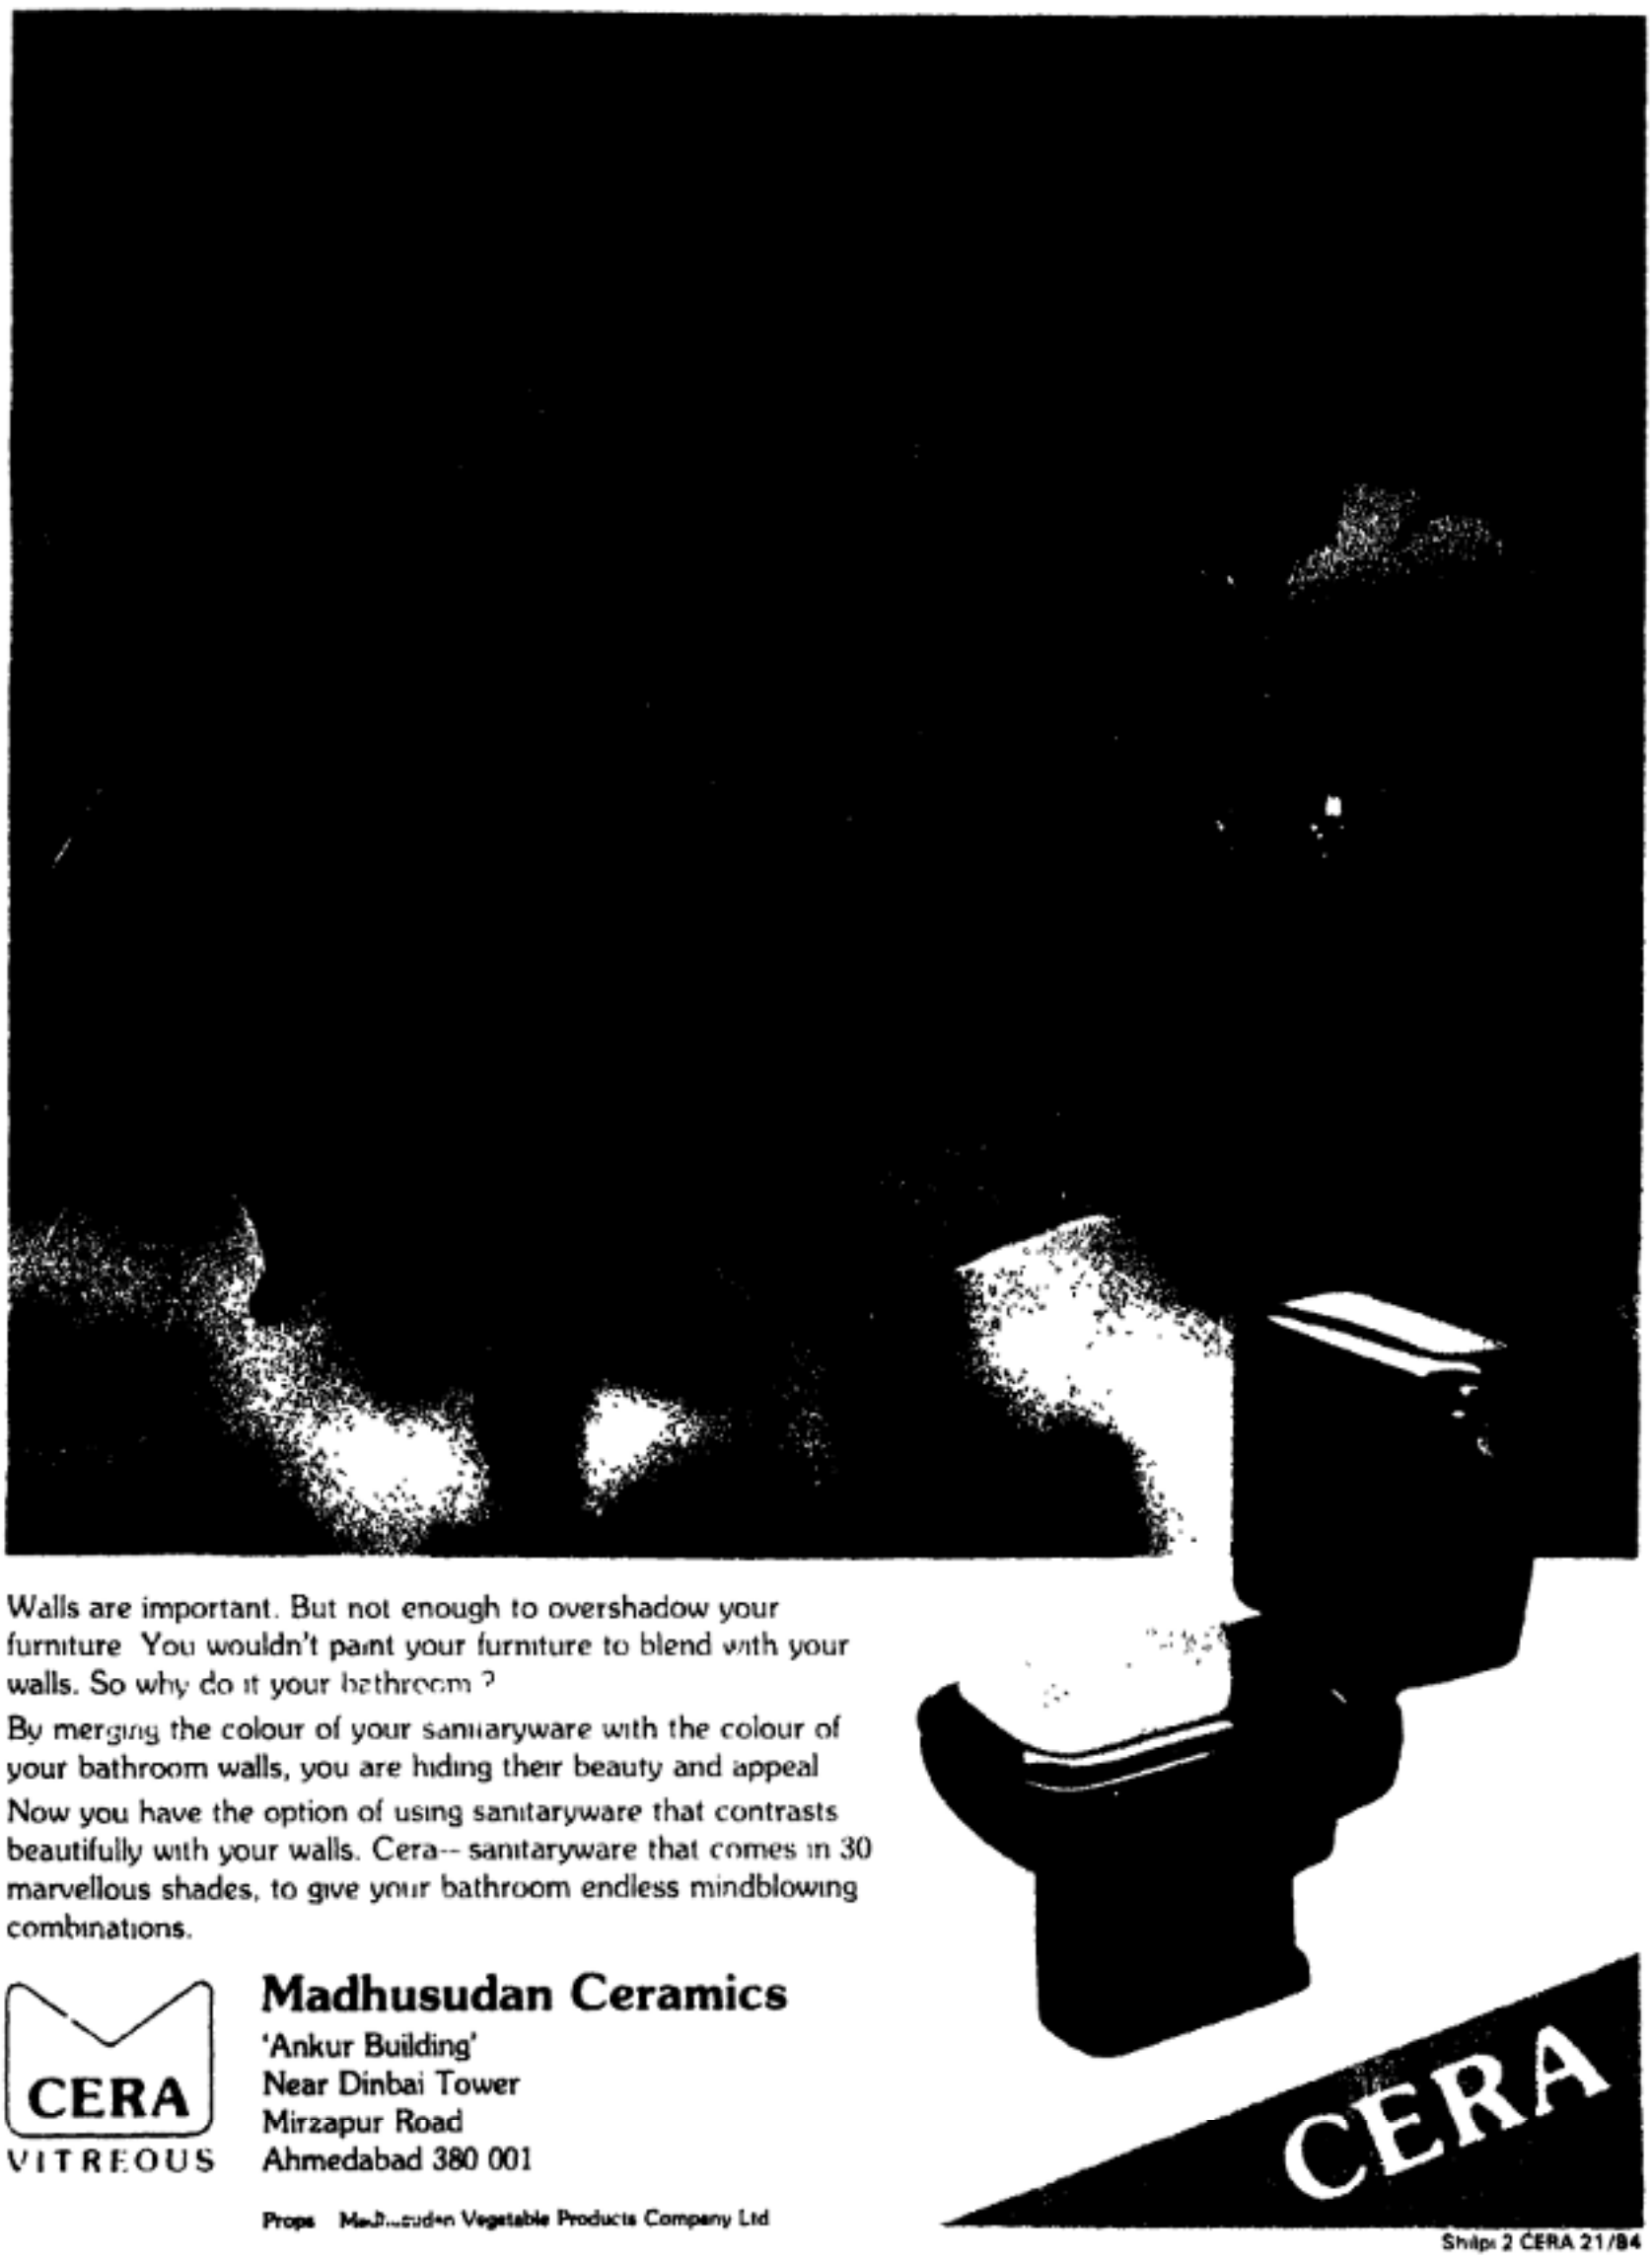
Bacteria grow in food particles trapped between teeth, causing bad breath and tooth decay.

Colgate's unique active foam reaches deep to remove odour-causing food particles and decay-causing bacteria.



Regular brushing with Colgate gives you clean, fresh breath and strong, healthy teeth.

Make sure your family brushes with Colgate after every meal.
Stop bad breath, fight tooth decay.
Give them the Colgate Ring of Confidence



GK&E B84 55

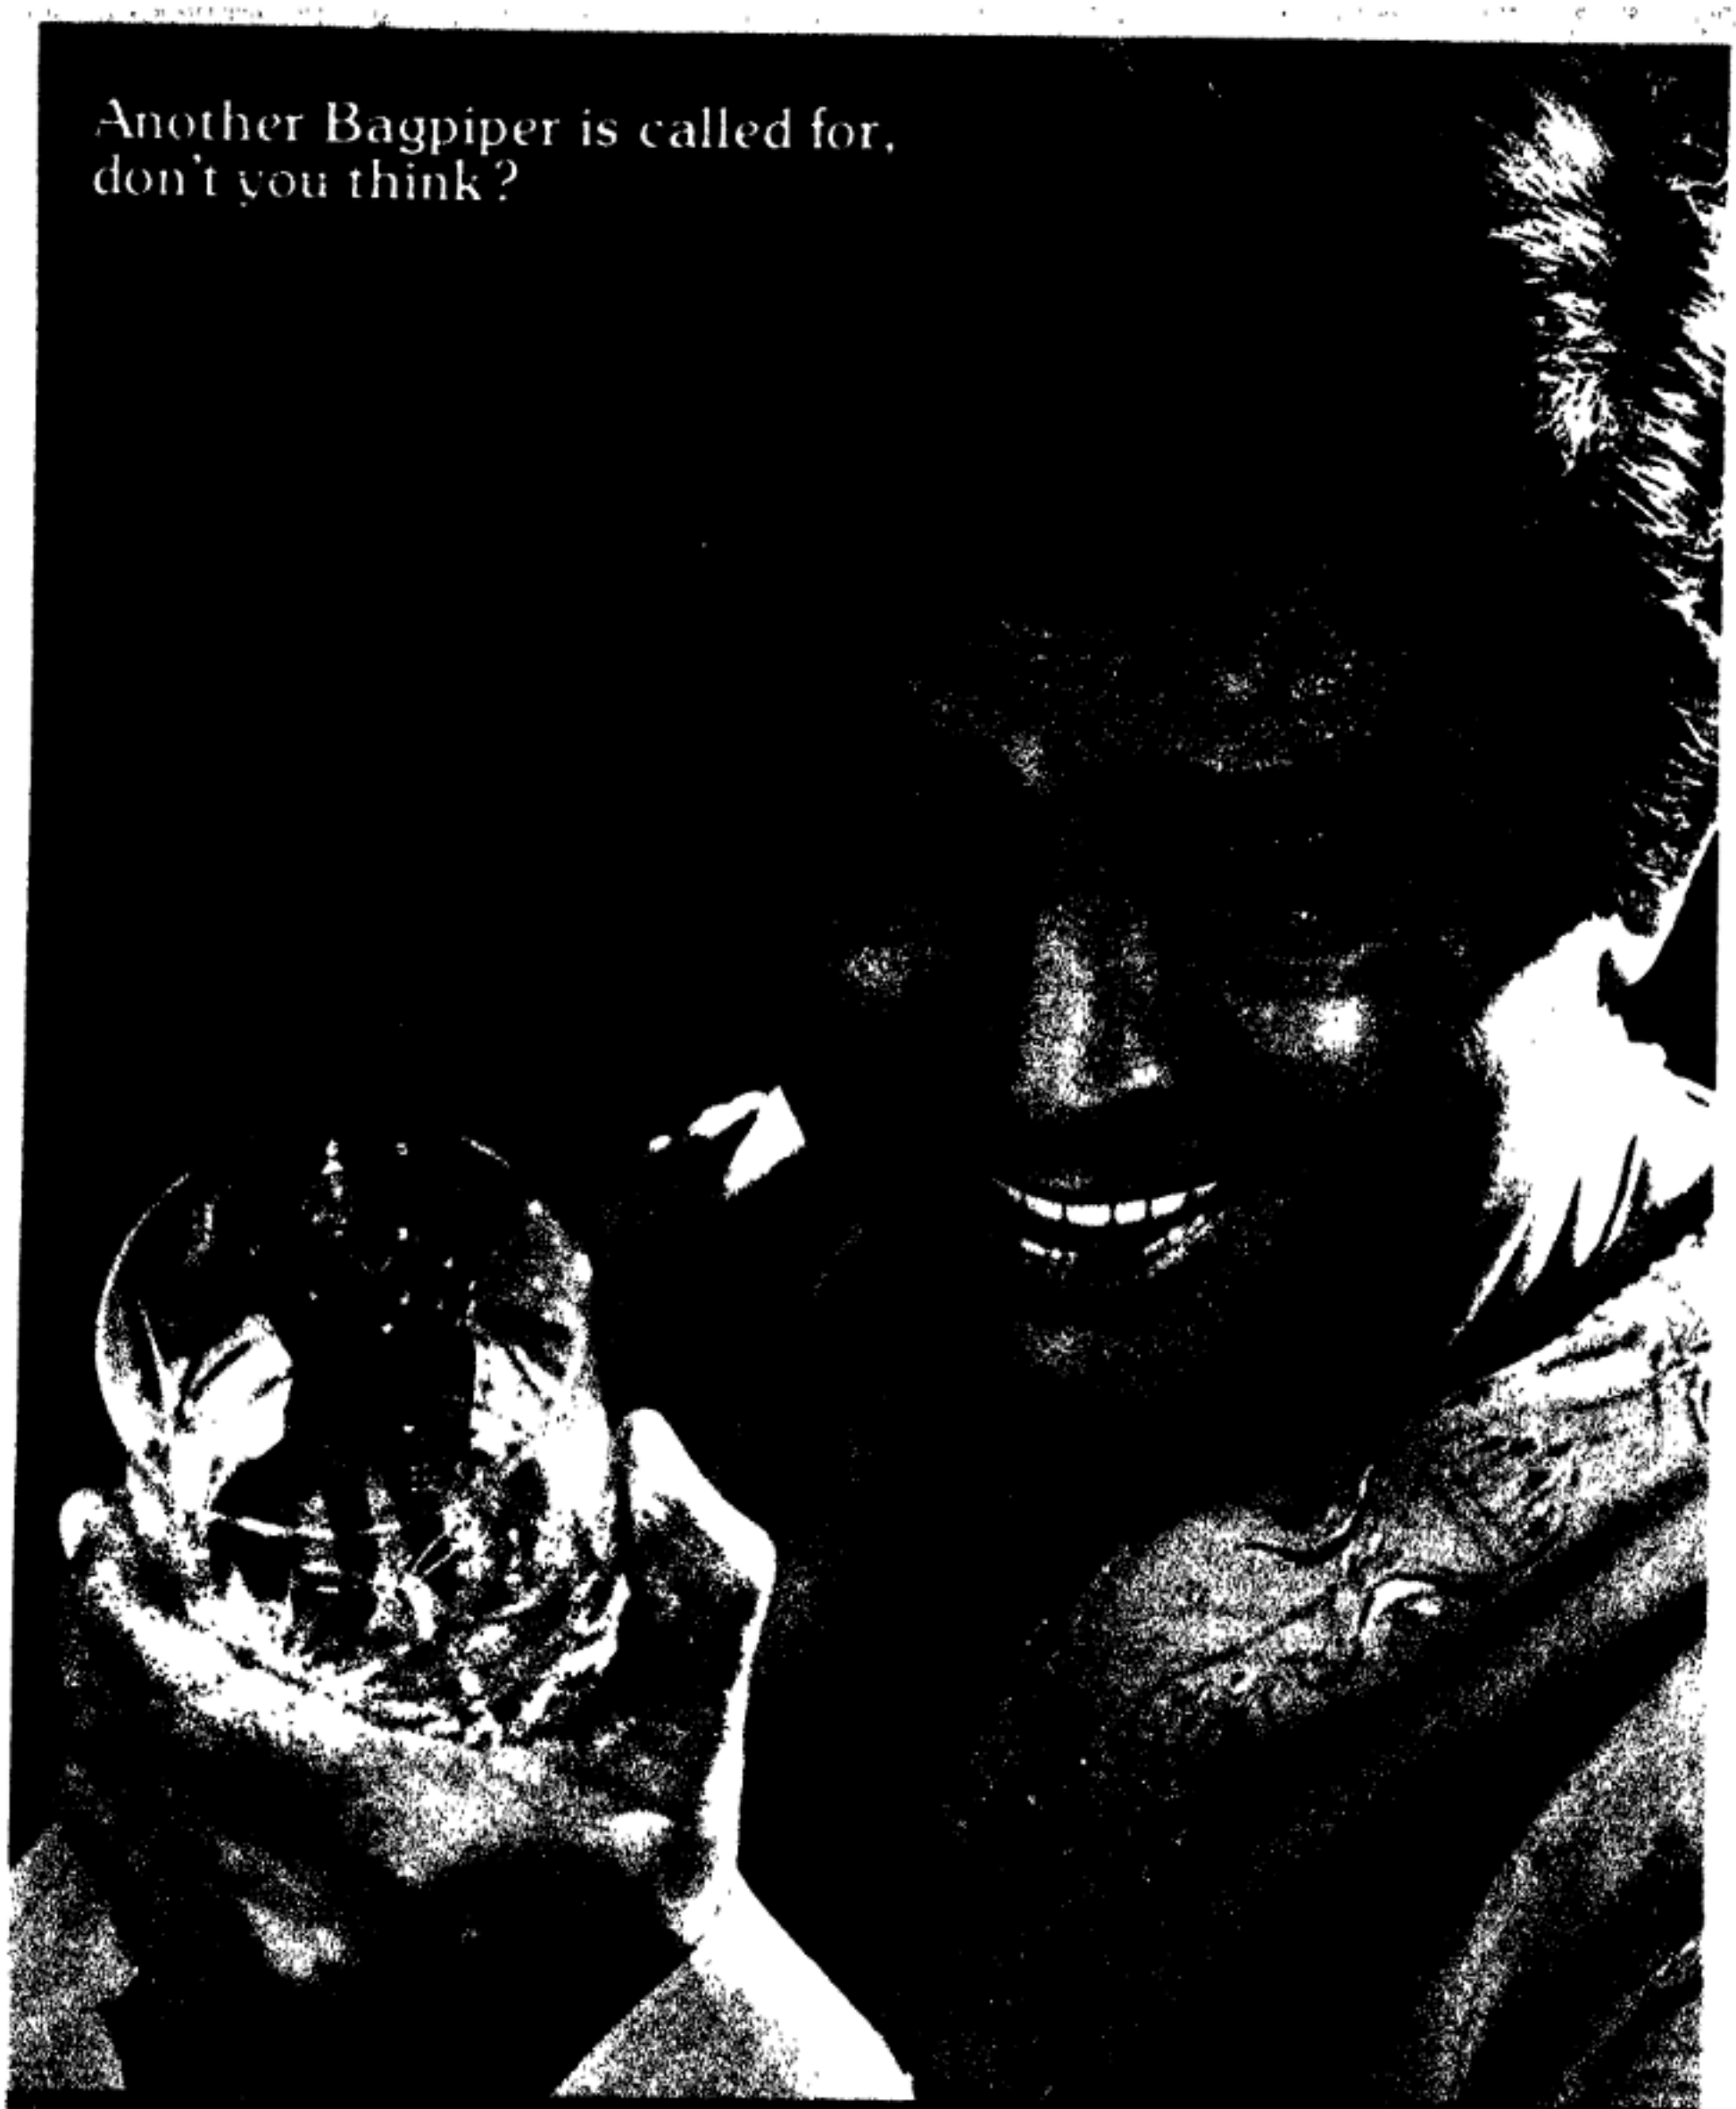
You'll love its fresh minty taste!

Dhariwal
Suiting Exclusives
• Pure Wool
• Terry Wool
• Blended Wool
Winter & its Romance
Lal-imli

Why be a wall flower
When you can pick exotic combinations

Walls are important. But not enough to overshadow your furniture. You wouldn't paint your furniture to blend with your walls. So why do it your bathroom ?

By merging the colour of your sanitaryware with the colour of your bathroom walls, you are hiding their beauty and appeal.



Now you have the option of using sanitaryware that contrasts beautifully with your walls. Cera-- sanitaryware that comes in 30 marvellous shades, to give your bathroom endless mindblowing combinations.

CERA
VITREOUS

Madhusudan Ceramics
'Ankur Building'
Near Dinbai Tower
Mirzapur Road
Ahmedabad 380 001

Props Madhusudan Vegetable Products Company Ltd

Shilpi 2 CERA 21/84

everest/84/HL/529

6—19 JANUARY 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 ISSUE 10 RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 18

The New Wave Government

Rajiv Gandhi's cabinet which was sworn in on 31 December '84 is clearly aimed at projecting the image of a government that works. The new ministry is a judicious blend of youth and experience and the PM at the very first opportunity displayed his administrative capabilities. A report by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya.

Why the Opposition Lost

What were the reasons for the opposition's debacle and what were the factors which helped the Congress(I)? An analysis by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya. Madhu Jain reports on the jubilation of the Congress(I) supporters in the capital and gloom in the opposition camp.

The Sweep

SUNDAY correspondents analyse the results in the state which swept the Congress(I) to power.

Sandeep Shankar

Page 18

Stemming the Tide

Reports on the few states which held out against the Rajiv wave.

NEWS 54

Why were Pranab Mukherjee and A.B.A Ghani Khan Choudhury dropped?
Gen Zia's hollow victory
Delhi's little Kabul

COMMENT

Dateline M.J. Akbar 9
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 11
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 13
Opinion 14

VARIETY

Science 65
Khaas Baat 67
This India 69
Sundayweek 71
Chess/Bridge/Quiz 72
Teasers 76
Peanuts 78
Delhi Diary 82

PUNCHLINE/R.K. LAXMAN

Cover transparency: Durgaprasad

Editor M.J. Akbar

Associate Editor Toosher Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K. John, Henry Jacob
Rajiv Bagchi, Sanjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay
Olga Tellis
Bangalore
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati
Seema Guha
Trivandrum
Venu Menon
Srinagar
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for A[illegible]
by Bijit Kumar Bose from [illegible]
Street Calcutta [illegible]
[illegible]
Tripura [illegible]

"Sweetex helps me stay slim. It saves me 2600 calories a week . . . without actually fasting."

Any doctor will tell you, overweight is mostly due to overeating. And thus excess calorie intake. Remember this simple formula. Six cups of tea a day equals twelve teaspoons of sugar. That's 384 calories daily.* If you cut out sugar in tea and coffee alone, you can save up to 2600 calories a week without actually fasting.

Replace sugar with Sweetex. Invisibly. Effortlessly. It doesn't give you licence to gorge. It isn't a magic formula. But it helps you to cut out calories. It lends support to your calorie controlled diet. And helps you control your weight.

(* One rounded teaspoon of sugar = 32 calories)

Sweetex

SUGAR FREE SWEETENER

FOR THE WEIGHTWATCHER!

Trikaya B REV 1.84

DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

New Delhi: There is nothing quite so desolate as the home of a defeated politician. The campaign bustle is replaced by an eerie despair, the posters mock from the walls, when illusions shatter they never make much noise. The only sound that one might hear from closed doors is the mumble of excuses: the people misunderstood, the media distorted, supporters took victory for granted and did not turn out to vote, opponents told lies. The band of loyalists, now suddenly shrunk to non-sycophantic levels, relives the descent from euphoria to confidence to despair. Anecdotes are exchanged; memory prodded to search for some solace in the debris of a lost adventure. The conversation has the touch of winter in it; there is no human to warm the heart. The bruise and scratch on the ego may be camouflaged in front of the world which still has to be faced, but here the wounds are left in the open. At best, time will heal only some of them. A general election is too big a milestone in a politician's life: he can hope to contest, at the most, half a dozen and defeat means half a decade if not more lost. For the opposition the results of 1984 mean that they will go through the Eighties without the sustenance of a spell in office. Survival becomes a hard business in the bleakness of defeat. Both money and friends, the two most inconstant possessions in life, run out quickly.

1980 of course was much better. The shock of defeat was greater, since both the Janata and the Janata (Secular)—remember that names?—had convinced themselves that they were on the brink of [illegible] the time, by poring over [illegible] enough indications to what was happening. The momentum towards Rajiv Gandhi (and it was his victory, not Mrs Indira Gandhi's) began to peak very late, in the last week of the campaign, but when it did, took on leviathan proportions. Mothers saw Rajiv as the son who had to be protected after this great tragedy, the young saw him as one of them and were determined to give him his chance. And who could blame the young since the alternatives that the opposition had to offer were men of the vintage of Chaudhury Charan Singh or Babu Jagjivan Ram, men who belong to the past, not the future. This is the problem: in 1980, the seats disappeared but hope survived; in 1985 hope too has taken a severe beating. In 1980 the various segments of the Janata mixture went their separate ways in an effort to separately capture power by 1985. The Bhartiya Janata Party was the most confident of the lot then. It has now been demolished. As for Chaudhury Charan Singh, hopefully his ambitions will finally be given a burial. If any party can claim some pretense of survival it is the Janata, but unless the party does something unexpectedly dramatic to revive its fortunes it too might end up soon as a small footnote in history rather than an institution created by a mighty popular movement in the Seventies. Strong doses of courage and ideology are needed. Those who have them will live to fight another day. Those who spend their time only waiting for Rajiv Gandhi to fail will find that the country has passed them by.

The new year's eve surprise of course was the dropping of Mr A B A Ghani Khan Chowdhury from the cabinet. It was generally known that Mr Pranab Mukherjee's days of influence were over, and if Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi did keep him it would be at the expense of a demotion. But Mr Chowdhury was expected, after his impressive victories in Bengal, to be at the top of the first list. Perhaps the man most shocked was Mr Chowdhury himself; he could not believe it, particularly since his supporters had begun distributing the champagne early. The parallel which comes to mind is that of Mr A R Antulay in 1980, who did so much in Mrs Gandhi's comeback effort between 1977 and 1980. He clearly expected to be a cabinet minister in Mrs Gandhi's government and was stunned when his name was not announced. His patience was rewarded when, against every prediction, he was named the chief minister of Maharashtra after the Assembly elections. No one imagined that a Muslim would be made chief minister of the land which fought Aurangzeb, but there he was. If Mr Choudhury feels in any mood to do so, he can console himself with the hope that he may get the big job in Bengal if the Congress wins the Assembly elections here.

Mr Ashoke Sen's expertise will be needed, I suspect, in passing some new legislation on Punjab. He was the minister who piloted the constitutional amendment in 1963 banning parties preaching secession from contesting the elections. Perhaps this time he will have to push through such legislation about communal parties.

Clearly Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has made a serious attempt, with the formation of his first government, to make the Congress once again the kind of party which it was in the Fifties, with a strong commitment to the minorities and the harijan. The number of Brahmins too has been brought down sharply since Mrs Gandhi the grandmother had become terribly Brahmin-heavy. It was most pleasant to see Chacha Vodai Ghatoor in the cabinet. He is one of the most delightful people in today's politics. And Mr Vishwanath Pratap Singh has been given the job which should have been his long ago. I doubt if Rajiv Gandhi could have made a better start. However, conspicuous by its absence once again was the name of Srikant Verma, the poet who has a genius for slogans and who once again handled the Congress publicity with a political skill which advertising agencies and public school graduates are going to take some time to learn.

I think Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has a bit of wit too. Was Mr Arun Nehru made the minister of state for power because he had developed a reputation of being power hungry?

The momentum towards Rajiv Gandhi (and it was his victory, not Mrs Indira Gandhi's) began to peak very late, in the last week of the campaign, but when it did took on leviathan proportions. Mothers saw Rajiv as the son who had to be protected after this great tragedy; the young saw him as one of them and were determined to give him his chance.

Now Available!

Completely revised and updated editions of highly informative and internationally recognised reference works

THE GUINNESS BOOK OF RECORDS 1985

Norris D. McWhirter (Editor & Compiler)

352 pages £ 6.50 Special Price in India Rs. 98

The world s best selling ultimate reference work for a general knowledge of record breaking facts and feats. provides exceptional value for its meagre price with four-colour printing throughout. Fully covers 1984 Olympics.

GUINNESS BOOK OF SPORTS FACTS

Stan Greenberg

1984 192 pages £ 6.95 Special Price in India Rs. 98

Records, winners and champions of sports are presented in the authoritative and attractive Guinness style. These are complemented by some of the best in sports stunning photographs. predominantly from the award-winning All-Sports team. Covers a wide variety of sports from the world over (60). with all the winners of the 1984 Olympics.

JUNIOR PEARS ENCYCLOPAEDIA 24th Edition

Edward Blishen (Editor)

Pelham Books 704 pp £ 6.95 Special Price in India Rs. 98

This. certainly the most up-to-date single-volume encyclopaedia. covers history. geography science and mathematics. radio and television. etc. and includes the 1984 Olympics results.

PEARS CYCLOPAEDIA 1984-85 –93rd Edition

Christopher Cook (Editor)

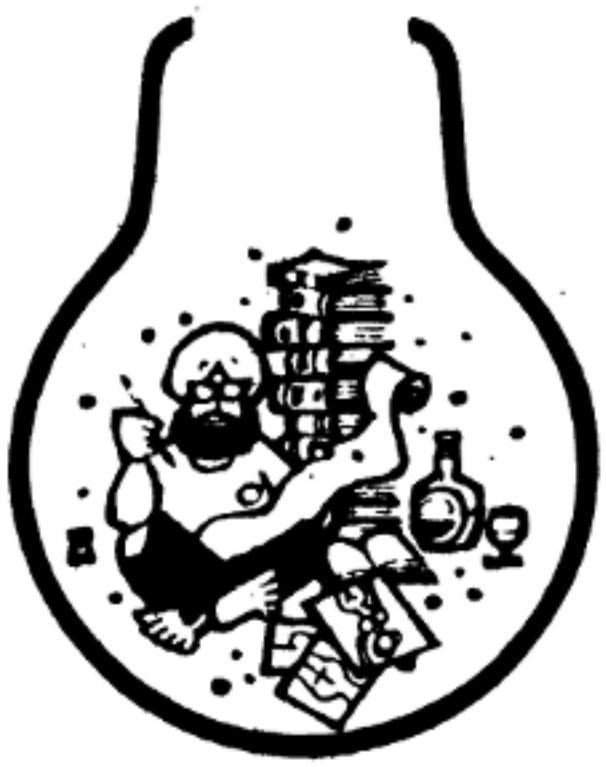
Pelham Books 1984 1056 pp £ 7.95 Special Price in India Rs. 110

Exhaustively illustrated. thir edition provides background information of every day use on diverse subjects including history. politics. man and his environment. nuclear magnetic resonance. historical events, prominent people. world of music etc.

Please send us your valued orders. VPP Post Free.

UBS Publishers' Distributors Ltd.

5. Ansari Road. New Delhi-110002



Branches : New Delhi • Bombay • Bangalore • Madras • Calcutta • Kanpur

Requiem for 1984

It's been India's worst year since Independence. And the worst ever for the Sikhs since they lost their kingdom 133 years ago. The fortunes of the two are closely interlinked; if one sinks, there is little hope of survival of the other. You may think that Sikhs are a miniscule minority of under two per cent of the population and what happens to them should not have much bearing on the fortunes of a country of 700 people. I wish that were so. But I know it to be otherwise. Let me elucidate from personal experience.

I spent some time visiting Sikh refugee camps in the city. Early November they had upwards of 50,000 inmates, mostly poor artisans of the Labana subcaste. Within a fortnight the administration ordered them to return to their homes or whatever was left of them. Most of them refused to go back to areas where they knew killers were still at large, and either moved to makeshift shelters provided by a few Sikh gurudwaras or migrated to Punjab where they had no roots (99 out of a hundred were refugees from Pakistan), no homes, no lands, only distant relatives. The same happened to Sikhs who fled from Bihar and Uttar Pradesh, mainly Kanpur where killing, looting and arson was as savage as in Delhi. None of the assurances given by Rajiv Gandhi and the chief ministers of Bihar and UP created any confidence in them for the simple reason that they felt that if these people had wanted to prevent anti-Sikh riots and had acted in time, they would not have occurred in the first place.

Those who subscribe to the theory that Sikhs deserved to be taught a lesson should now feel satisfied that Sikhs have in fact learnt some kind of lesson. But it is not the lesson Sikh-baiters hoped to teach them. They should visit some refugee camps and ask any of the 900 or more widows who lost not only their bread-winning husbands but their young sons as well how they feel. They should talk to men with limbs in plaster, their long hair and beards forcibly shorn off and scores of young girls who were dishonoured whether or not they feel they deserved what they got. They could also derive satisfaction from the fact that the number of Sikhs seen on the roads of Delhi has visibly decreased; that the once ebullient and extrovert people now look sullen and downcast; loudspeakers which blared forth from gurudwaras to the annoyance of their neighbours have fallen silent, attendance at gurudwaras like Sis Ganj and Bangla Sahib where one had to jostle one's way through the throng is very thin. The Gurubani Keertan is as mellifluous as ever but it floats across half-empty halls. I asked myself, "Have the Sikhs run their course in history and will they now like Indian Muslims become a community of hymn singers?" Allama Iqbal proclaimed on the rise and downfall of nations in the following words:

A tujh ko bataaoon main taqdeer e-umam kya hai!
Shamsheer-o-Sanaa avval, taoos-o-rabaab aakhir.

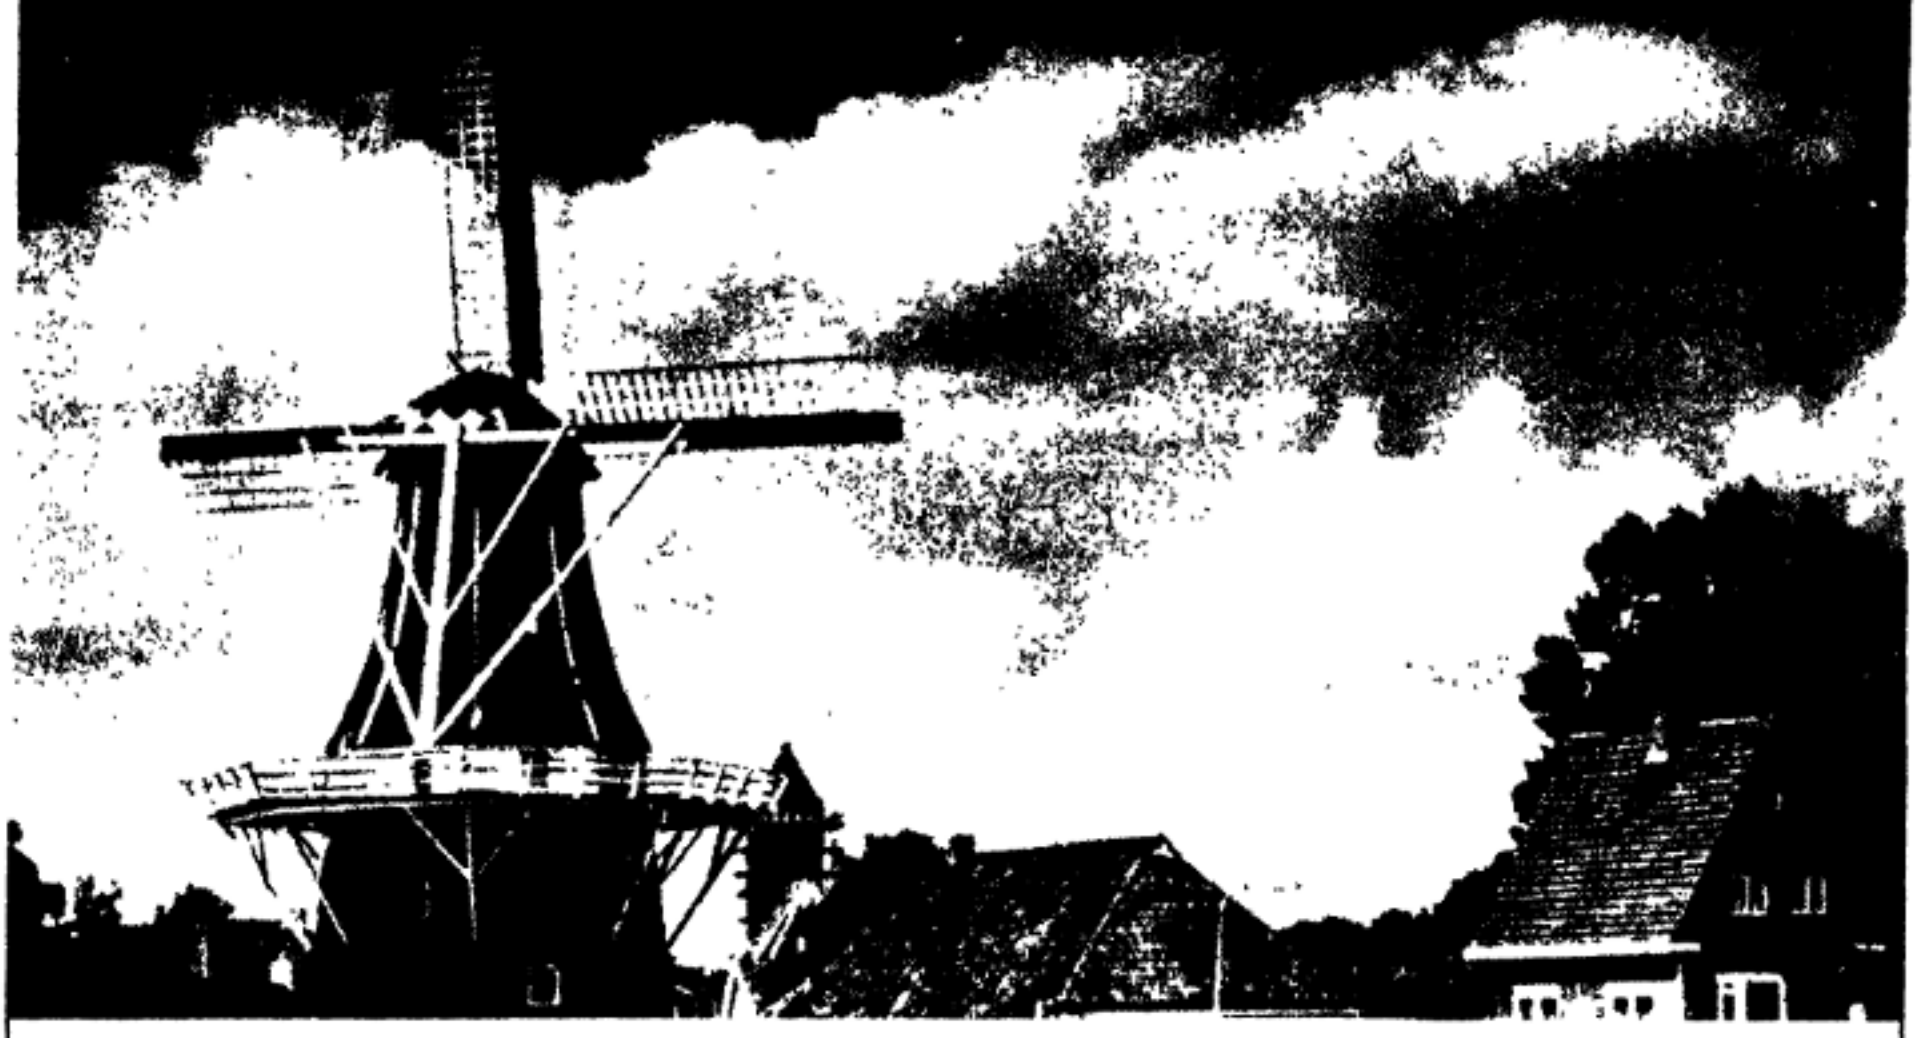
(Come let me tell you of the rise and fall of nations;/It is the sword and the dagger in the first phase/The viol and the lute in the last.)

What happens to the already communally surcharged atmosphere of Punjab when this cargo of bitterness is off-loaded and scattered in different towns and villages? Unless defused in time, it could be as lethal as the MIC gas that enveloped Bhopal. Can we afford to have the most sensitive border of our country and our only land-link to Jammu and Kashmir become permanently destabilised? Let all Indians ponder over this as the year ends. I would also like to suggest a few New Year's resolutions for 1985. For the Sikhs: make unequivocal reaffirmation of your Indianness, denounce Khalistan, ostracise Khalistanis and condemn people who argue with guns, bombs and pistols. Give assurances to your Punjabi Hindu brethren that as long as you live you will not allow a hair on their heads to be touched by evil-doers. For all other Indians: do not regard all Sikhs as Khalistanis, but fellow Indians; give back to the Sikhs the place of honour they had before their downfall in 1984. If you want to save your country from disintegration, you have no other choice. If the Sikhs sink, India will sink with them.

A Sikh family in a refugee camp

Khalistan Roadways

This Khalistani anecdote has been sent to me by Kanwaljit Kaur and Manohar Bhatia. A Khalistan Roadways bus plying between the state's major towns had a Nihang conductor. "Where to?" he asked a young Sikh passenger before issuing him a ticket. "Amritsar," replied the youngster. The Nihang conductor gave him a clout on the head and said, "It is Sri Amritsar Sahib." The youngster quickly corrected himself, "Yes, of course." One for Sri Amritsarji Sahib." The next passenger was a Hindu. "Where to?" asked the Nihang. "Sri Ludhianaji Sahib," replied the other timidly. He too was rewarded with a clout on the head. "Only Ludhiana, no Sri or Sahibji," admonished the Nihang before issuing him a ticket. The third passenger happened to be a wordly wise Marwari. When asked for his destination, he replied: "Nihangji, kindly give me a ticket for Sri Amritsarji Sahib; thereafter I will go on foot to my village." The Nihang was pleased. "If you are not completing your journey by this bus, no need for [illegible] replied the Nihang.



Ode to a Doctor

I came across this charming little doggerel [illegible], my brief sojourn in Hong Kong recently.

Please don't send me to the hospital
I know what will happen.
Hospital will grab my purse,
Switch me [illegible] nurse to nurse,
I'll go from bad to worse,
And end up in a hearse.

"Don't say that's Amsterdam down there already!"

"Yes – KLM's new non-stop flight gets you there so much quicker."

The shortest way to Holland is from Delhi to Amsterdam on KLM's new direct flight. It gets you there in just 9 hours — a whole 2½ hours less than before!

For every passenger flying to Amsterdam from outside Europe, there's Holland-on-the-House* That's one night in Amsterdam all paid for — including breakfast, free entrance to museums and the Casino at Scheveningen, discount rates on canal cruises, city sightseeing and guided tours. Plus major discounts on car rentals, shopping & hotel rates for subsequent nights.

Then there's Win-on-the-Way* for Royal Class and Business Class passengers. If you're in transit and catching an onward flight from Amsterdam the same day, your ticket enters you for a draw in the sky! So when you arrive at Schiphol, you could have won a Volvo Or a brilliantly faceted diamond. Or 15 Dfl worth of tax-free shopping.

As you can see, the best reason to fly KLM to Amsterdam is not just the shortest flight!

* Offered by the Holland Promotion Foundation
Valid upto 31st March 1985

For Information call us at:
Bangalore 28703, Bombay 221013, Calcutta 441221, Delhi 343998 and Madras 86356.

The Reliable Airline KLM Royal Dutch Airlines

CLARION D 386

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Who is Rajiv's Deputy?

There is no number two or three in the union cabinet. All ministers have been listed alphabetically and they take their seats in cabinet meetings accordingly. This is a departure from the past. Indira Gandhi had designated Pranab Mukherjee, former finance minister, as number two and he presided over the cabinet and its sub committee on political affairs in her absence.

It was perhaps an indiscreet remark made by Pranab Mukherjee that put an end to the old practice and has also been responsible for his exit from the government. While returning in the same plane with Rajiv Gandhi on 31 October, soon after hearing about Indira Gandhi's assassination, Mr Mukherjee is reported to have observed that he would automatically be the interim Prime Minister because he was the seniormost and that the election of the party's leader would take place later. That remark has been seen as a betrayal of his ambition.

After Nehru's death, President Radhakrishnan had established the practice of the seniormost cabinet minister becoming an interim Prime Minister and then convening the ruling party's meeting for the election of the leader. Gulzarilal Nanda officiated as Prime Minister after the death of both Nehru and Shastri. However, this time, Rajiv Gandhi was appointed Prime Minister straightaway and the party gave its sanction later.

Nehru did not face the problem of making arrangements when abroad. Initially, Sardar Patel was there and he presided over the cabinet because he was the deputy Prime Minister. After his death, Maulana Abdul Kalam Azad fit in ideally because alphabetically he was on the top, and otherwise too he was so well-known politically that everyone considered him next to Nehru

When Indira Gandhi came to power in 1966, she was politically weak and hence she followed the practice of the seniormost minister looking after her work during her trips abroad. This question did not arise between 1967 and 1969 when Morarji Desai was appointed deputy Prime Minister. However, after he quit, she did not designate either Jagjivan Ram nor Y.B. Chavan, the two stalwarts in her cabinet as the second-in-command. She thought they would sort out the matter between themselves. But this did not happen.

Being alphabetically above Jagjivan Ram, Chavan thought that he had precedence over him. But Jagjivan Ram did not accept it. When the former Prime Minister was abroad once, an urgent meeting of the political affairs committee of the cabinet had to be convened because of the threat by government servants to go on strike. Chavan thought he would preside over the meeting but Jagjivan Ram went around the problem by sitting on the sofa where Chavan was seated. During the entire discussion with other members of the cabinet committee, the two behaved as if both were equal.

When Indira Gandhi returned to power in 1971 after sweeping the polls, she was politically stronger and, therefore, did not adhere to the practice of seniority; she also did not want any of the ministers to be second in line of succession. This, she thought, would give unnecessary edge to one person. She introduced seniority on the basis of alphabetical order but in a different way so as to kill two birds with one stone.

The norm laid down was that the last word of a minister's name would be taken into consideration. Indira Gandhi did so purposely. Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed was the most dependable minister she had. Also, even if he were to serve as number two, she did not anticipate any danger from him. So, he presided over cabinet meetings in her absence. He justified her confidence in him, not only when he was a cabinet minister but also when he was the President during the Emergency. He was the one who signed the notification even before the cabinet's approval, as the Shah Commission's findings indicate.

In the second stint of Prime Ministership from 1980, Indira Gandhi reversed the practice only for Pranab Mukherjee. He had stood by her in the wilderness—Narasimha Rao was not then on the national scene—and though he lost in the 1980 polls, she summoned him from Calcutta to convene the Congress(I) Parliamentary Party meeting, help her form the government, and so on. He was the only defeated candidate who was made a cabinet minister and ultimately raised to the post of finance minister and the number two position.

Why was Pranab thus elevated? How could a person who was only a deputy minister become number two in the cabinet in about a decade? Probably one word explains his meteoric rise: loyalty. But he is no Buta Singh who too, has become cabinet minister by dint of his loyalty. Pranab Mukherjee has intelligence and can converse well, which the former Prime Minister was able to utilise in conducting affairs within the party and without.

It is yet too early to say whether Rajiv Gandhi would have a number two for presiding over urgent cabinet meetings when he goes out of India. But my hunch is that he will have someone, without formally designating him so. During Indira Gandhi's rule, it was felt, that certain matters required immediate attention and could not afford an inordinate delay which her busy itinerary would cause.

It is yet too early to say whether Rajiv Gandhi would have a number two for presiding over urgent cabinet meetings. But my hunch is that he will have someone, without formally designating him

OPINION

Buying Votes

The cover story, The Selling of a Prime Minister (9—15 December '84) made interesting reading. I was astonished at the astronomical sum spent by the Congress(I) to promote its image just before the elections. The Congress(I) usually speaks very highly of its achievements. But actually the contrary is true and hence the need to sell a Prime Minister.
Param Hans Singh, Arrah

• In a poor country like ours, the money spent by the ruling party for publicity campaigns is not only uncalled for, but it should come as a shock to every sensible citizen. In all their advertisements, the Congress(I) has sought the support of the people to build a strong and united India. Just before the elections the ruling party has once again raised the bogey of a foreign force trying to weaken India. May I remind our rulers that India in the past has overcome much more serious problems but has managed to survive. The government should stop raising false alarms.
Anshuman Tiwari, New Delhi

• With the announcement of the date for the general elections, the publicity gimmicks of the Congress(I) and other parties started. The politicians are out with their begging bowls. Here is a nursery rhyme that brings out the mood of the elections:
Hark! Hark! the dogs do bark,
The beggars have come to town
Some gave them black bread, some gave them brown
And some took a horsewhip and drove them out of town.
Lt. Col. S. K. Mushran (Retd), Lucknow

• Rajiv Gandhi's programme to appoint workers all over the country to report on the weaknesses of the party at the grassroots' level is certainly commendable. Nowadays political parties, once they have won an election, tend to forget the masses. The communication gap between a ruling party and the people can only be bridged by dedicated party workers. I am sure Rajiv Gandhi's plans will make the Congress(I) more popular.
Shyamal Gupta, Burdwan

• The report made interesting reading. It was alarming to learn that such a huge sum is being spent to buy votes.
N. Reddy, Hyderabad

Welcome, Amitabh

The Dream Merchants (16-22 December '84) made interesting reading. The people of Allahabad are fed up with dirty politics; they are eagerly waiting for a change. Some people are in the habit of criticising anyone who tries to do something good for the masses. I am sure that Amitabh Bachchan will gradually emerge as a seasoned political leader. What he needs most is encouragement. Let us not discourage him in his effort to serve the people of India.
Bibek Sen, Kalyan Nagar (West Bengal)

• The Congress(I) is inducting cinestars to counter the growing influence of the opposition. But political experience will finally prevail The profiles of the three filmstars contesting the elections were excellent.
Ranjan K. Talcher (Orissa)

• The cover story on filmstars with political ambitions was timely and thought-provoking. Amitabh Bachchan, the superhero of the silver screen, has many things in common with the veteran politician, H.N. Bahuguna. Mr Bahuguna switches from one political party to another with the same dexterity as Amitabh switches from one role to another. Moreover, both are veterans in their respective fields and are endowed with charismatic personalities. Amitabh may be a dwarf in politics but his chances should not be underrated.
Rana Zafar, Calcutta

Criminal Delay

Indira Gandhi was shot at 9.13 am, taken to the AIIMS at 9.43 am and finally to the operation theatre at 10.19 am Over an hour of precious time was lost before she was operated upon. It is quite possible that Indira Gandhi was already dead when the operation began. In comparison, the doctors who operated on President Reagan were amazingly efficient. According to Time magazine, within five minutes of Mr Reagan's arrival at the George Washington University Hospital, he was hooked onto an artificial breathing apparatus, and given intravenous fluids, and his clothes cut off. The doctors also operated his lung to prevent damage to the heart, lung and major blood vessels. Blood transfusion was begun immediately to make up for the loss of blood. All this in a matter of minutes. Mrs Gandhi's aides and the hospital staff could certainly have been a little more efficient.
Santokh Singh Khokhar, Mughalsarai

• Indira Gandhi's aides have been severely criticised for failing to inform the AIIMS of the unexpected arrival of Mrs Gandhi. The emergency section of any hospital, especially a pestigious one like the AIIMS, is expected to maintain a round-the-clock readiness. The criminal delay in operating on Indira Gandhi indicates the casual state of affairs in the hospital. A casualty victim is supposed to get immediate treatment in an emergency ward. One need not be a Prime Minister to draw medical attention.
Dr Ambuj Kamboj, Meerut

Healthy Coverage

Anita Pratap's coverage of the Tamil Nadu chief minister M. G. Ramachandran's illness (A Beloved Hero's Fight for Life, 4-11 November 1984) was exhaustive Her in-depth analysis gave a true picture of the CM's health.
N. Ellango, Tirunelveli, (Tamil Nadu)

Not Revealing

The report on Indira Gandhi's assassination, The Conspiracy, (25 November-1 December 1984) failed to reveal the hidden forces behind the plot.
A. N. Bhattacharya, Calcutta

The Killers of Bhopal

Victims of the Bhopal gas tragedy

Tooshar Pandit's investigation of the Bhopal tragedy (Killer Gas, Callous Carbide, 16—22 December '84) was impressive. The incident reminds me of Hitler's gas chambers or the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki during the Second World War. Instead of shedding crocodile tears, the government should take care of the affected people.
Faiz Ahmed Faizi, Calcutta

• The vivid narration of the Bhopal gas tragedy made painful reading. All such factories using toxic gases or substances should be immediately subjected to safety tests. Such checks should be a routine affair and not carried out only after a tragedy I hope the article serves as an eye-opener to all concerned.
Nirjhar Das Gupta, Calcutta

• The Bhopal tragedy has been rightly termed as the "worst environmental disaster" in the world. Over 3,000 people have lost their lives and the future of triple that number is uncertain. But I was shocked to see Amitabh Bachchan on the cover of that issue. The Bhopal incident certainly deserved a picture on the cover.
Laxmidhar Mohanty, Cuttack

• The government is as much responsible for the Bhopal tragedy as Union Carbide. Safety rules were ignored by the concerned company right under the nose of the government. The pictures with the article were really moving.
G. Panchapakesan, Thanjavur

• The report has left me terrified and stunned. It was astonishing to learn that security rules were flouted at the Bhopal plant of such a well-known company. The Madhya Pradesh government tried to put all the blame for the tragedy on Union Carbide. The MP administration would have come out unscathed but for the efforts of journalists like Tooshar Pandit who rightly pinpointed the MP government's responsibilities.
Surendra Prasad Tripathi, Santragachi (West Bengal)

• The Madhya Pradesh chief minister's behaviour immediately after the Bhopal incident was surprising. It left me wondering as to whether it was an election gimmick. Instead of providing relief to the victims, the CM was more bothered about taking the multinational firm to court Arjun Singh even started refusing help and donations from various agencies.
M. S. Narasimha Murthy, Bangalore

• The behaviour of the Madhya Pradesh chief minister during the incident in Bhopal is condemnable. In that hour of crisis, instead of providing relief to the victims, the CM went around arresting Union Carbide officials. He was more bothered about his chair than the sufferings of the poor.
Dr Antaryami Upadhyay, Singhbhum

• The Madhya Pradesh government was more responsible for the tragedy than Union Carbide. It is astonishing as to how a "killer" plant was allowed to function in a thickly populated area. In our country everything except human lives is costly.
V. N. Narayanaswamy, Madras

Prejudiced

M. J. Akbar's essay, Religion, Life and Death (11-24 November 1984), seemed to be motivated against the Hindus. In his attempt to malign the community, the author has forgotten the qualities of tolerance and mercy which marks out Hindus. Hinduism is secular and hence, fear of Hindu fanaticism is baseless.
Madan Lal, Ranaghat (West Bengal)

Commendable

All the articles about Indira Gandhi in the special issue of SUNDAY (Martyr, 11—24 November 1984) were good. Her last interview, especially, was excellent.
C. V. Geetha, Madras

• The special issue had an attractive cover, an excellent cover story and very good photographs. Unlike the other leading newsmagazines which are highly critical of the ruling party, your positive and objective approach is commendable. Please keep up the journalistic excellence.
Charles John, Trivandrum

Confusing

The Khaas Baat item (2—8 December 1984) regarding Kannada film star Vishnuvardhan being harassed by Rajkumar's fans is misleading. A detailed analysis of the issue would be more welcome than publishing such a short report. Moreover, calling Rajkumar a politician-film-star is absurd. Though his name is often misued by politicians, he has made it clear that he is not interested in politics
Y. G. Siddhartha, Kasibugga

Tewari or Pandey?

It has been disclosed that the columnist of Delhi Diary, D.E. Nizamuddin, is actually Mr Udayan Sharma (Illustrated Weekly, 15 December '84). What about you, Mr M.J. Akbar? Are you too some Tewari or Pandey?
A.H. Khan, Azamgarh

Letters which do not have the full names and addresses of the correspondents will not be considered for publication—Editor

Wanted: Articles With Malice Towards None

The violence after the assassination of Indira Gandhi was unbelievable and must be condemned Khushwant Singh claims that he has realised how the Jews must have felt in Nazi Germany, but has he realised how terror stricken the Hindus in Punjab were for three years?
Ashok Sahdev, New Delhi

• Whatever Khushwant Singh has written about the attack on the Sikh community by violent mobs after Mrs Gandhi's assassination is true and I sympathise with him But it is a matter of regret that instead of exposing the men who masterminded the assassination, Mr Singh has blamed only the two bodyguards
D N Rav, Puri

• Khushwant Singh claims that Mrs Gandhi's "assassination was on the cards after Operation Bluestar' and that "she brought it on her own head" In all his articles and his interviews including the one to the BBC, he has given the impression that he supports Sikh terrorists Such irresponsible statements are dangerous to the integrity of the nation
G Rama Krishna Jharsuguda (Orissa)

• Khushwant Singh writes that Indira Gandhi's assassination was on the cards after Operation Bluestar and that she brought it on her own head He also mentions that the entire community of 12 million Sikhs were branded as criminals for a crime committed by two people These statements are contradictory which only show the confusion that exists in the minds of the members of the Sikh community

First the killing was not an isolated event but a reaction against Operation Bluestar It is a fact that the entire nation, except a section of the Sikhs who were using the Golden Temple as an arsenal appreciated Indira Gandhi's decision to send the army inside the Temple

It is tragic that people like Mr Singh were silent when terrorists were misusing the Temple It only they had raised voices against the terrorists or those who financed them neither the army action, nor the assassination of the PM and its bloody aftermath would have occurred I am yet to see an organised body of Sikhs condemning the jubilation by the Sikhs in the UK or condemning the storage of arms in gurudwaras or the murder of innocent people

Mr Singh has deplored the fact that Sikhs have become second class citizens Till the assassination, the entire nation held the Sikhs in high esteem Even today only the secessionist terrorists are hated
B Ramachandran, Virudhunagar (Tamil Nadu)

• On 2 November a Sikh celebrating Indira Gandhi's death presented me with a laddoo and two chocolates I returned the sweets and requested him to "export" them to Ethiopia Do the Sikhs still deserve any sympathy?
Ram Mohan Paliyath, Cochin

• I have gone through the anti Hindu outbursts by Khushwant Singh in two successive issues of SUNDAY (25 November 1 December and 2 December 8 December 1984) It is unfortunate that such provocative articles are allowed to be published Khushwant Singh has described in detail how innocent Sikhs were slaughtered after Indira Gandhi's death I wonder how such a celebrated columnist could have forgotten the plight of the Hindus in Punjab during the days of Bhindranwale This confirms my belief that Mr Singh reacts only when his life is in danger or his community is in trouble

All secular forces throughout the country have strongly condemned the violence perpetrated on innocent Sikhs, and Indian democracy survived only because of Hindu Sikh amity which even Bhindranwale could not break
B D Chatterjee, Pakhanjore (Madhya Pradesh)

• I fully agree with Khushwant Singh's views of the riots in Delhi Mr Singh and the Sikh community deserves our sympathy But his assessment of the situation is one sided Many Sikhs in Cuttack danced on the streets and shouted pro Khalistan slogans after Mrs Gandhi was assassinated
B Banerjee, Keonjhar (Orissa)

• Had Mr Khushwant Singh dared to condemn the genocide of the Hindus in Punjab, we could have appreciated his article on the killing of Sikhs But Mr Singh has been very partisan and not lived up to his duty as a journalist
A S N Murthy, Bangalore

• There is no doubt that only two Sikhs were responsible for the assassination of Indira Gandhi But there were Sikhs in England and the USA who celebrated the murder with champagne Will Khushwant Singh condemn their actions?
Hitlal Hazarika Majuli (Assam)

• It is surprising that Khushwant Singh has been writing articles full of malice and hatred However bitter he may feel after the anti Sikh riots, he should realise that thousands of patriotic Indians continue to support their Sikh brethren In recent years the Sikh community has alienated itself from the national mainstream for narrow sectarian causes. Even the Sikh moderates who are against extremism have been silent spectators The five head priests who did not preseve the sanctity of the Golden Temple are respected leaders today
Rohit Singh Bhopal

• The Sikhs feel that it is their birthright to kill Hindus indiscriminately and convert a shrine into an armoury Even intellectuals like Khushwant Singh did not raise their voices in protest against the killing of thousands of Hindus in Punjab He failed to understand the simple theory for every action there is an equal and opposite reaction
Barun Chakravarty, Calcutta

Want Help?

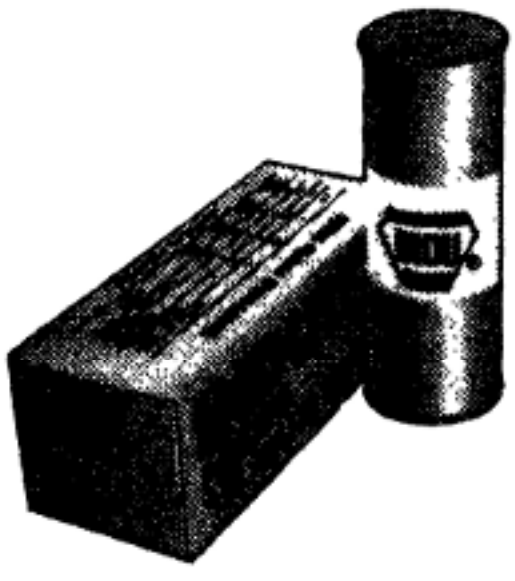
In April '84 after a three-year long struggle I won a case against the Bombay Housing Board which had asked me to vacate my house since I did not pay rent for two years I had argued in court, without any help from lawyers, that I did not pay the rent as the Board had not paid heed to my repeated requests for vital repairs of the house If any housing board tenant or their association anywhere in the country wishes to have a copy of the judgment or my advice, they are welcome to write to me
C Antony Louis, 18/528 Nehru Nagar, Bombay 24

Last Letter

If a workman dies on duty, his son is employed immediately on compassionate grounds So, what was the harm in Rajiv Gandhi becoming the Prime Minister after his mother's death?
Rudhra Dutta Satapathi, Rourkela.

"Will it bite?"

Random memories. Life is full of them. Memories of happiness, love, pride and fun. Fleeting moments that you just have to capture. They can happen any time. They may not happen again.



Take a picture.

In black and white.

Only black and white pictures don't fade for years and years.

Keep the pictures in the family album.

Later, you can share your memories. And relive the happy times.

Capture the moment

INDU

Indu Roll Film and Bromides

Sista's-HPF.238 84.M

Rajiv Gandhi being sworn in as the Prime Minister of India by President Zail Singh

The New Wave Government

The cabinet is a judicious blend of youth and experience

31 December in New Delhi is usually chilly. This year the New Year's eve was colder. The temperature was below normal. The glittering Ashoka Hall of the Rashtrapati Bhavan,, where the new council of ministers led by the triumphant young Prime Minister, Rajiv Gandhi, was being sworn in, had one person sweating profusely. The joy of the large assemblage was not reflected on his face. Arun Kumar Nehru, the person who had been assumed by many to be the number two man in the Rajiv Gandhi hierarchy, had been sworn in as a minister of state, under the charge of a cabinet minister. Sheila Kaul, maternal aunt of Mrs Indira Gandhi, was not in the list. Pranab Kumar Mukherjee, the number two man in the Indira Gandhi team, had been dropped. The controversial railway minister of the outgoing cabinet, Abu Barkat Ataul Ghani Khan Choudhury, whose quarrels at the state politics level with Pranab Mukherjee and with minister of state C.K. Jaffer Sharief in the railway ministry were famous, too was not in the list. Jaffer Sharief, despite having defeated Janata Party stalwart George Fernandes in the elections, was also excluded, perhaps because his quarrels with Ghani Khan Choudhury were found embarrassing. The outgoing civil supplies minister, Bhagwad Jha Azad, in whose regime the supply price of wheat to the flour mills had been reduced but maida, sooji and bread prices had remained static, too was missing. The new wave government, which had been swept into power by a tidal bore, was being sworn in.

Many, including this correspondent, had voiced doubts about Rajiv Gandhi's ability to run a government. But the way in which the new council of ministers was constituted, made these doubts look not only unfounded but also frivolous. The Prime Minister had responded to the massive mandate of the people by giving the nation a clean and efficient cabinet as the New Year's gift. The ministry-making exercise had been undertaken by him quietly and the first strides as the newly elected Prime Minister were confident. The swearing-in was at 5.15 pm. The ministerial probables received phonecalls only at 4.45 pm and were asked to report to Rashtrapati Bhavan. Till he reached the Ashoka Hall, even Arun Nehru did not know what post he was getting. No portfolios were announced initially, with the new ministers being asked to assemble for a cabinet meeting at 6.45 pm. In the three quarters of an hour which lapsed between the swearing-in cermony and the maiden cabinet meeting, numerous phonecalls poured in at the offices of the newspapers and news agencies, from aides of the new ministers, enquiring about the allocation of portfolios. Among those who telephoned the Press Trust of India was an aide of Arun Nehru. Even he was in the dark about the formation of the new wave government.

As the powerful AICC general secretary, Arun Nehru was Rajiv Gandhi's Achilles heel. His arrogant behaviour annoyed many partymen. Since the death of Mrs Indira Gandhi, after Rajiv Gandhi appointed Arun Nehru as party general secretary in his own place (when he became the Congress president), Arun Nehru had assumed the number two position in the new team. Some people had even started looking to Arun Nehru as an alternate leader. And a vast majority of partymen, aghast at the way this business executive-turned-political-manager was trying to dominate the party, turned to Rajiv Gandhi with helpless looks. Senior leaders like Vishwanath Pratap Singh and Narayan Dutt Tiwari sank their differences in Uttar Pradesh politics, albeit temporarily, to provide a joint front against the onslaught of Arun Nehru. By appointing Arun Nehru as a minister of state without independent charge (this is a third-level post, after cabinet ministers and ministers of state with independent charge), Rajiv Gandhi showed his partymen that he was not going to treat anyone as being more equal than the rest because of kinship.

The dropping of Sheila Kaul too was guided by this consideration, though she was an efficient minister and is known for her good behaviour. By Arun Nehru's appointment as a Union minister, many senior partymen were pleased. Even among the youth, many who were acting as surrogates to Arun Nehru because they thought he wielded the authority of Rajiv Gandhi, looked relieved. The son of a senior cabinet minister, who was sitting close to this correspondent during the Ashoka Hall ceremony, loudly whispered to a party leader, "So Arun Nehru will be under a cabinet minister!" When he was leaving the Ashoka Hall to join the tea party in the adjoining room, the sweat on Arun Nehru face was too visible. He was trying to force a smile now and then, but the message which Rajiv Gandhi wanted to convey by appointing him as a minister of state was loud and clear.

When the portfolios were allocated later that evening, Arun Nehru got power, under the overall charge of cabinet minister B Shankaranand, who will be the irrigation and power minister. Arun Nehru is bound to be the dominant minister, with Shankaranand toeing his line, but he will confine his powerful presence to the power ministry's office, Shram Shakti Bhavan, on Rafi Marg. The other magnificent buildings, which house the offices of the government of India, will not be within his bounds, as would have been the case if he were to remain as the dominant AICC general secretary. But while cutting Arun Nehru to size, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had taken his professional competence as a good manager, especially while working for Jenson and Nicholson, into account. Power is an overworked department and the government's performance will be dependent on the performance of the ministry of power in a big way in the days to come. Major projects are on the anvil. His competence as a minister may be useful to the government.

Like Arun Nehru, the new government has three other professionals-turned-politicians as ministers. Former ambassador to China and the USA, K.R. Narayanan (planning), distinguished diplomat Kanwar Natwar Singh (steel) and Madhavrao Scindia (railways) have kindled high hopes of good performance in their respective ministries. Similarly, the appointment of a distinguished parliamentarian like Margaret Alva as the minister of state for parliamentary affairs shows that performance and ability have been taken into account in the process of ministry-making. Former Andhra Pradesh chief minister, T. Anjaiah, returns as the minister of state (independent charge) for labour, the post he held before he was sent to Hyderabad as chief minister. He began his career as a six-anna-a-day worker in the Hyderabad Allwyn Metal Works and later became a leading trade unionist.

Rajiv Gandhi's council of ministers at the swearing-in ceremony at the Rashtrapati Bhavan. (From left): Buta Singh, H.K.L. Bhagat, K.C. Pant, P.V. Narasimha Rao, Rao Birendra Singh, S.B. Chavan, Mohsina Kidwai, Vasant Sathe and V.P. Singh

His tenure as labour minister in Andhra had seen many revolutionary changes in the trade union field, like the introduction of secret ballots in the factory unions. As labour minister in the centre earlier, he had initiated many schemes, which he will now have to resurrect from the dusty shelves of the ministry. Datta Samant, the militant trade union leader of Maharashtra (who is now an independent member of the Lok Sabha) was firmly tackled by Anjaiah in his last tenure. When a team of industrialists and workers affected by Samant's high handedness had approached him, Anjaiah had asked the then chief minister of Maharashtra, A.R. Antulay, to use the National Security Act and arrest Samant. The eminent barrister, late Rajni Patel, had to go to the Esplanade Courts in Bombay to get Samant released then. Anjaiah as labour minister, therefore, holds out promise.

P.V. Narasimha Rao taking the oath of office and secrecy

The induction of the new cabinet ministers has been carefully planned. To begin with, by reverting back to the system of naming the ministers in the alphabetical order, the Prime Minister has discarded the system of having the leader of the party in the Rajya Sabha as the number two person in the cabinet. Pranab Mukherjee had been given this predominant position by Mrs Indira Gandhi after she made him the finance minister in 1982. Now, the leader of the Rajya Sabha, Vishwanath Pratap Singh, has been made the finance minister and a member of the all-powerful cabinet committee on political affairs (CCPA). But the job of presiding over cabinet meetings in the absence of the Prime Minister from the capital is being given to defence minister P.V. Narasimha Rao by virtue of the cabinet minister with the longest standing. Besides V.P. Singh and Narasimha Rao, home minister Shankarrao Chavan is the other member of the CCPA, presided over by the Prime Minister himself. Of these, only Narasimha Rao was in the last CCPA. Pranab Mukherjee has been altogether dropped. There is a likelihood of former CCPA member Shiv Shanker, who lost from Andhra Pradesh, being asked to contest the byelection from Chail (reserved) constituency near Allahabad. (The poll was countermanded due to the death of Congress-I candidate, Union minister of state Dharamveer.) After he wins a byelection, Shiv Shanker's induction into the cabinet and possibly again into the CCPA can be expected. (Already, in the appointment of Hans Raj Bhardwaj as minister of state for law, a triumph for Shiv Shanker is being noticed).

Vishwanath Pratap Singh as the union finance minister is bad news for the wheeler-dealers who abound the capital. He has the bad reputation of being a person who does not entertain individual requests. As union commerce minister earlier (before he was sent as president of the Uttar Pradesh Congress Committee) he had refused to meet any individual industrialist. He did not take even the official bungalow he was entitled to. Instead he lived in his own apartment in a multistoreyed building near Greater Kailash in South Delhi and refused to have official engagements at home. He took two modest rooms in the Vitthalbhai Patel House, and met people there for two hours after 7.30 am, before shifting to his office in the Udyog Bhavan.

Vitthalbhai Patel House is a hostel for junior members of Parliament and government officers. If anyone unsavoury had gone to meet commerce minister, V.P. Singh there, then it would have become the gossip of the town within minutes. The IENS building, which houses the offices of most outstation newspapers and is the meeting place for journalists round the day, is across the road from Vitthalbhai Patel House. No gossip reached IENS building about the goings-on in the visitors' room of the then commerce minister. The beef tallow scandal broke during V.P. Singh's tenure in the commerce ministry and he handled it gracefully. As chief minister of UP, the post which he took up in June 1980, V.P. Singh did not prove to be an able administrator. The anti-dacoity campaign saw many innocents being killed in false encounters staged by the police, who wanted to win laurels from a chief minister who was obsessed with anti-dacoity operations. The Moradabad riots and the Behmai massacre were the dark spots of his tenure in Lucknow. He resigned his post voluntarity after one such massacre and earned the admiration of the people. V.P. Singh's failure on the law and order front was totally offset by his clean image. He was accused of inefficient administration in UP, but not of corruption. To have selected such a man to be the finance minister certainly enhances the Prime Minister's prestige. V.P. Singh has a popular following among his partymen in UP. By Arun Singh's and V.P. Singh's respective appointments, in one stroke Rajiv Gandhi has pleased the majority of his partymen in UP, a state which has returned 82 members to the Lok Sabha.

The overuse of the army for civilian duties has become a problem for the government. The fourth pay commission has been receiving feelers from the services for better terms of service for the officers in uniform than civilians. There is also talk that the order of precedence should be changed so as to make the generals above the secretaries to the government. In such a juncture, an able civilian administrator is required in the defence ministry. P.V. Narasimha Rao fits the bill. While the army has to be used to the nation's advantage, the interests of the rest of the government employees and other sections of society cannot be overlooked. Narasimha Rao is one person who can use his diplomatic skills to do the kind of tightrope walking which the defence minister will now be expected to do. Unfortunately, no junior minister has been assigned to him. Since the days of Jawaharlal Nehru, defence production used to be under a minister of state, a practice discarded by the Janata regime. India's defence production base is vast and multifaceted. One wonders if the cabinet minister alone will be able to look after the large ministry which defence is.

S.B. Chavan as home minister has been a good choice. Like V.P. Singh and Narasimha Rao, he too has a clean image. He has been the chief minister of a large state like Maharashtra. His first priority would be to solve the difficult Punjab problem. Jammu and Kashmir and Punjab have to be viewed together. The mistake of removing Farooq Abdullah's government in Jammu and Kashmir cannot be overlooked now. The popular mandate in all the three seats of the Kashmir valley, which is the dominant part of the state, has gone in favour of Farooq Abdullah. There can be no stability in Punjab without normalcy in Kashmir. S.B. Chavan will have before him the option of letting Farooq rule again (by the Congress-I withdrawing support to Ghulam Mohammad Shah) or of holding fresh elections in the state, as demanded by the National Conference (Farooq). Holding elections in Punjab is being opposed by a powerful lobby, which has the opinion of the army topbrass lined up behind it. But Punjab without a popular government will continue to be a trouble-spot.

Elections in Assam too should be held. It is a shame that in the entire seventh Lok Sabha there was no popular representation from a large part of this state because some people, who apparently do not have faith in democracy or in national integrity, have been holding the government to ransom on the question of electoral rolls. If the Rajiv Gandhi regime wants to show its strength, then the problem of Assam has to be solved along with Punjab and the people there allowed to exercise their franchise. A government held to ransom by threats in a one state of the union cannot project a strong image in the rest of the country.

There has been some criticism in the press regarding the appointment of Bansi Lal as the railway minister. Suddenly the ghost of the Emergency is seen when a person like Bansi Lal is elevated. If the people accept the regime of Mrs Indira Gandhi, with Sanjay Gandhi as the dominant person next to her in the 1980 elections, then unnecessarily crying wolf at the sight of Bansi Lal cannot be justified. It is true that he was a hawk in the Emergency regime. But then he was elected to the Lok Sabha in 1980 and in 1984 he led the Congress(I) to a victory in all the seats in Haryana, considered to be stronghold of Devi Lal, presently in the DMKP, formerly of the Janata Party (a veteran of many defections). Bansi Lal as the chairman of the Parliamentary Estimates Committee in the years he was kept out of power (1980-85) made the committee produce more reports than any previous chairman. He may be rough, but he is efficient. If Haryana has progressed, Bansi Lal has a fair share of credit to corner. As the defence minister, he acquitted himself well. One incident would illustrate how efficient a minister he was when he held the defence portfolio.

SUNDAY had reported in 1982 how the Main Battle Tank (MBT) project of the army has been dragging along since the early Seventies, without any success. The then defence minister, R. Venkataraman, the present vice-president of India, made a commitment on the floor of Parliament that the indigenous Main Battle Tank would roll out by the end of 1982 and an offensive was launched against our report. Unsavoury suggestions about our motives were made in motivated reports in the press and in private conversations of the minister. But 1984 is over and the tank is nowhere in sight. A prototype, fitted with foreign components was praised by Venkataraman as the "indigenous tank." Way back in 1976, Bansi Lal, who may not be a suave and sophisticated as the elder statesmen from Tamil Nadu, had visited the establishment at Avadi where the project was on. When he had been shown mere drawings and no tangible results, he had chided the officers. Six years later, his successor, Venkataraman, could not see through the game which the efficient Bansi Lal had detected in 1976.

Sondeep Shankar

Finance minister V.P. Singh (left) and defence minister S.B. Chavan

As railway minister, Bansi Lal's efficiency combined with his firmness is bound to improve the government's image. It may be said that it was fascist Benito Mussolini who equated the performance of the government with the train timings. The common man notices the running of trains, which affects him and is not concerned with higher things. To this extent, the running of trains on time is important. The previous minister, Ghani Khan Choudhury, had improved the passenger services. At least in Delhi, the booking office was streamlined and tickets on trunk routes were available at short notice. But he carried on his fight against the bureaucracy to a personal extent. So much so that railway board chairman Raghavan, once Ghani Khan's blue-eyed person, became a villain on the election eve and the minister wanted him sacked. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had intervened and reversed the minister's orders. Perhaps one of the reasons which contributed to Ghani Khan's exclusion from the cabinet was the way in which he dealt with the officers. Bansi Lal's firmness combined with the imaginative approach of his minister of state, Madhavrao Scindia, can improve the functioning of the railways

Abdul Ghafoor, who by virtue of the alphabetical list, is placed next to the Prime Minister in the cabinet list, is a seasoned politician A former chief minister of Bihar, he had gone out of Mrs Indira Gandhi's party had returned two years back. He was made a general secretary of the AICC last year and his inclusion being projected as the party's Muslim leader.

Ghafoor, who was at his hotel, was summoned by Kesri over the telephone to the Shanmukhananda Hall and sent to the CWC meeting. On the day of the swearing-in of the new wave team, Kesri quietly sat in the last row of the distinguished gathering at the Ashoka Hall, flanked by AICC general secretary G. Karuppiah Moopanar, Bombay party chief Murli Deora and youth Congress general secretaries Anand Sharma and Debaprasad Roy. When Abdul Ghafoor's name was called out, Kesri beamed Why was Arun Nehru sitting in the last row of seats where the ministers designate sat, he was asked. "Let us see, everything would become clear soon," he replied.

In Abdul Ghafoor's selection, a portion of Rajiv Gandhi's maiden address to a Congress session became relevant At the Bombay AICC, some important task.

K.C. Pant has become the cabinet minister for education. Margaret Alva, who was largely responsible for the formation of the "Mahila Congress," has become a minister. Rajiv Gandhi would have liked former West Bengal chief minister, Siddhartha Shankar Ray to get a party ticket. But both Pranab Mukherjee and Ghani Khan Choudhury opposed this. Ray contested as an independent candidate from Darjeeling and finished a poor third. The results show that if Ray had been the Congress candidate, then the CPI(M) could not have wrested this seat. If that were so, then in West Bengal both the CPI(M) and the Congress would have won 17 seats each in the Lok Sabha (the Congress now has 16) and the psychological impact of this on the state's politics can be well-imagined. While Rajiv Gandhi had allowed his senior party colleagues

Minister of state for steel Natwar Singh (extreme left) with Congress(I) MPs Vyjayanthimala and Sunil Dutt

as the works and housing minister is a good choice While A.B.A Ghani Khan Choudhury is popular in Malda, West Bengal, he cannot be said to represent the Muslims. Abdul Ghafoor's stars had been on the ascendence since October 1983, when the AICC session was held at Bombay Abdur Rehman Antulay had suddenly been made an invitee to the working committee meetings There was resentment by some partymen, particularly Maharashtra chief minister Vasantdada Patil The wily treasurer of AICC, Sitaram Kesri, mooted the idea that Abdul Ghafoor be made an invitee as well, so that while Vasantdada Patil was pacified an impression would not grow that Antulay was he had described the party as a banyan tree, which was about to be a hundred years old. Referring to those who had left the party over the years, he said the tree had shed many leaves and many branches had sprouted from its roots. With this indication by Rajiv Gandhi, a phase began when people who had left the Congress of Mrs Gandhi due to differences either with her or primarily with late Sanjay Gandhi, were given importance again. Besides Abdul Ghafoor, A.K Anthony was made an AICC general secretary last year. West Bengal'swell-known youth leader, Priya Ranjan Das Munshi, who has returned to Parliament after a lapse of seven years, is bound to get to go against his wishes on the poll eve, he may also have remembered the Ray episode also while dropping Mukherjee and Choudhury from his cabinet.

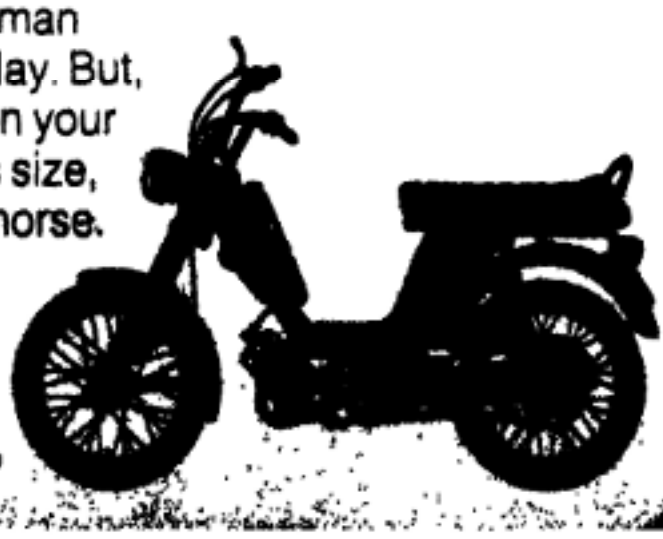
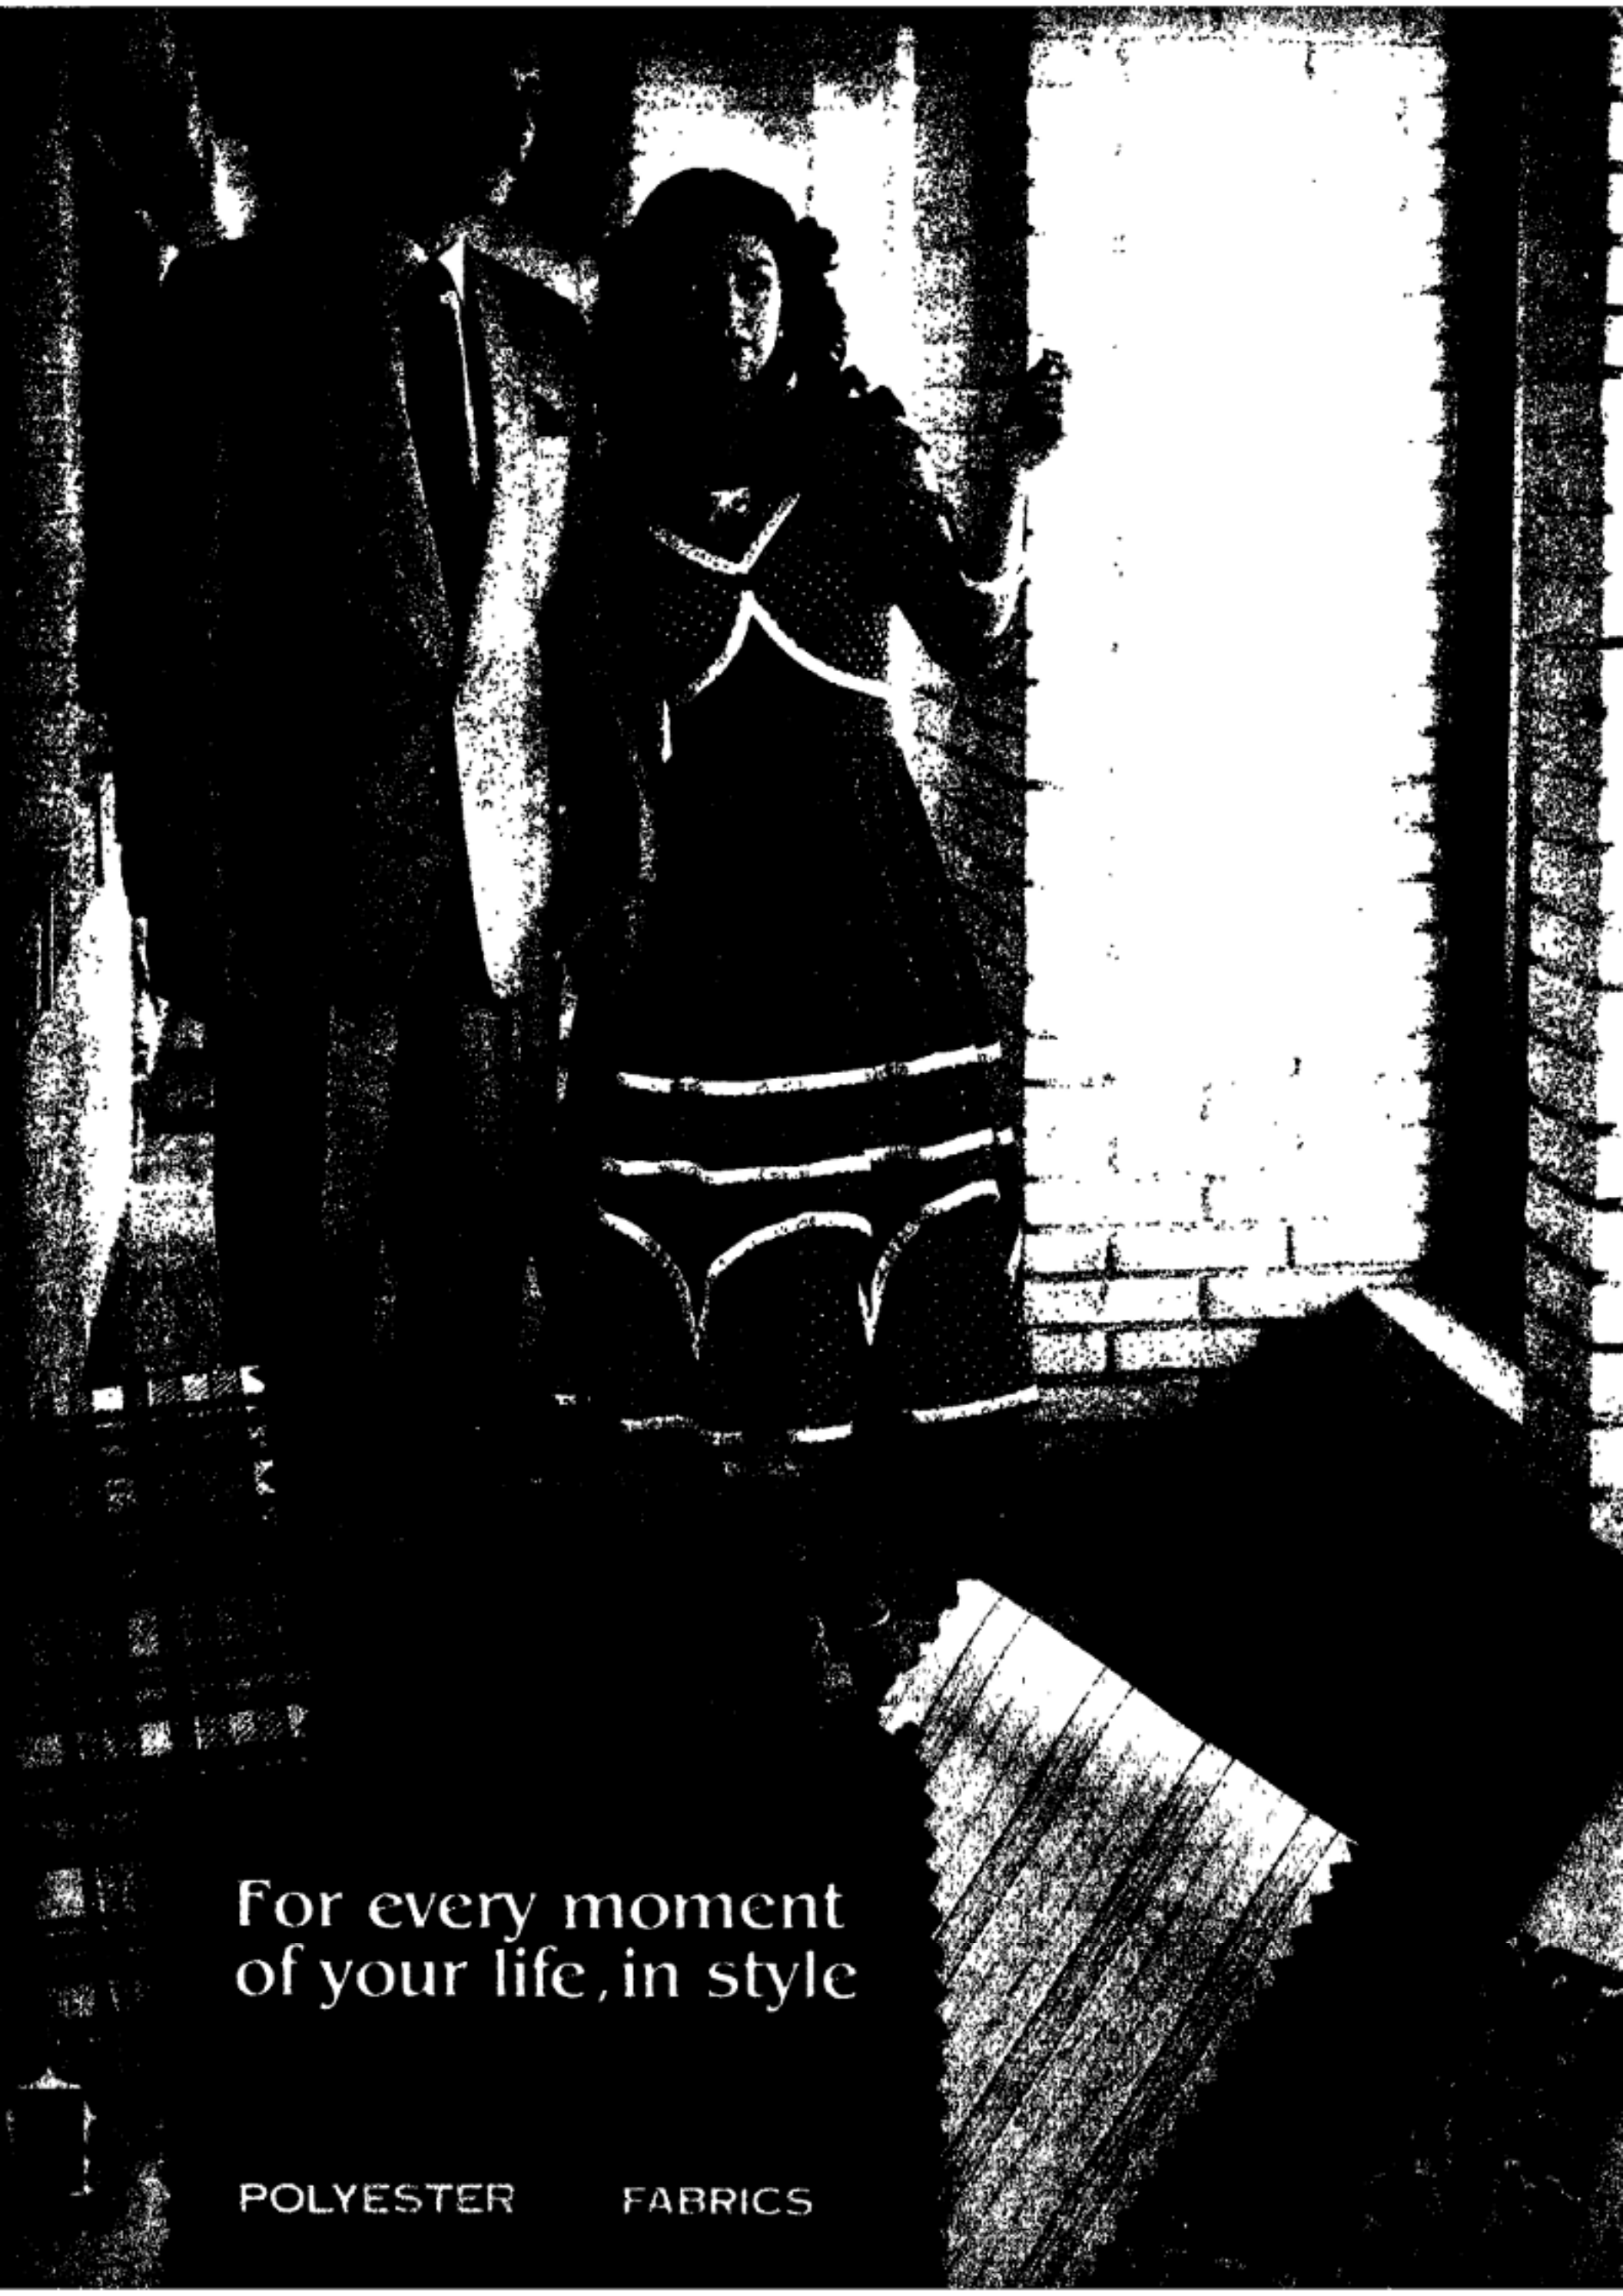
Among the old organisational faces, a young lawyer from Madras, P. Rangarajan Kumaramangalam, a former president of the National Students' Union of India and later a Youth Congress leader, has won from Salem. Son of former minister Mohan Kumaramangalam, Rangarajan has of late been active in the trade union field. He may be among the old hands which Rajiv Gandhi may like to put to work soon.



Of the Youth Congress leaders, both Arif Mohammad Khan and Ghu-

Smart guys know how to conserve energy.



A TVS 50 XL can save you a lot more than you think.

There's an easy way of saving yourself a lot of trouble.And still do your bit for easing the Fuel Crisis. Listen to a man who knows. "I do a lot of running around every day. But, no sweat. It's real easy going on my TVS. Easy on your pocket. Easy on your poor feet. You know, for its size, the TVS sure carries a lot of weight. Sturdy as a horse. And it can trot along, even up a slope, at quite a lively pace. And just look at its vital statistics. 60 km. per litre. A max. speed of 45 kmph. And a payload of 135 kg. Best of all, I no longer have a 'wait' problem. Catch me chasing a bus!"

TVS 50 XL

We make it better

For every moment of your life, in style
POLYESTER FABRICS

lam Nabi Azad have been retained. Arif has been given the important portfolio of industry and company affairs. Ghulam Nabi is in parliamentary affairs. Two other youth leaders, Oscar Fernandes and Ahmed Patel, have become parliamentary secretaries. There are many Youth Congress MPs now. IYC president Tariq Anwar has been reelected from Katihar in Bihar. He might continue in the organisational post, unless inducted into the government. Himachal Pradesh does not have any ministers at present. The former Himachal tourism minister Chandresh Kumari, who has come to the Lok Sabha now or youth leader and youngest ever Rajya Sabha member Anand Sharma might figure in the race for a government position.

The return of Yogendra Makwana to the ministry will be welcomed. He proved his mettle in the days as the minister of state for home under Gyani Zail Singh in the 1980-81 period. Many problems of the home ministry began with his exit from the ministry. He has been assigned the portfolio of health. Mohsina Kidwai is the cabinet minister above him.

N.K.P. Salve's exclusion has surprised many. Perhaps he was devoting more time to the organisational matters in the Cricket Control Board than in the steel ministry. Vasant Sathe, the proponent of the presidential form of government, is being assisted by Natwar Singh in steel, mines and coal. Vasant Sathe has made it clear that steel would entirely be looked after by the junior minister. The bifurcation of the energy ministry, sending coal to steel and mines, linking power with his old department, irrigation and separating petroleum will make administration of these departments simple. Similarly, the delinking of company affairs from law and justice (now placed under the respected barrister and former law minister, Ashok Sen) and linking it with industry is a step towards streamlining the administration. The creation of a separate ministry for women and social welfare under Congress parliamentary board member Margathan Chandrashekhar and assigning sports to a junior minister (Joychandra Singh) may show that sports will not occupy the cabinet's time to the extent it did in the past few years (while no tangible results were produced apart from the cricket World Cup win).

The information and broadcasting portfolio has been given to V.N. Gadgil, minister of state with independent charge. Gadgil was a good parliamentarian till he became the minister for defence production in the Emergency (under Bansi Lal). He opposed Sanjay Gandhi after the 1977 debacle. "A 92-year-old party has been destroyed by a 29-year-old boy," Gadgil had thundered in the AICC session held in New Delhi's Mavlanker Hall in May 1977. He returned to the Congress(I) later and Mrs Gandhi had given him the communications portfolio. He has a clean image. His tenure in the information and broadcasting ministry may produce some good copy for journalists, as illustrated above.

What will be the direction of the new wave government? In his Bombay AICC speech, Rajiv Gandhi had said that he laid emphasis on the fact that 75 per cent of the country's population was below the age of 40. Sixtythree per cent of the electorate which elected him with the largest ever mandate for an Indian leader was of this age group. The hopes kindled, therefore, are not only great, but they have been kindled in young hearts. This is an age group where heartburning comes easily. Massive administrative reforms may be necessary before the government can move in a particular direction. The fact that K.P. Singh Deo has been assigned the department of personnel and administrative reforms shows that some major changes are on the cards. With the departure of R.K. Dhawan and the entire old team of Mrs Indira Gandhi's personal staff (including personal physician, Dr K.P. Mathur) Rajiv Gandhi seems to have decided to begin on a clean slate after making a clean sweep at the hustings.

The appointment of three parliamentary secretaries is significant. Now there is a political bureaucracy, with a clean image, which will exercise the powers of the Prime Minister. In the USA and in France the system is somewhat similar. Rajiv Gandhi, without changing into the presidential form of government for the present, seems to be moving away from the British administrative system, which is now in vogue, to the systems closer to the American and French ones. V. George, his personal aide, will take Dhawan's position, but the powers enjoyed by Dhawan may never be given to George. In the USA there must be some person holding the post of private secretary to the American President. But he becomes a controversial figure. In George, Rajiv Gandhi has an aide who can be efficient without getting into controversies. A new wave government has been launched with high hopes. But hopes are the biggest enemy of those who do not perform well. In his ministry-making, Rajiv Gandhi has shown that he is an able Prime Minister. The performance of this ministry is what will matter ultimately, not its initial, glittering, image.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, Delhi

The Secret List

How secret was the list of new ministers kept on 31 December? Though phone calls went out to ministerial probables around 4.45 pm that day, they were only told to come to the Ashoka Hall. At Rashtrapati Bhavan, the cabinet secretary Krishnaswamy Rao Sahib was heard exclaiming to the principal secretary to the Prime Minister, Dr P.C. Alexander, "So, even you don't know?"

Two minutes before Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi reached the Ashoka Hall (the message must have been flashed as soon as his car entered Rashtrapati Bhavan) Dr Alexander took out some typed sheets from his pocket and beckoned to the ministerial probables asking them to move to the box meant for the ministers designate, to the left of the President's chair.

They all filed in one by one. When Arun Nehru reached the box, he was politely told to take a seat in the back rows, meant for the juniormost ministers.

Dungarpur

Arun Nehru

Why the Opposition Lost

It was a vote for the integrity of the country

"Whenever you see colour, think of us" This copyline was made famous for the paint firm, Jenson and Nicholson (which employed Arun Nehru till 1981), by the advertising agency, Rediffusion (which was hired by the Congress-I for the poll campaign). Ironically, this may well become the opposition's punchline in the eighth Lok Sabha. The leader of the largest opposition group, the Telugu Desam, N.T. Rama Rao, has directed his party MPs to don yellow clothes when they sit in Parliament. The 28 members in yellow clothes will form the largest section of the 106 member opposition and sit on the extreme left of the House. The next largest group will be the CPI-M, with 22 members. The former ruling party, Janata, with ten members would have the satisfaction of not being among the single-digit representations in the House. The CPI with six, the Congress(S) with four, the Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party (DMKP) with three, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) with two and the Congress(J) with its lone member, Babu Jagjivan Ram, will form a part of the opposition.

Farooq Abdullah's National Conference has won the same number of seats as the DMKP and one more than the BJP—the two national parties which had sabotaged opposition unity moves in 1983 by prematurely launching the National Democratic Alliance and thus tried to "dominate" the opposition scene by putting a self-styled fait accompli before the rest of the opposition parties. By some poetic justice, the DMKP has won three seats—to symbolise the dalit, the mazdoor and the kisan which this party wanted to represent. None of the Janata Party defectors who jumped on the Chaudhary Charan Singh bandwagon on 2 October last year and launched the DMKP have been returned. The Janata Party, which was considered as the "weakling" among opposition parties, has not only won ten seats, but has picked up seats from Kerala, Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka, Maharashtra, Bihar and Orissa, thus reflecting a national character.

The Congress(S), the other "untouchable" in the eyes of the "dominant" leaders, has picked up seats from Kerala, Andhra Pradesh and Maharashtra. The BJP has been routed in its bastions, Delhi, Himachal Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh. The seat from Andhra Pradesh which the BJP has won is courtesy the Telugu Desam. Only from Gujarat has it picked up a seat on its own. The CPI(M) has fared poorly in its bastions, West Bengal and Kerala. In Kerala, the CPI(M)-led front has been almost routed, the party itself picking up only one seat. In West Bengal, the Left Front has faced humiliation, the Congress(I) having picked up 16 of the 42 seats. The non-CPI(M) partners of the Left Front, CPI, Forward Bloc and the Revolutionary Socialist Party have not fared poorly in West Bengal This perhaps shows that the vote was primarily against the CPI(M).

Illustration Bulbul Sharma

The opposition has been censured by the people. Whatever explanation one may try to provide now, the nation has with a resounding mandate said that it would not tolerate disintegration either of the country or of the political system. The opposition till today is paying the price for the failure of the Janata experiment. In 1977, the people had given the non-Congress parties a mandate to rule the country for a five year term. Due to the Janata split in July 1979 the people got an opportunity to change the government earlier than the constitutionally stipulated five year period. The reelection of Mrs Indira Gandhi in 1980 in effect meant acceptance of the role which she assigned to her sons, at first Sanjay Gandhi and later Rajiv Gandhi. In voting for the Congress, the people voted for stability. The failure of the opposition to provide a one-to-one fight, or even to put up candidates with the same manifesto in all the constituencies of this vast country, was seen by the people as a sign of weakness.

It would be wrong to say that the Congress(I) won because of a "Hindu backlash," as is being said by a large section of the press. Such a backlash would have been possible if the Hindus were communal per se. But Hinduism by its very nature is secular. Had it not been so, then India would not have been the only country outside the communist world which does not have a state religion. If India is secular, then it is because the majority wants it to remain so. And the majority in this country comprises Hindus. The backlash, if any, was national. When Hindus were being killed in Punjab, there was no backlash.

Only when the Prime Minister was assassinated did the nation stand up to the occasion.

The 1984 verdict is a verdict for national integration The opposition parties were unable to defend themselves when Rajiv Gandhi attacked them for their sympathy for the Akali Dal In a secular country one wonders if any political party can be guided by high priests, as is the case with the Akali Dal The references by Rajiv Gandhi to the Anandpur Sahib resolution in his speeches may not have been understood by the masses, but they understood one thing: the integrity of the nation was being imperilled by a particular section of the people in a sensitive border state. The verdict was given against the opposition because they could not explain why the Akali Dal had not been censured by them for having failed to stop Khalistan slogans being raised in Punjab The opposition itself started saying that it was going to provide a coalition government, if elected The Janata experience was such that the people could not accept this line either

That brings us to the question whether the opposition has realised its mistakes The Janata Party's firebrand general secretary, George Fernandes has said that with the parliamentary forum not available to the opposition extra parliamentary fora would be sought to represent people's grievances The opposition certainly has to keep the government under pressure But when the people give a parliamentary mandate, talk of extra parliamentary fora within a week of the results being declared may not be representing the mood of the people. The Karnataka chief minister, Ramakrishna Hegde, has said that unity efforts should be abandoned and the opposition parties should come together on a programmatic basis. This is a sane suggestion, coming from a person who has created high standards of political morality by resigning soon after the Janata Party fared badly in the Lok Sabha polls in his state. (Not only that, in the caretaker government, which he formed at the request of the Governor, he did not include any of the five ministers who had lost the Lok Sabha polls)

But will the opposition be able to unite on issues of ideology? Will the personality and ego problems be overcome? These are the problems of a generation of leaders who are octogenarians and septuagenarians. The 1984 mandate has ousted this generation. Only people like Hegde and Chandra Shekhar, who are in their late Fifties, can hope to offer a challenge to the young Prime Minister. The way the government is being run initially, for the first six months it may be prudent for the opposition to let Rajiv Gandhi exercise the might of the mandate he has received After six months, if there are lapses, the opposition would be within its rights to jump into the fray all over again and point out to the people the fallacy of their judgment.

Illustration: Bulbul Sharma

When trends of the results came in on 28 December, the first major opposition leader to win was K.P. Unnikrishnan of the Congress(S) from Badagara in Kerala. This was also a somewhat poetic verdict. Unnikrishnan had been fighting for opposition unity relentlessly. He advocated coalition politics. He wanted the Congress(S), which is a party of Congressmen who disagreed primarily with Sanjay Gandhi, to retain its identity. By being among the first 30 to win, not only did he keep the Congress(S) name alive, but also became a fourth term parliamentarian to grace the opposition benches. Along with Madhu Dandavate of the Janata and Indrajit Gupta of the CPI, he will have to now become the principal opposition spokesman in the Lok Sabha. All other stalwarts have lost. The young voices of Harikesh Bahadur and Ramvilas Paswan will not be heard in the zero hour of the Lok Sabha now. Satyasadhan Chakrabarty of the CPI(M) has lost. Atal Behari Vajpayee, Ram Jethmalani, Pramila Dandavate, Chitta Basu, Ramavtar Shastri and Dharam Bir Sinha have not been returned. Though the Telugu Desam has sent up a massive contingent, in all likelihood the effective opposition voice from Andhra Pradesh will be that of V Kishore Chandra Deo of the Congress(S), a former minister, who enters his third term now. The opposition will have to match the youthfulness of the new Congress(I) contingent as well as the maturity of the ministers appointed by the Prime Minister. The task ahead is arduous.

On the evening of 28 December, while trends showed that the opposition was being routed, this correspondent met Janata president, Chandra Shekhar. He was leading by a small margin then. He will win, his supporters said. "Even if I win, only this house given to me as an MP will remain," Chandra Shekhar remarked wryly. He lost the election eventually. The Karnataka party office kept him informed of the position in the state. Whether Hegde should resign or not was being debated. Chandra Shekhar seemed at that moment to fix his eyes not on the results which were coming in, but on the Assembly elections which are now round the corner in nine or ten states. If the mandate again goes with a massive swing in favour of the Congress(I), then a lot of rethinking will be called for.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

The Dance of Victory

Delhi celebrates the Congress(I)'s triumph

Friday, 28 December 1984 was not like any other normal winter day. The biting chill in the air was not sufficient to dampen the spirits of the Congress(I) followers. As the day rolled by and as news of Congress(I) candidates leading in most of the constituencies trickled in Congress(I) sympathisers went wild with joy. Except Rajiv Gandhi who maintained a serene composure even as news of Congress(I) victories started pouring in.

But the rest of the country, particularly Delhi exploded in an orgy of celebration. The Congress(I) victory had not just been a landslide as the optimists had predicted, it had assumed the proportions of an avalanche, burying deep the hopes of a stunned opposition. Riding high on the victory wave were the victors, some among them even a bit apprehensive of so overwhelming a success. Was the Congress(I) boat which Rajiv Gandhi had steered through uncertain seas now overloaded? This thought and many such apprehensions must have crossed the mind of India's youngest-ever Prime Minister—who is also the first Prime Minister from the post-Independent era—as he sat in number one Safdarjang Road on that historic Friday.

The marigold garlands kept piling up. By mid-afternoon, the groundswell of joy had manifested itself in boisterous bhangras throughout Delhi. The astute hawkers with laddoos and pedas made their little fortunes outside the city's seven counting centres. Young men on bicycles and motor cycles roamed the city triumphantly.

However, there was an air of restrained joy in the Prime Minister's house. Rajiv Gandhi's ascent to prime ministership had been free from violence and bloodshed. Moreover, Mr Gandhi does not publicly demonstrate his feelings. Even when the news came in that he was ahead of his sister-in-law, Menaka Gandhi, by a huge margin, his response was more akin to a happy shrug of the shoulder.

The enigmatic half-smile of Mr Rajiv Gandhi did, however, broaden into something like a grin when he addressed people on the afternoon of 29 December at Gol Methi Chowk, down the road from where he lives. Assembled on the ten feet high platform, hurriedly put together the day before, were Delhi's seven beaming victors and gloriously attired Buta Singh in pink and red Rajasthani pugree.

The Prime Minister's smiles that day were mostly directed towards the women supporters who could not restrain themselves from breaking into a bhangra: "Aaj mere vira da... (today is my brother's victory)," they sang. After his speech Rajiv Gandhi went to them and greeted them. Earlier, Mr Gandhi had given a special word of thanks to the women and youth of the country. He was probably one of the few people to realise that it would be the woman's vote which was going to propel him towards so big a victory. The Prime Minister had read the tiny writing on the wall which was invisible to so many—especially both astrological and political pundits.

Mr Gandhi, as everybody knows, is not a man of too many words. The one gesture which showed his joy at the results was when he went up for a joy ride over Delhi Perhaps, up there in the skies he is so familiar with, the half-smile realised its full potential It was not for nothing that Mr Vishwabandhu Gupta sent up the Felliniesque 80-ft high balloon in the shape of the Congress(I) hand from Safdarjang airport to loom large over the capital. Mr Gandhi's son, Rahul and friends watched this ascent of the white taffeta silk apparition with unconcealed glee. Never had there been such a balloon over Delhi, never had there been such a victory.

The rest of the Congressmen did not wait until Saturday to celebrate. The third round of counting was not yet over at the UPSC (Union Public Service Commission) counting booth for the New Delhi parliamentary constituency won by Mr K.C. Pant, when the bhangra dance began and the small group of BJP supporters began to leave.

Bhangra outside the PM's house

Outside Bal Bhavan—the counting booth for the more difficult Chandni Chowk seat (contested by J.P. Aggarwal of the Congress(I) and Sikandar Bakht of the BJP) it was like a mela. Restraint had completely vanished by 3.30 pm. People were smuggling in laddoos into the counting booth. Young men danced in a frenzy, especially when the TV cameras were being focused on them. There were garlanded paper and metal 'hands'—the Congress(I) symbol—bobbing in the air, as were shimmering brocade party flags. The BJP workers had long fled, or rather had been made to flee. The young Congress(I) men, mostly in their late teens and sporting Amitabh Bachchan hair cuts, were chanting tauntingly, "Atak gaya, kamal ke phool par latak gaya." They were referring to the losing BJP candidate, Sikandar Bakht who was not able to muster the considerable Muslim vote of the area.

People were jubilant by the time we reached Pusa Institute, the counting booth for the Karol Bagh constituency. "Why ask?" replied a young man on a bicycle outside the institute when we asked him where the booth was. "Haath pe lag gayee...bas aur kya," he added. Teenagers dominated the scene. The BJP supporters had fled from here as well.

Rajiv Gandhi waves to the crowd

Meanwhile, as the results kept coming in, the opposition continued to sink further and further into gloom. The massive mandate for Rajiv Gandhi had hit them like a bolt of lightning. They had missed seeing the wave, and now they were nearly drowning in it. Among the opposition leaders the most inconsolable was Chaudhury Charan Singh. He made it to Parliament, but virtually without his party. All he could mutter was: "The world has changed...He (Rajiv Gandhi) is just a boy." He remarked that the Congress(I) had won the elections by beimani (dishonest means); otherwise, the Chaudhury reckoned, he would have won by a margin of over three lakhs and not the measly one lakh odd votes.

On the other hand, Vajpayee and Chandra Shekhar, who had not even made it to the Lok Sabha, were more sophisticated in their response. Chandra Shekhar said: "The sympathy wave was obviously there but we failed to read it right...The Congress(I) had won the elections the very day Mrs Indira Gandhi was assassinated." Vajpayee remarked. "We lost the elections, but we have not been defeated..." Mr Vajpayee also said that the "clean image of Rajiv Gandhi had something to do with the results. In 1971 it was us who rode on the crest of a wave, perhaps in 1984, it was true of the Congress(I)..." The BJP president's sense of humour does not abandon him, even in the bleakest of moments. When a reporter approached him for a comment while the results were coming in he said: "So you have come to put my photograph with the defeated.. "

For a day or two the offices of the opposition parties looked as if they had closed shop. The rooms wore a desolate look, even the faces of the peons were crestfallen. Slowly, they began to pick themselves up. The press conferences began. George Fernandes of the Janata Party said that the opposition denied as it was the forum of Parliament to agitate or redress its grievances, would have to turn to extra-parliamentary fora increasingly. The Janata Party was now going to prepare itself for the Assembly elections, and they would, Mr Fernandes said, go it alone. Mr R.K. Hegde, caretaker chief minister of Karnataka, was one of the few among the opposition leaders to call for a sincere evaluation of the reasons for their defeat. He had not been responsible for the debacle.

Mr Jagjivan Ram, like Mr Charan Singh talked of rigging and said that Mr Gandhi's charge that the opposition supported the Anandpur Sahib Resolution was also responsible to some extent for the Congress(I) victory.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

Congress(I) supporters celebrate the party's victory

The Sweep

MAHARASHTRA

While the Congress(I) popular vote in the eighth Lok Sabha Elections in December last year went up in almost every state, including Andhra Pradesh, it went down in Maharashtra. Despite a higher turnout of voters this time, the Congress(I) polled 51.24 per cent of the votes in the 47 seats it contested, a drop of 1.56 per cent from its share in 1980, when it polled 52.98 per cent of the votes. Among the other parties, the Congress(S) which contested 15 seats polled 12.10 per cent of the votes against 11 86 per cent in 1980. The BJP which contested 20 seats polled 10.07 per cent of the votes as against 20 27 per cent in 1980. The Janata Party which contested 15 seats, polled 7 64 per cent of the votes as against its share of 1.06 per cent last time However, despite the drop in votes polled, the Congress(I) added three more seats to its 1980 tally of 40 seats, adding to the party's overwhelming presence in Parliament.

The region that let the Congress(I) down was Vidarbha, the cotton belt which has been seething with discontent and its backward areas crying for the institution of a Vidarbha Development Board. In the rural constituencies with a large population of Dalits and Muslims, like Buldhana, Akola, Washim, Amravati, Wardha and Yeotmal, the Congress(I) candidates had to struggle for victory and won with small margins. Unlike in the rest of India, caste and communal factors often worked to their disadvantage In Akola, for instance, the sitting MP, Madhusudan Vairale scraped through with the help of the Maratha votes and the votes of minority castes and women. His opponent, the new star of the scheduled castes, Prakash Ambedkar, the grandson of Dr Babasaheb Ambedkar, polled 1,65,064 votes against Mr Vairale's 1,78,874 votes. While the pattern of voting showed that Mr Ambedkar took the Muslim and Buddhist votes, the third candidate, the BJP's Pandurang Fundkar polled 1,48,909 votes primarily of the Mali, Kundhis and other Hindus. In Washim, the sitting MP and union minister Ghulam Nabi Azad had to struggle against a political lightweight Gokuldas Rathod who belongs to the Banjara community, in the majority there, and won by the lowest margin in the state: only 10,359 votes.

Sharad Pawar

Despite propaganda by the Congress(I) about it being the only party capable of holding India together, and Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi addressing no less than 21 meetings in Maharashtra's smallest towns, the margins of victory of other Congress(I) successful candidates in Chandrapur, Chimur, Bhandara, Nagpur and Ramtek were not large enough to offset the loss of votes. Local issues, the Sharad Pawar factor and the Sharad Joshi factor were fairly successful considering their relatively limited resources and reach.

Sunil Dutt campaigning

On the whole, the opposition parties were unable to meet the propaganda blitz of the ruling party. However, Sharad Pawar in Baramati was more than a match for the Congress(I) candidate Shankarrao Bajirao Patil. Mr Pawar's victory despite the last minute appearance of the Prime Minister on behalf of Mr Patil and A. T. Patil, the Congress(I) candidate from the Kolaba constituency who lost his deposit, has contributed to the debate on whether there was a "wave" of any sort in Maharashtra, excluding Bombay. In Bombay, particularly in Bombay city, there was a clear rejection of the Janata Party and the BJP. Dr Datta Samant's victory, the only opposition victory in Bombay, has established his party,the Kamagar Aghadi, as the party of the working class. Congress(I) sources have claimed that he won only because of the absence of the hand symbol on the ballot papers. But Dr Samant's other candidates, his elder brother P. N. Samant and T. S. Bhorade in the Bombay North-East constituency were able to poll a respectable amount of votes in their first attempts.

Vidarbha has produced two new power centres, one of Sharad Pawar representing the militant Maratha youths who campaigned with a vengence against the Congress(I) in several constituencies, even in Marathwada and Prakash Ambedkar who could rally the huge Dalit population round him. The Dalits have shown their disgust for all the traditional leaders like the Gavais and Khobragades. The Muslims, on whom the opposition were banking, voted in Bombay for the Congress(I) and in the rest of Maharashtra for Muslim candidates where there were strong candidates. In Bombay, Haji Mastan, who tried to impose himself as a leader of the poor and middle class Muslims got cold feet as the authorities played cat and mouse with him, locking him up one day and releasing him the next. He and Karim Lala, the other underworld leader, realised that discretion being the better part of valour decided not to contest. The result was a landslide victory for Murli Deora in South Bombay.

The polarisation of votes indicates a new trend in Maharashtra. Till recently, independents used to get a good number of votes, but this time nearly all of them lost their deposits. This polarisation gives hope to the opposition, particularly the Congress(S) in the coming Assembly elections. Already, cadres of both the Congress(S) and the BJP are straining to break away from the seat adjustment alliances.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

BIHAR

The Congress(I) won an unprecedented victory in Bihar securing 49 of the 54 seats in the state and upsetting the predictions of scribes and pollsters. The results were a reversal of the 1977 elections, when the Congress had got a drubbing at the hands of the Janata Party. In addition, the Congress(I) set a record for itself in this election by winning 57 per cent of the popular votes. In the 1980 elections the party had polled only 30 per cent of the votes while the Janata Party, its splinter parties and the Lok Dal together had polled 40 per cent of the votes Similarly, in south Bihar, especially in Santhal Parganas and Chotanagpur, considered to be the bastion of the Jharkhand Party and the Jharkhand Mukti Morcha, the Congress(I) won all the seats from the region, defeating veteran tribal leaders like Siboo Soren and N E Horo. Six Jharkhand candidates contesting from this region have lost their deposits Such has been the scale of victory that it has taken even Congress(I) members by surprise. For instance, chief minister Chandrashekhar Singh, just ten days before the elections, had not expected that his party would win more than 35 seats

Congress(I) leaders feel that this unexpected victory was the result of an outburst against the infighting in the opposition. Secondly, they feel that it was because the people wanted to see the nation's integrity untouched. Thirdly, the people did not want a coalition government at the centre And, above all, it was the faith reposed on the young Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi by the people, who want him to decide the fate of the nation. They further argue that there was an undercurrent of sympathy following Mrs Gandhi's assassination. Rajiv Gandhi's capability to keep it alive helped the party.

Even the opposition knew of such a move to garner votes by exploiting Mrs Gandhi's assassination. But they hardly expected a near rout in the state which traditionally has remained an anti-Congress bastion.

What benefited the ruling party was the infighting in the opposition. For example, the CPI national council secretary, Mr Jagannath Sarker, announced that the CPI would work for the defeat of Karpoori Thakur, the DMKP leader, in Samastipur. Mr Thakur, who has an unbeaten past, lost to a Congress(I) lightweight, Ramdeo Rai, by a huge margin of over 1,80,000 votes. Mr Jagjivan Ram, who played his old election game, spent a couple of days there and distributed money among his voters and luckily survived a defeat in Sasaram His margin of victory dwindled to 1,400 votes this time. The CPI, which rarely faced internal dissension during the elections, was divided on caste lines and its members even worked for the party candidate's defeat Out of its six sitting seats the party could retain just one, forfeiting the rest to the Congress(I). The BJP, alienated by its cadre, the RSS, drew a blank. The RSS volunteers actively fought for the Congress(I) in the elections The Janata Party, which won eight seats in 1980, was almost a truncated party following a series of defections and splits Among the winners in the opposition,

Bihar CM C.S. Singh

Jagjivan Ram: eight in a row

Mr Vijay Kumar Mishra, son of f. mer railway minister L.N. Mish: won the Darbhanga seat on a DMI ticket with the help of his uncle a Congress(I) leader, Jagannath M hra, defeating the Congress(I) lead and union minister Harinath Mish.

In Nalanda, the CPI won becau its candidate, Vijay Kumar Yad. had the sole benefit of the fig between the Congress(I)'s Pank Kumar Sinha and the BJP's S Vis wamohan Choudhury, both of who were kurmis. In Chapra, the Jana candidate Ram Bahadur Singh is Rajput and all his three oppone were Yadavas; hence the caste v in this Yadav-dominated constitue cy split. In Darbhanga, it was a fig between Brahmins. In Gopalganj, t fight between a Brahmin and a bh mihar is a frequent phenomenon. M Pandey leads the Brahmins while M Rai the bhumihars.

However, leaving local issu aside, the all-pervasive caste fact worked in an unusual way this tim The Rajputs, hitherto considered be the Janata Party's voteban switched their loyalty to the Congre s(I). The Yadavas, who are normal with the Lok Dal or the opposite parties, also voted by and large bloc for the ruling party. Accordi to a DMKP leader, the Yadavas d cided not to support any of t opposition leaders since they we non-Yadavas. The Rajputs and Yad vas joined the Congress(I) by an large and so did a majority of th harijans. The Bihar governmen aware of an erosion in the Musli support to the ruling par announced the inclusion of Ansa in the annexure of the schedul castes in the election year, whic would entitle them to avail of r servation facilities in governme jobs. Muslims constitute about 11 pe cent of the population in Bihar. Th Brahmins,as usual, stood behind th Congress(I).

Apart from this, the Congress(resorted to booth capturing as wel It became evident in Aurangaba where a minister of state himself no faces a charge of snatching the ball papers and stamping it in favour o the Congress(I). In Muzaffarpur,fro where Mr L.P. Sahi won, there wa large-scale rigging and booth captu ing while the presiding officers ope ly allowed it. At a booth Damachak, five people voted fro around 700 voters there. In many the other booths the Congress(I) su porters were seen virtually mannin the booths while the insecure presi ing and polling officers were ju silent spectators.

Yubaraj Ghimire, Patna

GUJARAT

It was a windfall. When by late night on 28 December 1984, it became clear that the Congress(I) was heading for a spectacular victory in the election for the 26 Lok Sabha seats in Gujarat, it momentarily left both the followers and opponents of the new Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi, dumbstruck. Even after full 24 hours, the opposition leaders in the state who had forged an electoral accord to offer a straight contest to the Congress(I) in as many as 24 constituencies were still at sea as to how could it have happened. The Congress(I) finally bagged 24 of the 26 seats in the state.

Although it was not a carbon copy of the 1980 results when Indira Gandhi's party had won 25 of the 26 seats, the results this time were something clearly out of the dreams even for the most optimistic of Congressmen. In some respects the victory of 24 Congress(I) nominees could be termed as even more spectacular than in 1980, because this time they were facing the combined challenge of the Janata, the BJP and the DMKP in all but two seats. So hopeful were the opposition leaders of giving a tough fight to the ruling party that Makarand Desai, president of the Gujarat BJP had blandly forecast a repetition of the 1977 election results when the Congress had won only ten Lok Sabha seats from Gujarat. He was promptly supported by Chimanbhai Patel, former chief minister and Janata leader.

The opposition leaders were not alone in the prediction of bad times for the Congress(I). The dissidents within the Gujarat Congress(I), who were displeased with the high command for fielding most of the 1980 party nominess once more, were pessimistic about the party's chances in the polls. The anti-Solanki group had privately assessed that the Congress(I) would win between 14 and 18 seats. But the chief minister, Madhavsinh Solanki, had predicted that the party would do well, save in a couple of seats.

Most political pundits too, had been forecasting difficult times for the ruling party in at least seven seats in Saurashtra, one in Kutch and four in north Gujarat. They had predicted an erosion of votes compared to the 54.84 per cent votes polled by the Congress in 1980. The main reason of worry for the Congress(I) was the electoral adjustment among the three major opposition parties in at least 24 constituencies. Moreover, the renomination of all but three sitting Congress(I) MPs was yet another cause for concern. The candidates who had won in 1980 were not rated as the best among the nominees available.

Ashok Bose

Madhavsinh Solanki

The intense bickering between the Solanki group and the dissidents led by the former political guru of the chief minister, Jinabhai Darji made even staunch supporters of the Congress pessimistic of the party's prospects at the hustings. Mr Darji had recently said that he would work to ensure Mr Solanki did not become chief minister for another term.

Jinabhai Darji

The anti-Congress feeling was said to be gaining strength in many parts of the state like Saurashtra due to the tension between the Patels, alienated from the ruling party on the one hand and the Kshatriyas who form an important plank of Mr Solanki's mass base on the other. Since 1980, nine byelections to the state Assembly were held, of which five were lost by the Congress(I). In the Lok Sabha bypoll for the Porbandar seat, the birthplace of Gandhiji, the ruling party had won only because the opposition parties failed to put up a common candidate. Reinforcing the feeling that the Congress(I) was losing ground were reports of opinion polls conducted before the death of Indira Gandhi that the support for the Congress(I) in the state then stood at about 37 per cent.

The Congress(I) countered the combined opposition onslaught by a three-pronged strategy. Prodded by the Solanki group, the high command nominated the same people who had won in 1980. The caste factor was not ignored too. In 1980, candidates had been selected under what has now become known as the KHAM strategy, the nominees mostly belonged to the kshatriya, harijan, adivasi and Muslim communities—which together constitute some 70 per cent of the electorate However, three sitting MPs, Hiralal Parmar, a harijan leader from Patan (SC), Amrut Patel from Gandhinagar and Ramji Mavani from Rajkot were replaced by members from the same communities. Mr Parmar, who belonged to the dissident group, joined the BJP. Amrut Patel, a Bombay-based builder had incurred the displeasure of both the Solanki and the dissident factions and both were demanding his ouster. Mr Mavani had incurred the wrath of the dissidents. For only ten seats out of 26 the two groups recommended candidates unanimously, but in the rest of the seats the high command honoured the suggestions of the chief minister.

The second strategy of the Congress to win support was to please the poor and the young, including women. The state government has already implemented a free mid-day meal scheme for 50 lakh primary school children. It intends to provide cheaper foodgrains to the poor and free education at all levels, including university and technical, for women from June 1985. The first scheme involves a cost of Rs 110 crore a year and the other two would add to the burden of the exchequer by another

Babubhai Patel

Rs 77 crore a year. But many think that these three programmes may eventually cost about Rs 300 crore a year.

The third strategy of the ruling party was to make full use of the sympathy wave in the wake of the assassination of Indira Gandhi. She was very popular in the state and used to proudly call herself the daughter-in-law of Gujarat. Her husband, Feroze Gandhi, was a Parsi and Parsis first landed in Gujarat centuries ago after fleeing from Iran. Today they are considered as Gujaratis and many speak Parsi-Gujarati at home. In the days following her arrest during the Janata regime, Mrs Gandhi set off on a political comeback trail from South Gujarat. Rajiv Gandhi made three trips to the state, addressing poll rallies in ten constituencies. Over a lakh people greeted the PM in most places and like the mother, the son too strove to establish a rapport, declaring that coming to Gujarat was like coming home.

The unmeasured sympathy factor kept everyone guessing. The opposition parties kept up a concerted campaign to neutralise the sympathy factor and Congressmen themselves had doubts about sympathy votes. In hindsight, it is certain that the wave did come to sweep the ruling party to victory.

Despite the accord between the Janata, the BJP and the DMKP, it was more like an understanding of strange bedfellows than anything else. For the adjustment worked out through Babubhai Patel, former chief minister and president of the Lok Swaraj Manch, ran into trouble when the Janata claimed the Bhavnagar seat allotted to the Lok Swaraj Manch. Then, the BJP fielded former police commissioner of Baroda, Jaspal Singh, from Baroda, arguing that he was more likely to win than the Janata nominee, Manubhai Patel. The result was that the Janata workers, wielding considerable influence, dissociated themselves from electioneering in Surat where a BJP candidate was the joint opposition nominee In Ahmedabad, Maganbhai Barot, former deputy finance minister in the central government and sitting MP from the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch, had hoped to be the joint candidate against the Congress(I). But the BJP manipulated the seat in favour of its nominee, Ashok Bhatt. Result: Mr Barot kept the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch out of the opposition accord. A regional party, Jai Rama Rajya Party, fielded Prof. Balraj Madhok, former chief of the erstwhile Jana Sangh.

Such bickerings among the opposition led to a strange inactivity of workers of other parties where the candidate belonged to a different party On the positive side, the accord avoided contest among opposition candidates in 24 seats. However, the idea of avoiding a split of non-Congress votes was realised only partly since a record number of Independents jumped into the election fray. The number of candidates for the 26 Lok Sabha seats this time was 229, an all time high.

Despite the drama, the Gujarat contests did not attract national attention because of number of a reasons. With only 26 seats at stake the outcome did not matter much. Moreover, Gujarat is not included in either the Hindi belt. It is also not a non-Congress(I)-ruled state. To top it all this time there was no top leader, either from the Congress(I) or the opposition in the fray. The highest ranking Congress(I) candidate was Digvijaysinh Jhala, deputy union minister for environment, while the top nominee of the opposition was H.M. Patel, former union finance minister in the Janata government.

Digvijaysinh

D V Jayner

Maganbhai Barot

Campaigning in the state this time was carried out on a very low key, although the opposition brought in leaders like Atal Behari Vajpayee, Chandra Shekhar and Morarji Desai, for hurried tours. The Congress(I) did not bother to bring in anybody from outside the state, save Rajiv Gandhi. A notable absentee was Pranab Mukherjee, union finance minister, who represents Gujarat in the Upper House. The ruling party feared that the closure of more than 18 textile mills in the state would adversely affect the party's election prospects. Thus the Prime Minister told an election rally that soon after the polls the government would initiate steps to revive the ailing textile industry so that "textiles of India can find world markets as they once did in the olden days." This was the only specific reference to a state issue by Mr Gandhi and it seemed to have done its magic. While the Congress(I) had put up candidates for all the 26 seats, the Janata fielded 12 candidates, the BJP 11, the DMKP two, the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch two, the CPI and CPI(M) one each and the Doordarshi Party contested 25 seats. The rest were Independents.

Besides the opposition, the dissidents in the Congress(I) have suffered a blow. Mr Solanki's stock would go up in the eyes of the high command and Mr Darji's wish to see him out of the office of chief minister after the next Assembly poll may remain a dream.

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

ORISSA

The much publicised Patnaik versus Patnaik theory in Orissa did ot exactly work in the 1984 parmentary elections. That explains hy all forecasts based on traditional lculations failed in the face of a ong pro-Congress(I) swing. The ve in favour of the Congress(I) had so swept the party to a record l-out-of-21-seats victory in 1980. But is time it was presumed by political servers that the "absence of a ve" on either side would ensure a gh fight between Janata leader ju Patnaik and chief minister J.B. tnaik. But the strong undercurrent sympathy for the ruling party and leader Rajiv Gandhi following dira Gandhi's assassination upset calculations. The assumption that e sympathy wave had petered off th the passage of time was proved ong. Besides, the people exhibited e same feeling as in 1980 that a vided opposition with no leader ojected as the future Prime Minis- would not be able to maintain the ity and integrity of the nation.

Local issues were pushed into the ckground and the people, instead, re guided by national considerans such as the formation of a ong and stable government at the ntre in the face of a "threat to the tional unity and security." The vernment-controlled media like R and Doordarshan played a very fective role in motivating the peo-, the vast majority of whom do not ve any other means of knowing the tional and international develop-nts.

Biju Ray

The opposition parties were nowhere in the picture in the propaganda war. The ruling party had glossy posters and leaflets with Indira Gandhi's picture. Its main theme: the question of safeguarding the country's unity and security for which "Indira Gandhi gave her last drop of blood." J.B. Patnaik, followed by his partymen, propagated that the opposition was responsible for the assassination of Indira Gandhi, "whose last visit was to Orissa which she loved most." The message had a lasting effect on the minds of the people. As Kamaraj Patro of Chhatrapur in Ganjam district told SUNDAY, "They (the opposition) killed Indira Gandhi by hatching a conspiracy." The candidate's reputation was hardly of any consequence to the voters. Kamaraj Patro and many others in the Berhampur constituency were ignorant of who their sitting Congress(I) MP (Jagannath Rao) was, although he had been elected in the last six elections he had contested. Some of them were, on the other hand, aware of the young Janata candidate, Suryanarayan Patro, but preferred to vote for the "Indira Congress."

Contrary to the expectation of the opposition and political observers, the votes of the harijans, adivasis, people of the other backward classes and minority communities went in favour of the Congress(I) almost en bloc. Nabaghana Nayak of Godisahi village in the Banki Assembly segment of Cuttack constituency and other adivasi villagers said three weeks before the polling, "The Raja is after all the Raja. One Raja (Indira Gandhi) is dead, but another (Rajiv Gandhi) is there. He will get the votes even if he does not come to ask for it." Asked the reason for their loyality to the "Raja family," they said they had benefited from the loan assistance programmes and some other measures.

D V Jayner

K.P. Singh Deo

Opposition leaders also glossed over the sympathy of women voters towards Rajiv Gandhi which was translated into votes. The Janata leader and former chief minister Nilamani Routray said even two days after the polling that "at best two to three per cent" of the women's votes might have been swayed in favour of the Congress(I) because of the sympathy factor and that other women must have voted in accordance with the judgment of the male heads of their families. The political observers were also mistaken in their assumption that there was hardly any sympathy factor to sway the women voters substantially in favour of the ruling party. A number of cases of wives having voted for the Congress(I) against the counsel of their husbands were noticed. That the opposition parties, particularly the Janata, were fighting an unequal battle with the Congress(I) from the point of view of resources was evident from the very beginning. Despite this the Janata-CPI-CPI(M) combine bettered its performance compared to 1980, bringing down the margins of defeat in as many as ten of the state's 21 seats and keeping the margin unchanged in one constituency, Mayurbhanj. Biju Patnaik, the only opposition candidate who retained his seat, improved his victory margin from 5,000 to about 17,000 votes, which was a blow to J.B. Patnaik's principal lieutenant Basant Biswal who was the Congress(I) campaign manager in Kendrapara and had mobilised huge resources. Another Janata leader and former union minister Rabi Ray, who had lost to the Congress(I)'s Laxman Mallick by a margin of about 60,000 votes in Jagatsinghapur in 1980 was this time declared a loser by 1,087 votes. The suspicious manner in which the counting of votes in this seat was conducted continues to be a matter of dispute.

The influences of the royal families of Kalahandi and Bolangir are still prevalent as evidenced from the poll results from these two constituencies. The Janata nominee Pratap Keshari Deo, ex-ruler of Kalahandi, narrowed his margin of defeat from 45,627 votes in 1980 to 24,074, while Anang Uday Singh Deo, the Janata candidate and the son of the former ruler of Bolangir, brought down his margin from 79,000 to 34,000.

The other six constituencies where the opposition candidates improved their performance are Bhubaneswar, Puri, Deogarh, Jajpur, Balasore and Bhadrak. In the prestigious battle for the Cuttack seat, the opposition candidate Dr Jogesh Rout (Janata) lost by a margin of about 79,000 votes which was a much reduced one compared to J.B. Patnaik's 1980 victory margin of 1,24,000 votes In the 1981 bypoll, however, Patnaik's wife, Jayanti Patnaik, had won by a smaller margin: 50,000.

Notwithstanding the electoral alliance between the Janata and the CPI, the latter seemed to have bet rayed the Janata candidates in some constituencies, particularly Aska, Berhampur and Jagatsinghapur. All the leading figures of the state CPI left for Deogarh leaving these constituencies, where they have sizable vote banks, under the specious plea of campaigning for their lone candidate Prasanna Panda there. The other smaller opposition parties, whose claims during the seat adjustment talks were rejected by Biju Patnaik, fielded their candidates in about a dozen constituencies, but were humiliated with the forfeiture of their deposits. They only contributed to the impression among the voters that the opposition is too split a force to govern the country. Despite J.B. Patnaik's earlier claim of repeating his party's 1980 feat of achieving all but one of the seats, if not also wresting the remaining one from Biju Patnaik, the Congress(I) leaders and workers were conceding "six to seven" seats to the opposition in private talks even after the polls. In view of the mild swing in favour of the Janata, particularly in the coas tal belt, Kalahandi and Bolangir, the Congress(I) men themselves were clearly amazed at the outcome of the polls.

Sarada P. Nanda, Bhubaneswar

TAMIL NADU

A frail, sick MGR, confined to a hospital bed in distant New York was able to do more for his party than a supercharged Karunanidhi who pulsated through Tamil Nadu, fervidly canvassing for votes for the DMK-led opposition front. In addition to the MGR charisma which has soared to higher realms, the most crucial outcome of the Parliament and Assembly elections that were held simultaneously in Tamul Nadu is that after a lapse of 17 years the Congress has once again become a force to reckon with in the state.

The partnership between the Congress(I) and the AIADMK turned out to be pussant and symbiotic—the alliance benefited the AIADMK in the Lok Sabha and the Congress(I) in the Tamil Nadu Assembly. The dual sympathy factor—for the assassinated Prime Minister and for the ailing chief minister—played a pivotal role in making the combine invincible. Barring a few states, the Congress(I) avalanche that started from the foothills of the Himalayas swept right across to Kanyakumari. The spectacular results in Tamil Nadu were unprecedented—the Congress(I) won 25 Lok Sabha seats (and also the lone Pondicherry seat), the AIADMK 12, leaving the DMK with just one seat (Of the 39 Lok Sabha seats in the state, election to North Madras was countermanded following the death of an independent candidate and will be held on 28 January. As for the Assembly results, the AIADMK won 133 seats, the Congress(I) 62, the DMK 20, the CPI(M) 5, Janata 3, Gandhi-Kamaraj National Congress 2, All India Forward Bloc 1, CPI and IUML 2 each, Republican Party and Hindu Munnani 1 each. The AIADMK achieved a hat-trick, having won an absolute majority in the Tamul Nadu Assembly for the third consecutive time. What was more, despite the absence of MGR from the campaign scene, the party managed to improve its performance in that it had won only 130 seats in 1977 and 129 seats in 1980.

MGR (extreme right) at a hospital in New York

Due to the alliance with the AIADMK, the Congress(I) was able to reap a rich harvest, succeeding in nearly doubling its strength—in the dissolved House it had 33 MLAs. The avalanche that swept the Congress(I) and AIADMK to power has ruthlessly uprooted parties and personalities, dealing a devastating blow to the DMK-led opposition front. Standing forlonly in the debris are 20 MLAs of the DMK, compared to the 32 MLAs the party had in the dissolved House. The CPI(M) has come down from 11 to five MLAs and the CPI from 10 to two. There is not a trace of the Tamil Nadu Kamaraj Congress in the Assembly this time with even the president of the party, P. Nedumaran, being defeated.

The defeat in the Assembly elec tions was far more crushing than the Parliament elections as past trend has established that the regional par ty which has an alliance with the Congress(I) benefits for the Lok Sabha polls. The DMK which had won 16 Lok Sabha seats in 1980 when it had an alliance with the Congres s(I) was axed to one. While a victory for the AIADMK-Congress(I) combine was very much on the cards (SUNDAY 23, December), the routing of the DMK-led opposition in the Assembly was unexpected. Even the most optimistic AIADMK leaders had not expected to win over 100 seats and had privately confided to this correspondent that they expected the DMK to win at least 60 Assembly seats.

A remarkable coincidence is that both the AIADMK and the Congress(I) scored identical percentages of success. Both secured cent per cent success in the Parliament elections in that the Congress(I) won all 25 seats it contested and the AIADMK all the 12 that it contested. In the Assembly elections, both enjoyed a whopping 86 per cent success, the AIADMK won 133 of the 154 seats it contested and the Congress(I) 62 of the 72 seats it contested. Two Lok Sabha results that caused considerable heartburn to the DMK-led opposition front are Nagercoil and Nagapattinam In Nagercoil, the Janata candidate P. Vijayaraghavan was beaten by the sitting Congress(I) MP by a narrow margin of 12,000 votes. In Nagapattinam, the vetearn CPI leader K. Murugaiyyan who won the seat in 1977 was defeated by the AIADMK candidate by a wafer-thin margin of 2,000 votes.

In addition to the large number of seats, the sweep also enabled the combine to score handsome margins of victory. In the Lok Sabha elections, the combine managed to maintain a margin of over two lakh votes in eight constituencies—in 1980, the Congress(I)-DMK combine failed to maintain a margin of over two lakh votes in even one constituency. In 20 constituencies, the combine managed to get a margin of over one lakh votes whereas in 1980 the Congress(I)-DMK combine managed to do so only in 11 constituencies. Similarly, in the case of the Assembly elections, the combine won by comfortable, even huge margins. On the other hand, the battered DMK managed to win by the skin of its teeth in most of the 20 seats it won.

The Congress which ruled Tamil Nadu till 1967 has made a significant leap in this election by emerging as the strongest (in terms of the number of MLAs) opposition party in the state Assembly. With 62 MLAs, the party can today contemplate slowly doing away with one of the Kazhagam crutches that it always had to rely upon for elections since it was routed by the DMK in 1967. One striking aspect of the Assembly results is that ironically it was the Congress(I) and not the AIADMK candidates who defeated their rivals by massive margins To cite a few examples, the Congress(I) candidates in Krishnarayapuram, Thirumayam, Vasudevanallur, Perambalur and Thottiyam won by bigger margins than even M.G. Ramachandran The Congress(I) can carve out an oasis for itself positioned as it is between a paralysed DMK and a paralysed chief minister. The climate is so ideal that even without resorting to intrigue and treachery the Congress(I) can begin laying the foundation stone for its return to power in Tamil Nadu. For the moment it is put in the piquant situation of being the main opposition party to its electoral ally, the ruling AIADMK

The people of Tamil Nadu categorically want MGR as their chief minister They will settle for no one else. If the AIADMK is able to fulfil its promises and MGR is back in action, holding the reins of the party and government, all is well that ends well. If not, seething power struggles will rip the party apart. Starting a charade is easy enough, maintaining it will be tough There are senior leaders in the party who are trying to get MGR to nominate his successor. Once the euphoria of the spectacular success wanes, internal dissension will pose a serious threat to the integrity of the AIADMK.

Jayalalitha

Across the Palk Straits, the Sinhala leaders of Sri Lanka would be gladdened by the Assembly results in Tamil Nadu—all the outspoken Tamil leaders who had championed the cause of the Sri Lanka Tamils have been routed—C T·Dhandapani, Nedumaran and S D. Somasundaram who suffered the ignominy of losing his deposit. As far as the DMK is concerned, it has been humbled to its knees. TNCC(I) President M. Palaniyandi and AIADMK general secretary P. U. Shunmugam in exclusive interviews to SUNDAY had identical explanations for the DMK rout. According to them, the people have chosen to reject the DMK because the party was so "destructive in its approach" and indulged only in mudslinging and vituperative campaign against MGR and Mrs Gandhi. Despite being out of power for seven years the DMK party cadre had shown exemplary unity and discipline. Karunanidhi's supremacy was unquestioned. Today the party is completely demoralised. The prospect of being out of power for another five years seems to have broken the spirit of the party members. An erosion in its ranks is inevitable but it remains to be seen whether the AIADMK will accept any DMK members or MLAs primarily as they do not need them. Moreover, there would be the fear that the defectors could be the decoys of the DMK chief infiltrating the AIADMK. Karunanidhi today is a depressed man. Nevertheless it is doubtful whether he will give up in despair without a last ditch fight. But with 20 MLAs there is very little he can do. Like MGR, Karunanidhi has not allowed any other leader to flourish in his own right in the party. So, no leadership changes that could perhaps have had a salutary effect on the party can be effected. The DMK has suffered its worst reversal yet, so much so that today its election symbol, the rising sun appears more appropriately to be the setting sun.

Anita Pratap, Madras

UTTAR PRADESH

The election results in Uttar Pradesh—82 out of 85 parliamentary seats to the Congress(I) and only two to the Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party (DMKP) (polling for the Chail seat having been countermanded due to the death of the Congress-I candidate, Dharam Veer)–have shattered the wildest of predictions. But though it is an outcome that was hardly foreseen, massive electoral mandates have usually followed political waves in the past, as in the elections of 1971 when the opposition got 11 seats, in 1977 when the Congress could not get any seat, and in 1980 when the Congress came back with 51 seats. In each of these polls an overriding national issue had largely decided the vote: in 1971, it was the Garibi Hatao call by the Congress, in 1977 the cry against the Emergency by a united opposition and in 1980, public disappointment with the Janata. The strength of the wave in 1984—underestimated grossly as a sympathy factor and which actually was an appeal to the voter to save the nation in the wake of Indira Gandhi's martyrdom—is comparable, perhaps, to that of 1977. Hence, the opposition's total rout.

In as many as 36 constituencies the Congress(I) candidates won by margins of over a lakh. Prominent among them are Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi who beat his sister-in-law, Menaka Gandhi, in Amethi by 3,14,878 votes. Arun Nehru won from Rae Bareili by 2,57,553 votes while Dinesh Singh trounced his opponent in Pratapgarh by 2,32,507 votes. Amitabh Bachchan beat the DMKP leader H. N. Bahuguna in Allahabad by 1,87,795 votes. Chaudhary Charan Singh retained his Baghpat seat but with a considerably reduced margin. The only other success by the DMKP was in Etah where Mahfooz Ali Khan won by a margin of just 3,431 votes. Menaka Gandhi lost her deposit in Amethi, while Chandra Shekhar, the Janata Party president, lost his Ballia seat to the Congress(I) candidate, Jagannath Chaudhary, by 53,950 votes. Among the opposition parties, the DMKP had contested 67 of the 85 seats, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) 56 seats, the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch (RSM) 51 seats and the Janata in 48 constituencies. Only the DMKP won two seats. This time the Congress(I) gained as many as 34 seats in the state, wresting 28 from the DMKP, three from the Janata, and one each from the CPI, BJP and RSM. It retained 48 of the seats it won in 1980 losing only one to the DMKP. Twenty-eight of its 30 sitting MPs were reelected, some of them with huge margins. In contrast, 27 of the 29 sitting opposition MPs were defeated. The prominent Congress(I) winners include five union ministers of the dissolved cabinet. Besides the PM,Rajiv Gandhi, they are: Mohsina Kidwai (Meerut), Khurshed Alam Khan (Farrukhabad), Arif Mohammad Khan (Bahraich), Ziaur Rehman Ansari (Unnao) and Sheila Kaul (Lucknow). The Congress(I) had also nominated four Rajya Sabha members, including the deputy chairman Shyam Lal Yadav, all of whom got elected. Among the other Congress(I) candidates who won, three were MLCs, 22 were MLAs, nine were state ministers, three were former union ministers and eight former UP ministers.

The Congress(I)'s victory was unforeseen even by senior party leaders. According to the state Janata president, "The Congress(I) had won with the help of money as also misusing official machinery and the publicity media." While reports had come in of booth-capturing all over the state by the Congress(I) with the help of the state machinery, whether the prevention of such incidents would have made a difference regarding the outcome of the elections remains doubtful. A spokesman of the DMKP maintained that the backward caste vote bank of the party had not been lost, regardless of the election result. "We have got as many votes as we wanted from the backward classes, but a number of factors came in the way of our defeat. The first of these, he alleged, was extensive booth-capturing by the Congress(I): around ten to 25 polling booths in every constituency were captured and an attempt was made to prevent the backward classes from voting in areas where the DMKP was strong. The second, he said, was the fact that the Congress(I) had very effectively capitalised on Indira Gandhi's assassination: its election campaign raised no other important issue except the former PM's death. "We thought that the sympathy over her death had ended; but the manner in which they conducted the campaign and evoked popular sympathy proved us wrong." Owing to this factor the DMKP lost a large chunk of its traditional votes. The party spokesman added, "But booth-capturing has made a difference. Had there not been so much rigging, I can safely say that we would have won in places where we lost by a margin of 25,000 or less votes. This would have given us a good 35 seats." But a scrutiny of the results shows that only in six constituencies the Congress(I) won by a margin in this region, and in only three were the margins below 10,000: Moradabad (7,113) Balrampur (8,656) and Azamgarh (1986). The Congress(I) nominees won by a margin of a lakh or more votes in 35 constituencies.

Chaudhary Charan Singh

Another major reason behind the opposition's poor showing was obviously its failure to offer the Congress(I) straight contests. The DMKP spokesman blamed "certain rigid and stubborn opposition leaders who came in the way of unity," according to him, Chaudhary Charan Singh was the most compromising of all the leaders and was willing to make concessions. However, the DMKP was being asked to come to an understanding with any and every opposition party, some of which had no popular character at all. "Even the Janwadi Party," the spokesman added, "which has two or three people in it was asking for seat adjustment with us. They wanted to contest eight seats. They have not even come third in any constituency. And, in how many places has the Janata Party come second?" The DMKP, on the other hand, had put up 67 candidates and in most constituencies they had come second. But since in most constituencies the Congress(I)) had won by margins exceeding 50,000, and in many cases outpolled all the opposition candidates put together, could an opposition unity prevent a Congress(I) landslide in the state?

"Yes, the opposition could put up a fight. There is the psychological reaction of the public to disunity among the opposition," the DMKP spokesman said. "This made the Congress(I) wave even more stronger."

If the backwards voted for the DMKP, whom did the Muslims vote for? From all indications, the Muslim vote went against the Congress(I) but got dispersed among varied opposition parties. Estimated to form about 16 to 17 per cent of the electorate in the state, Muslims had gone against the Congress(I) ever since the communal incidents in Moradabad, Assam, Bhiwandi, Goandi and Azamgarh. The Muslim sympathy for the Sikhs in the wake of the recent communal attacks on the latter is also well-known. Unfortunately, the lack of unity among the opposition parties, left the Muslim voters confused and irresolute.

The lack of an understanding among the opposition had created a chaotic scene: almost every constituency witnessed multiple contests: there were 40 contestants in Lucknow, for example, 39 in Kanpur and 32 in Amethi. A number of opposition parties in the fray were mere groupings. Some parties, like the DMKP, had not even got recognition (it fought the election as the Lok Dal, its precursor). Like the Muslims, the scheduled castes who form the largest caste group in the state have no political party to represent them. A large chunk of scheduled caste votes are also said to have been lost to the Congress(I) for lack of any alternative before the voter.

To make things worse for the opposition, the Congress(I)'s stand on Punjab, Indira Gandhi's martyrdom at the hands of Sikh fanatics and Rajiv Gandhi's accusations against the opposition for supporting the Anandpur Sahib Resolution, assured the Congress(I) of the caste Hindu vote. The ruling party's election campaign—starting with full page advertisements in newspapers speaking of threats to national integrity and presenting the Congress(I) as the only patriotic party whose mission was to keep India strong and united and representing all other opposition groups as 'obstacles' in the way—caught the imagination of Hindus. The advertisement blitz also influenced a large section of the uncommitted, apolitical electorate. Besides, the Congress(I) was the only party that conducted its campaign methodically, having started well ahead of the opposition parties, who spent most of their time in endless abortive negotiations for seat adjustments at the state level. Most opposition party workers were for long unaware of what their leaders in Delhi were deciding and had to confine themselves to low-key campaigning.

With the Assembly elections approaching, the ruling party will obviously be keen to keep up the tempo of its triumph. The opposition will have to come together and fight the Congress(I) from a common platform. But have the opposition parties learnt their lessons yet?

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

MADHYA PRADESH

It will take a long time for the Bharatiya Janata Party to forget the eighth Lok Sabha elections—in a state once considered their stronghold, the party could not win a single seat. The only consolation for the BJP is that they finished second in 35 constituencies out of the 39 in Madhya Pradesh, all of which fell to the Congress(I) whirlwind that swept the opposition out of the Hindi belt.

The chief minister, Arjun Singh, had already created a massive vote bank for the party by allotting pattas (ownership deals) to lakhs of jhuggi dwellers, by scrapping old cooperative debts of over Rs 100 crores, by donating rickshaws to rickshaw pullers and by accepting, on the eve of the polls, the report of the Maha jan Commission on backward classes. The state PCC(I) chief, Motilal Vora, told SUNDAY that all sections had benefited by these reforms.

As elsewhere, it was disunity that went against the opposition. The state DMKP chief, Brijlal Verma, told SUNDAY that the opposition was paying the price for fighting against each other instead of standing on a common platform. Even some staunch BJP supporters worked for the Congress(I) for the failure of the opposition to forge a unity. Vithal Ballal, a prominent BJP worker from Raipur, joined the Congress(I) during the poll campaign period saying that it would be better to help the Congress(I) directly than indirectly.

Madhavrao Scindia

But in Madhya Pradesh the BJP has only itself to blame as it was responsible for causing disunity among the opposition. The BJP secretary, Kusha Bhau Thakare, the president Kailash Joshi and the leader of the opposition in the Vidhan Sabha, Sunderlal Patwa, were firm that the BJP should fight the elections alone. The outcome proved the fallacy of the BJP's much publicised claim that they had a so called hold in the state. Both Kailash Joshi and Sunderlal Patwa have offered to step down from the central leadership of the party.

The brilliant performance of the Congress(I) in the state has also consolidated the position of Arjun Singh and the PCC chief, Motilal Vora, while stifling the dissidents in the party led by V C Shukla who also won the election from Mahasamud constituency. Shivendra Bahadur Singh, the ruling party's candidate from Rajnandgaon and Doon School mate of Rajiv Gandhi had in the midst of the polls demanded the expulsion of five Congress(I) MLAs including a minister Dr Tumanlal from the party for working against him. Even the AICC(I) general secretary, Chandulal Chandrakar, had complained that in his constituency, Durg followers of V.C Shukla were working against him. But the landslide victory has effectively silenced the dissidents.

Major opposition stalwarts who were swept off by the Rajiv wave are Atal Behari Vajpayee (Gwalior), Phoolchand Verma (Shajapur) and Satyanarayan Jatiya. Two BJP candidates, Baburao Parnjape (Jabalpur) and Prasad Ahirwar (Sagar) who had wrested the seats from the Congress(I) in the 1982 byelections, also lost. Other prominent losers include Purushottam Kaushik from Mahasamund (Janata), Yamuna Prasad Shastri, the state Janata Party chief from Rewa, Swami Agnivesh from Rajnandgaon (Janata) and Jagadish Joshi from Satna (Janata).

Among the 39 Congress(I) winners are Madhav Rao Scindia who defeated Vajpayee in Gwalior, P.C Sethi (Indore), Kamal Nath (Chhindwara) and Samaj Keyur Bhushan (Raipur), the renowned Sarvodaya leader and disciple of Acharya Vinoba Bhave.

An interesting feature of the elections was the emergence of many regional and minor parties in the Chattisgarh region, like the pro-Ananda Marg Chattisgarhi Samaj, whose demands include a separate Chattisgarh state; Bahujan Samaj, campaigning for the harijans, adivasis and the backwards and the Doordarshi Party of Baba Jay Gurudev which entered the electoral fray for the first time and managed to secure more votes than the Janata Party in most constituencies. Kankar Munjare, the young trade union leader of Krantikari Mazdoor Parishad, supported by the Chattisgarhi Samaj also secured over 72,000 votes in Balaghat, next only to the BJP.

M.V. Kher, Raipur

NORTH-EASTERN STATES

The outcome of the battle of ballots for the ten Lok Sabha seats from the north-east went along more or less on predictable lines. While the CPI(M), true to expectations annexed both the Tripura seats with vastly reduced margins, the Congress(I) fared well in the other north-eastern constituencies. The party registered its most spectacular victory in the lone Nagaland seat from where its sitting MP, Chingwang Konyak romped home with a staggering margin of over 1,30,000 votes.

The north-east, a political backwater with only ten seats in the Lok Sabha, does not hold much attraction for the national parties. The diversity of its multilingual and multireligious ethnic groups and the difficult communication in the sprawling region, seems to be the sole reasons why the national outfits stay clear of the north-eastern states. Till 1975 the Congress was also not very keen to improve its fortunes in this region. During the Emergency, the Congress set afoot a move to merge the myriad regional parties in the north-east and tone up its apparatus. The apparent reluctance of the national opposition parties to spread their tentacles in the north-east restricted the poll battles between the regional parties and the Congress(I) in the region, except in Tripura, where the electorate was polarised this time between the Congress(I) and the CPI(M).

A keen contest, helped by a feverish campaign, was witnessed in Tripura. The CPI(M), which held both the seats, came under a combined onslaught by the Congress(I) and the Tripura Upajati Juba Samity (TUJS). In 1980, the spectacular victory of the CPI(M) in the state came on the heels of a division of the anti-Marxist votes, with the Amra Bangali and the TUJS taking away 14.88 per cent and 13.47 per cent of the votes, respectively. This time the Congress(I) forged an alliance with the TUJS, giving the sectarian body a promise of help in the next District Council polls.

Though the alliance gave the impression of the Congress(I) being on a firm wicket, it, however, proved to be counter-productive, triggering off both a Bengali and a tribal backlash against the party. The Congress(I), perhaps, did not bother to read the writing on the wall. Its electoral adjustment with the TUJS during the 1983 Assembly polls resulted in the diversion of a sizable tribal ballots to the CPI(M),TUJS share of votes in fact plummeted to 10.20 per cent that time in comparison to what they garnered in the seventh Lok Sabha elections. In the tribal psyche, Congress(I) is still a party of the Bengali refugees and hence it is considered by them as an anti-tribal entity.

Bisheswar Singh

An analysis of this year's voting trends in Tripura revealed that tribals, constituting 29 per cent of the total population, supported the CPI(M) candidate Bajubon Reand in the Tripura East seat, even as the ex-tribal ruler of the state, the Calcutta-based Kirit Bikram Manikya Bahadur, was pitted against him as a Congress(I) candidate.

Added to this was the severe infighting in the Tripura Congress(I), with PCC(I) president, Asoke Bhattacharjee not seeing eye to eye with Youth Congress(I) leaders. The party's organisational weakness at the grassroots' level also greatly neutralised the wave of sympathy for Indira Gandhi. The Assam minister, Jagadish Choudhury, who supervised the

P.K. Thungon

Congress(I) campaign in the Tripura East seat, told SUNDAY that he had to organise the booth-level committees himself as the local party activists, busy in feuding, were tardy in the campaigning.

Though the triumph for the third time of the union deputy minister for commerce, Purno Sangma from the Garo tribal-inhabited Tura seat in Meghalaya was a foregone conclusion as the Garos and a sizable Bengali population never flagged in their loyalty to the Congress(I), the victory of former Lok Sabha deputy speaker, G. G. Swell from the prestigious Shillong seat, the heartland of the Khasi tribals, as a Congress(I) nominee, gave a rude jolt to the Hill Peoples' Union (HPU), an electoral amalgam of the APHLC (All Party Hill Leaders Conference) and the HSPDP (Hill State Peoples Democratic Party). The prospect of the HPU was bright when the campaign got under way. The Khasi hills is a stronghold of both these regional parties, who in previous elections, rode to victory on the crest of regional chauvinism. The sporadic movements against the alleged infiltration of foreigners in this border state gave the idea of regionalism further acceptance.

In the 1983 bypoll for the Shillong Lok Sabha seat, the APHLC candidate, Dr Kharluki romped home even as the pro-regional party ballots were split up with a HSPDP aspirant walking away with over 70,000 votes. In the 1983 Assembly elections, the regional parties polled 49.39 per cent of the valid votes.

The sympathy wave for Indira Gandhi and the personal charisma of G. G. Swell, who reentered the political arena after resigning as India's Ambassador to Spain, helped the Congress(I) to swing the majority of Khasi voters in its favour. Said a Meghalaya PCC(I) leader, "Khasis who are the most cosmopolitan among the north-east's tribals know exactly when to rise above the sectarian interests and feel one with the rest of the nation." The expected support to Dr B. Pakem, the HPU candidate, also did not emanate from the seven Assembly segments in Jaintia Hills. Dr Pakem, a professor of political science in NEHU (North-Eastern Hill University), himself hails from the Jaintia Hills.

The heavy turnout of non-Naga voters, the traditional supporters of the Congress(I) in Dimapur, the bustling foothills town and overwhelming support from the Ao, Mon and Konyak tribes were the two main reasons for the heady victory of Chingwang Konyak, the sitting Congress(I) MP in the Lok Sabha from

Nagaland With this victory, Konyak did away with the belief that a sitting Lok Sabha MP from Nagaland cannot ensure his return for the second time to the House The failure of two regional opposition outfits—NNDP and NPP -to field a consensus candidate led to the suicidal splitting up of votes between Chalie Kevichusa, an Angami journalist and NNDP candidate and Huslka Sumi, a Sema and NPP nominee

The wave in favour of the ruling party which whipped through Arunachal Pradesh helped the party to have a clear sweep of the union territory's two Lok Sabha seats and achieve a two thirds majority in the Assembly The victory of the ruling party is attributed to the party's sway over at least 13 of the 20 major tribals in the union territory Moreover the Northeast Frontier Alliance (NFFA), a conglomeration of PPA and BJP, had a lacklustre campaign It was not even confident of its victory even from the initial stage out of a total of 30 Assembly seats it put up candidates only for 19 seats In West Lok Sabha seat Tomo Riba, PPA candidate and a former Arunachal chief minister, gave a fright to the diminutive union deputy minister for education, P K Thungon as he manouvered to rope in a majority of the Adi tribal voters in his favour. Thungon edged past Riba with a meagre 0.2 per cent lead in comparison to what they garnered in the seventh Lok Sabha elections.

A large bulk of the Manipur electorate once again expressed their disenchantment with both the Congress(I) and the organised opposition parties by opting for the Independents. Of the 193 Independents in the fray for the 60-member Manipur Assembly, 20 have been elected at the time of writing In the 1980 Assembly polls as many as 19 Independents won, setting the stage for a curious game of defections The Manipur Peoples Party (MPP), the CPI, and the Janata had failed to arrive at a consensus on the seat adjustments for the Assembly polls As a result, they could not cash in on the prevailing discontent among the urban populace, generated by the growing corruption among the high ups in Rishang Keishing's Congress (I) government and its denial of the civil rights to the people in the insurgency rocked state

The Independent winners include Congress (I) dissidents like I. D Dijuanang, Knurdinglien and J. Hoakip. Three former underground secessionist leaders, including the fabled PLA hero N Bisheswar Singh, who contested as Independents sailed effortlessly into the Assembly. They had no dearth of supporters among the women and the youth who hailed them for their clean and pro-poor people image Bisheswar, now in quest of an effective overground ancillary to link up with his underground outfit for creating a favourable political atmosphere conducive to the rebels, fought the elections from Imphal Central Jail Though the Congress (I) scraped through in both the Lok Sabha seats from the state, the result showed that the dissidents had managed to make dents into party votes and its (party's) support base among the Kuki and Hmar tribals.

Santanu Ghosh, Silchar

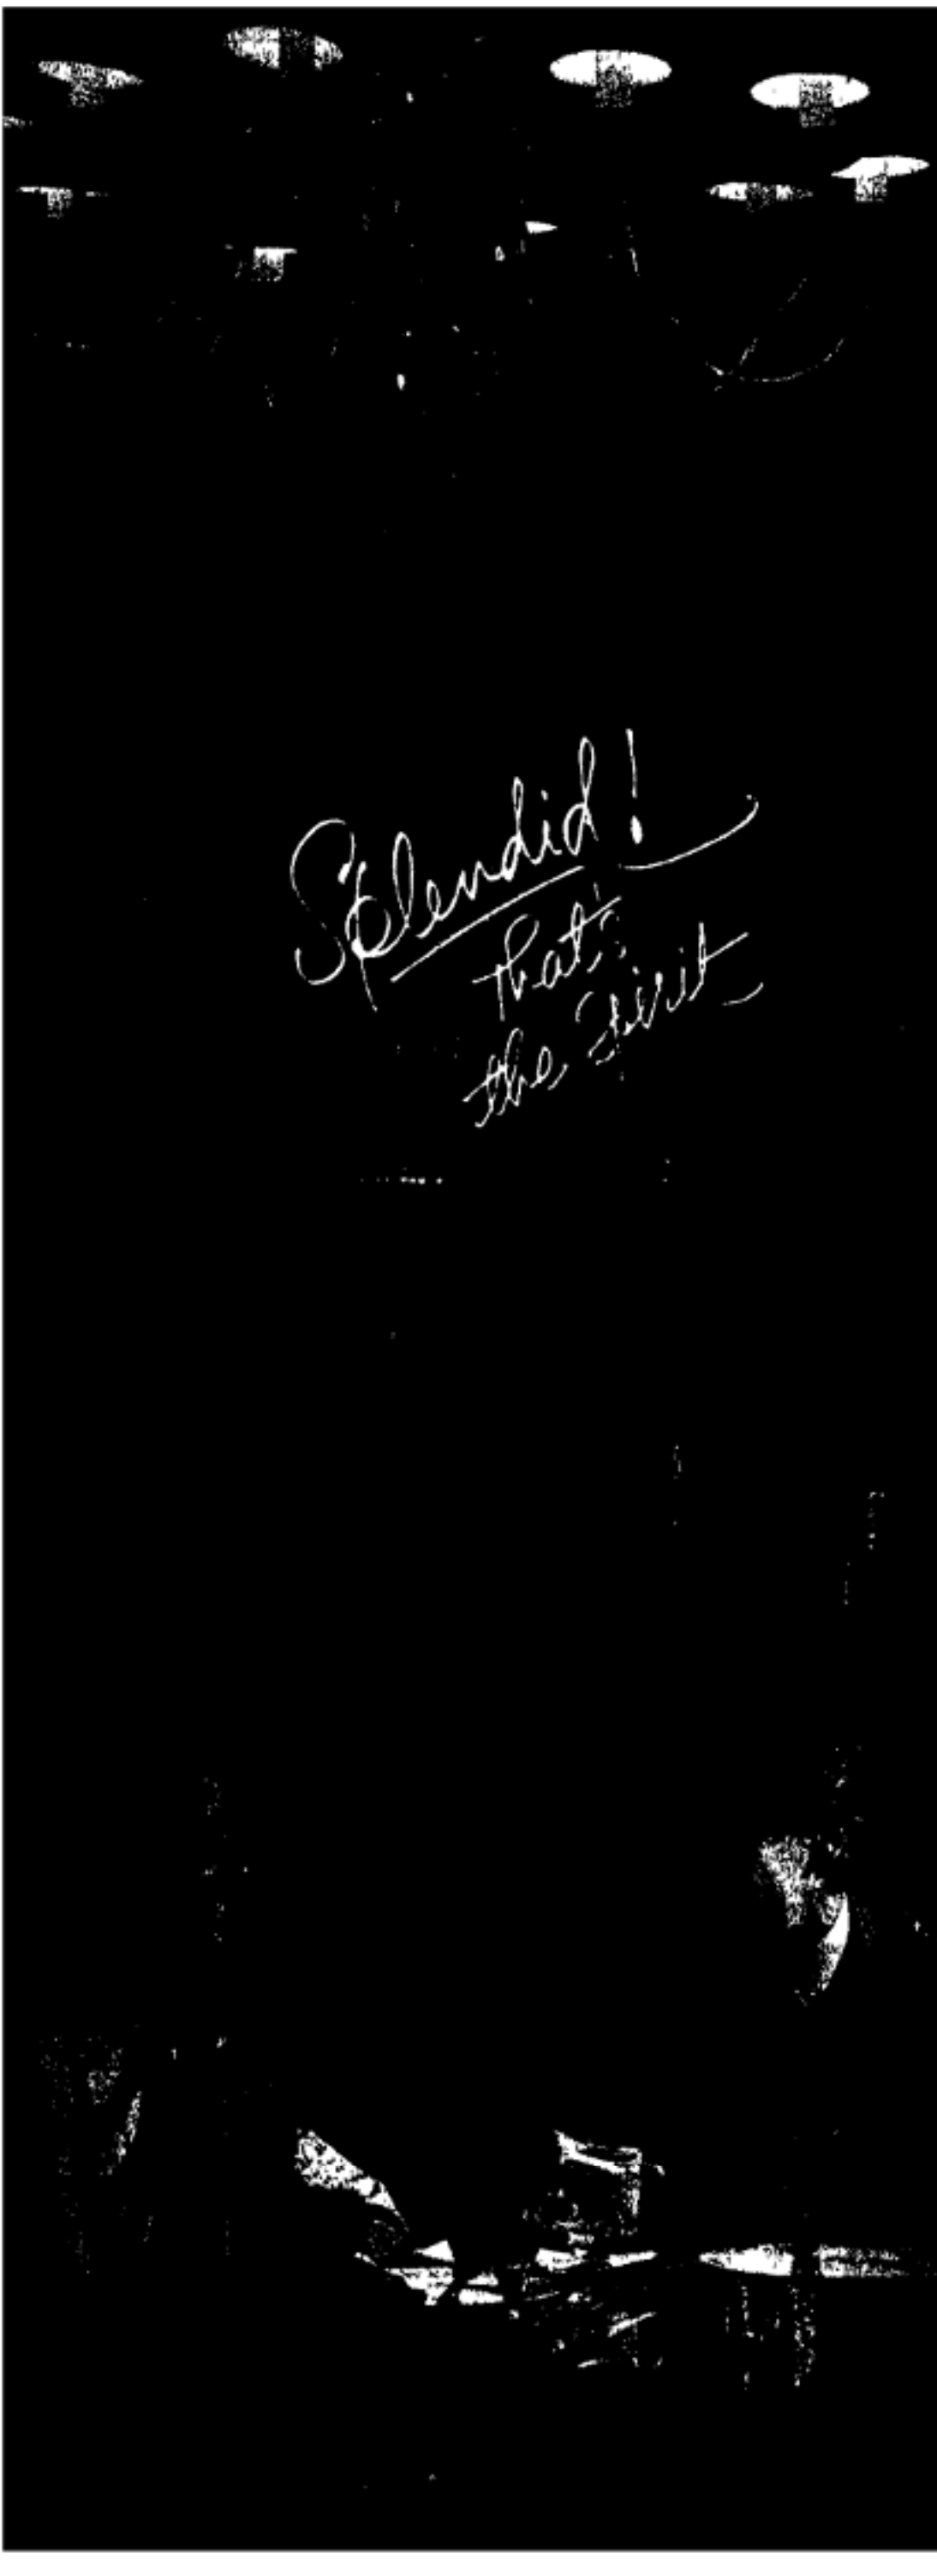
RAJASTHAN

Once Emperor Akbar asked Birbal whether his countrymen thought alike and worked in unison or took different stands on a particular question Birbal answered emphasising that all the countrymen would take the same stand The Emperor then asked him to prove his contention

Accordingly a huge tank was built and the residents of the capital city were ordered to pour a jug of milk each in the tank at night on an appointed date Aware that if someone put in water instead of milk, nobody would be able to know it, every citizen poured water into the tank In the morning Akbar and Birbal saw that the tank was filled with water and there was not a trace of milk When Akbar wanted to know how this had happened despite government orders to fill up the tank with milk pat came the reply from Birbal what he had said earlier had been proved Every citizen thought alike and acted accordingly This is the story a voter narrated when asked to comment on the landslide victory of the ruling Congress(I) at the hustings.

However, despite the Rajiv wave all over the country the results would have been different in Rajasthan had the opposition united and put up candidates in all the 25 constituencies An analysis of the poll results clearly indicates that had there been straight contests, the opposition parties could have won at least in Nagaur, Bharatpur, Pali, Banswara, Barmer and Jhunjhunu constituencies

In Nagaur, the union minister of state for foreign affairs Ramnivas Mirdha got 2 19,1961 votes. He was pitted in a triangular contest against the DMKP state unit chief and sitting MP Nathuram Mirdha and the state Janata Party president Kalyansingh Kalvi who together polled 2.93,520 votes This is 74,559 votes more than the votes polled by the ruling party candidate



K Natwar Singh

In Bharatpur diplomat-turned politician K Natwar Singh won by a margin of 79,039 votes In the fray were the DMKP, the BJP and the Congress(I) candidates The three opposition candidates together polled 2,43,565 votes against the 1,87,305 votes received by Natwar Singh Thus the opposition together polled 56,260 more than the ruling party It would have been an uphill task for the Congress(I) candidate to defeat a joint opposition candidate in this constituency

In Jhunihunu, the DMKP, BJP and Janata Party candidates together polled 2,70,197 votes This was 9,045 votes more than the 2,61,152 votes polled by the Congress(I) candidate Mohammed Ayub Khan In Pali, sitting MP and ruling party candidate Moolchand Daga got 9,517 votes less than the opposition candidates. His nearest rival, Pushpa Jain, was defeated by a margin of 35,271 votes only. In the fray were the DMKP, the Janata and the Muslim League candidates. In Barmer, the DMKP and the BJP candidates together obtained 3,000 votes more than the ruling party candidate's the sitting MP Vriddhichand Jain. Similarly in Banswara, the Congress(I) candidate secured 4,000 votes less than the BJP, DMKP, Janata and an independent candidate. All this goes to prove that the failure of opposition parties to unite was mainly responsible for their debacle in Rajasthan.

Milap Chand Dandia, Jaipur

DELUXE
Splendid!
That's the spirit
RICH MATURE MELLOW
TO BLEND SMOOTHLY WITH YOUR STYLE
Phipson

KOHINOOR

And no
two moments will ever be the same

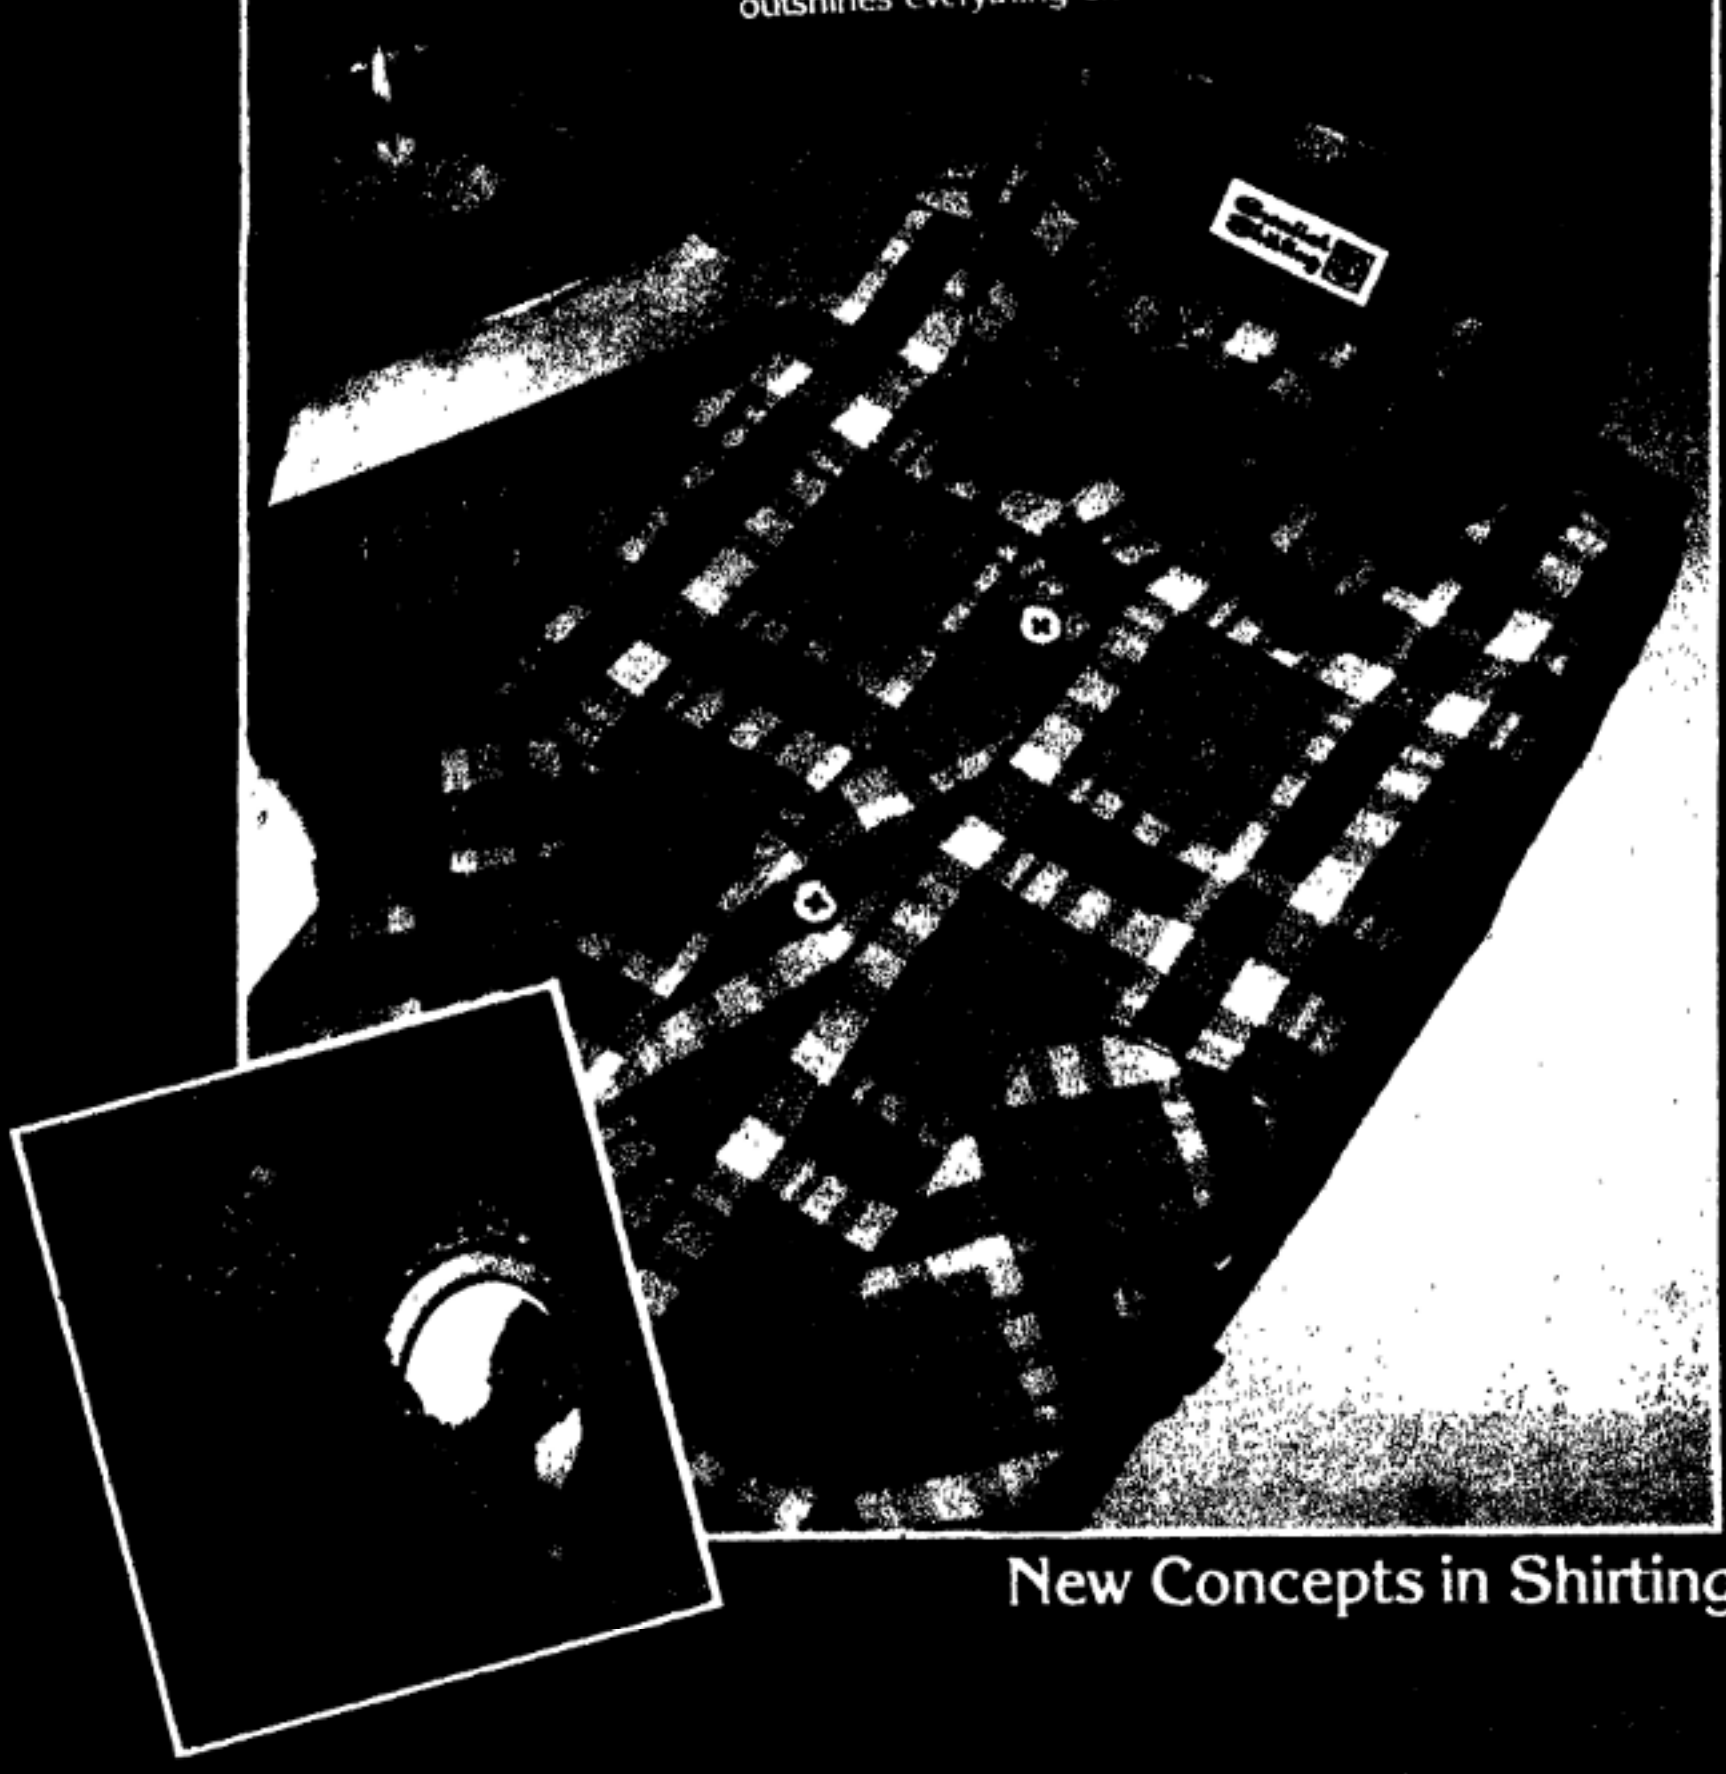
A ttk Product



3 colour condoms in one pack

Gwalior Shirting

The right shirting can transform your wardrobe. We make light work of it.

Gwalior Shirting casts a whole new light on the subject. Textures, colours and designs you've formerly searched for in vain elsewhere.

Look no further. Come to Gwalior Shirting. We make it for men who've made it. It outshines everything else.

New Concepts in Shirting

MAPP-GR-85-57-ENG

Come escape to a world of beautiful living, among beautiful people, in a beautiful locale. Address... unknown. Place... well... Paradise.

Brought to you by

CAPSTAN flavourscapes

Club Méditerranée Free with Bangkok, Pattaya, Singapore & Kuala Lumpur.

Flavourscape : Club Méditerranée.

Club Med is paradise on earth, where you banish all cares and indulge in the sheer joy of living. Sip the most exotic wines, relish the sumptuous feasts. Enjoy making friends with exciting jet setters from around the world. Watch and marvel or learn and plunge into some of the most exciting water sports. In short, simply luxuriate in the idyllic world of Club Med at Cherating Beach, where everything is on the house

Club Med can also set up super style conferences and conventions, ideal for Company incentives.

Capstan offers you this unforgettable experience in a 11 day holiday package covering Bangkok, Pattaya, Singapore and Kuala Lumpur.

Flavour is the Capstan world.

Capstan has searched the world and handpicked experiences to give you a truly memorable holiday. Because flavour is the Capstan world Now there are no other holidays. Just flavourdays.

And many more Flavourscapes for you from only Rs. 5999/- onwards.

Capstan Flavour. Nothing Less.

Tours subject to RBI approval.

CLARION C-CFK-6A

For details of Capstan Flavourscapes contact
TRAVEL HOUSE
We make travel simple. And flavourful

Head office: 102 AVG Bhawan, M-3 Middle Circle Connaught Circus, New Delhi and branch offices at. Royal Insurance Building, 14 Jamshedji Tata Road, Bombay and all Welcomgroup hotels . Maurya Sheraton, New Delhi. Mughal Sheraton, Agra. Banjara, Hyderabad. Sea Rock, Bombay. Chola Sheraton, Madras. Windsor Manor, Bangalore. Mansingh, Jaipur. Cidade-de-Goa, Goa. And all Air India offices or your Travel Agent.

In co operation with
AIR-INDIA

STATUTORY WARNING: CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

KARNATAKA

Mark Twain once said that there are three kinds of lies: lies damn lies and statistics That may be a little harsh on statistics, but in the precise field of numbers, statistics is known to lend itself to mischief, especially with politicians For politicians, statistics is like putty, to be shaped into convenient figures to distort and deceive.

How frail statistics can be is best understood by the specious argument proposed by the former Karnataka chief minister Ramakrishna Hegde even before the Lok Sabha elections Of the 28 Lok Sabha seats in the state, 27 were held by the Congress(I) and only one by the Janata Party Therefore, said Mr Hegde, even if the Janata Party wins just two seats in the 1984 elections, it would represent a 100 per cent increase

The Janata Party won four of the 28 seats. But that was not enough to save the Janata government in Karnataka Mr Hegde had to resign even though his party registered a 300 per cent increase in the number of seats won The party needed something like a 1000 per cent increase to remain in power, but could not manage it in the face of the sympathy wave and Rajiv wave. Does this mean that the Janata Party has been routed? On the contrary, according to statistics, the voting pattern during the just-concluded elections reveals a strange conundrum. first, though the Congress(I) has won, the Janata Party has gained. Second, where the Janata has gained, the Congress(I) has lost.

In strictly numerical terms, the Janata Party has won three seats more in 1984 than in 1980, while the Congress(I) has won three less (1980: Congress(I) 27; Janata 1; 1984: Congress(I) 24; Janata 4). Beneath the superficial loss for the Congress(I) is the real loss. While the party polled 56.25 per cent of the votes polled in the 1980 election, the figure came down to 51.84 per cent in 1984: a drop of nearly 4.5 per cent. The Congress(I) loss in Karnataka stands out considering the fact that it has made amazing gains elsewhere in India, barring Andhra Pradesh.

There has also been a steady erosion of Congress(I) votes in Karnataka since 1971. From 70.87 per cent votes polled in 1971, it slid dramatically to about 56 per cent in 1977, remained steady in 1980, before a further slide to 51.84 per cent in 1984. The Congress(I) loss is the Janata's gain, to parrot the familiar line. In 1980, when the Janata Party won just one seat from the state, it polled a poor 22 per cent to the Congress(I)'s 56.25 per cent. This time, while winning four seats, the Janata Party has polled about 41 per cent (to the Congress I's 51 84 per cent) an increase of nearly 19 per cent The Janata Party also polled more votes than it did in the January 1983 Assembly election (33 08 per cent), when it came to power So, if anything, the Janata government has found approval

It must be noted that in 1984, the Janata Party tally includes the five seats given to its allies (four to the Bharatiya Janata Party and one to the CPI) But the allies have fared miserably Barring Bidar, the candidates put up by the allies in the other four constituencies lost by more than a one-lakh vote margin Not a single Janata candidate lost by a lakh plus margin, a regular feature in the past In 1980, the Congress(I) won 22 of the 28 seats by a lakh plus margin The stiff contest put up by the Janata Party is in sharp contrast to the display by its counterpart units in other states, and indeed all other opposition party, barring the Telugu Desam, the National Conference and the CPI(M) in West Bengal.

The Janata Party's gain is further accentuated when its performance in every constituency is taken In each of the 28 constituencies, including the five given to its allies, there has been a positive swing in its favour. This positive swing varies from more than 30 per cent in constituencies like Mandya, Koppal and Bellary, to just two per cent in the Janata stronghold of Bangalore South Simply put, the Janata Party has polled a larger percentage of votes in all constituencies than in the 1980 general elections.

The Congress(I) on the other hand, has registered a negative swing in 20 of the 28 constituencies i e polled less votes than in the 1980 elections. In four constituencies this negative swing is more than 10 per cent The conclusion is that though the Congress(I) won the 1984 Lok Sabha elections comfortably enough in Karnataka, its popularity is on the decline The Janata Party, on the other hand, has struck roots and is now a well-entrenched cadre-based party.

The election sprang surprises, with the Janata Party winning some unexpected seats, even as it lost some which it was tipped to win. By far, the most stunning loss was that of Abdul Nazeer Sab, who was defeated by the Congress(I) nominee, Aziz Sait, in Dharwad South constituency. Sab, as rural development minister in the Hegde cabinet, had done good work. He had everything going for him: his image, a fair name and charisma But in the face of the massive Congress(I) wave, he was a hapless victim and to many others including Congressmen, a tragic victim. His loss only reinforced what was suspected after Devraj Urs's miserable rout in the 1980 Lok Sabha elections; that people do not always vote for a government that works The theme of danger to unity and integrity which the Congress(I) contested on, carried more weight with the people.

Likewise, in Bangalore North constituency, the Janata Party general secretary, George Fernandes, fell to union minister Jaffer Sharief. This, inspite of the fact that seven of the eight Assembly segments in the constituency are held by Janata and its ally, the CPI(M). Once again, the sympathy wave, combined with the poor image of the opposition at the national level contributed to Fernandes's defeat. "I'm baffled," said George Fernandes after his defeat.

But while the Janata Party lost, it was certainly not routed as the percentage of votes polled by the party shows. In several constituencies, the Congress(I) candidates won by a narrow margin. In the Chikkodi reserved constituency, union minister B. Shankaranand won by a mere 3,000 votes. In a few of the constituencies, Janata candidates failed to win, thanks to some votepicking by unexpected candidates. In the Kanakapura constituency, P. G. R. Scindia, a minister in the Hegde cabinet lost by about 10,000 votes. A DMKP candidate in the field with no chance of winning had taken away 28,000

Jaffer Sharief: giant killer

'We Have Polled More Votes Than Ever Before'

Ramakrishna Hegde told SUNDAY

Q: What reason do you ascribe for your party's poor performance in the just concluded elections?*

A: I would credit it to the sense of discrimination by the electorate. They knew this election was for the Lok Sabha, and that it had nothing to do with the state government. They knew that as against Rajiv Gandhi as Prime Minister, there was no other viable, credible alternative. At the same time, here, our voters in Karnataka, did not want to let down the Janata government, which explains how we polled a high percentage—about 41 per cent—of the votes.

Q: Don't you think the results of this election give a fillip to the theory put forth when Devaraj Urs was routed in 1980 by Mrs Gandhi, that people need not necessarily vote for a government that performs well?

A: There is some justification in drawing such an inference. But I would still give credit to our people. They know the difference between the parliamentary poll and an Assembly election. You see, if the same results (of the 1984 Lok Sabha poll) are repeated in the coming Assembly elections I would say there is absolute justification in this conclusion. But let us see.

Q: But in the just concluded election, you did try to make the election a local issue. You told the people it was a referendum on the performance of the state government.

A: Yes, I did. I was afraid the opposition did not present a very credible picture and so I drew on the performance of the state government hoping it would fetch us the votes.

Q: And you failed?

A: No. We have polled more votes than ever before.

Q:Do you have a new plank to fight the Assembly elections?

A: The performance of my government.

Ramakrishna Hegde

Q: What about individuals? Gundu Rao...

A: Oh, they will be there campaigning. The contrast is there for all to see. We will not mention it.

Q: Have you given any thought to forming a new opposition party? A new front?

A: We have not discussed it so far. I don't say there is no such proposal. Many people have thought about it. But there has been no serious discussion yet. Now that the Assembly elections are coming up, there is no time. I think after the Assembly elections, we can give some time to the proposal.

Q: The other day you mentioned the good performance put up by Farooq Abdullah's National Conference and NTR's Telugu Desam. Have you considered going regional also?

A: No, not at all. It is all right for them. They had their reasons. But I am not going to ...

Q: What about a federation of such regional opposition parties at the national level as suggested by Minoo Masani?

A: Yes, the federation idea is worth considering. But not just a federation of regional parties. There have to be national opposition parties also.

Q: It appears there is a need for building up an opposition in the country anew, sifting out the deadwood. What thought have given to this matter?

A: What is first necessary is thorough and deep introspection to find out where we have gone wrong. It is no use finding faults with any individual. Perhaps our policy (about projecting a coalition) was not correct. More than anything, we failed to present a credible picture before the electorate

Q: Is introspection enough? Don't you think stronger measures are necessary?

A: Yes. After introspection whatever measures are necessary to improve our image, they must be taken.

Interviewed by Chidanand Rajghatta

votes, while a Raitha Sangha candidate polled 8,000 votes. Thousands of votes in the urban segment of the constituency were not registered. Scindia, who had nursed the constituency meticulously for over a year, was understandably crestfallen. But Hegde's gambit of throwing in six of his cabinet colleagues into the fray failed miserably. Five of them, including Sab and Scindia, lost. The lone winner was urban development minister V. S. Krishna Iyer from the traditional Janata stronghold of Bangalore South.

The biggest blow to the Congress(I) came in the Mandya constituency where the union minister, S. M. Krishna was routed by the octogenarian Janata nominee, K. V. Shankare Gowda. This was a strange case where the Congress(I) sympathy wave could not match the sympathy wave for Shankare Gowda, who has never won a direct election and who was fighting what was his last big election. In the Kolar reserved constituency, the Congress(I) suffered another setback when the sitting MP, G. Y. Krishnan, seeking a fifth term from the same constituency, was defeated by Dr Venkatesh, a practising physician and a newcomer to politics. The Kolar win for the Janata emphasised the importance of the NTR factor in Karnataka. Kolar has a large Telugu electorate and it was only one of the two constituencies where NTR campaigned for the Janata Party.

For the Congress(I), it was a victory to be savoured and later, mulled over. Clearly, it is not the same Congress of 1971, 1977 and 1980. There will be no more easy victories; the party had only four wins by lakh-plus margins. The halcyon days of the Congress are over and it is only up to Rajiv Gandhi to prevent this perceptible downhill slide.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Bangalore

Stemming the Tide

ANDHRA PRADESH

The Lok Sabha election results were a rude shock to the Congress(I) in Andhra Pradesh, especially as Rajiv Gandhi's intensive three-day tour had given a tremendous boost to the morale of the Congressmen. In fact, some of the party leaders were boasting of bagging 25 seats. They claimed that Mr Gandhi's charisma would be successful in driving out NTR from the state But the Congress(I) hold of 41 out of 42 seats in both 1977 and 1980 Lok Sabha elections loosened and the party managed to win only six seats, half of which they managed to scrape through with a margin of less than 10,000 votes. The Congress(I) got nasty surprises when many of the party stalwarts including union home minister P.V. Narasimha Rao and one-time party president K. Brahmananda Reddy lost their seats to the Telugu Desam which Congress(I) leaders had referred to as "a regional party."

The Congress(I)'s expectations in the state had shot up because of the relatively low level of factional in fighting in the party and the large crowds which turned up at Rajiv Gandhi's public meetings. Congress leaders had gleefully accepted the three additional days of electioneering that the party had to its benefit with the polling date set for 27 December. The Congress(I) took the crowds to mean votes and thought that the sympathy wave which had not been evident earlier, was triggered off by Rajiv Gandhi's meetings. While in the rest of the country, the Congress(I) campaign highlighted issue like the unity and integrity of the country, in Andhra Pradesh the Prime Minister tried to brand the opposition conclaves as disruptive and divisive attempts of the opposition parties. He used a catchy slogan to end his speeches: "This is a vote not for Telugu Desam. Kashmir Desam or UP Desam," he said, "this is a vote for Bharat Desam." However, in Andhra Pradesh, there has been a heightened awareness of the political happenings in the state since August 1984 when N. Bhaskara Rao was forcibly installed as chief minister. Rajiv Gandhi questioning the morality of N.T. Ramarao remaining as caretaker chief minister for three months did not cut much ice among the people, especially when many of the MLAs owing allegiance to Bhaskara Rao joined the Congress(I) recently.

The election results came as a pleasant surprise to the Telugu Desam Party too. The party's optimistic estimates had not pegged their tally to more than 23 seats The sympathy factor as well as Rajiv Gandhi's personal impact was difficult to estimate. The united front that the Congress(I) presented after the election campaign gave the Congress supporters and party workers a lot of confidence. The Congress (I) workers had been forwarding the theory that the TDP should be elected to the state Assembly but the Congress for the centre. That the Congress(I) misread the mood of the people is obvious for, in the few days before polling, Congress(I) leaders in Hyderabad chortled—their bicycle is punctured now (cycle is the Telegu Desam election symbol).

All the six members of the union cabinet from Andhra Pradesh toppled in the face of the Telugu Desam onslaught. Even Vijayabhaskara Reddy who had withstood the NTR wave at Yemmiganur Assembly constituency in 1983 and had won his Kurnool Lok Sabha seat with a margin of over 2,00,000 votes in the 1977 and 1980 elections lost at Kurnool this time by 7,400 votes. Union home minister Narasimha Rao could retain his berth in Parliament only through the Ramtek seat in Maharashtra where he was elected by a margin of two lakh votes after losing his home constituency of Hanamkonda in Andhra Pradesh. P. Shiv Shankar, P. Venkatasubbaiah, M.S. Sanjeevi Rao, Vijayabhaskara Reddy and Mallikarjun resigned from the cabinet after losing their seats in the state. Even the frantic last-minute shift from Secunderabad to Medak by P. Shiv Shankar in search of a safe constituency (Medak having been Indira Gandhi's constituency, the Congress-I expected the sympathy factor to attract the votes) did not help.

N.T. Rama Rao campaigning in Andhra Pradesh

There was no wave operating in the state, neither a sympathy wave nor an NTR wave, but the solid Telugu Desam support that NTR has carved out for himself remained with him. The Congress(I) had anticipated that the acute anti-Congress feeling in the state would have subsided after the death of Indira Gandhi, but Mr Rajiv Gandhi could not gain any goodwill in the state The Congress(I) enthusiasm, however, was not totally misplaced. The party gained eight per cent votes over the percentage of votes it had polled in the 1983 Assembly elections. Five per cent of this increase in votes came from the decrease in the votes of independent candidates. The Congress(I) could make only a marginal dent of three per cent in the votes cast in favour of the Telugu Desam Party and its allies in 1983 The largest increase in votes for the Congress(I) came in the Andhra region (12 per cent). The anticipated five per cent increase in the votes in Telengana which could have given the Congress(I) half the seats in the region did not come about; the Congress(I) gained only three per cent increase in the votes but this was offset by the combined opposition front. The opposition unity and seat adjustment in all constituencies except Khammam helped the parties to consolidate their support in the region.

The Congress(I) party made every effort to sway the people. A number of popular Telugu film personalites including Krishna and Jamuna, the latter a heroine of many NTR starrers, were roped in. The party mounted a high-level media blitz: there were video films of Indira Gandhi's funeral, a burrakatha (folk drama) on the life of the late Prime Minister, gigantic cutouts of Indira Gandhi, large hoardings in questionable taste depicting her assassination and audio cassettes of her speeches.

The Telugu Desam which had introduced a cassette of NTR's speeches, film dialogues and massive cutouts to the Andhra Pradesh election scene had to fall back on NTR and his personal appeal to the people through his tours in the Chaitanya Ratham. NTR and the party leaders brought home to the people the activity or rather the lack of it by the Congress(I) MPs, many of whom had not bothered to visit their constituencies. As a result, for the first time, sitting members were asked embarrassing questions on what they had done for their constituencies.

While Congressmen in the rest of the country are elated with the Lok Sabha results, in Andhra Pradesh where they worked together keeping the forthcoming Assembly elections in mind, they are in a totally shattered condition. On the other hand, the Telugu Desam has proved its relevance to the national opposition.

Shubha Singh, Hyderabad

"We Will Provide a Constructive Opposition"

NTR told SUNDAY

Q: Your party and its allies have won 33 Lok Sabha seats in Andhra Pradesh. What is the reason for this victory?

A: It is the confidence that the people repose in us (the Telugu Desam Party) and it is due to the great dedication with which we are following our party's manifesto and implementing our policies in upholding the poorer sections of the society, not at all caring for the rich.

Q: While the rest of the country has fallen to the Congress(I) it is only in Andhra Pradesh that the Telugu Desam has held its own. What are the reasons for this?

A: It is our great concern for the common man, their (Congress-I's) approach is from the platform (while) we work for the poor and that is what affects the people.

Q: During his election meetings in Andhra Pradesh, Rajiv Gandhi questioned the morality of your caretaker government remaining in office for three months.

A: These were all election speeches. I have also given my replies in the public meetings.

Q: Why do you think the opposition parties failed at the national level?

A: The opposition leaders do not have a correct view for perfect understanding among themselves for which I was trying. We need to have coordination and cooperation. Only then will the people have confidence in us (opposition parties).

Q: Now that the Telugu Desam Party forms the largest opposition party in the Lok Sabha, what will be your party's role in Parliament?

A: We will hold the opposition role tightly. We will project our party's policies. Our emphasis is on the common man. We will give (the nation) a constructive opposition.

Q: During the election campaign, the Congress(I) tried to brand the regional parties including the Telugu Desam Party as separatist (forces). What do you think?

A: They (Congress-I) can't say anything now. The people have given us a mandate on the national level also. They (the Congress-I) will be insulting my electorate if they speak like this.

Q: What are the issues your party MPs will take up in the Lok Sabha?

A: We are interested in equal rights for women in ancestral property; equal rights for women along with men. Don't you agree?

Q: Do you plan to bring in an anti-defection bill?

A: Yes. We want an anti-defection bill. We want politics to be free of corruption. If the Congress wants to remove corruption in politics, let them vote for the bill. If they want corruption to continue, let them not support the bill.

Q: You have extended fullest support and cooperation to Rajiv Gandhi in a message wishing him success in the future. Does this mean that you will soften your stand vis-a-vis the centre and the Congress(I)?

A: I am first an Indian, only after that do I belong to my state. It is my duty as an Indian to support the centre.

Interviewed by Shubha Singh

KASHMIR

The ruling National Conference with its ally the Congress(I) managed to secure only two seats out of the five in which elections were held. The National Conference (Opposition) led by the former chief minister Dr Farooq Abdullah strengthened its claim to rule the state by checking the massive Rajiv wave that swept the country. The results in fact showed that the people of the state did not approve of the unfair means adopted by the Congress(I) to throw the Farooq Abdullah government out of power. Even the election commission recognised Dr Abdullah's faction as the real National Conference by granting it the plough symbol. Commented a victorious Farooq Abdullah: "Had the ruling party-Congress(I) combine not resorted to booth capturing and other malpractices their candidates would have even lost their deposits."

Even though the ruling party had lost the battle before the gong sounded, the Congress(I) tried its best to create an impact by vainly trying to woo Mirwaiz Moulvi Farooq of Awami Action Committee and Abdul Gani Lone, leader of pro-autonomy People's Conference. Mirwaiz Farooq and Lone despite being unhappy about Dr Abdullah's attitude in not consulting his allies about the selection of candidates, appealed to the people to vote for the opposition National Conference.

In Baramulla things were made easy for the NC (Opposition) when Lone withdrew his nomination to work for them. The ruling NC even hobnobbed with the Jamaat-e-Islami and likeminded parties which have pockets of influence. The chief minister, Mr Shah, met Jamaat leaders including Qazi Saifuddin. Later Mr Shah said that in fact, Jamaat leaders had called on him to plead the case of their party colleague Syed Ali Geelani lodged in the Srinagar central jail for anti-India activities. However, the Jamaat called for a boycott of the elections to "register protest against India's occupation of Kashmir."

In Srinagar, the chief minister's son Muzaffar Shah was beaten by the sitting MP, Abdul Rashid Kabuli of NC (Opposition). Shah and his party expected that Kashmiri pandits and Shiites would vote for the ruling party. The CM had irked many Shiites by imposing restriction during the last Moharram celebrations. A section of the Shiites led by state Congress(I) legislature party leader Moulvi Iftekhar Hussain Ansari obviously backed the ruling party candidate while prominent Shiite leaders Moulvi Abbas Ansari and Aga Mahmood campaigned for the NC (Opposition). The Kashmiri pandits boycotted the election alleging discrimination against them.

In Anantnag, the NC (Opposition) candidate Begum Akbar Jahan Abdullah, mother of the two rival presidents of the National Conference had a smooth sailing. Such was the respect she commanded that even the chief minister and his wife Khalida Shah (Begum Abdullah's daughter) did not campaign against her. In desperation the ruling party resorted to rigging and booth-capturing and the election commission ordered repoll in 30 polling booths in two Kashmir valley constituencies Anantnag and Srinagar.

In Jammu-Poonch Dr Karan Singh who contested as an independent candidate finished a miserable third. Janak Raj Gupta of the Congress(I) won the seat defeating Shabir Ahmed Salaria of the NC (O). Karan Singh had tried to win over the Sikh electorate of the constituency and had visited the Sikh populated areas of the city and so the predominantly Hindu electorate voted against him. Karan Singh's "betrayal" of Mrs Gandhi was also an issue. Karan Singh had shifted from Udhampur from where he had been winning since 1967.

Yusuf Jameel

Farooq Abdullah addressing a meeting

'People Have Total Confidence In Me'

Farooq Abdullah told SUNDAY

Q: How did you stem the Rajiv Gandhi wave and win all the three seats in the Kashmir valley?*

A: My party National Conference, fought for the independence of the Kashmiris and it was this party which became instrumental in the state's accession to the Indian Union. It has a record of good deeds and always stood for the people of Jammu and Kashmir, irrespective of their caste, creed and other affiliations. The people also love this party and its principles and ideology. There is no denying that the Congress(I) is a national party, but the people of Jammu and Kashmir have their own problems and interests.

Q: But it is alleged that you as well as other opposition National Conference leaders resorted to arousing the religious and regional feelings of the people during your election campaign.

A: That is totally baseless and malicious. You know, not only did the Muslims of Kashmir vote for my party but other sections of people, including the Kashmiri pandits and Sikhs as well In Jammu division too which is a Hindu predominant belt, my party nominee has polled nearly one-and-a-half lakh votes and gave a tough fight to the Congress(I) candidate there.

Q: On the eve of the elections you had asserted that the Congress(I) headed by Mr Rajiv Gandhi was not the Congress which had fought for the country's independence. But after it returned to power through the elections, you have publicly praised this party and its leader. Is it an attempt to mend fences with the Prime Minister?

A: The countrymen have overwhelmingly voted for the Congress(I) in the recent elections. Facts are facts and you can hardly put them behind. One should accept the people's verdict gracefully. I'm for reconciliation and my efforts will be directed not at destroying the country but strengthening it.

Q: Does it mean that you have given up your alliance with the opposition ?

A: No, not at all. You know, my alliance with the opposition was not for personal gains. We had been saying that the Congress(I) had adopted some wrong and anti-people policies and asked the voters to vote it out of power. We wanted that the country should prosper. We have many problems to tackle, Punjab being the most sensitive one. I'm even prepared to sacrifice my life to see this most sensitive problem solved early.

Q: What were the main causes for the opposition's rout?

A: Disunity. The opposition failed to unite. Various opposition parties pitted their candidates against each other. After tasting a debacle, I hope the opposition parties will try to unite and reach a consensus on all national and regional issues.

Q: You have appealed to the Prime Minister to do justice to the people of Jammu and Kashmir. What kind of justice do you expect from him?

A: He should direct his party unit in Kashmir to withdraw its support to the Ghulam Mohammad Shah ministry, so that the way is paved for the dissolution of the state Assembly and fresh elections for the House are held. The resounding victory of my party in the elections has proved that the people have reposed total confidence in me and my party.

Q: Following your dismissal in July you had demanded the removal of the state Governor, Mr Jagmohan, accusing him of siding with the Congress(I) and its ally, the National Conference faction led by your estranged sister, Khalida Shah. But you have now praised him publicly for ensuring a free and fair poll in his state.

A: I'm a Muslim, so I believe only in the truth. You know, very few politicians speak the truth. But I must confess that it was the Governor who sternly rejected the suggestion to rig the elections in his state, for the benefit of the ruling party Congress(I) combine The role the Governor played and the impartiality the poll and law and order machinery maintained helped in restoring their trust. I'm happy over this.

Q: But soon after the polling was over you had, at a press conference, accused the Congress(I) and the ruling National Conference of resorting to large-scale rigging and had also demanded repoll in the Anantnag constituency.

A: They, of course, tried to rig the poll. Some polling booths were captured, particularly in the Anantnag constituency, by them. But our party supporters resisted it. The Election Commission had also reports on this. They, therefore, ordered repolling in many polling stations. This way their attempts were foiled to some extent. Had they not captured booths and resorted to other irregularities their candidates would have even lost their deposits.

Q: Is there any move to bridge the gulf between the Congress(I) leaders and you?

A: This boy (Rajiv) has guts and we should cooperate with him

Interviewed by Yusuf Jameel

WEST BENGAL

The CPI(M) has been rejected by the voters in Calcutta and the surrounding industrial belt. It has maintained only a toe-hold in the rural districts of Burdwan, Bankura, Midnapore, Purulia, and Coochbehar In the north, in Darjeeling and Jalpaiguri, the party has got through by the skin of its teeth. However, the voters have returned all the CPI candidates and most of the contestants belonging to the Revolutionary Socialist Party (RSP) and the Forward Bloc. To the discerning observer, the results appear to be a censure of the CPI(M).

The Congress(I) on the other hand, has swept Calcutta and the industrial belt by spectacular margins; it has increased its strength considerably in north Bengal, and has made inroads into the "red bastions" of Serampore, Hooghly and the 24 Parganas. The Congress's victory has forced the CPI(M) leaders to finally admit their failure to assess the mood of the voters. The Marxist leaders have tried to dismiss the "nightmare" results as a manifestation of the "Indira wave." In addition, both chief minister Jyoti Basu and the CPI(M) state secretary, Saroj Mukherjee, have held newspapers, AIR and TV guilty of misleading the voters about the true state of things.

The CPI(M)-dominated Left Front came to power in the wake of the Janata wave of 1977. At the 1980 hustings, the Front improved its position. Now, there is no mistake about the fact that the CPI(M) is losing its support base among the middle classes, the urban industrial workers as well as the vast majority of the rural poor who live below the poverty line. Although the chips are down, there is no unanimity in the Front about the reasons for the debacle. Though the CPI(M) wants to forget the entire episode as just another manifestation of the Indira wave, the RSP and Forward Bloc think that the Front's loss of touch with the masses is at the root of the defeat.

The bells indicating a debacle were tolling long before the ignominous defeat came. It was evident from the Assembly by-election results in 1983 and this year (the Front lost in three of the five seats), as well as in from the panchayat elections. In the Howrah municipal elections this year, the Front narrowly defeated the Congress(I), but the Front leaders, instead of taking the proper lesson from the results, preferred to ignore it altogether.

In fact, during the past seven years in power, the CPI(M) and its partners have increasingly depended on the bureaucracy rather than on mass contact. At times, the approach has been totally insensitive to popular expectations. Take for example chief minister Jyoti Basu's trip to China when the state was reeling under the enterric epidemic which took more than a thousand lives. Or, for that matter the unseemly mudslinging the between the PWD minister, Jatin Chakravorty, and the urban dvelopment minister, Prasanta Sur, over condition of roads in the city and districts. People were bewildered when Mr Chakravorty started giving sermons on such subjects as culture, music and the arts during his squabbles with the well-known singer, Ms Usha Uthup.

The Left Front, in fact, failed to live upto the expectations it generated among the people. The much publicised "operation Barga," which was instituted to give sharecropping rights to landless peasants, was dropped as soon as the rural gentry resisted it. Strikes organised by trade unions often led to lockouts and closures and ultimately unemployment. The employment curve took a downward trend and the Front leaders did nothing more than issuing statements about future investments in the state, which, however, never materialised.

Law minister Ashoke Sen at the Calcutta airport

Mrs Gandhi's return to power in 1980 upset the Front's applecart. The CPI(M) as well as the Front leaders miscalculated her intentions and assumed that she might topple the West Bengal government. Accordingly, the state government adopted a bunch of welfare measures which ultimately boomeranged. The Front exchequer went bankrupt. Measures like unemployment dole, disbursement of dearness allowance at central rates, and increased payscales for teachers, municipal employees etc, were taken. This increased the burden on the exchequer at a time when revenue collections were falling. Plan expenditure had to be diverted to non-plan heads creating a "Catch 22" situation where the state had to depend on overdrafts.

As the financial situation deteriorated further, the CPI(M)-dominated Front tried to take the easy way out. It tried to shift the blame on the centre and raised the non-Marxist bogey of the centre's stepmotherly attitude towards the state. During the election campaign, the Left Front raised national issues like unity and integrity trying to gloss over its nonperformance. And this approach suited the Congress as it, almost with a vengeance, capitalised on the Front's acts of commission and ommission in the past seven years. Nonplussed, the CPI(M) brought Dr Farooq Abdullah for campaigning in Muslim-majority areas, but interestingly enough none of the central leaders of the party were asked to campaign in West Bengal. At the same time the party did not hesitate to mount a campaign against the railway minister, A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chaudhury, in Malda, which was nothing short of character assassination.

The smugness of the CPI(M) leadership is evident from the fact that ever after polling was over, they could not gauge the erosion of their strength. Saroj Mukherjee, who glibly dismissed the results as a manifestation of the Indira wave after the final results came in, had only a couple of days back said that there was no Indira wave. The realisation of the defeat, however, is dawning on the CPI(M) and its Front partners now. Benoy Chaudhury, the state land reforms minister, has admitted that over-bureaucratisation of panchayats had alienated the rural masses from the party. The RSP and Forward Bloc leaders now admit with uncanny hindsight that after all the vote might have been "an anti-Left Front wave." The erosion of the Left Front's strength may be gauged from the fact that while the Front had a margin of 35 lakh votes in 1980, this time it is less than a lakh. The defeat of the CPI(M) politburo member, Samar Mukherjee, by a margin of about a lakh votes by Priya Ranjan Das Munshi (Congress-I) in Howrah, only highlights the magnitude of the erosion of the CPI(M)'s strength in an area where the lower middle classes, factory workers, rural poor and the rich live cheek by jowl.

The CPI(M) has to make up its mind now about whether to stick to power or to go for a fresh mandate. There are divisions over the issue both in the CPI(M) as well as in the Front. The voters, at least in this state, have made it clear that no party, not even the CPI(M) or the Left Front, can take them for granted.

Tarun Ganguly, Calcutta

How We Won the Elections

Srikant Verma, AICC(I) spokesman, analyses the Congress(I) victory

The issues in this election were simple. The people really made up their minds the day Mrs Gandhi was assassinated. It was also—if we analyse the problem—a way to avenge the death of Mrs Gandhi The forces which were responsible for the assassination of Mrs Gandhi have been taught a lesson. By forces, I do not mean the opposition; I am referring to the forces which were for the destabilisation of the country The people of India want, through their vote, to say that this country cannot be destabilised

But I would still say that it was a positive vote During the campaign Mr Chandra Shekhar began to say that unity and national integrity were not the issues This I think was an insult to the feelings of the people It showed an utter lack of concern on the part of the opposition. People began to reconsider whether the country could be safe in the hands of people who do not respect their feelings. So, I feel that they were punished. If they had not uttered such sentences, some of them might not have lost the elections

Jubilant Congress(I) supporters rejoicing on the streets of Delhi

This was not a complex election; there were not too many issues involved either. The opposition parties were unnecessarily raising issues which were peripheral and minor. There was only one issue: the unity and the indivisibility of India. The Congress(I) rightly understood the mood of the people. The Congress party had already lost its leader for the cause of unity and integrity of the country. I think that it was on this issue that we won the election.

To some extent, the victory was also a vote against the opposition.

Day in and day out, during my press briefings, I reminded the opposition leaders through the press to read the writing on the wall. The people were concerned about the unity of the nation, but all the time the opposition accused us of raising the bogey of unity. They have been punished, but by and large it is a positive vote for the unity and integrity of the country. The people have given a big mandate to Rajiv Gandhi so that he does not have to depend on anyone. He is free to act: to make the choices, to provide the stability in India.

The votes of the women have been very important in the elections. They were very aggrieved, they felt deeply hurt when Mrs Gandhi was murdered. This country, although it has a great intellectual tradition, is basically emotional. Indians respond to things emotionally. There is deep compassion, kindness among the people. That, at least, has been the message of our philosophy and religion Our women were, therefore, deeply hurt when Mrs Gandhi was assassinated. That is why, as I said earlier, they decided that very day to vote for Rajiv Gandhi It was not a sympathy wave, although it is being called thus. The word in itself seems to me to be very odd It is not sympathy, it is a decision: Mrs Gandhi died for a cause and let us uphold that cause.

I would also like to mention that a lot of canards were spread by the BJP and other parties that there was a Hindu backlash, that only the Hindus would vote for the Congress(I) while the Muslims and Sikhs would not. But the results have proved once again that all communities and religions voted for the Congress(I). The Muslims and the Sikhs living outside Punjab have voted for the Congress(I). So, the cause of national integration has been upheld. This is the first time the cause of national integration has been upheld through the ballot.

In the last two Lok Sabha elections, the north voted differently from the south. With a few minor differences here and there, the north and south have behaved in the same pattern if you see the results in Kerala and Tamil Nadu. The world should learn a lesson from the results of this election. The Indian people are deeply in love with their country, they will resist and fight any attempt to divide the country.

The caste factor did not work at all. That is why the DMKP which is a caste-based party proved to be insignificant. In Parliament, they will not even have a bench. This time the people rose above caste considerations. These people were expecting a caste vote, especially in the north, but they were wiped out. The BJP has been completely liquidated. The trader class and certain castes used to vote for them; they did not do so in December. We had to reach the conclusion that the votes were for national integration.

The victory has also been a vote for the youth: an important factor. One should not ignore the youth. Today, Rajiv Gandhi is a young man: although I would personally see his role as a link between the young and old. People also thought that since they were electing a young Prime Minister, his team in Parliament and in his cabinet should also be young. As I often said in my press briefings, our opponents are forgetting the fact that this time 40 per cent to 50 per cent of the voters belong to the younger generation. They would naturally like to vote for a younger Prime Minister. But, at the same time I would say that the older generation has also voted for the younger generation. They thought: let us also give a chance to the young man; we have seen enough of the old men. A possible reason for the victories of Jagjivan Ram and Charan Singh is that both supported the army action in the Golden Temple and both justified the government's attitude throughout, even before the army action. Thus, they also won on the issue.

To say that Hindus used to vote for the BJP is to brand all Hindus as communalists. The Hindus who voted for the Congress (as well as the others who voted for the Congress-I) did so because they believed it to be the national party. It has its roots all over India. So, they did not vote for the BJP. The issue was Akhand Bharat. They thought that this Akhand Bharat could only be visualised through a party which has an All-India character and roots everywhere. The BJP has become irrelevant.

The Congress(I) victory was also a vote for change in the sense that Rajiv Gandhi's assurances that he would provide a clean government worked. People have somehow come to believe that Rajiv Gandhi is a man who does what he says. When he says that he will provide a clean government, he will really provide it, and root out corruption.

The opposition was eliminated because of their role during the last two or three years. Punjab had become a national issue. The opposition should have helped the government to solve the problem. Instead, it created obstacles. They did not exert any pressure on the Akali Dal. Naturally, people were annoyed with the leaders. As far as Madhav Rao Scindia and Amitabh Bachchan and the younger generation are concerned, they won because people had begun to think that they had had enough of professional politicians. Let politics also be done by those who have not made politics their dhanda (means of living). That is why they voted for Amitabh Bachchan, Sunil Dutt, Vyjayanthimala, Natwar Singh, K.R. Narayanan and non-professionals in the belief that the newly-elected people might deliver the goods because they do not have a vested interest in politics. It is also true that somebody who has something else to do—like writers, intellectuals, sportsmen, scientists—would behave differently. He would not make politics a means of living. There would be less corruption, insecurity. Politics would be raised to a higher level.

The country has shown to the world its inner strength. It was being said that this country was being fragmented. People had begun to believe outside that India would be divided very soon. The country in December 1984 wanted to demonstrate that it was one

As told to Madhu Jain

Durable, comfortable, sound absorbent.

Linoleum covers the entire range of taste and need...

- Ideal for homes, shops, offices, restaurants and hospitals.
- Easy to lay, clean and maintain.
- Hygienic and sound absorbent
- Attractive colours, patterns and range of thicknesses.

LINOLEUM

the all-purpose floor covering

INDIA LINOLEUMS LIMITED

9/1 R N Mukherjee Road, Calcutta 700001

CC/IL-1/84

WEST BENGAL

The Fall of Pranab and Ghani

Strong resentment in state against their exclusion from cabinet

The first hints of their decline came quite early, even while Mrs Gandhi lay in state. Suddenly the state-controlled TV and radio appeared to be losing the interest that they had been showing all these years in Mrs Gandhi's finance minister and the number two man in her cabinet, Pranab Mukherjee. References to him became fewer and far between and finally he could no longer be seen or heard in the official media. The signs of Mrs Gandhi's railway minister, Ghani Khan Choudhury's decline were evident when Rajiv Gandhi reinstated the Railway Board chairman K.T. Raghavan, whom the railway minister had sacked after holding him responsible for a train accident in Bombay.

If they had the eyes to recognise the signals they would not have been as surprised as they were when Rajiv Gandhi dropped them from his cabinet after the elections. Although Pranab Mukherjee, because of his seniority and since he was a member of the Congress(I) parliamentary board and the working committee was given a seat on the dais besides Rajiv Gandhi at the Congress parliamentary party meeting convened to elect the party leader for the Lok Sabha, he was neither asked to propose nor second Rajiv Gandhi's name. The two hardly spoke to each other. In 1980, though Pranab Mukherjee lost in the polls, Mrs Gandhi summoned him from Calcutta to convene the Congress(I) parliamentary party meeting and propose her name as the party leader. The contrast should have made it clear to Pranab Mukherjee that he had reached the end of the road.

Yet, he was hoping against hope. Returning to his Jantar Mantar Road bungalow he stayed near the telephone till 5 pm expecting a call from Rajiv Gandhi or any of his aides saying he had been included in the cabinet. The call did not materialise and Pranab Mukherjee, sensing that the inevitable axe had fallen on him, sent a letter to the works and housing minister requesting him for a smaller bungalow which he was entitled to as an MP. He also relieved his personal staff immediately.

The sword was hanging over his head for quite some time but it came down only when he had been rendered most vulnerable. Had he been given the Congress(I) nomination to contest from West Bengal as he had wanted, he would probably have won a seat in the Lok Sabha (he is a Rajya Sabha member from Gujarat) and been on a firmer ground. But Rajiv Gandhi refused him a ticket while another of Mr Mukherjee's colleagues, then the home minister and now the defence minister, P.V Narasimha Rao, had the rare privilege of contesting from two constituencies. As it is Pranab Mukherjee has never won a direct election although he rose from obscurity to be among the most powerful persons in the country. A college teacher, he entered politics as an office secretary of the Bangla Congress in 1966 following a split in the West Bengal Congress. After the fall of the United Front government in West Bengal he switched over to Mrs Gandhi's party in 1970 and was appointed a deputy minister for industrial development in her cabinet in 1973. A year later he was shifted to the finance ministry and later on given independent charge of banking and revenue during the Emergency. After Mrs Gandhi returned to power in 1980, she rewarded him even more amply, although he had lost the elections, by appointing him as her finance minister, for standing by her during her days in the wilderness. And gradually over the years Pranab Mukherjee became one of the very few people Mrs Gandhi trusted, sitting with her in all the important party and the government committees. If his fall was abrupt it was even more uncermonious.

Ghani Khan Choudhury

More grace was shown to Pranab Mukherjee's colleague and political rival in West Bengal, Barkat Ghani Khan Choudhury. Shortly before Rajiv Gandhi and his cabinet had been sworn in on Monday 31 December, Ghani Khan Choudhury was summoned to the Prime Minister's 1 Safdarjang Road residence. There Rajiv Gandhi informed Ghani Khan that he was being dropped from the cabinet but was being considered for the AICC(I)'s general secretary's post as three of the general secretaries—Arun Nehru, Chandulal Chandrakar and Abdul Ghafoor—were joining the cabinet. But Ghani Khan Choudhury was so agitated at his exclusion from the cabinet that he, instead of accepting the offer, wanted some time to talk to his followers on the subject. When Mr Choudhury returned to his 12 Akbar Road residence, he found most of 16 Congress(I) MPs elected from West Bengal gathered there and were greatly agitated. They generally felt that West Bengal had been let down and they said it in so many words to West Bengal Governor Umashankar Dixit, a family friend of the Nehru-Gandhis, who was also in the Capital. Mr Dixit met Rajiv Gandhi twice during the day to convey the feelings of the party MPs from West Bengal.

On Wednesday Choudhury in a letter informed Rajiv Gandhi that he wanted another round of discussions with him before accepting the party position which he had offered. The next morning he met Arun Nehru and told him that he had decided to accept the offer. It was to be formalised after a meeting with Rajiv Gandhi on Friday. Ghani Khan Choudhury was asked to be near his telephone to answer the summons from the Prime Minister whenever it came. He waited for the whole day but the summons never came. It is yet premature to draw any conclusion from this but the possibility of Rajiv Gandhi having second thoughts about Ghani Khan Choudhury is not altogether ruled out.

Pranab Mukherjee's alleged claim for interim-Prime Ministership after Mrs Gandhi's assassination is widely believed as a possible reason for his eclipse. Rajiv Gandhi was on a campaign tour in West Bengal when he received the news of Mrs Gandhi's assassination from a BBC broadcast. It was while flying with Rajiv Gandhi to New Delhi that Pranab Mukherjee is said to have dropped subtle hints to other senior party leaders, the Lok Sabha speaker Balaram Jakhar, Ghani Khan Choudhury, AICC(I) joint secretary Panicker and West Bengal Governor Umashankar Dixit who were also travelling by the same flight, drawing their attention to two previous occasions when the number two in the cabinet had become an interim Prime Minister. The reference was to Gulzarilal Nanda who became the interim Prime Minister after Nehru's death and again after Lal Bahadur Shastri's death. Pranab Mukherjee however denies that he had ever made such a claim. Says he: "I am not a fool to be so ambitious as to behave like that."

More likely, he was dropped because he had outlived his utility. If Mrs Gandhi needed persons whom she could trust absolutely, her son Rajiv Gandhi has no such compulsions. Mrs Gandhi, in her final years, had around her people who were politically weak so that they could not become a threat to Rajiv Gandhi whom she had certainly been grooming to succeed her. Now that Rajiv Gandhi has become the Prime Minister he does not need to have Mr Mukherjee around. Besides, Pranab Mukherjee was not pulling on well with some powerful aides of the new Prime Minister. Some of his actions, whether or not done at the behest of Mrs Gandhi, never received Rajiv Gandhi's approval. With the new leaders have emerged some new equations in which Pranab Mukherjee hardly fits. And so he had to go.

Ghani Khan Choudhury, on the other hand, has become a victim of his style. In an attempt to project himself as a person who could get things done the way he wished, he made enemies with powerful bureaucrats and even his colleagues. In both the ministries that he had been in during Mrs Gandhi's tenure—energy and railways—he quarrelled with senior and powerful officers, often publicly, by summararily sacking or transferring them without assigning any credible explanation. He could not get along with his junior minister in the railways, C.K. Jaffar Sharief. But what must have irritated Rajiv Gandhi most were the unseemly quarrels between Pranab Mukherjee and Ghani Khan Choudhury which manifested itself in an alarming way leading to a delay in nominating party candidates for West Bengal. Their quarrels for recognition as the supreme Congress(I) leader in West Bengal was increasingly getting out of hand and had clearly divided the state unit of the party into two warring camps. It is no secret that the two former ministers have been running the West Bengal party by proxy through their respective proteges, reducing party's state unit's executives to mere decorations.

Pranab Mukherjee

What Rajiv Gandhi may not have foreseen is the widespread resentment that surfaced in West Bengal for excluding Pranab Mukherjee and Ghani Khan Choudhury from his cabinet. It was the Bengali pride that was hurt. For only twice before had a Bengali been considered for any important portfolio in the union cabinet—Sachin Chaudhury, who was finance minister in Mrs Gandhi's cabinet for a term and before him Shyamaprasad Mukherjee, who was the commerce and industries minister in Nehru's cabinet. Barring them, representatives from West Bengal have always been allotted either the law or the education portfolio at the centre, till two important cabinet posts came West Bengal's way after 1980.

Ghani Khan Choudhury's exclusion more than that of Pranab Mukherjee's, especially after the Congress(I)'s spectacular gains in West Bengal, a Marxist citadel, dismayed not only the state unit of the Congress(I) but also greatly upset people in the state. Ghani Khan had earned a name for himself in West Bengal as a go-getter by pushing through and initiating numerous central projects both as energy minister and as railway minister including the Calcutta Metro and a super thermal plant in West Bengal. Many feared that with his exit several of these projects promising employment for a large number of people would either be stalled or even be abandoned. The fears came true, soon enough, when thousands of people employed in the railways on temporary basis during Choudhury's tenure were sacked by his successor although he had promised not to.

It is the Marxist-led Left Front, still nursing its wounds after its electoral setback, which has benefitted the most by Rajiv Gandhi's actions. It was like a windfall for them as a vast section of state's population which had put in its trust in the Congress(I) suddenly beginning to believe that their trust had been misplaced. The prevalent feeling is that the two ministers have been unfairly dropped and their exit is against West Bengal's interests. This was clearly reflected in a lukewarm response to the Congress(I)'s victory celebrations in Calcutta on Saturday 5 January. Not only were the two dropped ministers—Ghani Khan Chowdhury and Pranab Mukherjee—absent from the celebrations but many important Congress(I) activists kept themselves away from it.

Tooshar Pandit, Calcutta

KARNATAKA

Hegde Resigns

Asks for a fresh mandate

The Congress(I)'s sweeping victory in the elections, besides annihilating the major opposition parties, knocked out the Janata government in Karnataka. In one stroke the Congress(I) achieved what its puny state leaders had attempted to do all the while in an unsavoury manner. Just a week short of two years in office, Ramakrishna Hegde resigned following an adverse verdict in the Lok Sabha elections.

Set to win at least 14 of the 28 Lok Sabha seats from Karnataka to stay in office, the Janata Party notched up a meagre tally of four. Immediately, the chorus went up from the Congress(I) asking for the resignation of the Janata government. Hegde obliged. But he was not going to allow the Congress(I) to hold the reins of the state so easily. Even as he resigned from office, the wily chief minister got his cabinet to recommend dissolution of the Assembly. The Governor, and the new government at the centre, could do little else than oblige. And so, Hegde set up the stage for a rematch: an Assembly poll in March. The outgoing chief minister's argument that the Congress(I) victory in the Lok Sabha election is not really a verdict on the Janata government, will be put to test.

Hegde's exit from office was not without drama. On 28 December 1984, even as the counting of votes reached the half-way stage, it became clear that the Janata was going to lose. With desires of coming back to office, Congress(I) leaders, Gundu Rao and Bangarappa, immediately began a clamour for Hegde's ouster. But Hegde refused to oblige and, in fact, flatly refused to quit, saying that the results of the Lok Sabha polls could not annul the Assembly verdict which had brought the Janata to power. But there were subtle undercurrents to the chief minister's stance. By alluding that he would stay on in spite of the poor show in the Lok Sabha polls, Hegde hoped to be dismissed by the centre just as the Congress(I) did to the Janata-led state governments after its win in the 1980 Lok Sabha polls. But the answer to Hegde's ploy came the very next day. Despite the memorable win, PM Rajiv Gandhi made it clear he was not going to dismiss Mr Hegde. In fact, he disapproved of the 1980 precedent. If Mr Hegde wished, he could resign.

So, the next day, after some rethinking, Hegde resigned from office. But he recommended dissolution of the Assembly to seek a fresh poll. The day after he resigned, Hegde addressed a public meeting attended by nearly 50,000 people who listened to him in pouring rain. The adulation and affection he found is normally associated with NTR in Andhra Pradesh and MGR in Tamil Nadu. The sympathy wave, it seemed, was rolling back.

Faced with this situation, the Congress(I) fumbled badly. There was no question of the Congress(I) forming a government, not only because it lacked the majority, but more due to the adverse opinion it would create. So, the recommendation for dissolution had to be accepted and fresh polls ordered. But, if Hegde was relieved of his post he was certain to capitalise on the already growing sympathy. And if he was asked to continue as caretaker chief minister (which Hegde had already declined to do) it would be advantageous to the Janata Party while facing the Assembly polls. Hegde's statesmanship also succeeded in bringing out the differences within the Congress(I) into the open. While the Congress(I) leaders reacted with confusion to Hegde's moves, only former chief minister, R. Gundu Rao, was categorical in welcoming the chief minister's resignation and move to dissolve the Assembly. Gundu Rao's objective was two-pronged: he would get a chance to be elected to the Assembly (he is not a member having lost in 1983), and he would show to the party high command that he was still the undisputed Congress(I) leader in Karnataka, at least in terms of support among Congressmen.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Bangalore

PARIS OPERA BALLET

A Study in Perfection

Rudolph Nureyev captivates Delhi audiences

The performance of the Paris Opera Ballet in Delhi on 31 December, as a part of a cultural exchange between the governments of India and France to mark 1985 as the Year of India in France left ballet enthusiasts and lovers of spectacle in the capital spellbound. The scintillating troupe, led by the celebrated Rudolph Nureyev, also the artistic director of the Paris Opera Ballet, included the superb ballerina Claude de Va Vulpian, and Francoise Legree, Jean Guizerix, Fanmy Gaida, and Yannick Stephant.

Much of the attention and adulation however, was reserved for Nureyev, the Russian-born superstar of ballet, who's mesmeric grace had caused a sensation even as a student at the Vaganova School in Leningrad. Nureyev danced his way to international fame after his Convent Garden debut when he partnered Margot Fonteyn in Giselle.

Nureyev, however, was not at his magnificent best in the opening piece Apollon (he later complained about the faulty lighting which made him lose his balance once or twice), where he as master of the Muses inspires the three Muses of poetry, rhyme and dance, came into his own towards the end. The final ballet,

Claude de Vulpian

Nureyev: "Ballet has not evolved in USSR"

On ballet in the Soviet Union (Rudolph Nureyev defected from the USSR in a rather dramatic fashion in 1961. The leap to freedom took place at Paris's Le Bourget airport when he refused to return to the Soviet Union from Paris from where he was to go to London): Ballet has not evolved in the USSR. It has stultified. They look, but they do not see. Everything is fossilised.

On innate musicality and change in ballet forms:

Dance is also a union of different arts and poetry. George Balanchine tried to dispense with the story but had the music, Merce Cunningham dispensed with music as well. Ours is a tolerant society. George Balanchine made a fantastic marriage between music and movement. Cunningham made movement speak for itself...choreographers like these will survive a long time. They discovered forms which have become classical. My advice to choreographers would be to go directly to Merce Graham and directly study her style. This would be a point of departure.

On his short-lived career as an actor (he played Rudolph Valentino):

I am a dancer. Films were a diversion, although not very successful...were i to make a film on a ballet I would like to film "Sleeping Beauty" or "Don Quixote"

On his training:

The choreography came from France. The basis of the training came from the Paris Opera and it was transferred to the Bolshoi. I grew up on this. It seems to me to be the same school.

On Leningrad:

(He compares Rome with Leningrad) Look at Rome, the squares have such beautiful proportions. The Italians, even the people who sweep the streets wear the best designed clothes. They wear their hair well. They talk, they move so gracefully....It all has to do with the place, the surroundings...

Interviewed by Madhu Jain

Ruuolph Nurevev

Yannick Stephant

Songs of a Wayfarer, a piece created by Maurice Bejart to Gustav Mahler's music especially for Nureyev, left the audience enthralled. This melancholic pas de deux, performed with Jean Guizerix is about a romantic student who rages against himself and the world until fate helps him to come to terms with himself. Guizerix plays fate with a controlled intensity but it is Nureyev's performance, especially his gestures of impossible pathos and impotent rage that makes the number unforgettable.

The most talked about ballet was Bhakti 111, also by Maurice Bejart. The performers Marie-Claude Pietragalla and Wilfried Romoli, bathed in shades of saffron and pink presented a stunningly performed series of scenes reminiscent of tantric poses. But despite the fact that east and west do not meet all that well here, the result, something like the Bolshoi Ballet's Indian Poem, remains electrifying.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

AFGHAN REFUGEES

Delhi's Little Kabul

The Afghan refugees are unwanted guests

Five years of Soviet occupation in Afghanistan has changed not only Kabul, but also Delhi. The large influx of rich refugees from Afghanistan has pushed up rents and prices of essential commodities in the capital. According to the foreign registration office, about 6,000 Afghan nationals have entered India legally. The Afghans residing in Delhi come mainly from the urban areas of their country and belong to the educated upper class. It is easy to spot them anywhere in Delhi; in elite shopping arcades, in fashionable shops, in the crowded bazaars of Paharganj or in the posh colonies of south Delhi.

Their increasing presence is so conspicuous that the Delhi shopkeepers have started displaying products which attract the extravagant Afghan buyer. For instance, a few years ago, most butchers in south Delhi sold only jhatka meat which Hindus and Sikhs eat. Now many shops selling halal meat have come up in south Delhi. Even the grocers display in large quantities the golden sela rice used for making biryani. The textile shops are full of colourful material used for making Pathan costumes, popular among the Afghans. Most of the Afghan refugees stay in posh south Delhi colonies or other localities like Paharganj and Ballimaran, or in the Trans Yamuna colonies in east Delhi. Many of them come to India for medical treatment as the Indian embassy in Kabul prefers to issue visas on health grounds or to rich Afghans. Once the Afghan refugee reaches New Delhi he uses his stay to seek political asylum in Western countries. Unlike Pakistan, which is a breeding ground for rebels, India does not allow any political activity by foreign nationals.

The Indian government has also not permitted the United Nations Refugee Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) to open an office in Delhi for the Afghan refugees. The UNRRA at present operates through the UN Development Project (UNDP) for giving subsistence allowances to the refugees who have fled their country. The UNRRA has spent two million dollars to help the refugees. The controversy regarding granting of permission to UNRRA surfaced when the UNDP acting on behalf of UNRRA granted political protection to three Afghan soccer players who defected and sought refuge in India. The players seeking refugee status had approached the UNDP after arriving from Beijing. Earlier, UNRRA had granted refugee status to three Afghan Airline officials on Indian soil without the consent of the government. After these two incidents, the government of India has warned the UNO that in future the UNDP would not be permitted to act independently regarding the refugee problem.

Their affluence a thing of the past, the Afghan refugees talk of the comforts back home and the harsh realities they have to face here. When they came to Delhi, many of them had brought large sums of money; now they have only their entitled allowance from UNRRA to live on. Their refugee status entitles the Afghan national to Rs 600 a month to the head of the family, Rs 300 each to other members in order of age and Rs 150 each to minor dependants. The UNRRA also gives educational and medical assistance. However, the high cost of living in Delhi has made it difficult to maintain a family on such meagre allowances. Large families live in small rooms, and as many as seven or eight people live crammed in a single barsati, and face acute shortages of water.

Nostalgia for the comforts and concern about the grave situation back home has restrained many Afghans from establishing social contacts with the locals. Unlike their introvert elders, the young generation have made themselves at home and are quite comfortable in India and speak fluent Hindi. Many of them deal in narcotics and smuggle foreign goods. The dealers operate mainly from Paharganj. Quartz watches, German cameras and Japanese electronics goods are now easily available at some shops in Old Delhi. The actual dealing is done in cheap hotels and guest houses in Paharganj and Ballimaran. The crime department has recorded 103 cases of theft and drug trafficking involving Afghan nationals this year. "That is why we are so apathetic to their conditions," said Mr Aggarwal, a resident of Defence Colony, where many Afghans live. The locals blame the Afghans for the rise in house rents and daily necessities.

The long wait for immigration visas to the US and European countries has further frustrated their hopes. It takes at least three to four years after registration at the immigration office to acquire a visa. Thus, many Afghans have illegally migrated with forged passports. Some Afghan nationals pay up to Rs 30,000 for passports which they buy from hippies or for passports that are smuggled from Pakistan and other Muslim countries. The travel agent or the tout manipulates only the first two pages, changing names, photographs and other important details.

A senior official of an international airline company said that the changes in the passport were done so expertly that it was difficult to detect a forgery. The travel agent responsible for buying the ticket gives the airline officials the impression that the concerned passenger is an American or European returning home. Once the Afghan boards the aircraft he destroys the forged passport and presents his original after reaching his destination and claims political asylum. Before the immigration authorities at the airport can take any action to deport the individual, he is met by a lawyer who presents his case for hearing before the magistrate. This was the modus operandi used by more than 50 Afghan nationals to gain political asylum in Europe and United States this year However, airline officials are beginning to screen passports and request the embassy official-in-charge to examine it

The Afghan soccer stars who defected and sought refuge in India

Pakistan faces a graver refugee problem than India. An estimated 4 million refugees of Afghan origin are staying in Pakistani refugee camps situated along its border. On an average it receives over 2,500 refugees per month mainly from the rural and backward areas of Afghanistan. The United Nations and Pakistan had signed an agreement early this year regarding the launching of a 20 million dollar project to create jobs for the refugees. In 1983-84, the cost of maintaining 3.8 million refugees was Rs 400 crores. Beside the financial expenditure, the influx has proved to be difficult for Pakistan economically, socially and politically

Frequent air raids by the Afghanistan airforce on the North-West Frontier border towns of Terimangle, Herat and Peshawar that are inhabited by Afghani refugees have caused many civilian casualties. Pakistan officials feel that after the war is over, the Afghans might opt to stay permanently in Pakistan as the country offers more economic opportunities The presence of Afghan refugees has increased social tensions in the Pakistan border towns. They compete for jobs at low wages causing labour displacements, and since they come under the refugee status, they are exempted from paying taxes. As the refugee traffic has made it easier for drug operations across the border, it has increased the number of heroin addicts in Pakistan The Afghan elders are seriously concerned about the growing strength of Soviet intervention They are no less worried about the problem of the young who cannot find anything better than to deal in drugs and smuggling

As Afghanistan prepares itself to face the sixth year of its hopeless struggle there seem to be few signs of any real success and fewer chances of a quick settlement. The recent Geneva talks between Pakistan and Afghanistan held under the auspices of the UN representative Mr Deigo Cordovous were recessed after an agreement to meet again in February 1985 after the swearing-in of the US President. Till then, a political solution to the Afghan problem remains an illusion and the miseries of Afghan refugees seem destined to increase.

Falguni Talwar, New Delhi

ENERGY

New Sources are Uneconomical

The government policy lacks direction

Despite spiralling costs of conventional energy sources and the government's interest in the development of alternative sources of energy, no integrated policy has been developed as yet. The plans to tap energy from bio-gas, bio-mass or solar energy, wind energy, geo-thermal and ocean energy in the near future are either too far-fetched and optimistic or uneconomical. The Department of Non-conventional Energy Sources (DNES) under the union energy ministry is yet to draw up a comprehensive plan and apart from extensive media coverage to inaugurations of a few bio-gas plants and solar photovoltaic technology-based electricity systems for "remote and inaccessible" villages, little has been done so far

The department's plan to electrify 10,000 villages using solar energy is hardly feasible considering the department's own performance against projections made for the current financial year. So far, only 15 villages have been identified using solar energy against a target of 220 villages and at a heavy cost. According to Maheshwar Dayal, the secretary of the DNES a system to work a village pump and keep the street lights burning for just three hours a day costs around Rs two lakh.

Mr Dayal said that 15 villages in the country have been electrified (using solar energy). Street lighting in five villages in Tamil Nadu and three in Andhra Pradesh has been arranged. Mr Dayal claimed that lighting units for at least another 30 villages will be supplied by the end of 1984.

Even if 30 villages are electrified in the next three months, the figure will not be even half of the target fixed for the current financial year. The reason for such a poor performance is due to faulty planning in the production of photovoltaic systems and its prohibitively high cost. The cost per unit of electricity produced under a photovoltaic system is nearly eight times that of electricity from thermal plants. However, Mr Dayal claims that "if we consider investment on new transmission lines, high transmission and distribution losses and poor load factors in certain rural areas, the cost of electricity actually consumed can be as high as Rs eight per unit at a distance of 10 km from the existing grids at least in the initial phase of load development. If we take a photovoltaic system of one to two kilowatt load, cost of power can be competitive to that from a thermal plant."

Unfortunately, the photovoltaic cells are being manufactured only by Bharat Heavy Electricals Limited (BHEL) and the Central Electronics Limited (CEL), Sahibabad (UP), despite demands by the private sector to produce them.

According to Suresh Krishna, chairman of the Association of Indian Engineering Industry, AIEI (southern region), and the chief executive of Sundaram Fasteners of the TVS group of companies, "the government has taken an important step by encouraging BHEL and CEL in the manufacture of photovoltaic cells. However, given the vast potential within the country, there appears to be enough scope for both the public sector and private sector companies to join hands in this effort."

Discussing the DNES plan to electrify 10,000 villages, Mr Dayal estimated that "an initial programme of electrification of these villages involving 'minimum' energy requirements such as street lighting, community centre and school lighting, a community TV set, a pump for drinking water, lighting and power for a small medical centre including a refrigerator and one or two micro-irrigation pumps can add up to a requirement of 25 megawatt using photovoltaic electricity systems." It is, however, doubtful whether such equipment can be supplied.

A windmill to generate power

"If costs can be brought down to about half the current level, the country can even absorb 30 megawatt of photovoltaic system per year by 1990," said Mr Dayal But Dr T. K. Bhattacharya, of CEL observes that "the economies of using solar photovoltaic cells, as a viable supplementary source of electrical energy, are as yet not within the reach of common man. There have been extremely rosy forecasts made during 1974-81 about drastic cost reductions in that area, which have not materialised in practice. The present international approach is based on cautious optimism supported by intensive in-depth research."

Solar technology is still in its infancy even in the western countries. Below a certain level, cost reduction on the conventional photovoltaic technology in use now will not be possible Newer technologies like polycrystalline silicon, ribbon silicon and amorphous silicon solar cells are being experimented. Polycrystalline cells are already being manufactured by several companies abroad. Amorphous cells are presently being made on a commercial basis for calculators and other indoor applications It is almost certain that lower cost amorphous cells suitable for outdoor application may become abundantly available by 1990. In India, "pilot production plants" are likely to be established during the seventh Five Year Plan to do integrated research and development in this area.

But overambitious schemes have led to crippling losses. Hundreds of windmills on the Madras Mahabalipuram coast built to tap windmill power in the late Seventies have been failures.

The best surviving non-conventional energy idea is the gobar gas plants using animal waste, probably due to their low cost. Even here, the implementation has been so tardy that the government had to subsidise 50 per cent of the cost of erection of the plant and give Rs 5,000 towards feasibility studies. Still there are not many takers.

T. Raman, Madras

PAKISTAN

General Zia's Hollow Victory

Large numbers boycott referendum

As expected Pakistan President General Zia-ul Haq has won the national referendum hands down. He secured 97.7 per cent of the votes polled, according to the Pakistan chief election commissioner, Mr Justice S. A. Nusrat. As many as 27,758,901 voters or nearly 60 per cent of the electorate exercised their right of franchise Though there were very few districts where the turnout was less than 40 per cent, one of the lowest was in Larkana (30.6 per cent) in Sind, Bhutto's hometown

Most large cities, notably Karachi, Rawalpindi and even Islamabad, Pakistan's capital, gave the referendum a cold shoulder. In Islamabad, out of an electorate of 1,48,565, 69,546 voted "yes," while 2,213 voted "no." Nearly 76,000 voters abstained despite pressure on civil servants to vote.

Most voters in PakistanfacedaHobson's choice because a "yes" for Gen Zia was tagged with a "yes" for the Islamic structure in Pakistan. No voter could separate the two. Thus a "no" for one meant a "no" for the other Moreover, troops were stationed all over the country.

It is surprising that the results, which were to be announced three days after the polling, were available informally, within a few hours after polling ended. And strangely, the Election Commission declared the results of far-flung areas in Baluchistan before that of Lahore, Peshawar, Rawalpindi, Quetta and metropolitan Karachi. The absence of 40 per cent of the electorate is enormous considering the official threats against a boycott. Also, at the last moment, the production of identity cards by voters—a "must"—was waived aside. Still more than 11 million voters decided to stay away from the polls.

General Zia-ul Haq

Gen. Zia's speeches—opposition parties boycotted the referendum—invoked not only the name of Islam but also raised fears about the "enemy". He said at Quetta, on the eve of the polls, that "to avoid intrigues by foreign powers, future uncertainty and political confusion, he had adopted the path of referendum, "which would consolidate the basis of the country on the one hand and give impetus to the Islamisation process on the other." However, all this did not convince at least 40 per cent of electorate to go to the polling booth. (Interestingly, the first news on the polling was that Gen. Zia had "suffered a set-back with a strikingly low turnout in the referendum.")

Miss Benazir Bhutto, the acting chairman of the Pakistan People's Party (PPP) said in London, that despite the frantic efforts of the regime, polling remained dismal. "Malik Qasam, leader of the Opposition Movement for Restoration of Democracy(MRD), has alleged that there was extensive coercion of voters. The Muslim, an independent English daily from Islamabad has said in an editorial that "the mechanics of the referendum left a lot to be desired and these reflected bureaucratic bungling and confusion on a wide scale."

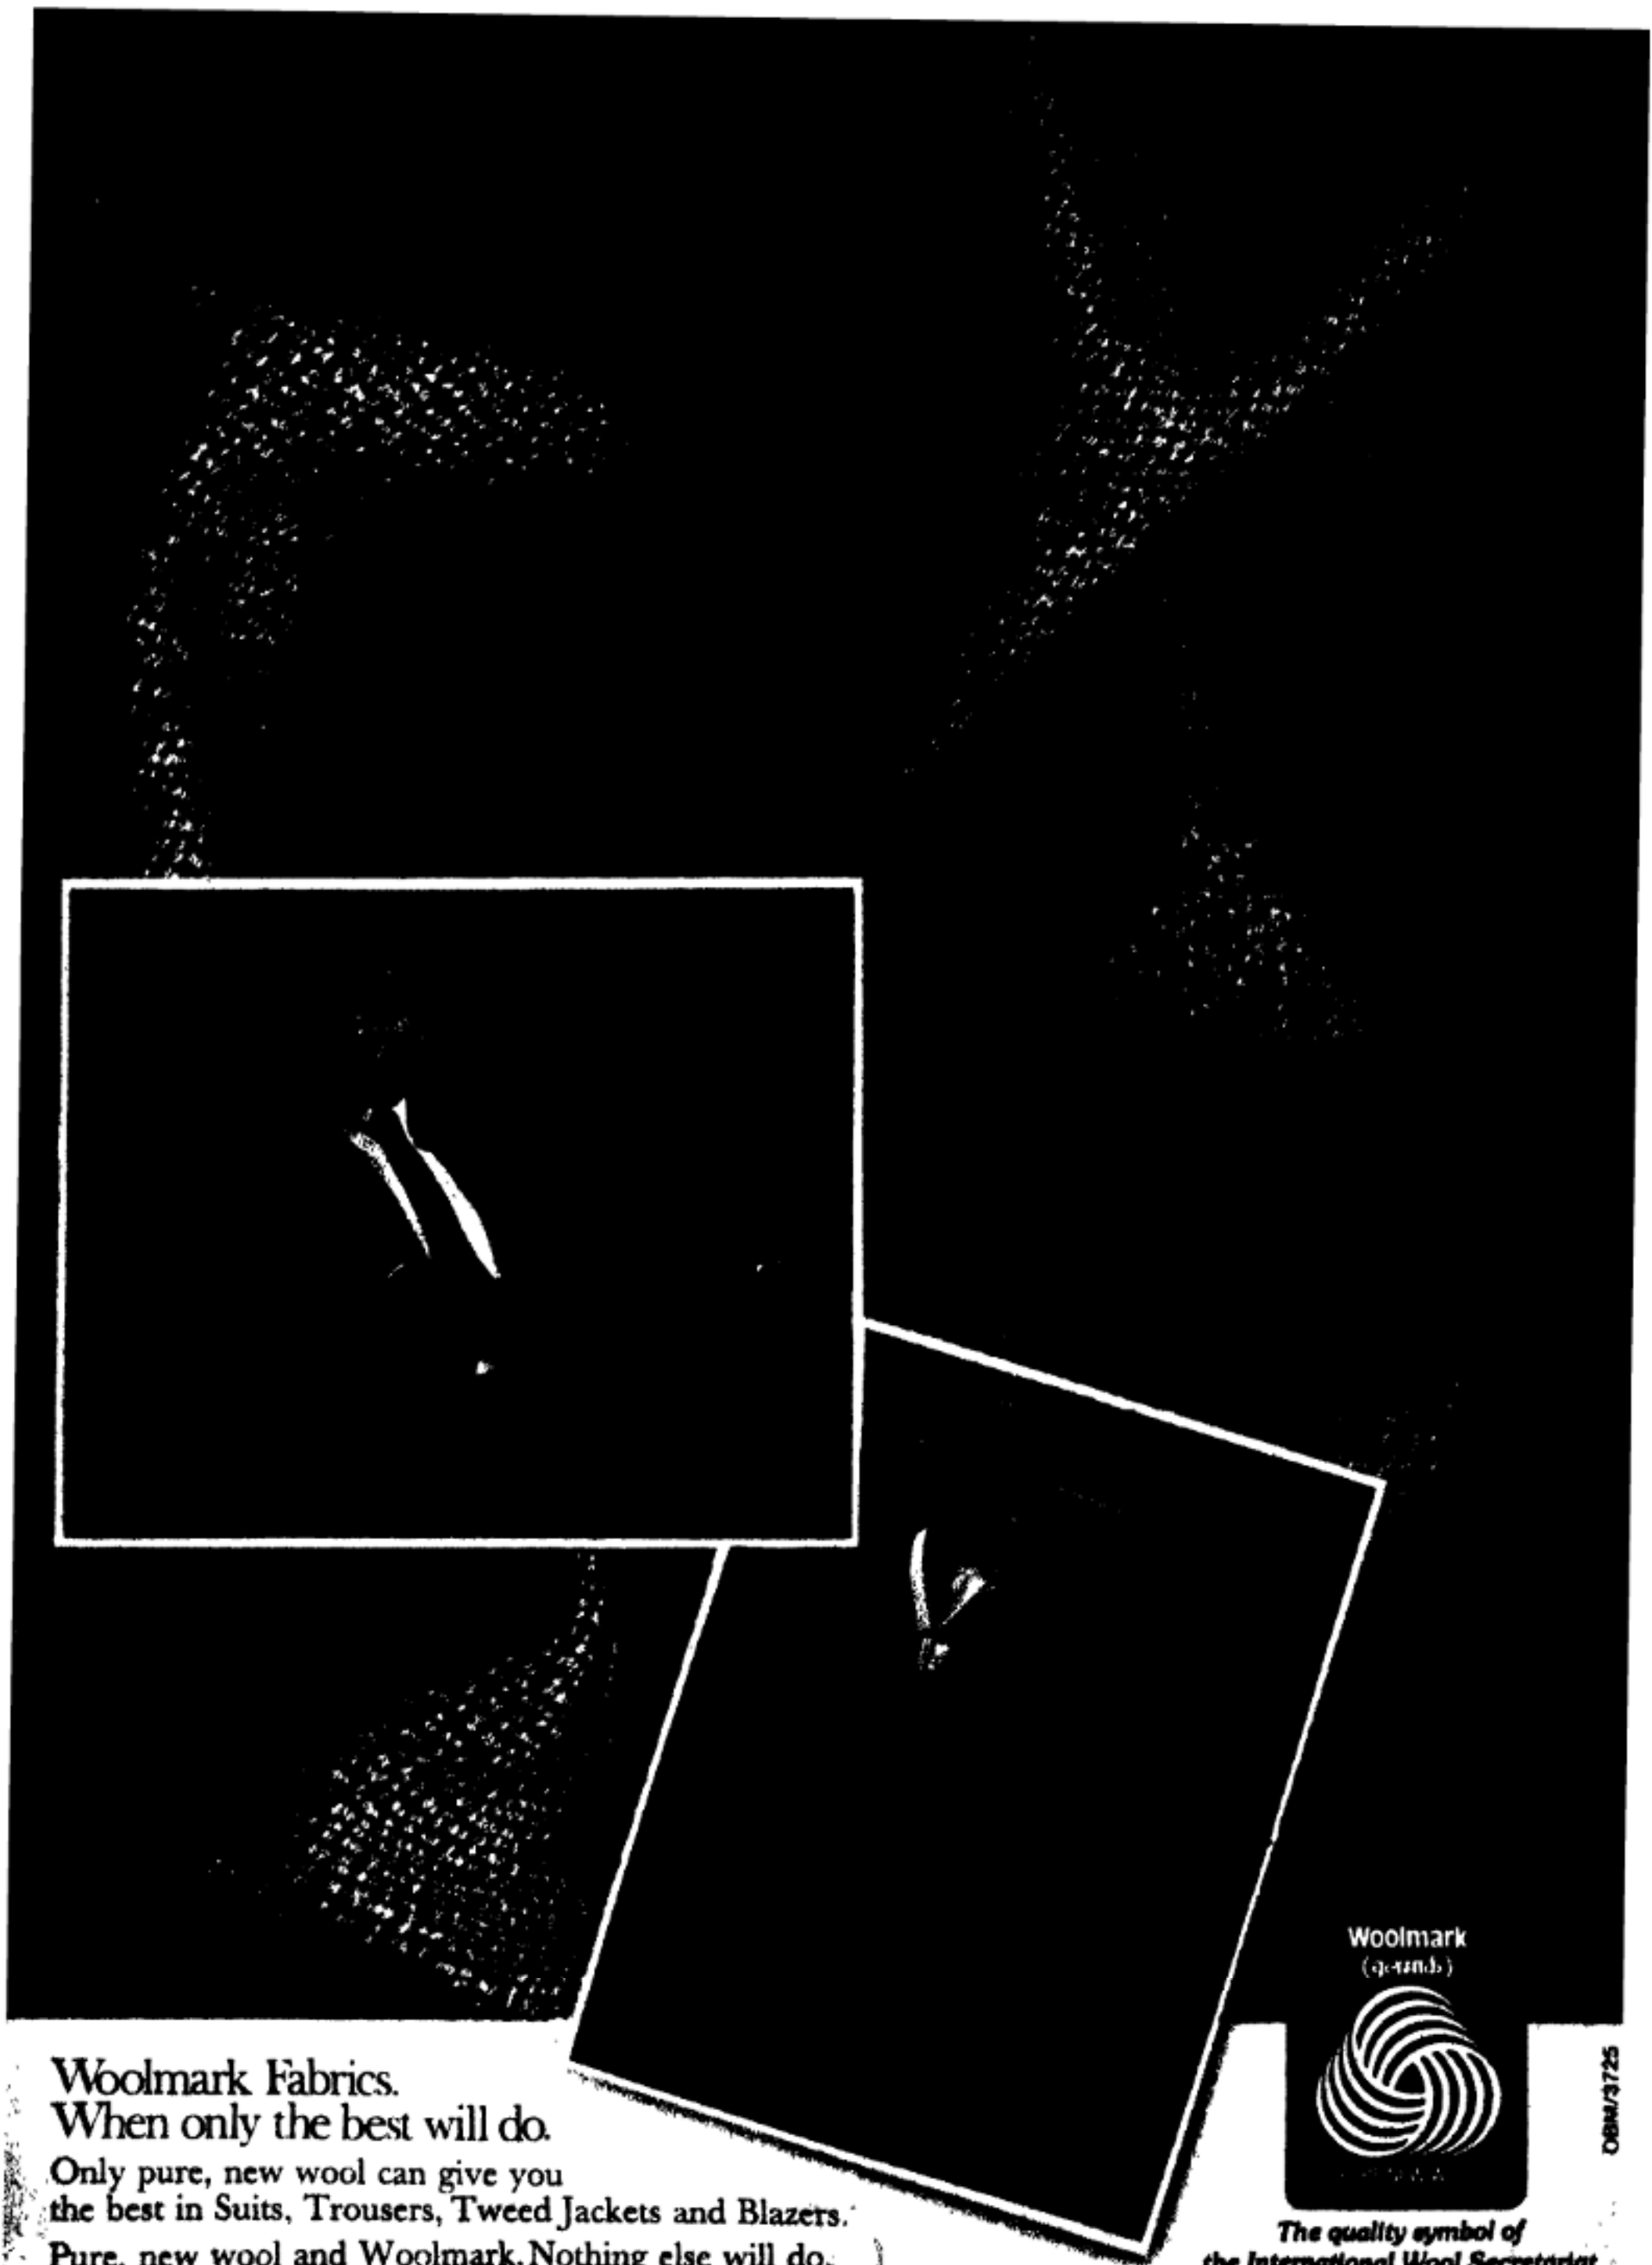
Many foreign newsmen, who have been covering the elections on both sides of the border, have compared the atmosphere in the two countries. They have said that in India it was an election and in Pakistan a selection. Significantly, the Pakistan Election Commission has directed the press in the country to refrain from relying upon the stories released by the foreign media regarding the Commission or referendum.

Against this backdrop and the allegations that Gen. Zia's rule "is neither more or less legitimate now than it was before the referendum," the announcement to hold a partyless election in Pakistan on 23 March next year has lost much of its importance. It appears that the country is in for a regimented rule for many years to come; at least for the next five years because that is the term for which Gen. Zia has been "elected."

Kuldip Nayar, New Delhi

Turn on the lights and it's like the glow of a thousand pearls

Only once in a lifetime comes a luxury like this. The rich smoothness of velvet and a soft sheen, like the glow of a thousand pearls. For your walls. That's the unique offering of DULUX Velvet Touch. A premium wall finish in 29 shades, including 4 Natural Whites. Apple White, Rose White, Heather White and Lily White.



Such an exclusive range is a beautiful persuasion to create different moods in your home. So that you can come home to luxury every time.

Dulux
Velvet Touch

The feel of velvet, a glow of pearls

CLARION C-ACCVT-2

Come home to luxury with Dulux Velvet Touch

Woolmark Fabrics.
When only the best will do.

Only pure, new wool can give you the best in Suits, Trousers, Tweed Jackets and Blazers.
Pure, new wool and Woolmark. Nothing else will do.

Woolmark
(brand)

The quality symbol of the International Wool Secretariat

OBM/3725

CHINA

Bamboo Curtain Lifts

Tibet is more accessible today

A major change in China's Tibetan policy has been noticed after the recent pact between Britain and China over Hongkong. In an effort to quickly integrate Tibet with the rest of China, the once-forbidden land has been made more accessible to outsiders. Sweeping socio-economic reforms are also being carried out and in an unprecedented gesture, the Chinese have lifted the former agricultural policy of rigid state control and marketing in Tibet. Most China-watchers believe that the recent reforms in Tibet are an effort to soothe the fears of the people of Hongkong and Taiwan and convince them of the flexibility of the Chinese economic system.

The Chinese claim that the relaxation in Tibet is aimed at boosting production in order to reduce its dependence on Beijing's subsidy. However, Hongkong-based Sinologists feel that the Chinese move in Tibet is politically motivated. According to Tibetan Review, a magazine on Tibetan affairs, the recent decision to underwrite the expenses of the government and party workers living in Tibet by the central government, relieving the Tibetan production units of the responsibility would further add to the amount of central subsidy to Tibet instead of reducing it. The reports add that Tibet's poverty has been a burden for Beijing, forcing it to subsidise 98 per cent of the region's public spending. During the last 32 years of Chinese occupation, the central government has spent an equivalent of about 2.75 billion US dollars on Tibet. In 1981, the average annual income for Tibet's 1.8 million people was equivalent to 92 US dollars as against the national average of 189 US dollars. The agriculture and industrial output in Tibet is the lowest among China's 30 provinces, autonomous regions and cities.

The new economic policy enables the Tibetan peasants and herdsmen to select the agricultural goods they wish to produce, fix their own prices and carry on trade. They enjoy tax exempt status at least until 1990 so that their incomes double within three to five years. Till recently, the peasants and herdsmen were given fixed production quotas by the state which also bought the produce at controlled prices, though they could privately sell any surplus produce.

According to some observers, the new economic policy in Tibet is a bait to lure the self-exiled Tibetans to return home. The Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) authorities have been instructed by Beijing to treat new arrivals cordially. Meanwhile, Tibetans in India have reacted sharply to Beijing's decision to induct 50,000 Chinese workers from other underdeveloped and overpopulated regions of the country into Tibet. The new arrivals were supposed to begin work on 16 major construction projects last year in Lhasa including multistoried guest houses, hotels, and a stadium. Another 42 major development projects are being planned in Tibet this year.

Tibetans allege that over 30,000 Chinese have been made to settle down in Tibet and even intermarry with Tibetans to destroy the Tibetan nationalist identity and make Lhasa a socialist city. The Chinese are particularly adept at this and have been successful in Inner Mongolia where the native population has been reduced to a small minority.

Tapas Mukherjee, Darjeeling

Headache?

The one solution

ANACIN

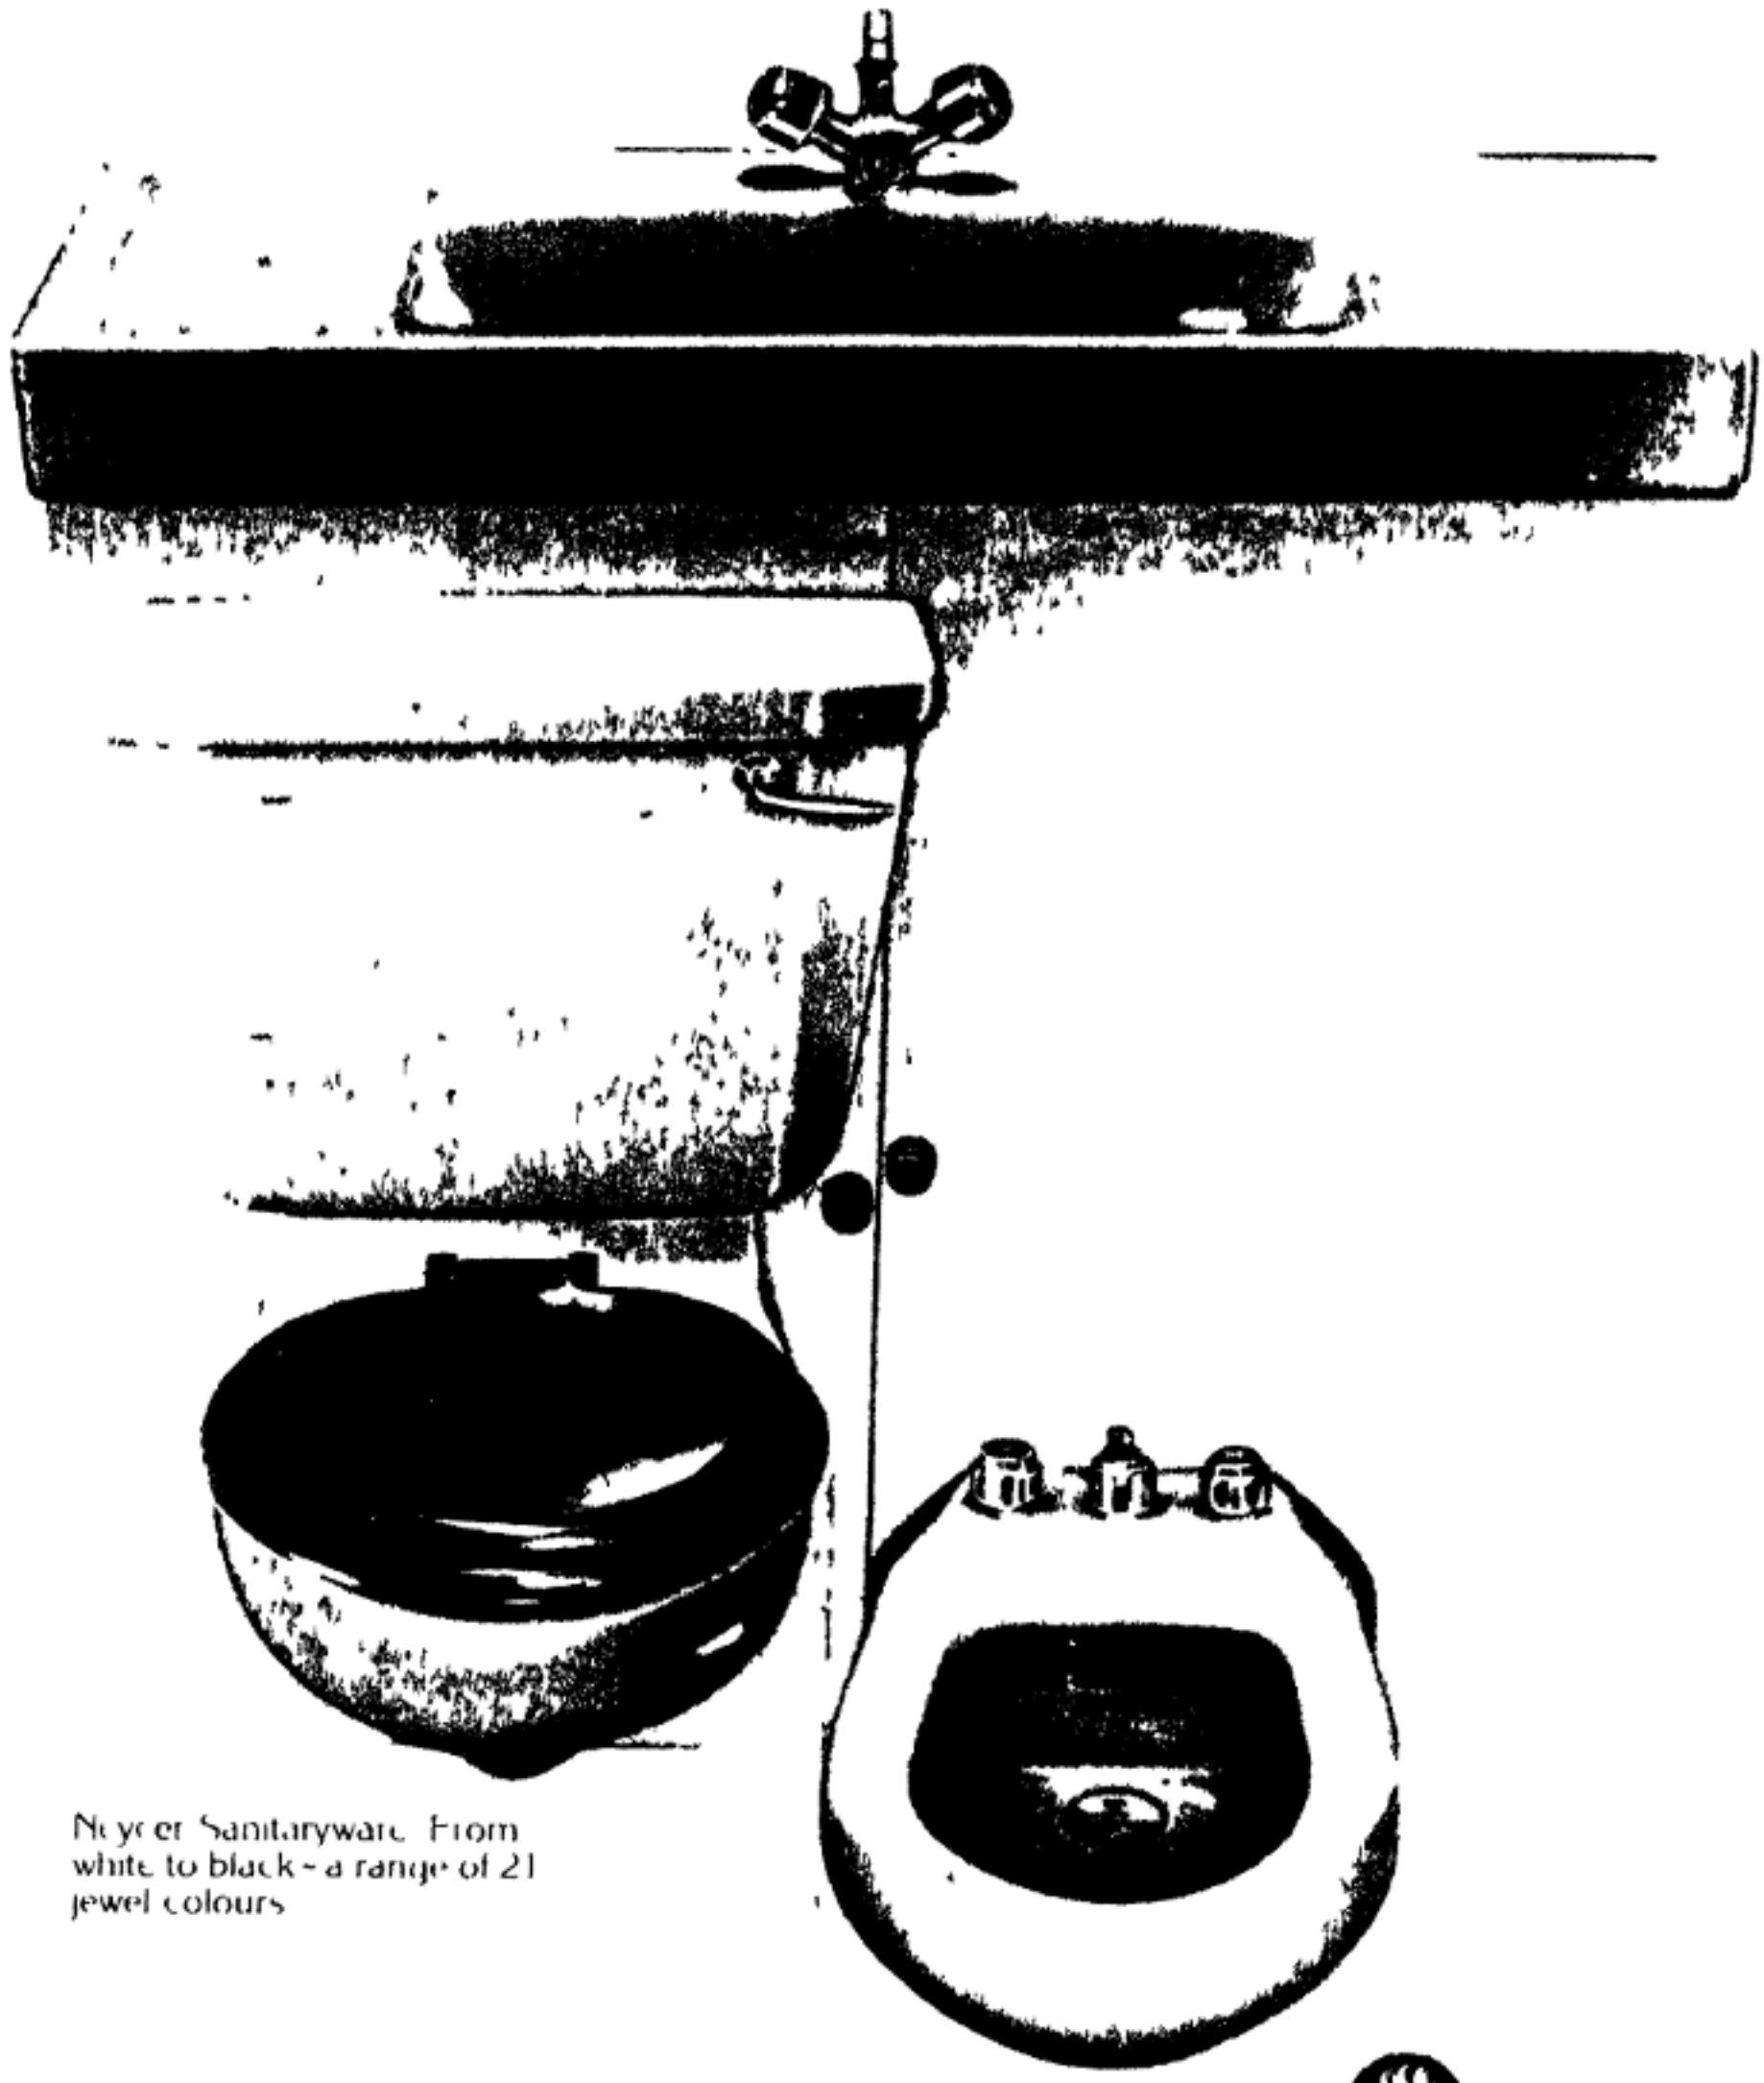
Trust its extra pain relieving power

Anacin contains more of the pain reliever doctors the world over recommend.

Effective for the aches and pains of colds and flu, headache, toothache, backache and muscular pain.

Trust only Anacin.

Now in a protective foil pack.



Strong and trusted MANNERS ANACIN*

India's No. 1 pain reliever

* Licensed user of T M Geoffrey Manners & Co Ltd

GM 1 R 84

Neycer combinations ...
now all you have to decide is the colour

Neycer Sanitaryware. From white to black - a range of 21 jewel colours

Neycer

Neiveli Ceramics & Refractories Limited
Vadalur P.O. 607303 South Arcot District Tamil Nadu

Beauty in your bathroom, beauty that lasts.

CBW 8776

A New Operation

A new method for sparking cancer is sure to prove a boon to researchers trying to learn how oncogenes do their dirty work. Recently, a US team of researchers achieved, in a matter of hours, what is known as 'malign transformation'. Using a needle-fine tool, the scientists injected rat, mouse and human cells with h-ras protein, which is produced under the direction of an oncogene, or cancer agent, first found in cells from a human bladder tumour. Within hours, the rodent cells changed shape and began dividing energetically, growing unmindfully over neighbouring cells (the human cells were not affected). No one knows yet precisely how either the gene or the protein interferes with normal cell mechanics.

Analysing the Split Personality

Behavioural scientists in the US and elsewhere have begun identifying signs in children that may eventually predict which of them will eventually have schizophrenia, or split personality, a kind of mental disease where the patient is an introvert, suffers from dissociation and is unable to distinguish between reality and unreality. The approach is based on the assumption that some people inherit a susceptibility to schizophrenia but how they weather the stresses of life determines whether they will contract the disease.

Many of the children studied had schizophrenic parents and hence were more likely to inherit the disorder. A distinctive feature of the parents was that they habitually gave their children confusing and negative messages. When showing disapproval, the parents tended to attack the child rather than to criticise the things he had done, told the child what his feelings and thoughts were rather than listening to what the child said, and often spoke ambiguously. More than two million Americans suffer from this split personality.

Among the important differences between children who become schizophrenic and those who have not are that:

- Their mother's schizophrenia was more chronic and severe than that of others, had an earlier onset, lasted longer and involved more pronounced symptoms. The mother also showed poor social and personal adjustment.
- These children were more likely to have had complications at delivery, such as abnormal birth positions.
- They had more often been raised in institutions, or by foster parents.
- In school they often created disturbances, being anxious, easily angered and aggressive.

One of the more promising lines of this research focuses on the way families communicate. Some researchers believe that teaching social skills to children may help.

More Cornea Transplants

The cornea of the eye, one of the first human tissues to be transplanted successfully, is being used now much more than ever before to restore sight to the blind. More than 20,000 corneal transplants are now being performed in the United States. Such transplants have been done since the Forties.

Originally, corneal tissues were removed from the donor's eyes in square sheets and were cut to fit the recipient. Now a surgical device is used to take a circular piece of cornea. It is sewn into place in the patient's eye with sutures much finer than human hair.

Escaping the Mood Swings

An American team of scientists has come out with a drug that shuts off sex hormone production by the ovaries, which appears to be the first effective treatment for premenstrual syndrome. In spite of the risk of contracting uterine cancer and developing brittle bones, the scientists believe that some women may be willing to take the drug to escape the mood swings and other disturbing consequences of the monthly cycle.

Live Longer with Dynorphin

One of the body's natural opiates, dynorphin, may help people suffering from strokes. An experiment conducted by the university of California medical school on cats showed that those who suffered strokes had a prolonged life: dynorphin prolonged the survival of six out of ten feline stroke victims given a synthetic version of the opiate.

No Antibiotics in Beef

If you buy beef or hamburger meat from the supermarket and it has been laced with antibiotics, then you are likely to catch nausea, cramps, fever and diarrhoea. Scientists at the Centres for Disease Control in Atlanta (USA), together with health officials in Minnesota, have traced the infections of the salmonella bacteria in hamburger meat, which was bought from the same feed-lot which routinely added an antibiotic to the animal feed.

According to the CDC, 12 of the 18 victims that they eventually found in four mid-Western states contracted the infection because they took the antibiotics for other illnesses. Most of these people probably were affected first by the salmonella in the beef, but remained well because the bacteria that normally inhabit human intestines competed with the salmonella for nutrients and kept it in check—until they took antibiotics. Then the drugs quickly killed the normal bacteria, allowing an explosive growth of the salmonella bacteria from the hamburger meat.

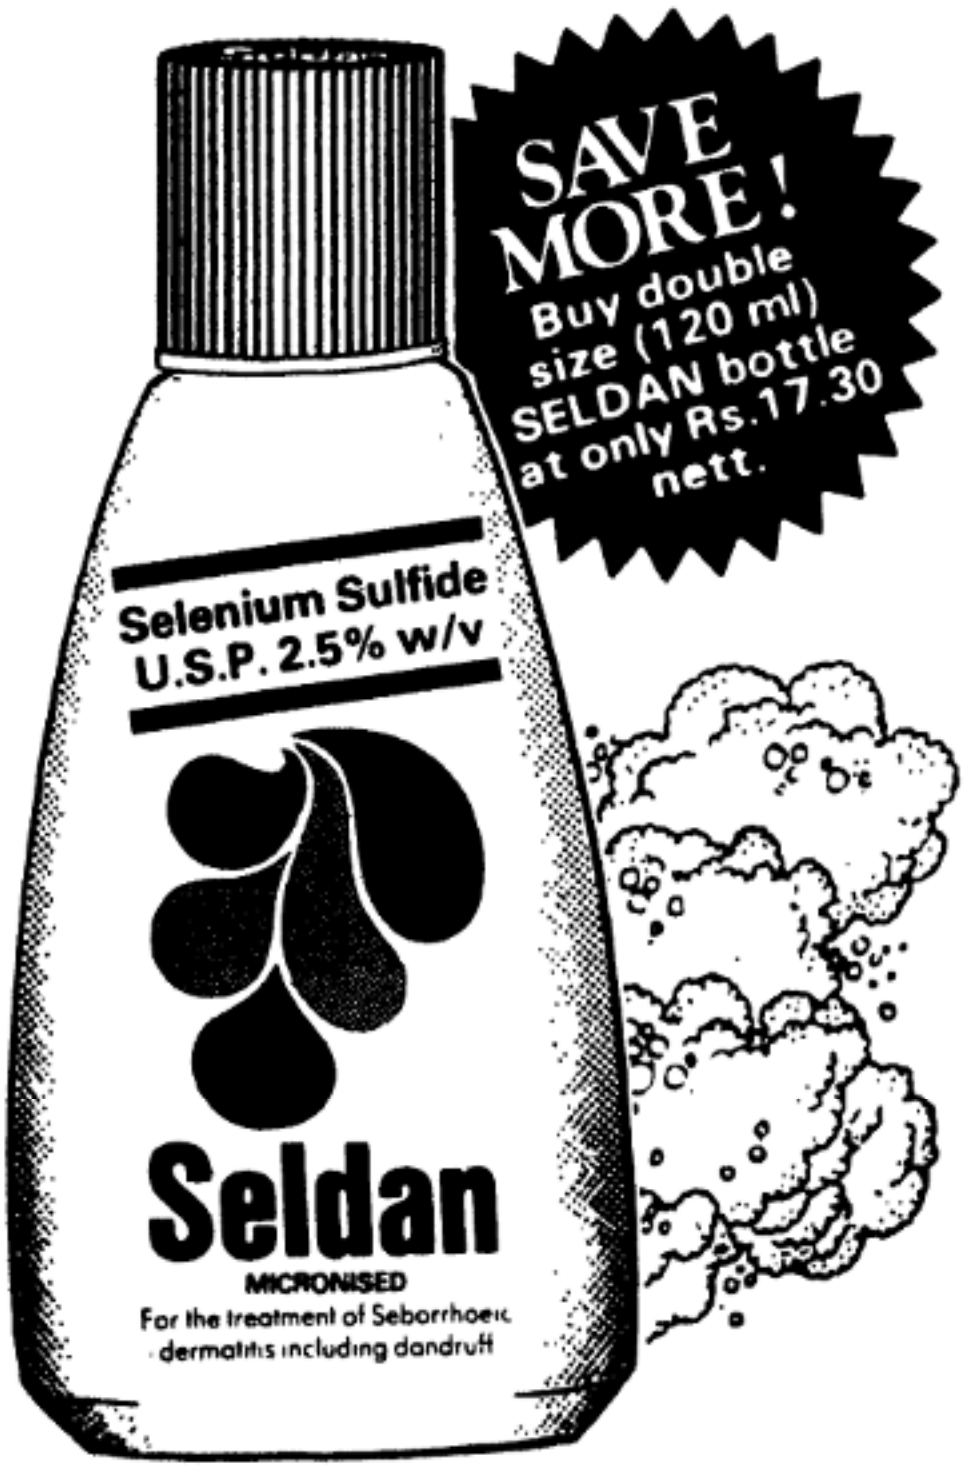
Illustrations: Prabir Sen

Save Re.1·00

DANDRUFF?

Why lose friends and hair? Use...

Seldan



Selenium Sulfide Lotion

Dandruff can cause you acute problems. Including social embarrassment, secondary infection, pimples, blinking, even loss of hair! Mere soaps & shampoos can't treat it.

SELDAN does—effectively. With Selenium Sulfide. U.S. Pharmacopoeia—the formula prescribed by most Doctors, world-wide.

And SELDAN contains SLS.
Wash Dandruff away—the SELDAN way.

THE ONE FORMULA MOST DOCTORS RECOMMEND.

To get a discount of Re 1 on every 60 ml bottle of SELDAN. Just tick mark (✓) the applicable answers to the few questions below. Then cut this entire box and hand it over to the Chemist/ Store at the time of purchase They will charge you Re 1 less

1. Who will actually use this bottle of Seldan?
   Male/ Female
2. What is the user's age-group?
   Below 18 years/18-25/25-35/35-50/above 50.
3. What is the user's family income per month?
   Below Rs 1000/ Rs. 1001-1500/ Rs. 1501-2500/ Above Rs. 2500 p m.
4. How long has the user been suffering from Dandruff?
   Less than one year/1-2/2-3/3-5/over 5 years.
5. What has the user been so far using to control Dandruff? Soap/Common Shampoo/Medicated Shampoo/Seldan/Any other lotion/Household remedy.

NOTE TO CHEMIST/STORE : To the customer presenting this cutting with tick marks, please give a discount of Re. 1 on Seldan 60 ml bottle The Company will reimburse to you Re 1 plus 10 Paise as handling charges.

MOUNT METTUR
PHARMACEUTICALS LTD.
Tiruvanmiyur, Madras 600 041

ADWAVE/MMPL-2713/A

Three days before Kumar Gaurav married Namrata, the sister of his bosom friend Sunjay Dutt, a noted astrologer had predicted a bright new era for him. The good times would begin with his first film after marriage, which according to the astrologer would be a hit. The film, Hum Hain Lajwat, on which much depended, failed to evoke any response. Meanwhile they have left for their honeymoon. But his honeymoon with stardom has ended all too soon.

The Namrata-Kumar Gaurav marriage has left Vijaveta Pandit, Gaurav's first heroine and first love, confused, sad and bitter. According to sources very close to the Pandit family, Vijaveta has threatened to release some of his juicy love letters to her, to a film magazine. Her elder sister Sulakshana is believed to be the inspiration behind the move. The intention is obviously to create rancour between Kumar Gaurav and Namrata. A jilted girl can be very dangerous, especially if she happens to be Vijayeta Pandit.

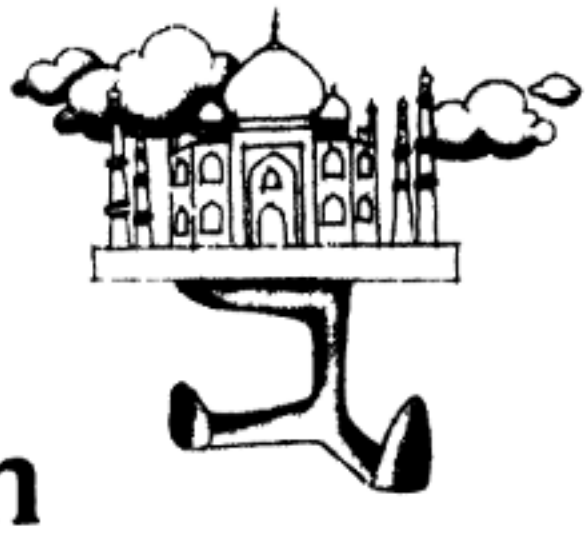
And pray, what is Sulakshana Pandit up to these days? Nothing. She has not been getting offers either for singing or acting. Sanjeev Kumar, who once showed interest in her (as a woman, not as an actress), has, it seems, stopped thinking about marriage. She spends her time singing for 'B' grade movies and giving concerts in the Gulf countries, "where there is more money and fun than in films."

When Suresh Oberoi first talked about playing lead roles, he was not taken seriously. But he had faith in himself and managed to get a role opposite Swapna and then with Deepti Naval in Kanoon Kya Karega which flopped. Now he has a row of films: Surkhiyaan, Aitbaar, Satta, Thikaana and Badla with Moon Moon Sen, Dimple Kapadia, Zeenat Aman, Smita Patil and Anita Raj. "I am still to be linked with any of them because I keep my profession and my personal life on two different planes," he says. Or is it because the heroines are not interested?

Prabhat Kumar

Sulakshana Pandit: no songs, no dances

Durgaprasad



Kumar Gaurav marries Namrata Dutt

Vijayeta Pandit: jilted

A new sex-symbol has descended on Madras from no less a place than Gujarat. Kuyili, who acted as heroine in K Balachander's Puyilangu, is actually the screen name of Miss Gulnardi from Gujarat. Balachander liked her so much that she has been signed for his next movie, Kalyana Agathikal. She has also signed a Hindi and Malayalam film.

Hollywood is often cruel and Kabir Bedi it seems has realised it. At one stage it almost seemed that he would make it, especially after the role in Octopussy. The film was not a hit by James Bond standards. And so Bedi was forgotten. But he keeps trying and he was recently in Bombay to drop word that he was afterall, available to act in Hind movies.

The shoemakers of Agra thank Shah Jahan for building the Taj.

The folk dancers didn't know they were part of the tourism chain.

The taxi drivers always know the dollar exchange rate.

After all, tourism is a people's business.

Tourism is an industry that touches the lives of lakhs of people. Generating employment, creating a market for goods, giving them an outlet for their talents.

Tourism is one of the world's fastest growing industries and we aim to increase India's share of the business. For that it is vital that the tourist thinks of India as a desirable destination.

Let us make India a tourist paradise.

Welcome a visitor send back a friend.

Department of Tourism
Government of India

ASP·DOT-1·84

THIS INDIA

MADURAI: An independent candidate at Usilampatti in Madurai district, Mr Raju Thevar, was allowed to take out a procession of six donkeys on 17 December 1984 in his constituency, with a view to impressing on the electorate that he would carry their burden, if elected, just as the donkeys carried their burden—The Hindu (M Govindarajan, Madras)

NEW DELHI: The 120-odd Sikh refugees at the Subzi Mandi police station did not cast their votes and travel by the government-arranged DTC buses in protest against the refusal of the "government to pay for their tickets," the police commissioner, S S. Jog said here. Mr Jog said as the government was firm that each one must pay for his own ticket the Sikh refugees, some of whom were on a hunger strike demanding their proper rehabilitation, refused to go and cast their votes—The Hindustan Times (Ajay Mehra, New Delhi)

SHILLONG: Mr Endro Iawphaniaw, the forest minister in the last coalition government of Meghalaya, was arrested last month in Assam with four others for allegedly attempting to pilfer timber. Mr Iawphaniaw and Mr Bombar Lyngdoh Kharnaior, former district council member, were released on personal bonds on 4 December, three days after their arrest in Umang forest area in the state's Karbi Anglong district—The Times of India (R. Suriya Narayanan, Gauhati)

HOSHIARPUR: The shopkeepers of the Kashmiri Bazar in Hoshiarpur adopted a novel method to get a pile of debris removed from the market. The debris was left after the repair of a sewerage manhole. When their repeated requests to the municipal authorities to remove the dump proved futile, they covered it with a red cloth and put some coins and flowers on it When the municipal authorities came to know about it they thought it was an attempt to establish a mazar and promptly removed it—The Times of India (Harshvardhan Kher, Gwalior)

SIMLA. The Simla municipal corporation has launched a vigorous drive to catch monkeys and transport them to distant places. Monkeys, who had become a source of nuisance and harassment here, are being caught in traps set by five "specialists" especially requisitioned from Uttar Pradesh. So far, they have been able to catch about 400 monkeys The corporation has transported these monkeys to places more than 25 km from here—Indian Express (B.K. Salwan, 99 APO)

RAJKOT The timely closing of a series of level crossing gates and the presence of mind of the railway staff helped avert a major disaster as a "ghost" train hurtled down the track between Ranavav and Porbandar in Gujarat's Junagadh district on 16 December 1984. Railway sources said that the 15-minute drama began when 14 wagons of a goods train carrying limestone broke away from the engine while shunting at Ranavav station and began rolling towards Porbandar, soon picking up a speed of about 100 km an hour on the steep incline. The station authorities immediately relayed an emergency message to Adityana and Porbandar stations, and the driver of a diesel engine standing on the same track at Adityana began rushing towards Porbandar, keeping just ahead of the oncoming wagons. On a dead-end track, the driver braked hard and jumped out to safety just before the loose rack at the seashore. The engine rammed the rail at the end of the track followed by the pursuing wagons—four of which derailed on impact—The Statesman (V Satyamurti, New Delhi)

NEW DELHI: In a major advance of plant tissue culture, geneticists at Haryana Agricultural University at Hissar have grown date palms in test tubes for the first time in India. The HAU achievement closely follows test-tube coconuts grown by agricultural scientists at Kasargod, in Kerala, and the test tube oil palms by scientists at the Bhabha Atomic Research Centre in Bombay. The date palm project at HAU was financed by the Indian Council of Agricultural Research. It will enable rapid multiplication of thousands of plantlets of date palm, starting from a single-leaf bud—Statesman (Ranjan Gupta, Durgapur)

WITHOUT COMMENT

The people have voted overwhelmingly for us because they are looking for a future for the country...we were always confident of winning—Rajiv Gandhi, after the Congress(I)'s landslide victory in the recent Lok Sabha elections, quoted in The Hindustan Times

I am not deterred by the defeat. It is not the first time I have been defeated—H N. Bahuguna, quoted in The Statesman

The maharajah's (Madhav Rao Scindia's) victory has in no small measure been due to money power, muscle power and ministerial power—A.B. Vajpayee

If there is anything called a Rajiv wave then God save this country—Jyoti Basu, West Bengal CM, quoted in The Telegraph

Parliament? What are you talking about? Just shoot all politicians. Yes, you, me, everyone—Charan Singh, when asked what the eighth Parliament would be like, quoted in Indian Express

A giant landslide it is, if there ever there was one. This is unmistakably Mr Rajiv Gandhi's victory—Editorial comment in Indian Express

The Indian voter has wiped the political slate as clean as he possibly could. He has given Rajiv Gandhi a mandate to inaugurate a new era in the country's political life—Girilal Jain in The Times of India

The results of the poll have clearly shown the will of the Indian people to carry out to the fullest extent Mrs Indira Gandhi's political and spiritual message—Francois Mitterand, President of France prize Rs 20 for the entry given first

THE NEW Vijai SUPER mark II

Scooters India Limited

There's no 150 cc scooter to match it for ECONOMY POWER SAFETY.

FEATURES	Brand X	Brand Y	Vijai Super Mark-II
FUEL ELONOMY Kms/litres	40±6	40	56±6
POWER BHP	6.3	6.5	9.6
SAFETY Engine Mounting	Right hand side	Central	Centrally aligned

Its here New Vijai Super Mark-II The latest model from Scooters India Limited — successors to Innocenti of Italy Pioneers in scooter manufacture. Vijai Super The winner of Grand Prix in India and abroad

Super Economy: 56±6 kms per litre

A new variable venturi carburettor, improved cylinder design, increased compression ratio and modified gear ratio impart optimum fuel economy SAVING FUEL.

Super Power: 9.6 BHP

Goes from 0 to 60 kms in 12 75 seconds flat Negotiates gradients with ease And keeps ahead of others

Super Safety

Centrally mounted engine low centre of gravity and wider wheel base make it safer even at high speeds on curves with load

Super Durability

Modified material composition of cylinder chrome plated piston rings and the use of solid lubricant enhance engine life That is why it carries a warranty of 15 months or 10 000 kms (whichever is earlier) – the longest on any two wheeler

It undergoes over 1 000 quality checks before it leaves the factory

Vijai Super Mark II Distributed and serviced countrywide through 225 outlets

Exported to many technologically advanced countries including Italy — its birth place

THE NEW Vijai SUPER mark II

The best deal on wheels

ASP-SIL-1 84A

BEGINNING 6 JANUARY 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) Success as well as setbacks are in store for you this week. Professionals and businessmen will make steady progress. Financially, this is a good period. you can make investments. The domestic front will remain peaceful. However, this is not a favourable week for lovers: try and avoid unnecessary arguments. Your health too will bother you throughout this phase
Good dates: 7, 8 and 9
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: North

LEO (15 August—14 September) If you have legal problems it is best to solve them during this period. Disputes relating to property will be solved in your favour This is also a good period for lovers misunderstandings will end. At home your children will be a source of joy to you. Financially, this is a good phase for most of you However, your health will bother you this week.
Good dates: 10, 11 and 12
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: North-west

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) This week you will have to draw upon your savings or borrow money to tide over this lean period. At home, one of your relatives may suddenly fall sick adding to your financial burden If you wish to change your job, consult your elders. Lovers are advised to steer clear of all controversies. Your health will add to your worries during this period.
Good dates: 7, 10 and 11
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 4
Favourable direction: West

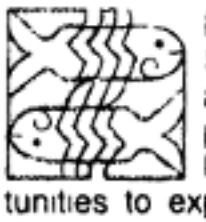
TAURUS (15 May—14 June) Businessmen will be able to repay most of their debts this week. The prospects are also bright for gamblers and speculators. For those in service a promotion or a posting to a better place is in the offing. Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans However, your children will be a source of worry to you this week. Keep a vigilant eye on your health and diet.
Good dates: 6, 8 and 10
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 8
Favourable direction: South-east

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) This is a good week for professionals but if some of you are thinking in terms of changing your career, do so after consulting your elders. The period is equally favourable for those in business' utilise every opportunity that comes your way. The last two days of the week are particularly favourable for artists. Lovers should avoid adventurous plans this week
Good dates: 6, 9 and 10
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 8
Favourable direction: North

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) This is a week of mixed fortunes. On the financial front some of you will suffer reverses. A word of advice. try not to borrow money and keep your expenditure to a minimum. On the domestic front your wife may suddenly fall sick. However, this is a favourable period for those in love and intending to get married.
Good dates: 7, 8 and 10
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North-east

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) The week ahead is not good for those in love postpone marriage plans On the domestic front, your relationship with someone close to you will be strained. Financially, this is a bright phase and you may gain money from an unexpected source. An old friend with whom you had broken off relations will be particularly helpful to you. Your health will improve.
Good dates: 9, 10 and 11
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 7
Favourable direction: West

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) At the slightest indication of illness consult a physician. Negligency may lead to serious complications. Lovers should avoid unnecessary arguments this week But this is a favourable period for students' some of you may get a chance to study in prestigious institutions. Those unemployed may find a job Friends and relatives will be helpful to you this week.
Good dates: 8, 9 and 10
Lucky numbers: 5, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: South-west



AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) Sportsmen will come out with flying colours in competitions this week. For businessmen, any deal struck during this period will prove to be lucrative. However, professionals are advised to deal with their superiors carefully. The domestic front will remain inspiring. This is also a good time for love and matrimonial alliances But do not neglect your health.
Good dates: 6, 9 and 10
Lucky numbers: 3, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (15 July—14 August) On the economic front the stars are favourable to you this week: some of you may even win a lottery. The period is also favourable for creative artists and sportsmen. However, professionals are likely to come in for criticism from their employers. Businessmen should also be wary of deception. A letter towards the end of the week will bring unexpected good tidings.
Good dates: 6, 7 and 9
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: East

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) This week you will be busy with social engagements but do not overstrain yourself as this will have an adverse effect on your health. Professionals will not be in the good books of their superiors while businessmen are likely to suffer a setback. This is also not the opportune time to get married. However, your health will improve markedly this week.
Good dates: 6, 11 and 12
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: East

PISCES (15 March—14 April) Stellar influences make this an extremely favourable period for all of you. Businessmen will get opportunities to expand their business while a promotion cannot be ruled out for those in service. At home, your children will be a source of joy to you. Friends and relatives will be very helpful Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans. But do not neglect your health.
Good dates: 8, 9 and 10
Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: South

For those born on the 6th, 7th or 8th of any month:

Most of you do not possess artistic temperament. You are practical and down-to-earth in all your dealings. Avoid the creative arts and join any administrative job if you want to prosper in life. Some of you are endowed with a rare sense of correctly analysing an incident. Friends and relatives look upon you for advice. Women born during this period are usually very intelligent and passionate.

21ST JANUARY '85 MAY BE A RED LETTER DAY IN YOUR LIFE

ANDHRA LAXMI

DELUXE BUMPER

CHANCES ON EACH TICKET

DRAW 21/1/85

WIN MORE THAN

RS. 9 CRORES

TICKET
RS. 500 ONLY

WIN IN MAIN DRAW

1ST PRIZES (40) Rs. 10,00,000 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 4 DIGITS)
2ND PRIZES (40) Rs. 1,00,000 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 4 DIGITS)
3RD PRIZES (400) Rs. 10,000 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 3 DIGITS)
4TH PRIZES (4000) Rs. 1,000 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 2 DIGITS)
5TH PRIZES (40000) Rs. 500 EACH
(TO BE DRAWN ON LAST 1 DIGITS)

WIN IN MINI DRAWS

20 1ST PRIZES Rs. 5,00,000 EACH
(ONE IN EACH DRAW)
8,000 2ND PRIZES Rs. 1,000 EACH
(400 IN EACH DRAW)

20 MINI DRAWS START FROM 18 DEC. ONWARDS. NUMBER OF TICKETS ARE LIMITED. BUY YOUR LUCKY TICKET TODAY TO AVAIL ALL 21 CHANCES

ORGANISING AGENTS:
CHANDRA AGENCIES
17, HOTEL CONTINENTAL ANNEXE, REGAL BUILDING,
NEW DELHI-110001. PHONES: 312202, 311208.

CONVENOR, RAFFLE COMMITTEE,
D.D. HOSP. HYDERABAD.
IN AID OF DEVELOPING DR. C.D. DESHMUKH CANCER
VASCULAR INSTITUTE AND RESEARCH CENTRE

A TICKET IS ENTITLED FOR ALL PRIZES DRAWN ON IT

VARIETY

CHESS

International master Dimitar Donchev achieved the unusual feat in 1983 of becoming national champion of two different countries, Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria. This was made possible by the fact that the Czechs opened up their championship to invited players from other Eastern Bloc countries, but it was nonetheless surprising that a little-known Bulgarian could eclipse grandmasters of the stature of Smejkal Ftachnik and Jansac on their home ground. Donchev's play is direct but refined and reveals more than an inkling of a sense of humour, as the following game from his victory in the Bulgarian championship demonstrates.

White: Kolev. Black. Donchev. King's Indian Defence Bulgarian Championship 1983.

1 P–Q4	N–KB3	2 P–QB4	P–Q3
3 N–QB3	QN–Q2	4 P–K4	P–K4
5 N–B3	P–KN3	6 B–K2	B-N2
7 O–O	O–O	8 R–K1	P–B3
9 B–B1	P–QR3	10 P–Q5	P–B4
11 P–QR3	N–K1	12 P–QN4?!

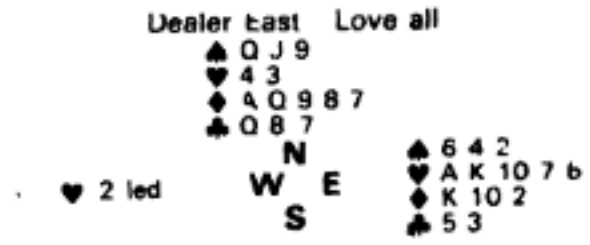
Superficial. Correct is 12 P–KN3 to meet 12 . . . P–KR3 with 13 N–KR4 restraining . P–KB4

Donchev (Black) to move

Kolev (White)



12 . . . P–KR3
A necessary preliminary to . . P–KB4, else the reply N–N5 is unpleasant.
13 N–Q2 P–B4 14 N–N3 P–N3
15 R–N1 N(Q2)–B3 16 B–Q3 P–B5
17 PxP NPxP 18 B–Q2 P–B6!
A fine stroke. If 19 QxP N–N5 or 19 PxP N –R4, in either case initiating a powerful attack
19 P–N3 N–N5 20 B–KB1 P–KR4
21 P–KR3? DIAGRAM
Really asking for trouble
21 . . . P–R5!. 22 PxN PxP
23 P–N5
Trying hard to keep the queen out, but she is not to be denied.
23 . . Q–Q2 24 PxP
Else Black plays P–N7 and . . Q–R6
24 . . . P–B7+ 25 K–R2 B–R1!
A deft and rather amusing death-blow. There is no defence to Q–R2+
26 Resigns.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE

Players who have come to watch a tournament sometimes say afterwards 'I watched So-and-so for an hour and a half, but I didn't see anything special'. Perhaps, but would they always have recognised a good play if they had seen it? Study this deal from a tournament in France

Dealer East Love all

The bidding goes:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
—	—	—	No
1♠	No	2♦	2♥
2♠	3♣	4♠	No
No	No

West leads the 2 of hearts to the king and you follow with the ace South plays the 5 and the 9 on these two tricks What do you play next?

A club, I am sure, hoping in time to make a club and a diamond But Chemla led a third round of hearts. Can you even see why?

The point is that partner, not knowing that you hold the king of diamonds, may take the ace of clubs and attempt to give you a ruff. Which will be disastrous if the hand is

What is liable to happen – and did happen at some tables – is that West, not placing his partner with the king of diamonds, may win a club lead and return a club, thinking that the best chance is to find partner with a singleton. Then South's losing diamond will go away on the queen of clubs

It appears that Chemla could have indicated a singleton elsewhere by playing ace and king of hearts, in that order. But why trust partner to remember?

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1 What is alopecia the medical term for?
2. The saying "once in a blue moon"—meaning a rare happening—is a fairly common one. Why does the moon look blue?
3. How is d-Lysergic Acid Diethylamide tartrate better known as?
4. Which film personality has won the maximum number of "Oscars," awarded by the U.S. Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences?
5. What are marsupials?
6. Which state in India has the highest literacy rate?
7. What do Strahov, Maracana, Azteca, Brabourne and Wembley have in common?
8 China is the most populous country in the world. Name the least populous country?
9. In India, the national anthem is Jana, Gana, Mana; in Britain it is God Save the Queen; what is the national anthem of France called?
10. Which well-known painting is also called La Gioconda?
11. The word "tycoon" originates from a title which was once awarded to whom?
12. Which river is known as Bengal's Sorrow?

ANSWERS

1. Baldness.
2. The presence of sulphur particles in the atmosphere after a forest fire or a volcanic explosion can make the moon look blue.
3. L.S.D., the powerful drug.
4. Walt Disney—29 Oscars.
5. Animals with pouches, like the kangaroo. Most marsupials are found in Australia.
6. Kerala, where nearly 70 per cent of the population is literate.
7. They are all famous stadiums in Prague, Rio de Janeiro, Mexico City, Bombay and London respectively.
8. Vatican City.
9. La Marseillaise, written in 1792 by Rouget de L'Isle.
10. The Mona Lisa.
11. The Japanese commander-in-chief was called Taikun.
12. The Damodar.

Now!

From the pioneers in diesel locomotive batteries...

New

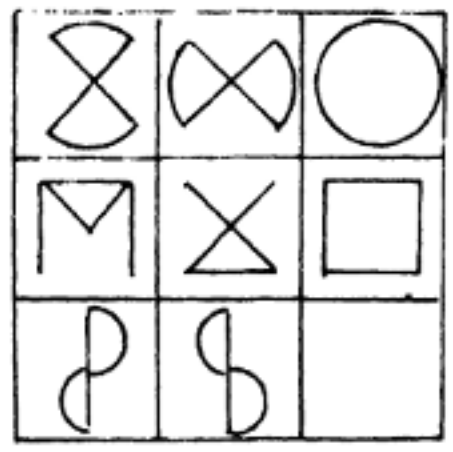
Standard
Car Batteries

The New Standard Car Battery!
It snaps to a start. It functions faultlessly.
It's got a lot of stamina. It won't leak.
It's low on maintenance, high on performance.
Its special high-performance plates
keep your car going long, long distances.
Standard. The car battery from the battery specialists.
Don't you think your car deserves one?

Technology you can trust

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU



Cryptocross

5	8	21	13	4	■	12	5	6	2	13	20	19
■	20	■	20	■	■	25	■	6	■	19	■
1	19	5	16	4	■	5	3	24	2	19	5	14
■	5	■	4	3	24	■	4	■	13	■	13	■
1	3	5	6	16	4	13	■	7	2	25	4	6
■	11	■	■	■	14	■	11	■	5	■	15	■
■	■	11	17	5	19	2	6	26	3	10	■	■
■	5	■	5	■	10	■	20	■	■	■	17	■
5	22	21	19	4	■	11	9	2	6	15	3	4
■	5	■	23	■	9	■	11	■	20	■	5	■
5	8	3	21	15	4	15	■	5	7	20	2	15
■	4	■	4	■	5	■	■	■	4	■	8	■
19	5	11	13	2	6	26	■	18	3	2	4	11

1	2	3	4	A 5	6
7	8	9	10	S 11	12
13	14	15	16	P 17	18
19	20	21	22	23	24
25	26

Each number in the main grid represents a letter. The same number always stands for the same letter. To help you make a start, three letters have been given. Can you now substitute the rest to complete the grid?

Shape Sleuth

Choose one of the squares numbered 1 to 5 to complete the blank in the large square.

Quick Think

Every one knows that families in India are close and large, but at a party the other day there were from the same family, one grandmother, one grandfather, two fathers, two mothers, four children, three grandchildren, one father-in-law, one mother-in-law and one daughter-in-law. An enormous number from just one family, you might say, and rather hard on the hostess. But was it really? Count carefully and see what the minimum is that you can reduce the family to.

Witsharpener

Three children whose surnames are Mukherjee, Bose and Sen live on the same road but use a different form of transport to come to school each morning. Their ages are 12, 13 and 14 years. We know that:

a) Ram is 14 years old
b) The 12 year old comes in a rickshaw
c) Barun does not cycle to school
d) Mukherjee takes the bus
e) Sisir's surname is not Bose nor is he 13 years old

Given these facts, can you work out each child's surname, his age and the transport he uses to come to school?

Scrambles

PENALTIES

CHAIN

TANGERINE

ENEMY

RUMBAED

ANALOG

SERIAL

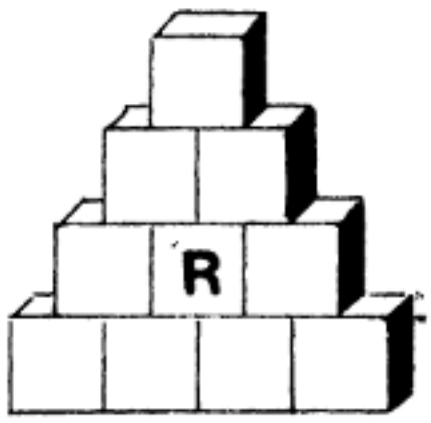
answer

Feel like a trip around the world? Just unscramble these words and see where you get. And if that is not enough of arm chair travel, take the circled letters and rearrange them for one more journey!

What's in a Word?

In the following arrangement of letters— —R— — I S E you could replace both pairs of blanks with the same letters to form the word PORPOISE.

Can you complete the words given below in the same manner?



a) — —I N — I L L A
b) ——S — S I N
c) ——O——I E T Y
d) ——S——R I S M
e) C L — G — G

Mindbender

Can you work out this well-known puzzle?

There was once a Bedouin who had three sons. When he died, he left his property consisting of 17 camels to his sons, the oldest to have one halt of them, the second son to have one third, and the youngest one ninth. As 17 was a number not divisible by either 2, 3, 9, the camels could not be divided and the sons were in a dilemma. Finally, they remembered a sheik who was known for his wisdom and consulted him. What was his advice?

Blockbuster

D, N, M, P, R, E, I, T, E, A

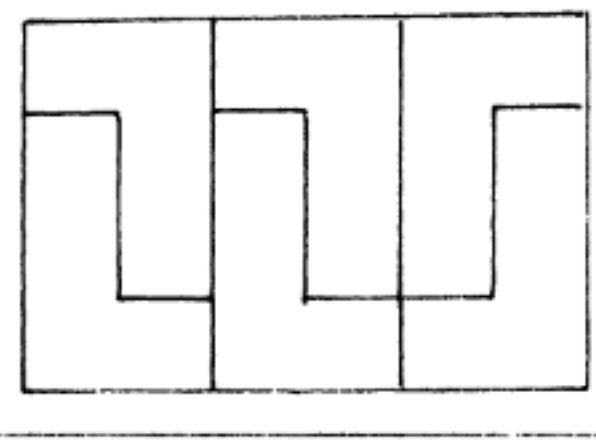
Fill in the ten letters given below into the squares of the blank pyramid so that these those form eight four-letter words reading downwards.

Solutions to last week's Teasers:

Personality Plus:
Jawaharlal Nehru

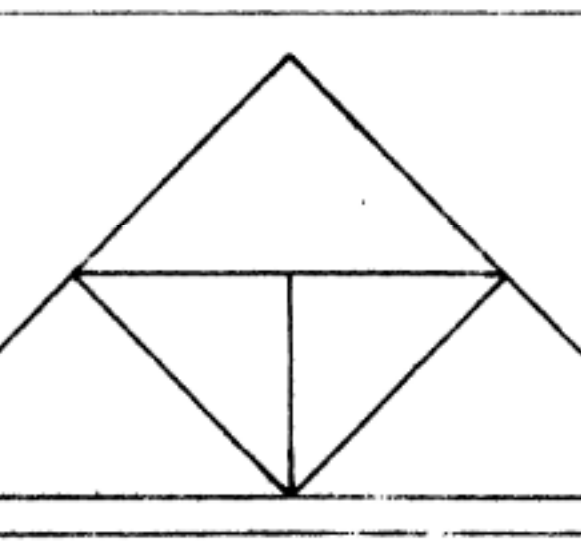
Blankagrams:
1. Duck 2. Bill 3. Hide 4 Play 5. Planter 6. Fly 7. Mount 8 Tick 9. Till 10. Tie

Quizzbizz:
c) Light can travel in vacuum.

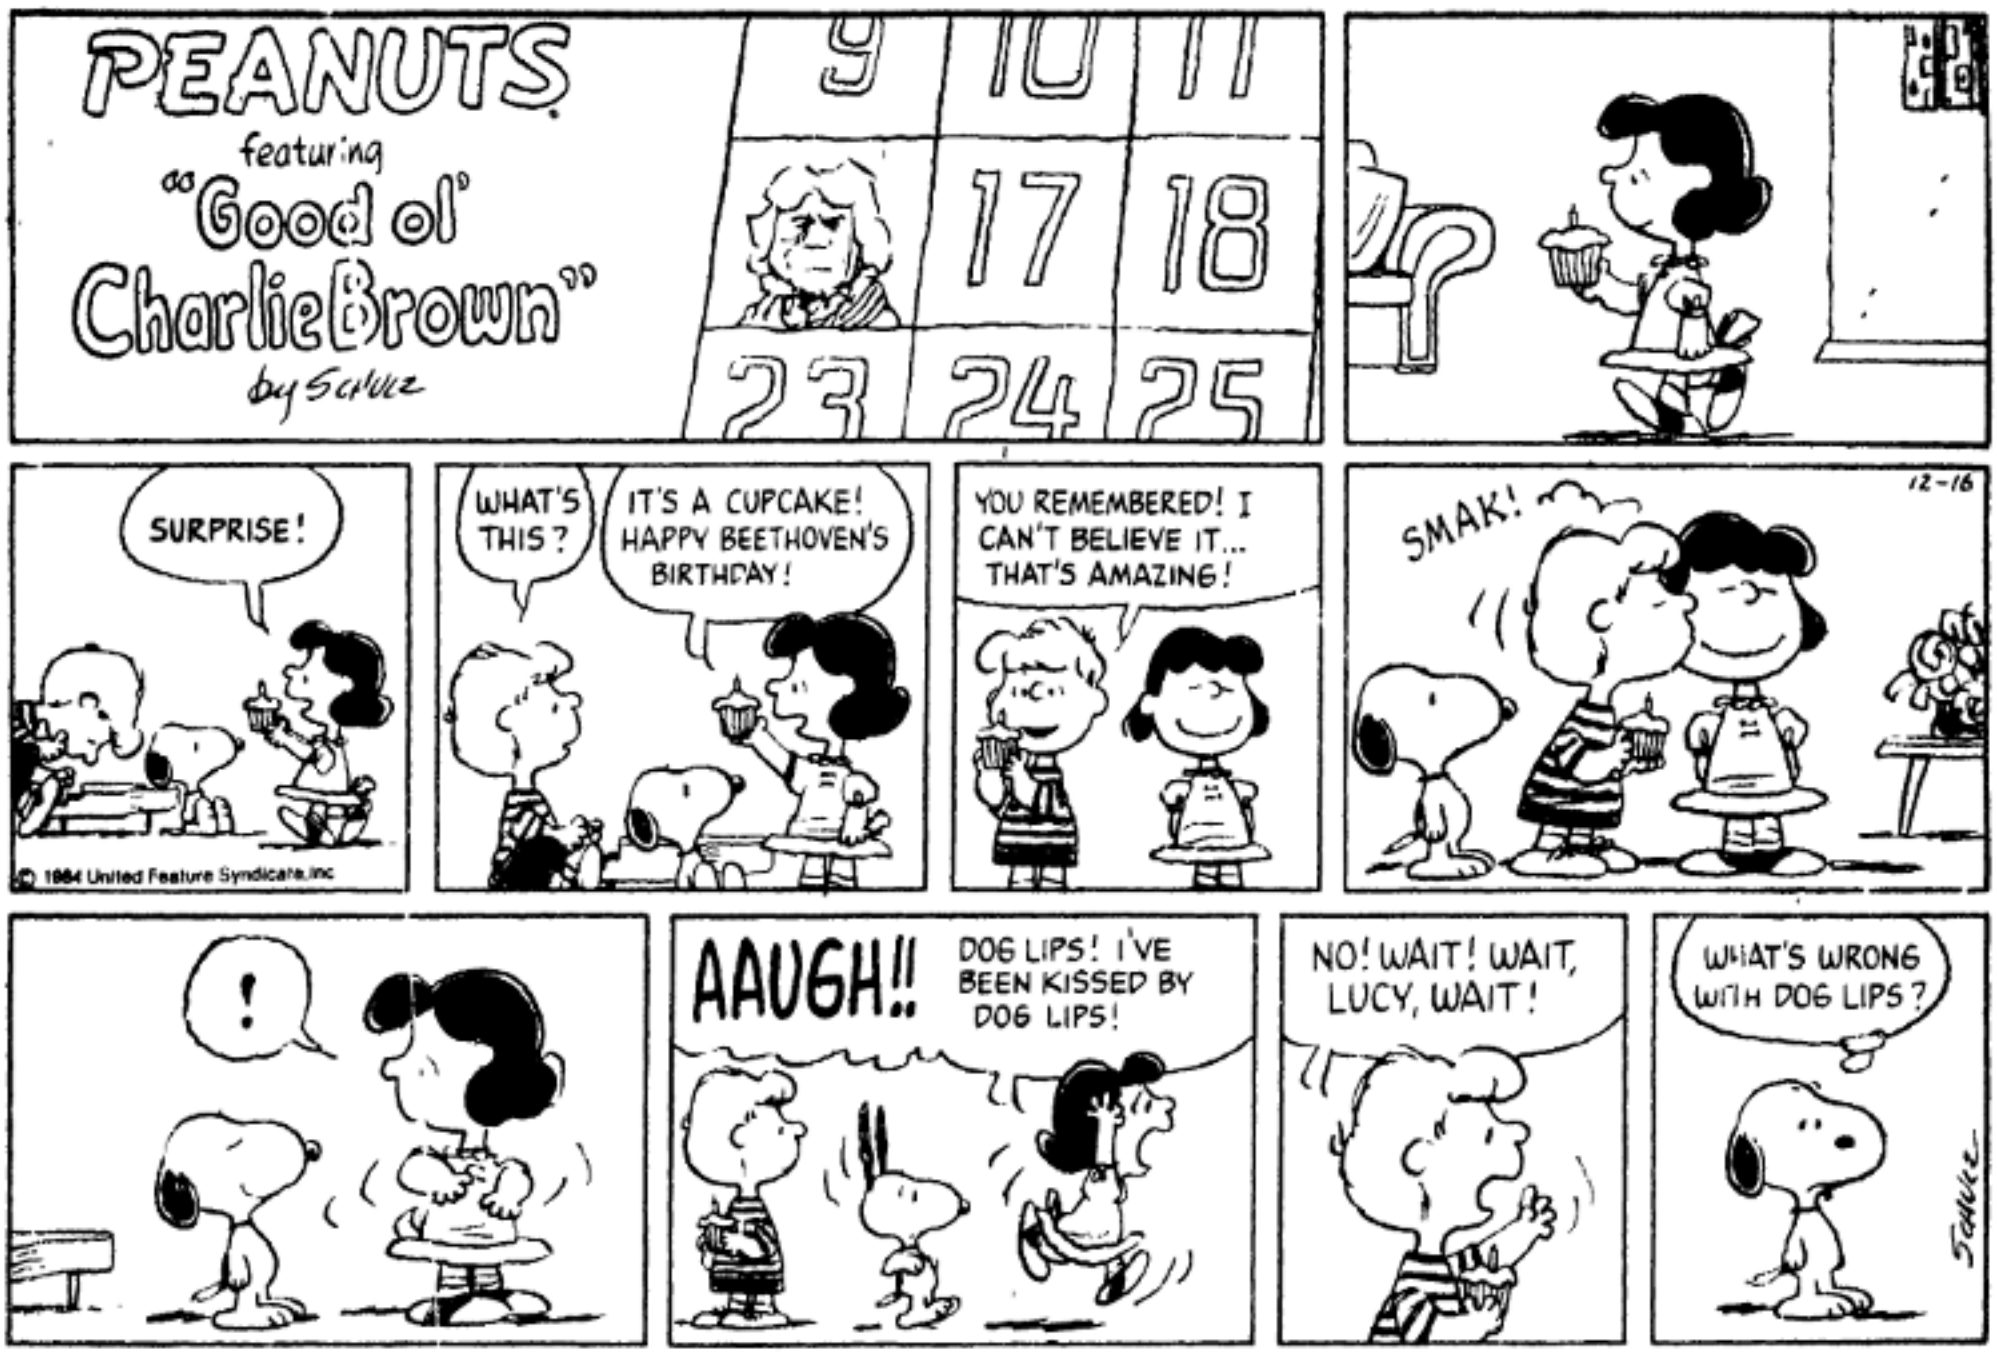


Quickthink:
There are 8 kennels.

What's in a Word:
Q(UEUE)



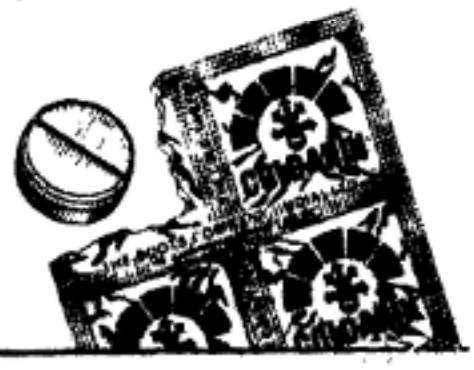
Shape Sleuth (Page 71):
The pieces marked 4, 5, and 7 complete a square.



Think Again:
Box C-3.

Mindbender:

Shape Sleuth:



DON'T SNEEZE YOUR DAY AWAY.

Don't let a cold ruin your day. Runny nose, congestion and a heavy head. Typical symptoms of a cold. You suffer. Your day suffers. Why not do the sensible thing? Try Coldarin. It's a specially formulated tablet for colds. So convenient. Such a relief!

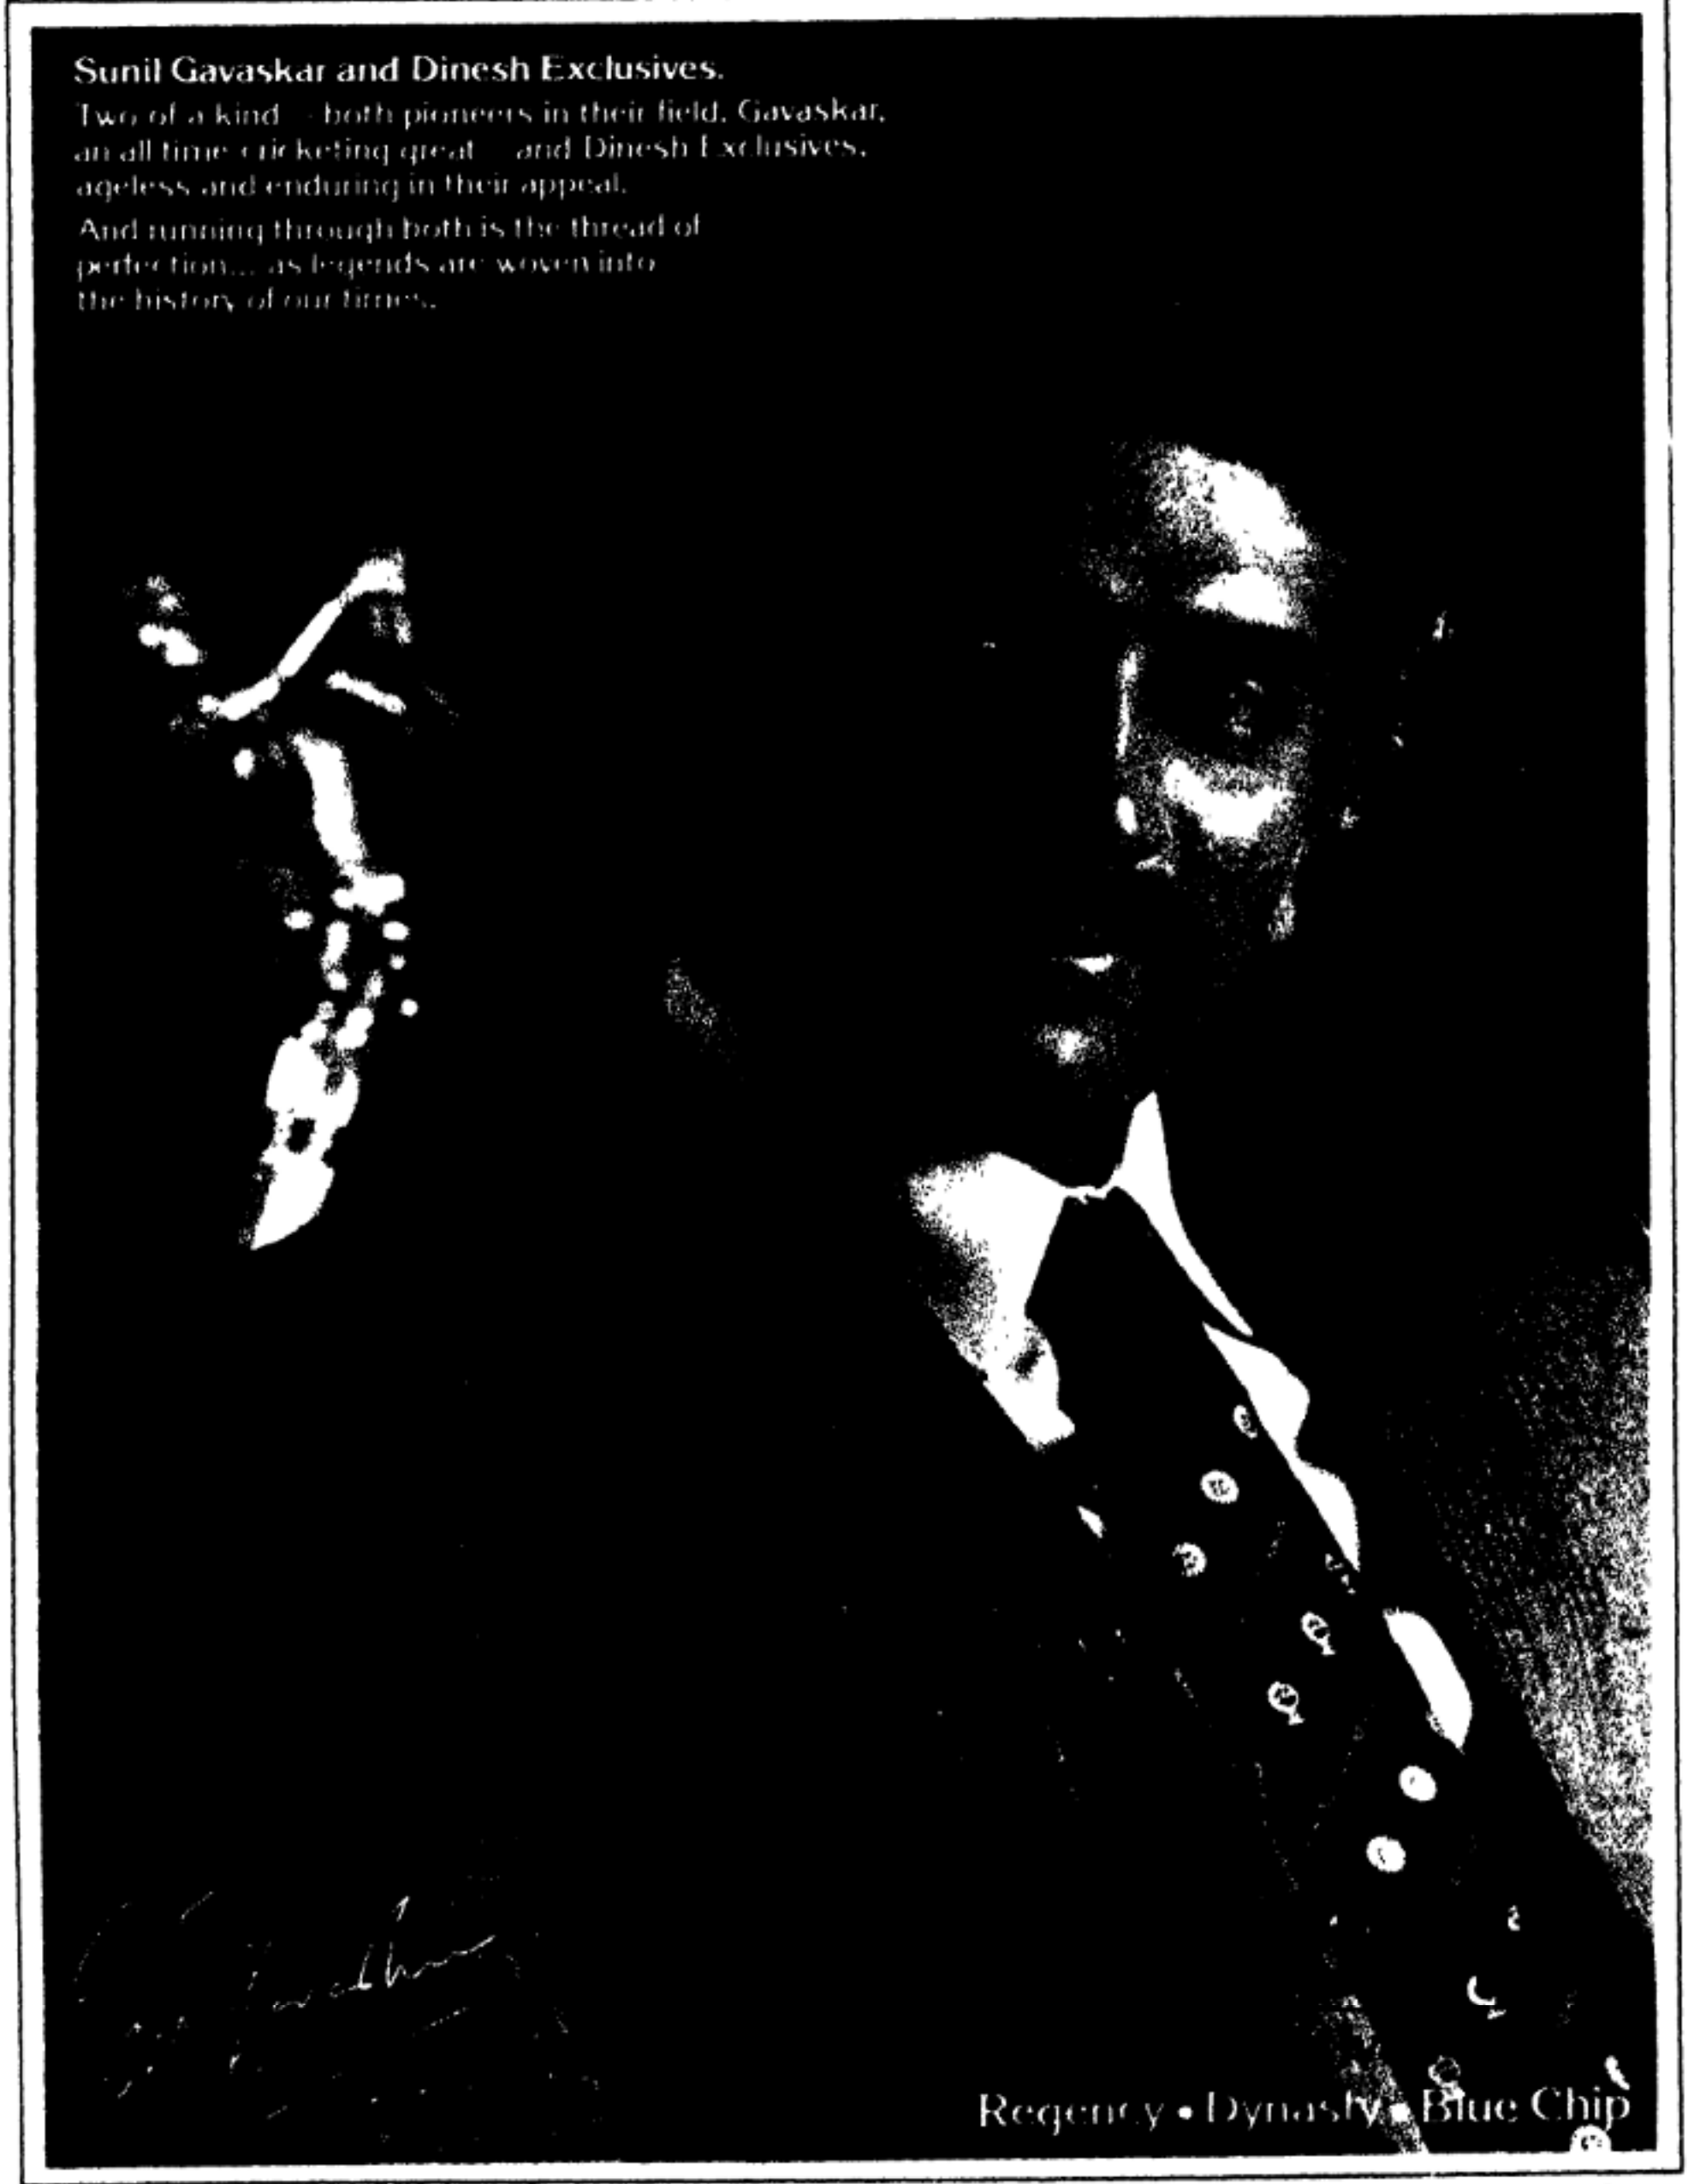
Why have a cold? Have a Coldarin.

CASBC 111-124

Now! Bite into the international taste of chocolate



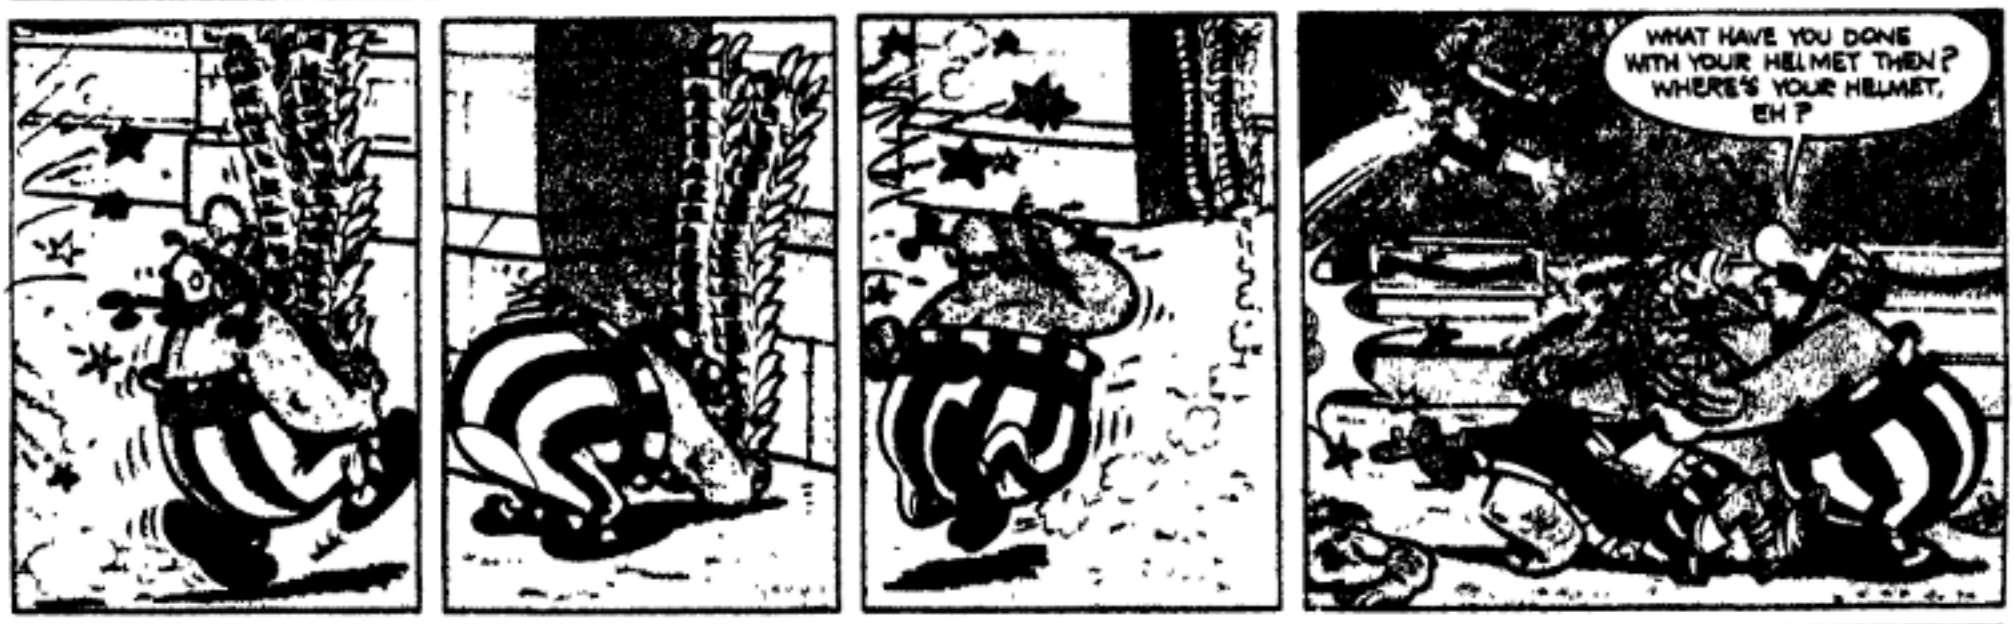
Take a bite and get an altogether new experience. A rich, creamy experience that only a chocolate made by Cadbury's from dairy-fresh milk, can offer. New Cadbury's Dairy Milk is just that. Just like the one that's made Cadbury's the international standard in chocolate.

New Cadbury's Dairy Milk

OBM/4156

Portrait of two legends.

everest/84/SDM/259



Decades later... still the leader.

COMICS

Asterix

THE GLADIATOR BY GOSCINNY AND UDERZO

DELHI DIARY

Whose Survival?

Sandeep Shankar

Pranab Mukherjee

Pranab Mukherjee's magnum opus, Beyond Survival, suddenly increased its sales in December 1984. Senior officers of the public sector banks were seen selling these books to people who called on them for business. The book is priced at Rs 95 and dishing out a hundred rupee note to the bank official who sanctions loans was not much of a bother for the businessmen. But many of them ended up buying five or six copies of the book, as they were dealing with as many banks. Now they are in a fix—to whom can they palm off the extra books? One wonders if the honourable union finance and commerce minister was aware of these happenings. By some coincidence, apart from the banks, the officers of the agencies like the State Trading Corporation and other such commerce ministry outfits were also seen displaying this book in their offices

Rajiv's Brigade

The development centre of the Indian Youth Congress(I), headed by the bearded Rajya Sabha member from West Bengal, Debaprasad Roy, has become the trusted cadre centre of the Congress(I) since the Rajiv Gandhi era set in. This became evident during the election campaign. Initially, the control room set up at the AICC(I) office at 24 Akbar Road was manned by the personnel of the ex-servicemen's cell of the party. Vishwajeet Singh, who belongs to the erstwhile ruling family of Kapurthala, who has come to the Rajya Sabha from Maharashtra, was in overall command. Retired Brigadier Rai Singh and a former naval officer, Commander Sood, were the political adjutants. There were many complaints from the PCC(I) offices about the rude behaviour of the formerly uniformed men. One day, the party's treasurer Sitaram Kesri had to tell the ex-servicemen to remember that they were working for a democratic political party now and they should be reverential to their political seniors. After this, the development centre boys were asked to "assist" the control room commanders. Not only this, at the railway stations, when the parcels containing publicity material were loaded, Dr Roy's boys supervised the operations. Some trucks carrying the AICC(I) material to the states were accompanied by the developmentcentre cadre. Rajiv Gandhi's brigade oversaw the ex-servicemen's cell in the last days of the campaign.

Escape to Victory

In the third week of December 1984, the penultimate week before the polling day in the eighth general elections, the movie distributors in Uttar Pradesh seem to have chipped in their bit in the campaign for Amitabh Bachchan. As many as eight Amitabh starrers were running in the movie halls of Allahabad this week, as compared to only one in the neighbouring metropolis of Kanpur. Sharabi was being shown in Kanpur, while Allahabad was regaled with Zanjeer, Mahaan, Ganga ki Saugandh, Naseeb, Coolie, Suhaag, Nastik and of course, Sharabi. Two English movies were also being exhibited in Allahabad: House of Wax and Escape to Victory. The question is: whose victory?

K M Kiran

Amitabh Bachchan

Beg Your Pardon?

Is campaigning for a candidate a political or an intellectual exercise? Former Chief Justice of India, Justice M. H. Beg, addressed a meeting of "intellectuals" at the residence of an Allahabad lawyer, Swamy Dayal, on the eve of the elections. Amitabh Bachchan's poet father, Harivansh Rai Bachchan was the other speaker at this meeting. The purpose of this intellectual exercise was to mobilise support for the Congress(I) candidate from Allahabad, Amitabh Bachchan. Senior Bachchan harped on his past association with the city's intelligentsia (he taught at the Allahabad university) and said that it was not necessary that the new MP should be a person who stayed in Allahabad. (He pointed out that Rajiv Gandhi did not stay at Amethi nor was Arun Kumar Nehru, a resident of Rae Bareili—thereby equating his actor-turned-politician son with these gentlemen.) Justice Beg said that only the Congress(I) could ensure stability in the country. This value judgment was questioned by Justice Shashi Kant Verma, a former Chief Justice of the Allahabad High Court, from where M. H. Beg at one stage practised law and where he first came to the bench. The elderly retired judge mildly questioned Justice Beg by saying, "How can you say that?" Immediately, the former Chief Justice of India said that as Justice Verma was his senior, he was withdrawing his statement. This judicious withdrawal apart, one wonders at the propriety of the chairman of the minorities commission to address an election campaign meeting, even if it be held under the guise of an "intellectuals' meet." Justice M.H. Beg is not only the former Chief Justice of India, but the sitting chairman of the minorities commission. Despite his views, the Muslims in Allahabad seemed bent upon supporting a politician for real walking pleasure.

D.E. Nizamuddin

LIBERTY

Liberty Group Marketing Division, Liberty House Extension, Railway Road, Karnal-132001

Sakar/Lib

Regd. No. WB/cc/256/TN/MS(C)376 MH-By-South/86

BAJAJ 4 2416

Bajaj Automatically

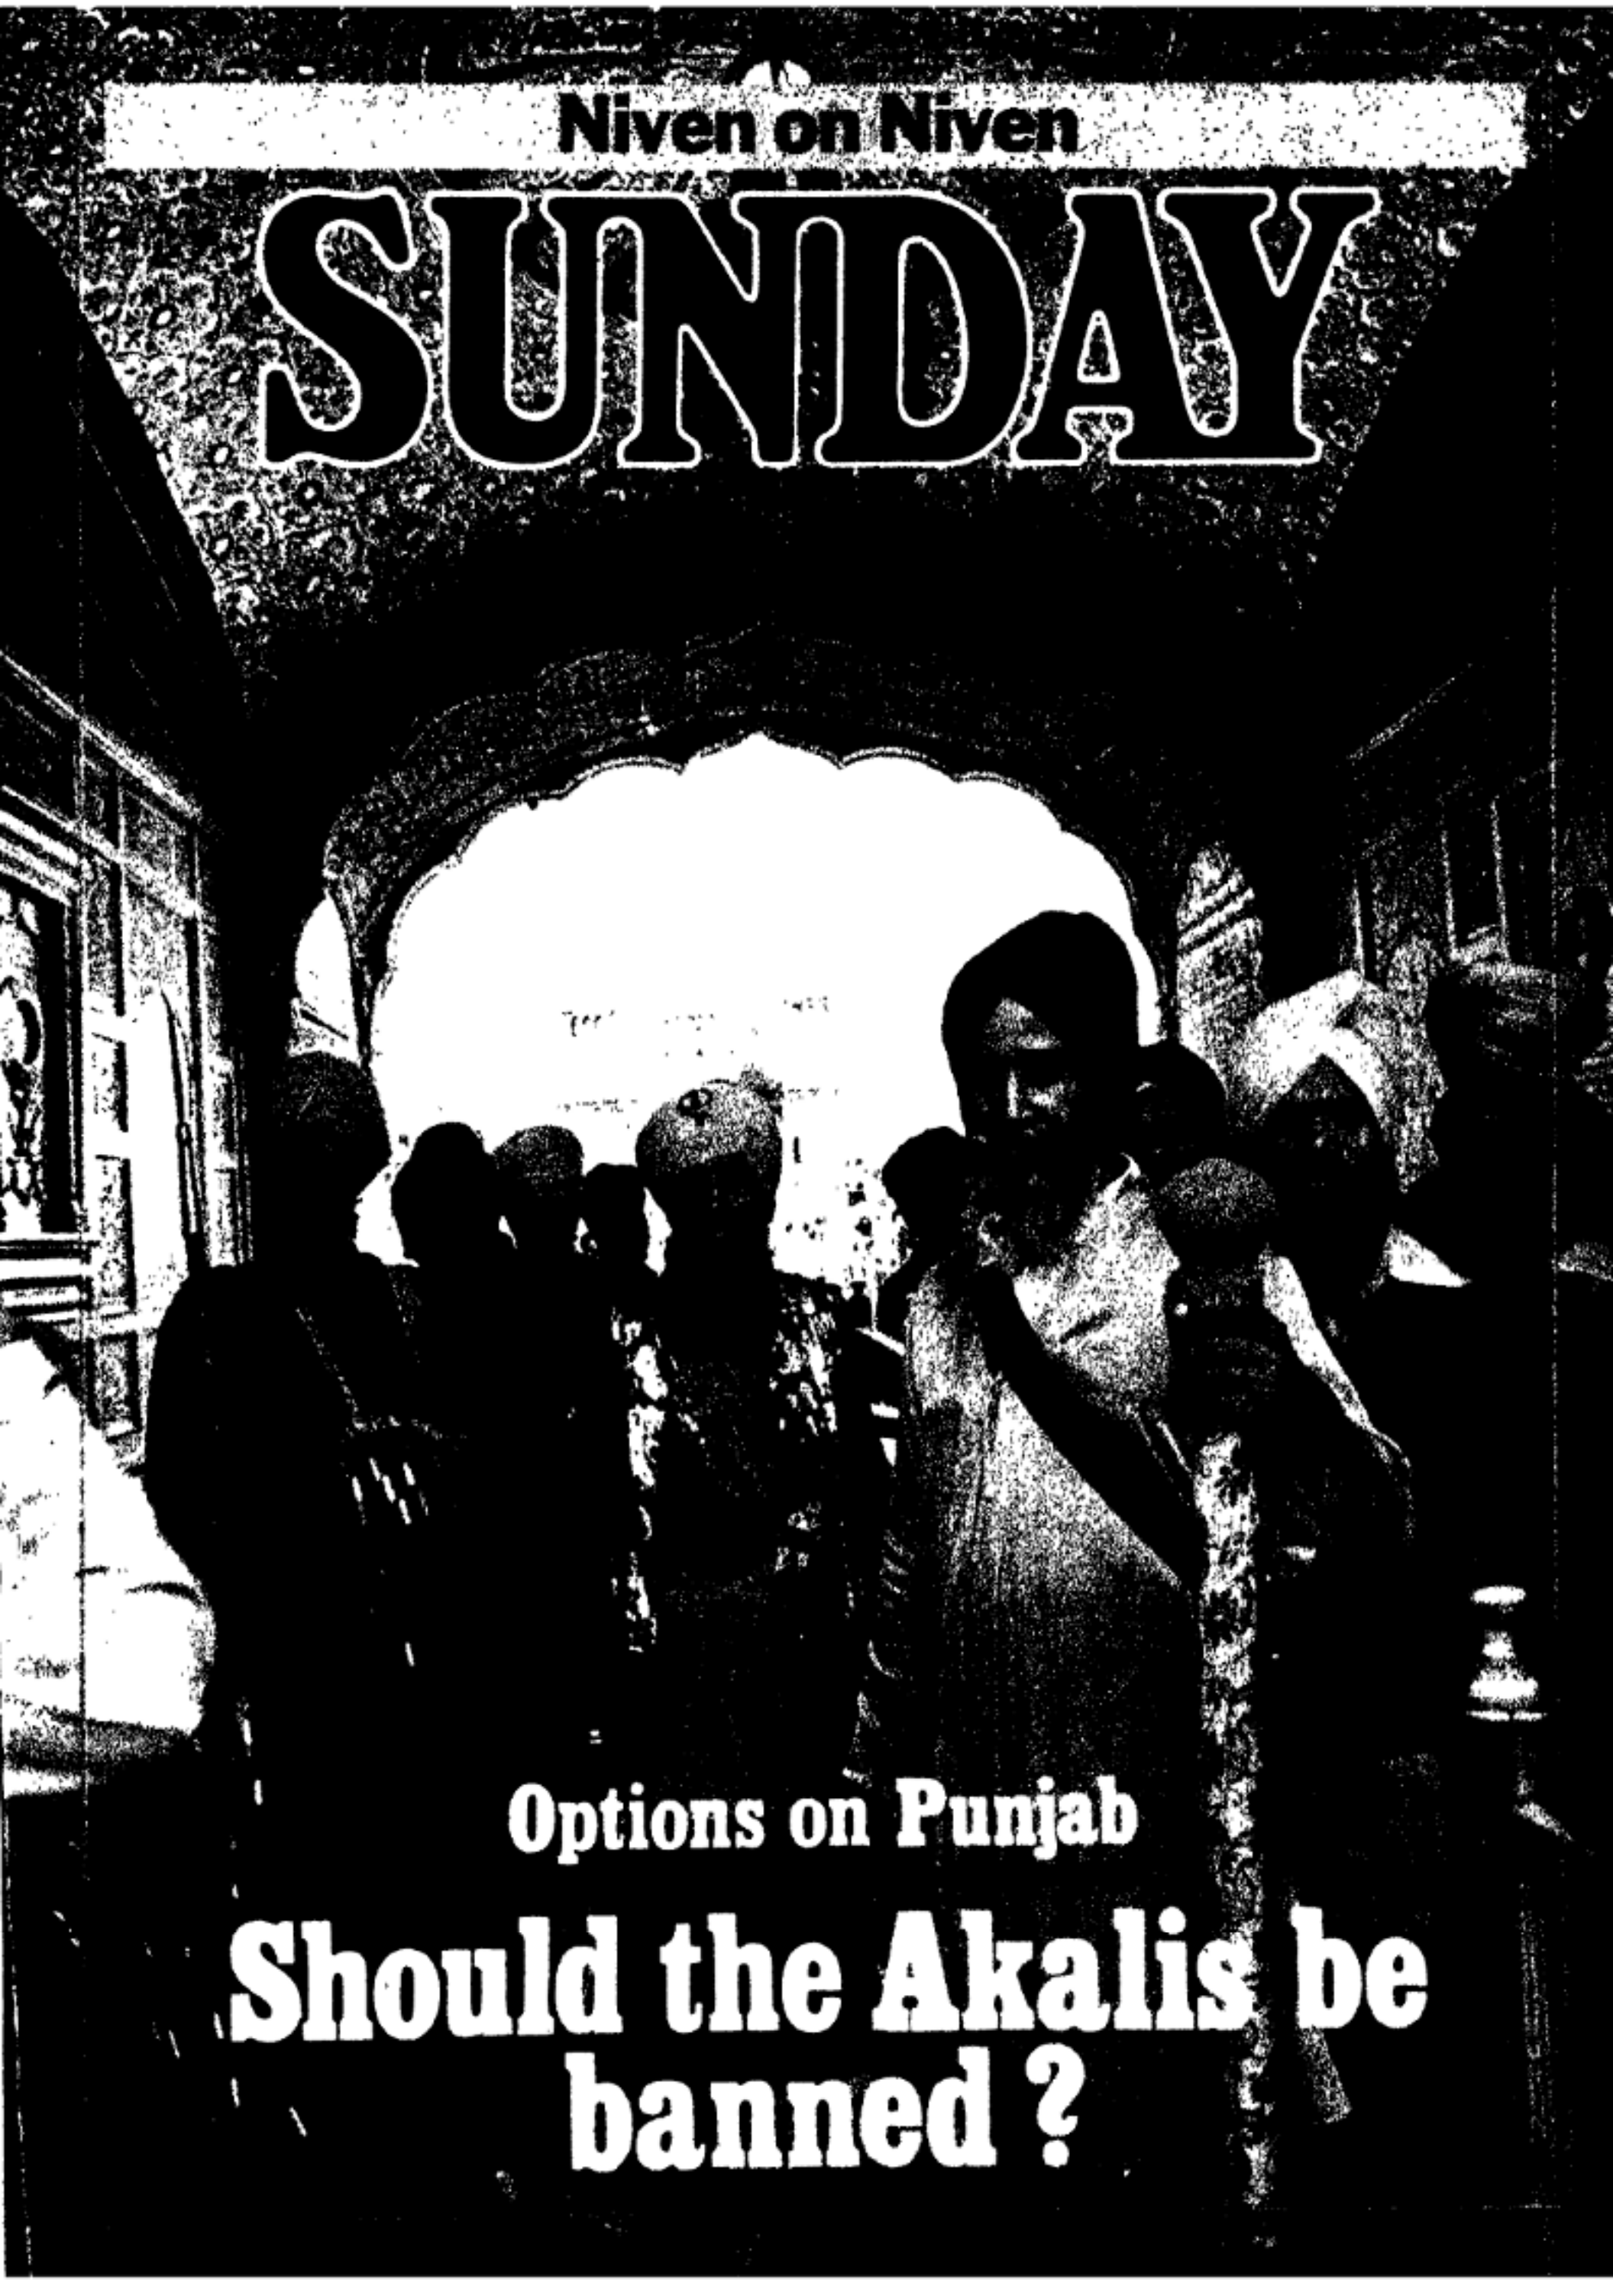
If someone asked you to name India's largest scooter manufacturer, whose name would come to mind first?

If you were told there is a plant in India which turns out one scooter every minute, who would you think of first? Bajaj Auto, automatically.

But the waiting list for Bajaj scooters is too long even for such a plant; though it is as big as any single scooter plant in the world.

So, Bajaj Auto is setting up two new plants which will help us to produce over 700,000 vehicles a year.

Normally, it takes years to commission such an operation. But with our experience, we plan to start production at Aurangabad by 1985 and Agra by 1986.



Which should keep Bajaj Auto the leader for years to come; automatically.

bajaj auto ltd

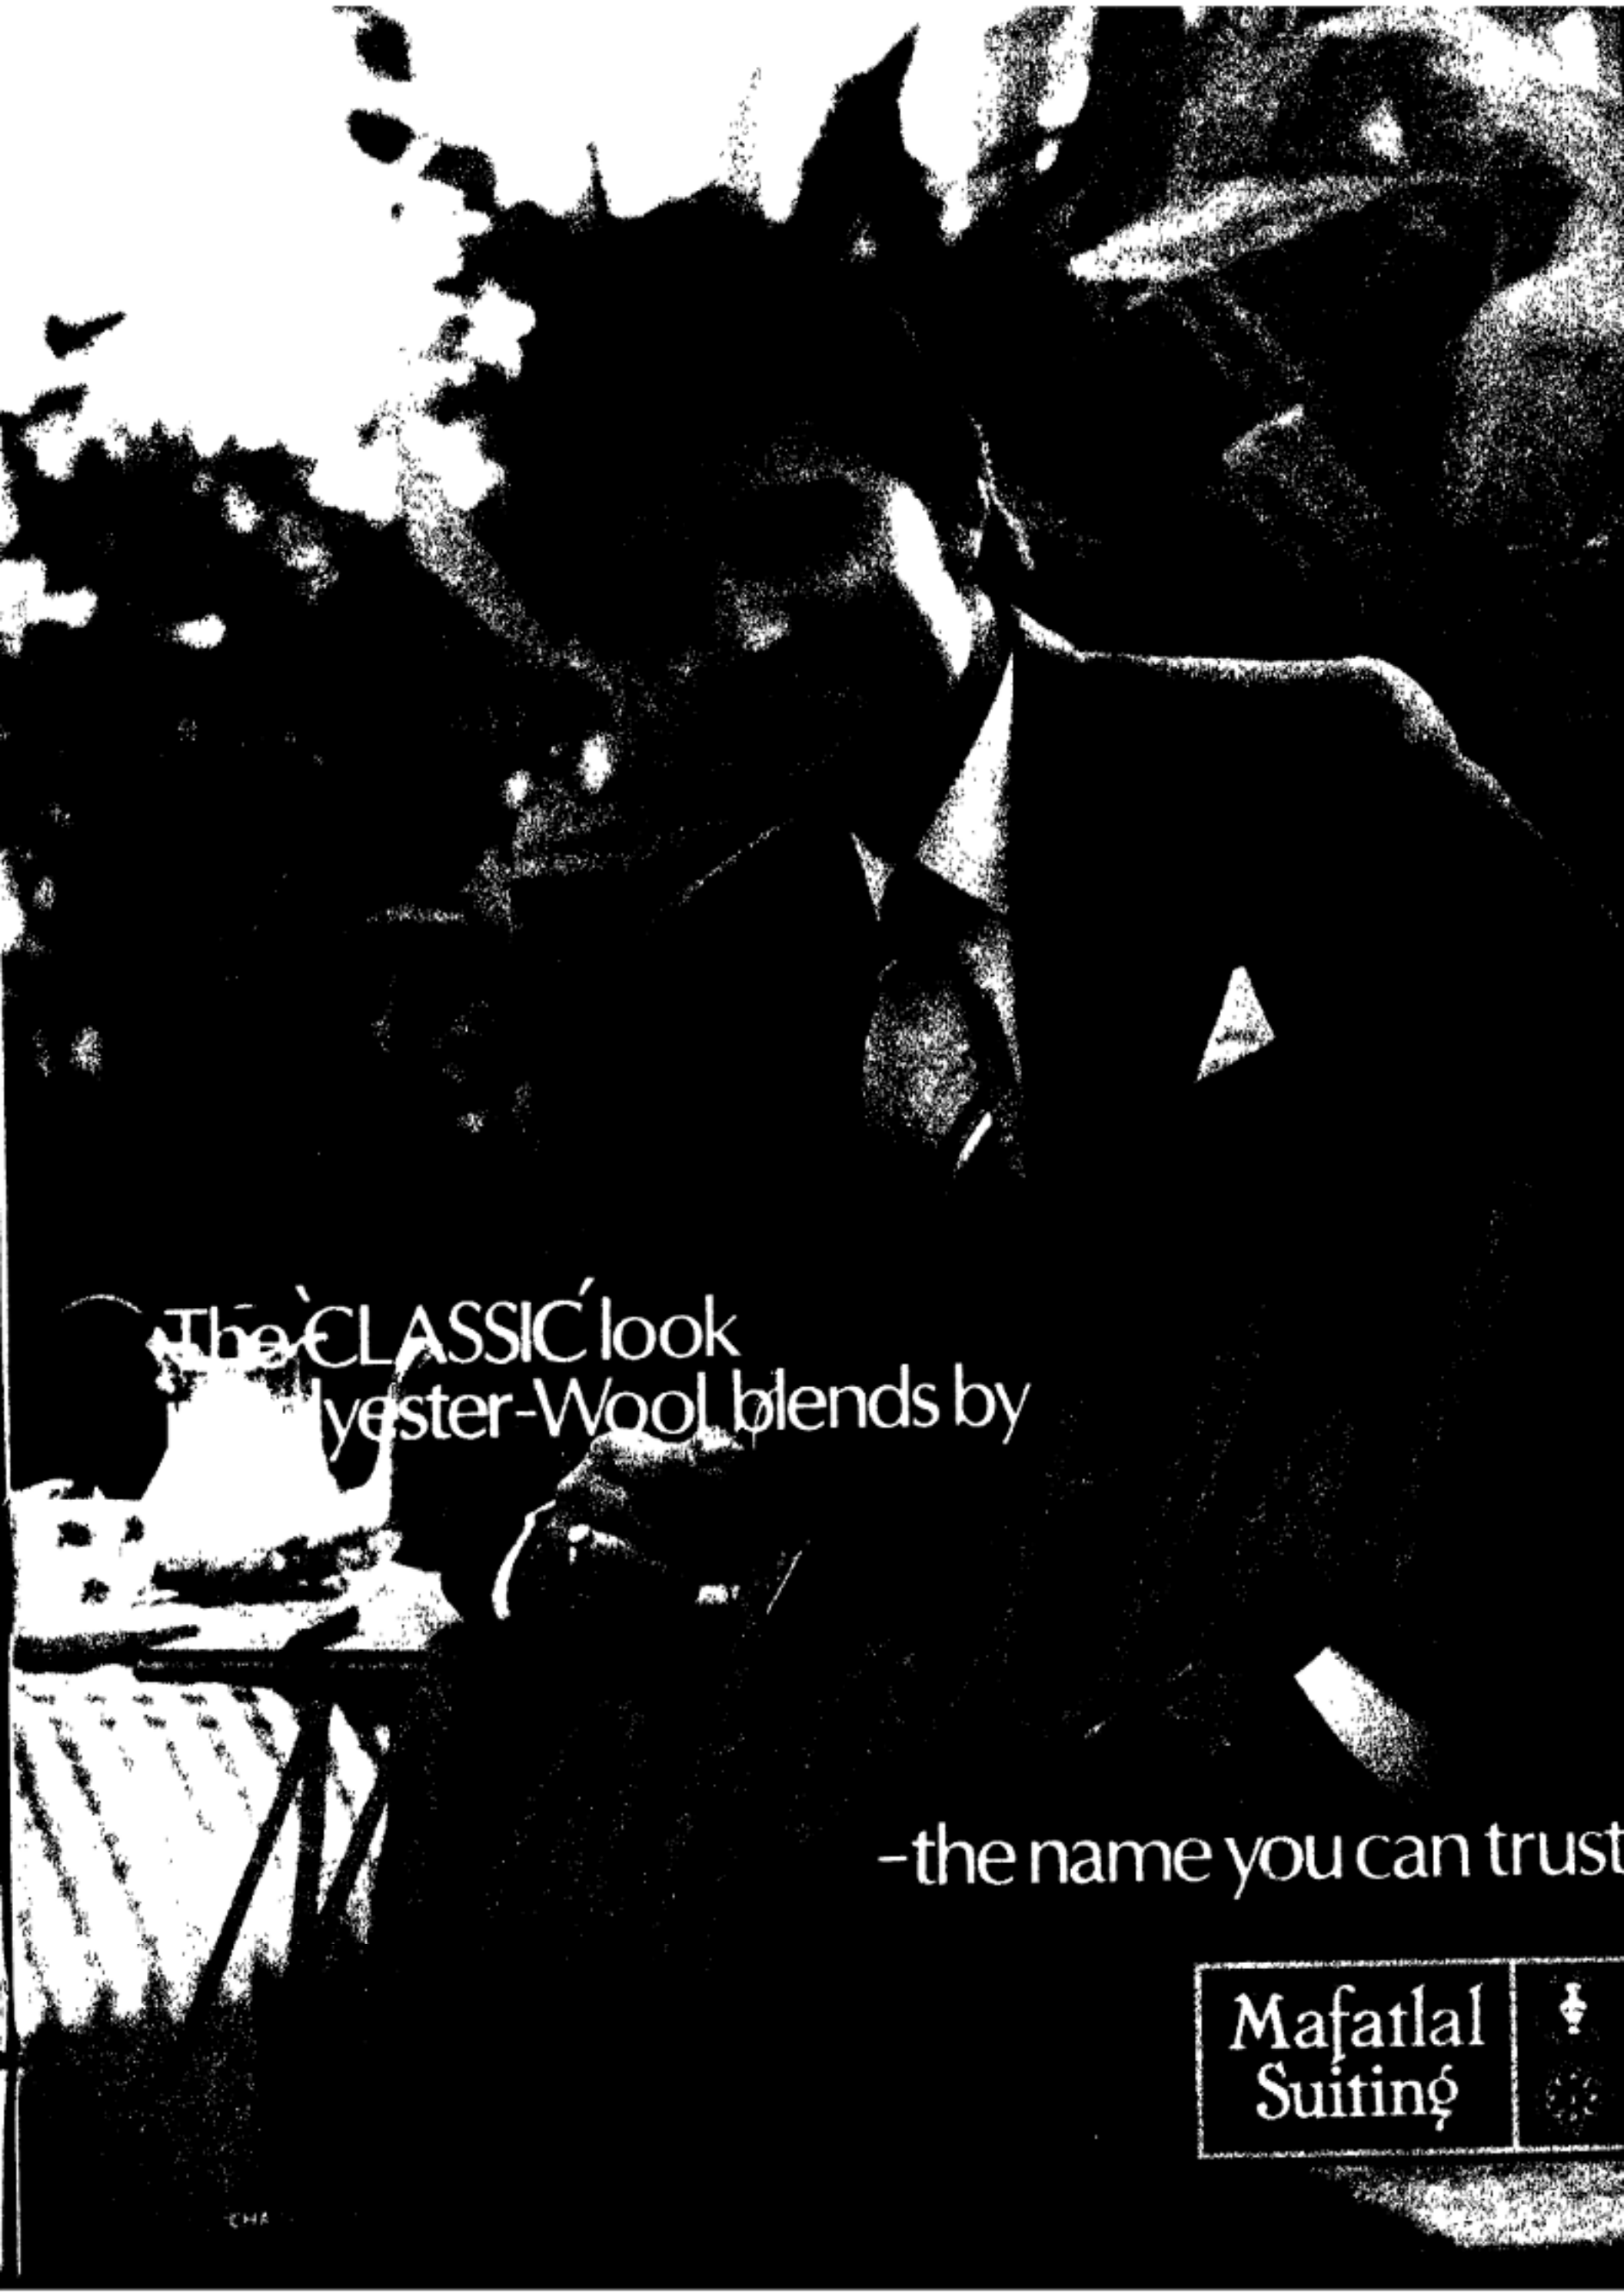
Value for money, for years

Niven on Niven

SUNDAY

Options on Punjab

Should the Akalis be banned ?



The tinkle of crystal,
the sparkle of talk and laughter... and Gold Flake.
Great quality...
For the gracious people.

GOLD FLAKE
KINGS
Quality that's forever

STATUTORY WARNING: CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

The CLASSIC look of Polyester-Wool blends by
-the name you can trust
Mafatlal
Suiting

It's a hard day's night
I've been walkin' the town
Makin' a living
And I'm feelin' down
I've been on the move
'Cos I got money to make
But after it's all over
A man needs a break
So here's to the good times
It's gotta be said
I'm ready for a kip
I'm lookin' for the bed

Yeah, I'm lookin' for the Red

WHEN YOU'RE LOOKIN' FOR A LIFT

IRON BED

20—26 JANUARY 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 □ ISSUE 11 ▫ RS 4 00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 16

Options on Punjab

There is a choice of several alternatives before Rajiv Gandhi to solve the Punjab tangle. Though the mood in Delhi is for a reconciliation with the Akalis, the central government can amend the Constitution to ban the Akali Dal as a politico-religious organisation if the Akalis do not pay heed to what the government considers reasonable. A report on the options before the government by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya.

SPECIAL REPORT 30

The Sitapur Massacre

On 3 January '85, 23 people, 21 of them belonging to the same family, were massacred at Moh a ddipur village in Uttar Pradesh following a dispute over a mango tree. An investigation by Nirmal Mitra.

Page 16

Page 38

SUNDAY SPECIAL 38

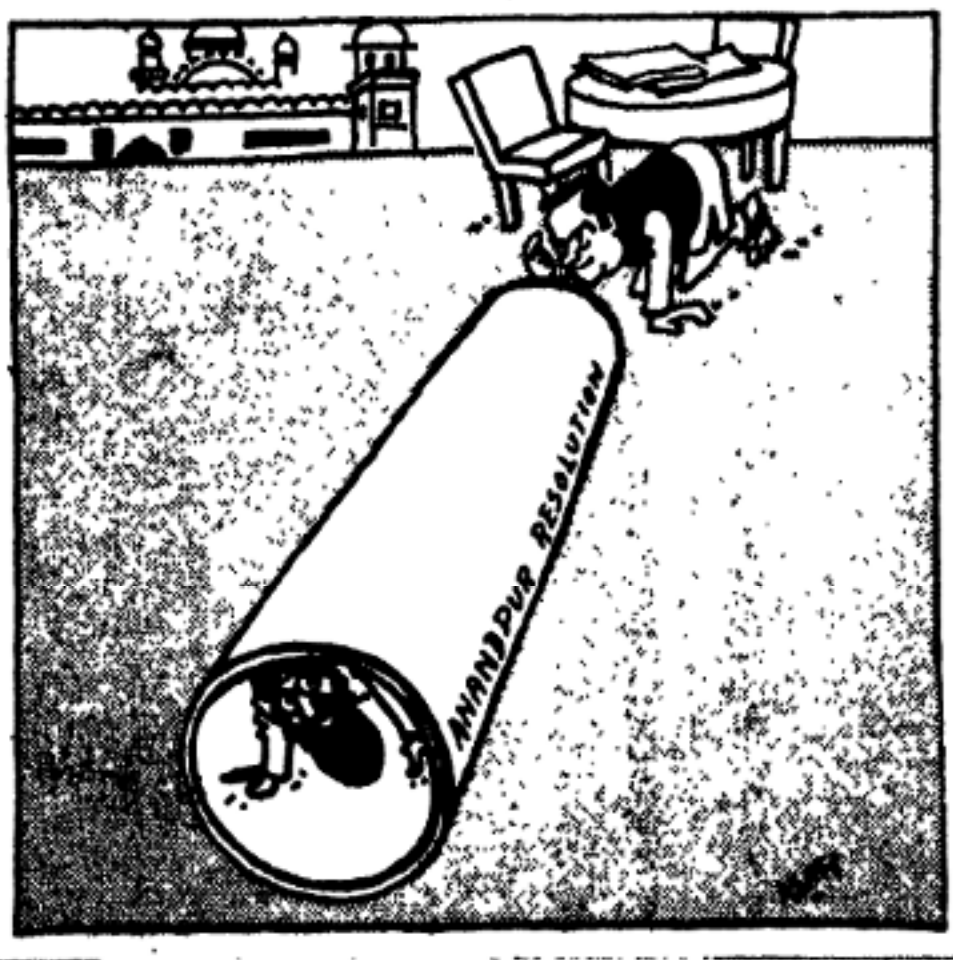
A Script of Chaos

The 10th International Film Festival opened in New Delhi on 3 January. A report by Madhu Jain. Plus an interview with the noted film director, Adoor Gopalakrishnan, director of Mukhamukham.

COMMENT

Dateline M.J. Akbar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 9
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12



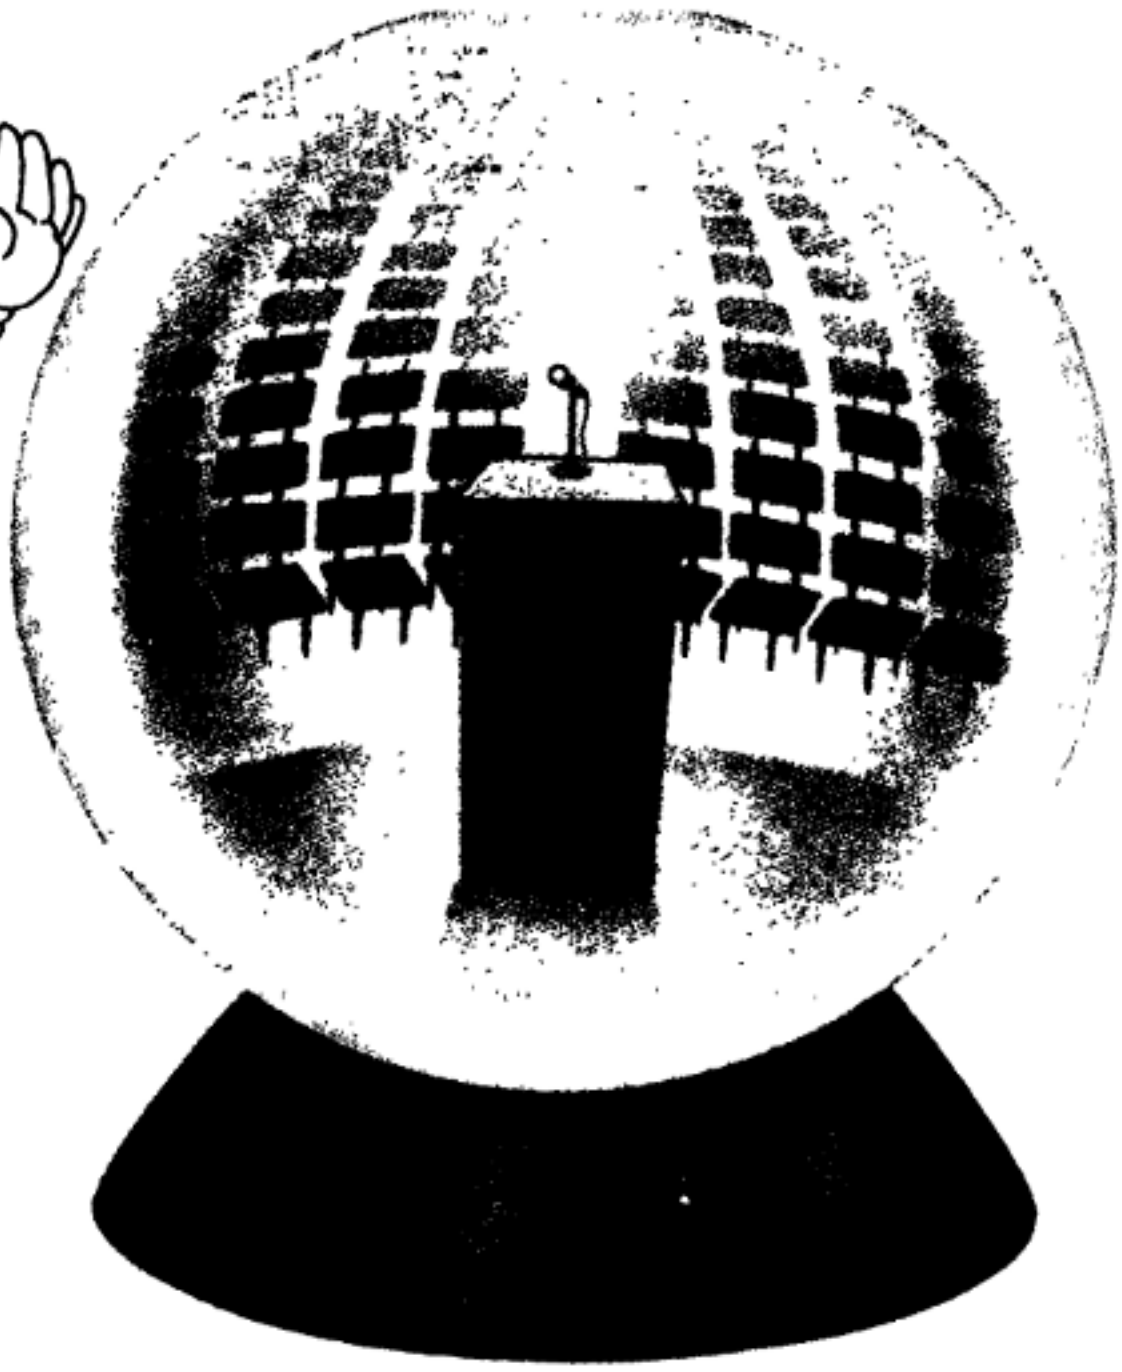
VARIETY

Science 56
Khaas Baat 66
This India 67
Sundayweek 68
Chess/Bridge/Quiz 69
Teasers 70
Peanuts 72

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Delhi Diary 74

PUNCHLINE/KUTTY



Cover transparency: Sondeep Shankar

Editor M.J Akbar

Associate Editor Toosher Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K John, Henry Jacob,
Rajiv Bagchi, Srimoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay
Olga Tellis
Bangalore
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati
Seema Guha
Srinagar
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bapu Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
An surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar Jammu

Watch your conference take shape without putting it together

Do nothing.

And watch Air-India's Congresses & Conventions team organise just about everything. To put your conference together in the shape you'd like it to be.

Watch them bid for India as the conference venue. Promote your conference abroad. Liaise with delegates. Assist in preparing their kits. Arrange their hotel bookings. Transport them all the way to Delhi or any other city in India. On a wide range of low, low group and individual fares.

What's more, they'll even provide freighter services at special rates. In case you need to fly in special equipment for the conference.

Of course, their job is made easier by Air-India's worldwide network of 145 offices. And by Delhi's superb conference venues. Like the Talkatora Stadium or the Indoor Sports Complex. Ideal for large conventions ranging from 3000 to 25000. Or, the 9 new hotels in Delhi, most of which offer excellent conference facilities.

Or even the ultra-modern Shere-e-Kashmir Conference Centre at Srinagar. Which offers you a choice between two large and two small conference rooms as well as a 600 seat auditorium with simultaneous translation facilities in five languages and film projection facilities for both 16 mm and 35 mm. Plus four committee rooms, exclusive documentation and communication equipment, banquet space for 500 persons, an exhibition gallery and a press room. All attached to the superb 5-star Centaur Lake View Hotel right next to Dal Lake.

Naturally, with such services, it's no surprise that Air-India has been closely involved with the 12th International Leprosy Congress, the World Mining Congress, the 59th International Convention of World Association of Detectives Conference and many more.

Best of all, Air-India offers its conference planning services absolutely free! Now that you know, don't just rub your hands together in glee!

Get in touch with:

Air-India
Congresses & Conventions
6th Floor, Vandana, 11, Tolstoy Marg,
New Delhi 110 001 Tel: 344225
Cable: AIR-INDIA

You host it. We'll organise it.

Member
International Congress
and Convention Association

AIR-1519

DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

Calcutta: It was terribly brilliant of me not to have gone to Bombay to cover the Ram Jethmalani versus Sunil Dutt election, otherwise I might have got three out of three wrong instead of only two out of three. The pie I am currently gorging myself on is so humble that even a Middle Ages serf would not deign to touch it. The stardust that I thought would become ash in Allahabad and, Madras has now been sprinkled over the House of the People: and the first lesson of democracy is, don't argue with the people, they are right. Part of the reason why one got it wrong was because, in the early days, there were enough voluble protests in the constituencies at being handed out a celluloid champion instead of a political one. But the truth is one tends to hear what one wants to hear. When the winner gets the support of three hundred thousand voices and the loser two hundred thousand, it is quite possible to confuse the signals: after all, two hundred thousand people can also create their share of noise at least until they get drowned out towards the end of the shouting match. It was only by the end that one began to get an accurate inkling of what was coming, but the scale of the victory surprised even Congressmen. Bihar's chief minister Mr Chandra Shekhar Singh was making what he must have thought was his most optimistic prediction when, during the lull between polling day and counting, he said the Congress would get 39 seats out of 54 in the state. It got 50; and even a veteran like Jagjivan Ram, against whom the ruling party put up only token resistence, scraped through by a pitiful few hundred votes. But the excuses don't really wash. An apology, therefore, to our readers, and ungrudging congratulations to the winners.

But what should the opposition do about the star influx that is becoming such a dread factor in our politics? The charismatic Ramakrishna Hegde, I notice, has strengthened his persuasion team for the Assembly elections by recruiting the Nag brothers. A nod to the inevitable, presumably. Maybe the CPI(M) should woo Mithun Chakravarty to save itself in Bengal, except that the star's disco and karate routine may not find favour with the Left Front minister Jatin Chakravarty, who found even poor Usha Uthup terribly decadent. And Dev Anand could be persuaded to campaign for the opposition in the north; but then he is almost as old as some of the opposition leaders and what the market wants is youth, so that might boomerang. In Punjab, the Akalis would need nothing short of a Dara Singh to help them onto their feet.

But I have one suggestion for Allahabad, on which at least all the opposition parties should agree. In the next elections, they should put up Rekha against Amitabh. I also have an idea for her main campaign theme:

Yeh kahaan aa gaye ham
Tere saath chalte chalte.

Bengal put up an impressive display of wounded pride after its two powerful ministers of the Mrs Gandhi era were found missing from the Rajiv Gandhi cabinet. I personally could not quite understand this great sense of outrage. Mrs Gandhi had given two of the most important portfolios to a state which had given her just four seats in Parliament, and she must have had her reasons, both personal and political, for doing so. Mr Pranab Mukherjee presumably came in on the loyalty-efficiency ticket, while Mr A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury served a dual purpose by being both Bengali and Muslim. But surely Bengal does not expect this kind of ratio to become the norm? One cabinet minister for 16 MPs is perfectly fair; indeed by this token Bihar should have had three, which it doesn't. The fact is that too much mathematics is not possible in government formation, and the Prime Minister needs to find an equation between political expediency and personal trust. Very obviously he does not have the personal rapport with either Mr Mukherjee or Mr Chowdhury, or they would not have been subjected to such embarrassment. And since it is quite unlikely that there will be a Congress party without Mr Rajiv Gandhi at the head of it, and for decades to come, they might begin wondering about their future in this party. Mr Mukherjee, it is said by Those Who Know, waited calmly (doubtless smoking his familiar pipe) till five in the evening on the day the cabinet was to be announced and when the telephone did not ring equally calmly accepted his fate, asked the new government for a smaller bungalow, said goodbye to his staff and told a few people who came to console that he might attempt to find solace in writing a little poetry. But retirement at so young an age? No more serving the people? No more playing the croupier at the power roulette? We who are paid to observe shall wait and see.

Mr Chowdhury, far less stoic a person, was livid at being dropped after what was clearly the biggest political victory of his life. After the strong reaction in Bengal to their hero's tragic demotion, Rajiv Gandhi did unbend a little and gave Mr Chowdhury a consolation prize, but from railway minister to general secretary in charge of Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and Orissa is descent in any language. Mr Chowdhury is putting on a brave face by saying that he has been given charge of selecting the candidates for the Assembly elections but cosmetic surgery in politics does not save much face. More to the point will be if Mr Chowdhury can regain his place in the central cabinet by April or May, which he privately sounds confident about. Hope lies eternal in the human breast, but it could become a case of once-bitten-twice-bitten. Maybe both Mr Chowdhury and Mr Mukherjee should join the Janata Party. It has a lot of vacancies all over the country, but is particularly empty in Bengal.

One gets the feeling that Mr Jyoti Basu is a little bit regretful that he did not think of the Hegde Plan for Political Survival (also known as How To Organise A Sympathy Wave For Yourself). There was Ramakrishna Hegde beaten fair and square, and by a stroke of genius he had ensured that the Janata stood a good chance of winning the Assembly elections. The simple truth of course is that Hegde's decision to resign was as much a product of his own character and morality as of good politics. Mr Basu on the other hand, even if he had wanted to resign and start some sympathy wavelet in his direction, would not have been able to do so without a laborious debate within the CPI(M). And stories of the internal squabbles on this issue would have soured the whole effort. Anyway, Mr Basu has some time ahead in which to think of new plans. If 24 hours is a long time in politics, what happens in a year can only be a matter of conjecture.

"Sweetex helps me stay slim. It saves me 2600 calories a week . . . without actually fasting."

Any doctor will tell you, overweight is mostly due to overeating. And thus excess calorie intake. Remember this simple formula. Six cups of tea a day equals twelve teaspoons of sugar. That's 384 calories daily.* If you cut out sugar in tea and coffee alone, you can save up to 2600 calories a week without actually fasting.

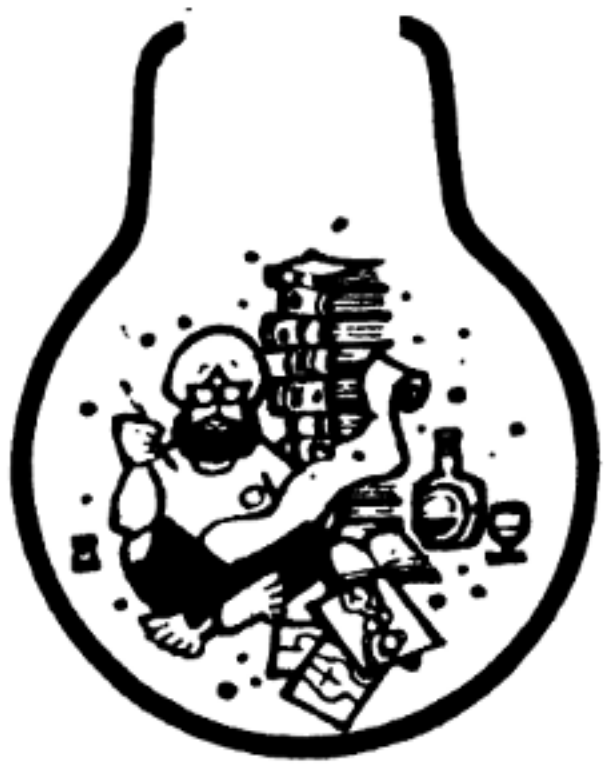
Replace sugar with Sweetex. Invisibly. Effortlessly. It doesn't give you licence to gorge. It isn't a magic formula. But it helps you to cut out calories. It lends support to your calorie controlled diet. And helps you control your weight.

(* One rounded teaspoon of sugar = 32 calories)

Sweetex

SUGAR FREE SWEETENER

FOR THE WEIGHTWATCHER!



Trikaya B REV 1.84

Why English

One good reason why English has scored over all other languages and become the world's lingua franca is that it ignores purists and accepts as many words as it can from other languages. Some years ago G. Subba Rao gave a list of Telugu words in his Dictionary of Indian Words in English. Now R. E. Hawkins in his Common Indian Words in English (Oxford University Press) has listed another 2000 Indian words which in the last three centuries have found their way into the larger Oxford English Dictionary. Many have been mutilated to make it easy for the English to pronounce: Bunnow from bannao to make; chubarrow from chup raho for shut up; coggage from the Bengali kagoj for newspaper; crab bat from kharaab baat for bad language; Dick from the Urdu dickut for trouble; johukum for yesman; kuchparwani for a careless person; namkewaste for nominal; nimukwallah for a loyal person; puckarow to catch; samjhow to warn. More amusing are Indian words of abuse that have found acceptability in the sahib's lingo. We have chalu, chamcha, charsaubis, and lafanga. And there is one whose Indian origin I have no doubt about but I dare not translate lest it should offend the straight-laced who are forever accusing me of vulgarity. This is barn soot for a despicable person. Any guesses about its origin?

Punjab Problem

Rajiv Gandhi made an excellent impression as Prime Minister in his broadcast to the nation over All India Radio and Doordarshan. It was not great oratory but his speech was coherent, lucid and had a ring of sincerity about it. It is obvious that he is a more gifted speaker than either his mother or his grandfather, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. His masculine good looks as well as the gift of the gab are inherited from his father, Feroze Gandhi, who made quite a mark in the Lok Sabha as a forceful debater. I have little doubt that in due course he will become a spell-binder. However, it will take more than spell-binding oratory to keep the mustangs in his chariot in running order. At the moment none of his partymen left out of the ministry are likely to show disaffection for the simple reason that they have no one to defect to. But no sooner crises come, as they are bound to, he will need all the cunning he can muster and all the muscle-power he has to keep a grip on the reins.

Rajiv has given Punjab and Assam top priority. I am more familiar with the Punjab problem than I am with the Assamese and will confine my observations to its possible solutions. The issues are no longer restricted to Chandigarh and distribution of river waters. They now include the rise and fall of Bhindranwale, Operation Blue Star, military activity in the Punjab countryside, special courts, the assassination of Mrs Gandhi, the massacre of Sikhs in towns of northern India and migration of large numbers to the Punjab. The main trouble is that we still do not know the full facts. The government's attempt to whitewash events leading to Operation Blue Star and its aftermath by the issue of the White Paper have been discredited by the Prime Minister himself. An even more important pre-condition to a settlement will be the government's amoral slithering over organised killings of innocent Sikhs in the first week of November 1984 and exonerating its partymen whose names have been published amongst the guilty. It must overcome its reluctance to institute a judicial enquiry which will identify the culprits and punish them. Unless these hurdles are overcome, there can be no lasting settlement in the Punjab.

To Fit The Crime

Some time ago a Delhi judge sentenced a rapist to life imprisonment. At the time I had suggested that the more appropriate sentence could have been to give the convicted man option between spending the rest of his life in prison (in India a life sentence may mean no more than 10 years in jail) or undergo surgery which would forever deprive him of the power to indulge in sex. A doctor friend tells me that there is no need to resort to such drastic measures as castration as there are drugs available which substantially reduce man's sex urge. Their only side-effect is enlargement of male breasts to female sizes—no great calamity. The chief difficulty in imposing these more rational forms of punishments is the absence of sanction of the law. Framers of the Indian Penal Code could not think of punishments other than fine, imprisonment or hanging. It would not be a bad idea if we re-evaluated the equation between crime and punishment and took advantage of modern medicine to rationalise their relationship. I have no doubt it would reduce the incidence of certain kinds of crime without resorting to brutality such as amputation of limbs practised in some Muslim countries as well as substantially reduce expense incurred inkeeping convicts in jail for long periods. To start a public debate on the subject I recommend the following: First; punishment for murder should not be death but imprisonment with hard labour over a period of years with the convict's earnings going to the family of the deceased as well as confiscation of his personal property which should also be passed on to the family of the victim. Second; punishment for crimes of which do not result in death but grievous bodily injury should also entail forfeiture of property and earnings while in jail (which should not exceed three years) which should go to the injured person. Corporal punishment like lashing in public should be introduced. Three; crimes of sex, child abuse and attempted rape should be punished by compulsory administration of drugs that reduce sex drive and actual rape by castration. Four; for crimes of violence and recklessness caused by excessive and habitual intake of liquor, punishment should include compulsory administration of drugs like Antabuse which produce very unpleasant reactions if followed by alcohol. A person who takes a drink after Antabuse can get violently sick and get hangover of an intensity which would make him swear never to touch it again. I can recommend it to wives who have to suffer humiliation and violence at the hands of hard drinking husbands.

Readers' reactions to these suggestions will be welcomed.

...but we'd love to pause a while and tell you how Skypak could change your world!

Imagine you're sitting in your office. You have a document in front of you. And you want it delivered to some other part of the world.

Pick up your telephone and dial the local Skypak number.

The moment you hear a friendly "hello" a chain is set in motion. A race begins. A race against time. You have the entire worldwide family of TNT SKYPAK at your service instantly! With 200 offices around the globe and 19 of them in India. And the services of 26,000 people in 48 countries.

But that's statistics. All you're concerned with is your parcel, your destination and your deadline. Well, that's what we are concerned with as well.

Our reputation for speed and efficiency on every job is internationally trusted for 2 decades! And every time you have a package to send, we have that reputation to keep. With pleasure.

SKYPAK

when it's wanted yesterday!

203, Jolly Bhavan No 2, 7 New Marine Lines, Bombay 400 020 Phone: 253703 994454 Telex 011 3339 SAI IN

• Ahmedabad 443053 • Bangalore 568869 • Baroda 52285 • Bombay 994454 • Calcutta 431660 • Cochin 69012 • Delhi 6414830 • Gandhidham 3414 • Hyderabad 38237 • Kandla 7437 • Madras 475091 • Mangalore 96296 • Mysore 30894 • Mapusa 2440 • Margao 2447 • Pune 54595 • Panjim 5768 • Trivandrum 65261 • Vasco 2403

TNT SKYPAK
THE WORLDWIDE COURIERS

Please note: We don't carry non-commercial and personal material

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Our Repressive Acts

During the first World War, when India was a British colony, the government of India appointed a commission under Mr Justice Rowlatt, an English judge, to report on sedition. The commission issued its report in July 1918 and recommended, among other things, "extreme and vigorous" measures to combat "political violence."

The recommendations were incorporated in a legislative measure in March 1919 which came to be known as the Rowlatt Act. What it laid down was that anyone engaged in political violence would be tried by a special tribunal sitting in camera. Mahatma Gandhi raised his voice against the Rowlatt Bill and asked the people to observe a general hartal accompanied by a fast. They responded to his call and observed the hartal and the fast on 6 April 1919, the second Sunday after the Viceroy gave his assent to the Bill.

Alas, the nation's mood has changed since; it does not have the stamina it once had. It has become too 'security-conscious.' Therefore, it is no surprise that the country has accepted without demur the Terrorists Affected Areas (Special Courts) Act, which is almost an exact copy of the Rowlatt Act. The Special Courts Act also defines a terrorist as a person who indulges in "violence" disrupts "service or means of communication" and so on.

Like the Rowlatt Act, the Special Courts Act says that "all proceedings before Special Court shall be conducted in camera." The Rowlatt Act said that "reports of the proceedings" would not be published while the Special Courts Act says that a Special Court may pass orders for "avoiding of the mention of the names and addresses of the witnesses in its orders or judgments or in any records of the case accessible to the public..."

One may feel horrified but the fact remains that one of the victims of this act is a forthright, conscientious journalist, Brahma Chellaney, the Associated Press correspondent, who reported on the military action in the Golden Temple at Amritsar The whole thing smacks of the administration's vendetta against him and it is a sad reflection on the state of freedom of the press in India.

Unlimited powers to the executive only increases the temptation to use them for all kinds of purposes and the system becomes dictatorial.

True, the terrorists should not be given any quarter and there is justified horror over the happenings in Punjab. But the act is mostly misused in Punjab. The main purpose of the Act seems to pick up persons who are anti-establishment or come in the way of the government while doing a spot of honest work. Of course, the Naxalites are a target. This is apparent from the case the Intelligence Bureau made for more stringent provisions against them. It said that "the National Security Act (NSA) had not proved effective in containing extremists' activities or violence," and the Intelligence Bureau specifically mentioned "the continuing violent activities in the Bihar-West Bengal border."

Why should the government arm itself with such stringent powers like the NSA, the Disturbed Areas (Special Courts) Act and the many "special acts," apart from regular provisions under the criminal procedure code? Why yet another Act? Unlimited powers to the executive only increases the temptation to use them for all kinds of purposes and the system becomes dictatorial. In the Special Courts Act the onus to prove that a terrorist is not a terrorist is on the suspect. If it is "shown" that the person concerned was in an area where "the forces charged with the maintenance of public order in the discharge of their duties" have been resisted, "it shall be presumed, unless the contrary is shown, that such person had committed such offence."

In a country where fake encounters between police and a wide variety of offenders are frequent, the authorities can go to the extent of charging any opponent or critic with terrorism He has not only to prove his innocence but also stand trial in any part of the country where the government may establish a Special Court.

Curiously, appeal against a Special Court's judgment can be made only to the Supreme Court, not the High Court under whose jurisdiction the judge of a Special Court will be. In fact, the Act says. "A Special Court shall be presided over by a judge to be appointed by the central government with the concurrence of the Chief Justice of the High Court."

Experience from the days of the Emergency shows how highhanded and arbitrary actions were carried out by the executive with impunity. The nation was unable to realise the directions and the full implications of the actions of the government and its functionaries. Ethical considerations inherent in public behaviour became dim and in many cases beyond the mental grasp of many of the public functionaries. What is the guarantee that the Draconian laws with which the government has armed itself will not be used by civil servants on orders from those in power?

In the agitation against the Rowlatt Bill an active participant was Swami Shardhanand, a venerable teacher, whose ashram near Hardwar was as famous as Tagore's school at Shantiniketan. He was invited to speak at the Jama Masjid, Delhi. This invitation was extraordinary for no Hindu scholar had been invited to speak in a mosque, as far as one can remember. This showed a secular approach. Can we not mould secular opinion in the same way against increasing repressive laws? Without the awareness of what is right and a desire to act for what is right, there may be no realisation of what is wrong.

The Sant's Jokes

M. J. Akbar has logically brought out the contradictions within Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale (The High Priest of Low Ambition, 23—29 December '84). Some of the theories propounded by the Sant read like a joke. Of special mention is his theory that all human beings are born as Sikhs.
C.V. Radhakrishnan, Calcutta

• M.J. Akbar has deliberately or inadvertently indulged in distortion of sequence of events in order to prove that the breakdown of tripartite talks in February '84 was the outcome of belligerency by Hindu revivalists culminating in atrocities on Sikhs in Haryana. But this is not true. As far as I remember, the tripartite talks in Delhi came to an abrupt end as a sequel to heavy firing on BSF personnel from within the Golden Temple resulting in the death of over half-a-dozen jawans. The author has conveniently ignored the killings of innocent Hindus in Punjab or the orgy of violence let loose by Sikh extremists. May I remind Mr Akbar that the Hindu Suraksha Samiti is not an organisation of Hindu revivalists but it is an organisation born out of the natural instinct of self preservation.

The disturbances in Haryana in February '84 were a spontaneous outburst of anger of the Hindus. But what happened in Haryana is nothing in comparison to what has been happening in Punjab for the last two years. The chief minister of Haryana, Bhajan Lal, deserves to be congratulated for his administrative acumen and foresight.
R.G. Bansal, Delhi

Effective Device

In Life-saver (Science, 30 December—5 January) it has been mentioned that Scottish doctors have invented a plastic film to keep babies warm in winter. May I point out that a Christian father residing near Calcutta was the first to use plastic film as a blanket for keeping people warm. Known as the 'Goodnight Garibi Blanket,' the device consists of two layers of polythene sheet, with a few sheets of newspaper between them. The polythene sheets have holes punched on them to allow transmission of moisture. It is a simple device but very effective
Debashis Ray, Waltair

Wide Off the Target

24 December '84 (27 December at places) was really The Day of the Voter (23—29 December '84). Most Indian magazines, including SUNDAY, failed to judge the pulse of the Indian electorate. The outcome of the election may have surprised those in SUNDAY, but to the common man on the street, the results were expected.
Sayed Shahjahan, Dhaka (Bangladesh)

• The cover story successfully brought out the mood of a general election. Time and again our leaders refer to the fact that caste and religion are destroying the unity and integrity of India. But it is they who exploit religious and caste feelings to secure votes during an election. Such double standards are the hallmarks of all political leaders. The electorate should be wary of them. Indian democracy has survived only because the people of this country are far too politically conscious to be guided by such irresponsible leaders.
Param Hans Singh, Arrah (Bihar)

• Our Parliament is adorned by two filmy heroes and a heroine. What we need now is a villain and a comedian. What about nominating 'Gabbar Singh' and 'Bhoopali?'
Chiranjeeb, Hailakandi (Silchar)

• It was surprising to note that the entire cross-section of the electorate interviewed by SUNDAY (Voices) voiced anti-Congress(I) feelings.
Ajay Pant, Moradabad

How Right

Tooshar Pandit's article on the opinion polls was well written and comprehensive (Opinion Polls: Do They Count?, 23—29 December '84). I hope the article will go a long way to dispel many unfounded doubts about opinion polls that exist in the minds of even educated people in our country who equate such surveys with forecasts made by astrologers. However, the article suffers from one deficiency: it is infested with too much statistical jargon. The writer could have explained the intricacies of such surveys in layman's terms. Very few readers are expected to know what is meant by 'random sample' or the 'semantic differential technique.' Another point which has not been touched upon is the factor of deliberately falsifying the response by the respondent that the pollster has to guard against while conducting a poll. To minimise such chances, some 'honesty sieve' questions should also be framed while preparing the questionnaire that will detect deliberate falsification.
Madhumita Lahiry, Muzaffarpur

• The opinion poll conducted by SUNDAY and IMRB indicated a swing in favour of the Congress(I) throughout the country. Inspite of that, most of SUNDAY's predictions regarding the outcome of the poll were off the mark.
M.A. Ahad, Bhubaneswar

A Clarification

Chanchal Sarkar had named seven persons as members of the Citizen's Commission headed by the former Chief Justice of India, S.M. Sikri (Civil Rights in a Democracy, 30 December '84). In fact, there are only five members: Gurbachan Singh and I are not members of the Commission.
Air Chief Marshal Arjan Singh, DFC (Retd), New Delhi

Wise man

Charan Singh's answers to some of the questions of M. J. Akbar ('Elections for Politicians is a Game', 2—8 December 1984) prove that he is an autocrat who thinks that he is the only wise man in the country.
C. B. Sahai, New Delhi

Off the Mark

Amitabh Bachchan campaigning in Allahabad during the Lok Sabha elections

All the predictions in Dream Merchants (16-22 December '84) turned out to be wrong. Amitabh not only drew the crowds but he also got the votes.
Anup Sarkar, Calcutta

• The people of Allahabad pulled off a big surprise. Amitabh Bachchan's voice will soon be heard in the corridors of power. It is a pity that no one could read the minds of the electorate in Allahabad.
Gour Ghosh, Sindri (Bihar)

• I was surprised to see Amitabh Bachchan on the cover of SUNDAY. Whatever be his status, he does not deserve a place in so reputed a weekly. The film magazines are there to give him publicity.
Neeraj Nayan, Rairangapur

Biased

Khushwant Singh's At The Receiving End and Brahma Chellany (Gossip Sweet and Sour, 25 December '84) were thought-provoking. However, in the articles, Mr Singh harbours feelings of an orthodox Sikh, showing scanty reasoning power.

True, what followed Indira Gandhi's gruesome assassination was inhuman, horrifying and condemnable. But was the death of Indira Gandhi an occasion to rejoice? When the entire world was plunged in sorrow, most of the Sikhs were rejoicing. Some were celebrating the occasion by distributing sweets while others displayed their ecstasy by dancing. I have been informed by eye witnesses that the entire Sikh community in Asansol, Dhanbad and Bokaro started bhangra on hearing that Mrs Gandhi was dead. Mr Singh should not forget that the people at large are not saints. Retaliation, therefore, was natural. Nevertheless, it would be a crime against humanity to support the killing of the Sikhs. Many of Mr Singh's articles reflect his support for the Sikh extremists. He has not even condemned the murder of Indira Gandhi. But I am not surprised. History is full of instances where Sikhs have shown their disloyalty. Their stand during the Quit India movement is well known. Yet Pandit Nehru and his daughter trusted them. Ultimately, she paid the price.
N.K. Shah, Sheikhpura (Bihar)

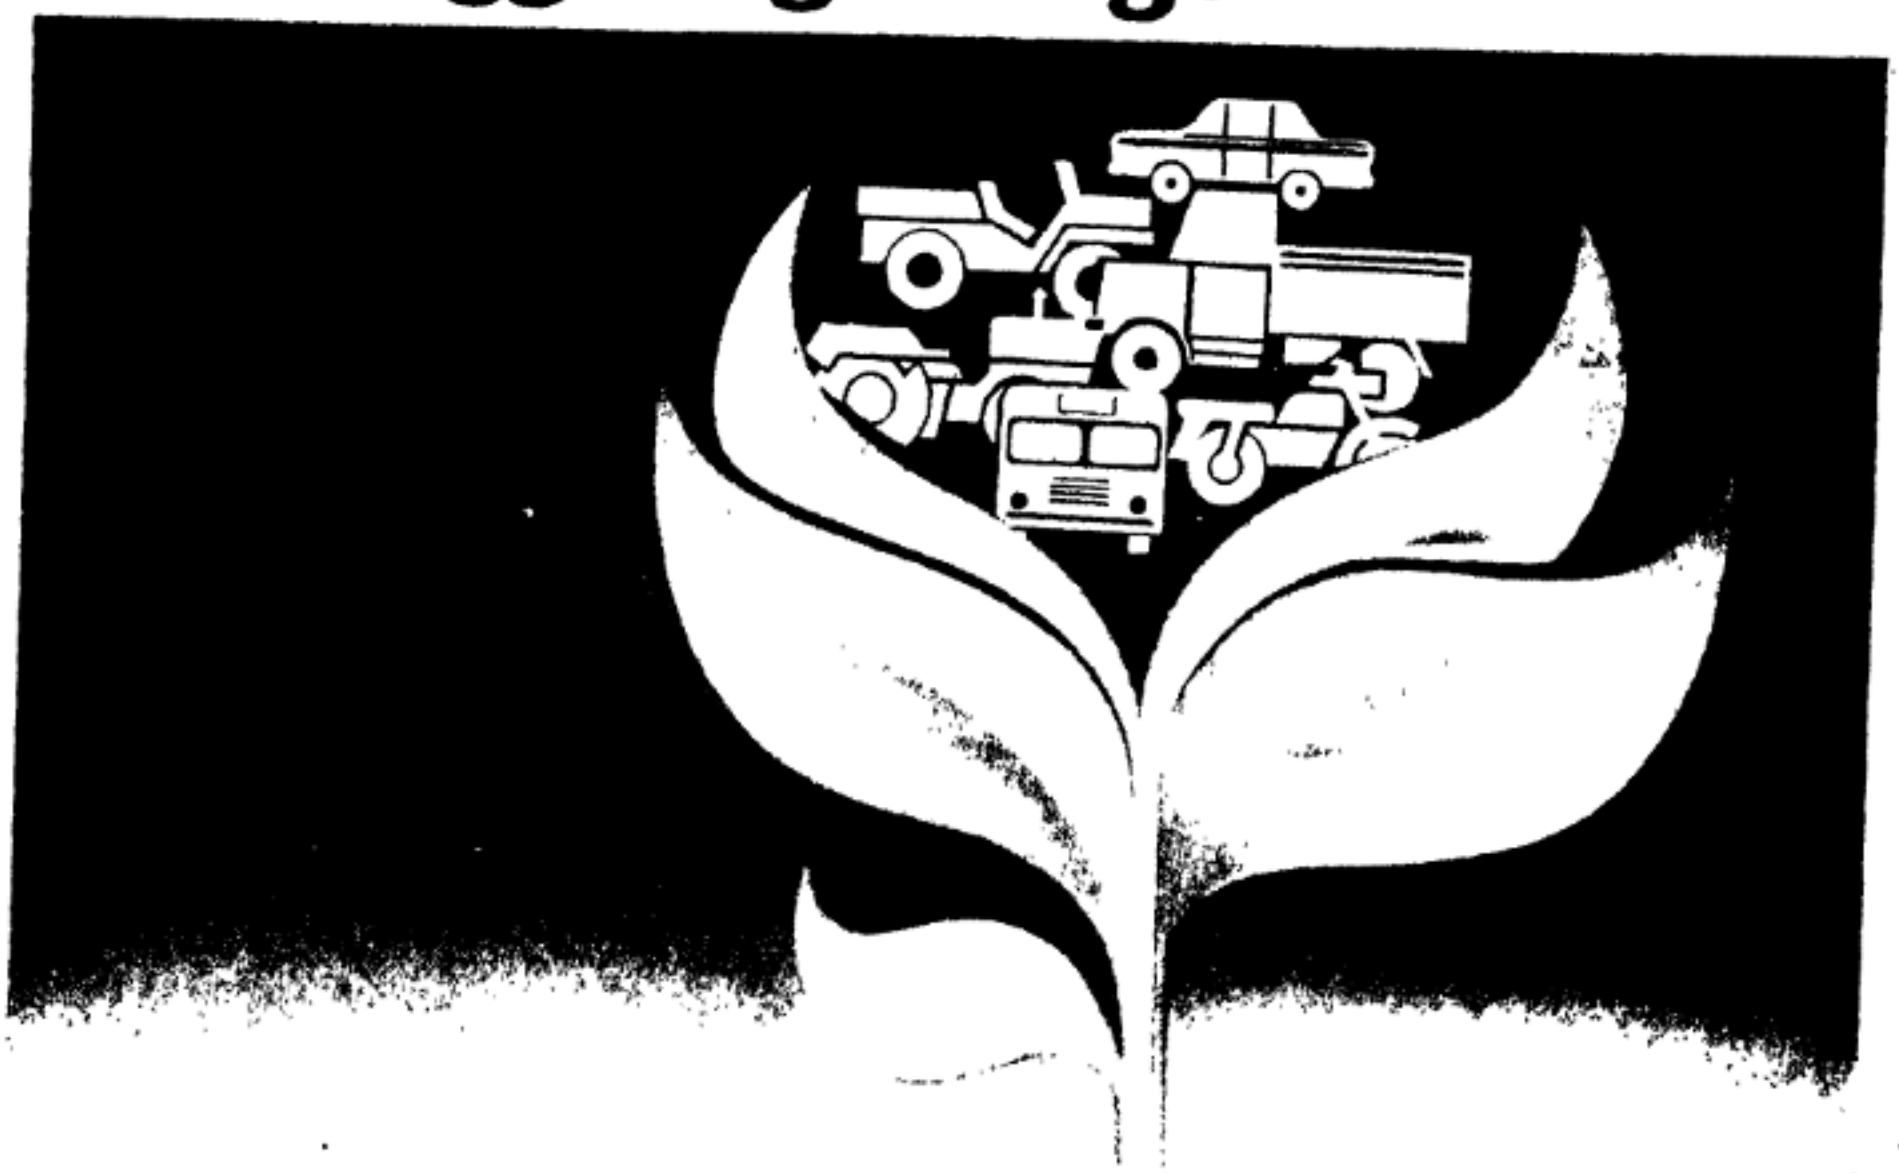
Are We Serving as Guinea Pigs for the Rich Multinationals?

The investigative report, Killer Gas, Callous Carbide (16—22 December '84) was superb. One wonders how the Union Carbide factory functioned all these years without adequate safety measures. The government is to blame for permitting the multi-national to function within the city.
C.V. Radhakrishnan, Calcutta

• One cannot but feel distressed at the heavy toll of life due to poison gas leak in Bhopal.
Altaf Andrabi, Srinagar

• It is actually the chief minister, Arjun Singh, who should have been arrested and not the chairman of Union Carbide. What compensations do our governments pay when people die in train collision or when mines get flooded and many workers die?
G. Helmut, Vishakhapatnam

• Union Carbide has tarnished civilised history by its negligence and callousness. The state government should also share the blame for the unprecedented tragedy. The union government must take steps to see that such accidents do not recur.
Kurban Ukani, Calcutta



• The new slogan of Union Carbide—'Eveready to kill.'
K. Chandru, Madras

• Tooshar Pandit deserves praise for his investigative report on the Bhopal gas tragedy. It was shocking to learn that inspite of warnings the government did not take any steps to inform the people living near the factory. The arrest of the chairman of Union Carbide or suing them for compensation will not absolve the Madhya Pradesh government of its criminal lapse.
P.P. Beeran, Hafr-al-Batin (Saudi Arabia)

• We have heard of monkeys being exported from India to the USA for experiments. The Bhopal tragedy was a typical case of an American firm using Indians as guinea pigs. The release of the Union Carbide chairman, Mr Anderson, confirms the popular fear that the lives of aristocrats and people in power are more valuable than the ordinary people who died in thousands. The government, it seems, does not bother about the lives of the common people.
Chagla Mahapatra, Polasara (Orissa)

• The government is equally to blame for the tragedy. In most factories in the country safety measures are not observed.
Jabina, Nalanda, (Bihar)

With new concepts, new vehicles, new designs coming... the automotive world is in for a staggering change

What is India Pistons doing about this change?

The automotive industry, the world over is in the throes of change Change from an era of gas guzzlers to fuel efficient vehicles Change that'll radically improve the operational cost and efficiency of the automobile industry

Even in India, the winds of change are blowing — with collaboration agreements being signed that'll launch a new breed of Japanese designed cars and other vehicles on the road.

How is India Pistons meeting this change ? Head on.

For a company that's seen three decades of change — Change is a way of life Change is renewal. Change is progress Change is inevitable

As the first auto-ancillary unit on the Indian automotive scene, India Pistons has the capability to adapt to the change and challenge of the eighties.

India Pistons–
responding to the changing environment

MAC/IP/1010

INDIA PISTONS LIMITED, MADRAS

No More Predictions, Please

Congress(I) MP Vyjayanthimala

M. J. Akbar's Dateline is a very popular column. But I would advise him not to make political forecasts. His write-up on Vyjayanthimala (23 December '84) was superb but his predictions regarding her fate at the hustings proved disastrous.
Shyama Purkayastha, Hailakandi

• All the three filmstars have won by comfortable margins. M.J. Akbar was particularly harsh on Vyjayanthimala. But it was the latter who had the last laugh.
Salman Yusuf, Patna

• Amitabh Bachchan, Sunil Dutt and Vyjayanthimala have won the elections. It is a pity that SUNDAY's predictions regarding their poll prospects were off the mark.
Subhas Dutta, Ranchi

• In Dateline Mr Akbar writes: "One cannot but be astonished by the sheer audacity of these filmstars who think that their prancing on the screen gives them the right to represent the people in Parliament." I do not agree with the author's statement. If a lawyer, Ram Jethmalani, can represent the people, if a trade union leader, Datta Samant, can aspire to go to the Parliament and if an old, insane man like Charan Singh can represent the people's aspirations, then I think that filmstars too can represent the people.
S.R. Iyengar, Bombay

• M.J. Akbar's statement in Dateline (23 December '84) that the attempt by MGR's supporters to sell their sick and incapacitated leader to the electorate is a "deception" to an inhuman extent is apt. Most of the English dailies in Tamil Nadu, one of which is more than a century old and enjoys a sound credibility, have been silent on the issue. Most periodicals and dailies in Tamil Nadu are owned and staffed by persons of a particular community which MGR has wooed. These publications do not give a true picture of MGR's health. Inspite of the fact that pictures of MGR at Brooklyn Hospital in New York were taken to convince the voters that he was looking hale and hearty and a documentary on MGR screened in most of the cinema halls before the polls, the people of Tamil Nadu are well aware that MGR cannot talk and walk like a normal person. He is even undertaking speech therapy and there are serious doubts about whether he will ever regain his speaking powers. Under such circumstances, he has contested the Assembly elections by proxy and won. But contesting elections under such a state of health isundemocratic. A tamasha of this sort can take place only in our country where the vast majority are still illiterate and ignorant.
P. Padmanabhan, Coimbatore

Unfounded Fears

I was surprised to note the contents of Mr Rias Ahmad's letter (Opinion, 23-29 December '84). Mr Ahmad states that Muslims in India are persecuted and that the spirit of secularism hardly prevails in this country. But the author had not cited a single incident to substantiate his argument. The fact that India had two Muslim Presidents and a vice president goes to prove that secularism does exist in India. Moreover, there are many chief ministers and union cabinet ministers who are followers of Islam. Where then does the question of persecution and discrimination come in? Mr Ahmad also mentions in his letter that Muslims in Pakistan are all well off, which is far from true. The Muslim community, on the other hand, have time and again proved disloyal to their country. There are many Muslims in India who nurse hatred towards their motherland.
S.P. Diwakar, Channarayapatna

• I was appalled by the sentiments voiced by Mr Rias Ahmad in his letter. Among other things he mentions that Muslims in India are treated as foreigners and traitors since the partition. The author adds that their forefathers made a wrong decision to stay on in India.

Mr Ahmad is perhaps unaware of the situation in Pakistan. Or why else would he think that Muslims are better off in Pakistan? In India Muslims, like all other communities, enjoy much more freedom than their counterparts in Pakistan. If a similar letter, as the one written by Mr Ahmad, would have been written by a Hindu in Pakistan and sent to a newspaper organisation for publication, it would never have been published
Bijay Kumar Dash, Madras

An Appeal

This has reference to the article, No Glasses, Please (Science, 16 – 22 December '84) where it has been mentioned that Dr Svyatoslav successfully treats patients suffering from mild to acute myopia. In India there are thousands of myopic patients who lose their eyesight due to lack of proper treatment. Indians would be grateful to Dr Svyatoslav if he visits this country regularly to help fellow doctors working on the subject.
R.D. Satapathi, Rourkela

OPTIONS ON PUNJAB

Should the Akalis Be Banned?

The government is going to test out a three-pronged approach on Punjab composed of one carrot and two sticks

Militant Sikhs raise the Khalistan flag at the Shahidi Baba Deep Singh Gurudwara in Amritsar

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi knows, as much as anyone else, that the credibility of his government will depend a great deal on how he tackles the enormous problem called Punjab. If the last general election was indeed a referendum on Punjab, the integrity of the country and a mandate to Rajiv Gandhi to solve a problem which had taken so many lives including the most precious one of Mrs Indira Gandhi, then Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has to announce some plan before he goes to the people once again. And since that is scheduled for March, the urgency for a new Punjab policy can be easily appreciated. When Rajiv Gandhi returns to the campaign trail for the Assembly elections in ten states or more within a few weeks, he can hardly go back with the same refrain. The task of finding an answer to the questions raised by the Anandpur Sahib Resolution and the Akali agitation (with its extremist-secessionist fringe) is now his. And, judging by the statements emanating from Delhi, the new Prime Minister of India is quite aware of this.

The government is going to test out a three-pronged approach on Punjab composed of one carrot and two sticks. Obviously, the carrot is being dangled first. Delhi is full of talk of reconciliations with the Sikhs in general and the Akalis in particular. Arrests have been made of those suspected to have led the riots against the Sikhs in the wake of the assassination of Mrs Gandhi, and one presumes they will not be let off as easily as they were the first time around. There is a feeling too that the grounds are being made for talks with the Akalis, though this might not prove as easy as it sounds. It is unlikely that the government will enter the process of negotiations until it gains some confidence that the Akalis will be prepared to give ground. Since Rajiv Gandhi has made the Anandpur Sahib Resolution into a secessionist document in the popular eye, he will need an Akali "withdrawal" on some of the terms of the resolution before he comes to any agreement with the Akalis. If there is a private understanding that a gesture of such a kind could be made at the end of formal negotiations, then the Akali leaders could be released from jail for talks, and after the agreement the cases of secession made against some of them will be withdrawn. But just in case the Akalis seem to feel that they still have a few cards left in their hand, the government is also beginning to send two messages which could finally end all hope of any return to power by the Akalis.

Violent mood: a demonstration by Akalis in New Delhi

Prakash Singh Badal (right) burning the Constitution

The obvious way to do this of course would be by a simple ban on communal parties. Since the Akalis make no pretense of representing any community other than the Sikhs, they are clearly a communal party (even, that is, if they do not actively participate in divisive communal politics, as they claim). Such a proposal was, in fact, mooted in the wake of the assassination of Mahatma Gandhi but, either out of expediency or error, both Jawaharlal Nehru and Sardar Patel did not make the effort to pursue it. The logic of course is unarguable. While communal parties or groups or societies have the constitutional right to propagate the welfare of their communities in the areas of education and religion, they have little place in the electoral politics of a secular state. In fact, the moral position of this argument is so strong that it is a wonder why the proposal was not given a constitutional force while the Constituent Assembly was still in session Nehru and Patel could well have solved many of our subsequent problems, even if they would have had to face the anger of the communalists (whether in the Muslim League or the Hindu Mahasabha or the Akali Dal). But it was not done.

Indications that Rajiv Gandhi might have such an idea were strengthened by the appointment of Ashoke Sen as law minister. Surprising as it may seem, before 1963 a party advocating secession from the union of India had the full right to participate in elections. The DMK in Tamil Nadu, for instance, did manage to win a few seats on such a platform The loophole was closed by an amendment to the Constitution in 1963 (in the wave of patriotic emotion that flooded the country after the war with China), and this amendment was piloted through the House by none other than Ashoke Sen, who was then law minister. On that occasion, Mr Sen managed to get support from across the House even the DMK leader C.N. Annadurai found it difficult to argue against it, though formally his party abstained from voting. If the option of conciliation fails, Ashoke Sen could be asked to bring a similar amendment this time. And it would be difficult to see how any opposition party could vote against this amendment. The Akalis would then be relegated to simply the management of the gurdwaras—the role, in fact, for which they were originally intended.

The other idea which would equal ly finish the Akalis as a political force has just been tested upon the public through an excellent decoy, Bhajan Lal (a man with no reputation to lose among the Sikhs and, therefore, whose statements could easily be disowned by the Prime Minister). This proposes that Punjab be restored to its original status: that is, Punjab, Haryana and Himachal Pradesh be remerged. If that happened, the Sikhs, instead of being a small majority of 52 per cent would become a minority of about 35 per cent and the chances of an Akali becoming chief minister of the state through an Akali majority in the Assembly would be finished. The whole battle which the Akalis led in the late Fifties and the Sixties for the creation of a Sikh-majority Punjab would have been negated by this single decision. The irony of course would be that the present Punjab had been created by Mrs Gandhi within weeks after she took over as Prime Minister; that Punjab would be over within months of her death.

The mood, however, is one of reconciliation with the Sikhs and the Akalis. One of the steps which could bring an end to the tangle would be the restoration of popular rule in the state. This is no longer just an option on a complicated political and social chessboard; it has become a compulsion now. The union government is convinced that President's rule in the state should end soon (it is due to expire, unless further renewed, in early April). Moreover, the army, which has been administering what should really be a civilian fort since last year has to decide how long servicemen can be exposed to civilian duties. The use of the army to quell disturbances is often necessary, but the troops cannot be kept out of the barracks for too long. Civilian duty has fallouts which are not conducive to the discipline of the army. For the army top brass, therefore, restoration of a popular rule in Punjab has also become a virtual necessity.

The Congress(I) leaders in the state have been clamouring for the reversion of power into their hands for some time now. The party had a clear majority when the Darbara Singh government was dismissed in October 1983 but the June 1980 mandate will expire soon. Holding fresh elections in the state along with the other state Assemblies is a political option which is clearly better than restoring the Congress(I) to power before holding the elections.

The Akali Dal, on its part, can find a way out of the impasse by agreeing to take part in the elections. Being in a minority in the dismissed government, a number of Akalis have been in favour of holding elections for the last two years.

But the question is: will elections be held? The hitch is not from the side of the government, the army or the Congress(I). The Akali moderates, too, are not a problem. The main threat remains from the extremists.

The centre's major problem is that the Akali Dal and Sikh religious leaders are under arrest (nearly 400 cases of sedition have been registered against them). The release of the Akali Dal leaders Harchand Singh Longowal, Surjit Singh Barnala and Prakash Singh Badal along with theShiromani Gurudwara Prabhandhak Committee chief Gurcharan Singh Tohra, has become a political option which the government will have to decide on before the elections are held. But even if it does decide to release the leaders, the government will still be faced with a problem: since sedition is a criminal offence under the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, there is no provision for political considerations.

The government can release the four top leaders to pave the way for normalcy. While this may pose administrative problems, due to the criminal charges against the leaders, they can contest elections from jail if they so wish. George Fernandes contested the 1977 Lok Sabha elections when he was in jail and won. Communist leaders like P. Rammurthi have contested elections from jail. If elections are held without the release of Longowal, Badal, Barnala and Tohra, the Sikh leaders can certainly be allowed to file their nominations. A predominant section of opinion in the government and the ruling party seems to favour this option.

Inside Guru Ram Das Niwas: Sikh refugees waiting to be given shelter

The Akali leaders who are held only under the NSA, may be released before the polls, if this option is accepted by the government. Under this formula, the acting president of the Akali Dal, Surjan Singh Thekedar, should be allowed to meet the arrested leaders in Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh where they are under detention, and discuss the political strategy before the elections. Thekedar, before the Lok Sabha polls, had been giving the impression that he was a hardliner. But after the election results were announced in late December, he is believed to have changed his attitude. Today, he does not seem totally averse to a dialogue with the government and may even agree to meet the four leaders in jail on the eve of the polls.

After the election dates are decided, a precondition for the elections should be the withdrawal of the army from Punjab. Polling held in the state while it is under the charge of the armed forces may not be deemed to be free and fair.

Besides, the Akali Dal and the Congress(I) should not hinder the functioning of any party which comes to power after elections are held in the state. If the Akalis win, they must not be stopped from taking over the reins of power. If the Congress receives the mandate, as it has done almost all over the country in the recent Lok Sabha elections, then the Akalis must accept the defeat gracefully and allow the elected government to function. If the politicians of Punjab have the good of the people in their hearts, they should not allow the elections in the state to be turned into a farce. If the demand is for the restoration of popular rule then the verdict of the electorate has to be respected. Any disregard for the consensus would have disastrous effects. Already the apathy of the politicians of Punjab, who failed to stand up to the threats posed by the extremists, has made the state, which was a leader in agriculture and industry in the country, suffer economically. If Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale had been challenged politically, then Punjab would not have come to its present pitiable state. Instead of countering extremism politically, the leaders wanted to reap the rewards of such adventurism and the price the country has paid is colossal. Secularism has never been under such a strain in India as it has been ever since extremist activity, under religious tutelage, began in Punjab.

The Punjab tangle is no longer confined to the Chandigarh problem or the river waters dispute. The Anadpur Sahib resolution, which has been more widely discussed than actually read, is also not a major obstruction to a solution. What is most important in Punjab today is the restoration of communal harmony. Both Hindus and Sikhs in Punjab are feeling insecure; and this has to be eradicated. This is not going to be a simple task. The mutual trust between communities will take some time to be restored. The newspapers in Punjab have been regularly carrying advertisements of people willing to sell their property in exchange for property in Delhi or Haryana. There have been some cases of Sikhs living in Panchkula, a suburb of Chandigarh which falls in Haryana, shifting to Mohali, also a suburb of Chandigarh, which falls in Punjab. The government has been alarmed at the way Sikh families from outside Punjab have been moving over to the state. One of the first tasks undertaken by the government of Rajiv Gandhi has been to summon the chief ministers of Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh and Rajasthan and ask the union home minister S. B. Chavan to direct them to go to Punjab and persuade the Sikh families to return to their homes in the three states. The lieutenant-governor of Delhi and the chief executive councillor of the union territory of Delhi were also involved in this exercise.

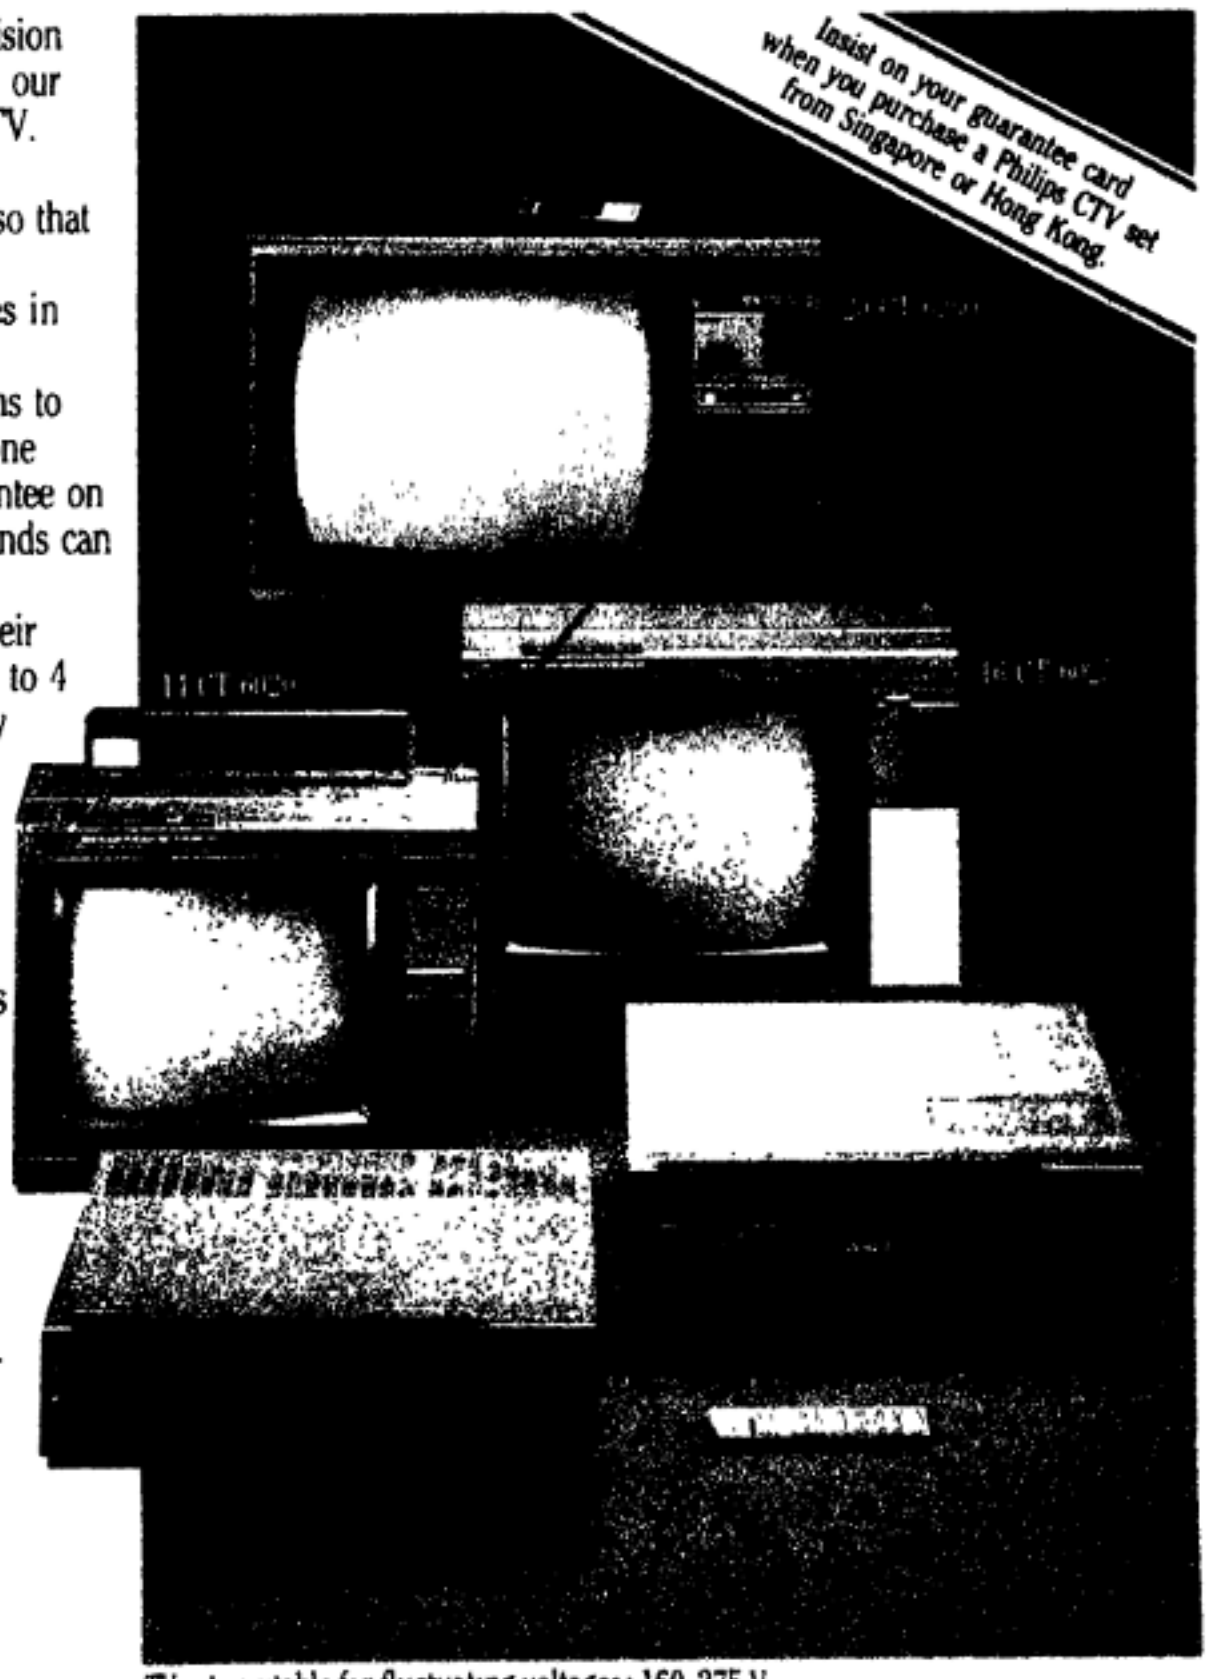
In his first address to the nation after the elections, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had unequivocally assured the Sikhs that they would be protected. In almost every election speech made by him in the last phase of the campaign in December, he made it a point to reassure the Sikh community about their security. The

Jagdish Yadav

Sikh refugees inside Gurudwara Rakab Ganj in New Delhi

STOP PRESS: PHILIPS HAS PRODUCED ITS 100 MILLIONTH TV SET. IT'S ANOTHER GUARANTEE FOR PROBLEM-FREE VIEWING.

Philips have made a 100 million television sets, so naturally we know more about what our customers want and appreciate in a colour TV.



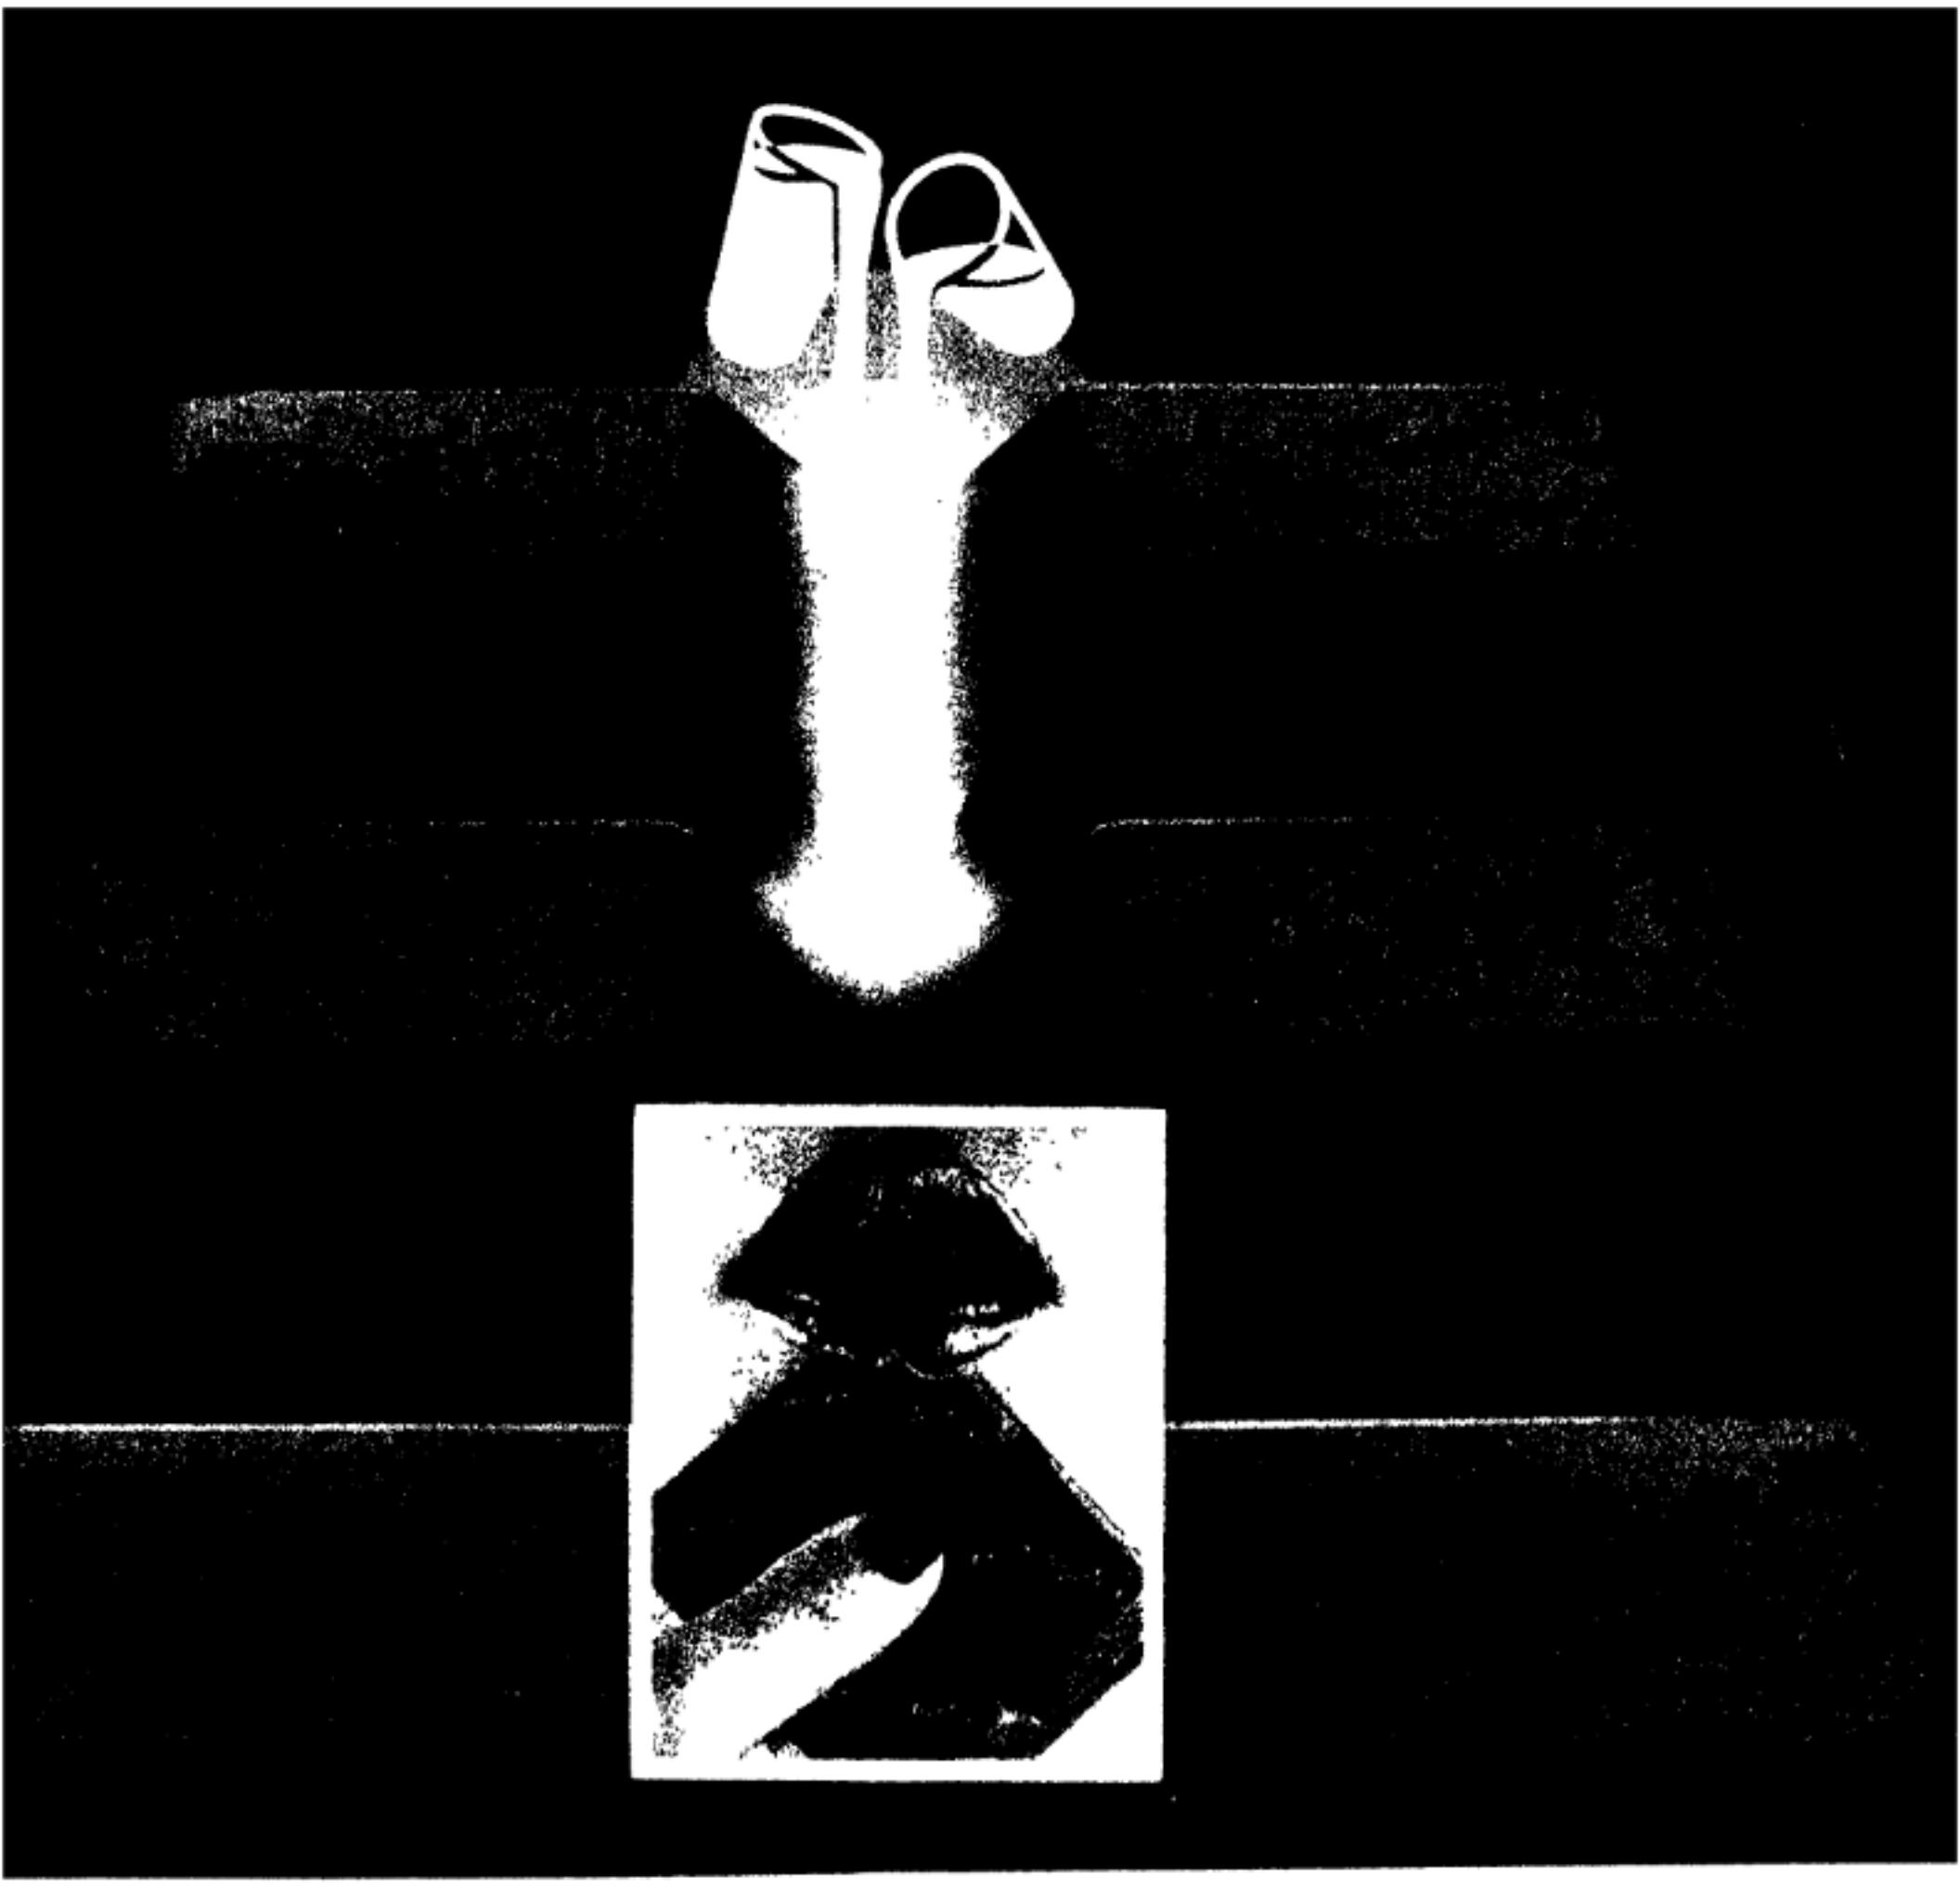
For example, every Philips is FULLY TROPICALISED against heat and humidity, so that you can enjoy problem-free viewing.

What's more, all Philips service centres in India* are fully equipped with sophisticated instruments, with overseas-trained technicians to care for your Philips if you happen to buy one from Singapore or Hong Kong. Plus a guarantee on after sales service that none of the other brands can match!

Philips VCRs come in two models: Their features include high-speed video search, up to 4 hours recording, auto play-back, time display and pre-programming for one event 7 days in advance.

For colour televisions, a range of models are available from 14", 16" or 20", with or without remote control. All the models have these common features: Philips famous natural colour from our equally famous Hi-Bri picture tube, Quickstart, and higher brightness level for more contrast, VCR adaptations on all channels, 4 watts sound output, Automatic Fine Tuning for sharp pictures, low power consumption.

Plus superior quality and service that comes from being the largest TV manufacturer in the world.



TV sets suitable for fluctuating voltages: 160-275 V.

* Philips service centres in India:
39/43 Nesbit Road, Mazgaon, Bombay 400 010. Tel: 8725528
2 Heysham Road, Calcutta 700 020 Tel: 473621.
3 Haddows Road, Madras 600 006. Tel: 812341/7.
66 Janpath, New Delhi 110 001. Tel: 321125.

PHILIPS

Released for information only by:
Philips Singapore Pte. Ltd., Lorong 1, Toa Payoh, Singapore 1231 and Philips Hong Kong Limited, 27th-29th Floor, Hopewell Centre, Hong Kong

PHILIPS

Now! Bite into the international taste of chocolate

Take a bite and get an altogether new experience. A rich, creamy experience that only a chocolate made by Cadbury's from dairy-fresh milk, can offer. New Cadbury's Dairy Milk is just that. Just like the one that's made Cadbury's the international standard in chocolate

New Cadbury's Dairy Milk

K.C. Pant

S.B. Chavan

P. Narasimha Rao

intelligence reports, which indicated that the Sikhs were migrating to Punjab from other states were taken seriously by the Prime Minister and his timely action may go a long way in creating an atmosphere which will help this sensitive state return to normalcy.

The tragedy of Punjab is that while religious bigots played havoc, the riots which broke out simultaneously in many parts of the country in the first week of November, affected many poor people. The Sikhs who are settled in places outside Punjab are mainly those who migrated to India when Pakistan was created. They do not own land or property in Punjab and much of what they had created out of their sweat and toil was lost in the riots. Today, the same people are looking to Punjab as a place where they can be safe. One does not know if they can earn a livelihood there. Gurudwarascanprovide shelter for a while, but they cannot become permanent refugee camps. In dealing with the Punjab crisis, it has to be borne in mind that a floating Sikh population can pose a threat if effective steps are not taken soon to rehabilitate them.

The apathy of the state machinery in the early days of Rajiv Gandhi's rule is responsible for the present impasse. If the riots in early November had been effectively handled and those guilty of indulging in the communal orgy booked, then the feeling of insecurity among the Sikhs would not have grown. The first positive step from the government came on 9 January 1985, when the additional commissioner of Delhi police, Ved Marwah, told the press that 1,900 people had been arrested for their role in the November riots in the capital.

Should the Akali Dal be banned? Freedom of expression and religion in this country are subject to the Indian people's fundamental commitment to secularism. The Akali Dal is one party where the high priests sitting in the Akal Takht at Amritsar call the shots. It is a shame that the high priests, who owe their existence to the Shiromani GurudwaraPrabhandhak Committee (SGPC) Act, which is a creature of the statute book, dared to declare the President of India as a tankhaiya (ostracised from the Sikh community) after Operation Bluestar in June. The President of India cannot be brought to ridicule by a bunch of religious leaders. It is true that Giani Zail Singh is a Sikh. But he is not the President of India by virtue of his religion. It is unfortunate that the President gave undue importance to the high priests by seeking the removal of this order. The high priests obliged. But, at what cost? In the presence of the President, they ridiculed the armed forces of which he is the supreme commander. Such acts are certainly not in consonance with the mood of secular India.

Giving Chandigarh to Punjab and referring the river waters dispute to a tribunal are no longer solutions to the Punjab crisis. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is facing trouble from his own partymen on Chandigarh. The former law minister, Jagannath Kaushal, who won the Chandigarh seat for the ruling party, has promised that Chandigarh would remain a union territory and most people in Chandigarh want it to retain its present status. But the Congress(I) must evolve a national policy on the Chandigarh question. Indira Gandhi had promised Chandigarh to Punjab. However, the stand of Haryana chief minister Bhajan Lal is different. He had confused the issues two years earlier, by staking Haryana's claim to Chandigarh. Now, when the Prime Minister and the three-member cabinet panel comprising S.B. Chavan, K.C. Pant and Narasimha Rao have been grappling with the Punjab problem, Bhajan Lal has suddenly dug out nineteenth century revenue records to prove that Abohar and Fazilka were part of Sirsa district (now in Haryana). But Punjab may not want to give up these two tehsils.

In the next two months, much of the efforts of the new wave government of Rajiv Gandhi will have to concentrate on Punjab. The AICC general secretary, Srikant Verma, has rightly pointed out to the Akalis that the verdict of the 1984 polls has been against separatism and, therefore, insistence on the Anandpur Sahib resolution will not be in line with the massive mandate which the people all over the country have given last month. The image of the new wave government is good. Its performance will be on test in Punjab, to begin with.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

Paramilitary personnel patrol inside the Golden Temple complex

Wanted: Action Against Extremists

While the confidence of the rest of the Sikhs is restored

The Congress(I) and its leader Mr Rajiv Gandhi have been returned with a thumping mandate The assassination of Indira Gandhi and the Punjab imbroglio which gave new meaning to the ruling party's 'unity of the country' slogan are two of the factors that have given the party 400 seats in the eighth Lok Sabha. In keeping with this the Prime Minister, in his first address to the nation, has declared Punjab to be the first on the new government's list of priorities. Earlier he had set up a high-powered panel comprising the home minister Mr S B. Chavan, the defence minister Mr P V. Narasimha Rao and the education minister K.C. Pant Mr Pant had flirted with Punjab for a short period last year when he was sent as one of the many government emissaries to Punjab. Mr Rao, of course, was actively involved with the problem as the home minister and Mr S.B. Chavan today is being briefed on the subject.

The former Punjab chief minister Mr Darbara Singh and the agriculture minister Mr Buta Singh are very actively involved with the Prime Minister in resolving the tangle and have become almost daily visitors to his residence

Mr Rajiv Gandhi has come out strongly against the Anandpur Sahib resolution in interviews and in his address to the nation. He has made it clear that this will not be taken as a precondition for any settlement as the government is positive that separatism will not be tolerated. The unity of the country, as Mr Gandhi asserted, is paramount. But in saying so he has not said anything new, although most political pundits in the press and outside are hailing his words as if they had not heard these assertions before. This is exactly what his mother had been saying for over a year before her death. Mrs Indira Gandhi had made it clear that while discussion on the other pending demands of the Akali Dal could be initiated, the government would not compromise on the Anandpur Sahib resolution at all.

Mr Rajiv Gandhi while equally categorical about the resolution, has not made his mind known on the other pending demands of the Akali Dal, namely the river waters issue, the demand for transferring Chandigarh to Punjab and the religious demands of the Akali Dal that Mrs Gandhi had accepted but not implemented. Will he continue pandering to religiosity or will he make a clean break? Will he begin negotiations and if so, with whom? Or will he announce a unilateral decision and clamp down on the Akali Dal as an organisation? There is no doubt that in resolving the Punjab tangle, or at least in attempting to solve it, the young Prime Minister can very easily make his first political and, in all probability, very costly blunder.

Mr Rajiv Gandhi in the past has always appeared very confused about the Punjab issue. He had never been able to come to grips with the problem and after his damaging certificate to Bhindranwale as a "religious leader" in April last, he kept very much out of the scene as far as this state was concerned. Earlier he had blundered in trying to oust Darbara Singh as the chief minister by supporting his close friend at that time, Mr Amarender Singh. Mr Amarender Singh had with the full blessings of Mr Rajiv Gandhi worked to destabilise the Darbara government in Punjab, creating more confusion than even the centre could handle.

But that is the past and very likely Mr Rajiv Gandhi has learnt from his mistakes. One indication of this is that Mr Darbara Singh is amongst those now advising him on Punjab. But the Punjab scenario is not very encouraging for a fruitful settlement at present. The five high priests have become the spokesmen for the Sikh extremists. The so-called moderate leaders are in jail. This raises the question as to whom the government will negotiate with. Prakash Singh Badal comes to mind as the most moderate leader but even he had been compelled to succumb to pressures when in Delhi he set fire to a copy of Article 25 of the Indian Constitution. The army is deployed in the state in full strength and in the wake of Operation Bluestar and the attacks on innocent Sikhs following Mrs Gandhi's assassination most of this community has become alienated. They have to be won over and this can only be done by assuring them, in action and not just in words, that they are not second class citizens in the eyes of the government.

The real problem in Punjab is not the acceptance of the demands. The government can very easily make a unilateral announcement and then ensure that there are no reprisals by keeping the army posted in the state. Or it can restore popular rule with the Akali Dal as a co-partner and keep its fingers crossed hoping for the best. It can even ban the Akali Dal as a politico-religious organisation. There is a choice of several short term alternatives and it is for the Prime Minister and his colleagues to determine what they feel is the best for Punjab and for the country in the present circumstances

But nothing will succeed in the long run without a concerted attack on communalism and fundamentalism. Mr Rajiv Gandhi in his speech has underlined the importance of secularism and one can only hope that he means this. It is very easy in this country to speak of secularism and pander heavily at the same time to communalism. The Congress(I) has done this in the past and in fact is guilty of it in its campaign for the recent elections. In Amethi, which is the Prime Minister's constituency, this correspondent heard anti-Sikh slogans directed at Menaka Gandhi being raised by Congress(I) workers in all parts of the constituency. In Nainital the Congress(I) workers made it clear that the unity of the country was correlated to Hinduism. This was because the rival candidate, namely, Akbar Ahmed had captured the Muslim and Sikh votes to some extent and the Congress(I) was unashamedly appealing to the majority community to unitedly return its candidate to the Lok Sabha

Today while eulogising the new chapter that has opened in Indian history the politicians and the journalists have chosen to forget the worst post partition riots that shook this country. The Prime Minister, while assuring the Sikhs that their life and property were secure, did not assure them that a judicial enquiry would be held to look into the carnage that took countless lives in the country's capital and the neighbouring states. Action against parties like the Akali Dal which mix religion with politics is long overdue but no government can take such an action in isolation. It has to have the confidence of the community concerned with it and for this the government now has to take the necessary measures. The Sikh extremists must not only be isolated but should be dealt with ruthlessly while the confidence of the rest of the community is restored in the government.

Only a truly secular government can attack fundamentalism and stamp out communalism with confidence. For this the government and its functionaries should not be seen by the people to be pandering to any one community. Mr Rajiv Gandhi has spoken of secularism; only the future will tell if he is capable of and really inclined to follow his words with concrete action or whether he is merely paying lip service to a concept he does not fully understand.

Seema Mustafa, New Delhi

'Constitution of the Cabinet Panel Does Not Mean Anything'

Sardar Surjan Singh Thekedar, convenor of the ad hoc committee of the Akali Dal told SUNDAY

Q: Can normalcy return to Punjab?

A: Normalcy can return if the government sees things in the right perspective. The Akali leaders now in jail have to be released. So have the Akali workers and the other people arrested during the last one year or so. The centre then has to declare the acceptance of the just and legitimate demands of the Sikhs and provide constitutional guarantees for the safety and the security of their lives and property.

The Akali Dal is not a secessionist or a separatist party. It does not believe in violent methods of agitation. I can say that the Akali Dal is more patriotic than even the ruling party.

Q: Will the constitution of the panel by the Prime Minister bring an end to the Punjab problem?

A: So much suffering has been inflicted on the Sikhs that the constitution of the panel does not mean anything. I think there can surely be more constructive steps than the formation of the panel. Among these steps are the declaration of the acceptance of the Sikh demands which the government knows are genuine and legitimate.

Q: Why is the Akali Dal so adamant about the acceptance of the Anandpur Sahib resolution?

A: The Anandpur Sahib resolution is being misinterpreted. The resolution stands for more power to the states and for a federal structure. The government should not feel hesitant to act just because the name of the resolution starts with Anandpur Sahib, one of the holy places of the Sikhs.

Q: Can the Akali Dal start the talks now?

A: I do not think so. There is no question of the Akali Dal starting any negotiations. Only the leaders in jail can deliver the goods. So, they have to be released first.

Interviewed by Tirthankar Ghosh

Destination: Punjab

The Akalis are promoting a transfer of Sikh population from other parts of the country

"Until the central government assures the Sikhs who have left their homes in other parts of India to come to Punjab, the refugees will not stop coming here. Neither will they go back."

Giani Sahib Singh, one of the five head priests of the Golden Temple in Amritsar

Nineteen year old Mahinder Kaur hurried up the stairs to her room in the Guru Ram Das Niwas, outside the Temple complex. Mahinder had arrived in the Golden Temple with her parents and her two brothers in the beginning of November 1984. Her husband Sukhbir, to whom she had been married in September 1982, had been killed in the riots in Delhi following Indira Gandhi's assassination. The family had taken refuge in a gurudwara in Delhi and had almost decided to go back to their home in Mahabir Enclave near Palam village in New Delhi, when they heard that there would be bloody reprisals against the Sikhs during the Lok Sabha elections. The family members were told by Sikh leaders that it was useless going back to their home; it would do them good if they migrated to Punjab.

Mahinder's family had been to the Golden Temple once on a pilgrimage and naturally the first place in Punjab which came to their minds was Amritsar. Today, Mahinder's is one of the 100 families which have taken refuge in the Guru Ram Das Niwas. The trickle of refugees from Delhi, Kanpur, parts of Himachal Pradesh and Bihar which started in the first week of November 1984, grew to a flood as the Lok Sabha elections approached. According to conservative estimates put forward by the Punjab state government officers in Chandigarh, around 5,000 Sikh families have come to Punjab since the November riots.

But ask any Sikh connected with the relief and rehabilitation of the Sikh refugees in the 13 centres set up in the state and the reply is: one lakh to one-and-a-half lakh Sikh families have migrated to Punjab. This may be an exaggeration, for while travelling from Chandigarh to Jullundur and Amritsar via Ropar and Ludhiana, where the families have settled down, one arrives at a figure somewhere around 30,000.

The SGPC is sparing no pains to help the refugee families. In fact, its youth wing and volunteers are even encouraging them to stay on. The methods adopted are subtle. While there is no dearth of assistance to the refugees—whether in the form of money or materials—the leaders have mounted a campaign to tell the refugees that there is no security for Sikhs anywhere in the country, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's assurances notwithstanding. This correspondent had a taste of the SGPC methods in Jullundur's Gurudwara Diwan Sathan in Central Town. Many young Sikh members of the Youth Relief and Welfare Committee were more keen to give information about the Sikh refugees than they could themselves. Said one of them: "You must write that migrants do not want to go back to their homes," he warned, "All of them want to settle in Punjab and we will do everything to rehabilitate them."

Sikh refugees in a gurudwara in Ludhiana

This correspondent spoke to Darshan Kaur, an elderly lady who has been living in Gurudwara Diwan Sathan for the last month or so. Her home was in Patnasaheb, near the gurudwara and she had left Patna because, as she confided, "I was very scared. During the riots we were not harmed. In fact, we suffered no losses— our business was intact. I came here because I have relatives in this town (Jullundur). Every Sikh I knew told me that the murders would start taking place during the Lok Sabha elections. But nothing happened." Would she go back, we asked her. Before Darshan Kaur could reply, an elderly Sikh gentleman, who had arrived from the trans-Jamuna colony in Delhi, shot back at us: "How can she go back? For that matter how can all of us go back? The Congress(I) is waiting with knives, sticks and bombs for us." Darshan Kaur had no answer.

The SGPC has grand plans for the rehabilitation of the Sikh refugees. According to a senior intelligence officer in Chandigarh, looking after Punjab affairs, there are plans to collect Rs 11 crores for the refugees. And he was quite confident that the amount would definitely be collected.

The relief centres set up by the SGPC have till now provided assistance to over 1,800 families in Amritsar. In Ludhiana, over 5,460 families have been given money and help to settle down. Already plans are underway to construct 100 shops and two multistoried housing complexes on land owned by the SGPC in Amritsar. Perhaps the most ambitious scheme has been formulated at Mohali near Chandigarh. There an industrial training institute, where various technical trades would be taught, will be set up.

Sardar Bhan Singh, secretary of the SGPC, in charge of the relief and rehabilitation programme said: "We are trying our best to provide relief to the refugees. They have suffered a lot. Anyone who comes to the Golden Temple and asks for refuge is never refused. So, when the widows and the families came here, we asked them to stay on." Over 200 widows and their dependants have been given Rs 1,000 each. In addition, free clothing, bedding and rations are provided. The children have been admitted in five colleges and 10 schools run by the

'Mentally All Sikhs Have Become Extremists'

Rajinder Kaur, ex-MP and president of the Istiree Akali Dal, told SUNDAY

Rajinder Kaur

Q: Can the Punjab problem be solved?

A: The Punjab problem has been exploited by the Congress(I). Although Mrs Gandhi could not exploit it, her son has. It is the Congress(I) which killed the Sikhs in Delhi and other parts of India. The situation is quite tense now and no one—neither Hindus nor Sikhs—feels safe in Punjab.

Q: But the Prime Minister has appointed a panel to look into the Punjab problem.

A: The panel cannot succeed. How can it succeed when the persons in it are guilty of keeping the problem alive? I will give you an example. I was supposed to lead a jatha to liberate the Golden Temple from army occupation on 16 July 1984. On the morning of 15 July, the army general came forward for a meeting with us (the Akali leadership). The army wanted us to give up the idea of the jatha. The talks with them had neared completion and we had worked out some sort of compromise, when K.C. Pant came to Amritsar with express orders from the centre to break down the talks. It is my personal feeling that Mrs Gandhi was misled by the people around her who have wanted to keep the problem alive.

Q: Are the Sikhs then totally alienated?

A: Do you know what the Sikhs feel today? The Sikhs are under the impression that the government has told them to get out of India. No one has been arrested yet for the killings of Sikhs in the riots following Indira Gandhi's death.

As for the compensation given by the government, it is nothing. What can anyone these days do with Rs 10,000. A Sikh cannot move around safely and everywhere he is looked down upon as a traitor and killer of Hindus. Mentally all Sikhs have become extremists.

Q. How can there be peace?

A. There can be peace if the government want. But it seems the government does not want peace.. innocent Sikhs are killed almost everyday in fake encounters...The tension can be lessened if the senior Akali leaders are released from jail.

Q: Should not the Akali Dal have disowned Bhindranwale?

A: They could not and should not have disowned Bhandranwale. He was after all an Akali, like all Sikhs are. However, he could be checked but no one could check him. You know, the tragedy of Bhindranwale was that he did not know he had been set up by the Congress(I). He was used by the Congress(I) which built him up as a symbol of Sikh extremism.

Interviewed by Tirthankar Ghosh

SGPC and are being given free education. Most able-bodied men in Amritsar are being given jobs by Sikh industrialists.

With all these facilities, it is natural for the Sikh refugees not to want to go back. And the reasons being given by the refugees vary. "There is no security anywhere. How can I go back home when I have lost everything?" asked Gurmeet Singh from Kanpur. Said Fateh Singh, owner-driver of an autorickshaw (DER 4306) from Sabzi Mandi in Delhi: "We can't trust anyone. We don't want to stay outside Punjab. If the centre was instigating the riots can the Sikhs ever stay in peace?"

Both Gurmeet Singh and Fateh Singh are living off the largess of the SGPC. Yet both like numerous other Sikh families have one or other family members at their homes in Kanpur, Calcutta, Bhopal, Patna, Ranchi and other places. We asked Fateh Singh, originally from Calcutta's 1/1 Shibnarayan Das Lane, whether he would ever go back to his wife, children and brothers in Calcutta. "How can I?" he asked "I am sure to be attacked on the way." When we assured him that the days of madness when Sikhs were picked out and killed were over, he evaded our reply and added. "Don't worry, though nothing happened in Calcutta, I have written to my family to sell the house and come and settle down in Punjab. This is the only safe place for us."

More and more Sikhs are reaching Punjab every day, although the number has decreased considerably. This correspondent asked a number of refugees in the Golden Temple whether they had come on their own volition or on the advice of some people A story doing the rounds in Chandigarh mentions that a large number of letters have gone out from the Golden Temple to the gurudwaras around the country asking the members of the sangat to migrate to Punjab. Said an intelligence officer, who did not wish to be named: "I have myself seen 70 or 80 such letters. Most of them do not have proper addresses. Common Sikh names, like Surjeet Singh, are picked. In the Golden Temple, they have a list of nearly all the gurudwaras in the country. Suppose they were to send a letter addressed to Surjeet Singh of the Gurudwara Bangla Sahib in Delhi, some Surjeet Singh of Delhi would receive it And, after the November riots, a Sikh is ready to believe anything. If he receives an advice to migrate to Punjab, Surjeet Singh most certainly will."

However, when Giani Sahib Singh, one of the high priests of the Golden Temple was asked if any such letters had been sent out from the Temple, he evaded the question. He then said: "The government is responsible for what happened to the Sikhs. The people have no other place than the gurudwaras in Punjab to go to."

Nevertheless, some Sikh families have gone back to their homes. Charanjeet Kaur from Delhi, now in the Kalgidhar Gurudwara in Ludhiana said her husband had to go back to his job in the ministry of labour in Delhi. She said: "My husband is a clerk and he had to join his duties. But he will come back to Punjab. He has only gone to arrange his transfer from Delhi." Charanjeet Kaur's is the only instance of a family going back that this correspondent came across. Some families, more resourceful than the others, have settled down in rented houses or have bought property in Chandigarh and Ludhiana. Estate agents in Chandigarh have been doing good business. In fact, land prices in and around the 'city beautiful' as Chandigarh is known, have more than doubled.

An uneasy calm prevails in Punjab. Shops down their shutters after sundown, cinema halls stop functioning after the evening show and almost everyone warns that it is not safe to travel on the highway after it is dark. The Sikh leaders themselves say precious little to ease the tension. The tension snowballs,

The "Martyr" of Maloya

Date: 28 December 1984. Place: Maloya village, about 15 km from Chandigarh. It is nearing noon and the 3,000-strong congregation gathered in the middle of the village is waiting in front of a hastily erected dais. They have gathered in Maloya, the native village of Beant Singh, one of the assassins of Indira Gandhi, to take part in the Bhog (a religious ceremony for a dead man) ceremony of the dead assassin.

On the dais is Beant Singh's widow, Bimal Kaur Khalsa. Beside her are a dozen persons, among whom are three senior Akali leaders: the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee's acting president Prem Singh Lalpura, an Akali Dal legislator, Beant Singh Khalsa and an ex MLA, Bachittar Singh. On the rostrum is also a lifesize portrait of Beant Singh.

The ceremony starts with recitations from the Guru Granth Sahib and other Sikh scriptures. Soon after, the Ropar Akali Dal jatha chief, Sant Ajit Singh rises to speak Without beating around, the Sant comes to the point. He describes Beant Singh as a martyr who the entire Sikh community should emulate. He calls upon the Sikh youth to follow the example set by "the brave and courageous son of the Sikh community. Beant Singh" says the Sant, "had done a great service to India by getting rid of the tormentor of the Sikhs;" thus he deserved to be praised, respected and revered.

The other Akali leaders, along with half a-dozen other leaders deliver highly provocative speeches. At the end of the ceremony, one of the leaders rises and asks the congregation to donate money for the widow and the children of the "martyr." Almost everyone donates money and when the amount collected is totalled, it is found to be around Rs 28,000 The money is given to the widow. Before dispersing, the leaders promise that similar congregations in the memory of Beant Singh would be held throughout Punjab. Though a criminal case was registered in the union territory of Chandigarh against those who delivered the speeches, the authorities did not take action immediately. The intelligence and police authorities were in a quandary whether to arrest the guilty or not In fact, on 5 January 1985, senior intelligence officials were wondering if the arrest of the Akali leaders would bring the Punjab crisis to the boil again. With the bulk of the Punjab Akali leadership in jail, the thinking of the top officers was not wholly misplaced. However, the Akali leaders were arrested on 7 January.

According to a very highly placed intelligence officer who did not wish to be named, "The Akali Dal leadership does not realise what misery and pain the Maloya incident can bring to the entire Sikh community living outside Punjab." Already, the country has witnessed what happened after Indira Gandhi's assassination and such incidents might start the cycle once again. Perhaps, the Akali leadership has not learnt yet, since a similar gathering was organised at Sohana village in Ropar district on 6 January 1985.

Ritu Sharma and Tirthankar Ghosh

The langar inside Kalgidhar Gurudwara in Ludhiana

fed on rumours spread by vested interests and the migrants are those who are affected the most. With nothing much to do, they feed each other with exaggerated versions of the November riots. Gurpreet Singh of Kanpur, now living in the Diwan Sathan Gurdwara in Jullundur's Central Town, said that he had heard of a two-month old Sikh baby who had been roasted alive on a gas stove. In Jullundur another story was doing the rounds. A Sikh lady from Delhi said that she herself had seen three Sikh children being tied together with a piece of tyre and that some white chemical was thrown on them which caused a fire killing them instantly.

The SGPC Relief Committee and other volunteer organisations are only too eager to brainwash these helpless migrants. When we were asking questions to the Sikh refugees a few of the SGPC volunteers gathered together a few of the migrants and shouted angrily: "Raj karega Khalsa. Akee rahe na koi (The Sikhs will rule and no enemy will exist)." As for the Sikh leaders most of them parrot the same lines. Rajinder Kaur, the daughter of the legendary Master Tara Singh and the president of the Istree Akali Dal said, "The release of the senior Sikh leaders can only lessen the tension. That and the withdrawal of the army at the earliest."

The Sikh refugees are often misguided by politicians and the Sikh youth activists when approached for advice and guidance. History is used by them to change their views. Gurnam Singh Tir, a lawyer and a senior adviser to the Akali Dal, gave an example. He said: "We have been treated as criminals and it is all due to the one family Kashmiri Brahmin rule. Out of 121 persons who were hanged during the independence movement, 93 were Sikhs. Out of 2,668 whose property was confiscated during the struggle against the British, 2,000 were Sikhs. Out of 1,302 persons killed during the Jallianwala Bagh massacre, 799 were Sikhs. How can we expect justice from a government which does not recognise these figures?"

The scenario in Amritsar and other parts of Punjab reminds one of the pre-partition days of 1947. Today there are no end to rumours as there were in 1947. Reminds Leonard Mosley in his The Last Days of the British Raj, that Amritsar was made up of "only narrow streets where gossip, rumour and alarm can spread like fire among dry kindling wood." Migrants in relief camps in Amritsar and Ludhiana had been given a dose of such gossip. They said they had been informed by political workers and responsible SGPC members to reach Punjab before 22 December 1984 because on that day a large scale massacre of Sikhs outside Punjab would start. Strangely, the date was extended to 24 December and later to 13 January 1985. Fortunately, intelligence sources were well aware of what was happening or going to happen and accordingly took measures.

Why are the Sikhs and the Akali Dal, in particular, so intent on encouraging this migration? In March 1947, the Muslim League had started advising the Muslims in India to move over to Pakistan. When the League realised that very few of the Muslims were interested in leaving their native villages, the leadership hired goondas to organise anti-Sikh and anti-Hindu riots in the area. Three months later the Sikhs organised their own killer squads which roamed about the country side wreaking vengeance. Is the Akali Dal interested in seeing a 1947 type of situation in this country again?

Though the refugees have been received with open arms and are being given all help now, the migration is sure to have its repercussions. As Gurnam Singh Tir confided, "Punjab is not in a position to rehabilitate the refugees. The Sikhs or the SGPC do not possess the resources to take care of the thousands of people who have come." And the rumblings of discontent have already started. "Land prices have shot up in Amritsar. Jobs which could be taken up by the people here have been given to the refugees. We have given enough in the form of money and help," said a Sikh shopkeeper, Harbhajan Singh, who owns a shop on the outskirts of Amritsar.

If some Sikhs of Punjab are resenting the migration from the rest of the country, the Hindus who have not been affected by the aftermath of the assassination of Indira Gandhi, are keeping quiet. But it is a very deceptive calm. As Ram Kumar Sharma, owner of a teashop just outside the city limits of Ludhiana put it: "What the Sikhs received in Delhi after the assassination of our Prime Minister was only a slap. This time, if they start anything in Punjab against the Hindus, they will receive something more." This belligerent mood of the Sikhs as well as the Hindus does not augur well. If the government does not take timely action, Punjab can well be in flames in a few months.

Tirthankar Ghosh in Amritsar and Rita Sharma in Chandigarh

Should Communal Parties Be Banned?

Some eminent personalities answer

Arjan Singh

Air Chief Marshal (Retd) Arjan Singh: Communal parties should be discouraged to function. I think they have no place in our Constitution.

Dr Karan Singh: It is very difficult to say which party is communal. According to our Constitution every one has the right to form a party. No party should be banned.

Raghuvir Sahai, eminent Hindi journalist and literary figure who won the Sahitya Akademi award this year: I can only say that there should not be any communal party. But, if communal parties exist, one has to determine the intention of those who want the ban on communal parties.

V.P. Bhatia, Editor, Organiser: I am against any ban on any political party

Amrita Pritam: How can one decide which party is communal? But, religion and politics should be separated. If some parties are based on religion, they should play a clean game of politics.

Shabana Azmi: All communal parties should be banned.

Shabana Azmi

Raghu Rai

Amrita Pritam

Karan Singh

Saeed Akhtar Mirza, noted filmmaker: I think all parties are communal; all of them should be banned.

Raj Krishna, economist and former member of Planning Commission: We should not ban communal parties: they are parts of our political structure. Large sections of the Indian society find their collective identity in terms of their religion. In outlawing communal parties, you are outlawing most of Indian society. The recent elections have shown that the Congress party is also a communal party—would not say the entire party, but large sections of it. Thus, it would also have to be banned. All communal, tribal, linguist, religious parties should co-exist in the Indian orchestra and settle their differences by political horsetrading. It is unfair for one communal party to ban other communal parties. The ruling party has alliances with communal forces in Maharashtra and Kerala.

Raghu Rai, photographer: Any party which evokes communal feelings should be banned. Unfortunately, some parties are communal by name and others are communal, without their name being so. So what does one do about those?

SPECIAL REPORT

Assam: Solution Ahead?

The mood in the AASU camp is one of reconciliation

Assam agitationists have come a long way since the heady days of 1979 to 1982, when their fiat ran supreme in the state. The movement for the removal of foreign nationals from Assam and the need to cleanse the electoral rolls was enthusiatically supported by the people in the state. Throughout the country too, there was widespread sympathy for the All Assam Students Union (AASU) and the young student leadership which claimed to lead a peaceful, non-violent agitation on the lines of Mahatma Gandhi. However, with time one heard less and less of Mahatma Gandhi and the movement strayed from its original path. The Nellie massacre rang a deathknell to the professed non-violent pretensions of the agitationists. The internal schism in the AASU leading to the expulsion of Muslim students led by the AASU vice-president Nurul Hussain shed it of its secular garb. The Muslim students led by Hussain accused the AASU executive of adopting an aggressively Hindu posture. At the same time differences within the AASU and the AAGSP have been steadily surfacing leading to the expulsion of Atul Bora of the PLP from his post as convenor of the AAGSP.

Riven as it is by internal differences, the movement also has, since February 1983, to contend with chief minister Hiteswar Saikia who has been working behind the scenes to wean away the support base of the agitationists. In upper Assam from where Mr Saikia hails, the movement, at present, exists more or less in name, except among sections of the upper castes. Saikia has shrewdly managed to convince the people there that the agitation dominated as it is by caste Hindus has little to offer the Ahoms. Long before the numerous calls for bandhs and boycotts of the ministers and visiting dignitaries from New Delhi became meaningless in Lower Assam, they were ignored in the Sibsagar and Dibrugarh districts.

The chief minister's principal achievement has been to prove to the people of Assam that he is as committed to the interests of the state and its people as the most ardent AASU supporter. He has repeatedly emphasised that patriotism and well-being of the state was not just the prerogative of the AASU and the AAGSP. Even AASU sympathisers grudgingly admit that Mr Saikia has been able to bring in a lot of money from the centre to the state and that, considering the present circumstances, he is the best person to look after the interests of the state.

Saikia has been able to earn a considerable amount of goodwill from even the middle classes,

Women demonstrating in Gauhati in 1980: weary of agitation formerly the most ardent supporters of the AASU. By restoring the confidence of the police and the bureaucracy and its own efficacy, by placing Assamese officers in key position in the state, Saikia has managed to keep significant sections of the middle and upper classes happy. He has also seen to it that Assamese businessmen and contractors are given a fair share of contracts

While Saikia's role in bringing peace to the state is creditable, the election commission has also achieved what would have been impossible even two years ago. Amid the raging controversy over the correction of the voters list, which had in the first place triggered off the agitation, the election commission has quietly been at work. Today, the enumeration of all potential voters in the state upto January 1985 has been completed. While both the AASU and the forces opposed to it, principally organisations of the minority groups and the ruling Congress(I), have been vociferously advocating their argument for and against the correction of the voters list on the basis of the 1971 electoral rolls, the commission has gone ahead and announced its guidelines for the publication of the draft electoral rolls.

While the AASU had not till the time of writing made public its reaction to the proposal of the election commission, in private the AASU leaders have expressed their disappointment with the election commission. However, they have also made it clear that this would not stand in the way of future negotiations.

According to the directive received from the election commission, those whose names have been entered in the 1971 electoral rolls and those "linked" with 1971 (the descendants of those whose names are present in the 1971 rolls) will be entered in the draft rolls. For the others whose names are not in the 1971 list, scrutiny will be done. Forest, revenue and police officials will be entrusted to forward the relevant information about such persons Their place of birth, land records and any other document to prove their bonafides will be collected and the information passed on to the electoral registration officer for scrutiny. The electoral registration officer would then decide whether or not a person's name should be entered in the draft rolls. The order of the election commission would go a long way in paving the path for conciliation. However, it is certain that minority organisations and the ruling Congress(I) would do their utmost to ensure that people entered in the 1979 voters list should also be included. It is to be seen how much pressure the chief minister can exert to ensure that Congress(I) voters are not left out.

AASU chief Prafulla Mahanta

Even if differences about inclusion of people not in the 1971 voters list do crop up, this will probably not make much difference to the talks. The AASU today distinguishes between the foreign nationals problem which entails the removal of the 1961 to 1971 migrants from Assam, measures for the prevention of fresh influx from Bangladesh, and the deletions which were required to ensure that no foreign nationals are included in the voters lists. Meanwhile, the AASU and the AAGSP have directed their supporters to file claims and objections against all suspected non-citizens whose names may have entered the draft rolls.

Like Hiteswar Saikia, the AASU today makes a distinction between the foreign nationals issue and the election and revision of the electoral rolls. The foreign nationals question would include the removal from Assam of all those who entered the state between 1961 and 1971 or probably a date between these two and adequate steps to stop the further influx of foreigners from Bangladesh. The question of revision and correction of the electoral rolls would probably be discussed separately with the election commission.

While earlier such a move by the election commission would have provided the AASU with ample reason to renew the agitation, today they are sadly not in a position to mobilise the kind of mass support they had earlier. While all sections of Assamese sympathise with the AASU, the mood to come out to the streets and fight for their rights is no longer there. The people of Assam have become weary after six years of struggle which, so far, has not achieved any substantial results, while on the other hand is causing considerable damage to the economy of the state. As such the announcement of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi that fresh negotiations between the union government and the Assam agitationists would soon start has been appreciated by all sections of the people in Assam. Most Assamese feel that the new Prime Minister may be more sympathetic to the problems of the state than his mother had been.

However, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister may feel it is unlikely that a solution that has eluded both parties in more than 20 rounds of discussions can be solved because of a change at the top. The only reason for hope is that today the students are separately looking for a solution. They are in an unenviable situation where they can neither rekindle the agitation or conclude it satisfactorily The general mood in the AASU camp is one of reconciliation and once a suitable solution to the foreign nationals issue is found, their first priority would be to form a strong regional party and contest the elections. The present AASU leadership cannot remain in the forefront much longer. Once they are out of the AASU and unless they can form another platform they would be in the wilderness. The students during the first AASU conference had changed their earlier views and had admitted that the Assam issue being a political one can only be solved politically. As such the need for a strong regional party in the state on the lines of NTR's Telugu Desam has been advocated by the AASU sympathisers. So far no party has been formed, though during the AASU conference in Jorhat in December last year the idea was mooted once again. The regional parties especially the Purbanchaliya Loka Parishad is opposed to the formation of another regional force. However, it is certain that the AASU will preside over the genesis of another political party as soon as the opportune moment arises. It is also known that the present AASU leadership will assume charge of the new party.

However, before all this comes about, an honourable solution to the Assam issue would be sought by the agitationists. Unless they can do so, they may become irrelevant. The next round of talks between the students and the union government officials which is scheduled to start soon may find the agitationists more pragmatic in their approach than they have been thus far.

Seema Guha, Gauhati

GUEST COLUMN/ RANJIT SAU

Greening of the Gangetic Banks

It did not catch much of the media headline; it was perhaps found not very exciting for the urban elite. It did not have the thrill of the dramatic announcement of bank nationalisation or of the celebrated 20-point programme. Perhaps after the most stunning general elections followed by a dull Test cricket match at the Eden Gardens in Calcutta, the intelligentsia lay exhausted in a listless mood in this cold winter month. Little did they realise at the moment that the young Prime Minister's address to the nation, broadcast on radio and television on 5 January, tenderly touched a deep chord in the country's socio economic choreography.

The Prime Minister has proposed a central Ganga authority vested with the task of cleaning up the much-polluted waters of the epic riverine system that has been for centuries nourished in mythological lore and lately filled with factory effluents. Windfalls from this venture are likely to be immense, far-reaching, and pervasive.

Another imaginative component in the Prime Minister's list is the scheme for setting up a national waste land development corporation with the agenda of reclaiming every year five million hectares for cultivation of fodder and fuel woods. In round figures the territory of India is 300 million hectares, of which 45 per cent is used for agriculture, and 20 per cent is under forest; most of the remaining 35 per cent may be treated as wasteland. The national wasteland development corporation will have plenty of work for years to come with enormous possibilities that usually accompany the opening up of a frontier of some 100 million hectares. Here is an area where the vast manpower of the country can be mobilised without eliciting much social tension at least for the time being. It is a positive-sum game. Its contribution to the much-depleted ecological wealth of the country is beyond any simple monetary measure, so would be its gift to the economy.

If the Prime Minister succeeds in re-orienting the ethos and work potentiality of the countless youths of the country along such productive channels the results are bound to be of heroic proportions. The job is not exactly easy; there are instances of less than satisfactory outcome of similar campaigns earlier in India as well as in some neighbouring countries. But this is not the hour for brooding over the past.

Policies on long-term basic issues of the Indian economy will take time; they are on the anvil. Two problems, however, call for immediate attention. Repayment of the IMF loan has to begin soon. The other one is no less daunting. This year and in the last, India is fortunate to have had two successive peak harvests. Every year the country creates a record or sorts in population; so should be the food crop; but it does not happen that way. If experience is any guide, the downward part of the cycle is expected to commence next year when drought may visit this land.

The vast irrigation network that has been built over the years with so much of care and expense lies choked with salination, silt, and unattended or uncut feeder channels. This priceless national property should be renovated and kept at its prime for meeting any unwelcome behaviour of the monsoon. The irrigation system must not be allowed to decay in indifference and bureaucratic lethargy. With aroused enthusiasm it can be reconstructed to productive vitality.

Apart from the officially classified non agricultural wasteland which is going to be looked after by a national development corporation, there is yet another, perhaps more precious, type of wasteland, namely, the cultivated area that is left idle after one crop in a year. The quantum of such unutilised natural resources may be of the order of another 100 million hectares. Opportunities available at this vital moment in India's destiny may be seized to facilitate and ensure that a second, if not also a third, crop is raised in every agricultural plot in the country. Subsidies, if given for this effort, would at ease be justifiable in relation to the return.

Advice is always a free commodity, to the policy-makers in Delhi it is now flowing in embarrassing abundance. I would complete my bit of the addition to this periodic nuisance by the following terse comment. In the modern age, electricity (without load-shedding) is a necessary condition for economic survival and growth. Every town, village, factory, farm, workshop in the country needs an uninterrupted and ample supply of this ray of Alladin's lamp. The sooner it is provided the better.

The present style and mood in Delhi is one of confidence and hope in the future. Time is an irreversible and jealous goddess; she can be unpredictable. Voters in India can testify to that. Among all the proposals, schemes, machinery, and plans that we are hearing about one stands out in shining glory: Rajiv Gandhi's idea for greening the Gangetic banks, in the long run, is going to be ranked as high as Indira Gandhi's nationalisation of commercial banks. In a remarkably shrewd move, the nation's eyes have been shifted to the majestic beauty of nature, away from the wasteland of narrow politicking. Thank you, Mr Prime Minister!

If the Prime Minister succeeds in re-orienting the ethos and work potentiality of the countless youths of the country along such productive channels the results are bound to be of heroic proportions.

SPECIAL REPORT

Vendetta in Sitapur

A family feud leaves 23 dead

"I saw four of them. Ram Pal and three others, rushing towards our house, guns in hand. I ran to bolt the door. Then I heard bullets hitting the wall, whistling past Shivlal and I threw ourselves on the floor and lay still. They were shouting abuses. Maro sale Shivlal ko! Nikle to goli mardeo! I saw two of them on the roof. Then I could feel the heat, and the smoke. i don't know what happened after that. I fainted. Sahib, I do not know how I am alive." Shivdeen Yadav (40) spoke in wide-eyed terror, as members of his still dazed family, hands to their faces, heard in silence. One of several survivors of a dastardly act of revenge by one Yadav family on another—a brutal sequel to a four-year quarrel which started over a stolen bicycle, then a mango tree—that left 23 dead and charred, 11 of them children, seven women, and a large, 40-roomed house burnt to ashes, Shivdeen, his brothers and his family, face a dark uncertainty. The wealth they had earned from years of hard work has been consumed by a spiteful envy—which grew into a violent family feud involving rape and murder. Overnight, their fortunes have changed, from abundance to penury. And, with most of their young dead, they have hardly anything to look forward to.

The storeroom where 11 children were burnt alive

The 23 corpses, wrapped in cloth, lined in a morgue in Sitapur, made a ghastly sight. As many as 22 of the dead were from the same family, and one, Bhagwati alias Bhabhuti Yadav, who was murdered on 1 January, from the other. It was to avenge his murder that the 22 others were killed. Three of the 22, Dwarika, his wife Chhidwani and their daughter Phoolwali were riddled with bullets. The other 19 include three children who died of suffocation, and 16 others who were roasted alive. Grotesquely disfigured, some of the bodies were just misshapen lumps of burnt flesh; the body of one of the women had a whole leg burnt off, and just a bone for a limb. Outside the morgue, a crowd of sobbing relatives waited for a look at the corpses.

Mohaddipur's Yadavs, a quiet, hardworking, intensely competitive lot, who have seen no trouble in the last two years, have been shattered by the carnage. Surprised at what jealousy within a family can do—the two families are related to each other--the men and women seem confused about what to think of it all. Although the quarrel between the two families was well known, nobody had thought it would be so vicious. Most of the survivors of the attack had fled the village for fear of their lives, even after being rescued by the police and other villagers. Only on 4 December, a good 48 hours after the massacre, when the embers were still burning, did some of them dare to come back—to see their homes in ashes and ruins, littered with signs of the raging fire.

The district of Sitapur, known for its hardened criminals, has always been a problem for the police. The liberal issue of gun licences makes things worse. Besides, Mohaddipur, with its large Yadav population—of the 45 families who live in it, all, save one, are Yadavs—has always had the tensions and conflicts of a fast-growing backward caste community that has struck it rich. Even though the violence never came out in the open, disputes over land and property—common obsessions among a people desperate to outstrip each other in a race for wealth and power—are usual, especially between in-laws and cousins.

The two warring families, whose patriarchs are Jagannath (70) and Lilkantha (72), brothers themselves (who are not directly involved in the clash, however), live in separate quarters of the same neighbourhood of Mohaddipur. Lilkantha's is the larger of the two houses, a huge, sprawling mud-and-thatched roof structure built like a honeycomb, with over 40 large and small rooms, four courtyards, but hardly any way of getting out unnoticed. A virtual fortification, the house was also a death-trap. A joint family of 70 lived in it; most of them ate and slept there and toiled in the fields for the rest of the day. "Twelve chullas (earthen stoves) burnt here," said a villager about the house. Lilkantha's house also had three tubewells, and 40 bullocks and cows. Jagannath's family, which was not as well off, has 35 members, who own about 12 cows and bullocks, and much less land than Lilkantha's massive 400 bighas.

The first quarrel between the two families, though of a minor nature, was over a bicycle belonging to a dudhwala (milkman) which was recovered by Chandrika, a member of Jagannath's family, from the house of Sham Lal, of the rival family Sham Lal was accused of stealing it. Later, tension arose over a plot of land that had changed hands between the two groups. Shivlal Yadav, one of Lilkantha's sons, had bought the land from Chandrika's brother Jawahar. Chandrika is related to Shivlal's family through marriage; he is Shivlal's brother Puran's own brother-in-law. Probably because it hurt his ego to see his own family losing land to his in-laws, Chandrika resented the sale. The nine-bigha plot, in Kol village, grows wheat and arhar and was sold off with proper sale deeds for Rs 1,000 or so.

Originally Jagannath's, it had with it a house and a mango tree. After the sale, there were quarrels between Chandrika, Jawahar, Chandrika's father Raggha and Jagannath on one side, and Shivlal and family on the other. Although by law Shivlal was the new owner, Chandrika laid claim to the tree. Often the dispute would be taken to the headman of Mohaddipur, Sardar Singh, but Chandrika's group found him siding with Shivlal. The bitterness increased. Perhaps to teach Shivlal a lesson, Chandrika cut the tree down. At the end of 1982, villagers say, Lilkantha's grandson Mewalal's (30) young wife was raped by Barati (35), Chandrika's son-in-law. A criminal from Baisampur village in the Mishrikh tehsil, under the Chandauli police station area Barati was a corrupting influence in the otherwise peaceful village "Ever since he began staying in Chandrika's house," a villager said, "there have been fights and threats in this place He was a notorious criminal, close to Ram Bhagat Singh, a noted criminal of Mishrikh. It was Barati who was responsible for all this trouble."

Vengeance came soon afterwards. Shivlal's men killed Barati and later, one of Chandrika's sons, Bhagwandin (28), in the village of Murka in December 1982. After making independent inquiries into the double murder. Chandrika's other son Bhagwati alias Bhabhuti (25) lodged a police complaint, naming ten persons in his FIR. Mewalal, Chhotelal (35), Shivlal (45), Ram Swarup (24), Brijmohan (55), Rajan (32), Puran (27), Baikunth (35), Kunwar (27) and the headman of Mohaddipur Sardar Singh (35). The case is on in the Sitapur district sessions court. The next date for hearing was 15 January.

Shivdeen Yadav (sitting); behind him stands Pyarelal, his rescuer

Two of the survivors with Pyarelal

The murder case, over a year-and-a-half old, had been worrying Shivlal and his brothers, who were implicated. And since Bhagwati happened to be the only person who knew enough about the case to cause them trouble, they decided to remove him. On 1 January, when he was returning from Sidhauli, Shivlal and his men allegedly kidnapped him from a spot on a dirt track to the west of Bare village, roughly three km from Mohaddipur, between 5 pm and 5.30 pm. When they found that he had not returned home for long, Chandrika's family started a search for Bhagwati that lasted all night. On the morning of 2 January, Bhagwati's younger brother Bahadur (18) chanced upon his dead body in a pool of blood, in an arhar field. Beside it lay a blank cartridge, his chappals, a muffler and a bicycle on its side. It was between 7.30 am and 8 am. Aghast, Bahadur ran to his family in the village shrieking "Daddu ko mar daley gaye!" (Grand father has been killed)." The rumour that had been afloat in the village the whole night, and Chandrika's worst suspicions, were confirmed.

Chandrika and another of his sons, Chattrapal (22), made their way to the Sidhauli police station, six km away, to lodge a complaint. But the case was not registered until the next day, 3 January. According to the police, they got to know of the murder from Chandrika and his son around 11 am on 2 January, but residents of the area near the police station, which is located on the main road to Sitapur, say that the complainants had arrived around 10 am. In the half hour that followed Chandrika's visit, the police claim they got to know of an attack by Chandrika's family on Shivlal's house. Their first reaction was to look for Chandrika and his son, whom they apprehended from the Sidhauli bus stop where they were waiting to board a bus for Lucknow.

In Mohaddipur, around the time Chandrika and his son were making their complaint, other members of his family were wreaking vengeance on Shivlal. According to eyewitnesses, Chandrika's family members "had gone mad." They had all left their home, as though seized by some alarming news, with the doors ajar. Plates full of food, clothes and bedclothes strewn on the floor were left as they were. Bahadur, Ram Pal, Ram Dayal and Rajaram, armed with 12 bore guns, were seen approaching Shivlal's well-fortified house. In an attempt to escape, Dwarika, his wife Chhidwani and daughter Phoolwali scampered out of the front door, and were gunned down instantly. In a dirt road in front of Dwarika's room, strands of the little girl's hair could be seen sticking to a mud wall; other walls bore large patches of blood, and so did the ground below.

The three done to death, the attackers climbed on to the roof of the house and started calling out the men. They caught sight of Shivnarain first, on the steps leading to his room. But as they took aim, the frightened man fell on the ground and jumped for cover inside. Seeing that the attackers had gone up to the roof, more than 30 men, women and children, instead of trying to escape, ran into the inner recesses, a number of small, low-ceilinged, ill-ventilated rooms used for storing grains and farming equipment, to hide there The attackers saw that the people in the house had been trapped for there was no way they could escape and went about setting fire to the dry, thatched roof from all sides. As the flames leapt, they threatened to shoot anyone who tried to escape. They had even blocked the door from outside. Of the 27 people shut inside, 19 were roasted alive and the remaining eight—most of them in an outer room—were found unconscious by the police and other villagers when they broke through a wall to rescue them at around 12.30 pm, a good two hours after the fire had started.

"I saw Ram Pal and three others coming towards our house with guns," said a still dazed Shivdeen Yadav, Shivlal's brother. "Then I heard bullets from his gun..." After a while, I could clearly see Bahadur and Mahavir standing on the roof, setting the house on fire. Burning embers were falling around us. Shivlal and I lay on the floor. I saw Bahadur strike a match and put it to the roof." Pyarelal, a lad of 17 who rushed to help the victims after the marauders had fled, said, "I saved Shivdeen and Shivlal, and later brought the police. The chowkidar of Bare, Brijlal, also came to help." "The whole house was on fire, sahib," said Shivdeen, refusing to stop. "I could barely see anything. The burning roof was falling on us. But Bahadur and his men did not see the two of us. They went away. Muqaddar se bachey (fate has saved us)." According to Shivdeen, after setting Shivlal's house on fire, the attackers were planning another onslaught on the house of Babu, a relative of Sohan, Shivlal's brother, in Shahibajpur village, but failed.

The officer-in-charge of the Sidhauli police station, Rizwan Hyder, visibly shaken by the whole affair, had never guessed matters could come to such a pass. He had known of the enmity between the two families, and had prior information of the murder, and the likelihood of a violent reprisal. Why did he not act? In the four months that he has been posted in Sidhauli he had learnt that Mohaddipur was trouble-free for the last two years since the double murder at the end of 1982. "There has been no fighting here, no clashes of any sort," he told this reporter, and then went about calling villagers to corroborate what he said: "Say, you," he shouted to a woman, and an old man standing nearby. "Was there anything here, ever?" "No sahib," everyone said, eyeing the policeman.

Take the villagers aside, and it is a different story, however. "This whole thing started with a tree. On 21 August 1983," Hyder said, "Chandrika cut the mango tree on the land that had been sold to Shivlal. A fortnight later, Barati and Bhagwandin were murdered. Bhabhuti filed the complaint, naming Shivlal and his associates, and on 1 January Shivlal and his men kidnapped and killed him. Chandrika's group retaliated by setting Shivlal's house on fire. We tried our best to put it out. A police jeep came within half-an-hour, but since water had to be lifted out of a well, the operation proved difficult." Hyder and his men, when they arrived, found the entire village almost deserted, with not a soul around to call out for help. After yelling for some time, a middle-aged woman came out to assist the police. "We rescued this girl, Munni," Hyder said, pointing to a child with a head wound. "She was fired at. We took her out of one of the outer rooms, opening into a courtyard."

A view of Shivdeen's burnt house

Six-year old Munni

Curiously, however, Shivlal Yadav, whom Chandrika had named in his complaint for the murder of his son Bhabhuti, was allowed to flee Mohaddipur after being rescued. The fact that Chandrika's complaints were never taken seriously, and Shivlal and his family, the richer and more powerful of the two, have always found favour with the authorities, has led to suspicions of police complicity in the feud. People in the village talk of how easily murders are committed, after bribing the police.

A large portion of Shivlal's and his brothers' wealth has gone up in smoke. "There was so much money in this house," said Shabir Ali of Bare, pointing to the ruins. "Just four of their cows cost Rs 70,000. Shivlal himself lost Rs 5,000. And it was all hard-earned. They all worked with their bare hands." But for the Yadavs, prosperity has brought its own evils: jealousy and hatred. The climax to the vendetta is perhaps still to come—with yet another bloody revenge.

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

Photographs: Gopinath Kochunni

A Festiva

Mediocre films and i

Had it not been in the end so tragic, the tenth International Film Festival would have been quite funny, like a Marx brothers comedy. The opening scene of this "tragi-comedy" of errors was the inaugural night of 3 January in Delhi's resplendent Vigyan Bhavan. A thousand more passes than were seats in the auditorium had been given by the star-struck officialdom, ever ready to oblige its unending list of friends, relatives and "contacts." There were almost as many people sitting in the aisles as there were in the seats. There had also been an invasion from the Bombay film industry, causing a traffic jam of sorts in the aisles and below the stage.

But the best was yet to be. The real "show" began once the speeches ended and filmdom took over. Raj Babbar, the ripples in his shiny black hair like the Arabian Sea on a moonlit night, began to call out the names of stars as if he was going through an attendance register in a school.

Slowly, but surely, the stars began to crowd on the stage beginning with Raj Kapoor. Soon, the stage began to resemble an overcrowded airboard sky in which the stars were so near each other that the sky disappeared. In this case it was the jury. There stood our "Bombaywallahs": Raj Kapoor, his sons, Raaj Kumar, Rajesh Khanna, Amrish Puri (bald like Mr Goldfinger in the Bond movies), Basu Bhattacharya, Vinod Mehra, Mithun Chakravarty, surreal in his black leather outfit with a white shawl sloppily thrown over his shoulders. (East and West might well mix but not leather and pashmina). Chauvinist the film industry must be, for the roll-call of women followed later: Simi Garewal in a scalloped white silk gown and a mini, mink coat, Padmini Kolhapure, Salma Agha out of the Arabian nights with bells on her toes and fingers and jewellery on her waist (Naushad was asked to move over to make room for the actress-singer), Smita Patil, Tina Munim and Poonam Dhillon dramatic in black and gold. And then came the starlets. Nobody begrudges the stars, they do after all make the industry go around and will now sparkle in the Lok Sabha. But why did they have to stand there with their backs to the jury for over half an hour, violating all norms of decency and decorum?

It was to become worse. The roll-call completely missed out eminent personalities—among many others Pandit Ravi Shankar, Naushad, Mrinal Sen, Puttana Kanagal, Tapan Sinha, Adoor Gopalkrishnan, D.V.S. Raju, former chairman of the National Film Development Corporation (NFDC) as well as of the Film Federation of India. The latter two left the function in a huff, with Mr Raju even issuing a statement that the south is being "discriminated against."

Equally disastrous were the diplomatic gaffes. French and Italian diplomats were furious about not having been invited to the inaugural function. Both countries have sent many films for screening. Moreover, the chairperson, actress Jeanne Moreau is French, and the Italian embassy cultural centre had helped to organise the Luchino Vis-

Dilip Kumar inaugurating the festival and (below) scene from Pembetino (Greece)

A still from Revanche (Greece)

SPECIAL

of Chaos

efficient organisation

conti retrospective. In fact, it was the Italian cultural centre which sent out press releases about the retrospective, for which they had also organised a seminar. While the French ambassador was invited to the inaugural function, the Italian was not

During the function itself, there were some unforgivable gaffes. While asking Jeanne Moreau to address the audience, actress Deepti Naval referred to her as Madame Jules and Jim (Jules and Jim is the name of the film directed by the late Francois Truffaut and starring Madame Moreau which opened the festival). Whether Ms Naval was being funny or was just plain stupid was not clear, but Mme Moreau was certainly not amused.

Although the films in the competition section are as a rule rather mediocre, there were some good films amongst the 81 films being screened in the information section from 29 countries. France has sent 11 films of which Eric Rohmer's "Full Moon in Paris" (for which actress Pascale Ogier won the best actress award in Venice last year), Alain Resnais's difficult but interesting and differen· L'Amour a Mort and Claude Lelouch's Viva la vie were top drawers.

Italy, apart from its mini-retrospective of Visconti, has sent five films, including the overpowering Bertolucci film, The Moon and Franco Zefferelli's La Traviata and an awful Marco Ferreri film The Future is Women which provoked the loudest catcalls at Venice this year. Hungary has Marta Mezaros's superb Diary for my Children (which won an award in Cannes last year) and Zoltan Fabri's House Warming is not one of his best. Greece with Remetiko by Costas Ferrio has also made its presence felt in this festival. Sweden has Ingmar Bergman's After the Rehearsal, which is really a filmed theatre, but powerful nevertheless. United Kingdom and the United States have sent many films but most of them are disappointing and trite.

Chairperson of the jury Jeanne Moreau

A still from the Japanese film Appasionata

Saddest of all, however, is the fact that although there are some good films in the information section (and the black American cinema, Latin American cinema and the retrospectives), the calibre of films in the competitive section was quite lamentable. To be fair, it could be said that 1984 was not a good year for cinema: The Venice and Cannes film festivals did not see any grand moments of cinema. But, it does seem apparent that nobody wants to come to Delhi any more.

Not only is there a dearth of foreign delegates (in fact after the demise of the Manila International Festival whose dates overlapped with the Indian Festival) there should have been many more, but getting a jury was also difficult. William Greaves, the American filmmaker dropped out at the last moment. Italian film maestro Michelangelo Antonioni agreed and then backed out. Bernardo Bertolucchi bowed out as well. Even jury member Safi Faye from Senegal reached Delhi a day after the festival began.

The I and B ministry should now reflect on the nature of film festivals in India. Perhaps we should be a little less ambitious and put our own house in order before we have the next one.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

'I Have Mixed Fact With Fiction'

Adoor Gopalakrishnan talks about his film Mukhamukham to SUNDAY

With Mukhamukham, the rather enigmatic Adoor Gopalakrishnan has emerged as perhaps the most important Indian film maker of the post-Satyajit Ray generation. It is not only Mr Gopalakrishnan's mastery of the cinematic language and his use of the meticulously worked out structure which makes this film a landmark in Indian cinema. The film raises fundamental, difficult questions in its quest to find out why the revolutionary or the spirit in all of us evaporates or dies. The film has become controversial and will continue to be a talking point because it depicts the disintegration of a revolutionary hero. Marxists in Kerala bitterly attacked Mr Gopalakrishnan and have called him "irresponsible" in what they consider to be an attack on the communist movement in the country. Some have even said that the Congress(I) should make sure that Mukhamukham is screened in West Bengal before the Assembly elections. The film works at many levels, and one of them is a very personal search for the death of the spirit. Crucial to understanding the film is a quote from Lenin used in the film: "The proletarian movement passes through various stages of growth at every stage, a set of people stagger, stop and are unable to continue the forward march...," The first part of the film is set in the decade ending in 1955—just before the Communist Party was voted to power in Kerala for the first time in the world in 1957. The second part begins in 1965, a little after the Communist Party split. Mr Gopalakrishnan's previous films are Swayamvaram, Kodiyettam, and Elippathayam which won the British Film Institute award.

Q: I found Mukhamukham to be even more powerful than your previous film Elippathayam. But you appear to be perturbed about the reaction to this film...

A: I think there were some problems with this film...once you understand the structure of the film, it is easier. This film works at two or three levels. The uppermost level: The exterior level shows a man coming back after ten years. It is seen as a straight narrative of slow, gradual disintegration and disillusionment. The next level can be seen in the second part of the film which deals with his return at a fictional level. But since I did not want the audience to get the impression that it is only fiction that they are watching, I treated it at a very realistic level. It is like when you have a dream: while you are dreaming you do not realise that it is a dream. Only when you wake up, do you realise this. If somebody is told that you are going to have a dream and you prepare for it then it ceases to be a dream, at both levels: the experience and the rumination level.

I wanted the audience to get the feeling that they are experiencing reality. It is very important to understand this film. But I fear that many people stopped at the exterior level. I have given a lot of suggestions in this film. The first suggestion is that the man is dead. Remember there is a raid in the party office. That whole sequence is about death: the attack by the police on the people which ends with the death of the proprietor. Death becomes a factual thing, an actuality. This is fictionalised by the reports. I have mixed fact with fiction throughout the film—fiction emerging as fact.

Courtesy: Kalakaumudi

Adoor Gopalakrishnan

After the contradictory reporting of the proprietor's death and even the motives behind the death all in the printed word, you see the open text-book of the young boy. Next you see the image of the fly. That is the key to the understanding of my film. As the boy is reading, you hear the sound of a night fly, a kind of moth. You hear the noise of its taking off, you do not really see the fly at that time. But you see the boy lifting his face from the book from that picture, from that image of the fly, upwards. And he is watching the fly. Then you hear the moth striking the ceiling and falling into the oil lamp—the kruk, kruk, kruk sound is there. The boy watches intently—I would even say watches cruelly this fly die in the oil lamp. I have purposely kept an oil lamp because it has so many associations. Especially, this particular oil lamp which is called nilavilaku. You are only supposed to speak the truth in front of it. Marriages take place before such a lamp. And in this house, only this lamp has been lit in the porch (poomukham). The boy at this point says to his mother: "You always tell lies..." This line is important because I am telling a lie—fiction.

Q: When did you first think of this film?

A: I wrote the first draft four years ago. The concept came from a personal experience of why the fire dies out in a man. I went in search of this. This kind of search cannot be done in a vacuum. There has to be a genuine background. I am mixing fiction and reality with my characters. If you look at the political situation, it is historically true and clear, factual and not manipulated. But that situation looks more fictional. The political situation which is so realistically portrayed in the film actually looks like fiction. The fact looks like fiction.

Q: Is this what people have objected so strongly to in your film?

A: Yes. I was truthful about the political situation. Talking about politics, I don't comment on it. I do not say that so and so is telling a lie or is wrong. That is why I do not call this a political film. People attack me on this point and ask why I hold that this is not a political film. I say that I am not taking sides. I am not promoting a political idea. I am seriously concerned no doubt, otherwise I would never have made the film.

Q: Yes, but why have most people seen your film as an attack on the Communist Party?

A: I am not responsible for the situation, the film starts with clay. This shows that I am going to mould. It goes through various stages that is an artist's freedom: to deal with basic material, the earth. The film is also in the beginning about the coming of the industrial revolution: wheels and chains are very prominent in the opening sequence in the tile factory with the kiln operation. And on the red of the kiln comes the slogan, Inquilab Zindabad. What you see next is the factory in the back ground and the flags in the foreground.

Q. Is the use of the colour red just a symbol?

A: It is the theme throughout.

Q: Why are all the women so fat in this film?

A: Why not? In Kerala—a lot of people objected. They said that the woman was too fat. I used her as a mother image. She is one of the seven characters who reconstruct the image of the man. Those who remember him are ordinary people from all walks of life, they are representative of the people who would love change to occur. But it is not there. In the second half, the conjuring of the image of this man takes place. For this you need a medium. Thus the woman. She has to look the archetypal woman: big, large. She mothers him in the second part. Because she is the one who gets him back. To call him back, even in fiction, you need some mothering. The trouble with this film is that I tried to make it look simple, approachable, but I now realise that this has also become the problem or the obstacle to an understanding of the film. If the film had looked very difficult or profound from the exterior, people would have looked for the structure that is there. But then, perhaps, the film would have become prohibitive. Even at a very plane level I wanted this film to mean something—that simplicity is achieved at great labour. A journalist wrote that my film is a documentary on tile manufacturing!

Q: This film is really for those who know cinema language.

A: You are right. I did not want it that way though. But very ordinary people in Kerala have liked the film. I had all these schemes in the film, but I did not want any of them to show.

Q: Could you compare the use of symbolism in Elippathayam and Mukhamukham?

A: Even my previous film needed a certain amount of education in the medium on the part of the audience, for it to be understood. That film was not accepted so easily. There are places where I have used dialogue as commentary. Throughout the film, image is mixed with the real. Remember the conversation in the party office: is the image of this man on the wall (the photograph) real? The camera moves from this image down to the object and back—that is a constantly evolving relationship—structurally, throughout the film. Moreover the concept of letters, whether it is graffiti or a newspaper. I have used this both as a statement, I have used the graphics of the letters. Inquilab Zindabad is used as a chant—almost a religious chant.

Q: The structure of the film appears to be very important in understanding it.

A: Well, the second part of the film is really about if he were to come back. The man who emerges in the second part is constructed from the threads in the first part. In the first part he drinks alcohol as medicine for his stomach ache. In the second part he becomes an alcoholic. Then there is his attitude towards his wife and child. For somebody who is so devoted to a pursuit, whether it is literature or culture or cinema, the passion becomes all-consuming.

The film starts with clay. This shows that I am going to mould. It goes through various stages that is an artist's freedom:to deal with basic material, the earth.

Q: What about the letters which Sreedharan keeps burning.

A: The first part of the film is happening today: The political situation especially against the Kerala background. I mean the ordinary people who do not belong to any political party. There are very sincere party followers of this idealism. The ordinary people are absolutely confused about what is happening to the leftist movement.

Q: Could you talk about the use of silence in your film?

A: It has to do with the interrelation of shots. For instance, when the boy, Sudhakaran, comes after having been dismissed from the party and stands in the courtyard, it seems almost like a court. The scene is composed like that. The camera looks at him from above, and he says: "Did you hear that I have been expelled?" He should be the judge, but then that is a comment on himself. The camera then moves towards him when he says: "There are many like me who are dissatisfied, but we will not resist, we will fight." Then the camera moves to Sreedharan. Sudhakaran's words continue, they become commentary as he says: "We will identify the traitors and we will unmask them and tear the masks from the faces of the enemy of the people." The word mask is important because the glow on Sreedharan's face slowly vanishes. It becomes green and dark. The face is absolutely mask-like. Then he begins to look for money. He wants to ask his wife for money but he is not sure that she will give him the money. It is not stealing—he wants to tell his wife who is bathing at that moment. But this act becomes an act of stealing when his son is punished for the theft. This man's very inactivity becomes an act of guilt, of crime.

Q: Is this your best film?

A: I would say that I consider it my most important work.

Q: The actor S. Ganga who plays Sreedharan is a new face. He is amazing.

A: He is a novice. He does dubbing for films and acts on stage once in a while. One of the reasons forchoosing him is that he is squint-eyed. He appears more like an enigma because you do not really know where he is looking—and he has a fantastic voice. I asked him to come home every Sunday. I asked him not to shave. I took photographs of his growing beard and made an album. Then I studied his face and physiognomy. And then we began to film. In the second part he has no shirt. In the courtyard scene after his arrival he has already become an object, people murmur in front of him. The person magnified, ceases to be a person, he becomes an object. This shot is taken from all sides.

Q: Could we return to the attack on your film by Marxists?

A: The Marxists accused me of being irresponsible. They said I intended to tarnish the image of the party. When those who are considered to be good theoreticians of Marxism react in so pedestrian a manner it is upsetting. Marxism should really help you. It is not just a political philosophy but an aesthetic philosophy as well. My response is that I am not blind and I am not anti-communist. An anti-communist approach would be blind.

Interviewed by Madhu Jain

BOOK EXTRACT

Niven, Gable and Hollywood

David Niven, the wellknown Hollywood actor who died in 1983, describes his early days in Hollywood and his friendship with Clark Gable, the then reigning matinee idol, in an extract from Niven, published recently by Hamish Hamilton (distributed in India by UBS Publishers' Distributors 5, Ansuri Road, New Delhi 110 002). This is a compilation of his two books Bring on the Empty Horses and The Moon's a Balloon.

A blond sunburned fuzz covered his muscular forearms and his pot-belly hung over the top of his pants. Gross, pig-eyed and rude, Chet Liebert was a loathsome human being but he had one great asset—a 45-foot spear-fishing boat named Konig; he also had an undeniable talent in his chosen profession, and by the other charter-boat skippers working out of Balboa, California, he was grudgingly acknowledged to be the most successful They had no opinion but to bestow this accolade upon him because every year he caught more broadbill and marlin swordfish than they did.

He kept his huge frame topped up with beer, swore endlessly in a heavy Dutch accent and never by any chance gave credit where credit was due. In an effort to keep deck-hands, he paid generously and this attracted me to him like a moth to a flame. As a two dollar and fifty cents a day Hollywood 'extra', who only worked spasmodically, I was in no position to be choosy so I swallowed the heavy insults and eagerly grabbed the six dollars he gave me for ten hours of dangerous, dirty and back breaking work as deck-hand 'spotter', spearman, hauler, gutter and swabber. When we were out spearing the giant broadbill swordfish for sale in the market, I took those six bucks, but I also gratefully pocketed the generous tips that were slipped into my hand when Konig was chartered by private individuals in the more exciting and less exacting pursuit with rod and reel of the blue and white marlin.

'Okay, so you're late,' said Liebert when I showed up for work at five o'clock one morning. 'Get her cleaned up from top to bottom, gut a dozen flying fish and check two sets of gear and the teasers—make sure the head is spotless too, Goddammit, becos we've a charter today and the guy is bringing a broad with him, they'll be here at six thirty and they'll need breakfast so see that the coffee's ready and stand by with ham and eggs and all the crap.' 'They're picture people,' he added, 'so keep your goddammed trap shut about being a lousy phoney actor and get on with the job.'

Liebert had a sneaking regard for me. I suspected, because on the very first day I had worked for him, he had slipped on the wet, pitching, gut-slick flooring and had misjudged the gaffing of a two-hundred-pound

Niven with Ava Gardner in The Little Hut

Niven (centre) with Prince Rainier and Princess Grace marlin which an exhausted oil executive had finally brought alongside after a slashing, fighting, plunging three-hour battle. The giant fish with its last gasp had managed to spew out the hook and the gaff not planted, was free and sliding down tail first into the dark, blue water. In a moment of madness, I had grabbed the disappearing sword with my left hand removing most of the skin off my palm and, with my right, I had punched the poor brute in its large saucer eyeball thereby paralysing it for the split second which Liebert needed to sink the gaff. Not a word was said but there had been a tiny flicker of recognition in the puffy red pig-eyes of my employer.

By six o'clock on a still and cloudless morning, Konig, as ordered, was swabbed down, mopped, dried and polished and by the time a large open Packard turned on to the quay, the aroma of good coffee was rising from the galley.

'Okay, now go over and fetch their gear, and don't get movie struck,' he added.

When I approached the Packard I saw what he meant—the girl was blonde and willowy with a fresh, open, fun-loving face. She wore a blue reefer jacket, red slacks and her yachting cap was tilted at a rather exotic angle over her right eye. I don't think I noticed what the large, muscular man was wearing—he was opening the boot of the car and his back was toward me, but when he turned round, smiled and said, 'Hi, it looks like a good day,' I nearly fell into the harbour. The man was Clark Gable.

I relieved him of rods, various professional-looking tackle boxes, a large ice bucket, a bottle of Scotch whisky and watched him stride purposefully towards Konig—the blonde held on to his arm.

'Okay, Chet—bait 'em up and let's go,' he yelled happily as he leaped aboard.

We had a lucky day. Gable landed two big, blue marlin and was once broken after an hour's struggle with a gigantic, leaping Mako shark. We also found a school of hungry, yellowtail tuna which were striking at everything in sight and even the blonde amid shrieks of excitement landed a couple of twenty pounders. She also became rather maudlin towards late afternoon when she hooked a dolphin on a white feather lure and decided that it was the soul of a dead sailor. .the whisky was almost empty by then. She pawed Gable a great deal.

The deck-hand was working at full throttle throughout the day and when not perched uncomfortably in the crosstrees of the mast looking for fins or tell-tale swirls, I was baiting hooks, gutting and cleaning the catch, making sandwiches or mixing drinks.

When Gable heard my voice, he immediately pinpointed my accent and voiced a mild curiosity as to why I was there and doing what I was doing. Liebert gave me a long, hard look as I prepared to answer but suddenly the first blue marlin hit and forty-five minutes later when he triumphantly unstrapped his shoulder harness, Gable's curiosity had vanished.

Six months later, in the Spring of 1935, I landed something myself—a small contract with Samuel Goldwyn; the doors of Hollywood began to open, and I met Gable again. The iron man from Cadiz, Ohio, was looking rather trapped in white tie and tails, but the occasion demanded his discomfort...it was the Academy Awards Presentation Dinner—the annual handing out of the early Oscars.

The year before he had won one himself for his performance in It Happened One Night and his acceptance speech was the shortest on record, two words—"Thank You " That night Hollywood history had been made. Gable had been loaned by MGM to the despised Harry Cohn and his struggling company, Columbia, as a punishment for intransigence in turning down too many mediocre scripts. Claudette Colbert was being similarly chastised for the same reason by her studio—Paramount, but between them they had outsmarted their bosses and persuaded the brilliant director, Frank Capra, to direct the picture for which Cohn had borrowed them. As a result, Claudette, Capra and Gable all collected golden statuettes, It Happened One Night was voted Best Picture of the Year, and Columbia Pictures entered the big league.

Now a year later, the Academy Awards had come around again and Hollywood—still very much a village—was honouring its own with its strange tribal rites. Gable did not win this time though his picture Mutiny on the Bounty came out on top. Excitement ran high among the two hundred tribesmen and women who filled the private banqueting room downstairs at the Ambassador Hotel. A demure Bette Davis was proclaimed the winner for her performance in Dangerous and Victor McLaglen (who to everybody's delight belched loudly when receiving his prize) was voted Best Actor for his portrayal in The Informer.

It was a vintage year and the competition for votes must have been fierce because among other classic offerings that night were Gary Cooper in The Lives of a Bengal Lancer, Fred Astaire in Top Hat, W.C. Fields in David Copperfield and Garbo in Anna Karenina. Less successful in all departments had been the Warner Brothers' entry—A Midsummer Night's Dream with James Cagney as Bottom and Mickey Rooney as Puck. For the premiere in Beverly Hills, an elaborate programme had been presented to each member of the audience, embossed on the cover of which were four golden plaques, each containing a well-known profile—the three Warner Brothers and William Shakespeare.

Gable was seated at another table with a party from his studio—Irving Thalberg, the producer of Mutiny on the Bounty, Thalberg's wife Norma Shearer, Jean Harlow, William Powell, Joan Crawford and others. Ria, Gable's second wife, was also there and I looked at her with interest. Several years older than her husband, she looked very calm and distinguished and Gable was smiling across the table at her in the conspiratorial way happily married couples signal mutual boredom at dull parties. I was remembering with pleasure the unaffected charm and friendliness Gable had dispensed aboard Konig, when suddenly, he glanced directly at me. For a moment he looked puzzled then my face must have clicked into place because he waved, smiled a friendly smile and mimed the hooking of a big fish. I nodded and waved back and after the presentations were over he came to Goldwyn's table and shook my hand.

'Good to see you again,' he said, 'what are you doing here...trying to get Sam to go tuna fishing?'

I felt embarrassed at first telling it to 'The King' as he was known throughout Hollywood, but bathed in the warmth of the great man's personality, I relaxed and

Clark Gable in Mutiny on the Bounty

Clarke Gable: MGM's blue-eyed boy explained that I had changed my job and had lately landed a contract with Goldwyn.

'Well, that's just great', he exploded, 'lots of luck, kid, and don't forget—the first thirty years are the hardest!' Then he added quite seriously '...and don't give up fishing—you'll find it's a great help sometimes.'

When he had made the rounds of our table, followed everywhere by looks of great affection, he spoke to me once more.

'I'm moving over to the Goldwyn lot for the next one so I'll hope to see you around...we can forget about making pictures for a while and yak about steelhead—is that a deal?'

'Fine,' I said, delighted at the prospect of seeing him again and not unaware of the soaring of my personal stock among my high-powered dinner companions.

Several weeks later, Goldwyn gave me my first speaking part: the role of a Cockney sailor in Barbary Coast. It consisted of one line; thrown out of the window of a waterfront brothel in San Francisco, as I sailed past the Madam, I was called upon to say—"Orl rite—I'm goin." Then as I lay face down in several inches of mud, the two stars of the picture, Miriam Hopkins and Joel McCrea, accompanied by several donkeys and a posse of vigilantes walked over the top of me.

Gable was, by now, working at the Goldwyn studio making The Call of the Wild and on the morning of my big moment he, the greatest star in the Hollywood firmament, took the time and the trouble to walk over to the Back Lot to wish good luck to an unknown beginner. He also insisted on stills being taken of the two of us and the Goldwyn publicity department gleefully grabbed the golden opportunity to rub off a little of 'The King's' glamour onto their nameless charge.

Several times I visited Gable while The Call of the Wild was being made and I soon discovered that he had many other things to talk about besides fishing and hunting. Certainly, more than anything, he enjoyed the

David Niven with Elizabeth Taylor

Great Outdoors, and just as surely he felt uncomfortable at formal parties and despised the Hollywood hostesses and their 'success lists'.

'They only invite me because at the moment I am on top of the heap,' he said, 'but when I fall on my ass, they'll just move someone else up a notch and I'll go down to the bottom of the pile.'

One January day he did more than talk about the big fighting sea-going, rainbow trout of Oregon, his excited voice came down the telephone—'Hey! Let's go!...I've just been talking to some pals who have a fishing camp on the Rogue—the steelhead are running!'

'I don't have a rod,' I said feebly.

'Forget it,' said Clark...'I've got everything—I'll pick you up at midday, we'll spend the night in 'Frisco and be at Grant's Pass by tomorrow afternoon.'

He was a fast and dedicated driver and he made it clear that he could do without small talk because it ruined his concentration. This was perfectly all right with me and I sat back and revelled in the glories of two-thirds of California. At Grant's Pass, where he stayed overnight at the fishing lodge, we were joined in the cold dark of the following morning by the guide who came with his squaw to fetch us, a squat, unsmiling, flaccid-faced Indian who smelled heavily of spirits, and was, according to Clark, the best man on the river. He was also the worst driver in the neighbourhood and in the semi-gloom of that freezing winter dawn, his dilapidated Chevvy, unbalanced by trailing a heavy fishing skiff behind it, swung terrifyingly round icy mountain bends. Clark watched me averting my eyes from the roaring river several hundred feet below, noted my tight smiles and high-pitched conversation and correctly diagnosed my condition as one of abject terror.

'Don't worry,' he said. 'He'll make up for it when he goes on the river and his wife, thank God, drives us back.' He indicated the almost totally round and equally smelly lady who was huddled, unspeaking and blanketed, beside her erratic husband.

As the sky began to lighten, we slithered down a winding track and came to rest on a sandy beach between towering grey, pine-topped cliffs. There we manhandled the skiff into the water, loaded it and watched as the spherical wife took her husband's place behind the wheel and disappeared in a barrage of flying gravel up the almost perpendicular hillside, to meet us at dusk miles down river.

Gable was wearing a heavy chequered Macinaw and his 'lucky' long peaked cap. He had not bothered to shave and a heavy black stubble was discernible in the growing light—it was bitterly cold.

'What are you giving us for breakfast, Chuck?' he asked the Indian.

'Small trout fried in butter,' said the unsmiling one, 'but you've got to catch 'em before I can cook 'em, don't you?

'Sure thing, Happy,' Gable grinned. 'Let's get going.'

The river was broad and sluggish where we put in but the Indian knew the likely pools and using a wet fly, we soon had half a dozen beautiful brook trout about eight inches long. We pulled over to a sandbank and while Gable and I collected dry driftwood, the guide, with a few quick flashes of his hunting knife, cleaned our catch.

On the East ridge high above us, the sun was backlighting the snow-covered firs. They looked as though they were on fire but down on the sandbank it was still well below zero and we huddled gratefully around the fire, sniffing the coffee and watching the deft movements of the Indian. A family of deer, seven of them, came down to drink at the riverbank opposite, a pastoral scene that was rudely shattered when an eagle flashed out of the sky and picked up a large rattlesnake from the rocks beside them. With his prey in his talons the great bird spiralled upward gaining height till up near the ridge the sun caught them and for a long time we could see the writhing silver underbelly of the reptile flashing out distress signals.

Niven with Susan Hayward, co-winners of the 1958 Oscar

Clark was a true sport fisherman, and was unconcerned about catching his limit of 'meat', a comparatively easy achievement during the winter run when the silvery, twenty-pound trout slashed with a vivid scarlet streak at their sides after years away in the big ocean, were making their way in thousands far up the river to spawn in the self-same gravel whence they had come. After a big January rain, the barriers of flotsam had been washed from the river, the snow 'melt' from the mountains had augmented the torrent and the rapids between the pools were a roaring, rocketing menace.

The big pools were full of fish and the air was so cold we had to dip our rods constantly in the water to free the 'guides' of ice—it was very exciting. The fish were taking single salmon eggs washed free from the high spawning grounds but Clark spurned the conventional use of these and we cast with brightly coloured salmon flies ...a much trickier operation. Clark had two rods, a beautiful English Hardy which he lent me and a dream of a Cross which he used with great effect himself.

You learn a lot about a man in four days of strenuous fishing and four nights of medium to heavy drinking. There was not a phoney bone in Gable's body. Round the log fire, or drifting down calm broad reaches between the tumbling rock-strewn rapids of the aptly named Rogue, he would talk frankly and unemotionally about Hollywood, and the people who controlled it.

The curvaceous blonde comedienne, Thelma Todd, had just been found dead in her beach front restaurant near Santa Monica. Found dead in the most mysterious circumstances and for days the newspapers had hinted darkly at foul play and gangster connections.

'Thelma didn't read the small print,' said Clark.

'The small print?' I queried.

'Yes—we all have a contract with the public...in us they see themselves or what they would like to be. On the screen, and in our private lives, we are the standards by which they measure their own ideals of everything—sex, guts, humour, stupidity, cowardice, crumminess—you name it. They love to put us on a pedestal and worship us and form fan clubs and write thousands of letters telling us how great we are. But they've read the small print and most of us haven't—they expect us to pay the price for it all...we have to "get it" in the end! So, when we get knocked off by gangsters, like Thelma did, or get hooked on booze or dope or get ourselves thrown out of the business because of scandals or because we just grow old...that's the pay-off and the public feels satisfied...Yeah, it's a good idea to read that small print.'

Clark had a moderate opinion of studio heads:

'They're bastards,' he said flatly, 'they encourage people to be larger than life, they'll give 'em anything, take any crap from them provided they interest the public and the public pays to see them, but the moment they slip—oh! brother! Look at the kids on our Lot at Metro now, Garland, Taylor, Gardner, Rooney, great kids all of 'em and loaded with talent but they'll probably ruin 'em all. Right now they can do anything they like, show up late, keep everyone waiting, go home when they want to, but God help them if the public stops coming...they'll pull the rug out from under 'em all over town.'

I asked him how it felt to be in the No. 1 spot in the whole industry.

'Well,' he laughed, 'as sure as hell there's only one place I can go from where they've got me now! So I just go along with Tracy's formula and hope for the best.'

'Tracy's formula?'

'Sure—get there on time, know the jokes, say them the best way you can, take the money and go home at six o'clock.'

John Huston directing Niven and Deborah Kerr in Casino Royale

Gable talked about Hollywood and everything connected with it but he remained completely unimpressed by it. He certainly never took his success for granted.

'Look,' he said, 'so they call me the goddamn "King" at the moment but there are dozens of people warming up in the wings and anyway I'm just out in front of a team, that's all. Metro have half a dozen people, top writers, whose only job is to find the best possible properties for me, things that I fit into with the least risk of falling on my ass...that way I remain valuable to them and everyone's happy—for the moment

'Don't ever let them kick you around,' he warned. 'They squeeze people dry and then drop them ..when you start to fade they put you into 'skid' pictures so you'll turn them down and they can put you on suspension and get you off the payroll...be tough with them if you get up there, because it's the only language they understand and that's the only place where you can use it. Remember you're dealing with people who believe that a 2,000 dollar a week writer is guaranteed to turn out better stuff than a guy who is only asking 750...

'Most executives at the big studios have no guts—they're so busy holding on to their jobs they never stick their necks out. Know how Lubitsch found out the other day that he was no longer head of Paramount? From his goddamn masseur for Christ's sake! This guy had been rubbing down the studio brass and they all told him what was happening but nobody had the guts to tell Ernst to his face that he was through.'

Next to fishing and hunting, Clark loved to play golf and we played a great deal together. He was a splendid sight at Pebble Beach, his favourite course—he didn't walk between shots...he strode. He had a fearsome slice which he never completely corrected so we bent the rules slightly so that he could continue to play when his ball had drifted out of bounds on to the beach and roars of laughter would rise from below as he hacked happily away among the seaweed, the crabs and the small pools.

He was a doughty opponent but he lacked concentration and in an important foursome match I gleefully saw him falter because my partner was Group Captain Douglas Bader, the legless R.A.F. fighter pilot.

Douglas visited me in California soon after World War II. He had come out to tour the hospitals and encouraged hundreds of double amputees who were wondering what the future could possibly hold for them. He did untold good recounting to them his own story of being shot down and baling out over France, where he buckled one of his artificial limbs. The German Commandant of the prison camp in which he soon found himself, was so impressed by Bader that it was agreed that, at a pre-arranged time, one Spitfire could fly over the camp and drop him a new leg. When the leg arrived, Bader thanked the Commandant, put it on and that night he escaped.

At dawn, he was recaptured hobbling gamely along ten miles from the camp. Thereafter, both his legs were taken away from him at night and locked up in the guardroom.

Playing golf against the legless Bader, as Gable soon discovered, was a hazardous undertaking and knowing of Clark's feeble concentration, I was quietly confident of the outcome.

Bader's first 'ploy' manifested itself on the second tee. Just as Clark was about to drive, Bader, with a noise like a machine-gun, knocked the ashes out of his pipe against his artificial thigh. On the fifth green, he winked at me and tightened a little wheel in his knee, then by moving very slightly just as Clark pulled back the head of his

David Niven (extreme right) in Around the World in Eighty Days

WELCOME DELEGATES!

Wishing

XXIXTH IFKT CONGRESS

New Delhi

A Grand Success

KOHINOOR

Knitting Mills

CALCUTTA-700007

BOOK EXTRACT

putter he produced a high penetrating mouse squeak. Thereafter, a jittery Gable and his unnerved partner never felt completely secure and Bader and I coasted to an easy victory.

Gable never spoke much about his wives; he felt no urge to unburden his domestic problems on his friends and he was strangely fatalistic when his marriages broke up, which they did with great regularity. In fact he was strangely fatalistic about everything. He never went out of his way to make men friends, he reckoned that he was what he was, people could take him or leave him, and if they preferred to leave him—that was perfectly okay with him. Above all, unlike so many big stars, he felt absolutely no need to bolster his ego by surrounding himself with stooges and sycophants so his circle of friends was small and independent.

It is difficult to paint a fascinating picture of a man whom nobody seemed to dislike. As David Selznick remarked during the filming of Gone With The Wind—'Oh, Gable has enemies all right—but they all like him!'

However, wherever there is competition there is jealousy and where there is jealousy the 'knockers' will knock. So in Hollywood people occasionally nudged each other and said 'Gable only likes older women.'

It was the understatement of the century—Gable

Clark Gable (right) in Gone with the Wind

loved all women—older, younger, blondes, brunettes and redheads he loved the lot.

True, his first wife Josephine Dillon happened to be twelve years his senior, and his second wife, Ria, five years more than that but Carole Lombard, Sylvia Fairbanks and Kay Williams when they became numbers three, four and five, were all in the junior league.

It was said by the knockers that Josephine, who was a well educated drama teacher, had 'invented' Gable, and the same source of bitchery passed round the happy word that Ria had paid for him to have his teeth capped. Clark just laughed when he heard this—'my Mom and Dad invented me,' he said, 'and L.B. Mayer paid for my teeth.'

Clark was not really stingy with money· he was 'careful'. With the whisky bottle, however, he was always lavish and for years I was amazed at the amount he could consume with no apparent effect.

Gable said that acting did not come naturally to him—'I worked like a son of a bitch to learn a few tricks and I fight like a steer to avoid getting stuck with parts I can't play.'

As an unsuccessful Broadway actor, he made three safaris into the Hollywood jungle. If the first trip in 1924 was a flop...(he worked only in small theatrical roles around Los Angeles or occasionally as an extra in the Studios)...the second was total disaster—he didn't work at all. Back again on Broadway, he finally smelled success when the egomanic George M. Cohan cast him as the lead in Gambling but after the opening in Philadelphia, the sweet smell changed rapidly to something more unattractive. Cohan decided that he would like to play the part himself and fired Gable. Understandably short on self-confidence, Gable thereafter ricocheted off a succession of short-term flops till one day he was offered a part in a Los Angeles stage production of The Last Mile and his third and ultimate safari began. He never agreed that his subsequent breakthrough into the Hollywood big time was the glamorous rocket-propelled affair claimed by the MGM publicity department and always gave credit for it to two people—Lionel Barrymore and Joan Crawford.

Barrymore got him a test for his native boy in Bird of Paradise.

Barrymore directed the test himself and according to Gable—'They curled my hair, then they stripped me and gave me a G-string, a prop man stuck a knife in my G-string which scared hell out of me in case his hand slipped then he stuck a goddam hibiscus behind my ear and told me to creep through the bushes.'

Irving Thalberg, the boy wonder of MGM, saw the result and told Barrymore—'You can't put this man in a picture; look at his ears...like a bat!' Nevertheless, he was finally hired by MGM to play a milkman in a

David Niven (second from right) in The Guns of Navarone

Constance Bennett picture and a small contract followed which brought in its wake the all important contribution by Joan Crawford. She bullied and cajoled the studio till Gable was given a major part in Dance, Fools, Dance—a tough hard-boiled character. His success was instantaneous. The critics raved and the movie audience found a new hero and, for what it's worth, both Crawford and Gable always vehemently denied that their friendship was anything but platonic.

I have hinted that Clark was a little close with a buck but this was only in connection with things his honest Dutch-German blood persuaded him were extravagant or unnecessary. For instance, none of the many women in his life were ever seen festooned with goodies.

Divorce, however, was something else again. Gable never skimped on that and to obtain his freedom from Josephine, Ria and Sylvia, he, almost without arguing, was practically wiped out three times. Each time he was divorced, he issued the same hopeful statement:—'I don't intend to marry again—ever...' but each time he soon forgot what he had said.

One of the interim ladies to whom he was attached for a while observed, rather sourly, 'Of course, Clark never really married anyone. A number of women married him...he just went along with the gag.'

If you're into fitness, Bullworker puts it all together in only 5 minutes a day:

"Looking for a fitness programme that's fast, easy and gets results right away?" asks fitness expert Bob Breton. "Bullworker puts it all together. In just 5 minutes a day you can give your body a complete fitness workout: shoulders, back, forearms, chest, abdomen and arms.

It's fast. Each exercise takes only 7 seconds, once a day.

It's easy: Any man between 15 and 65 in good general health can run through the whole programme without getting tired.

You can see your progress right from the very first day on the built-in Powermeter guage. After two to three weeks of training, most men can expect to measure extra 2 to 5 cms of muscles on their shoulders, chest and biceps—and 2 to 5 cms less flab around the middle.

And that's just the start: there are specialized exercises for building-up or trimming down any part of your body you want to. What's more, since Bullworker training is progressive, you perform better each time. Yet the training always seems easy since with every workout your strength increases by about 1%—that's an increase of up to 50% in the first three months

FREE with BULLWORKER 3

BULLWORKER
FITNESS EQUIPMENTS
Mehta Mahal, 15 Mathew Road, Bombay 400 004

ACT NOW! MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

BULLWORKER 263-EN SY-55

Mehta Mahal 10th floor, 15 Mathew Road, Bombay 400 004.

Please rush me BULLWORKER for 14-day FREE HOME TRIAL. If I am not completely delighted with the results, I may return everything by expiry of trial period immediate refund (less postage and forwarding charges)

Please tick ☑ appropriate box.

☐ Send by Registered Post Parcel. I am sending Rs 314/ by Draft/ I.P.O./M.O. No . . dated . . . . . (Payable to Bullworker Pvt. Ltd.)

☐ Send by V.P.P. I promise to pay postman Rs 314/- on delivery.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

..... Pin ..... Signature .....

A Thing of Joy

Most books that set out to provide an overview of the Olympic Games and which include, of necessity, a variety of photographs, can be dismissed as belonging to the usual genre of coffee-table books: tastefully laid out, pleasing to the eye, but not containing much to stimulate the intellect. If the Wills Book of Excellence: The Olympics does not fall into the above category, it is simply because of the great care that has gone into the writing, selection and arrangement of the material contained therein. Though the design is calculated to please the most discerning, there are also facts and personal glimpses aplenty, with the occasional intriguing tidbit thrown in to please the trivia addict.

Throughout the book's 11 chapters, the underlying theme of the quest for excellence, as exemplified by the performances in the Games, is subtly stressed and this serves as a useful connecting link to bind together what would otherwise have been a random collection of data. As it is, the book's weakest parts are those where this theme of excellence is not given due emphasis, for then the reader is faced with bald facts and figures with no point of reference.

The book attempts to chronicle the high watermarks of the quadriennial display of athletic prowess that is Baron Pierre de Coubertin's legacy to the world. Instead of specifically dwelling on the details of every single Olympiad (such treatment is best left to books of record) it touches upon the flashes of brilliance and the continuing drama of human endeavour—in terms of physical as well as mental determination—that separate the Olympics from all other universal sporting contests.

The chapter on Pierre de Coubertin throws light on a hitherto unemphasised aspect: his initial attempts to revive the Olympics, the teething troubles of the International Olympic Committee and the atmosphere at the first modern Games at Athens, 1896 (where American James Connolly earned the distinction of becoming the first modern Olympic winner by clearing 13.71 metres in the triple jump event).

Interestingly, the roots of the commercialism and financial difficulties that plague the organisers of the Games today are traced as far back as the 1904 Olympics at St Louis when de Coubertin, in an attempt to overcome the hurdle of adequate finance, linked the Games with the St Louis World Fair. The result was, in the words of one spectator, "a sporting contest (and) a fair where there were sports, where there was cheating, where monsters were exhibited for a joke." De Coubertin himself admitted later that the move was a commercialisation of the Olympic spirit but also added that he had no other choice.

A particularly fascinating chapter is the one that deals with "the difference between gold and silver," which recounts the photo-finish finales and the contests in which only marginal differences could separate the winners from the runners-up. The story of how Russian gymnast Yelena Davydova snatched the gold from Nadia Comaneci at the 1980 Moscow Games, winning by just 0.075 points, deservedly earns a place here, as well as the now legendary Coe-Ovett encounters.

The most heartening part of the book is the section which describes the struggles of the people with special handicaps to win through to success. The tales of the attempts to overcome physical as well as psychological stumbling blocks makes inspiring reading. Among others, there is the story of Shelley Mann, who once had to struggle even to lift her arm out of the swimming pool. She went on to establish an Olympic record in the 100m butterfly event. Also recounted is the ill-starred story of Konrad Frieherr von Wangenheim, a German equestrian. On the second day of the three-day equestrian team event at the Berlin Games, his horse stumbled and Konrad, who was thrown off, broke his collar bone. Aware that if he dropped out the German team would be disqualified, he remounted and cleared the remaining 32 obstacles flawlessly. The next day, his horse reared and toppled backwards, falling on its rider. Konrad, who was riding with a bound arm, somehow managed to remount, urge his steed to action again, and both horse and rider completed the event without further misadventures. The German team went on to win the gold medal.

Wills Book of Excellence: The Olympics, published by Orient Longman Ltd 17, Chittaranjan Avenue Calcutta 700072 Price Rs 100

Carl Lewis flashes the smile of triumph as he crosses the 100 metre finish line

The oft-told story of the 'black gazelle', Wilma Rudolph, is also recapitulated with feeling. Polio, atrophied limbs, cardio-vascular disorders, third degree burns: nothing seems to have deterred these men and women whose strongest asset proved to be their implacable will to succeed.

A separate chapter is devoted to providing an overview of the Indian presence at the Games, and this fills a long existing hiatus. Expectedly, the hockey performances are discussed at length, beginning from India's hockey debut at Amsterdam, 1928. This team did not concede a single goal and scored 28 times in five outings. The ups and downs of India's subsequent hockey appearances till they captured the gold at Moscow in 1980 are then recapitulated. India's 1984 debacle is reserved for the final chapter on the Los Angeles Games.

Apart from this and the Milkha Singh story, other topics in this chapter are touched upon perfunctorily. In particular, the wrestling events (where Maharashtra's K. D. Jadhav won the bronze in 1952: independent India's sole individual medal winning performance) could have been given more prominence as India has been a hair's breadth away from a medal more than once. The reasons for India's abysmal performance in general are dismissed by stating that the organised, sustained effort that is required is lacking. A further analysis would have proved most helpful here.

The memorial at Athens containing Pierre de Coubertin's heart

Jesse Owens

Nurmi (right) holds off Ritola's challenge in the 5000 metres

The chapter on the Los Angeles Games begins well, capturing the heady mix of commercialism and competitiveness that was the hallmark of the events there. However, the chapter in toto is disappointing as the linguistic elegance of the rest of the book seems to be lost in the maze of statistics. Also lacking are the personal glimpses that abound elsewhere in the book. The book ends befittingly with a reference to P.T. Usha's glorious performance in the 400m hurdles.

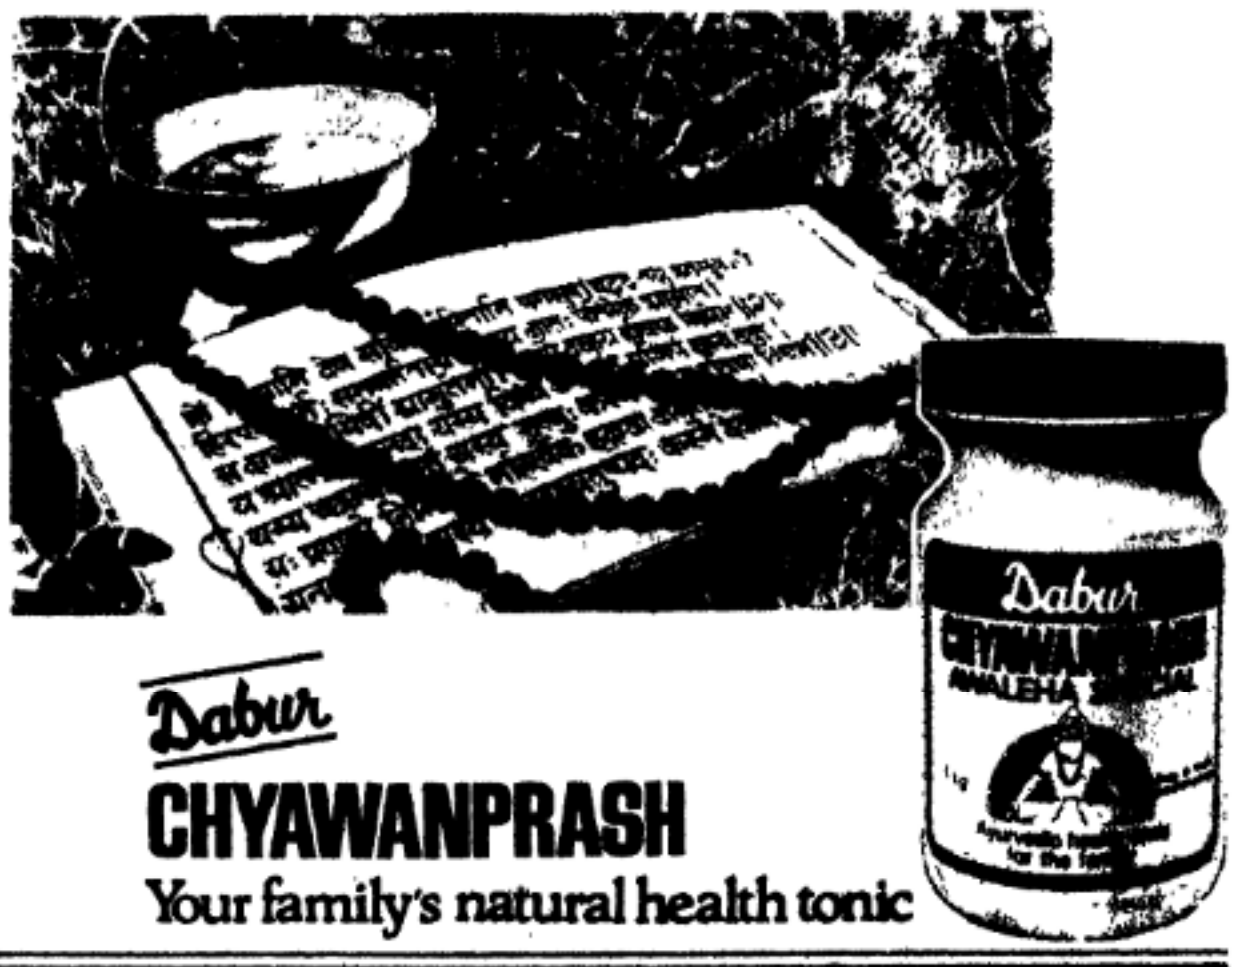
The photographs are carefully selected and capture the essence of the Olympics. Perhaps to steer clear of controversy, the writer does not attempt a critical and separate analysis of the dangers of crass commercialisation, the use of drugs to improve performances and the politicisation that are threatening to wreck the spirit and even the existence of the modern Games

Lokesh Sharma, the 23-year-old author, and sports reporter of The Telegraph has enriched sports literature, with this well-researched work. Not that everything about the Olympics is said in this book.

Indian book designing has also reached new heights with the eye-catching visualisation of Sunil Sil. By sponsoring the book the ITC has done what Indian publishers have not been able to do. This, incidentally is the first of a series on different sports that ITC is sponsoring, the next one being on tennis.

One wishes such a treat was served hot. The book is a little too early for the next Olympics and a little late for the last one. But then, as the saying goes, it is better late than never. And a thing of beauty is a joy foreover.

Sanjay Sipahimalani



Dabur Chyawanprash

The 3000 year old recipe of the rishis—recreated!

Our rishis of old knew many secrets about nature and how it could benefit the human body. One of these was a special formulation called Chyawanprash.

About 3000 years later, Dabur recreated this formulation in Dabur Chyawanprash.

Made from more than 40 natural ingredients like fresh amla, dashmool and ashtwarg, Dabur Chyawanprash builds up your family's resistance to many diseases and keeps them in good health.

Dabur

CHYAWANPRASH

Your family's natural health tonic

OBM/9487/R

BIHAR

Police Massacre Harijans

Naxalites blamed for the killings

Even as the whole country settled down to enjoy New Year's day, the harijan villagers of Kaithi Bigaha under the Obra police station in Aurangabad district in Bihar prepared for what would, for many of them, be the last day of their lives.

It all began on 31 December 1984. Around 30 harijan villagers from Kaithi Bigaha had assembled outside their village to protest against the rape of the daughter-in-law of Kanhai Sahu, a fellow harijan, by Shiv Kumar Sharma, the son of the Bhumihar landlord of Makhra, the adjacent village. This was not the first time the harijans had held such a protest meeting. Since 1981, the harijans have been demanding minimum wages from the landlords. Only this time, they added a new dimension to their meeting by raising their voices against the rape of their women.

The landlords at first tried to obstruct the harijans from holding the meeting. When the harijans proved to be adamant, the landlords sought the help of the local police. The police first surrounded the harijan village and two of them went inside one of the houses to investigate. The women protested against the police's entry and a scuffle followed. By then, say the eyewitnesses, the landlord and his men had sprinkled kerosene on the harijan huts and set them on fire. As the harijans rushed out to save themselves, the police let loose a hail of bullets killing five harijans on the spot. Another eight harijans were arrested by the policemen.

The police however claimed that they had fired in self-defence and that the dead harijans were Naxalites. "They were Naxalites and were killed in the retaliatory firing that lasted for 30 hours," said C.D. Singh, the sub-inspector of Obra police station. He continued: "Two police constables were killed and the district superintendent of police D.S. Prasad had a narrow escape. The harijans fired indiscriminately from inside their mud houses which were fortified," said Mr Singh. The Obra police have filed cases against the harijans for arson, dacoity and arms snatching.

The recovery of three rifles by the police has strengthened their suspicions that the harijans are Naxalites. The police explanation of the harijans being armed extremists has too many discrepancies to be convincing. The fact that the policemen set fire to the huts clearly disproves the story of the encounter with Naxalites. The police could hardly have burnt the huts after dousing them with kerosene if Naxalites were firing from inside. This correspondent also saw no signs of any fortifications around the 30 now deserted huts.

Though the police claim that blood spattered police uniforms were recovered from a harijan hut and have been sent to Aurangabad where the state director general of police (DGOP) would inspect them, it has been learnt that the DGOP is yet to arrive in Aurangabad. The uniforms have not been dispatched either. Instead they are still in Obra and are being used by the policemen there Moreover, the harijans killed have no criminal records as claimed by the police

K M Kisan

Ruins of huts burnt by the police

There is growing suspicion about a conspiracy between the Bhumihar landlords in the area and the police against the harijans. Just the day before, on 31 December, the harijans had met just outside the village to protest against the rape of a harijan woman by Shivkumar Sharma, the son of a Bhumihar landlord Chotanarayan Sharma in the nearby village of Makhra The meeting was organised by the woman's father-in-law, virtually a bonded labourer of ChotanaravanSharma But Kanhai Sahu and his family members were held as hostages by Sharma in order to prevent the meeting from being held. But seeing that the harijans were adamant, the landlords took the help of the police Discussions about the rape of the daughter of another villager Nanku Ram (from who's hut the bloodstained uniforms were allegedly recovered) by Arbind Sharma son of a landlord and the daily wages given by the landlords which is below the official rate of Rs 8

Terror-struck neighbours of the harijan villagers

KM Kiran

Wounded police constable Shatrughan Singh

were also held. It is believed that the harijans were so upset that they did not eat anything on the day of the meeting. The post-mortem of the dead bodies also show absence of food in the visceras indicating that the dead were only protesting harijans and not extremist Naxalites.

The harijans in the area work mainly as bonded labourers, wage earners or casual workers in the fields of the Bhumihars and atrocities on them are fairly frequent. In 1981 in Gaini, a nearby village, six harijans were killed for demanding the official minimum wages. However many harijans have been enrolling in the Indian People's Front (IPF), formed in 1982, which has been encouraging the harijans to resist.

Relations between the harijans and landlords deteriorated further after the Kaithi Bigha villagers demanded and got a raise in minimum daily wages from Rs two to Rs six, still less than the official rate of Rs eight. The landlords have also been trying to evict the harijans from the village, and Parasuram Sharma one of the landlords who reportedly masterminded the massacres argues that the harijans have settled on land which belongs to the school where he teaches. Official records, however, show that the land does not belong to the school and that the harijans have been given ownership of the land under the 20 point programme.

Another reason behind the tension between the landlords and the harijans is the division in political loyalties. While the landlords supported the Congress(I) candidate in the constituency Mr S.N. Sinha, the harijans supported either the Janata Party or the CPI.

The situation in Kaithi Bigha and the surrounding villages continues to be tense. The police deployed in the area are believed to be "guests of the landlords." The village mukhiya, Mr Ram Baran Singh has been approached by the district administration to ask the harijans to come back. But the hundred or so survivors are yet to return. The executive magistrate Mr A.B. Singh inspected the village on 3 January and has assured that the relief and rehabilitation measures would be carried out and that there would be no more violence in the area. The government however is yet to accept that the houses were burnt by the police but still believe that the cluster of houses were a well-designed fort with an underground tunnel for escape.

Meanwhile the harijans in the adjoining areas, aware of the government's apathetic attitude towards them are planning an exodus. The ones who are willing to stay on are too terror stricken.

Yubaraj Ghimire, Patna

Moments of happiness...

moments for Regent King

REGENT KING

A happy blend of taste & freshness

STATUTORY WARNING CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

HIMACHAL

beckons you to a tryst with your self

HIMACHAL TOURISM

For more information please write to: The Commissioner Tourism, Himachal Pradesh, Daizy Bank Estate, Shimla-171001. Tel. 2028, 3136, or contact our Tourist Offices:

New Delhi Tel. 345320, Calcutta Tel. 446847, Bombay Tel. 219191/284, Chandigarh Tel. 26494, Madras Tel. 812955, Pathankot Tel. 316, Dalhousie Tel. 36, Dharamsala Tel. 362, 363, Palampur Tel. 81, Shimla Tel. 3311, 6037, 5071, Manali Tel. 25.

DYNAMICS

GUJARAT CONGRESS(I)

Sweep Helps Loyalists

The dissidents are on the defensive

The landslide victory of the Congress(I) in the Lok Sabha polls in Gujarat has strengthened the loyalists belonging to the Madhavsinh Solanki group while the dissidents, headed by Mr Solanki's former mentor Mr Jinabhai Darji, are on the defensive. As the state government prepares for the elections to the Gujarat Legislative Assembly in March, the Solanki group appears to be on top.

"Not only will Solanki become the first chief minister in the state to complete the full term of five years in office, but in all probability he would be elected for a second term as well," a top loyalist worker said. The dissident leader, Mr Darji, had sometime ago vowed that he would make sure Mr Solanki did not become chief minister again. No chief minister has completed the full term of five years in office since the state came into being in 1960.

The optimism in the Solanki camp is because the Congress(I) won 24 of the 26 Lok Sabha seats from the state While much of the credit is being given to Mr Rajiv Gandhi, the loyalists also claim that the high command had picked up most of the nominees suggested by the Solanki group. The Congress(I) polled 53.24 per cent of the valid votes cast, which, however, was lower than the 1980 figure of 54.84 per cent.

The chief minister has already approached the high command after the Lok Sabha victory about disciplining the dissidents. He has also shored up his own position in the Gujarat party by informing the sitting legislators that they would be given tickets if the party did well in their Assembly segments in the Lok Sabha polls. The party has 142 MLAs in the 182-member state Assembly now and an analysis of the voting pattern in the Assembly segments in the Lok Sabha polls reveals that the Congress(I) got more votes in 139 Assembly constituencies while the Opposition led in the remaining 43 segments.

The loyalists concede that another Congress(I) sweep in the Assembly polls where a lot of local issues are involved, is unlikely. But they are still hopeful of doing well, if the high command does not encourage the dissidents. This means that the Solanki group wants the Congress(I) high command to follow the Lok Sabha pattern in selecting nominees of the loyalist group's choice.

Madhavsinh Solanki

At least two more incentive schemes for the poor were in the pipeline at the time of writing. The state government plans to provide foodgrains at concessional prices to nearly one and half crore people from fair-price shops and arrange for completely free education for women at all levels, including at the university and technical institutions. The first scheme is expected to counter the price rise and the second, to attract women voters. At present, girls get free education up to the eleventh standard in school. The two schemes could cost the exchequer about Rs. 77 crores a year according to official estimates. But private assessments indicate that the schemes could cost much more

While the Solanki faction has been celebrating its victory in the Lok Sabha elections, the dissidents have been taking stock of the situation. Just as the poll campaign began in December, there were reports that Mr Darji was planning to give up the executive chairmanship of the 20 Point Programme Committee. The post carries the perquisites of a cabinet minister, such as a bungalow, an office and a car although Mr Darji has never drawn the honorarium that goes with it. However, after the results were known, the dissidents are lying low. When asked if he had received Mr Darji's resignation, Mr Solanki denied receiving any resignation so far.

The dissidents may have suffered a setback, but they are certainly not out of the reckoning. Said a dissident leader, "Mr Solanki cannot appropriate the credit for winning the Lok Sabha poll all to himself. The dissidents too had worked as hard as anybody else." They also argued that the hopes of Mr Solanki's followers to wipe out the dissidents was too optimistic. Mr Solanki does not wield that much influence with the new Prime Minister,the dissidents argue. The dissidents quote the inclusion of Mr Yogendra Makwana, union minister of state in the new cabinet to back their claim.

Mr Solanki is at loggerheads with Mr Makwana, who as a Rajya Sabha member was retained in the cabinet, while included in none of the 24 Lok Sabha MPs from Gujarat wereincluded. In addition, two supporters of Mr Solanki in Delhi, Miss Kumud Joshi and Mr Digvijaysinhji Jhala have been dropped

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

NEW DELHI

For Our Fallen Heroes

A war memorial for the Cavalry and Armoured Corps

The war memorial which lent its name to the Prime Minister's house in the Nehru era has been renamed. The long forgotten Teen Murti Memorial in New Delhi was named the Cavalry Memorial on 6 January 1985 to pay homage to the soldiers of the Indian Cavalry and Armoured Corps who have laid down their lives in the two World Wars and in the wars fought by India after independence.

The Teen Murti House, once the official residence of India's first Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, now houses a museum dedicated to him. The building opposite Rashtrapati Bhawan was once used by the British commander-in-chief of India and had got its name from the Warriors' Memorial located opposite the main gate of that building. The monument, a sandstone column with three bronze statues of horsemen from the Hyderabad Lancers, Mysore Lancers and Kachchwana (Jodhpur) in their traditional uniforms, stands on a roundabout outside Teen Murti House. The top column of the statue is crowned with a horseshoe carving. The inscription at the base reads: "Their name liveth for evermore." Engraved all around the column are names of officers and soldiers who died or were missing in action.

The statues of the lancers were sculpted by Leonard Jennings in 1922 and the memorial was originally for cavalrymen who had died in the First World War during the capture of Haifa in the Middle East in 1917, which was occupied by the Germans and the Turks. The Imperial Cavalry Brigade which consisted of the former princely states of Hyderabad, Mysore and Jodhpur with detatchments from Bhavnagar, Kashmir and Kathiwar, had taken part in the battle and had suffered heavy casualties. The monument was specifically constructed opposite the official residence of the British commander-in-chief of the Indian armed forces, who ranked only second to the viceroy and governor general during the British Raj.

General A.S. Vaidya, the chief of army staff, himself an Armoured Corps man has played a vital role in rededicating the memorial to the

Gen. Vaidya rededicating the memorial

Cavalry and its successor, the Armoured Corps of today. The ceremony was to have taken place in the second week of November 1984, traditionally observed as the Cavalry weekend, but the function was postponed because of the assassination of Indira Gandhi. Ceremonies will be conducted here during the Cavalry weekend, and also Armoured Corps day, 14 April (the day Indian Cavalry units switched from horses to tanks).

The function on 6 January was attended by officers of the Armoured Regiments dressed in typical Cavalry outfits with blue and gray Kamarbandh and shoes with spurs. There were also retired generals of Cavalry units. Amidst the bugle's solemn sounding of the Last Post, the chief of army staff, general A. S. Vaidya, escorted by Lt. General J.M. Vohra, placed a wreath at the memorial. General Vaidya also dedicated a bronze plaque affixed on the memorial while the band of the Armed Corps Centre and School (Ahmednagar) played the funeral march. In a brief chat with the press, General Vaidya said that the memorial would revive memories of those who had died for the country. "When we pay homage to the dead we also look upon the Teen Murti House and pay homage to the leaders of the country who lived there and whose funeral procession started from there."

Falguni Talwar, New Delhi

Life piled on life will be of no avail if the gray spirit yearning in desire does not 'follow knowledge like a sinking star beyond the bound of human thought' Perfection is not the prerogative of mortals but to try to drink knowledge to the lees and not to miss significant knowledge in the underwood of details must be the endeavour of every managerial aspirant Knowledge must be unified and not disparate, if not, it degenerates into acquisition of isolated facts and we may lament 'where is the knowledge we have lost in information?' Effective use of knowledge combined with a capacity for guidance and direction is the very essence of leadership and managers are leaders

MBA ENTRANCE

TO THE MBA ASPIRANT

KNOWLEDGE:

FLAIR OR FLAME ?

Efficient/BT/116/84

Would you like your portrait to fit this profile ?

Here at Brilliants we help shape would-be MBA's. We augment your knowledge and alert your attention. The programme is designed to make you more than equal to the formidable challenge posed by such entrance tests as those of IIM, IRM, XLRI, Bajaj, AIMA etc.

BRILLIANT TUTORIALS

12,Masilamani Mudali St., T Nagar, Madras-17 Ph: 442099, 443308

EMINENCE THROUGH EXCELLENCE

TENZING NORGAY

The Old Man and the Mountains

The ailing Sherpa is missing the Himalayas

The window of Room 307 at the All India Institute of Medical Sciences overlooks the chaos of rush-hour traffic and a solid concrete wall. A man who has had the rare privilege of standing on top of the world's highest peak now stares at this bleak city scene. Tenzing Norgay, the conqueror of Mt. Everest, is a thin, frail figure today. A lung infection has kept him in hospital for the last one month. His lined but strangely young face is full of amazement as he talks about his illness. "All my life I have lived in the mountains; lived with snow. There was never any problem But then I caught pneumonia So strange, isn't it, so unusual!"

He pauses, as if to consider this odd behaviour on his body's part. The mountains and Tenzing have been an inseparable part of each other and now, at 71, the body has suddenly turned traitor. "But only the left side is bad. The rest is okay. Now everything is going to be fine," he reassures himself. "There is only a little weakness but soon I'll leave this place, maybe in a week."

The hospital room, during visiting hours, is like a warm, cheerful gathering of Sherpas. Children, grandchildren, and friends surround Tenzing. Beaming faces look upon fondly at their grand old man. "He has done so much for us," a granddaughter says softly. "Not only for the family but for all the Sherpas. He has sponsored so many children, sent them to school." One of the first things he did when he came back from the Everest was to bring his mother to Darjeeling and make a good home for her."

The same son had run away from home at the age of 13. "My parents were very understanding, kind people, but I had to go and see the world." Born in the shadow of Mt. Everest, at a village called Tsa-chu, Tenzing remembers how, as a child, he used to see the peak rising high in the sky, towering over the other mountains. He did not know then that it was Mt. Everest. The Sherpas called the mountain Chomolungma—the "Goddess Mother of the Wind."

But both the names meant nothing to the boy. The only name that made any sense to him was his mother's description of Everest, "The mountain so high that no bird can fly over it." That is the name Tenzing still likes best for Mount Everest

There is a certain quiet strength about Tenzing which fame and adulation have not disturbed. "What did I feel when I stood on the peak? Nothing, we had reached, we had been lucky, now we had to get back." There are no regrets that his moment of glory was 30 years ago. He is totally contented with his work at the Mountaineering Institute at Darjeeling. "The main thing is that I am going to the mountains with students. It is peaceful and I am happy. I want to go back now." He looks at his family defiantly. "The cold is not good for him," one of them murmurs. He might get a relapse. "Tenzing turns his head away. A sharp horn outside breaks his reverie and he sits up." The Prime Minister came yesterday. But he also came to see me because he loves mountains. Indira Gandhi and Panditji also loved the mountains." Panditji started the Mountaineering Institute. He really loved nature."

It would never occur to Tenzing that the Prime Minister came to see Tenzing Norgay, one of the greatest mountaineers of the world. He believes simply that he is just an extension of the mountains and any recognition given to him is meant really for the whole Himalayan range.

One subject Tenzing hates to talk about is who stepped on the summit of the Everest first. Was it Edmund Hillary or Tenzing? "We never ask him and he never tells us," whispered his son. They understand instinctively that a man like their father would not answer such a petty question. "What does that matter?" Tenzing asks "The important thing was the team spirit. There were just two of us on the top. Who was there to judge which one is lying? Today I will say I was first, tomorrow he will say, 'No, I was there before him.' Our friendship will be divided into pieces by people asking this question. We were there together, that's all."

Even in his hospital bed in Delhi, Tenzing keeps track of the mountains. "There is good snow this year, you say?" he asks Prem Chand, a mountaineer friend. Prem Chand smiles gently, "You must come Tenzing, sir. You were with us last year at Base Camp. You are lucky for us." "August is still far away, the Sherpa whispers. I must regain my strength I'll be well soon. It's just the weakness now. I will definitely come."

The doctors, however, think otherwise. Tenzing was in a bad condition when he was brought to the hospital. There was an acute lung infection brought on by pneumonia. The left lung had a large abscess. But he is much better now and the lungs have cleared except for a small lesion.

No one is sure when Tenzing will leave the hospital But the six-week follow-up treatment will begin soon. "How will I live in a city?" asks Tenzing. "Life is so difficult here" For him, a month's stay in Delhi has been too long and tiresome. Tenzing had not wanted his stay at the hospital to be publicised. Though Rajiv Gandhi's visit was a pleasant surprise, the overwhelming attention after the visit has made him tired.

Bulbul Sharma, New Delhi

Tenzing Norgay

Illustration by Bulbul Sharma

HEALTH

Hard Sell

UNICEF for social marketing

The UNICEF has called for serious "social marketing" of the oral rehydration therapy (ORT) through mass media campaigns in the developing world. The just-released 1985 report on The State of the World's Children recalls the examples of family planning and the Green Revolution where governments with political will have utilised the campaign techniques of commercial advertising to spread knowledge and motivation in these two areas. The UNICEF has stressed that the revolution in child survival depends on the communication of information to millions of parents and that social marketing has an important role to play in realising the potential of ORT.

Among the 'success stories' in the hard-sell of ORT, the report cites two major examples: radio commercials in Honduras and the Gambia where the ORT jingle has become something of a hit song; and a promotional project in Nicaragua where the radio government station in partnership with an advertising agency has successfully spread knowledge and use of ORT salts sold as 'Super Limonado'.

While highlighting the importance of social marketing, the UNICEF report sounds two warning notes: One, no media message can achieve anything without structural socio-economic change. Richard Manoff, consultant for many social marketing projects in the Third World, is quoted as saying that the nutrition educator turned advertising-agent must remember never to permit marketing to become a substitute for social policy initiatives. Second, it must never be forgotten that there are not only similarities but also differences between commercial and social marketing. The former may associate products with moods, emotions and irrational 'images' which heighten their desirability. But the latter must necessarily be eminently rational, practicable and with solid substance in its message.

The UNICEF also reminds ORT campaigners that intensive research into the problems and needs of the target audience is vital, with constant field-testing and evaluation, and a high degree of professionalism to launch a campaign that truly works.

Vimal Balasubrahmanyan, Secunderabad

INDUSTRY

Tomorrow's Technology Today

Indian industries to use advanced techniques

While only half-hearted attempts are being made by the country's prestigious universities and research labs to check the 'brain-drain' in the country, at least one institution, Indian Institute of Technology—Madras—has evolved what could be a solution to the problem. The Madras IIT is now in the process of bringing back its past students who have settled abroad, doing either advanced research or working to enable them to share their knowledge with the Indian industry.

On 29 December 1984 and 3 January 1985, the Alumni Association of IIT, Madras, conducted a two-level programme appropriately named 'Operation Catch-up' involving a number of top industrialists. "The programme aimed to provide a rudimentary knowledge of advanced technologies that may directly affect Indian industry," says Mr Amaran, a former student and one of the co-ordinators of the programme.

According to one estimate nearly 2000 ex-students of Madras IIT alone have settled abroad. The total number of Indian engineers and other professionals settled in the USA is over a lakh.

The programme covered robotics, artificial intelligence, solid geometric modelling and office automation which are rapidly growing fields in the United States. In fact, robotics is being used by some Indian industries and a major national workshop on robotics was organised by Kanpur IIT in November. The programme originally meant for service organisations, consultancy and manufacturing companies and companies looking out for opportunities in several other growth areas including artificial intelligence industrial automation etc., was poorly attended probably because it was arranged hurriedly. In fact, Dr S.L. Rao, a prominent scholar and industrialist and also a director of the Mettur Beardsell Company Limited has remarked that such programmes should be popularised as the Indian industry is on the threshold of rapid development and every manager should know about the latest technological improvements.

A major complaint about Indian industry is its lack of knowledge in new developments. "Industrialists are mere passive spectators. They do not try to bring in advanced technologies and are content with producing more things using outdated techniques," says Dr P.V. Indiresan, a former director of IIT, Madras. The 'Operation Catch-up, Dr Indiresan's brain-child was evolved just before his tenure as director ended last year. Citing the example of the Ambassador car, Dr Indiresan argues that while the Japanese firm Nissan had taken the same design from the British principals and improved upon it vastly, the Indian cars were exact prototypes of a three-decade old design with minor changes. "Where is Nissan and where is Hindustan Motors?" he asked.

According to him the government's attitude towards technology imports has undergone a dramatic change and the industry is yet to catch up. This may be due to the psychological barriers inhibiting the Indian industry about adopting technologies that are too advanced and because of operational factors. "What is needed is an appropriate technology using all the latest techniques which are fully developed abroad," Dr Indiresan says.

Dr Indiresan wants redesigning units to be set up by every industry for which a fixed sum of money could be allotted. This centre could be used to update the technologies to suit internal needs. Even the export promotion bodies such as sum AIEI (Association of Indian Engineering Industry) could consider insisting on the inclusion of a technical expert on each buying mission going abroad who could evaluate the growth in technology and bring it back to the country.

S. Ramchandar, chief executive of Tubes and Malleables Limited, a division of TI group of companies claims "While technology transfer is an essential pre-requisite of rapid industrialisation, it would be out of reach of small and medium enterprises because high technology processes are prohibitively expensive." He suggests some kind of a syndicated facility wherein some of the user industries could pool their resources and manpower to get the best of technologies. Dr Rangarajan Jayaraman, a top researcher with the IBM Thomas J. Watson Research Centre, New York, says robotics has revolutionised the modern industry. Products are characterised by high functional efficiency, complexity in manufacture low cost, and the usage of integrated circuits, computerised digital systems etc. "Industrial automation is the only answer to keep up with the rat race in many such advanced industries." Computerised design techniques are being employed largely by many companies in the USA.

According to Dr Rangarajan, robots not only do mechanical funtions based upon certain present instructions, but are also beginning to 'think'. The modern industrial robots are fitted with a variety of sensory devices using cameras, heat detectors or other devices for flexible operation on the shop floor. "These artificial intelligence facilities improve productivity by as much as ten times," says Vinod K. Batra, a senior executive in one of the largest US telecommunications companies, General Utilities. "For many corporations artificial intelligence (AI) means much less arcane applications. For instance, at its Stapleton airport hub in Denver, United Airlines deploys voice-recognition equipment to speed up baggage handling. The handlers simply speak into the microphone and identify the baggage numbers which are 'recognised' by a computer which sends away the baggage to the appropriate bay. The handling operators have improved by as much as 100 times."

Mr Batra feels that in late 1980s, along with the development of new operating software, fifth generation computer hardware, artificial intelligence and speech recognition will reach out of research and development to offer the business community greater productivity.

While the 'Operation Catch-up' is only a token exercise towards such ambitious technology transfer ideas, it is a step forward because Indian industry for the first time, has been involved in a meaningful discussion on scientific developments by experts of Indian origin abroad. This 'technology park' concept exemplified by the Stanford and Berkeley Universities was so successful that the Silicon Valley type of hi-tech industrial region could be born. In West Germany too, the Berlin Senate—Technical University Programme titled "Berlin Innovation and Business Promotion Centre (BIG) had caught on very well and nearly 25 companies have benefited till the end of December 1984 in the very first year of its operation. The Madras IIT experiment should also prove successful provided the idea catches up with other research centres and the industrialists.

T. Raman, Madras

SRI LANKA

Moving Towards a Holocaust

New government measures will escalate violence

Sri Lanka's ethnic conflict has escalated to such an extent that a civil war threatens to engulf the nation. Tamil militant leaders in interviews with SUNDAY expressed the fear that yet another bloody chapter of anguish and strife has begun in the island, which will lead to a civil war. Mr A S. Balasingham, the official spokesman of the Liberation Tigers of Thamil Eelam (LTTE) told SUNDAY that the Sri Lanka government has begun a series of measures which have "created the conditions for a civil war." He pointed out that the Sri Lanka government has begun engaging the Sinhala civilians in their war against the Tamils. By ordering conscription or compulsory military training for Sinhala youths and forming a new ministry for public mobilisation (intended to mobilise Sinhala opinion against Tamil "terrorists"), the Sri Lankan government has escalated chances of racial hostilities. According to the national security minister Mr Lalith Athulathmudali 30,000 armed Sinhala civilians are to be settled in Tamil areas.

In enlisting civilians for the fight against the Tamil terrorists, the Sri Lanka government has shown its own desperate situation. There would have been no need to resort to such a dangerous move had the government been in a position to rely solely on its armed forces, but the Sri Lankan forces are too small, ineffective, indisciplined, and thoroughly demoralised. The attempts at conscription prove that the war against the Tamils has taken a heavy toll on the Sri Lankan security forces, a fact suppressed by rigorous censorship. Past events show that Sinhala criminals and musclemen of the cabinet ministers have been able to wreak far greater havoc on the Tamils (innocents not militants) than the armed forces.

President Jayewardene

The Tamil militant leaders are apprehensive of a civil war because they feel it detracts from the purpose of their liberation struggle. Their intention has never been to fight the Sinhala masses but to enlist their support to overthrow the capitalist regime and usher in a socialist democratic political set-up. The militants lament "We just want to drive away the aggressors from our homeland. We don't want to fight with the Sinhala masses."

After the United National Party and Mr J. R. Jayewardene came to power in 1977, Sri Lanka has steadily moved away from the sphere of India's influence. Ideologically and economically it has followed the United States. Prior to this, Sri Lanka had freely acknowledged the fact that India was the guiding force in the sub-continent. Very often, India directly intervened in Sri Lanka's domestic affairs at Sri Lanka's request. Now Sri Lanka refuses to even accept India's good offices, though the events in the island are linked to happenings in India The Sri Lanka government has introduced a series of harsh anti-terrorist measures between November and December 1984, taking full advantage of the political uncertainty in India after Mrs Gandhi's assassination. Mr M.G. Ramachandran's illness also coincided with this phase. The measures introduced included the declaration of "no man's land" over a coastal stretch of 350 kms from Mannar to Mullaiteevu. The villagers in the area have been directed to abandon their houses so that a stretch of land 100 yards from the shore to the interior is totally unpopulated. This is in order to curb the movement of militants, particularly between Tamil Nadu and the northern parts of the island. This measure had displaced 3 lakh fishermen who have been deprived of a livelihood

The Tamils of the area who subsisted primarily on seafood are seriously affected Vehicular movement in Jaffna has also been restricted. All vehicles, including cycles, require passes to plv—the authorities hope to restrict the movements of the terrorists. The militant leaders are happy with the situation because they believe that by opting for a military solution, the government has precluded the possibility of a negotiated settlement—and a military solution will lead to the division of the country.

The LTTE has curbed its activities because they want India to arrive at the conclusion the Tamils have come to long ago—the futility of holding negotiations with the Sri Lanka government. The LTTE was also waiting to see the outcome of the All Party Conference (the proposals which were drafted by Mr Jayewardene were summarily dropped) and of the general elections in India All the hopes they had vested with Mrs Gandhi have been smoothly transferred to Mr Rajiv Gandhi, who, they are convinced, is a genuine sympathiser

Mr Balasingham feels that India must acknowledge the futility of holding talks with Sri Lanka. Since Sinhala chauvinism will always be a stumbling-block for the resolution of the ethnic problem, India must therefore approach the United Nations and move a motion condemning the Sri Lanka government for grave violations of human rights. Such a step would isolate Sri Lanka in the eyes of the world. Secondly, India could be a little more assertive in influencing the United States to pressurise Sri Lanka to restrain itself "A stern word from United States would definitely restrain Sri Lanka from plunging into an "all out genocidal onslaught on the Tamils," he said. The Sri Lanka government is getting weaker, its economy is in a shambles, the tourist industry has been sluggish and the industrial sector has virtually collapsed. Time is running out for the Sinhala government and the Tamil militants believe that if the western world refuses aid and investment, the Sri Lankan government would be in no position to prolong its war against the Tamils. The LTTE has always ruled out armed intervention by India in resolving the ethnic crises However, in the event of a civil war, they hope that India would intervene to restore order

The opening of the Israeli Interests Section in the American Embassy has angered the Muslim community in Sri Lanka. The hostility intensified when several Muslim businessmen were affected in Mannar when the army went on the rampage. Now it is the turn of the Christian community to sit up in alarm. The killing of a methodist priest, Jaga Rajasingham and a Catholic priest Rev. Fr. Mary Bastian in Mannar has exacerbated the sentiments of the Christian population. The World Council of Churches of various Christian organisations are bound to register their protest. Moreover, most of the displaced fishermen in the "no man's land" are Christians.

The time has come for India to take a more assertive role in the island's ethnic conflict, the effects of which are spilling across the Palk Straits into Tamil Nadu. Moreover, wanton attacks on Indian fishermen by the Sri Lankan coastal guardsareincreasing. Recently, two Indian fishermen were killed in Indian waters by the Sri Lanka navy personnel, an incident that the Sri Lankan government chooses to deny. The fishermen operating in the Rameshwaram belt are enraged by this incursion on their livelihood and in fact even life, and are resorting to violent agitations. The attacks on Indian fishermen are usually not deliberate acts of provocation by the Sri Lankan government, but the result of overreaction by the Sri Lankan navy It's a "Shoot first, questions later" policy. The spokesman of the LTTE told SUNDAY that such incidents are part of an orchestrated campaign by Sri Lanka government to whip up anti-India sentiments. However, there can be no justification for any act of aggression by the Sri Lankan forces in Indian territorial waters.

The exodus of Sri Lankan refugees into Tamil Nadu has swelled to alarming proportions. At the moment, according to official figures, there are 50,000 of them stranded in Tamil Nadu. Most of them are poor people who have fled with little or no possessions. They are spreading out over the coastal districts, and are to be found in large numbers in Ramnad, Pudukottai and Nagapattinam. The official figures do not take into account the upper middle class. These Sri Lankan Tamils who have cut their losses back home are now settled in Madras. They have bought up flats and houses here and are trying to integrate with the local Tamils. As the numbers swell, the economic amd other constraints imposed on the state will assume alarming proportions which the Tamil Nadu and Indian governments cannot afford to ignore.

Anita Pratap, Madras

Sri Lankan soldiers on patrol

TIBET

The Dalai Lama: Homecoming?

The Chinese government does not want him back

"Despite official and fulsome invitations to the exiled Dalai Lama in India to return and play 'a patriotic role' in the future of China and Tibet, the communists will never allow him officially to retain his role as spiritual leader of Tibet," observed John Frazer, an American, after his visit to Tibet in July 1979.

Today, five years later, this observation has been proved right. For the first time, the Chinese have made their terms public, the most significant of which is that if he should return he would be allowed to live permanently and comfortably in Beijing, and not in Lhasa, though he would be allowed to go to Tibet from time to time like the Panchen Lama who has been living in Beijing since the late Seventies, but was allowed to visit Tibet only once in 1982. The Chinese claim that the Dalai Lama will be made the vice-chairman of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress (China's Parliament) which, Sinologists say, is a figurehead position. The other terms that the Dalai Lama would have to accept are: the unification of Tibet with the rest of China and a silence about the events of 1959 which led to his flight to India.

Though these terms were formulated by Hu Yaobang, the secretary-general of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in 1981, they were kept secret till now. The conditions were discussed in a meeting between a senior official of CCP's central committee and a three-man delegation of the Dalai Lama in Beijing.

The 49-year-old Tenzing Gyatsho, the 14th Dalai Lama, has taken these terms for his return to China, calmly. In fact, he has asked Beijing to clear certain doubts and confusions regarding the conditions. The Dalai Lama says, "The very fact that the Chinese are insistent that I return and stay in Beijing clearly indicates that there are still problems in Tibet." He adds that unless the Tibet issue is solved by the Chinese to the full satisfaction of the Tibetans, he could be of more benefit to his people by remaining outside Tibet. "The proposal of my return is, therefore, irrelevant at this stage," he emphasises.

The Dalai Lama has been living in self-exile in Dharamsala since 1959 along with 1,10,000 Tibetan refugees, who followed him into India. These refugees have been settled in 44 agricultural and industrial settlements in different parts of India.

Ashok Bose

The Dalai Lama

For many years now Beijing has been inviting the Dalai Lama to return home, but these invitations have been ignored by him. In 1982, the Dalai Lama at a Buddhist congregation (where Tibetans from Tibet had also come) declared that he would visit Tibet briefly in 1985, provided he was allowed freedom of speech and movement. Also, he would take reporters of the "free world" with him. He hoped that the Tibetans who would meet him and express their thoughts freely to him are not punished by the Chinese after his visit. The Dalai Lama had in mind those Tibetans who had suffered at the hands of the Chinese, when they spontaneously welcomed three delegations sent by him to Tibet in 1979 and 1980. Some of them are still in prison.

The Chinese were taken aback. They had been issuing invitations for propaganda purposes to make the world believe that while they were keen to have the Dalai Lama back, it was he who wasn't responding. Then, the Chinese tried to force the Dalai Lama to cancel his visit. They arrested and executed a number of Tibetans labelling them thieves, rapists and criminals. According to some Tibetan refugees, they were mostly political activists, and not anti-social elements. The Chinese also stated that the Dalai Lama would be allowed to visit Tibet only if he acknowledged his past mistakes.

But the Dalai Lama refused to change his mind. Finally, the Chinese resigned themselves to receiving him in 1985 and preparations were launched to ready Tibet for the visit. Restoration work began on monasteries, temples and relics, destroyed during the Cultural Revolution of the Sixties. In addition, 40 developmental projects were launched and the deadline set for their completion was 1985.

In October, 1984, a three-member delegation led by 55-year-old Juchen Thubten Namgyal, the seniormost Kahlon (minister) in the Kashag (Tibetan cabinet-in-exile) left for Beijing with the 38-year-old Lodhi Gyari Gyaltsen and 65-year-old Phuntsok Takla to finalise the details of the trip.

A surprise awaited this delegation. The Chinese, instead of discussing the 1985 visit, released their terms for the Dalai Lama's return through the New China News Agency (NCNA). When the news reached Dharamsala, the headquarters of the Dalai Lama's government-in-exile, it dismayed the moderate Tibetans. They had been taken in by Deng's policy of liberalisation in China and had hoped that Beijing would make some move towards the political settlement of the Tibetan issue. The reaction among the refugees was unanimous: the Dalai Lama should reject the Chinese terms.

The Tibetan Youth Congress (TYC) leadership had opposed the Dalai Lama's 1985 trip. Within the refugee camp, the 10,000-member-strong TYC represents the hardliners who wouldn't settle for anything less than Tibet's independence from China. "We don't object to the delegation visiting China but we object to their discussing anything but Tibet's independence," says Sonam N. Dagpo, president of the TYC.

Another TYC activist said that had the Chinese agreed to Dalai Lama's brief 1985 visit, he would have tried to stop it. "I wouldn't have been alone," he says.

Refugee sources say that the Chinese have already begun going back on their 1980 policies of liberalisation. The Chinese have brought in over 100,000 Chinese workers into Tibet during the last one year despite Hu Yaobang's announcement in 1980 that the Chinese workers would be removed from Tibet. Though some workers were sent back, the tide has been reversed. The new arrivals are being justified on the ground that they are needed to complete economic and technical projects in Tibet for which no qualified Tibetans are available.

The Chinese since November 1983 have restricted the freedom of worship in Tibet. From 1980 to 1983, Tibetans were allowed to display photos of the Dalai Lama in temples, homes and even wear them as colour badges. Now, visitors entering Tibet are searched and photos of Dalai Lama and other religious objects like scriptures, images, sacred threads are confiscated. Refugee sources say that the photos of the Dalai Lama at Potala Palace, the Dalai Lama's traditional residence, have also been removed. Tibetans in western Tibet have been advised not to keep the photos of the Dalai Lama in their homes.

By announcing the conditions for Dalai Lama's return and maintaining a silence about a political solution of the Tibetan problem, the Chinese have clearly demonstrated their rigid stand on this 25-year-old issue.

According to a political analyst, the Chinese have offered only a change of place of exile to the Dalai Lama from Dharamsala to Beijing. In return, the Chinese have not offered any concession to his people or changed the present status of Tibet, even within Chinese suzerainty. As the Dalai Lama says, "Either the Chinese leaders are still ignorant about the basic Tibetan issue or they are deliberately trying to distort it by giving the impression that the issue is something minor."

A. J. Singh, Dharamsala

NEPAL

A New Five-Year Plan

But the economy is still floundering

When King Birendra of Nepal observed sometime back that his kingdom was "a rich country struggling against poverty," he was not far from the truth. For, the Himalayan kingdom is in no shape, as the King explained, "to harness the resources we have." And that is precisely the problem Nepal's Seventh Five Year Plan (1985 90), scheduled to be launched in mid-July, proposes to tackle. The objectives of the Seventh Plan, according to Prime Minister Lokendra Bahadur Chand is "to increase production at a faster rate, to increase productive employment opportunities and to meet the minimum basic needs of the people" by mobilising the country's internal resources.

Although the Plan looks sound and fairly objective on paper, it does not appear very convincing, especially to those who are aware of the problems of the Nepalese economy. Nepal has been striving for the last three decades to eradicate hunger, unemployment, disease and illiteracy but, even after six five-year plans, has not succeeded. It remains the least industrialised country in South Asia and is among the ten poorest nations in the world.

The major emphasis of the Seventh Plan, which is estimated to involve an aggregate development expenditure of 54,110 Nepalese Rupees will be agriculture, the main occupation of 90 per cent of the kingdom's population of 16 million. Despite the foodgrain surplus after a good harvest last year, agriculture continues to languish. The previous plans have done little to improve irrigation facilities, increase the output of fertilisers and provide for newer farming methods to increase agricultural output. However, the hopes of the policy formulators of reaching the take-off stage in the agricultural sector by the end of the Seventh Plan period may prove to be unfounded.

Prime Minister Lokendra Bahadur Chand

The growth of a viable industrial sector is one of the essential conditions of the country's economic development. However, there is not much chance of a breakthrough in the industrial sector, which at the moment employs only one per cent of the kingdom's workforce. The factors which are impeding industrial growth are too numerous and difficult to be overcome immediately. The Seventh Plan does not appear to be paying much attention to the development of heavy industries; the focus is more on small and medium-scale industries. The tardy implementation of the Sixth Plan will also prove to be a burden for the Seventh Plan, which will have to depend more on foreign aid and loans than the previous plan. While 60 per cent of the Sixth Plan's resource requirements was met by external aid and assistance, there are indications that foreign donors and creditors will finance 70 per cent of the Seventh Plan's development budget.

Another inhibiting factor is the increasingly adverse balance of payments position which has worsened over the years. In 1981-82, exports paid for 30.7 per cent of Nepal's imports. Exports have further declined in 1982-'83 to only 18.8 per cent of the kingdom's import bill. But imports cannot be curtailed either because any reduction in imports will slow down the development process.

The trade deficit with India, Nepal's largest trade partner, has been going up from Rs 72.90 crores in 1974-75 to Rs 137.32 crores in 1982-83. This is because its exports which account for more than 60 per cent of Nepal's external trade, have trailed far behind its imports. According to an economist associated with the kingdom's Institute of Third World Economic Studies, "The Nepalese budget has neither been able to give protection to national industries nor has it tried to reduce the trade deficit with India." However, some policy makers are aware that for 'planned development' the economy has to be diversified, dependence on India decreased, the balance of trade corrected and internal resources mobilised. But it is unlikely that Nepal's economic position will improve after the Seventh Plan.

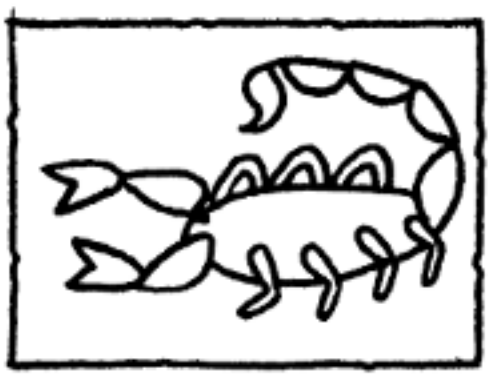
Bhola Chatterjee, Calcutta

Artificial Mouth Designed

It's part robotics, part computer, part biology. It's an artificial mouth, designed by a university of Minnesota research team, that does a year's worth of chewing in 24 hours. Such a device will test new materials which have been designed by US dental companies—based on mixtures of resins and new ceramics—that could be used to improve false teeth, bridges, crows and fillings in millions of real mouths. Dr William Douglas, leader of the team, says that the materials look more natural than conventional silver-based fillings and gold crowns.

Aging: An Enigma

Scientists are still at a loss to explain why some people live to be 80 or 85, robust, can see and hear, albeit slightly less well than in their youth, and why others lead such miserable, painful lives before dying. Currently, science offers no antidotes to aging, no magic potion, no fountain of youth, only some tantalising clues about what may be governing this inevitable process.



Old people suffer from a host of ailments: dementia (where the patient loses mental powers like intelligence or memory), cancer, arthritis, heart problems, pneumonia, etc. However, the cells of older creatures are able to carry out, though rather unsteadily, the tasks that keep the body going, such as utilising nutrients, removing wastes, repairing gene damage and manufacturing vital protein molecules.

Gerontologists—those who study old age—put forward two theories for aging: wear-and-tear theories, based on the assumption that the environment is responsible for wearing the cells down; and genetic clock theories, which assume that the genetic make-up of its body dictates its death. A Japanese researcher, Takatoshi Ishikawa of the Cancer Institute in Tokyo stipulates that during a lifespan of 70 years, the cell's indomitable enzymes, proteins themselves, may perform nearly 128 billion repair jobs.

Among the chemical 'culprits' are lipofuscin (a fatty, brown pigment) and glucose (a sugar). Glucose may actually be a prime cause of aging. It damages the proteins, including collagen, the main component of the connective tissue that supports and enmeshes cells. In a test tube, glucose binds collagen fibres together, and such linking has been observed in the tissues of elderly people as well. It also occurs in cooking (for instance, in the skin of a broiling chicken).

Researchers say that there are ways of prolonging life. Anti-oxidants like Vitamin E and limiting food intake could help. Roy Walford, one of America's leading researchers on aging, observes that many of the immune-system deficiencies that accompany aging can be tackled by undernutrition. Food restriction does not appear to work through the hormones that trigger growth

Hypersensitive Insect

Two American scientists have come out with a remarkable discovery: the sand scorpion is able to detect vibrations in sand, which is a bad medium for conducting seismic signals, by the movement of an insect as delicate as a moth. The two scientists—Dr Philip Brownell of Oregon state university and Dr Roger Farley of the university of California at Riverside—were observing the nocturnal behaviour of a colony of sand scorpions on a dune in the southern Mojave desert near Palm Springs, southern California. The scientists would use lanterns to attract moths; once a moth touched the sand, the scorpion would instantly ensnare it. They also noticed that the scorpion was shortsighted and could neither hear nor smell. In an experiment they found that a moth which was trapped above ground, near a scorpion, could elicit no response from the scorpion even when beating its wings furiously. This showed that the scorpion could not detect, in the air, the presence of its prey. So as a further test the scientists disturbed the sand with a twig. This sparked off a vigorous attack, precipitated by the mechanical vibrations.

Bacteria: The Snowmakers

The bacterium, pseudomonas syringae, is being tested by ski resorts in Colorado, USA, that determine whether it would improve standard snow-making methods on the slopes. The maker of a product called Snomax, which uses the bacterium, says it produces more snow than standard snow-making methods and at warmer temperatures. Large concentrations of Snomax are injected into underground snow-making pipes at a rate so that every drop of water comes out with an ice nucleus around which snow can form.

New Drug for Alzheimer's Disease

Scientists in the United States have come out with a drug that could help in the treatment of Alzheimer's disease, which occurs in old age and leads to the weakening of mental powers. Patients suffering from this disease lack a brain chemical called acetylcholine, important for learning and memorising things. It is with little success that scientists have tried to tackle the disease with drugs that boost the levels or prevent the breakdown of this chemical.

The medical team of Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Centre in Hanover, New Hampshire, implanted pressurised tubes under the skins of four patients to pump a continuous trickle of bethanechol chloride, an acetylcholine-like drug, to their brains. Prior to the experiment, some of these patients were so severely demented by the disease that they could not dress themselves or run errands. But after being administered the drug, the results were remarkable: all four improved noticeably.

Illustration: Prabir Sen

Rekha was fluttering around with unbounded joy the day the election results started coming in. She was not interested in any party winning, but her concern was for Amitabh Bachchan. She was shooting that day and she kept running to the radio. As Amitabh's lead skyrocketed so did Rekha's joy. "I knew he would win. He is too big a man to lose anything. Remember he even fought Yama and won. My respect for him has grown much more. I feel this is the beginning of many great things to come for him," Rekha gushed. Is this also the beginning of nice sweet times for Rekha?

Amol Palekar is now concentrating on Bengali films, not because he did not want to survive in Bombay, but because Hindi films did not want him. He tried directing (Akriet) but did not succeed. He has just completed Ankahee and his survival in Hindi filmdom will depend on the success of this film. But he seems to be liking Calcutta, "I feel very comfortable here. It's a great feeling. The money is not so good but the satisfaction is always there."

Rekha with Anuradha (left) in Utsav

Poonam Dhillon: lonely

Poonam Dhillon has never been the cherubic flirt after Ramesh Talwar, the young director, jilted her to marry the girl his parents chose. What put Talwar off the Dhillon trail was the presence of Raj Sippy, the reigning playboy-financier-director who dangles carrots before starry-eyed girls. At one stage it became the Talwar-Dhillon-Sippy triangle. Poonam, however, completed Zamaana which Talwar was directing but theirs is just a naam ka waaste relationship now. "I still have to get used to living all by myself," Poonam Dhillon cries. There are many others ready to wipe her tears, and it will soon become tears of joy.

Farooque Shaikh, who tried to take advantage of Amol Palekar's departure to Bengali films, is also on the verge of total defeat. Initial success intoxicated him and he started asking for fabulous prices. His explanation: "I want to do just a limited number of good roles. Those who want me will have to pay me my price."

Silk Smitha has no patience with anything that bars her way. And she believes in doing things in style. Once she made her producer fan her with a cardboard when the power went off. She rants publicly against the censors for using the scissors through her seductive scenes. Maya Mohini, in which she plays the heroine and matches her talents with Jayamalini and Anuradha will soon be released.

THIS INDIA

Illustration: Debashis Deb

BOMBAY: A ham-handed railway policeman found himself at the wrong end of the baton at the Wadala station the other day. In the course of a routine roundup of unauthorised commuters in the ladies' compartment, the cop grabbed a person dressed in jeans, pulled the 'culprit' out of the train and proceeded tying the person's hands in a methodical fashion. Suddenly, the person snatched away the hands, flicked off a shoe and started thrashing the cop right royally. It turned out that the 'culprit' was a military nurse dressed in unisex clothes. The near six-foot lady let the cop go only after he fell grovelling at her feet, seeking forgiveness—Indian Express (K.S. Mahalingam, Bombay)

NAGPUR: A young bank officer could not vote in the recent elections as his name did not figure in the voters' list, instead, he was hooked by a marriageable girl's father waiting outside a party pandal. Presuming that the list included his name the young man proceeded towards the polling booth but was startled not to find his name in the list. Disappointed, he was about to return home when a man in his late fifties sitting on a dais outside the polling booth called out to him, "Young man, your name is very much there in my list." The grateful bank officer eagerly approached the old man to see the 'list' only to discover that it was the 'marriageable candidates' list' which the old man was talking about and not the voters' list—Nagpur Times (S. Farah Deeba Abidi, Amravati)

BHOPAL: In one of the polling booths in Raipur, a couple arrived by scooter and went to separate polling agents of the Congress(I) and the BJP. Their logic was that while the husband was voting for the Congress(I), his wife would vote for the BJP and their young son, who followed them on the moped, would vote for an Independent. The three said that they believed in democracy and every member was at liberty to support the candidate of his choice—Nagpur Times (Jyotirmoy Roychowdhury, Nagpur)

GUWAHATI: A kilogramme in Assam now weighs 950 grammes. One-kg weights having 50 grammes less are said to have been in circulation and thereby unsuspecting customers are being deceived by the unscrupulous traders and hawkers. It is said that people close to the trading world know that there are under-weights in the markets of the state. Two such one-kg weights were recently detected at Tihu bazaar when a trader was using them—The Assam Tribune (Sanjeet Sinha, New Delhi)

HYDERABAD: An independent candidate contesting from Medak and Nizamabad constituencies in Andhra Pradesh has hit upon a novel method of attracting crowds to his meetings. The candidate, Ganta Babu, dances on the dais and also sings while dancing, providing entertainment to the people. He goes round the constituency in a cycle rickshaw and one of his electoral promises is "supply of free liquor"—Indian Express (Dhanpatrai Agarwal, Tadepalligudem)

BERHAMPUR: Only one person cast his vote on 24 December 1984 at Nalia Knuagaon of the Berhampur Lok Sabha constituency, ignoring the poll boycott call by fellow villagers. The rest of the villagers boycotted the poll alleging that no welfare measures were undertaken in their area—Indian Express (P. Suryanarayana Murthy, Gudivada)

SRIKAKULAM: The electorate of Kotia villages in Parvathipuram parliamentary constituency, bordering Orissa and Andhra Pradesh, exercise their franchise officially twice in every election, according to Mrs Chandana Pyal, joint collector and returning officer of Parvathipuram. She says that both the states have been claiming the villages and at the time of elections, polling booths are set up by both the states. The practice is being carried out for the last 15 years—Indian Express (S. Rao, Vishakhapatnam)

WITHOUT COMMENT

Political leaders are different from political dealers. Sometimes dealers succeed but they don't lead the country, they deal with the country. Dealing with the country successfully at a particular time is not leading the nation—Chandra Shekhar in The Week

Our people believe in symbolism and I have become one of the symbols of the Janata government in the state. This is Indian culture—Ramakrishna Hegde in India Today

The opposition behaved like children fighting over whether they should have chocolates or cakes—Datta Samant in The Telegraph

We want an opposition. But it is not our job to develop them. They are all over 21—Arun Nehru in Blitz

In many ways it's similar, if you imagine India as a huge aircraft, but with a much longer response time—Rajiv Gandhi, when asked whether the training he got as an airline pilot was relevant to his present job, in Newsweek

A happy love life is for juveniles and cretins. Anyone who feels can never aspire to an untroubled love life—Pritish Nandy in Femina

Sujit Ghosh

If one day there's a holocaust in the world, it's in Calcutta that life will come back—Dominique Lapierre, famed novelist, in Celebrity

There is no cinema of the Third World...I think there is no difference between a good film from India and from any other part of the world. A film carries itself—Jeanne Moreau, chairperson of the 10th international film festival jury, in Indian Express

prize Rs 30 for the entry given first

BEGINNING 20 JANUARY 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) The week is particularly good for sportsmen. some of you will win rare honours. The period is equally favourable for those in service a promotion cannot be ruled out. However, businessmen should refrain from taking hasty decisions Friends and relatives will be very helpful to you this week. Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans. But watch your health closely this week.
Good dates: 21, 23 and 24
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 5
Favourable direction: North-west

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) This is the right time for businessmen to embark on new ventures. But professionals should be cautious while dealing with their superiors. Those unemployed are likely to get jobs during this lucky phase. Lovers are advised to steer clear of all controversies Financially, this is a good phase but avoid extravagance. Those above the age of 40 should be careful about their health
Good dates: 22, 24 and 25
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 6
Favourable direction: East

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) The week ahead is lucky for all of you. Businessmen will get new opportunities to expand their business while professionals will make steady progress Among students, those who have appeared for competitive examinations will come out with flying colours. On the financial front, some of you are likely to inherit wealth. Your health too will improve during this lucky period
Good dates: 20, 23 and 26
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: North

CANCER (15 July—14 August) This week someone close to you will be working to embarrass you. At office you are likely to incur the displeasure of your superiors exercise restraint in dealing with such a situation. Your health will add to your worries. However, this is the right time to solve legal disputes. Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans. A pleasure trip is in the offing.
Good dates: 21, 24 and 25
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 9
Favourable direction: South-west

LEO (15 August—14 September) Your economic status will steadily deteriorate. A word of advice: try and live within your means. Circumstances may force you to change your career, but before doing so consult your elders. However, the week is particularly favourable for sportsmen and commercial artists. The period is also good for love and matrimonial alliances. Avoid undertaking journeys this week.
Good dates: 22, 23 and 24
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: North-east

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) Women are likely to get married during this period For those in love, this is the right time to solve misunderstandings. This is also a favourable period for businessmen: do not hesitate to take risks Professionals too will be rewarded for their work. Financially, this is not a very bright phase: check extravagance. Keep a sharp eye on your health and diet.
Good dates: 21, 23 and 25
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: West

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) You will have to borrow money to tide over this lean period. Professionals are advised to be more diligent regarding their work. At home a member of your family may suddenly fall sick, adding to your worries. However, this is a favourable period for those in love and waiting to get married. A journey towards the end of the week will relieve you of all your tensions.
Good dates: 20, 22 and 24
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) Social engagements will keep you occupied for most of the week but avoid mixing business with pleasure. Businessmen should devote more time to their business. Take the advice of friends and elders before taking a crucial decision. For those in love, this is not the right time to get married. A pleasant surprise awaits you at the end of the week.
Good dates: 22, 24 and 26
Lucky numbers: 2, 4, 6
Favourable direction: South

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) Despite losses on the financial front most of you will make steady progress this week. The domestic front promises to remain inspiring. If you are in love this is the opportune time to propose marriage. Businessmen and professionals should not hesitate to take risks. Sportsmen too will be rewarded for their dedication. However, do not neglect your health.
Good dates: 24, 25 and 26
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: South-east

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) Financially, this is a lucky week: some of you will gain money from unexpected sources. The period is also good for sportsmen and artists. The domestic front will remain peaceful. The time is also favourable for lovers: if you have marriage plans this is the right time to execute it However, professionals should be diplomatic while dealing with their superiors or colleagues.
Good dates: 20, 23 and 26
Lucky numbers: 1, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: North

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) This is not a good week to settle legal disputes. Financially, this is a bleak phase. you may suffer losses but do not get upset as this is only a passing phase. Slow progress in all your dealings may strain your patience but avoid taking hasty decisions. Your health will add to your worries The weekend will keep you busy with social engagements but do not neglect your work.
Good dates: 20, 25 and 26
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: East

PISCES (15 March—14 April) The week is particularly lucky for lovers: you may go ahead with marriage plans. Businessmen are advised to push their efforts to the utmost. Professionals will also make steady headway. However, some of you are likely to suffer losses this week. At home your wife or one of your relatives may suddenly fall sick. Avoid undertaking pleasure trips.
Good dates: 21, 24 and 25
Lucky numbers: 2, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: North-west

For those born on the 20th, 21st or 22nd of any month:

By nature you are shy and not in the habit of giving vent to your feelings in public. Most of you are soft-spoken and lack leadership qualities. You have an artistic temperament and hence you will do well if you choose the creative arts as your profession. Financially, you are extravagant but this does not mean that you do not live within your means. To your friends you are popular and most of them look upon you for advice. Females born during this period will make good housewives.

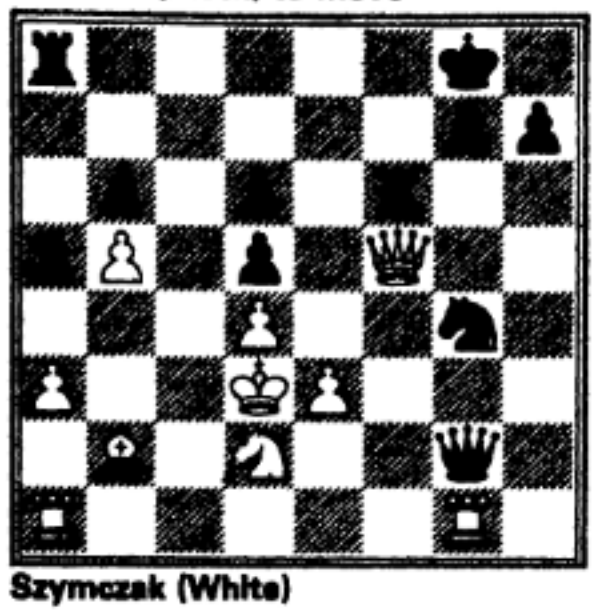
VARIETY

CHESS

Sacrificial attacks which persist deep into the endgame are to my mind aesthetically much more pleasing than the short, sharp shock games which tend to pervade chess columns such as this. The following from this year's Polish championship is a bit of a squeeze to get in but well worth the effort.

White: Szymczak. Black: Adamski. Szymczak. Nimzo-Indian Defence.

1 P–Q4	N–KB3	2 P–QB4	P–K3
3 N–KB3	P–QN3	4 N–B3	B–N5
5 Q–B2	B–N2	6 P–QR3	BxN+
7 QxB	0–0	8 P–K3	P–Q3
9 P–QN4	P–QR4	10 P–N5



Strategically a poor move. White must in the long run seek to close off the black bishop by P–Q5 but now this will always leave a gaping hole on QB4 for a black knight.

10 . . .	QN–Q2	11 B–N2	N–K5
12 Q–B2	P–KB4	13 B–Q3	Q–K2
14 0–0	R–B3!

Heralding the beginning of a terrible onslaught tactically made possible by White's feeble tenth move. If 15 P–Q5 R–N3 16 BxN PxB 17 QxP N–B4 will reopen the diagonal, as 18 Q–Q4 N–N6 costs an exchange.

15 P–B5	B–Q4	16 PxQP	PxP

Adamski (Black) to move

Szymczak (White)

17 N–Q2	R–KR3	18 P–B3	Q–R5

19 PxN

No choice. If 19 P–R3 N–N4 a nasty sacrificial finish is imminent.

19 . . .	PxP	20 BxP	QxP+
21 K–B2	N–B3!

An important moment. Black needs another piece in the attack.

22 BxB	N–N5+	23 K–K2	PxB
24 Q–B5	QxP+	25 K–Q3	R–B3
26 R–KN1!		DIAGRAM

It seems that White is crawling out, for if 26 . . . N–B7+ 28 K–B2 all the black pieces are hanging. The attack however is not to be denied.

26 . . .	QxN+!	27 KxQ	RxQ
28 RxN	R–B7+	29 K–B3	R–QB1+
30 K–N3	P–R5+	31 K–R2	R(1)–B7
32 R–QN1	P–R4!

Despite the exchanges, Black's position remains overwhelming. The white king, rook, bishop triangle can never untangle, meanwhile Black's two kingside pawns are heading for a touchdown.

33 R–N5	P–R5	34 R–R5	R–R7
35 RxQP	P–R6	36 R–R5	P–N3
37 R–R4	P–N4	38 R–R5	R(B7)–KN7
39 P–Q5	P–N5	40 K–R1	P–N6
41 P–K4	RxB!	42 RxR	RxR

43 RxP

Or 43 K:R P–N7 44 R–N5+ K–B2 and . . . P–R7.

43 . . .	R–N6	44 Resigns.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE

Would you fancy your chances in Six Diamonds on the deal below? You never can tell, even at world championship level. Mind you, you will have to play it cleverly and encounter imperfect defence.

Dealer East Game all

	♠ 5 ♥ K 10 9 4 3 ♦ 6 3 ♣ K Q 5 4 3
♠ 10 7 ♥ Q 5 2 ♦ K 8 ♣ 10 9 8 7 6 2	N W E S	♠ K Q J 9 8 4 2 ♥ 8 7 ♦ Q 10 9 ♣ J
	♠ A 6 3 ♥ A J 6 ♦ A J 7 5 4 2 ♣ A

This was the bidding in the match between Italy and Brazil:

South	West	North	East
De Falco	Chagas	Franco	Branco
—	—	—	3♠
4♦	No	5♦	No
6♦	No	No	No

Declarer won the spade lead, cashed the ace of clubs, ruffed a spade, and led the king of clubs from the table. East ruffed with the 9 of diamonds and was overruffed. The declarer played ace and another diamond and West, on lead, had no more spades. When the remaining trumps were played off he was caught in a show-up squeeze.

East's ruff with the 9 of diamonds was an error. What, after all, was the declarer trying to do, leading the king of clubs before drawing trumps? East must either refrain from ruffing or ruff with the queen.

Meanwhile, the great Chagas, hero of so many brilliancies, missed one when he failed to drop the king of diamonds under the ace.

Reviewing one of Victor Mollo's 'Animal' books, I remarked a little sourly that I would have disposed in three lines of a deal to which he devoted three pages. No such criticism applies to I Challenge You (Methuen, £7.95), which contains 200 neat problems in the middle range.

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. What do the following places have in common: Madagascar, Sri Lanka, Ireland, New Guinea and Crete?
2. The samadhi of Mahatma Gandhi is in Delhi. Where is the samadhi of his wife Kasturba Gandhi?
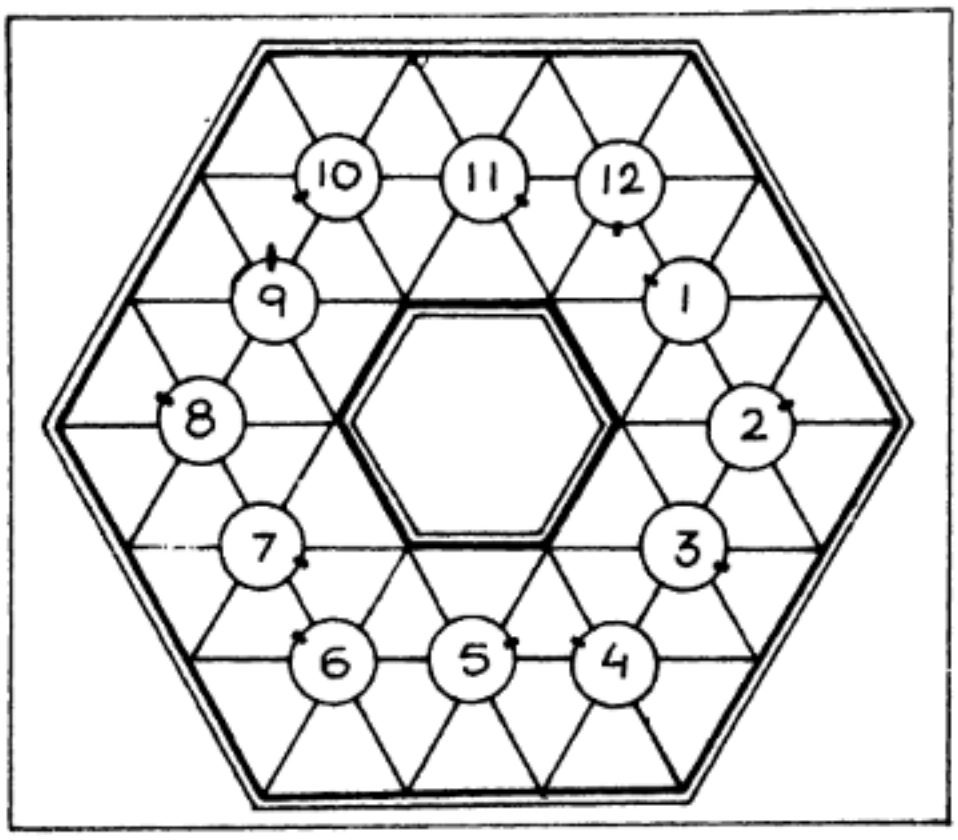
3. In alchemy, what substance is said to turn a base metal into gold?
4. Which well-known spirit also known as "jenever" and "schnapps," is distilled from malt and barley and flavoured with juniper berries?
5. The Russian kings were known as Czars. What were the German kings called?
6. Zeeland is the former name of which European country?
7. Name the famous Indian scientist and former chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission of India who was killed in an aircrash in the Alps in 1966?
8. Name the rank in the Indian Air Force equivalent to major in the Indian Army?
9. What is the Mafia, the Italian crime organisation known as in the United States?
10. Name the priest or friar who is associated with the adventures of Robin Hood in Sherwood Forest?
11. Gary Sobers was the first cricketer to hit six sixes in a six-ball over in first class cricket. Who was the bowler?
12. How is Jean Francois Marie Arouet better known as?
13. Which city is known as the Manchester of India?
14. What is the collective noun of larks called?



ANSWERS

1. They are all islands.
2. In Poona, at the grounds of the Aga Khan Palace.
3. The Philosopher's Stone.
4. Gin.
5. Kaiser.
6. Denmark.
7. Dr Homi Bhabha.
8. Squadron Leader.
9. The Cosa Nostra.
10. Friar Tuck.
11. Malcolm Nash.
12. The French philosopher-writer Voltaire.
13. Ahmedabad.
14. An exaltation.

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Word Play

The object of this hexagonal word maze is to fit in 12 six-letter words into the blanks, according to the clues given below. Each word is to be entered around the appropriate number in this maze, beginning at the triangle indicated by the short line. Proceed one letter per space, either in a clockwise or anti-clockwise direction. The direction, in each case, is for you to determine.

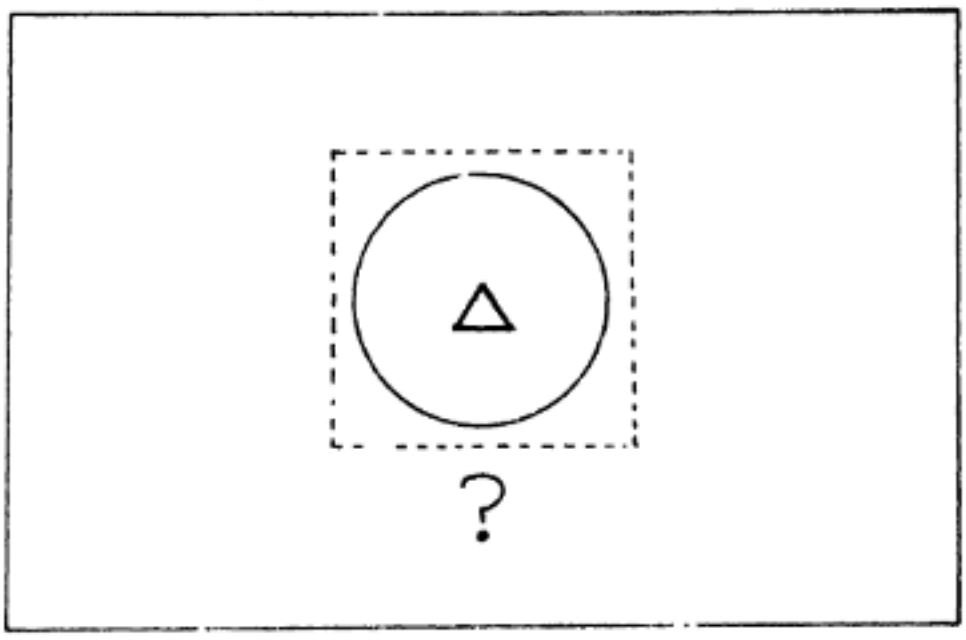
Clues:

1. Winding around a centre.
2. Very sad.
3. Baby pig.
4. Relating to a metre.
5. High school exam?
6. Where tennis may be played.
7. Decors shifted.
8. Very strict
9. Works as a sculptor.
10. Food for a bunny!
11. Fear or dismay.
12. Prawn.

Namegame

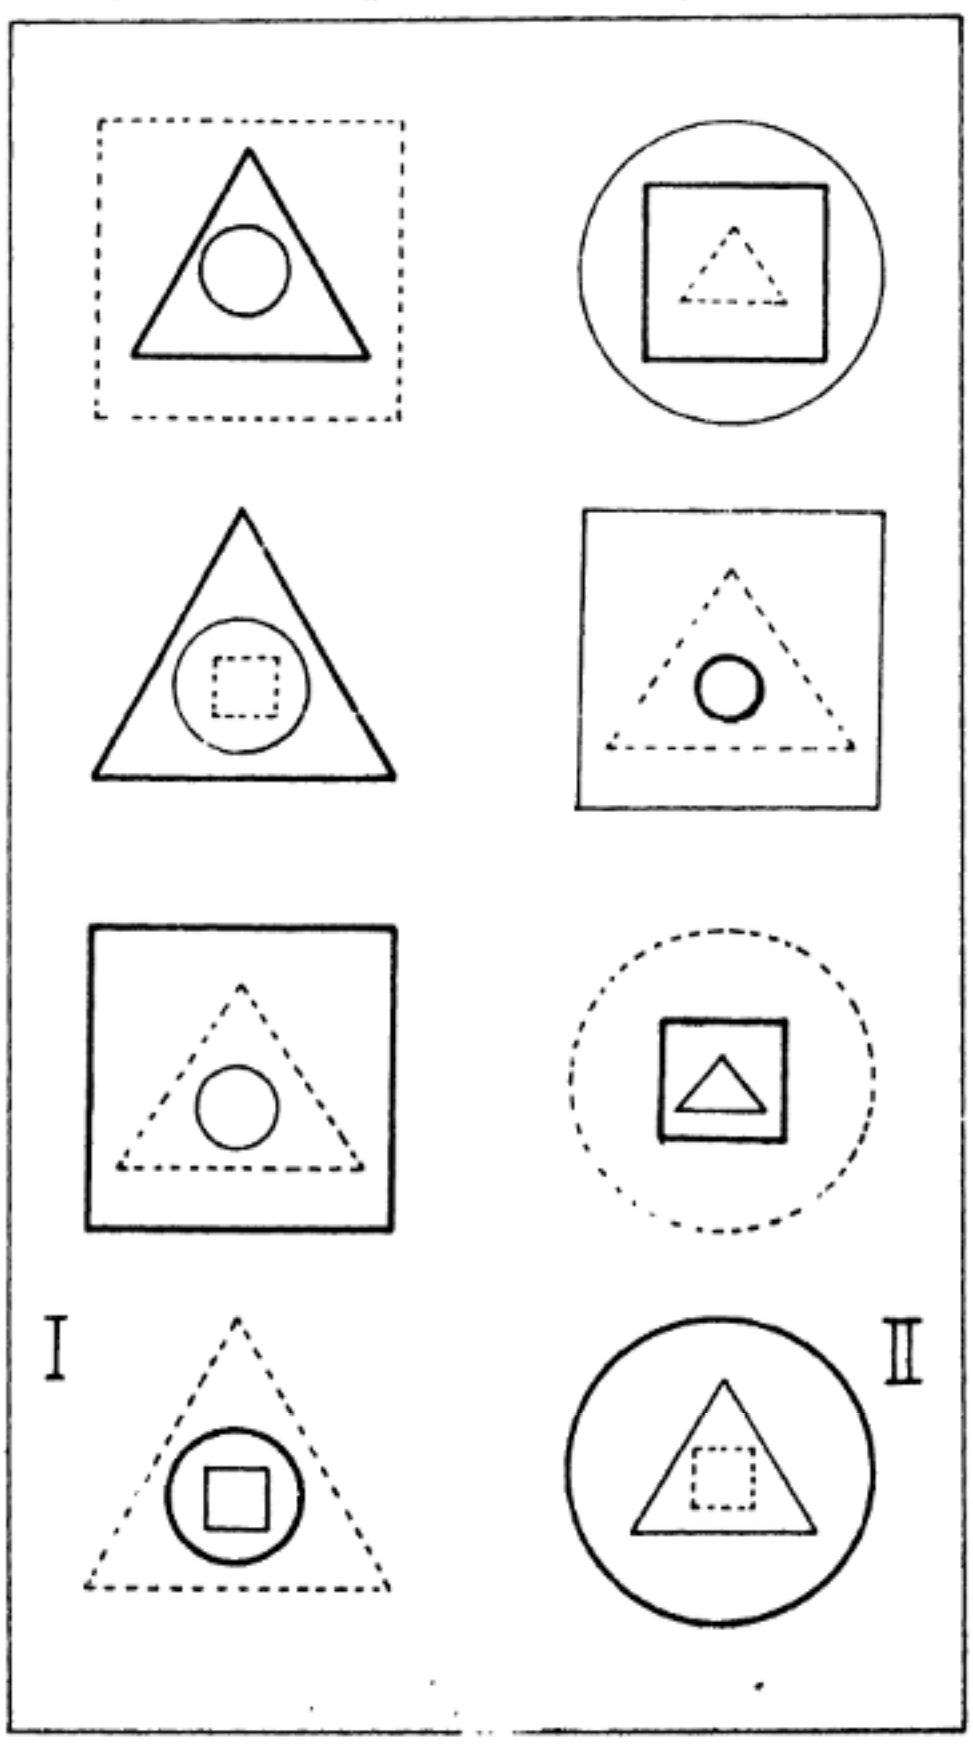
If Madame Tory is Margaret Thatcher, who are the following:

India's Glory.
Medallist Swimmer.
Carry on, Legs.
Nimble Cartwheeler.
London's Delight.
Actor Bygone.



Really?

Did you know that the cricket has its ears on its knees and the butterfly, on the base of its wings!

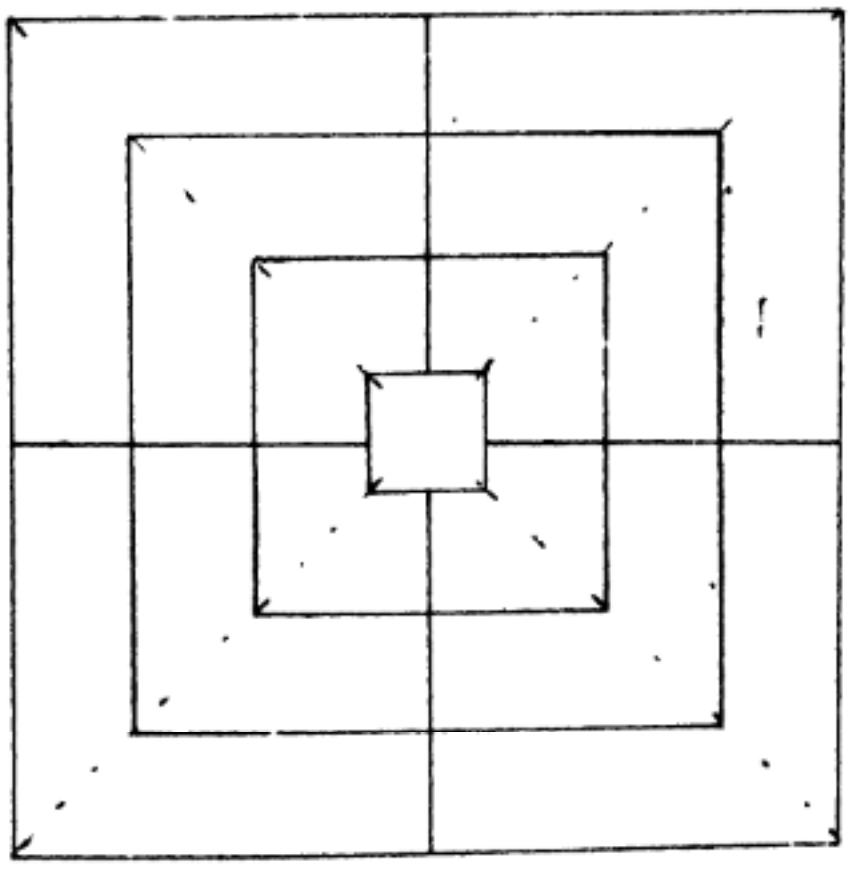


Quizbizz

How many things beginning with S can you think of which can be worn on your feet?

Wit Sharpener

To which category of illustrations: Group I or Group II below, does the diagram above belong?



What's in a Word

Can you sort out this fruit cocktail? What other meanings do these fruits have?
Lemon
Prune
Bananas
Apple
Pineapple
Mandarin
Raspberry

Figure It Out

Using numbers from 1 to 13, fill in numbers along the diagonals, one in each section of the illustration, so that each semi-diagonal adds upto 28.

Solutions to last week's Teasers:
Cryptocross:

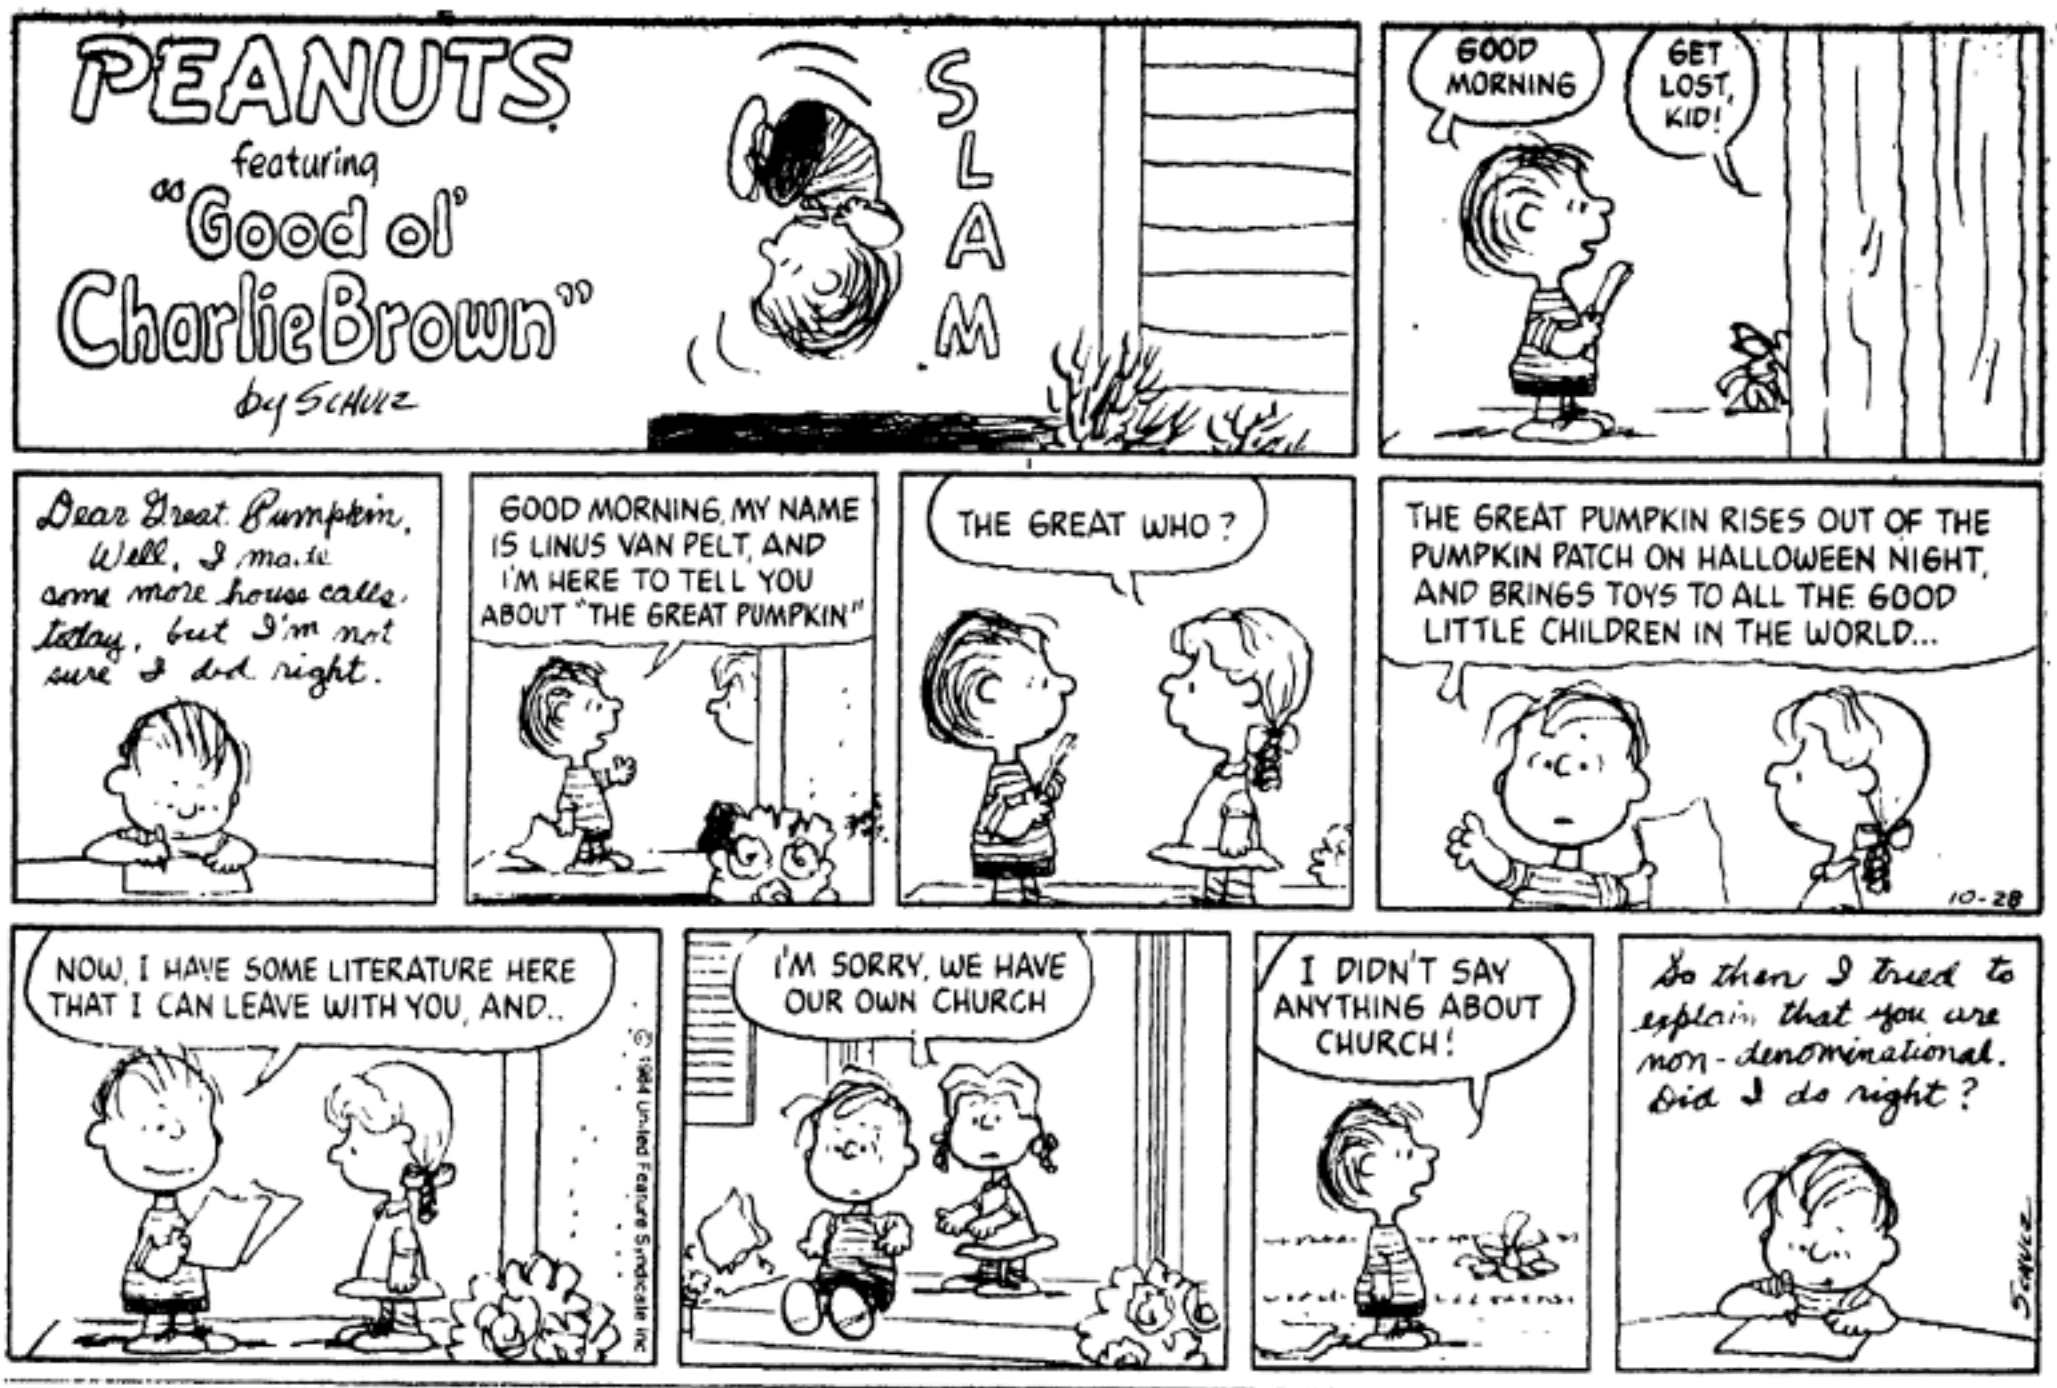
A	C	U	T	E	■	J	A	N	I	T	O	R
■	O	■	O	■	■	■	X	■	N	■	R	■
B	R	A	K	E	■	A	L	M	I	R	A	H
■	A	■	E	L	M	■	E	■	T	■	T	■
B	L	A	N	K	E	T	■	V	I	X	E	N
■	S	■	■	■	R	■	S	■	A	■	D	■
■	■	S	P	A	R	I	N	G	L	Y	■	■
■	A	■	A	■	Y	■	O	■	■	■	P	■
A	Z	U	R	E	■	S	W	I	N	D	L	E
■	A	■	Q	■	W	■	S	■	O	■	A	■
A	L	L	U	D	E	D	■	A	V	O	I	D
■	E	■	E	■	A	■	■	■	E	■	C	■
F	A	S	T	I	N	G	■	F	L	I	E	S

B	I	L	E	A	N
V	C	W	Y	S	J
T	H	D	K	P	F
R	O	U	Z	Q	M
X	G

Shape Sleuth:
No. 5. Imagine the first square in each horizontal line being superimposed on the second square. Certain lines overlap. After you remove the overlapping lines, you are left with the pattern in the third square.

Quick Think:
There were seven. They were two little girls, one little boy, their father and mother, and their father's parents.

Wit Sharpener:
Ram is 14 years old (clue a) and Sisir is not 13 (clue b). Therefore Sisir must be 12 years old and comes to school in a rickshaw (clue b). Barun does not cycle and so he must come by bus and his surname is Mukherjee (clue d). Sisir's surname is not Bose (clue e) and therefore it must be Sen, and Ram's surname is Bose. To summarise: Ram Bose, aged 14 comes by cycle, Barun Mukherjee, aged 13 comes by bus, Sisir Sen, aged 12 comes by rickshaw.



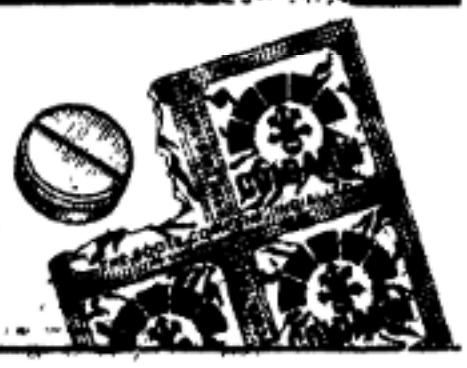
Scrambles:
Palestine, China, Argentina, Yemen, Bermuda, Angola, Israel and Algeria.

What's in a Word:
Chinchilla, Assassin, Propriety, Mesmerism, Clinging, Abominable.

Mindbender:
The Sheik loaned them a camel so that they had 18 to be divided. Then the first son took 1/2 (that is 9), the second took 1/3 (that is 6) and the third took 1/9 (that is 2).

Blockbuster:

		D
	A	I
M	R	N
P	E	T	E



DON'T SNEEZE YOUR DAY AWAY.

Don't let a cold ruin your day. Runny nose, congestion and a heavy head. Typical symptoms of a cold. You suffer. Your day suffers. Why not do the sensible thing? Try Coldarin. It's a specially formulated tablet for colds. So convenient. Such a relief!

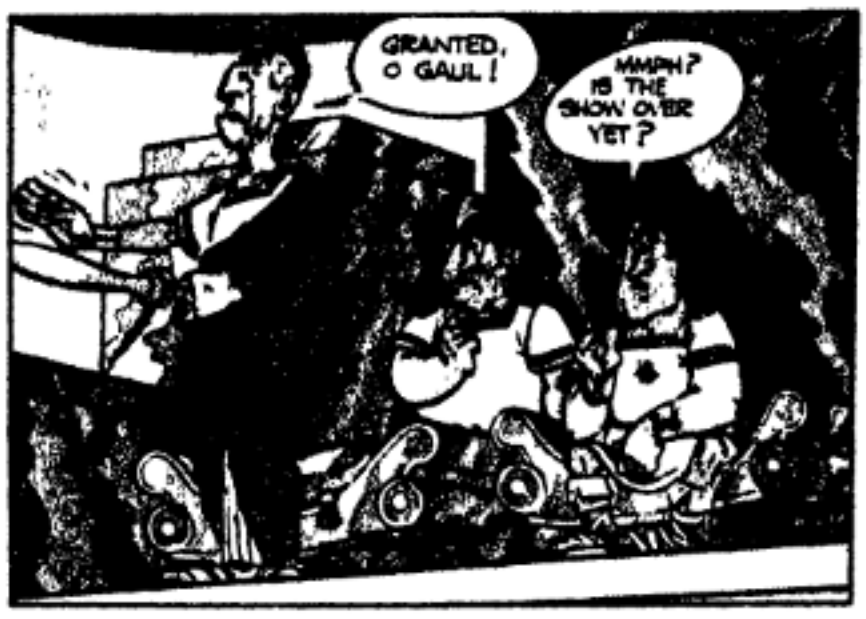
Why have a cold? Have a Coldarin.

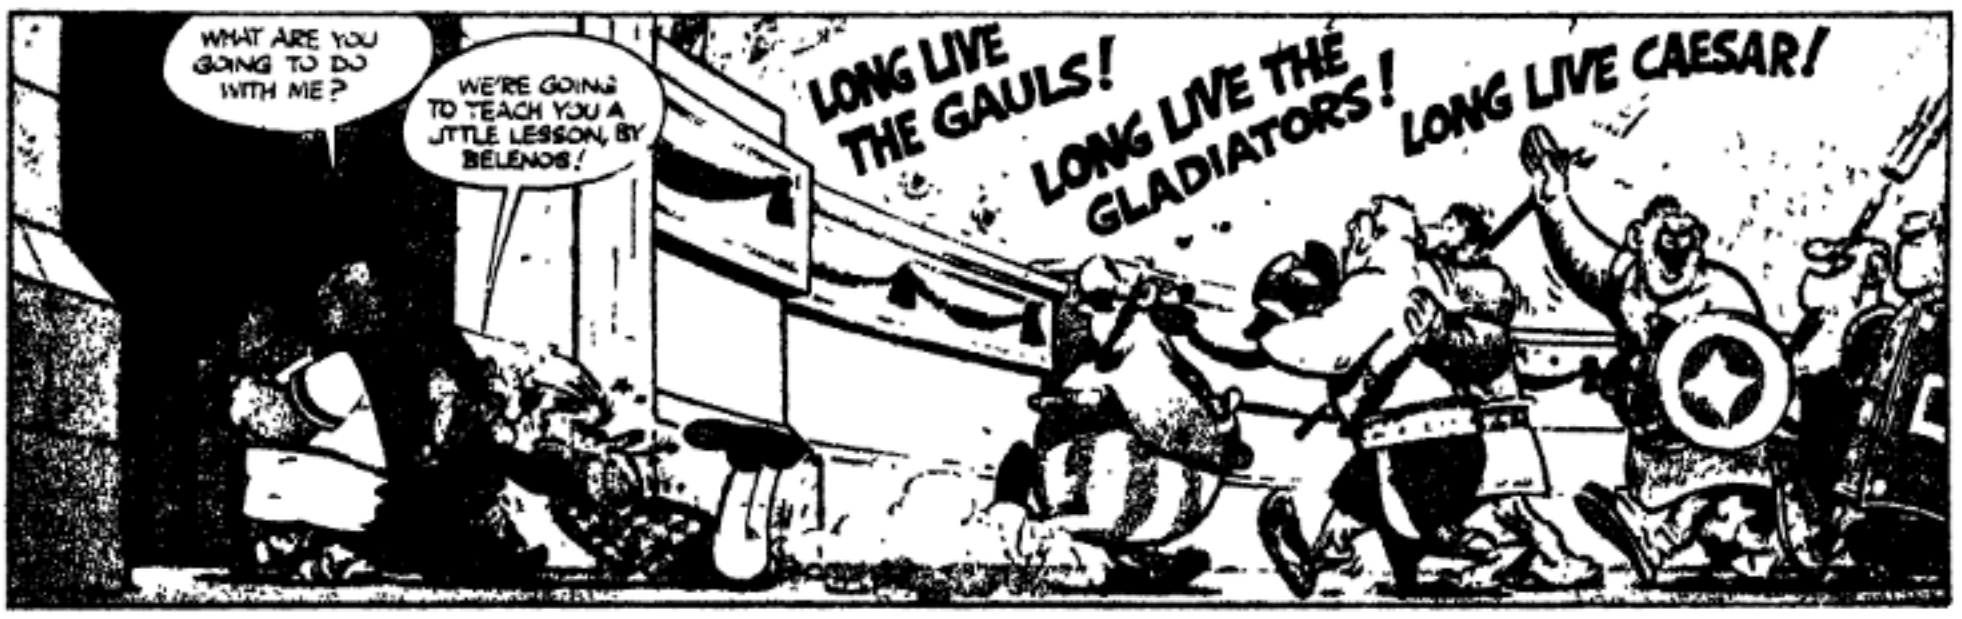
CASBC-111-124



COMICS

Asterix

THE GLADIATOR BY GOSCINNY AND UNDERZO



DELHI DIARY

"I" or "U"?

Why was Arif Mohammad Khan not made a minister of state with independent charge? This youngest-ever minister (he became a deputy minister when he was 30 and a minister of state a year later; now he is 33) should have been promoted, considering that Ghulam Nabi Azad, another young minister, has been elevated from deputy ministership The portfolio allocated to Arif Mohammad Khan is important—industry and company affairs—which has been retained by the Prime Minister. For all practical purposes, he is the industry and company affairs minister Then why was he not given independent charge? One explanation could be the alphabetical order of names. Arif with an "I" precedes Arun with an "U." Hence, in the list of ministers of state without independent charge, had Arif Mohammad Khan not been there, then Arun Kumar Nehru would have been at the top. Perhaps, after having decided to cut the Member of Parliament from Rae Bareili to size by making him a junior minister in the three-tier formation of the cabinet, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi decided not to put Arun Nehru at the top of the list. In the Doordarshan news on 31 December night, however, when the portfolios were announced, Arun Nehru's name was announced before Arif Mohammad Khan's. Arun Nehru is the minister of state for power, under B. Shankaranand, the cabinet minister for irrigation and power. Even if not as powerful as before, Arun Nehru has literally been allocated power.

Sondeep Shankar

Arif Mohammad Khan

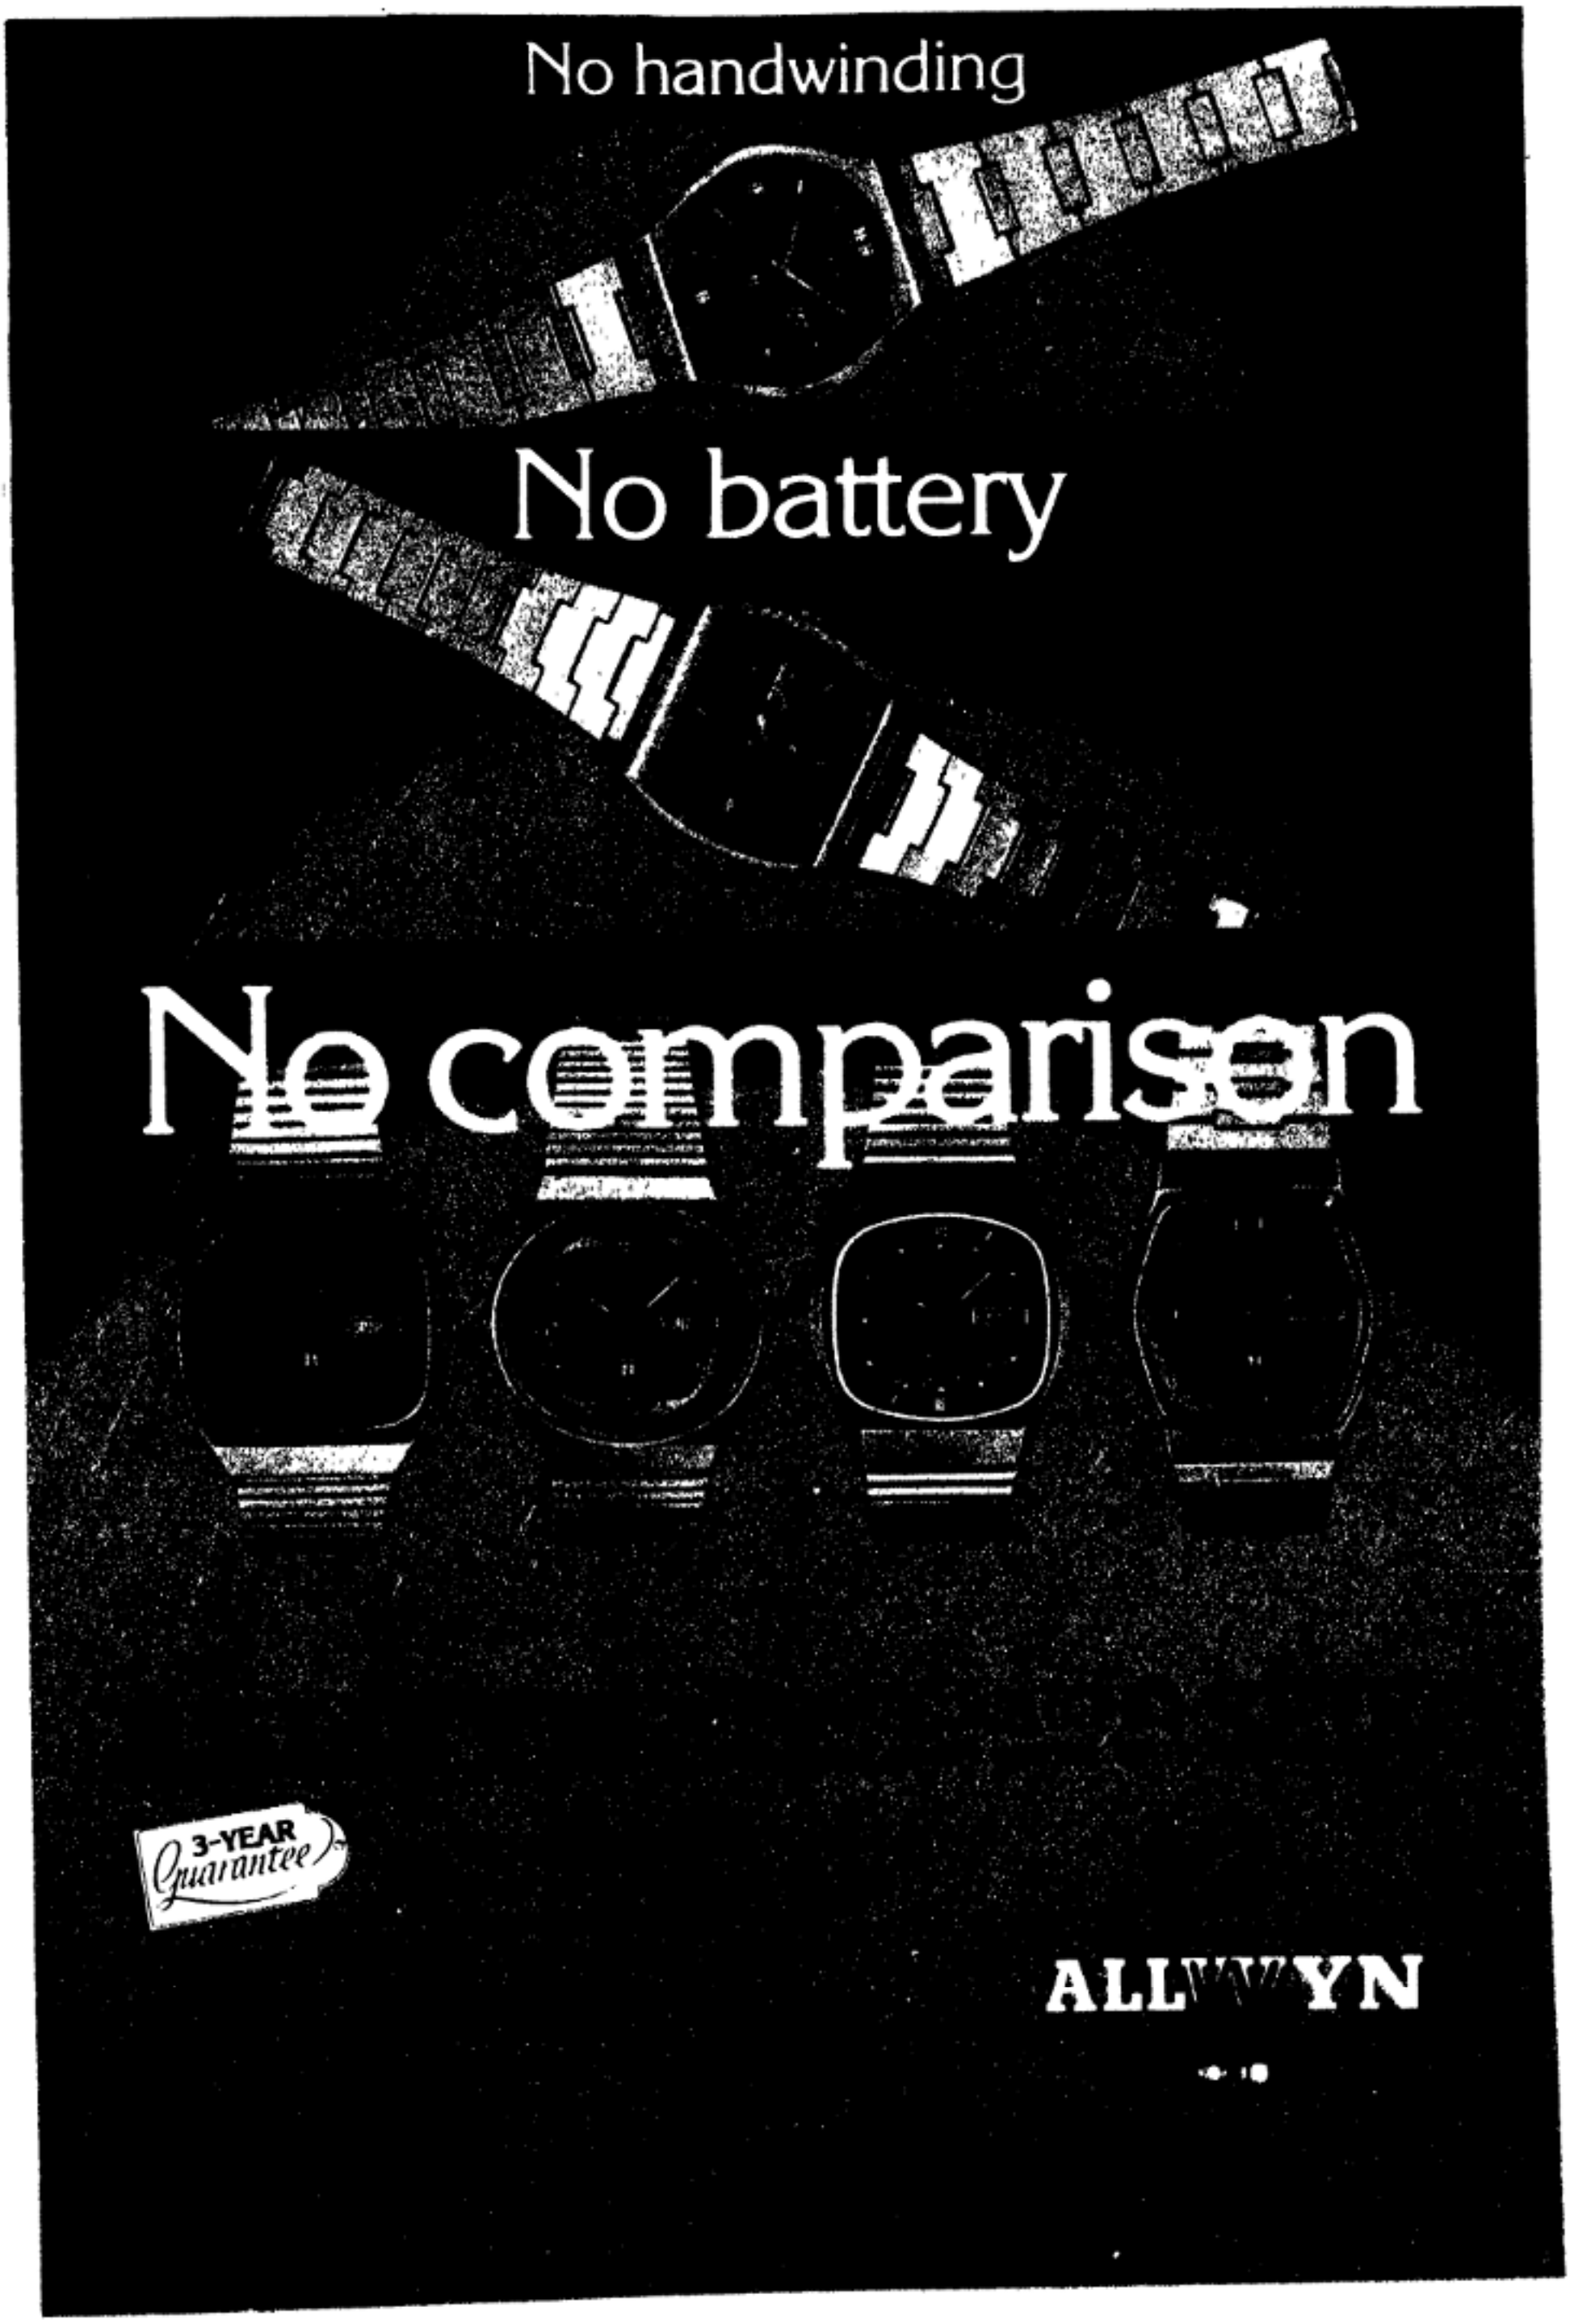
Whose Bread?

Have you bought bread recently at a cheaper price? Have the prices of maida or suji gone down? These questions may baffle housewives, but even more baffled than them are the officers of the civil supplies ministry in the capital. Some months back the government reduced the supply price of wheat to the flour mills Till then wheat was available at Rs 2.08 per kg. And the mills, by and large, were working to 40 per cent of their capacity After the government's decision, the supply price of wheat was reduced to Rs 1.72 per kg and as a result the mills started functioning to near cent per cent capacity. The result of this should have been more supply of maida and suji to the market and a resultant fall in the consumer price of these two items as well as that of bread. Someone, somewhere has cornered the "bread"—the benefit has not reached the consumers, whom the civil supplies ministry is supposed to cater to

Importance of Parliamentary Affairs

The new ministry has three ministers who have been given full-time charge of parliamentary affairs The senior politician from Delhi, Har Kishan Lal Bhagat, is the cabinet minister Margaret Alva of the Rajya Sabha and Ghulam Nabi Azad of the Lok Sabha are the ministers of state. Of them, Margaret Alva has an excellent parliamentary record. She was in the opposition till two years ago (as a member of the Congress-S she was elected from Karnataka with the Janata Party's support in 1980) As an opposition member, she had hit the headlines with her brilliant exposure of the Centurion tanks deal, in which the government had found it difficult to defend its stand. Later, as a ruling party member, she was put on the panel of presiding officers and her performance reminded many oldtimers of her mother-in-law, the late Violet Alva, who was deputy chairman of the Rajya Sabha in the Seventies. It seems that the government intends to take parliamentary work more seriously.

Sanjay Rishi



H.K.L. Bhagat

Long Innings

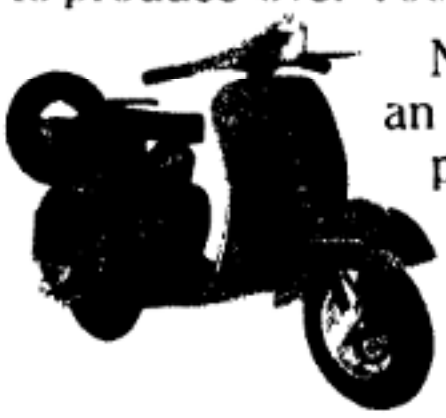
While journalists were looking embarrassed due to the failure of all projections regarding the general elections, an era ended in the news agencies of India on 31 December Wilfred Lazarus, former general manager of Samachar, the news agency of Emergency fame and ex-principal information officer of the government retired after four decades of news agency journalism The last posts held by Lazarus should not mislead us into believing that he had always led a comfortable life as a journalist. Having joined the Press Trust of India (PTI) in 1944, Lazarus became a legendary reporter who covered events abroad. His high watermark was his posting in the Middle East in the late Fifties and early Sixties, when he covered the Congo crisis in Africa and PTI was relied upon more than any other agency due to Lazarus's reporting. He was jailed in Congo but he managed to escape. He had earlier covered the events in Burma in the Forties and later in Nepal when the revolution took place When during the Emergency Samachar was formed by combining all news agencies in the country, he became the top boss of the setup. (Samachar was dismantled by the Janata Party.) Soon after the Congress returned to power in 1980, Lazarus, a favourite of Sanjay Gandhi, was made the PIO. His term expired in 1982. As PIO his performance was not remarkable. The seasoned Central Information Service hand, U.C. Tiwari, who was his second man, managed to outshine him and replaced him as soon as Lazarus's contract ended In the last two years of his service, this newsman led a quiet life.

D.E. Nizamuddin

No handwinding
No battery
No comparison
3-YEAR Guarantee
ALLWYN

Regd. No. WB/cc/256/TN/MS(C)376 MH-By-South/680

BAJAJ 4 2416



Bajaj Automatically

If someone asked you to name India's largest scooter manufacturer, whose name would come to mind first?

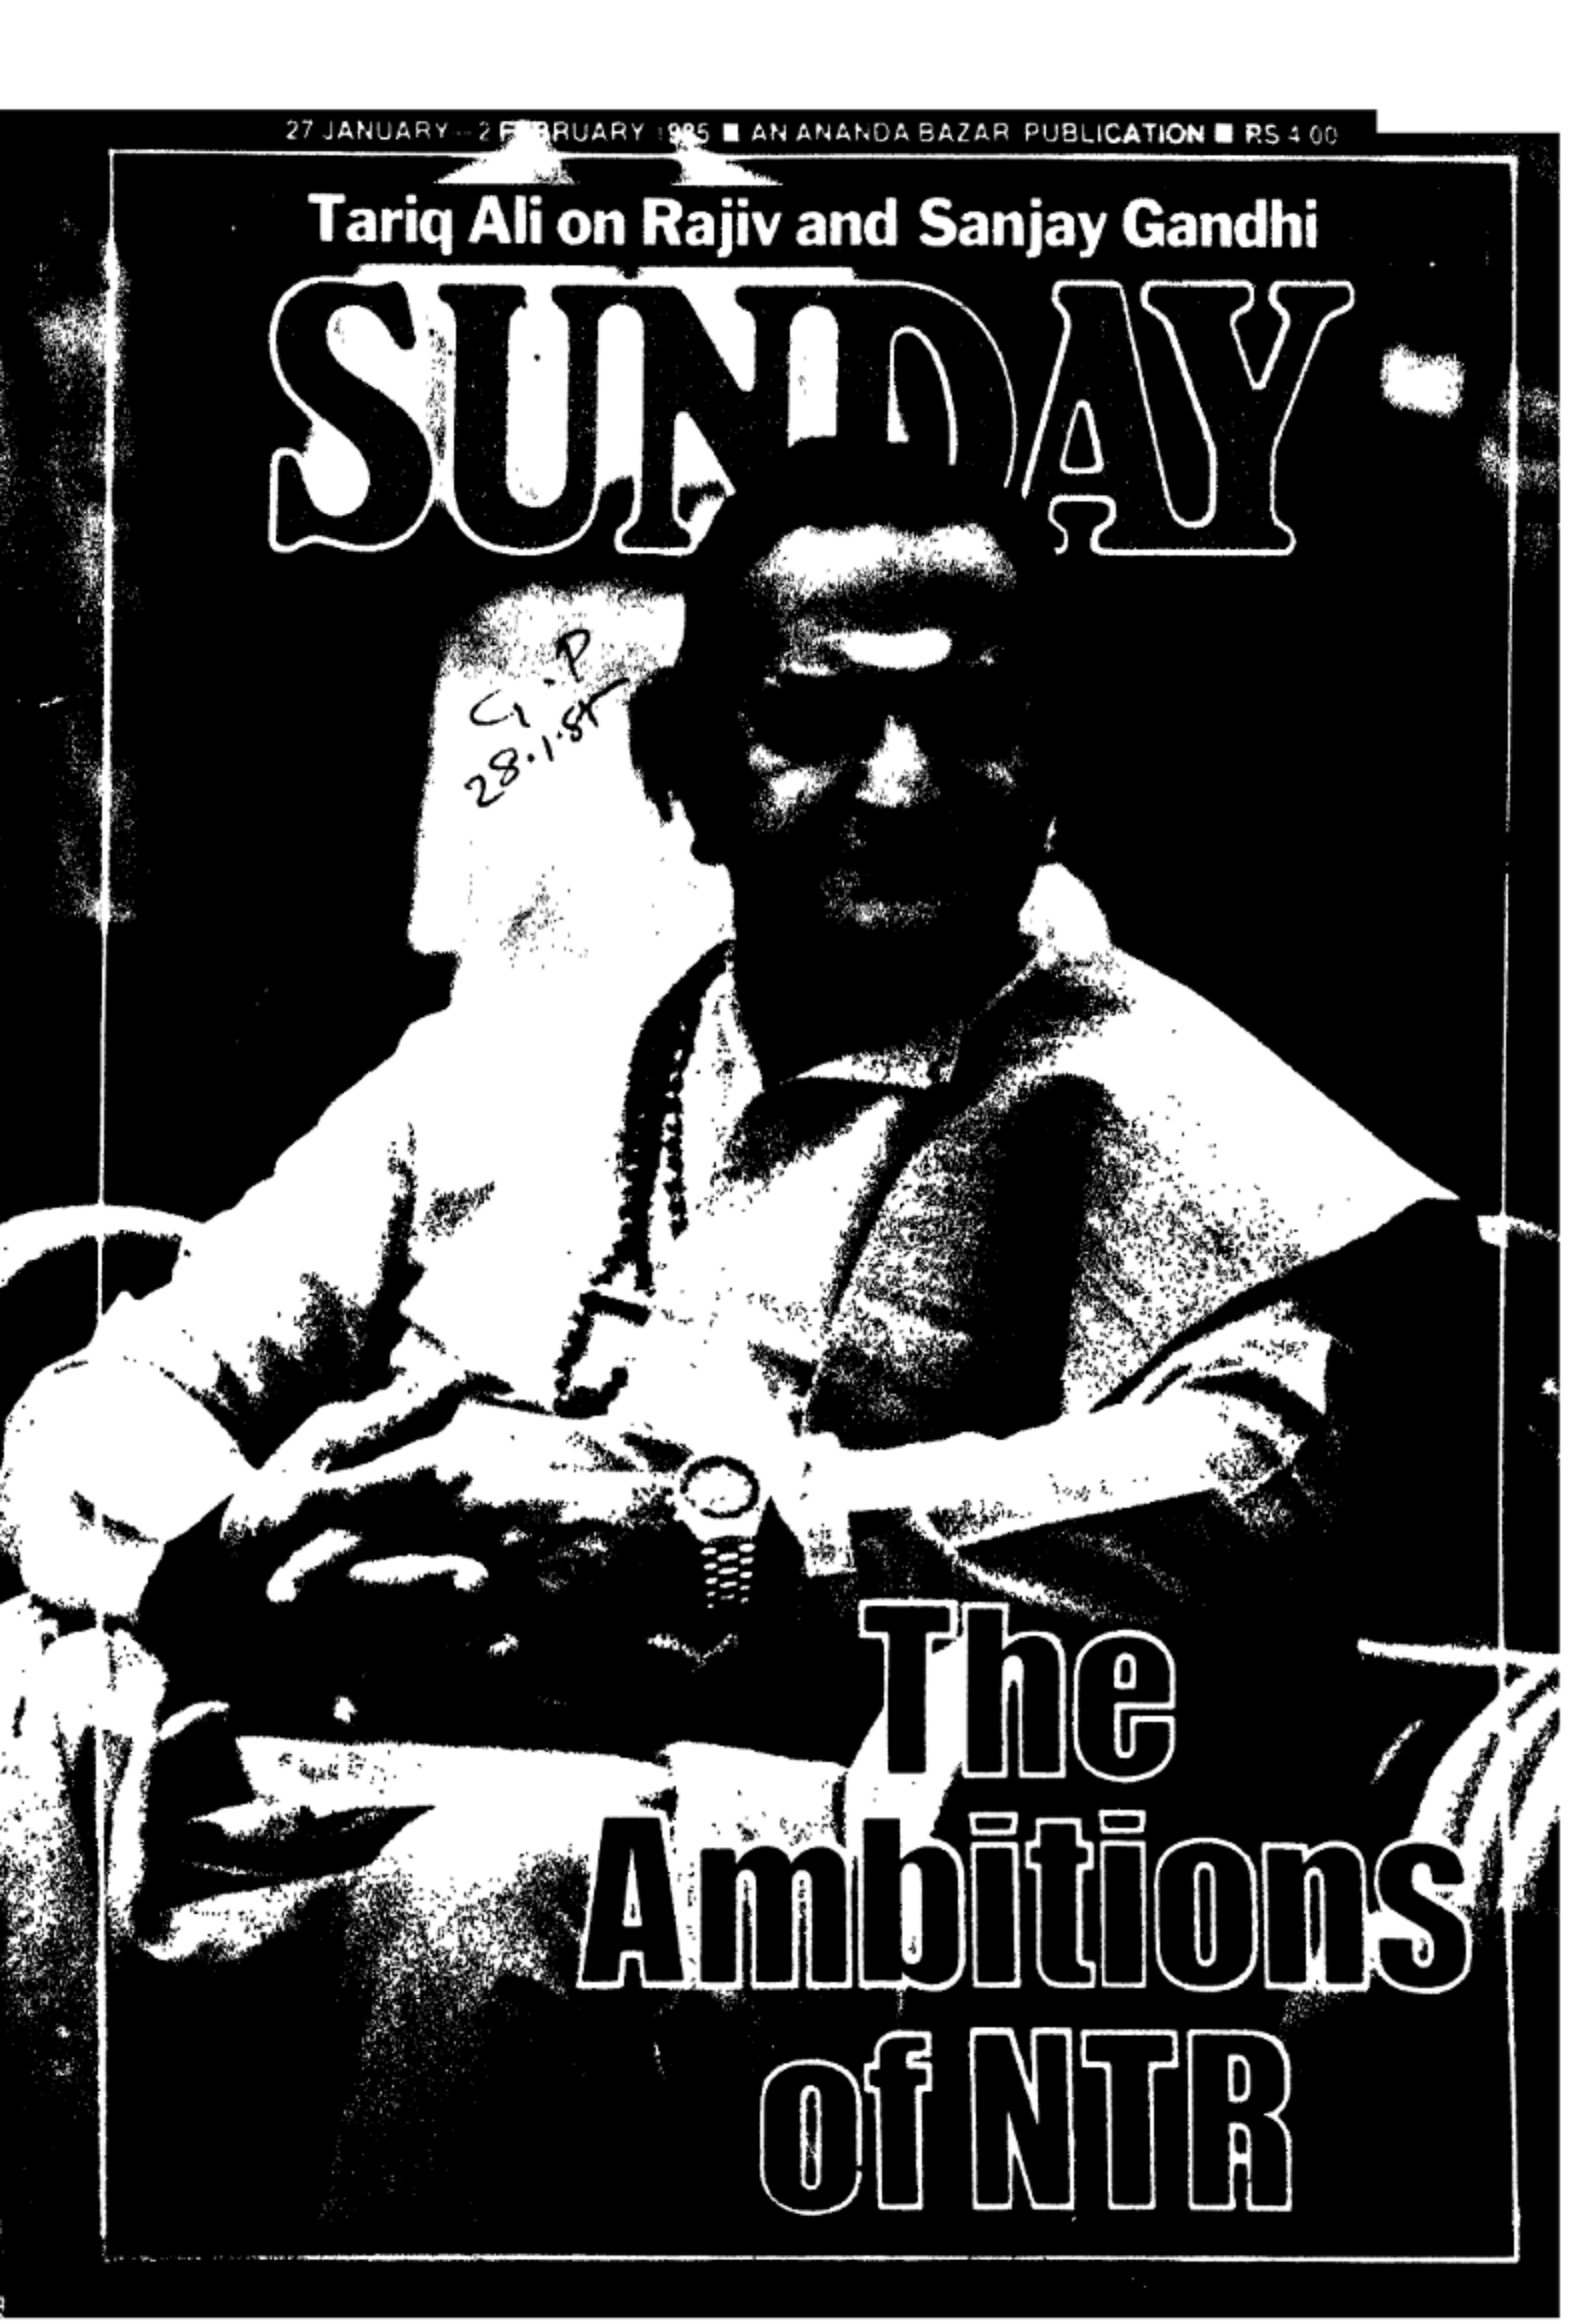
If you were told there is a plant in India which turns out one scooter every minute, who would you think of first? Bajaj Auto, automatically.

But the waiting list for Bajaj scooters is too long even for such a plant; though it is as big as any single scooter plant in the world.

So, Bajaj Auto is setting up two new plants which will help us to produce over 700,000 vehicles a year.

Normally, it takes years to commission such an operation. But with our experience, we plan to start production at Aurangabad by 1985 and Agra by 1986.

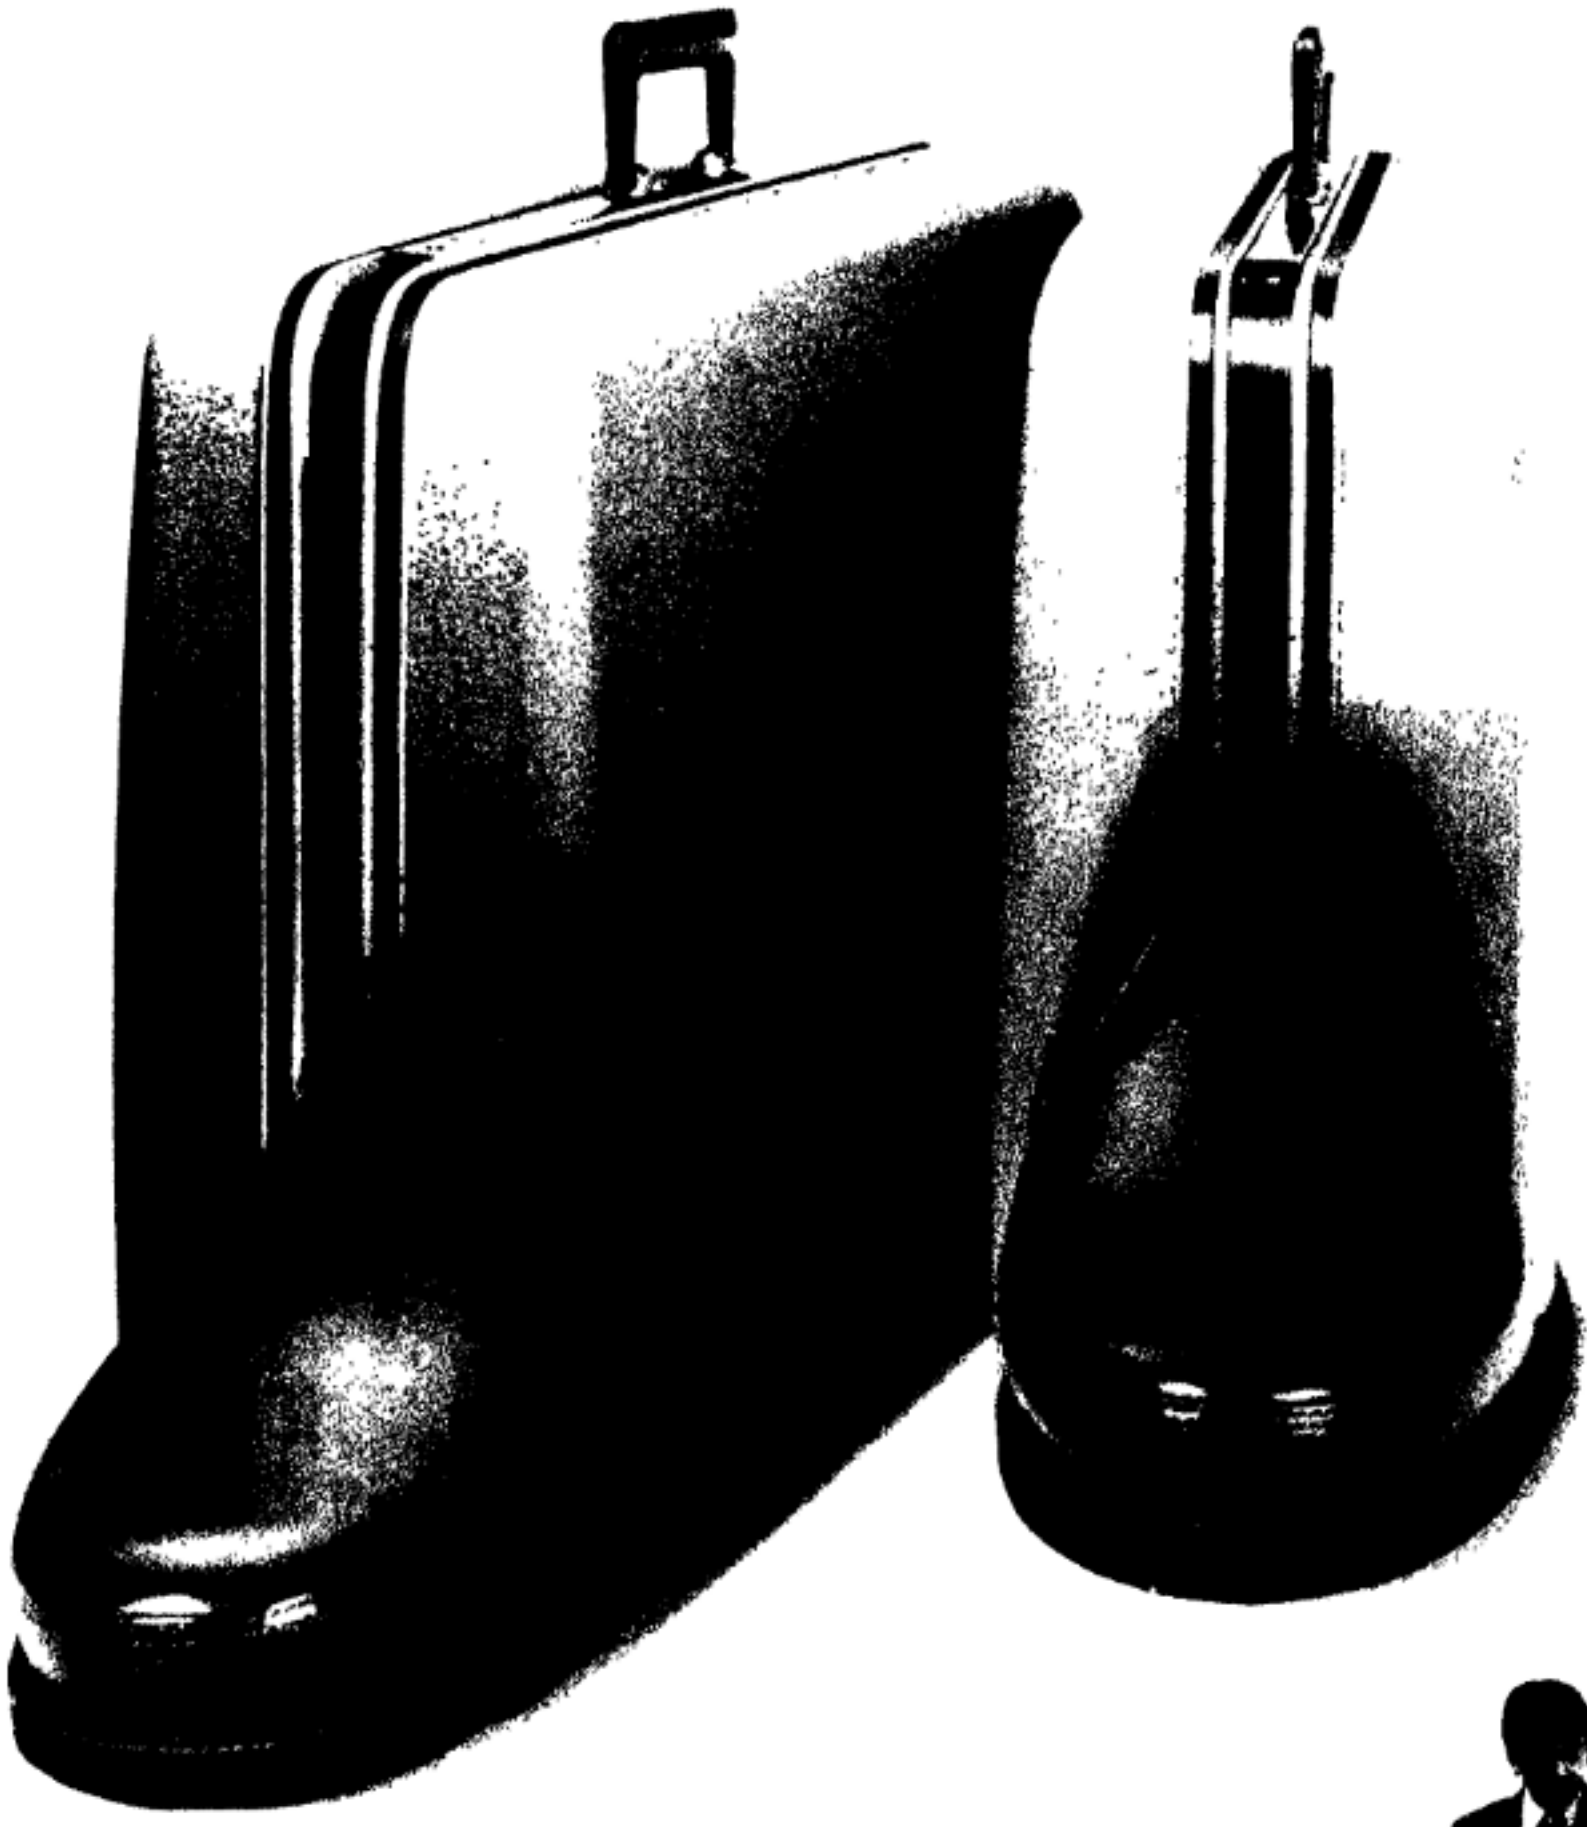
Which should keep Bajaj Auto the leader for years to come; automatically.



bajaj auto ltd

Value for money, for years

27 JANUARY – 2 FEBRUARY 1985 ■ AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION ■ RS 4.00



Tariq Ali on Rajiv and Sanjay Gandhi

SUNDAY

The Ambitions of NTR

Let's not call a spade a shovel.
Safari is not what dreams are made of.
It's the down to earth luggage for travel.

You have enough on your mind The new project Endless reports and formalities.
And the pressures of travelling at short notice This is the high tension world of Safari.

Compose yourself Details like clothes and personal effects are best left to the luggage that sails through the hurly-burly of airports and hotel lobbies.

Safari. The no-nonsense luggage built to perform common chores uncommonly well.
It's tough and handsome. Comes in classy, subdued colours.
Agile in crowded corners on its recessed wheels.

Safari. It survives.

safari

The luggage that knows its business.

ULKA-SL-200-84

Now! Bite into the international taste of chocolate

Take a bite and get an altogether new experience. A rich, creamy experience that only a chocolate made by Cadbury's from dairy-fresh milk, can offer. New Cadbury's Dairy Milk is just that. Just like the one that's made Cadbury's the international standard in chocolate.

New Cadbury's Dairy Milk

OBM/4156

Made for each other
Wills Filter set the filter trend in cigarettes long years ago. Today it's still the finest. In taste, in satisfaction. Hand-picked virginia tobaccos married to an efficient filter make it so. Millions of smokers have discovered it, then stayed with it.
WILLS FILTER
WILLS
FILTER TIPPED

27 JANUARY—2 FEBRUARY 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 □ ISSUE 12 □ RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

The Ambitions of NTR

After successfully stemming the Rajiv wave in Andhra Pradesh, chief minister N.T. Ramarao has decided to extend his vision beyond the borders of his state: he will launch the Bharat Desam later this year. Chidanand Rajghatta finds out the implications of this move.

INVESTIGATION 24

Enemies of the State

On 18 January '85 Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi made a startling statement on the floor of both the Houses: several persons holding sensitive posts in the government had been arrested on charges of spying. Of the five government officers held, one of them was identified as the personal assistant to the PM's principal secretary. A report by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya.

Page 14

Page 46

EXTRACTS 46

The Nation's Grandchildren

There have been many political families in the world but none has wielded power so consistently over their country as the Nehru-Gandhi family. In this extract from Tariq Ali's book, The Nehrus and the Gandhis: An Indian Dynasty, the author traces the rise of Rajiv and Sanjay Gandhi.

NEWS 55

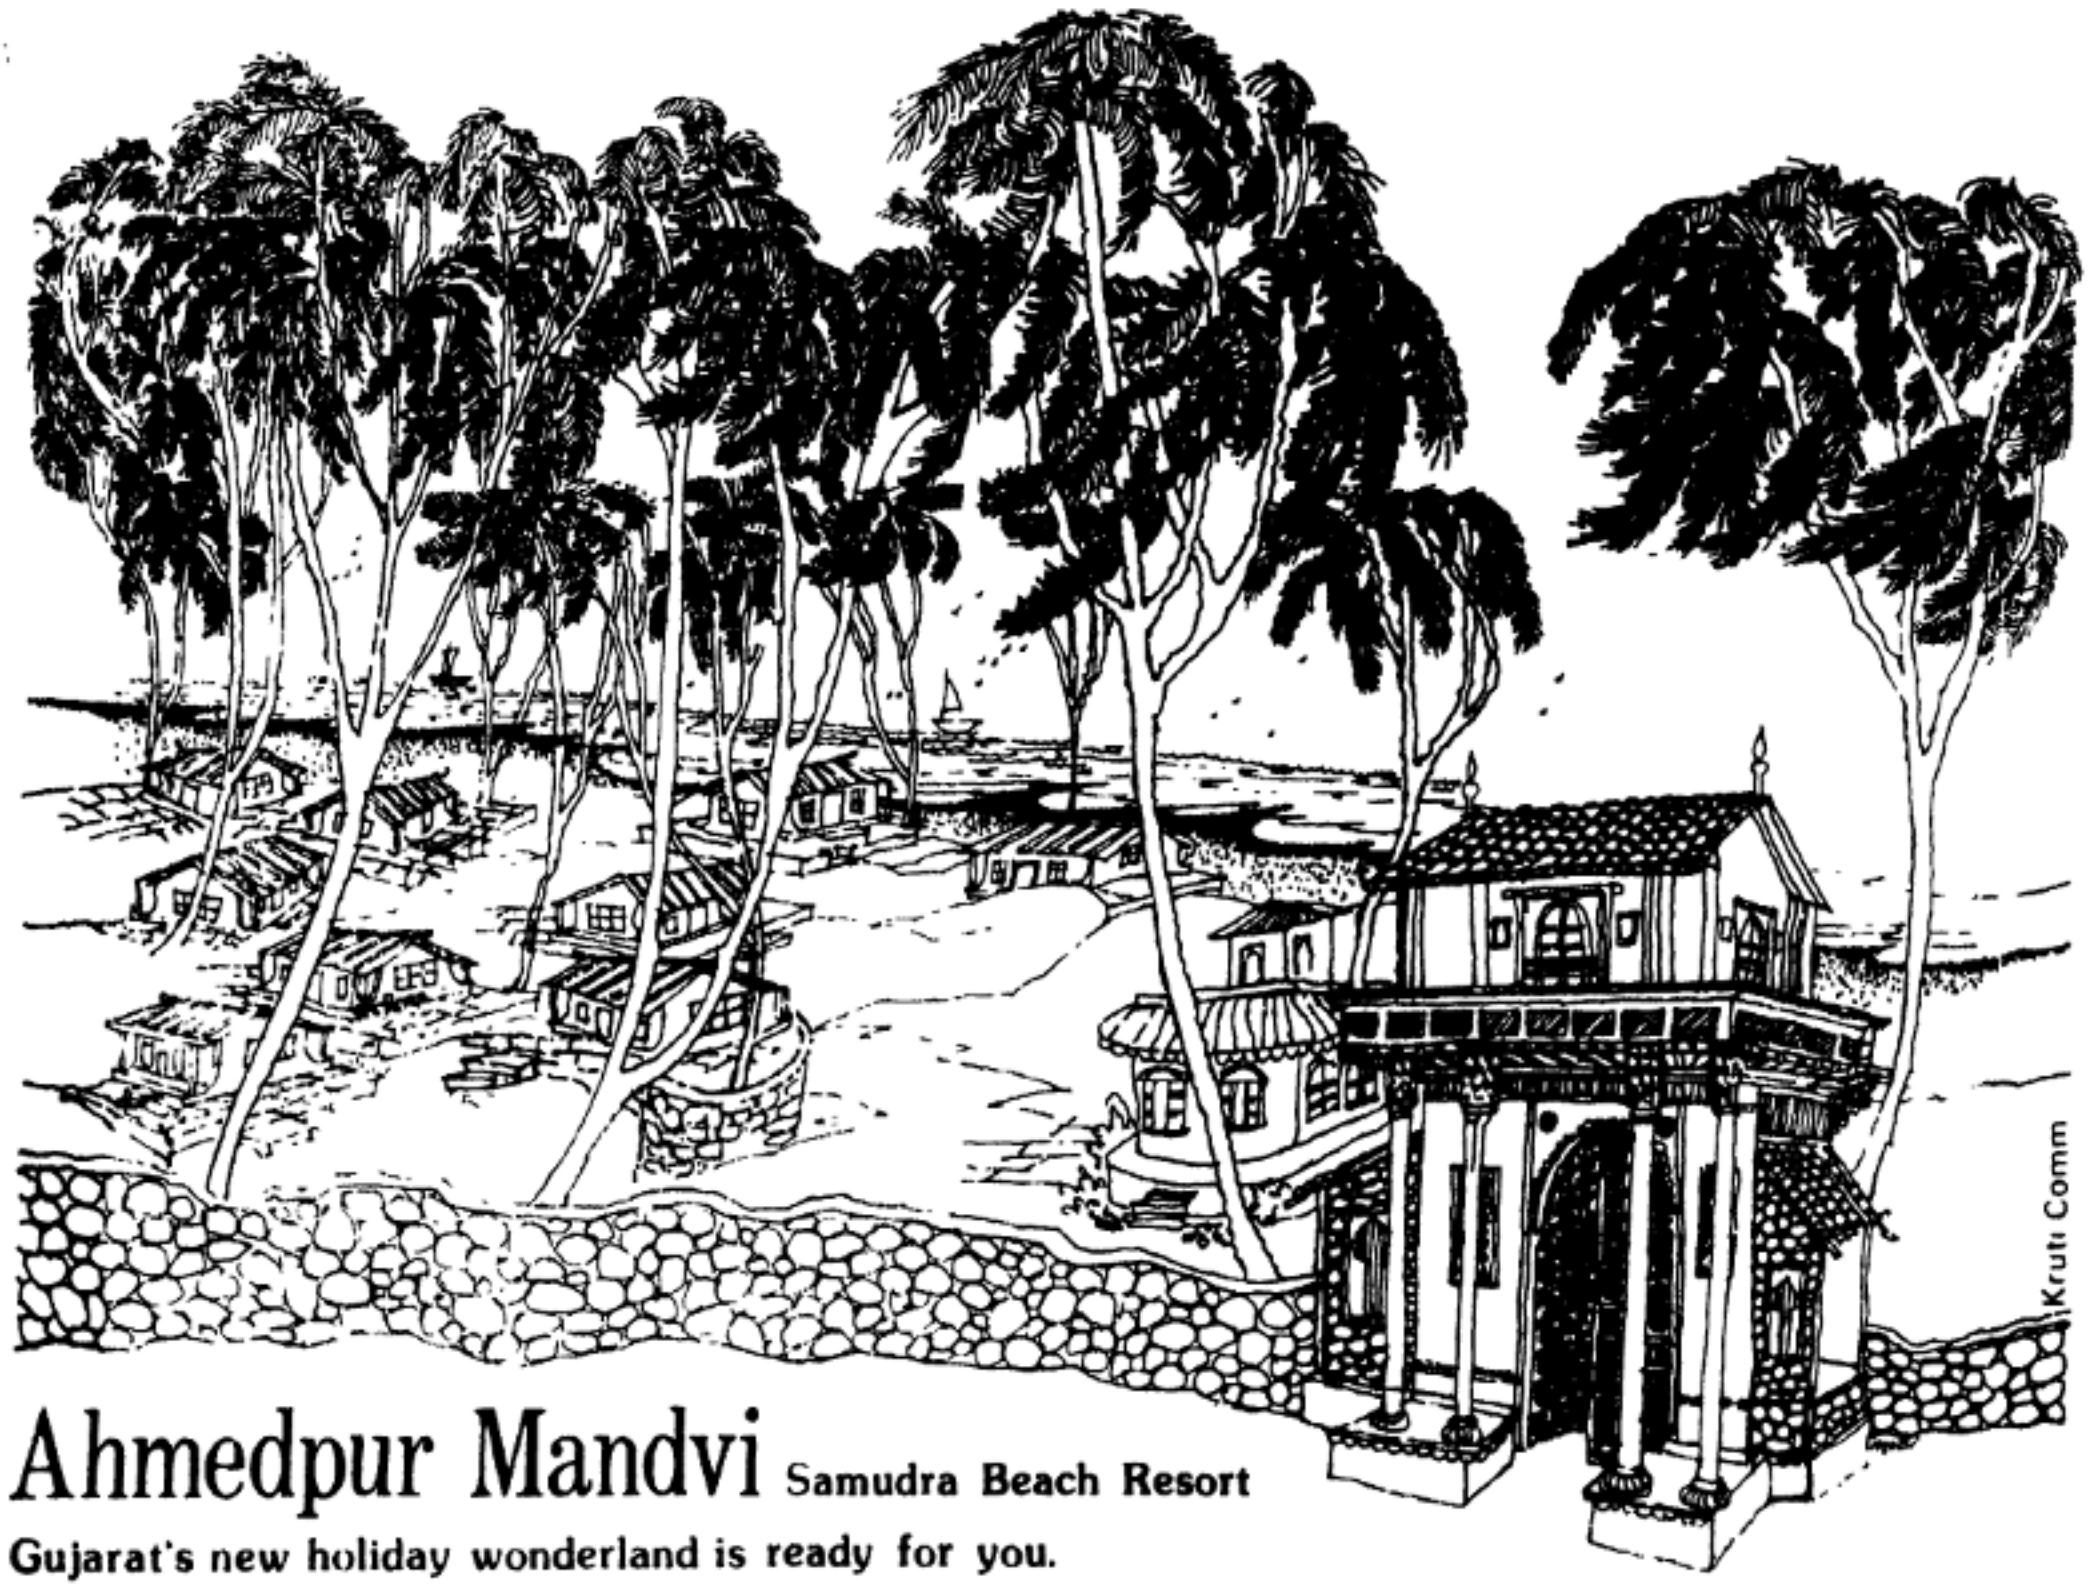
Attempt to assassinate Kirpal Singh
Feud in the AIADMK
Thus spake the Parsis

COMMENT

Dateline M.J. Akbar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 9
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12

PUNCHLINE/KUTTY



Cover transparency:
Nikhil Bhattacharya

Editor M.J. Akbar

Associate Editor Tooshar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K. John, Henry Jacob,
Rajiv Bagchi, Srinjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi:
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi:
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow:
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay:
Olga Tellis
Bangalore:
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad:
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati:
Seema Guha
Srinagar:
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex-Delhi

A Wonderland to Explore

Ahmedpur Mandvi Samudra Beach Resort

Gujarat's new holiday wonderland is ready for you.

This exotic beach resort will be a world of pleasure in itself with its twenty red-tiled rustic cottages in typical saurashtra style will enchant you.

Stroll at ease under the cool palm trees of a unique kind. Take a dip in the sea Or play water sports which is absolutely safe. Enjoy the food of the special restaurant. Or just relax. The choice is yours.

347 kms from Ahmedabad. 185 kms from Junagadh Travel by road. Or by rail to Una. Or fly to Keshod.

Nearby Places of Interest

Chorwad Beach Resort 125 kms. Somnath Temple 100 kms. Diu 15 kms the earlier Portugese Colony and an excellent beach. Sasangir-Lion Sanctuary 120 kms.

For details, write to us and be among the first few to share a memorable holiday with your family or friends at Ahmedpur Mandvi Samudra Beach Resort

Contact for Booking & Informafion

GUJARAT TOURISM

TOURISM CORPORATION OF GUJARAT LTD.

AHMEDABAD	H. K. HOUSE, ASHRAM ROAD, AHMEDABAD-380 009. TEL. 449683. 460640 TELEX : 0121-549 TCGL IN
DELHI	212 KANISHKA SHOPPING PLAZA, 19 ASHOKA ROAD NEW DELHI 110001 PHONE : 322107
BOMBAY	DHANRAJ MAHAL, APOLLO BUNDER BOMBAY 400 039. TEL. 2024925 TELEX : 0112434 GUJI IN
SURAT	1/847 ATHUGAR STREET, SURAT-395001 TEL. 26586.
JUNAGADH	RANG MAHAL DIWAN CHOWK JUNAGADH 362001 TEL. 834.–BY DIRECTORATE OF TOURISM, GUJARAT STATE.

DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

New Delhi: Question of the hour: Is there any Phoenix among the ashes of the landslide defeat which could open its eyes, even if it did not quite manage to rise, in time for the March Assembly elections? Since the politician diets every breakfast, lunch and dinner on hope, there is no shortage of it in his breast. And so, despite the fact that the thunder of applause from the ruling circles continues to echo around the capital, the opposition has begun to paint a better future than objectivity might warrant. But it is necessary of course to do that. Every commander has to raise a standard—a dream rimmed by conviction—before any battle, however hopeless the odds might seem at the start of the campaign.

Typically, the opposition has offered its own variation of the formula: there won't be one Phoenix, but many of them. And they will all rise separately, from their different piles of ashes. Conscious that one of the reasons for the vast defeat was that there was no cogent government or credible candidate for the prime ministership, the opposition will announce the prospective claimant for the chief ministership. In Karnataka, of course, Ramakrishna Hegde: in Andhra, no need to ask who. For Maharashtra, there will be Sharad Pawar at the head of the Progressive Democratic Front; in Gujarat, the Janata's Babubhai Patel will have the honour; in Rajasthan, Bhairon Singh Shekhawat of the BJP and in Madhya Pradesh Kailash Joshi of the same ilk. No problems in Orissa and Haryana too: Biju Patnaik and Devi Lal will head the ticket. In Uttar Pradesh, H.N. Bahuguna will be projected as the man who can save lives in communal clashes and build roads and provide irrigation when not doing that. (As always, Mr Bahuguna remains a good choice for the job. And now that Mr Amitabh Bachchan has gone back to the job he knows best, that is, singing and dancing on the silver screen, hopefully the Congress won't make the star their choice for chief minister.)

So that makes it three chief ministers on the Janata label, two of the BJP variety, two from Chaudhary Charan Singh's stable, and one from the Congress(S) camp. Not bad at all, as opposition efforts to acquire some sense go. But it wouldn't be the Indian opposition if there wasn't confusion somewhere, would it? Bihar, of course. Far from the other opposition parties agreeing that Karpoori Thakur is the best person to lead the challenge against the Congress(I), even the DMKP cannot agree on that. Barely had the thought surfaced, when Hukam Narayandev Yadav and Vijay Kumar Mishra announced the revolt accusing, in the process, Karpoori Thakur of being primarily responsible for the opposition rout in the state. Everything changes and nothing changes.

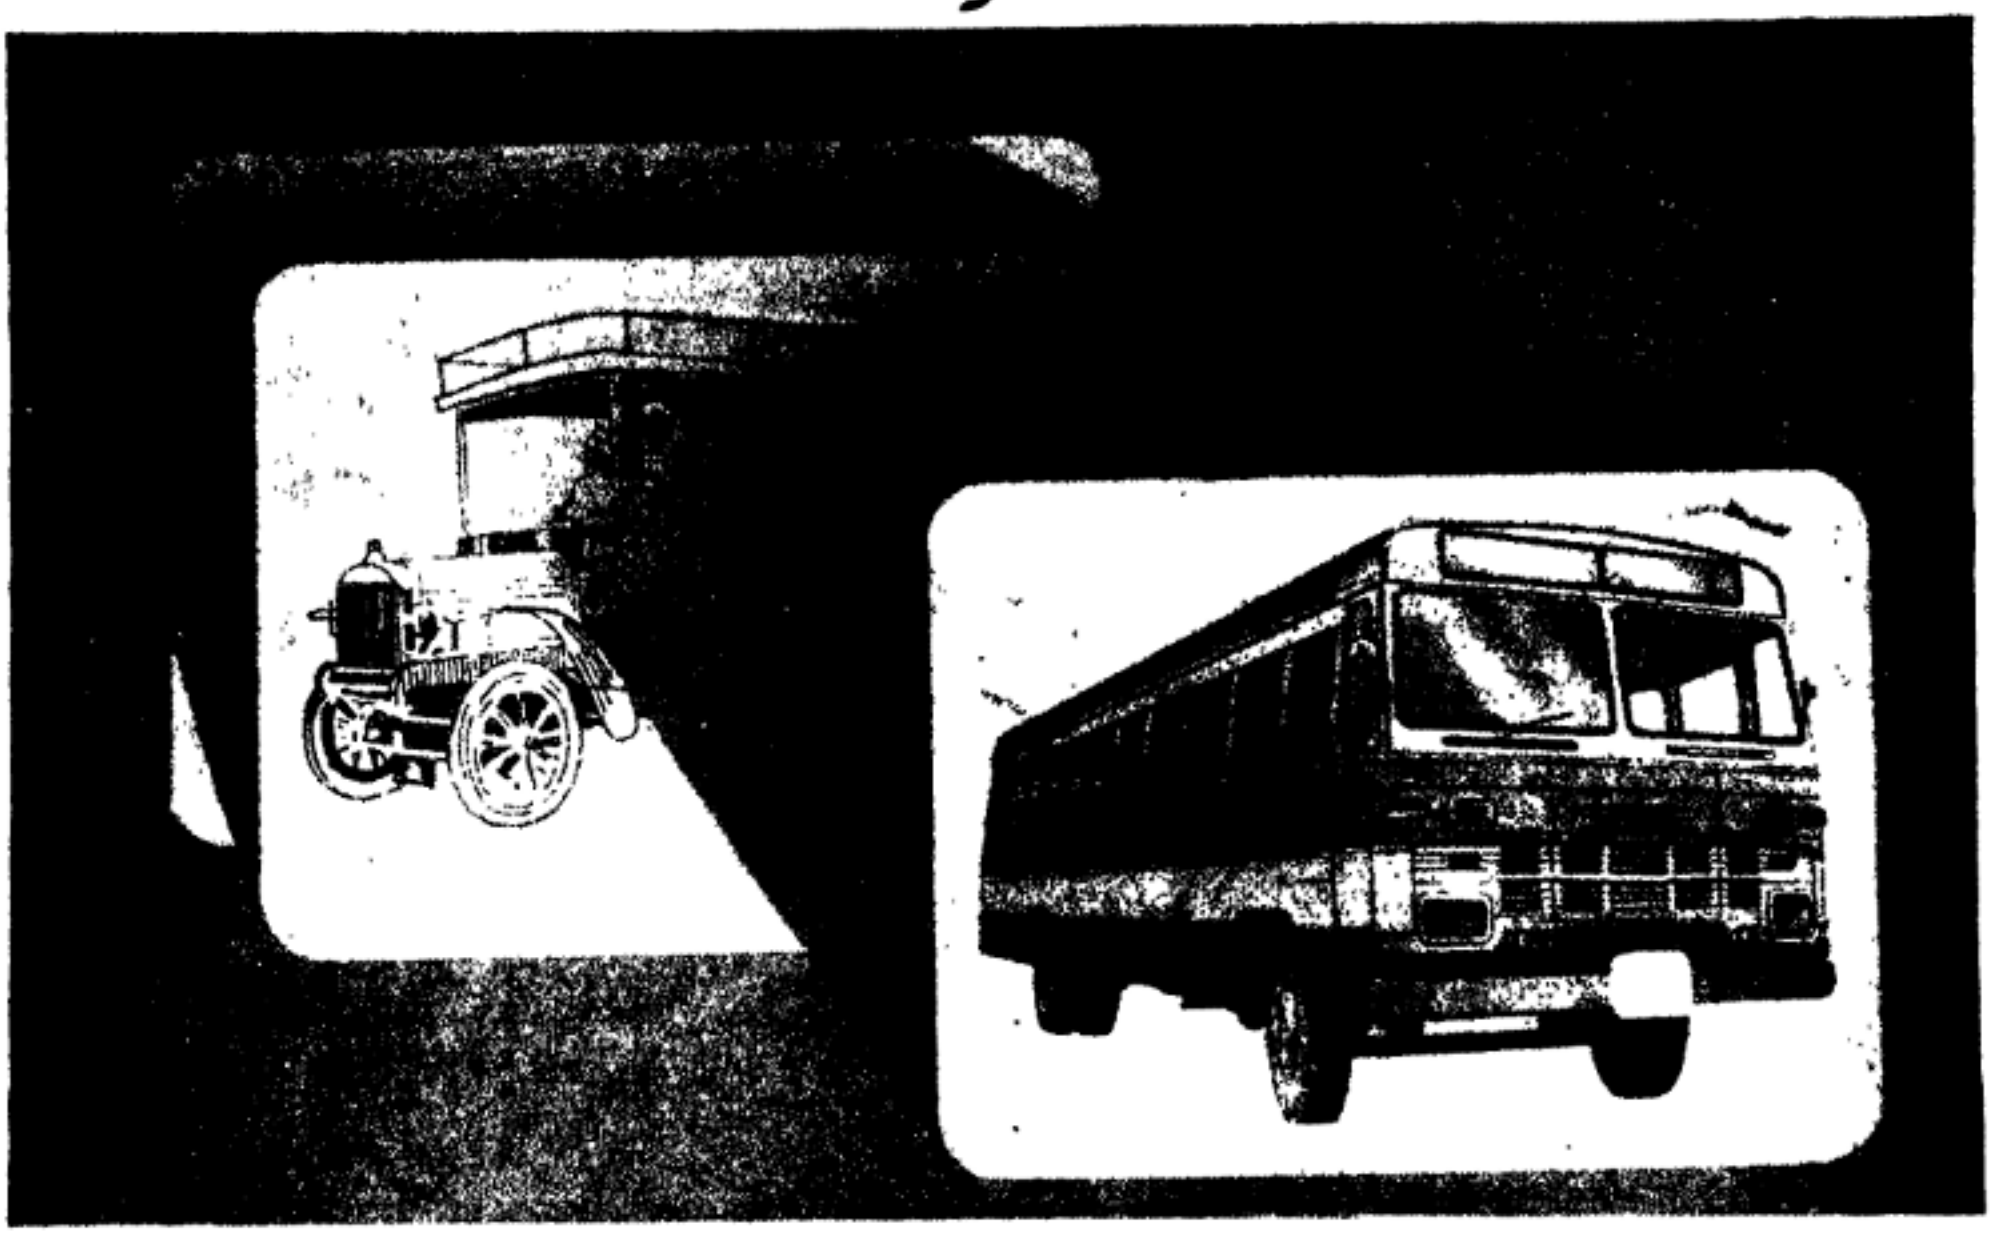
The image of the Phoenix rising from the ashes is often used to convey the idea of an extraordinary resurrection, but the details of the allegory are conveniently forgotten. This mythical Arabian bird called Phoenix, worshipped by the Egyptians at a time when their civilisation was the greatest in the world, was the only one of its kind. Every 500 years it burnt itself and then rose from its ashes rejuvenated; only from death came life. Maybe Phoenix would be embarrassed about being mentioned in connection with the Indian opposition, which burns itself into ashes rather more frequently than every 500 years, and then expects miracle medicines each time. I do agree that in politics there is life after death, but not if you behave a la the Bihar Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party.

There are welcome signs that Common Sense, which always seems to disappear from public view during an election campaign, is returning to the capital. Both the shock of victory and the shock of defeat, with their differing manifestations, are easing. The victors, particularly those without experience, are beginning to realise that sometimes it is far easier to win than to handle power; and the losers are taking some quiet, internal consolation in the fact that the consequences of a marginal victory (which was their highest hope) might have been infinitely worse than this all-purpose defeat in the perspective of the long run. The evidence for the return of Common Sense comes from the slow proliferation of jokes which always lubricate the seams of national politics, but disappear in the anger and passion of a general election.

One story goes that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has a common policy for both education and the opposition: in both cases he welcomes the ten plus two plus three formula. That, after all, is the status to which the national opposition parties have been reduced: the Janata has got ten seats, the BJP two and the DMKP three. (Incidentally, the Congress(S) has got four seats, which makes it stronger than the BJP and the DMKP, at least in Parliament.)

Incidentally, those who believe that there is nothing called the shock of victory have not obviously heard what happened in Bombay. One of the victorious Congressmen was so sure, on the morning of the counting, that he would lose that he phoned his Janata opponent to congratulate him in advance and then disappeared. When it was learnt in the evening that the Congress was ahead even in this seat, the winner could not be found. A dummy was used to lead the victory procession. Later when our new MP discovered that he had actually won, he got a mild heart attack from the shock.

In the same week that Henry Kissinger visited Delhi, the city also had a guest from the other side of the western political spectrum. Michael Foot, the gentle socialist. His soft manners and twinkling eyes disguise a passion of commitment to the poor, the underprivileged and the oppressed which is only apparent when he starts speaking about politics. Suddenly you realise that there are honest men who have devoted their lives to the welfare of the world, and not to its exploitation or manipulation.



At a lunch (hosted by the Paul brothers in Calcutta) Foot took on a range of questions from a group of us with engaging wit and a conviction in socialism which helped wash away that cynicism that inevitably builds up during a time when the world seems to be turning towards the right. But the best moment for me came during a brief personal chat before the lunch. I had earlier given my book to him, and with some hesitation asked whether he had managed to find it interesting enough to read. He stood up, came towards me, the book in hand and showed me page after page with phrases and passages underlined. He had been delighted to read it, he said. And then he asked me to sign the copy; he would preserve it in his library, he said. Rarely has a better compliment come my way.

Michael Foot

Hariv Basu

When yesterday's automotive technology is obsolete today and today's obsolete the day after...

What is India Pistons doing about this change?

Changing its technology to keep ahead of times

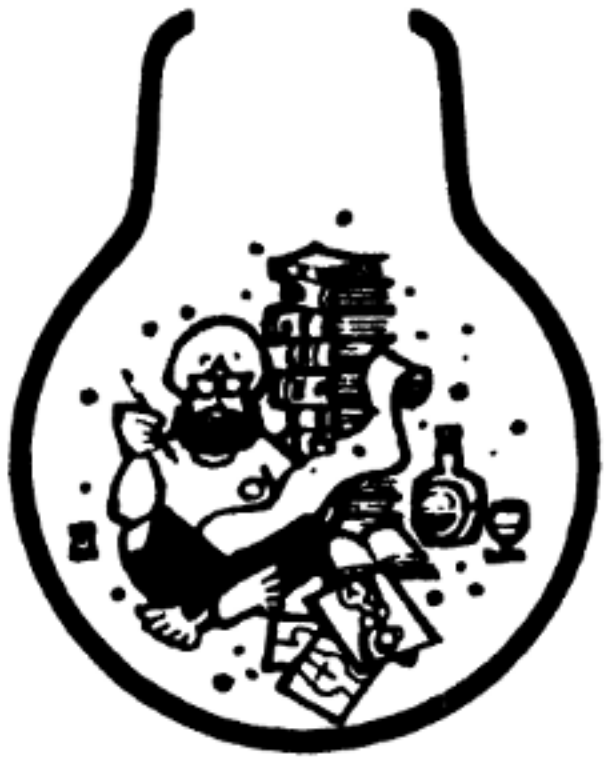
Even when the factory was started, India Pistons was ahead of the times. India Pistons' technology, the technology of the Associated Engineering Group of U.K. was first rate even then.

The composition of the factory — a single manufacturing facility, covering all the critical components in a piston assembly was the distinct innovation of India Pistons.

Having leaped hurdles in the past, the present poses no problems. Change in technology is being met by India Pistons' Research and Development. Constant up-dating. Constant touch with world developments keeps the company's philosophy and company's product line, way ahead of others. Way ahead of obsolescence.

India Pistons–
responding to the changing environment

MAC/IP/1012



INDIA PISTONS LIMITED, MADRAS

Garlic

Ornithologists know that it is easier to identify birds from their calls than by their appearances. Sometimes a single line along the eye or a patch of different colour in the plumage puts them in a different category. Take for example the brown and the black partridge. They have different colouring but are of the same size and have similar habits. However, their calls are distinct. The brown partridge you come across in the plains calls tito, tito, tito. The black begins its call with a squeak and then goes on to utter sounds which are usually transliterated as lassan, piyaaz, adrak khuda teree qudrat.

It was quite sometime after I heard this rendering of the black partridge's call that it occurred to me that this was a rustic formula to extol the virtues of three plants—garlic, onions and ginger. All three are extensively used in our cuisine and, apart from Jains and some others who regard everything grown underground as unwholesome, highly rated by indigenous systems of medicine.

Ginger has never had any enemies. It is tasty, odourless and good for digestion. Till recently onions and garlic had many detractors largely because of the unpleasant smell they left in the mouth. Whatever other qualities they possess, raw onions also produce an awful amount of malodorous gas in the stomach. Onions can be dispensed with or consumed only after they have been cooked. Garlic has a lot going for it both in the flavour it lends to all foods as well as its medicinal properties. It does leave an unpleasant odour in the mouth but unless you have a romantic date to keep, it is well worth the price. It is rich in sulphur, diallyl desulphide (which emits its distinct smell) and allyl-thio sulphinate. It is prescribed for people who bleed through the nose (nakseer), rheumatism, coughs, colds, bronchitis and high blood pressure. It is the king of natural medicines and answers Hipocrate's prescription: "Let food be your medicine." Even eating garlic in excessive quantities does not create any side effects. It is strongly recommended for people who suffer chronically from sore throats and colds. Next time you catch a cold try the following remedy. Heat two table-spoons of olive oil and put five cloves of garlic till they have turned brown and pour them into any kind of hot egg-based soup. It is tasty, it will warm your entrails and do a world of good to your throat and cold. Garlic is, as black partridges call from the hilltops, gift of the gods, khuda teree qudrat.

Act of God?

On a recent visit to Hyderabad I ran into Dr Shankar Dayal Sharma, governor of Andhra Pradesh. I had known him in his younger days in Bhopal where he was born. He went there soon after the poison gas tragedy and what he had to say was revealing. No sooner the people became aware of what had happened, local politicians and senior civil servants who should have given the lead in rescue operations fled from the city to save their own lives. It was the common people who risked their lives to save others and many died in the attempt. Although the majority of victims were Muslims, no distinction was made between Hindu, Muslim, Christian or Sikh. People tore up their own clothes to cover eyes and nostrils of those who had been exposed to the lethal gas. "In every calamity," said Dr Sharma very proudly, "it is the common man of India who rises to supreme heights of self-sacrifice. They helped picking up the dead. Hindus dug graves and buried dead Muslims. Muslims collected wood to cremate dead Hindus." He also had words of praise for the army which saved many lives. Also for trees and foliage. Inmates of houses which had trees were saved because trees absorbed the poison.

Would the Bhopal tragedy be described as an act of God? I suspect Union Carbide may try to take shelter behind this excuse. Why is it that we ascribe most calamities like earthquakes, floods, volcanic eruptions etc. to God? It must be human arrogance to pin catastrophes on God's head and arrogate successes to ourselves. However, there is an instance on record where an act of God did not turn out to be a calamity. The actress Helen Hayes became pregnant during the run of a play and was unable to fulfil the terms of the contract with the producer. When the producer sued her for damages, Miss Hayes contended that pregnancy was an act of God because she was against using contraceptives. The court gave a verdict in her favour

Kya Maloom

Driving back from Kasauli to Delhi I took a new route which was more picturesque as it ran along the foothills. However, at many intersections there were no roadsigns to indicate the right direction. At one major crossing not knowing which one to take, I espied a peasant sitting in the shade.

"Bhai sahib, can you tell me where this road goes to? I asked.

"Kya maloom? (How should I know?)."

"What about this one on the left, where does it lead to?" I asked.

"Kya maloom."

"For the one on the right?

"Kya maloom."

I lost my patience and shouted: "Kucch to maloom hoga—(you must know something). Which way are you going?"

He replied with composure: "I am not going anywhere. I just came here to see motor cars go by."

Central Hall

It is the gossip room of both Houses of Parliament where besides tearing up reputations of politicians, some good anecdotes are manufactured. The latest is about Babu Jagjivan Ram's reactions to the new cabinet of ministers.

Question: "Babuji, do you think new ministers like K.R. Narayanan and Natwar Singh who have spent most of their years in foreign countries or in aircooled offices in the secretariat know enough about the countryside to be effective?"

Answer: "No, I think they should spend some time in India's villages to get to know villagers problems."

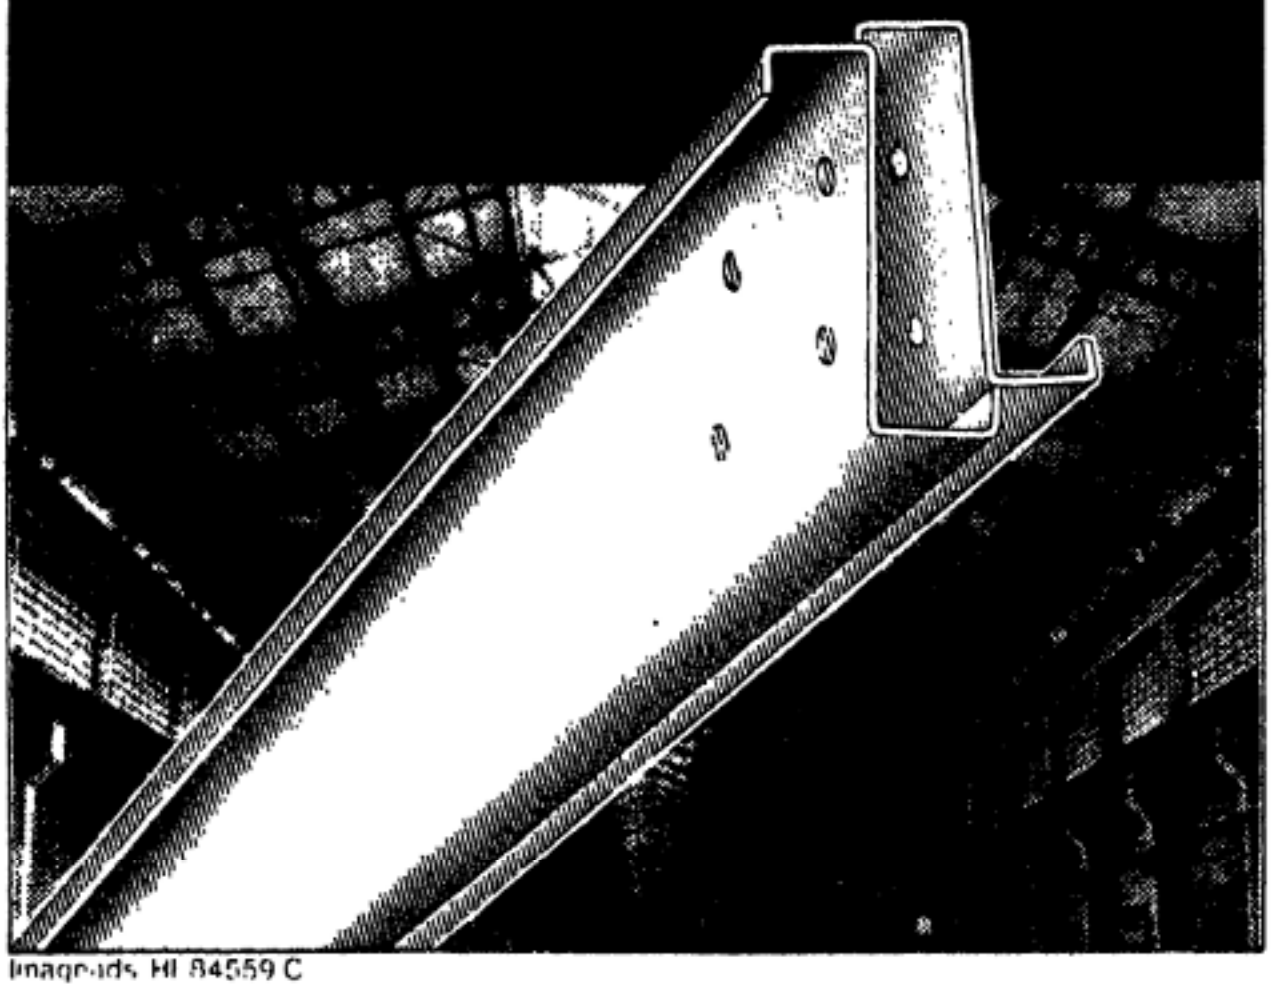
Question: "In that case don't you think Mr Rajiv Gandhi should also spend some time acquainting himself with villagers' problems?"

Answer: "No, he does not need to do so. He is well-acquainted with them. He knows the Asiad Village."

The ABC of better industrial shed roofing begins with 'Z'...

HI-Z

Today's high technology purlins



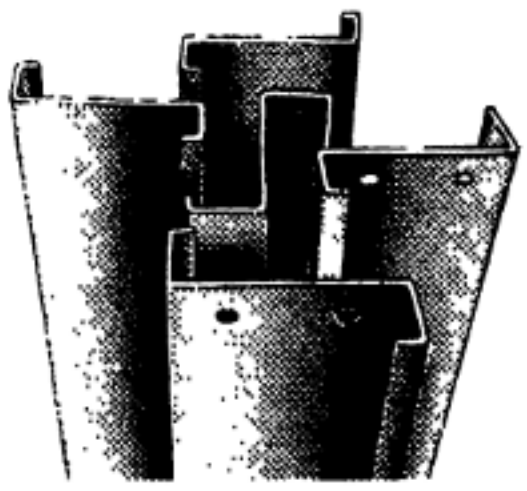


Image ads HI 84559 C

HITEK

From HITEK, with technical assistance from Brockhouse Group, UK and Metform, UK.

In roofings today, for industrial sheds and godowns, railway platforms and workshops and aircraft hangers.the ideal choice all over the world has come to be Z purlins. . . HI-Z purlins is HITEK's introduction to India. And HITEK is the only company in this high technology area in India to have solid support from international giants like Brockhouse and Metform.

Advantages to architects and builders with HI-Z

- Saves up to 50% in steel, 30% in construction costs.
- Close tolerances on sectional dimensions due to the process of cold roll forming
- Corrosion resistance
- Supply in pre-fabricated condition
- Truss spacing can be increased
- Choice of range
- Efficient after-sales service — actual supervision at erection site.

HITEK also offers consultancy packages in the design and erection of various roofing and side cladding with Hi-Z, and guidance on minimising costs and maximizing space.

For details, mail coupon, to –

HI-Z Division

Hitek Industries (Bihar) Limited

60, Booty Road, Ranchi 834 009. Bihar, India
Tel: 21811 Gram: HITEK
Telex. 0625-280 HITK IN, 031-6267 HPL IN

Offices:

CALCUTTA Phone: 472648
DELHI Phone: 621197
MADRAS Phone: 473296/470381
PATNA Phone: 21374

It's Hi-Tek-nology
It's Product Excellence

Yes, we are interested in knowing more about HI-Z purlins. Kindly send us details.

Name. _____

Company: _____

Address: _____

_____ Pin:_____

The Foreign Office Mess

When the formulation of foreign policy has been taken away by the policy planning division, the foreign secretary is left with nothing to do except pester his colleagues

The foreign office is not what it used to be. Nehru as foreign minister and Girija Shankar Bajpai as foreign secretary were the ideal combination and they founded not only the policies which have sustained us through the years but also a service which acquitted itself quite well. But for some years both policy-making and the service have suffered a reverse because of lack of professionals and men of vision.

With the creation of the policy planning division, the external affairs ministry has lost its importance. True, the division is a part of the ministry, but it was once in sole charge of framing policy. What is a ministry without any control over policy? When D.P. Dhar headed the division, he ran the ministry and made the foreign secretary, if not the minister, redundant. The same is the case today with G. Parthasarathy heading it. He has even been placed above the minister of state for foreign affairs. And it is an open secret that Narasimha Rao was never in his elements in the ministry of external affairs because GP, as Parthasarthy is known to his friends, was in direct touch with Mrs Gandhi on foreign policy.

I am not criticising GP, because the policies he has formulated have stood the country well. On Pakistan he may be considered by some as rather hawkish, but his overall approach to world problems has the necessary depth and keeps India's interest uppermost. He has, however, diluted the importance of the foreign office and left the foreign secretary with only the task of administration. That probably explains foreign secretary M.S. Rasgotra's over involvement in postings and transfers.

If one talks to foreign office personnel in Delhi, one finds that nine out of 10 officers are waiting for the day of Rasgotra's retirement this February. They tell you how he rewards his favourites and punishes those who have ever dared cross his path. One recent example is that of Narender Singh, who recently retired as India's ambassador to France. Rasgotra had asked him to canvass T.N. Kaul's candidature as chief executive of the UNESCO board. Narender Singh, after sounding some people, had replied that Kaul stood no chance. As predicted, Kaul was defeated, but Rasgotra made Narender Singh's life miserable.

India's permanent representative in Geneva, Muchkund Dube, was arraigned for visiting New York though he had gone on official work. And S.K. Singh faced Rasgotra's wrath on the issue of the guests he invited to an official party. When K.S. Bajpai, now India's envoy in Washington, was secretary in the ministry of external affairs, Rasgotra rubbed him the wrong way. The point I am emphasising is that when the formulation of foreign policy has been taken away by the policy planning division, the foreign secretary is left with nothing to do except pester his colleagues.

Then there are wheels within wheels in the ministry. Sometimes even a strong recommendation from the head of a mission goes unheeded, but in other cases a mere commendation may be sufficient for an out-of-turn promotion. Such incidents have demoralised the service and affected its efficiency. The favoured ones consider themselves superior and have contacts at the top. Those who are neglected trust nobody and are reluctant to cooperate with their colleagues. The result is that in many missions the right hand does not know what the left is doing.

At present the country has nearly 150 missions abroad. The ministry has been enjoying some sort of a diplomatic immunity which prevents a detailed examination of its working. It is time that a parliamentary committee considers whether a poor country like India can afford so many missions. Probably some of them can be grouped together. There is also the question of staff. Some missions, it appears, have a larger staff than is required. It may be worthwhile to examine why missions in Africa and South-East Asia are often smaller than those in Europe. There seems to be some complex about working in Africa, even if it has nothing to do with colour. One way to improve the foreign service is not to give extensions to foreign secretaries. There are many good officers who are in the queue but they either cool their heels or retire by the time the superannuated foreign secretary completes his extended tenure.

G. Parthasarathy and Rasgotra: no cohesion

Already the policy planning division has R.N. Kao, former RAW chief as a member. That means intelligence must be a part of policy planning. Why not have a national security council, as America has, and accommodate in it the three service chiefs? The Prime Minister should be its chairman and in his absence the head of the policy planning division could preside over it.

OPINION

Not Justified

The cover story, The Quest (30 December 1984—5 January 1985) by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya was interesting. However, except for Rajiv Gandhi, none of the others are steady enough to keep the country united. They even failed to bring about unity among themselves to contest the elections.
Barnali Basu, Jalpaiguri

• The cover story is inaccurate. In fact, not five but three of the personages on the cover were after the prime ministership of the country. Chandra Shekhar's case is different. He never tried to become the PM.
M. K. Vasudevan, Bombay

• The article was interesting. The defeat of Chandra Shekhar and A. B. Vajpayee was a great blow to their supporters.
Muyyam Rajan, Singrauli (MP)

• The cover story was not impressive. In view of the landslide victory of the Congress(I), Shubhabrata Bhattacharya's article appeared to be obsolete and purposeless. Moreover, bracketing Rajiv Gandhi with the others was not justified.
M. A. Ahad, Bhubaneswar

• Why did SUNDAY leave out the sixth person in the race for the prime ministership: Mr Morarji Desai?
V. Satyamurti, New Delhi

• The absence of NTR on the cover alongside the five men who have spent five years striving to be the Prime Minister surprised me.
Neeraj Cummar Bansal, Moradabad

Laudable Effort

T Raman has rightly focussed attention on the Apollo group of hospitals in Madras (Breaking New Ground, 23—29 December '84). A lot of money is wasted in the film and hotel industry in India. But since the profits are quite high in those industries, a lot of people are ready to invest. In such circumstances the efforts of Dr P.C. Reddy and his colleagues are laudable; they have set up what is known as the medical industry. The first of its kind in India, the Apollo group of hospitals in Madras is pledged to the service of mankind. But I am yet to know whether the hospitals will cater to the needs of the poor.
Kartikeswar Behera, Keonjhar

Excellent Article

Poems of Peace and Tolerance (30 December '84—5 January '85) was an excellent article on Sufism. As rightly stated by Dr Nazir Ahmad, the liberalism of the Sufis and the conservatism of the mullahs are two different means to achieve the same goal. But unfortunately with the passage of time and the wake of modern revival of religion, the Muslim society has shunned the former and shown strong inclination towards the latter.
M.A. Ahad, Bhubaneswar

Manmade Disaster

I was deeply moved by Tooshar Pandit's article, Killer Gas, Callous Carbide (16—22 December '84). More than 3000 people lost their lives and many more were crippled as a result of the disaster. We tend to blame nature and fate for most of the disasters that strike us. But the Bhopal tragedy was totally manmade. The government is as much responsible for the tragedy as Union Carbide.
G.V. Phaniraj Kishore, Hyderabad

• Tooshar Pandit's investigation rightly pinpointed the responsibilities of the Madhya Pradesh government. Moreover, I wonder how such a killer factory could operate in a densely populated area. From now on all state governments should see to it that licenses of such firms are not renewed.
T.A. Pai, Bokaro

Faulty Planning

In Wanted: A Consensus (30 December '84), Kuldip Nayar has rightly analysed the issues raised by the Congress(I) and the opposition parties in their campaign. He has correctly asserted that if we have to accept an authoritarian government to keep the country together the remedy would be worse than the disease. The massive mandate in favour of the Congress(I) in the recent Lok Sabha polls indicates the will of the people for an amicable solution of the Punjab and Assam problems.
M.W. Baig, Raichur (Karnataka)

• Kuldip Nayar's article, The Rich-Poor Divide (9—15 December '84) was excellent and timely. The policy followed by our policy planners has made the rich richer and the poor poorer.
Donepudi Madhu Babu, Tenali (AP)

• The wide chasm between the rich and the poor in our country is responsible for the unrest within India. The responsibility for failing to uplift the weaker sections of our society must rest solely with the rulers. To a large extent India's pro-Moscow stand comes in the way of progress. We have developed a habit of criticising the capitalist West. For all the unrest in our country we blame the CIA and the USA. Not a thing is said about Russia or the KGB.
S.C. Mathur, Bichpur (UP)

• While analysing the problems facing India Kuldip Nayar has dealt with only the economic problems: he has ignored the ideological crisis. The absence of a firm ideology is responsible for the ills plaguing our country.
K. Maheswaran, Trivandrum

Why Not an Actor?

This has reference to M. J. Akbar's comments in Dateline (9-15 December '84) regarding the fate of Amitabh Bachchan in the Lok Sabha elections. It was H. N. Bahuguna who got a pasting in Allahabad and not the actor. Moreover, I do not understand the logic behind Mr Akbar's reservations about Amitabh entering Parliament. If a doctor, a lawyer or a trade union leader can aspire to represent the people, what is the harm if an actor does the same?
S. Vasudevan, Madras

Off the Mark

I was amused to go through What the Astrologers Say (2—8 December '84). The predictions of both the astrologers, Ramakrishna Sarathy and Amritlal regarding the outcome of the Lok Sabha polls were wrong. Astrologers should stop political predictions.
V. Shanmugasundaram, Salem

•A reputed magazine like SUNDAY should not have commissioned astrologers to predict the political future of a country or its leaders. As it turned out to be most of their assertions were off the mark. Atal Behari Vajpayee did not win by a handsome margin and the Congress(I) got far more than 250 seats.
Desh Ratan, Allahabad

•The fraud behind astrology and palmistry has been exposed. Generally predictions are worded in such a way that 50 per cent correctness is assured. But I wonder how most of Amritlal's predictions went wrong.
B.R. Nanda, Lucknow

•The 'hand' of the Congress shows neither the line of fate nor the line of life, but its success is phenomenal. Is this not a chalienge to palmistry?
A. Baruah, Dibrugarh

• Ramakrishna Sarathy began his predictions by saying "that the Congress(I) will get between 200 and 250 seats in the Lok Sabha elections. The total number of seats in the Lok Sabha will be divided equally between the Congress(I) and the opposition parties." This prediction proved to be a total flop. Amritlal's predictions, more or less on these lines, were also wrong. My organisation is fighting for the upliftment of astrology but when a reputed weekly like SUNDAY publishes predictions which turn out to be totally wrong, people's faith in astrology is bound to be shaken.
A.K. Chaudhuri, executive secretary, Indian Institute of Astrology, Calcutta

A Wise Step

For a long time I have stopped reading SUNDAY since it was full of political news with very little for children. Introduction of the Teasers pages was a wise step to make the popular magazine more popular Moreover, the brain teasers are not meant for teenagers only. My father enjoys it as much as I do.
Sonia Singh, Calcutta

Bleak Future for Indian Cricket

Kapil Dev: a scapegoat

Nikhil Bhattacharya

Ashis Ray's report, Sunil Gavaskar versus Kapil Dev (30 December 1984—5 January 1985) was revealing. The tussle between the two cricketers can only be solved by taking the captaincy away from both of them. The selectors should realise that the Indian team as a whole is more important than either of them. If they wish to enjoy their cricket, they are welcome to do so in their back gardens.
Deepa Sinha, Calcutta

• The author has rightly concluded that "the hostility, in fact, commenced the moment Gavaskar lost the captaincy and the mantle was handed on to Kapil." Knowing full well that his days are numbered in Test cricket, Gavaskar struck at the first available opportunity to finish off the only real competitor in the field. It is high time for both to be excluded from the team. A new team should be built up around Ravi Shastri and Vengsarkar, the two most consistent players.
V. Sagar, New Delhi

• We can afford to miss Gavaskar who is nearing the end of his career but we cannot miss Kapil Dev. He is in his mid-twenties and his bat is capable of blasting a few more runs.
C.S. Krishnamurthy, Madras

• Due to the large amount of money involved, the image of cricket as a sport has been spoilt. Both Sunil Gavaskar and Kapil Dev should step down voluntarily to put an end to such dirty politics.
Rajendra Kumar, Bombay

• Ashis Ray's article was informative. Kapil has undoubtedly been made a scapegoat and is the victim of the North Zone—West Zone rivalry in cricket. Let us hope a healthy atmosphere will return to Indian cricket and all the differences sorted out.
Swarup Kumar Saha, Calcutta

• If no positive steps are taken to discourage the greed for money of the Indian cricketers, the future of Indian cricket is bleak.
S. Hussain, Dibrugarh

• Indian cricketers have by their achievements put India on the cricket map of the world. Unfortunately, Sunil Gavaskar, who has broken numerous records and has been awarded the Padma Shri, has stooped low to undermine the achievements of his contemporaries. His act of ousting Kapil Dev amounts to degrading the World Cup hero. I appeal to Sunil Gavaskar through this column not to stoop so low.
Mahesh Kumar, Bombay

• The article clearly shows that our cricketers are interested in nothing except money. I think a radical change in the system of payment to our cricketers is called for. I suggest that the cricketers should not be paid anything for Test matches drawn or lost. Only for the Test matches our team wins, should the players be paid some money as a bonus. If the cricketers are unwilling to play on these terms, cricket will die a natural death.
A. R. Ramnarayanan, Rourkela

COVER STORY

The Ambitions of NTR

Is the Bharat Desam a pipe dream or a way out for the opposition parties?

NTR atop his Chaitanya Ratham after being reinstated as chief minister

"So are you going to vote for an Assam Desam, Punjab Desam, a Karnataka Desam, a Maharashtra Desam, a Telugu Desam, or are you going to vote for a Bharat Desam?" This was the constant refrain of the Prime Minister, Rajiv Gandhi, from hundreds of microphones across the country, during campaigning, seeking votes that would bring his party—the Congress(I)—back to power. In the event, the people across much of the country responded by voting overwhelmingly for the Congress(I), seconding the claim that it alone could provide a strong and united India.

But not in Andhra Pradesh. Here, in what was until a couple of years ago a pocket borough of the Congress(I), the electorate rejected the claim of the Prime Minister and once again "punished" the Congress(I) for its behaviour in both the distant and recent past. The Telugu Desam Party (TDP) won 28 of the 32 seats it contested, and its allies won five more leaving a measly six for the Congress(I), where it had won 41 seats in 1980. It was not as if the Andhra electorate did not believe in Bharat Desam. Simply, it believed that the Telugu Desam MPs could best represent their collective aspirations in the nation's highest forum, while at the same time upholding the unity of the country. The Congress(I) gimmick did not sell in Andhra and the answer of the electorate that had sided with the Congress for seven general elections, was: anything but the Congress(I).

Now, less than two weeks after a heady and euphoric win, N.T. Ramarao, the founder-leader of the 34-month old Telugu Desam Party, has created quite a stir by announcing his plans to form a national level political party called the Bharat Desam. Coming from the actor-turned-politician who is known for his impulsiveness, this could well have been dismissed as a political joke. But in the light of the Telugu Desam's emphatic win and the decimation of the opposition, NTR's nebulous concept is being watched with keen interest.

By naming the new party Bharat Desam, Ramarao has extended his vision beyond the borders of Andhra Pradesh. He has also answered directly and literally the Rajiv Gandhi election-eve refrain. The proposed Bharat Desam also provides a new platform for the discredited opposition to come together. As a very close aide of NTR put it: "Now NTR need not go to the opposition. The opposition will come to him." From all accounts, the idea of a national opposition party like the Bharat Desam is not new. Ramarao has been toying with the idea for well over a year, as he disclosed to SUNDAY in a talk last week (see interview). Nor has the chief minister of Andhra Pradesh kept this a secret. He has been discussing it with his colleagues in the cabinet and the party. The Bharat Desam idea was very much a part of a resolution adopted at a conference celebrating the second anniversary of the formation of the Telugu Desam in Vishakapatnam in May last year. But few took notice of the idea and even fewer believed N.T. Ramarao would see it through to its end.

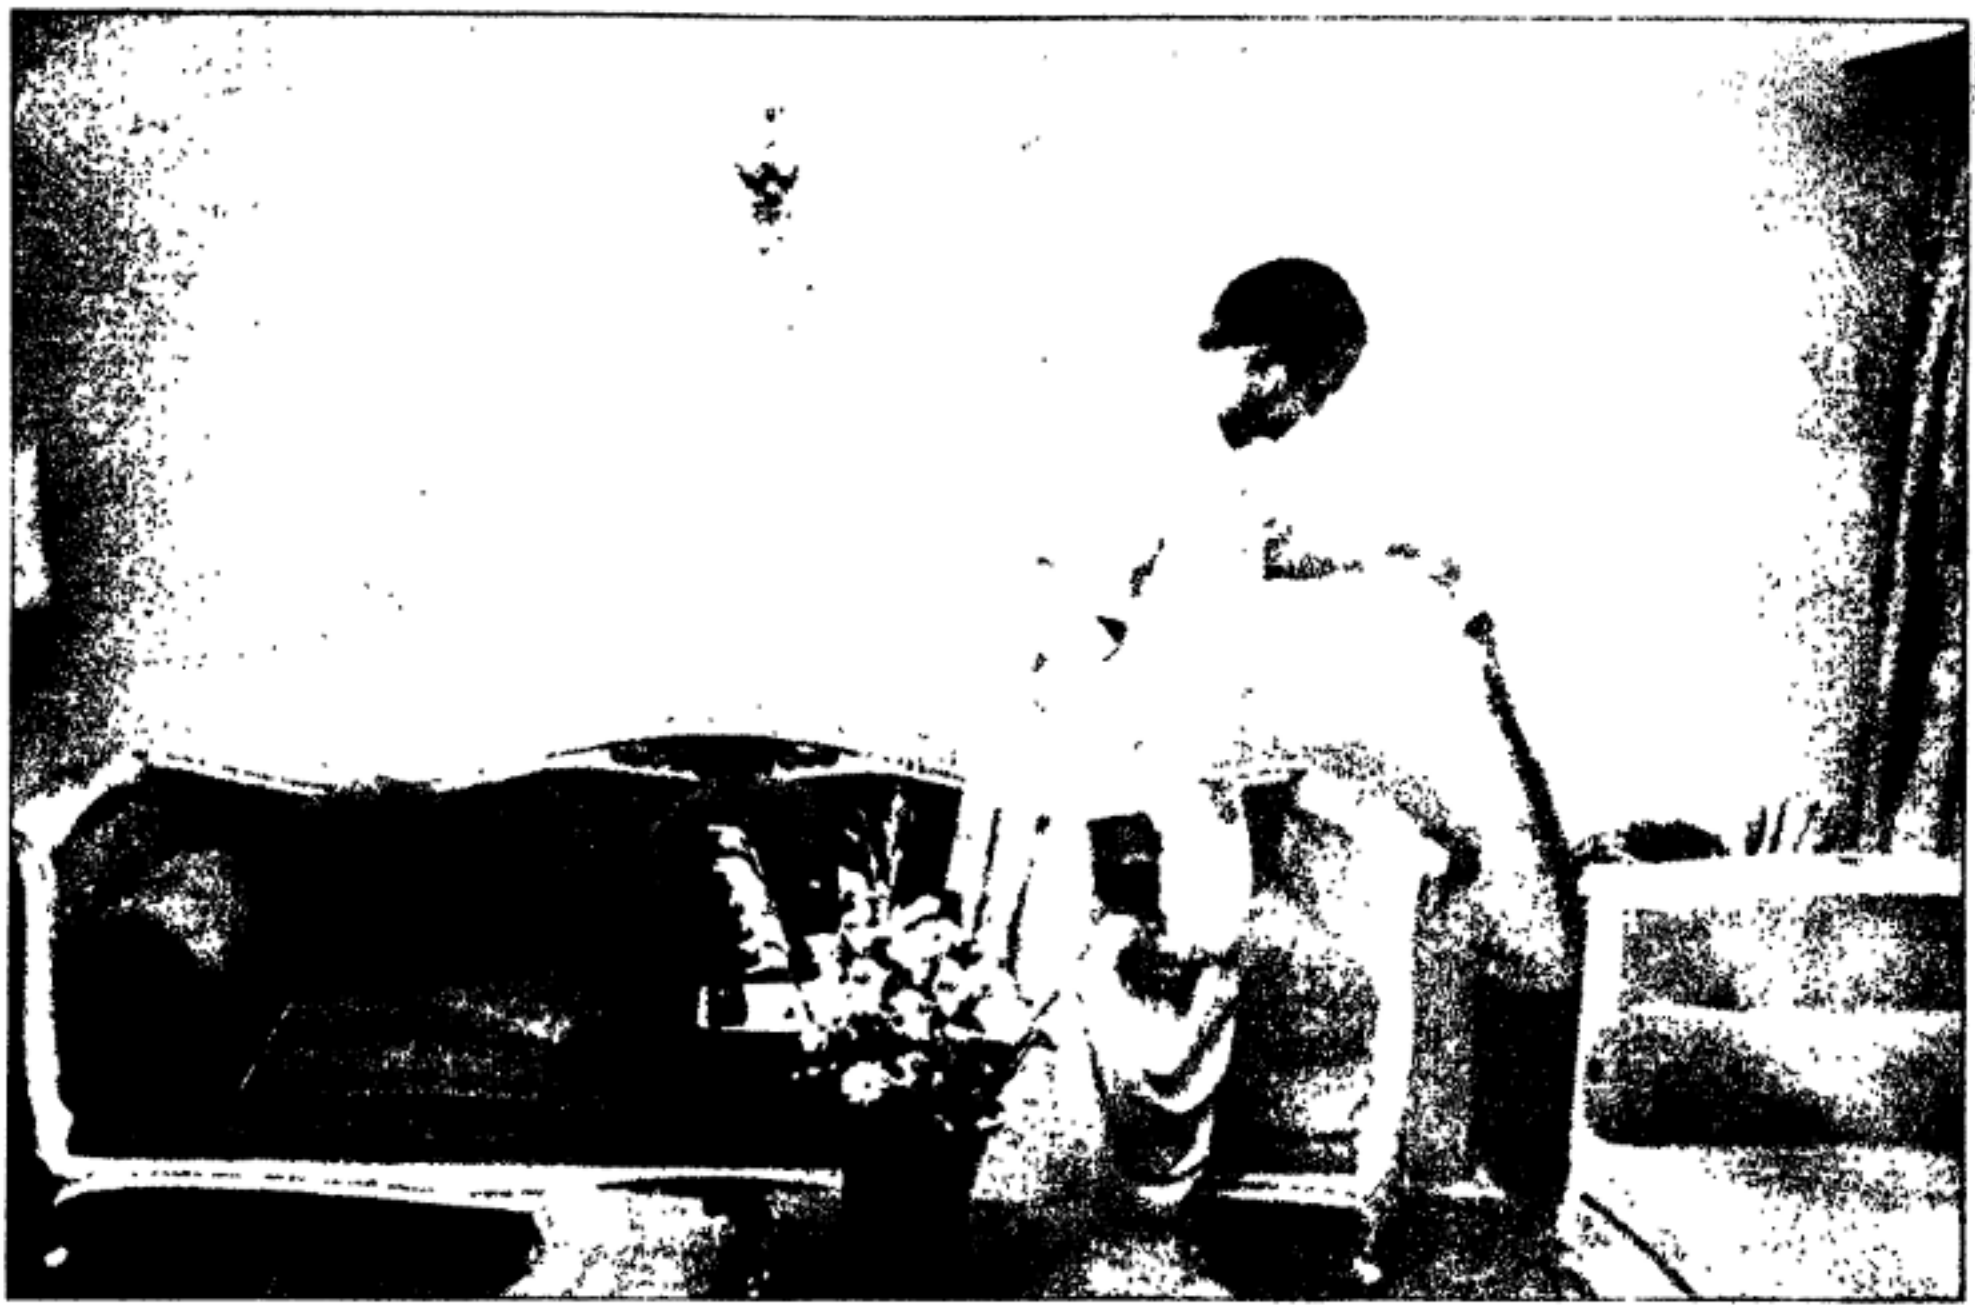
Of course, it would be too early to predict how seriously or how soon Ramarao would push through his idea of Bharat Desam. The announcement of Bharat Desam, when the Congress(I) has yet to get over its unprecedented win and the opposition its shattering loss, is rather unreal. Argued Prasuna Kotregudda, a Telugu Desam MLA in the dissolved House and a close confidant of Ramarao, "Telugu Desam also sounded unreal when it was launched in May 1982."

What is really baffling is how exactly NTR is going to bring the Bharat Desam idea to fruition. Is it going to be a confederation of existing national and/or regional parties? Or is Ramarao going to encourage the formation of regional parties on the lines of his own Telugu Desam, in other states? In that case, will he entrust or invite leaders like Sharad Pawar. Ramakrishna Hedge, Biju Patnaik and others to head the party in their respective states or does he plan to have an entirely new leadership?

Ramarao is himself vague about the whole scheme. "I cannot say anything till I have talked with the other opposition leaders," he said, when asked to be more specific. But sources close to Ramarao said he was extremely serious about Bharat Desam. The enigmatic chief minister, who Congress(I) politicians themselves now grudgingly admit, has mastered the art of political strategy, apparently feels that this is the right time to push home his advantage. The entire opposition is down on its knees like never before. The opposition leaders are also finding it extremely difficult to resurrect themselves in the aftermath of a total rout. Ramarao's Bharat Desam may well offer a way out.



Telugu Desam sources, however, say that Rama Rao is being deliberately ambiguous about the whole Bharat Desam project. He would first like to find out the reaction of opposition leaders like Hegde and Vajpayee, two leaders he is very interested in roping in. Between now and May this year, Ramarao will gauge the mood and reaction of the people, besides knowing the minds of other opposition leaders as also the performance of the Rajiv Gandhi government. In the end, Bharat Desam may well turn out to be a loose federation of opposition parties, much on the lines of the Janata Party of 1977.

But with the kind of ambition and eccentricity that has come to be associated with Ramarao, Bharat Desam is naturally being scoffed at. Ramarao, says a senior level bureaucrat at the state secretariat, "talks first and thinks later." Political circles in Andhra Pradesh including allies of the TDP like the BJP, the Janata Party, the CPI and the CPI(M) are not inclined to take Ramarao seriously. Among the sceptics is Ramarao's most famous political adversary, Nadendla Bhaskara Rao, who sneered, "Bharat Desam today, World Desam tomorrow." But there was more churlishness in his comment than anything else.

NTR cannot be faulted over his sense of timing. Rarely, if ever, has the saffron-clad chief minister even put a wrong foot forward since he took Andhra Pradesh by storm two years ago. From the time he launched the Telugu Desam in May 1982 to his political reincarnation following the coup by Nadendla Bhaskara Rao, Ramarao has proved to be a political Midas. This, combined with his sense of purpose and his increasingly apparent sincerity, is forcing even the sceptics to have a second look at Bharat Desam. Strangely enough, NTR's Bharat Desam is to be formally launched in May, later this year, in the week of Mahanaadu. There is a degree of personal aggrandisement in this unilateral decision. Mahanaadu is the week beginning on 20 May (the day NTR launched his Telugu Desam

NTR flanked by Charan Singh and Vajpayee (right): taking the initiative

NTR: grandiose plans

Party in 1982) and culminating on 28 May (Ramarao's birthday). The Telugu Desam itself is such a highly personalised party, that his decision does not come as a surprise. In fact, the first opposition conclave, held in Vijayawada, was during Mahanaadu in 1983. But will the opposition leaders, with their smouldering ambitions, allow NTR to have his way so easily? It sounds most unlikely, even considering that NTR is in a position to call the shots.

One of the many pointers that indicate Ramarao's earnestness about the Bharat Desam is the manner in which he has been presenting the 28 newly-elected Telugu Desam MPs to the nation. In fact, NTR has taken pains to show that the MPs belong not only to Andhra Pradesh but also the rest of the country. Each MP has been instructed to "adopt" one state, study its problems and represent it in the Parliament. It sounds rather presumptuous, considering that the other states do have some representative MPs from even among the opposition. But clearly, Ramarao is laying the groundwork for his future plans. All this has been in line with NTR's own actions. Over the past few weeks, he has repeatedly asserted that he is "an Indian first and a Telugu next." Then, when he came to New Delhi to witness the oath-taking ceremony of the Telugu Desam MPs., he addressed the press in Hindi, English and Telugu. It was NTR showmanship at its best. But sometimes, naivete can also be winning.

While most of the TDP allies in Andhra Pradesh are sceptical about the Bharat Desam idea, the Telugu Desam workers are quite taken in by the prospects of their leader becoming a national hero. Lounging before NTR's swank Abids residence at 6 am, Baggidi Srinivas said he had no doubts that NTR would make it In many cases such confidence does not stem out of blind faith any more.

Ramarao himself talks of the Bharat Desam in a most matter of fact way. There is no rhetoric (not yet, anyway) that accompanied the birth of the Telugu Desam. What is more, he talks of it with well-worn cliches like "need for unity among the opposition parties," "welfare of the people and this great country..." But there is a quiet fervour about it. At least apparently, his sights are not yet set on the gaddi in Delhi. It is just as if he believes in himself totally and the lofty ideals he speaks of. He believes that he cannot fail in his mission to bring together the hopelessly splintered opposition. Coming out after a meeting with Ramarao, Dr James Manor, professor of commonwealth and comparative politics at the university of Leicester, England, murmured: "It is as if he believes he has been annointed by God to lead this country."

So confident is NTR of the success of his Bharat Desam, that he has given up the initiative in organising another of those meaningless opposition conclaves. His immediate objective now is to win the two Lok Sabha seats. Srikakulam and Rajampet in Andhra Pradesh, elections to which were countermanded following the deaths of independent candidates. A victory in both constituencies will result in the TDP becoming a full-fledged, legitimate opposition party, since it will raise its strength in the House to 30. But between now and the Mahanaadu in May, NTR's principle troubleshooter, Parvataneni Upendra, the swarthy general-secretary of the Telugu Desam, has been deputed to canvass for the Bharat Desam in the opposition ranks. In the end, the bedraggled opposition may well settle for it. But as of now there are no takers.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Hyderabad

NTR: Superstar

What makes NTR tick?

Few, if any, would take a bet today against the Telugu Desam sweeping the Assembly polls in Andhra Pradesh a few weeks hence. Certainly not after the way in which N.T. Ramarao's party not only contained, but even reversed the Congress(I) wave in the just concluded Lok Sabha polls. This has naturally led to speculation about what kind of majority NTR will get in the coming Assembly polls.

victory in the Lok Sabha polls and his rise as the dominant opposition leader in the country. It is now clear that the Telugu Desam Party's second great electoral triumph is not the result of NTR's charisma alone. No doubt NTR is still considered a demigod to a large section of voters, but this image is also accompanied by some sincere work put in by the Telugu Desam Party in the two years it has been in power.

NTR: for a better vision

What makes NTR tick with the people of Andhra Pradesh? Why did the electorate of Andhra Pradesh vote against the Congress(I) when the rest of the country, with a few rare exceptions, stood solidly for Rajiv Gandhi's party? How long will NTR's reign continue? These are some of the questions that are being asked following NTR's stupendous

Surely the Telugu Desam government's performance was no more exceptional than the Janata government's performance in Karnataka, or the Left Front in West Bengal? The answer to this was provided by a former Telugu Desam MLA, who did not want to be named. "There is a qualitative difference in the schemes initiated by NTR and his counterparts in other states. The other schemes are merely on paper. Literally, they involve a lot of paperwork before they really reach the recipients. In Andhra, the schemes have been simple: like the Rs two-a-kilo rice schemes, and the Janata saree and dhoti scheme. These programmes are easy to implement, communicate and publicise."

These schemes have worked. In Andhra Pradesh today, everyone knows about the two-rupee-a kilo rice scheme and in the villages a lot of people have benefited by it. It is good rice, available in plenty and in time. It costs the state exchequer nearly Rs 100 crore in subsidy, but it has been worth it. Everyone knows N. T. Ramarao has been responsible for it.

Several other factors have also helped NTR carve out a facile victory. There was the Bhaskara Rao coup last September which thoroughly resurrected a new and chastened N. T. Ramarao. But NTR exploited the situation in a manner few other opposition leaders would have done. In fact, the Andhra episode was widely regarded as the nucleus around which the opposition could come together against the Congress(I). But they flattered to deceive. In the end, NTR alone capitalised on it, wringing the last bit of advantage from the episode, exposing the Congress(I) role in propping up Bhaskara Rao.

But it can be pointed out that something similar happened in neighbouring Karnataka where there was the distasteful Moily tapes incident. Why then could the Janata Party not win? Says Ramoji Rao, the stocky chairman of the Eenadu group of publications, which has stood by NTR at all times: "Hegde failed to exploit the situation arising out of the Moily tapes. The issue was confined to the cities. Here, NTR went to every nook and corner of the state explaining to millions of people. This was especially touching considering that he was just back from a heart operation. Few opposition leaders would have had the stamina or drive to do that." What NTR did was virtually a pre-election campaign.

Ramoji Rao cites three principal reasons for the Telugu Desam's triumph: the welfare schemes launched by NTR like the two-rupee a kilo rice scheme that has really won over the poor, NTR's own unique style of campaigning and his ability to bring about unity among the opposition parties in Andhra Pradesh. But there is also a fourth reason: Eenadu's own strident campaign against the Congress(I). Published from four centres in Andhra Pradesh, Eenadu reaches 400,000 homes each morning, hitting out hard against the Congress(I) while at the same time reporting almost every word uttered by Ramarao in public. Ramoji Rao himself estimates that the daily is read by four million people across Andhra Pradesh.

The last two of Ramoji Rao's three points need closer scrutiny. In spite of two years in the chief ministerial gaddi, NTR's campaign style has not changed. It has only become better. The Chaitanya Ratham, a 40-year-old rambling truck with a deceptively broken-down look, is still his principal campaign vehicle. NTR still remains the master of words, capable of evoking the emotions of the people with hard facts disguised in lofty phrases like "atma gauravam" and "dharmayuddha," many of them with religious connotations. Ramarao's saffron robes may be a bit of a joke in the cities but it has gone down well in the rural areas. NTR himself cares little now for the city votes and it is apparent that the Telugu Desam is not exactly popular in the fashionable areas of Hyderabad. While Hyderabad returned an MIM candidate, Secunderabad voted for a Congress(I) nominee. There was also some fear in the initial stages of campaigning that Ramarao had lost his ability as a crowd-puller. Indeed, if anything, Rajiv Gandhi drew bigger crowds everywhere in Andhra Pradesh. But the results proved the late K. Kamaraj's tautological masterpiece: "Lakh lakh people, hundred hundred votes."

The chief minister has also been able to bring about a remarkable degree of harmony among the other parties opposed to the Congress(I) in Andhra Pradesh. Seat adjustments for the Lok Sabha polls were made with the minimum degree of fuss. Only in one case, Khammam, an agreement could not be reached.

There is, of course, nothing to suggest that NTR's popularity has increased. On the contrary, the results of the Lok Sabha polls, though very much in favour of the Telugu Desam Party, show that the percentage of votes polled by the TDP has gone down by almost nine per cent since the Assembly elections in January 1983. The TDP leaders explain this away by pointing out that a fairly large section of the electorate would have voted on the sympathy and unity and integrity factor, and they would vote for the TDP in the coming Assembly elections. While the Congress(I) won only 60 Assembly seats in the 1983 Assembly elections, the party led in 75 Assembly segments out of 294 in the Lok Sabha polls. Only another Assembly election, however, will show the true nature of the Congress(I) gains. The Congress(I) leaders themselves admit that there is precious little they can do to contain NTR. "The only person who can bring down NTR, is NTR himself," said one leader. This is fairly evident. For inspite of his seeming infallibility, there are quite a few chinks and kinks, in the NTR armour For one, there seems to be no other leader in the TDP than NTR, and to a certain degree, P. Upendra. The kinks, of course, get great publicity, the latest being his directive to the newly-elected TDP MPs asking them to wear yellow shirts.

N.T. Ramarao campaigning

These idiosyncrasies apart, Ramarao has been quick to take advantage of the slightest mistake made by the Congress(I). In the Lok Sabha elections, the chief minister adopted an aggrieved posture when the Governor refused to repromulgate the ordinance pertaining to the abolition of village officers' post. This may have lost Ramarao a few thousand votes (there are almost 35,000 village officers in Andhra Pradesh), but they won him gratitude from lakhs of peasants, especially in the Telengana and Rayalaseema region, where they have writhed in the feudal grip of the hegemonistic Patels and Patwaris. Similarly, Ramarao's reign is considered despotic by white-collar workers who have come to despise his rule.

At the moment, it is difficult to visualise the Congress(I) containing the Telugu Desam in the forthcoming elections. On Pongal day, as a colt named Chaitanya Ratham ran as the day's best in the South Indian Derby, NTR's own Chaitanya Ratham was being taken apart and being prepared for yet another election: his third. Come March, and Ramarao will be out on the road again atop his Ratham, barnstorming the state in a spectacle that continues to enthrall his people.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Hyderabad

"Sweetex helps me stay slim. It saves me 2600 calories a week . . . without actually fasting."

Any doctor will tell you, overweight is mostly due to overeating. And thus excess calorie intake. Remember this simple formula. Six cups of tea a day equals twelve teaspoons of sugar. That's 384 calories daily.* If you cut out sugar in tea and coffee alone, you can save up to 2600 calories a week without actually fasting.

Replace sugar with Sweetex. Invisibly. Effortlessly. It doesn't give you licence to gorge. It isn't a magic formula. But it helps you to cut out calories. It lends support to your calorie controlled diet. And helps you control your weight.

(* One rounded teaspoon of sugar = 32 calories)

Sweetex

SUGAR FREE SWEETENER

FOR THE WEIGHTWATCHER!

TNK/9 8.REV 1.84

The Forgotten NBR

The wind has gone out of him. He even seems to have shrunk in size. Nadendla Bhaskara Rao faces what is arguably the most frightening phase in an Indian politician's life: loss of power and not even a remote chance of regaining it. The most turbulent period in Nadendla Bhaskara Rao's political career came in August and September last year. That was when he staged what can easily be the greatest coup in democratic India, ousting N. T. Rama Rao in connivance with the then Governor of Andhra Pradesh, Ram Lal, even as the chief minister returned after a heart surgery in Houston, Texas.

But now all that is over. That tumultuous month finally ended in disaster for Bhaskara Rao. However, he was rather lucky. There have been cataclysmic events in the country since Bhaskara Rao turned a quisling. The assassination of Indira Gandhi, the subsequent riots, the Bhopal tragedy have all combined to put the Andhra incident into the background. Public memory is short, but with regard to the Andhra episode, it has been snipped shorter. Even then, it will be a long, long time before Bhaskara Rao lives down the image of a traitor.

Today, Bhaskara Rao heads a political outfit of his own. Predictably (and most ironically), it is called the Democratic Telugu Desam Party (DTDP). As he has so often argued to the bored disbelief of every one that he was the progenitor of the Telugu Desam in 1982. The DTDP of Bhaskara Rao has been allotted the symbol of rising sun between two mountains. The way things are going for Bhaskara Rao, it could well have been the setting sun.

Almost everyone has deserted him. "My party has 28-30 MLAs," he said listlessly in a talk with SUNDAY. He meant former MLAs, since the House has been dissolved. The numbers really do not matter. Not with Bhaskara Rao anyway. Those two dozen (former) MLAs who are still with him are the ones who have no other option. They have not been taken back to the Telugu Desam and even the Congress(I) has spurned them. Needless to say, no one would like to touch Bhaskara Rao. But Jeevan Reddy, one of the lucky ones in the NTR cabinet who deserted Ramarao to share the spoils with Bhaskara Rao, gained entry into the Congress(I). He was one of the "distinguished" MLAs of the Bhaskara Rao group who created a furore in the Andhra Pradesh Assembly during the historic Assembly session of September 1983.

Metropolis

NTR comes to meet the President after he was ousted from the chief ministership

N. Bhaskara Rao in the wilderness

Nadendla Bhaskara Rao, however, sits alone in his party office in Narayanagudda, Hyderabad. Everything about the place is sparse and hollow including the furniture and the people. Bhaskara Rao says his party is going to contest all the 294 seats in the coming Assembly elections. One really wonders how. "I have got nearly 500 applications for nominations and 24 January is the last date," he said with a strange kind of pride, as if to establish his legitimacy as a politician. But the echoes did not make the numbers any larger. In fact, it is ridiculous, considering that the Telugu Desam of NTR will probably have something like 10,000 applications for the Assembly elections.

It is quite pathetic really. Last September, Bhaskara Rao sat in a swivel chair in the state secretariat, defying the mandate of the people, taking decisions about the state and its people. Today, he sits alone on a plain steel chair in a room that is only just whitewashed and has no carpeting.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Hyderabad

Jagdish Yadav

NTR with P. Upendra (left) at a press conference in Delhi

'Politics is Not for Power, It is for Service'

Andhra Pradesh chief minister N.T. Ramarao told SUNDAY

It was the famous pre-dawn interview. For N.T. Ramarao, the saffron-clad chief minister of Andhra Pradesh, the day begins at four a.m. The habit, it is said, is a hangover from the bleak days, when he had to wake up at half-past three to milk cows in order to supplement the family income. The chief minister of six crore Andhra people is still to get over the habit, much to the exasperation of journalists, bureaucrats, partymen alike who would like to meet him.

At six am N.T. Ramarao peaks. Dressed in his usual saffron robe, a white tilak on his forehead, his eyes sharp and clear, his mind alert, he radiates energy as the day goes by and rushes through his tiring routine till late. In the evening he looks dull and listless, his eyes glazed and his movements slow. Rarely is he awake after nine p.m. Ramarao spoke to SUNDAY on Sankranti day, the harvest festival for the Telugus. Later, the same day, he was to leave for New Delhi to watch the 28 Telugu Desam MPs take oath.

Q: How did the Telugu Desam manage to defy the Rajiv wave that swept the country?*

A: We have won the confidence of our people. They know that I am working and my government is working to uplift the poor and the downtrodden. These are not mere words. They have faith and belief in our party manifesto which we are implementing with success.

Q: Now the opposition has been routed and you are, perhaps, the only person who stood up against the Congress(I) and won. Do you have any plans or new ideas to get the opposition back on its feet?

A: Unity must come about without any motive and ambition, that is the first thing the leaders have to learn. They must unite for the sake of the country. Personal ambition must be kept aside. They must reach the people with their hearts and not their tongues. Once they create this confidence in the hearts and minds of the people, then winning elections is fairly simple.

Q: The Telugu Desam is the single largest opposition party. But it is also a regional party. Do you foresee the Congress(I) not taking your party seriously in Parliament with respect to the larger issues facing the country?

A: (Angrily) We are the representatives of all the people. Nobody can stop us from taking up the problems of the rest of the country. We may be a regional party but our partymen have gone there as members of the Lok Sabha. They have a right to project the plight of the whole country. The Parliament is not to raise the issues of our state; for that we have the Assembly. The Telugu Desam MPs are Indians first and Telugus next. That empowers them to speak for the nation and they will acquit themselves.

Q: What about the opposition conclaves and your attempts to unite

A: We are becoming a national party. We are starting the Bharat Desam.

Q: So we hear. But how will you go about it? When did the idea originate?

NTR with P. Upendra (extreme left) and TDP MPs sporting yellow shawls photographed at Parliament House

A: Long back; quite long back Bharat Desam is going to be a federal system. It will have Gandhian ideology adopted to the modern days. Under this federal system, each state should have its own government elected by its own people. Then each party winning in the state will be represented in the Parliament. When my government has a majority here, then it must be represented in the Parliament, in the cabinet, only then the problems will be evenly projected. Whichever major powers are existing in the state, they must be represented in the union cabinet. only then can all the views be presented.

Q: Now, just a moment: you said represented in the union cabinet. Do you mean to say that if the Telugu Desam is invited to join the union cabinet now, you will agree?

A: That is next. I am only talking about the policy guidelines of the Bharat Desam. Let us not assume things.

Q: How will you work out the modalities of the Bharat Desam?

A: There will be several Desams from different states, all of which are on a linguistic basis. See Tamil Nadu... nadu actually means Desam. So naturally each state is a separate entity. The union of states gives a federal government which is the feature of our Constitution.

Q: Specifically, are you suggesting that leaders like Biju Patnaik, Sharad Pawar and Ramakrishna Hegde start their Desams or will you start a desam in their states with new leaders?

A: No, no. I don't know their minds. Without knowing it, I cannot say.

Q: What about your efforts to unite the opposition? Have you given it up?

A: They must be united. Even for matters like adjustment of seats, they must draw up a procedure Power is not the important thing; when it comes, it comes. But the country comes before all and the poor people who need our sacrifice. Politics is not for power, it is for service. Politics is for the 50 per cent of the people without food, clothing and shelter.

Q: Now that you happen to be the dominant opposition leader, do you plan to be selective in inviting other opposition leaders to conclaves or even in joining the Bharat Desam? Especially considering that a few of them have been detrimental to opposition unity.

A: That is not the question. First they must have a clean understanding of the purpose of the Bharat Desam—service to the nation No-thing else matters Work for the people and they will automatically recognise your service. Success does not have any meaning without creating confidence in the minds of the people.

Q: Sure, but some opposition leaders have been particularly damaging to the unity moves.

A: Let them correct themselves. My only purpose is to create better things and comforts for the people who are in need of it, to bring about social justice and to create opportunities for all the people of this great country.

Q. The Telugu Desam itself is a personalised party with no second line leadership...

A: Yes, we are having one now. In the coming Assembly election new people will be given an opportunity. Whoever is of questionable reputation will be thrown out.

Q: When is the Bharat Desam going to come about?

A: We are launching it on 20 May in the Mahanaadu week.

Interviewed by Chidanand Rajghatta

Intelligence agents drive out of the 16, Hailey Road office of T. Manekial and Co.

Enemies of the State

A powerful espionage ring is smashed

The foreign hand has now been exposed. The umpteen references to "foreign hand," which Mrs Indira Gandhi and later Mr Rajiv Gandhi had been making over the past few years, had made this term jarring to Indian ears. The busting of the super spyring on the night of 16-17 January has exposed that the foreign hand is not merely a reality, but it operated right from within the Prime Minister's office. The entire office of the principal secretary to the Prime Minister, Dr P.C. Alexander, who has since been asked to resign, was betraying the country each and every minute of the working hours of the government of India, round the year. Not a moment when the gates of the South Block office of the Prime Minister were open, was the nation's interest safe. Every document marked "secret" was being passed on to a private person who, in turn, supplied these to foreigners. The operation was not specialised. The instruction given by the spymaster to his ring was that each and every document which reached the office of Dr Alexander and had the "secret" classification, was to be handed over to the person in-charge of the spyring. Expert sifting of these papers was done later, by the foreign masters, who therebybecame privy to minutest details of the government's functioning. Such was the ramification of the operations that on the day of the arrest nearly 600 classified documents were seized from the premises of Coomar Naram, the Delhi regional manager of a bluechip Bombay firm, T. Maneklal Manufacturing Company Ltd, which was a cover organisation for espionage.

The counter-intelligence activities cell of the intelligence bureau has done the nation proud. In less than two years, this is the second time that this cell, headed by a Haryana cadre IPS officer, Kalyan Rudra, has cracked major spyrings. In late 1983, the Larkins case, in which two retired top brass of the armed forces were arrested, exposed the vulnerability of the defence ministry to espionage by foreigners. Now the Prime Minister's office itself has been exposed as a spyden. This cell, referred to in the IB circles as the "CIA cell," has done excellent work. (The reference to CIA is not in the American context, but it is the abbreviation for "counter-intelligence activities.")

The present case came to the notice of the CIA cell by accident. In early October 1984, an operative was sent to Hotel Vikram, near Greater Kailash in South Delhi, to keep watch on a suspect. It was a bad day (initially) for this man, as the person under surveillance did not provide any interesting report. But as he had been asked to keep vigil, the operative, rather bored, stood outside the hotel. Suddenly the movements of a man aroused his interest. The operative saw the man (later identified as Mr Coomar Narain) arrive in a taxi and disembark outside the hotel and walk into the hotel compound. Why should anyone get off a taxi outside the hotel and not drive upto the portico, the operative wondered. He followed Coomar Narain into the hotel, where he saw Narain meeting a foreigner, An Indian meeting a foreigner in a lesser-known hotel is sufficient ground for the counter-intelligence sleuths to get interested. The operative saw Narain get out of the hotel, walk to a nearby taxistand and leave. Narain did not use the hotel's taxi-hailing service. The operative was on a hot trail. Narain was followed upto his office at 16 Hailey Road, in downtown New Delhi. On enquires, Narain's identity became known and the alert operative also learnt that T. Maneklal and Co., of which Narain was the local boss, owned a fleet of cars. A chauffeur-driven car was also assigned to Naraian for his personal use. Then why should be have moved around in taxis? The matter was reported to the higher-ups by the operative and as a matter of routine, Coomar Narain was put under surveillance. Along with his Hailey Road office, his residence, aa double-storeyed bungalow owned by him at the posh Defence Colony, was also watched. Soon, a farmhouse owned by him near Chhatarpur on the Gurgaon Road also came under the IB's watch. The vigil, which had begun quite accidentally, vielded rich dividends.

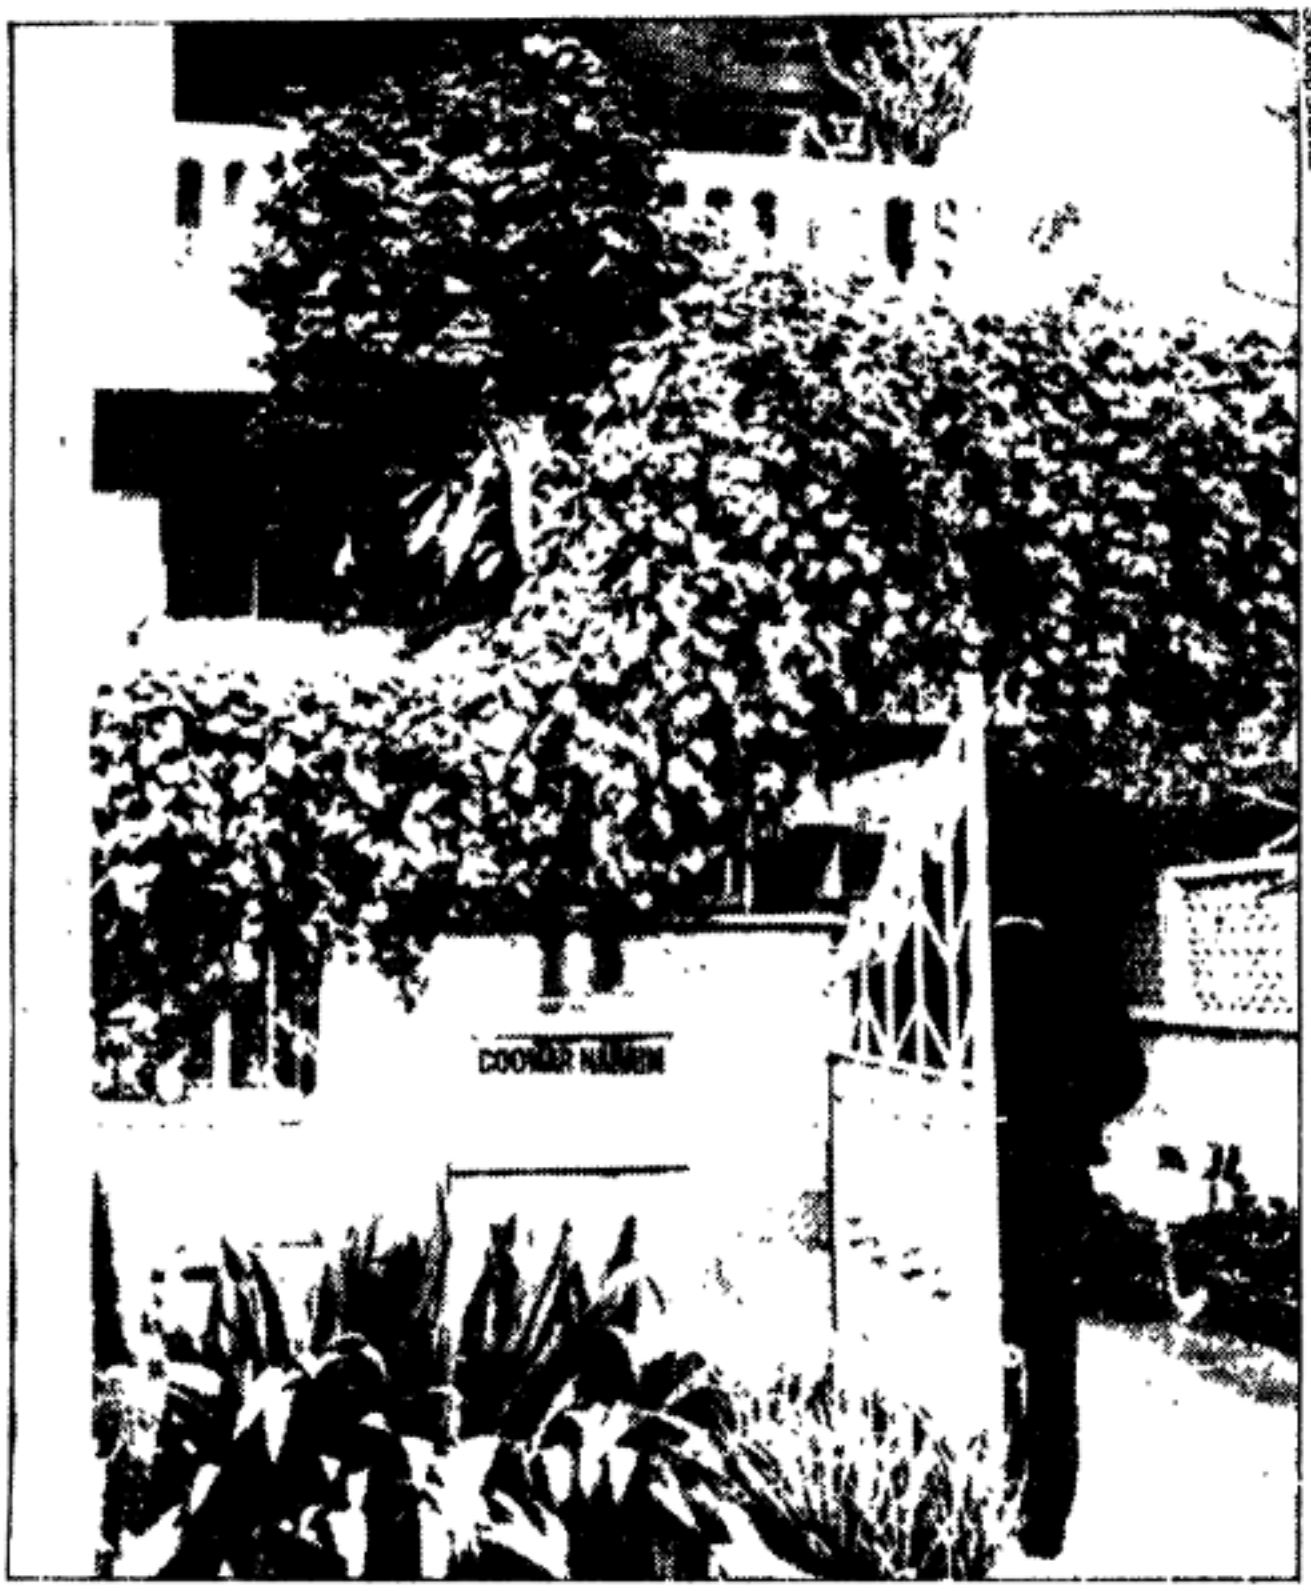
The modus operandi was simple. The office at Hailey Road used to see a sudden spurt of activity after dusk. Between seven and nine pm on most days of the week, a trickle of visitors used to be seen at the office of T. Maneklal and Co. The visitors were not on social calls. They were junior-ranking government functionaries, holding sensitive secretarial positions, who used to call on Coomar Narain and have a drink at his office. While the entertaining by Narain was on, the secret documents picked up by the sources during the day were taken by a peon of Maneklal and Co. to a xeroxing shop nearby. The IB operative saw a regular pattern in Narain's entertainment technique: the visitor arrived, a peon soon afterwards left through a bylane towards a multi-storeyed office building, Rohit House, on Tolstoy Marg. The xeroxing shop on the ground floor of Rohit House received steady business from Maneklal and Co and the shop owner did not mind

From Spinning to Spying

The Calcutta office of SLM-Maneklal Ashok Chakravorty



T Maneklal Manufacturing Company Ltd., the Bombay firm which has now been exposed as a cover organisation for espionage, began its operations in the field of manufacturing textile machinery. The journey from manufacturing spinning equipment to involvement in spying has been a long one. The principal accused in the spying case detained in Delhi, Coomar Narain, is the Delhi regional manager of the firm, which is known for its "SLM-Maneklal" range of products. After his arrest, Coomar Narain has told investigators that he had been running the spy ring under instructions from his managing director, Yogesh T. Maneklal, who lives in Bombay. The Maneklal firm has many foreign collaborations with French, American and Italian companies. Maneklal's involvement in espionage may have begun due to his business links abroad. Till 1983, Maneklal's firm mainly dealt in textile machinery manufacture. Last year, it diversified into the more lucrative oil rig equipment manufacturing field, which has assumed importance following the growth of oil exploration in Bombay High.

Weatherford International, an American firm specialising in oil rig equipment signed a tie up with SLM-Maneklal last year. Thereafter, this combine competed in several tenders floated for the Bombay High by the Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC). The Italian connection was through a contract signed by SLM-Maneklal with Uniroyal Manuli of Italy, which is a joint US-Italian company, floated by an American firm, Uniroyal and Dardanio Manuli of Italy. This firm specialises in industrial rubber and rubber products used in oil exploration.

Due to recession in the domestic textile industry which was facing a two-pronged attack from trade unions of the Datta Samant variety on the one hand and the manipulations of the textile king, Dhirubhai Ambani on the other), the accounts book of SLM-Maneklal showed a downward trend two years ago. Its gross profits fell from Rs 106.12 lakhs in 1982-83 to Rs 34.27 lakhs in 1983-84. Apart from diversifying into oil rig equipment, Maneklal apparently fell prey to spying operations around this time.

Apart from the French, US and Italian connections, this company also had dealings with the Soviet Union and Eastern Bloc countries like Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia and Vietnam. Belgium and Iran were also its trading contacts. The Maneklal firm also dealt in defence orders and had received orders for Riki boats and floats and other rubber products required by the armed forces. Apart from the office at Delhi's downtown Hailey Road, the firm had an office at Ansal Bhavan on Kasturba Gandhi Marg, also near Connaught Place. This office, however, was not used for spying. Only the Hailey Road and Coomar Narain's Defence Colony residence and a farmhouse were centres of spying activity.

S.B.

Sanjoy Sarkar

The house of Coomar Narain

staying beyond office hours to serve his customer. The xeroxing done, the peon went back to the sprawling single-storeyed building on Hailey Road and handed over the documents and the xeroxed copies to Naram The visitor then left the premises, obviously contented with the good liquor he had consumed. The system worked on spot-payment basis Apart from cash, a bottle of imported liquor used to be given to the visitors at the Maneklal office. Evenme itter evening, visitors were entertained at the Hailey Road office and the nation's secrets were passed on to foreigners, via the office of Maneklal and Co. The Defence Colony house and the farmhouse near Chhatarpur (where Delhi's elite own farmhouses; the Nehru-Gandhi family too, have a farm there) were used for entertaining higher officials. Coomar Narain apparently did not want the joint secretaries and the other senior officers he entertained in these two places to run into their secretarial staff, hence the use of the Hailey Road office, which was the main centre of the spyring.

Investigations which began in early October were hampered by the assassination of Indira Gandhi. The staff of the CIA cell were put on other duties for a while. The probe began in right earnest again in the middle of November and by early December, the IB was confident about the involvement of the office of the principal secretary to the Prime Minister in spying. Bypassing the cabinet secretary, who usually monitors all intelligence gathering, a senior home ministry official and the director of the IB, H. C. Barari, briefed Rajiv Gandhi about the scandal. The young Prime Minister, though unnerved, kept his cool. He wanted the report to be rechecked. In the meantime, he began cutting out Dr Alexander's office from sensitive work. Arun Singh who had been appointed parliamentary secretary took over all the sensitive work quietly. Dr Alexander was kept in good humour, while actual work was handled by Arun Singh's office. According to a section of the press, the spyring was not busted in December in view of the impending elections. This is a naive suggestion. If anything, when the nation's integrity was the election plank, the busting of a spyring would have only made the position of the Congress(I) stronger. The reason why the Prime Minister did not want hasty action to be taken was because a false alarm would be raised.

Within ten days of the assassination of Indira Gandhi, a case had been decided in the court of Bharat Bhushan Gupta, additional chief metropolitan magistrate, Delhi (the same judge before whom the present accused are being produced). In a judgment delivered on 10 November, the judge had acquitted three men, including two IB officers, Raghbir Singh and Dharam Singh, who had been charged with espionage because of lack of evidence. The courts have to follow the statute and when after registering the case against these men in February 1983, the police could not prove the charge that they were passing on secret documents to foreign agents, the case was filed as "untraced" due to lack of evidence. Had the arrests of officers in the Prime Minister's secretariat been carried out, and later not proved due to technicalities, then the image of the government would have suffered.

It was but natural for the Prime Minister to be cautious. He wanted concrete evidence to be gathered before the ring was busted.

Dr P. C. Alexander's importance diminished soon after the new wave government assumed office. Dr Alexander, of course, was trusted with the list of ministers on the day of the swearing-in: 31 December 1984. That was because the list had been typed by Mr Rajiv Gandhi's trusted aide, V. George, and handed over to Dr Alexander, without involving his office staff. But in all confidential matters from around 4 January, Dr Alexander was not in the picture . The parliamentary secretaries headed by Arun Singh ruled the roost. The political bureaucracy, as represented by the three parliamentary secretaries, Arun Singh, Ahmed Patel and Oscar Fernandes, had suddenly been elevated and placed over the bureaucracy in the PM's office.

After the removal of Dr Alexander, in all likelihood the post of principal secretary would be abolished. This

Those Arrested: Who's Who

On 18 January, the Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi announced in both the Houses of Parliament that certain officials who were occupying sensitive positions in the government had been arrested and were suspected to be indulging in activities detrimental to the national interest. At the time no one realised that the Prime Minister was revealing the biggest espionage case in the history of independent India.

The next day when names of the arrested persons were revealed, the entire bureaucracy was shocked. Of the eight persons arrested initially, six were government employees and two were businessmen. The main person in the spy ring was Mr T. N. Kher, under secretary of principal secretary Dr P. C. Alexander. Mr Kher has served in the Prime Minister's office for more than 20 years. He was with Mr P. N. Dhar, a former joint secretary to the PM till 1977 and also served with Mr H. Y. Sharda Prasad, the information adviser to the PM. Mr Kher was the most trusted man in the PM's office and no one had realised that he could be indulging in such activity. He owns a large house in Greater Kailash, a posh colony in South Delhi. One of his sons is a doctor and another an engineer. Mr Kher is a Kashmiri pandit and has good family connections.

Mr P. Gopalan, also arrested in connection with the espionage case, was the personal assistant in the office of Dr Alexander. He worked under Mr C. Ramachandran, the energy minister in the Janata regime and after the Congress(I) came to power in 1980, worked with Mr Ghani Khan Chaudhury when the latter was the coal and mine minister in Mrs Indira Gandhi's cabinet. When in 1981 Dr Alexander took over as principal secretary, Mr Gopalan was shifted to the PM's office.

Mr Coomar Narain, the regional manager of T. Maneklal and Company was arrested after intelligence personnel got information about his involvement in the case. Mr Narain is suspected to be the person who was chiefly supplying secret information to the foreign powers.

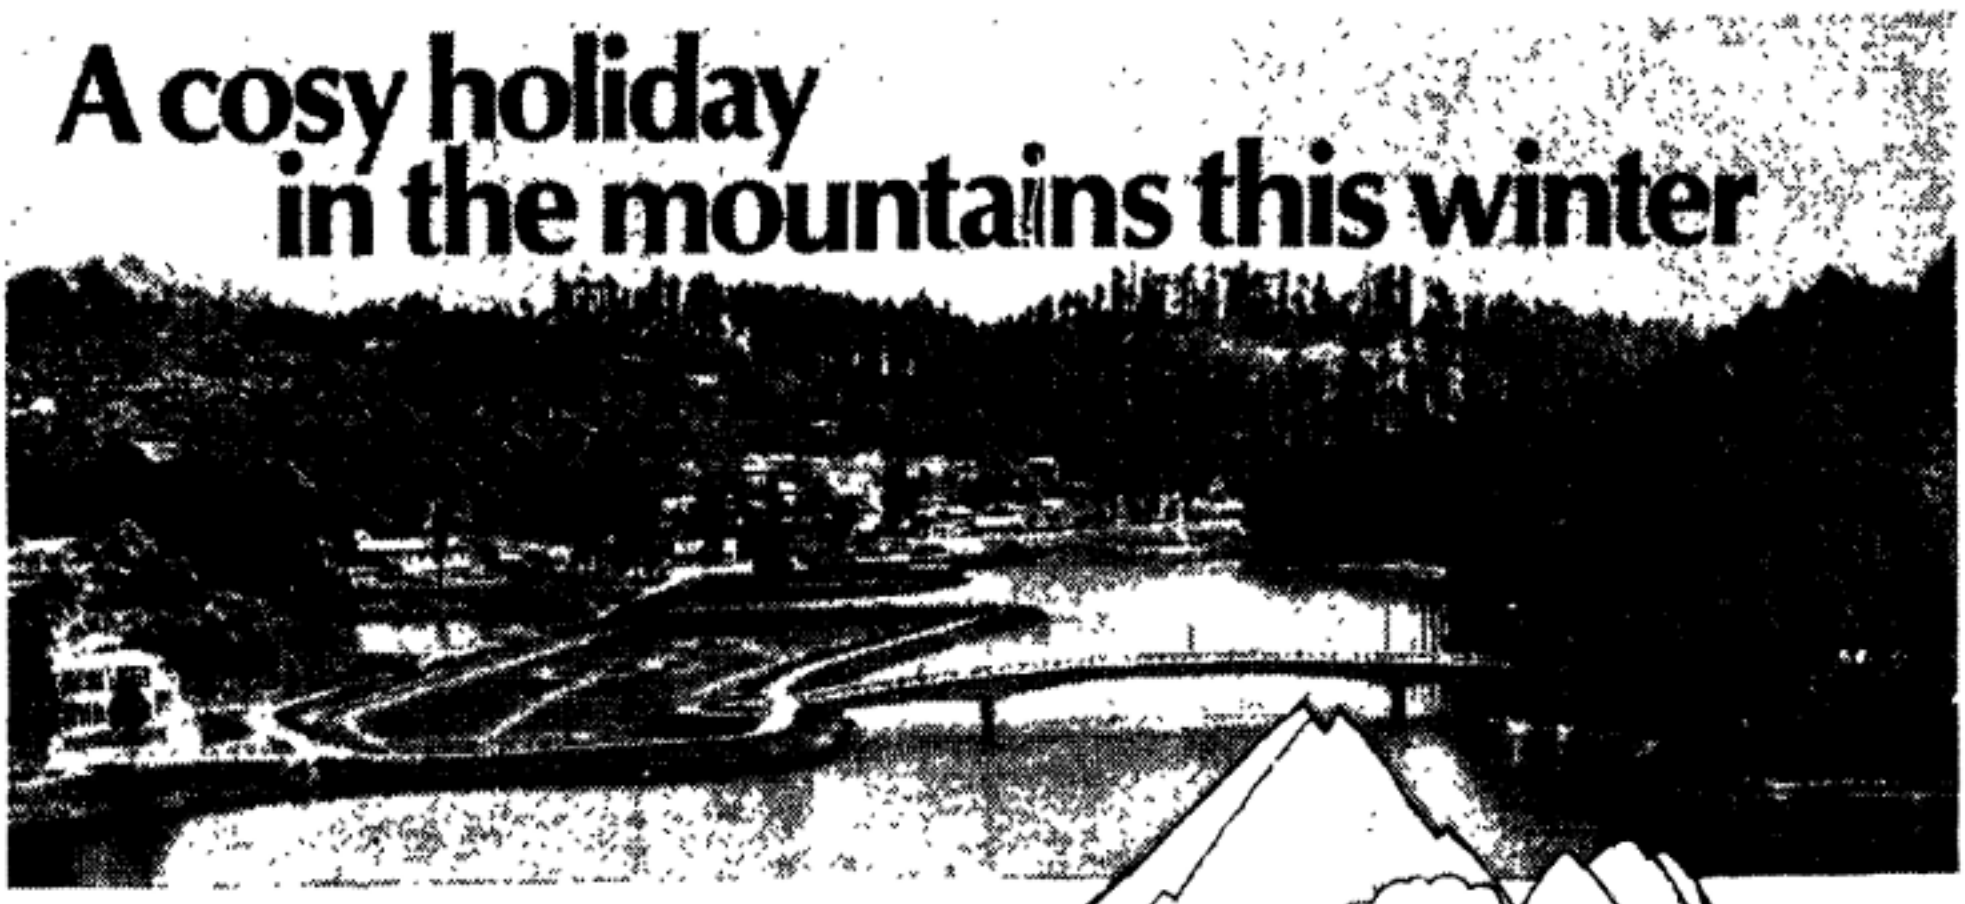
Mr S. Shankaran, the personal assistant to Mr Suryanarayan, the press secretary to the President, was the man who knew Mr Narain for many years and introduced him to Mr Kher last year.

Mr Narain was working for Maneklal and Company for the past 22 years and he owns a bungalow in the posh Defence Colony area of South Delhi. His wife usually stays at his Mehrauli Farm. According to neighbours of Mr Narain he was not friendly with anyone in the Defence Colony. He is also said to own a number of cars. His assistant Mr Chaman Lal Chanana was also arrested, who used to help Mr Narain at his 16, Hailey Road office for the spying business. This office is believed to be the nerve centre where secret information passed hands.

Mr K. Malhotra, another personal assistant in the PM's office was also arrested, along with others. Intelligence sources point out that he was involved in espionage.

Mr Jagdish Chandra, the personal assistant to the secretary, defence (production), Mr M. C. Sarin, was instrumental in the leakage of defence secrets. Another government employee Mr Jagdish Tiwari, the personal assistant to the additional secretary, Mr Baijal, was used by the foreign powers to obtain information regarding the country's economic plans.

Jagmeet Uppal, New Delhi



Jaspal Singh Gill being taken to a court in New Delhi on 8 December 1983

post was created during the prime ministership of the late Lal Bahadur Shastri, who appointed Lakshmi Kant Jha to this post. Mrs Gandhi chose P. N. Haksar first and in her later tenure she had at first Krishnaswamy Raosahab and then P.C. Alexander, an officer who had quit the IAS in 1977 as the Janata government wanted to send him back to his parent cadre, Kerala. He had taken up an assignment with the United Nations at Geneva before being asked by Mrs Gandhi to join as her principal secretary. Mrs Gandhi's personal friend, Pupul Jayakar, had recommended his name. Mrs Gandhi did not know Alexander closely before and Mrs Jayakar's word carried weight.

The IB mounted vigil at 16, Hailey Road in the early part of January. It was decided that the crackdown would take place on a day when maximum evidence could be collected. On the evening of 16 January, as many as seven "visitors" called on Coomar Narain at Hailey Road. The presence of P. Gopalan from Dr Alexander's office further provided an opportunity for the big catch. The raid was conducted and the officers

A cosy holiday in the mountains this winter

High and beautiful Darjeeling

It's a range of beauty spots, a package of experiences Darjeeling town—the warm and friendly 'Queen' of hill stations Exquisite natural splendour Mt Everest and the Kanchenjungha range, rolling tea gardens, valleys full of flowers and evergreens The colourful town with its gay processions and dances during festivals, shops and bazaars, museums and zoos A number of Tourist Lodges to choose from

Calm and lovely Mirik

A journey through miles of lovely green tea gardens and orange orchards takes you to the lake at Mirik Walk through forests of evergreen cryptomeria Go boating Stay at the quiet Tourist Hostel For luxury living, there are also nice little cottages

Cool and attractive Kalimpong

The resort that's cool and temperate through the year
See the Teesta river

Climb upto Durbindara point for a rare view of the Himalayas Browse in the local Arts & Crafts Centre or the colourful bi-weekly Bazaar A number of Tourist Lodges for persons of different tastes and budgets.

Secluded Kurseong

A cozy and convenient stop-over spot on your way to or from Darjeeling
A beauty spot by itself. See the Buddhist Monastery, Dow Hill and the Eagle's Crag The Tourist Centre with a beautiful bar-restaurant also provides accommodation

All these places are close to Darjeeling—Mirik (49 kms), Kalimpong (51 kms), Kurseong (36 kms).
No rains The weather is dry Cold but sunny And the mountains offer a rare beauty
Why don't you try this package this winter?

For further information & reservation, please contact

Tourist Bureau and Reservation Counter, Tourism Development Corporation

1-2 Benoy-Badal-Dinesh Bagh (East) Calcutta-700001 Phone 23-8271, Gram TRAVELTIPS
Nehru Road Darjeeling Hill Cart Road, Siliguri, West Bengal Information Bureau, A/2, State Emporia Baba Kharak Singh Marg, New Delhi 110 001 Phone 34 3775 Karim Mansion 787 Anna Salai Madras-600002 Phone 85206

Government of West Bengal

ICA TB 824 82/84

An earlier spy scandal: Maj-Gen F.D. Larkins, who is believed to have sold defence secrets to the CIA, being escorted by the police in 1983 with their documents were nabbed (Normally the secret papers were taken out by the suspects for an overnight operation. After the xeroxing had been done, the documents were innocently replaced in the respective offices the next morning.) The same night the residence of T. N Kher, the aide of Dr Alexander who had been in the PM's office for the last two decades, was raided. Documents were seized at his house as well. The raid at the office and the residence of Coomar Narain yielded nearly 600 documents. The magnitude of the racket can be gauged from the fact that on the day of his arrest Coomar Narain had collected papers from the Prime Minister's office, Rashtrapati Bhavan, defence ministry, department of defence production, finance ministry, department of economic affairs, petroleum ministry and the planning commission. The choice of 16 January for the raid by the IB sleuths proved useful.

Simultaneous raids were conducted on the premises of T. Maneklal and Co at Bombay and Calcutta and a rich haul of classified documents was gathered. The Indian firm had been an effective cover. Had some foreigner acted the way Coomar Narain did, the officers would not have been as accessible as they were to an Indian businessman. Though one wonders if the accused officers had not applied their minds to the fact that the Indian company was looking at too many files, not all connected with the business activities of the firm.

P. C. Alexander

The details of the expose need not be gone into. Newspapers have been flooded with different versions, about defence secrets, foreign office documents, etcetera. The fact is that there was no paper marked "secret" in the office of the principal secretary to the Prime Minister and in the offices of many senior bureaucrats which did not find its way into unauthorised hands. The involvement of the French diplomat need not surprise anyone It is normal practice for both the CIA and the KGB to employ diplomats other than those belonging to their own countries for spying. Western diplomats could be working for the CIA. Similarly, Eastern Bloc nations (even non-aligned Yugoslavia) are used by the KGB sometimes to spread their net. Even if an ordinary document of the

Who is Bolley?

Whether Colonel Alain Bolley, the French deputy military attache, who was asked to leave the country on 20 January following disclosures about his being the key foreign link in the spy scandal, was only working for the CIA or was, in addition, a spy for his own government as well is uncertain. What is certain is the fact that the Colonel subscribed to extreme rightwing ideology and was a bitter critic of the French government ever since the Socialists came to power in May 1981.

Bolley, a short man in his early fifties who sported a goatee,would often publicly abuse the present government headed by Francois Mitterrand, especially its inclusion of four communist ministers in the cabinet. Colonel Bolley feared that his country might one day become communist. Moreover, after Francois Mitterrand came to power in the summer of 1981, an old French group consisting of the extreme right overseas French citizens was reactivated to stir up opinion against the new government in Paris.

Delhi served as the headquarters of South Asia for such French nationals living in this region. (Last year, members living in the seven countries of the region met in Kathmandu). The group is believed to meet every six months, and it receives instructions from its Paris headquarters. Significantly, when the elections for the European Common Market Assembly were held a few months ago, there was not a single vote from the French community in India for members belonging to the socialist government. The votes all went to Jacques Chirac.

The Colonel had all the right credentials to attract the attention of the CIA. The disgruntled old soldier had also served in Algeria and is said to have been a sympathiser of the OAS (Organisation De L'Arm Secrete), the dreaded group of French servicemen who had served in Algeria which had master-minded and carried out several unsuccessful attempts on the life of general Charles de Gaulle after he had announced the historic decision to give Algeria its independence in 1962.

It may be recalled that at that time many of the French officers and soldiers working in "Algeria Francaise" (as Algeria was called prior to its independence) deserted and fought against the French army in a very bitter war.

Colonel Bolley, who was promoted to the rank of Colonel a few months ago and was given the Legion d' Honneur last winter had rather crucial assignments during his four-year stint in New Delhi.

An aviation expert, he was an important negotiator in many of the Indo-French military deals, including the controversial Mirage contract and most other military negotiations.

While information gathered by intelligence sources indicates that the Colonel was recruited by a CIA operative in Paris belonging to a front office involved in gathering Indian defence secrets, it could even be that Colonel Bolley was "hired" in New Delhi itself a little over two years ago.

The four communist ministers in the French cabinet whom Bolley always criticised

The French air and naval attache was, according to intelligence sources, the link between the CIA and Indian members of the spy ring. The Colonel's rather unobstrusive presence must have served him well for it made it easier for him to move through Delhi's social circles.

The "deportation" of the French diplomat also took place rather strangely. Although one of the national dailies, the Indian Express, published a story on the morning of 20 January that a French diplomat involved in the spy scandal had been sent out of the country on a special plane on the afternoon of 19 January, the Indian government did not make any move. The French embassy continued to deny all knowledge of the affair. And the Colonel himself, when reporters telephoned him,denied the involvement of any Frenchman. By the night of 19 January, the Colonel said "no comment" and later on that night itself, he was unavailable for even that. Finally, the Colonel boarded the scheduled Air France flight at 11.40 pm, with his wife and child. His family did not normally live with him in India but had come to Delhi this winter. In Paris, in an interview he later said when he was questioned about his involvement: "I am a soldier, not a spy..."

What is interesting is that the Indian government refused to say that it had deported the French diplomat. In fact, on 21 January the AFP (Agence France Presse) commentary made out the case that the French government could not have been involved because the Indian government had not demanded the expulsion of the French diplomat. The commentary also mentioned the fact that, perhaps, the Indian government did not want a break in Indo-French relations.

Meanwhile, in a statement in Parliament on the morning of 21 January, home minister, Mr S.B. Chavan clearly said that an agent of a foreign power had been asked to leave the country. While socialist governments are not supposed to be consorting with the CIA, it is a fairly well-known fact that the secret services of various European countries, including the socialist do share their information with each other and the CIA.

What still remains a little perpflexing about the French angle is the other "invisible" French diplomat who was supposed to have been despatched on the afternoon of 20 January. The military office of the French embassy has six Frenchmen, two of whom have diplomatic status. The question is: has one of the non-diplomatic staff been deported as well?

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

labour ministry, which has been marked "secret" falls into foreign hands, it is a matter for concern.

Who is to blame for the situation which leads to the occurrence of such incidents? The counter-intelligence activities cell of the IB has shown that it can bust such rackets with expertise. But are all reports of this cell passed on to the Prime Minister honestly? Since 26 June 1975, the overall charge of intelligence was handed over to the cabinet secretary. This order, issued on the first day of the Emergency, is still in force. If there are intelligence lapses, the cabinet secretary is certainly to blame.Why did a senior home minis-

Lt. Col Jasbir Singh, charged with supplying defence secrets to the CIA, arriving at the Patiala House Court in New Delhi on 8 December 1983

NEXT WEEK

The Decline and Fall of the Indian Bureaucrat

A special investigation into the spy scandal and its consequences

try officer and the director of IB choose to go directly to the PM, bypassing the cabinet secretary, to inform him of the spying in the principal secretary's office? Also, one prime ministerial aide who has been overseeing intelligence monitoring in the PM's office is V.S. Tripathi. When he was an IAS officer, he looked after intelligence matters. Even after leaving the IAS and becoming a private individual on contract service, Tripathi was in-charge of intelligence. So much so that at one stage in early 1983 there was a move to make him the only non-official member of the Joint Intelligence Committee. This move, though approved by no less a person than R.N. Kao, then senior security adviser to the cabinet, ran into rough weather and was later dropped. Krishnaswamy Raosahab and V. S. Tripathi certainly have some explaining to do after the spy scandal was busted. This is not to suggest that either Dr Alexander, Krishnaswamy Raosahab or Tripathi was in any way involved in the racket which has been busted. But their liability cannot be overlooked. Even after the death of the former Prime Minister, laxity seems to dominate the highest quarters of the bureaucracy.

The Prime Minister acted maturely by waiting for the arrests before he confronted Dr Alexander with the case. His announcement on the floor of the Parliament on 17 January was made at an opportune moment. The opposition leader, Madhu Dandavate, rose to the occasion by allowing the Prime Minister to withhold details of the arrests in the national interest. The early days of 1985 in New Delhi were marked by morning fog, which lifted around ten and thereafter there was bright sunshine. The fog around the Prime Minister's office has lifted, the culprits have been booked. One hopes the sunshine is not replaced by cloudy weather too soon.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

SPECIAL REPORT

White Paper or White Lie?

Or, how G.M. Shah is trying to frame Dr Abdullah

"They are only making me a greater leader," Dr Farooq Abdullah had commented when in August last year the state government headed by his estranged brother-in-law, Ghulam Mohammed Shah, first came out with a document alleging that the former chief minister had, during his tenure at the head of the state, shielded anti national and secessionist elements and had indulged in anti-India activities while in England as a medical student

Farooq Abdullah

Though Dr Abdullah had been advised to drag G. M. Shah to court for defaming him, he chose to fight his detractors politically and "not waste time in courts." Perhaps he was under the impression that the Shah government, which had come to power through defections, in order to justify its existence had indicted the former chief minister to give the impression that the Farooq Abdullah ministry had to be dismissed to save the country from the "traitor."

But Shah and his colleagues have not stopped accusing Dr Abdullah of being anti-national and communal. During the past six months a number of documents repeating the same charges were released officially. The recently released 113-page White Paper prepared by the state cabinet sub-committee headed by deputy chief minister Devidas Thakur repeats the same story. Dr Abdullah has, however, reacted sharply to the charges levelled against him and is seriously considering the idea of "teaching Shah a lesson for defaming me in the eyes of my countrymen" and he has described the official report as a "bundle of lies." As he declared at a public meeting in Srinagar, "I am prepared to face the gallows if these allegations are proved correct in a court of law." The faction of the National Conference led by him is also collecting material to prepare a counter document "to give a lie" to the official one But the state government also does not seem to be in any mood to close the chapter. A report released to the press by D. D. Thakur in Jammu early this month said that the White Paper was only an "interim report" and that a "complete and final report" would be made by the sub-committee in due course of time "depending upon the extent of engagements of its members."

The idea of the "White Paper" dates back to 7 July 1983 when, seven days after the dismissal of Farooq Abdullah's government, G. M. Shah decided to appoint a sub-committee under the chairmanship of deputy chief minister D. D. Thakur, with the minister for education and revenue and the minister for agriculture as its members and the chief secretary to the state government as its member secretary. The terms of this committee were spelt out in a government order issued a few days later. Subsequently, the chief minister who had been given the power to include any other terms of reference, added, "All acts of commission and omission of the cabinet headed by Dr Farooq Abdullah" should be inquired into by the sub-committee.

The four-member body was asked to present a report to the cabinet within a period of 15 days, but it could not do so till early September last year. The reason for the delay has been attributed to the busy schedule of the members. According to Thakur, he as well as the members of the committee took pains to prepare a report based on facts and said that political differences with Farooq Abdullah had not influenced the findings of the sub-committee. However, this assertion is not borne out by facts: the document is a repetition of the allegations made against the former chief minister from time to time and it was Thakur himself who had earlier released a couple of documents listing the same charges. (It may be remembered that during Farooq Abdullah's ministry, an enquiry commission had been set up to probe into D. D. Thakur's conduct as a minister in Sheikh Abdullah's government.

Some of the charges against Farooq Abdullah listed in the White Paper are:

- He had ignored the warnings of the state and central intelligence agencies about the activities of anti-national and secessionist elements in his state and had even connived with them during his tenure as the chief minister.
- He went to the UK and stayed there for about a decade during which time he acquired a British citizenship and passport. He also went on a tour of Pakistan on a special invitation from Maqbool Butt, the executed leader of the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF), who had organised a convention in May 1974 in Pakistan. During this trip he forged links with the well-known secessionist organisation (JKLF).
- He joined hands with Mirwaiz Maulvi Farooq. The National Conference flag which was hitherto a symbol of secularism was stitched on to the green flag of the Awami Action Committee, a communal party which did not acknowledge the state's accession to the Indian union. This encouraged anti-national and communal forces in the state and their disruptive activities increased considerably.

- His government concealed the truth and misguided the home ministry about the growing activities of the secessionists and also about the 'Gurmat camps' organised by Sikh extremists.
- About 72 detainees were released on parole, the orders for many of which were passed by the chief minister himself. But none of those released reported to the jail authorities nor were they rearrested.
- Farooq Abdullah was willing to go to any extent to help his personal favourites in complete disregard of all rules and prescribed procedure and all norms of financial and administrative propriety were thrown to the winds. This created financial and administrative chaos in the state

Farooq Abdullah may not have been able to achieve anything substantial in removing the people's economic problems and streamlining the administration largely because he could not devote enough time to it. But was he to blame for this? The Congress(I) kept up a barrage of attack against him, after the defeat in the 1983 Assembly elections and tried to disrupt the functioning of the state administration. This created a number of problems for Dr Abdullah and he had to spend a lot of time facing his opponents on the political front, in and outside the state. Besides with violence escalating in Punjab, the tourist inflow to Kashmir decreased, creating economic problems for the government. It is true that Farooq Abdullah may have given jobs to a few acquaintances which may have created bad blood But the people who benefited from it are now crowding around G.M. Shah and his colleagues. Whether or not Dr Abdullah had violated laws or procedures in recruiting them only an impartial judicial enquiry can ascertain.

However, he can hardly be dubbed an anti-national or accused of being communal. It is true that he went to the UK to study medicine. It is also true that he acquired British citizenship and held a British passport. But subsequently he opted for Indian citizenship. Does this make him an anti-national? Farooq Abdullah's first visit to Pakistan was in 1964 when he accompanied his father to that country at the behest of Jawaharlal Nehru. The then Prime Minister of India had wanted Sheikh Abdullah to negotiate a settlement of the Kashmir problem In 1974, on his second visit to Kashmir, Dr Abdullah made it clear to the leaders of Pakistan Occupied Kashmir (POK) that he was opposed to their idea of an

D.D. Thakur

CNS

G.M. Shah (left) with Mrs Gandhi

Helping Hands

The administration and the police setup in Jammu and Kashmir saw a major shakeup in the upper levels in early January. The state cabinet took a decision to terminate the services of as many as 16 senior officers, which included the state's trade commissioner in Delhi, Gulam Nabi Naik. All those who were dismissed had been reemployed in recent years after their respective periods of service had expired. Whatever the intentions of the state government headed by Gulam Mohammad Shah, the step was, by and large, welcomed by those who had been suffering due to the officers occupying senior positions for many years.

But some other changes made in the name of overhauling the administration and the police department have not gone down well with many people. The changes have been criticised because many senior officers have been replaced by favourites of the ruling party and the move came about soon after the defeat of the National Conference-Congress(I) combine in the recent Lok Sabha elections. The ruling party and its ally, soon after the election results were announced, accused "a section of the state government officials and some senior police officials" of siding with the opposition National Conference and "even helping it in capturing booths and resorting to other malpractices to win the polls." But, said former chief minister Dr Farooq Abdullah and the president of the opposition National Conference, "They did nothing in particular to favour us." Many in the ruling party as well as those in the state Congress(I) had, in vain, expected that the administration and the law and order machinery would favour the ruling party in the Lok Sabha polls. In the Kashmir Valley, where the National Conference-Congress(I) combine suffered a defeat, rumours were heard on the eve of the elections that the polls would be rigged in favour of the ruling party-backed candidates and the lone Congress(I) nominee

The plans of the ruling party, however, did not work out though the administration had managed to deploy men known to be sympathetic to it as polling personnel in some of the booths. The law and order machinery on the whole remained impartial. There were, however, cases where opposition supporters and party workers resisted attempts at booth-capturing and indulging in other irregularities and the election commission had to order a repoll in as many as 30 booths.

The ruling party and its allies are now taking the state government and police officials to task for not helping the combine in the elections.This is apparent from the Shah ministry adopting a pick-and-choose policy for victimising the officials. The list of such officials include the divisional commissioner of Kashmir division, Hamidullah Khan, who has been forced to go on a long leave. Mr Khan's role during the recent elections was not appreciated by the ruling party and its ally, the Congress(I). The ruling party had accused Dr Abdullah's party of attacking a polling booth in Srinagar constituency and snatching away a ballot box from there on 24 December. But Mr Khan and the deputy inspector-general of police, Ali Mohammed Wattali, had categorically denied the charge while talking to newsmen at the end of polling on that day. The two senior officials had also denied that a case had been registered against the former chief minister. Their denial had obviously upset the ruling party. Mr Wattali has been replaced and given an innocuous post. It is widely believed that Muzaffar Shah, the son of the chief minister G.M. Shah, and the ruling party-backed nominee for the Srinagar seat, was not particularly happy with Wattali and had even complained about him to the chief minister. Hence, the transfer order of Mr Wattali.

Another charge levelled against Mr Wattali mentions that he allegedly backed Muzaffar Shah's rival, Abdul Rashid Kabuli of the opposition National Conference, to whom he lost. It was on Wattali's orders that some ruling partymen had to be physically removed from the Sher-e-Kashmir recreation centre where the counting was taking place, for indulging in hooliganism. The younger Shah had, at that time, reportedly warned Wattali that he would teach him a lesson. The state's police chief, Peer Gulam Hassan Shah, was also not spared. Although the senior police officer had deviated from the rules by keeping the then chief minister, Dr Farooq Abdullah, in the dark about the developments which took place before he was ousted, Peer Hassan Shah was replaced by M.M. Khajoria. Peer Hassan Shah, a police officer of repute, could not tolerate such humiliation and resigned on returning to the state.

There are many other senior police officers, engineers and state government officials who complain that they have been victimised for no fault of their own. But the state government has denied the allegations. Mr G.M. Shah, the cabinet maintains, had been contemplating a major shakeup in the administration soon after he took over as the chief minister in July last year. But it had to be put off "to monitor the functioning of the various departments and examine the conduct of the senior officers." When this correspondent drew the attention of a minister towards the frequent changes in the administration during the past few months, particularly in July and August last year, he said that during that period only "sporadic changes" had taken place and that the "task of streamlining and rationalising" the administrative setup was repeatedly postponed due to the government's pre-occupation with the law and order situation which was being aggravated by the agitational approach of Dr Abdullah. Begum Khalida Shah of the ruling National Conference told a daily recently, that some officials had to be replaced "because they were shielding anti-national and secessionist elements.

The state government has also abolished all recruitment boards in the state. Instead, separate boards for recruitment to each department with the head of the department as the convenor, have been constituted. This has been done "to eliminate delays in filling up the vacancies and decentralising the process of recruitment." But its detractors have asserted that the government only wanted to give ministers and other high-ups " a chance to recruit its favourites." In the beginning of January 1985, a large number of unemployed youths held a demonstration in Srinagar against the alleged malpractices in some recruitments. The ruling party president has also been approached by some unemployed women complaining that large-scale irregularities took place in the recruitment of teachers in the state's education department.

Yusuf Jameel, Srinagar

armed movement for the liberation of Kashmir (see box). Nor did his allegedly anti-national activities abroad come in the way of his being appointed the chief minister of Jammu and Kashmir after the death of his father. Devidas Thakur may not find it convenient to remember it now, but it is a well-known fact that he had taken extraordinary interest in the appointment of Dr Abdullah as the chief minister at that point of time. So much for the allegation that he is "anti-national." One heard comments about Dr Abdullah being "anti-national" and "communal" only after he had defeated the Congress(I) in the 1983 Assembly elections and formed the National Conference government in the state.

Neither the ruling state government nor its ally, the Congress(I), appears to be in any mood to give up its vicious campaign against Dr Abdullah. But his younger brother, Tariq Abdullah, who had also acquired British citizenship while in England and was included in the Pakistani delegation to the United Nations during the 1965 war, is now among the close confidants of G.M. Shah and has recently been appointed project director of Srinagar's prestigious Convention Complex.

The alliance between Farooq Abdullah and Mirwaiz Maulvi Farooq has also been subjected to severe criticism by Shah, but it was the same Mirwaiz Maulvi Farooq whom Shah met on the eve of the Lok Sabha elections to enlist his support. Again, the former chief minister has been accused of sharing the platform with the "secessionist and communal" Mirwaiz. His credentials, however, did not come in the way when Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi conveyed through Shah a goodwill message to him for the constructive role he played in the wake of Mrs Gandhi's assassination. The White Paper claims that Farooq Abdullah was present on the eve of the last Assembly elections, at a meeting addressed by Mirwaiz where he revived the slogan of self-determination for Kashmiris. Even the worst critics of Dr Abdullah have been amused by this allegation: the question of Farooq Abdullah being present at that meeting did not arise as, till then, Mirwaiz had not announced his party's support to Dr Abdullah.

Syed Ali Geelani, the leader of the Jamaat-e-Islami's parliamentary board, who had been arrested during Farooq Abdullah's tenure as the chief minister for allegedly questioning Kashmir's accession to India, was released after G.M. Shah personally revoked his detention order last month. Iqbal Qureshi, the main accused in a bomb blast case in the sports stadium in Srinagar on Independence Day in 1983, was released on a month's parole soon after Shah assumed office but was not rearrested after his parole expired. As far as the "Gurmat camps" being held in Kashmir are concerned, former home minister P.V. Narasimha Rao has gone on record to say that such camps were held in some other states as well, including Uttar Pradesh and Himachal Pradesh. Besides, no training in fortification or arms was conducted in these camps, as alleged.

Tariq Abdullah

The sub-committee's report indicting Dr Abdullah is, therefore, an act of political vendetta. Scraps of Dr Abdullah's past have been raked up in an attempt to produce a concocted story to make the former chief minister appear to be what, in fact, he is not. The timing of the release of the document is also significant. The National Conference faction led by Dr Abdullah won all the three seats in the Kashmir Valley in the recent Lok Sabha elections on the basis of which he demanded the dismissal of the Shah ministry and fresh Assembly elections in the state. This demand may have frightened his detractors who have now hit back. But if they wanted to defame Farooq Abdullah, then they have failed entirely in their purpose. In fact, it has had just the opposite effect: it is the image of the Shah ministry that is getting tarnished further as it is evident that the White Paper was released to malign Dr Abdullah. The national press has also denounced it, describing it as an act of political vendetta. Even some Congress(I) leaders have privately criticised the Shah government for preparing such a weak report against the former chief minister. The ruling National Conference and its ally, the Congress(I), will indeed find it difficult to make political capital out of it.

Yusuf Jameel, Srinagar

Hashim Qureshi (centre) and others with a picture of Maqbool Butt

SPECIAL REPORT

Gunning for Dr Abdullah

G.M. Shah accuses the former CM of being "anti-national"

The former CM of Jammu and Kashmir, Dr Farooq Abdullah, has again been accused of being "in league" with anti-national and secessionist forces while he was in power. The 113-page report prepared by the cabinet subcommittee constituted by the Gulam Mohammed Shah ministry, asserted that while he was in England Dr Abdullah indulged in anti-India activities in collaboration with various pro-Pakistan and anti-India organisations like the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF). Another official document alleges that Farooq Abdullah toured Pakistan in 1974 and established contacts with well-known terrorists like Hashim Qureshi and Amanullah Khan of the JKLF and "himself took and administered the oath of allegiance to remain dedicated to the movement for the liberation of Kashmir."

After the defeat in the June 1983 Assembly polls, the Congress(I) started a campaign against the then chief minister Farooq Abdullah. The party leaders had then accused him of shielding anti-national and secessionist elements within his state They did not stop short at that : in fact, they even claimed that he was in "league with" the JKLF, used to be its active member and continued to be in touch with such elements.

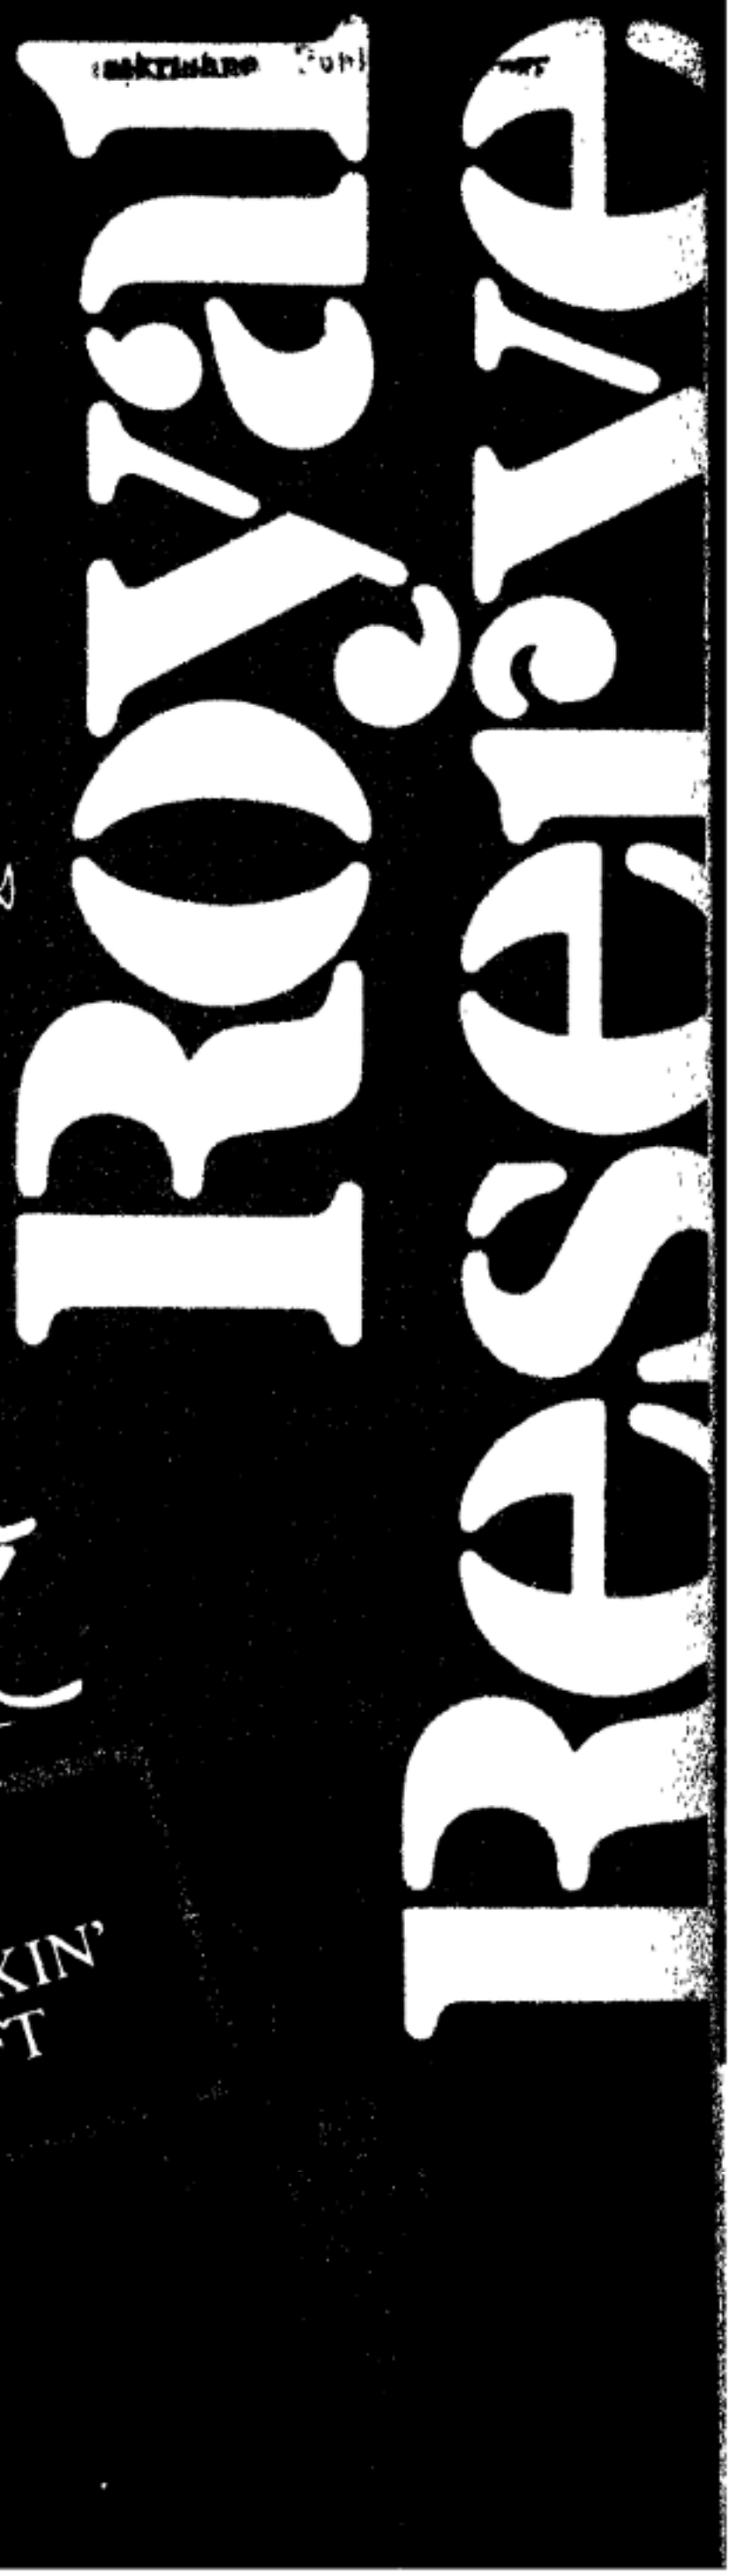
Dr Abdullah had first visited Pakistan in May 1964 when he accompanied his father Sheikh Abdullah The Sheikh had been sent to the neighbouring country by the then Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, possibly to negotiate a settlement of the Kashmir problem with the then president of Pakistan, Ayub Khan.

Farooq Abdullah, then a student of medicine in England, met some political activists of Pakistan Occupied Kashmir (POK) and conveyed a message to them from Sheikh Abdullah. The Sheikh, he told them, wanted an organisation like the Plebiscite Front to be launched on the other side of the border as well The suggestion evoked an encouraging response and Farooq Abdullah again held a meeting with "disgruntled" politicians of the territory including G.M. Lone, a wealthy Karachi-based carpet exporter from Kashmir and former Azad Kashmir state councillor, during his stopover at Karachi, on his way to London from India. Farooq Abdullah also discussed briefly the proposal of launching a new political party.

Even later Farooq Abdullah did remain in touch with the leaders of POK and often became a conduit for messages between his father and the POK leaders. Exactly a decade later, Dr Farooq Abdullah visited Pakistan again in 1974. He was sent to Pakistan by his parents "on a purely family mission." But as soon as he stepped on the other side of the border, he was invited to tour various parts of POK by the Plebiscite Front (for Pakistan and Azad Kashmir) leaders which Dr Abdullah accepted. Needless to say the organisation which invited Farooq Abdullah to tour POK had been formed at the instance of Sheikh Abdullah a decade ago and the present CM, G.M. Shah, used to be the general-secretary of Sheikh Abdullah's Plebiscite Front on the Indian side of Kashmir.

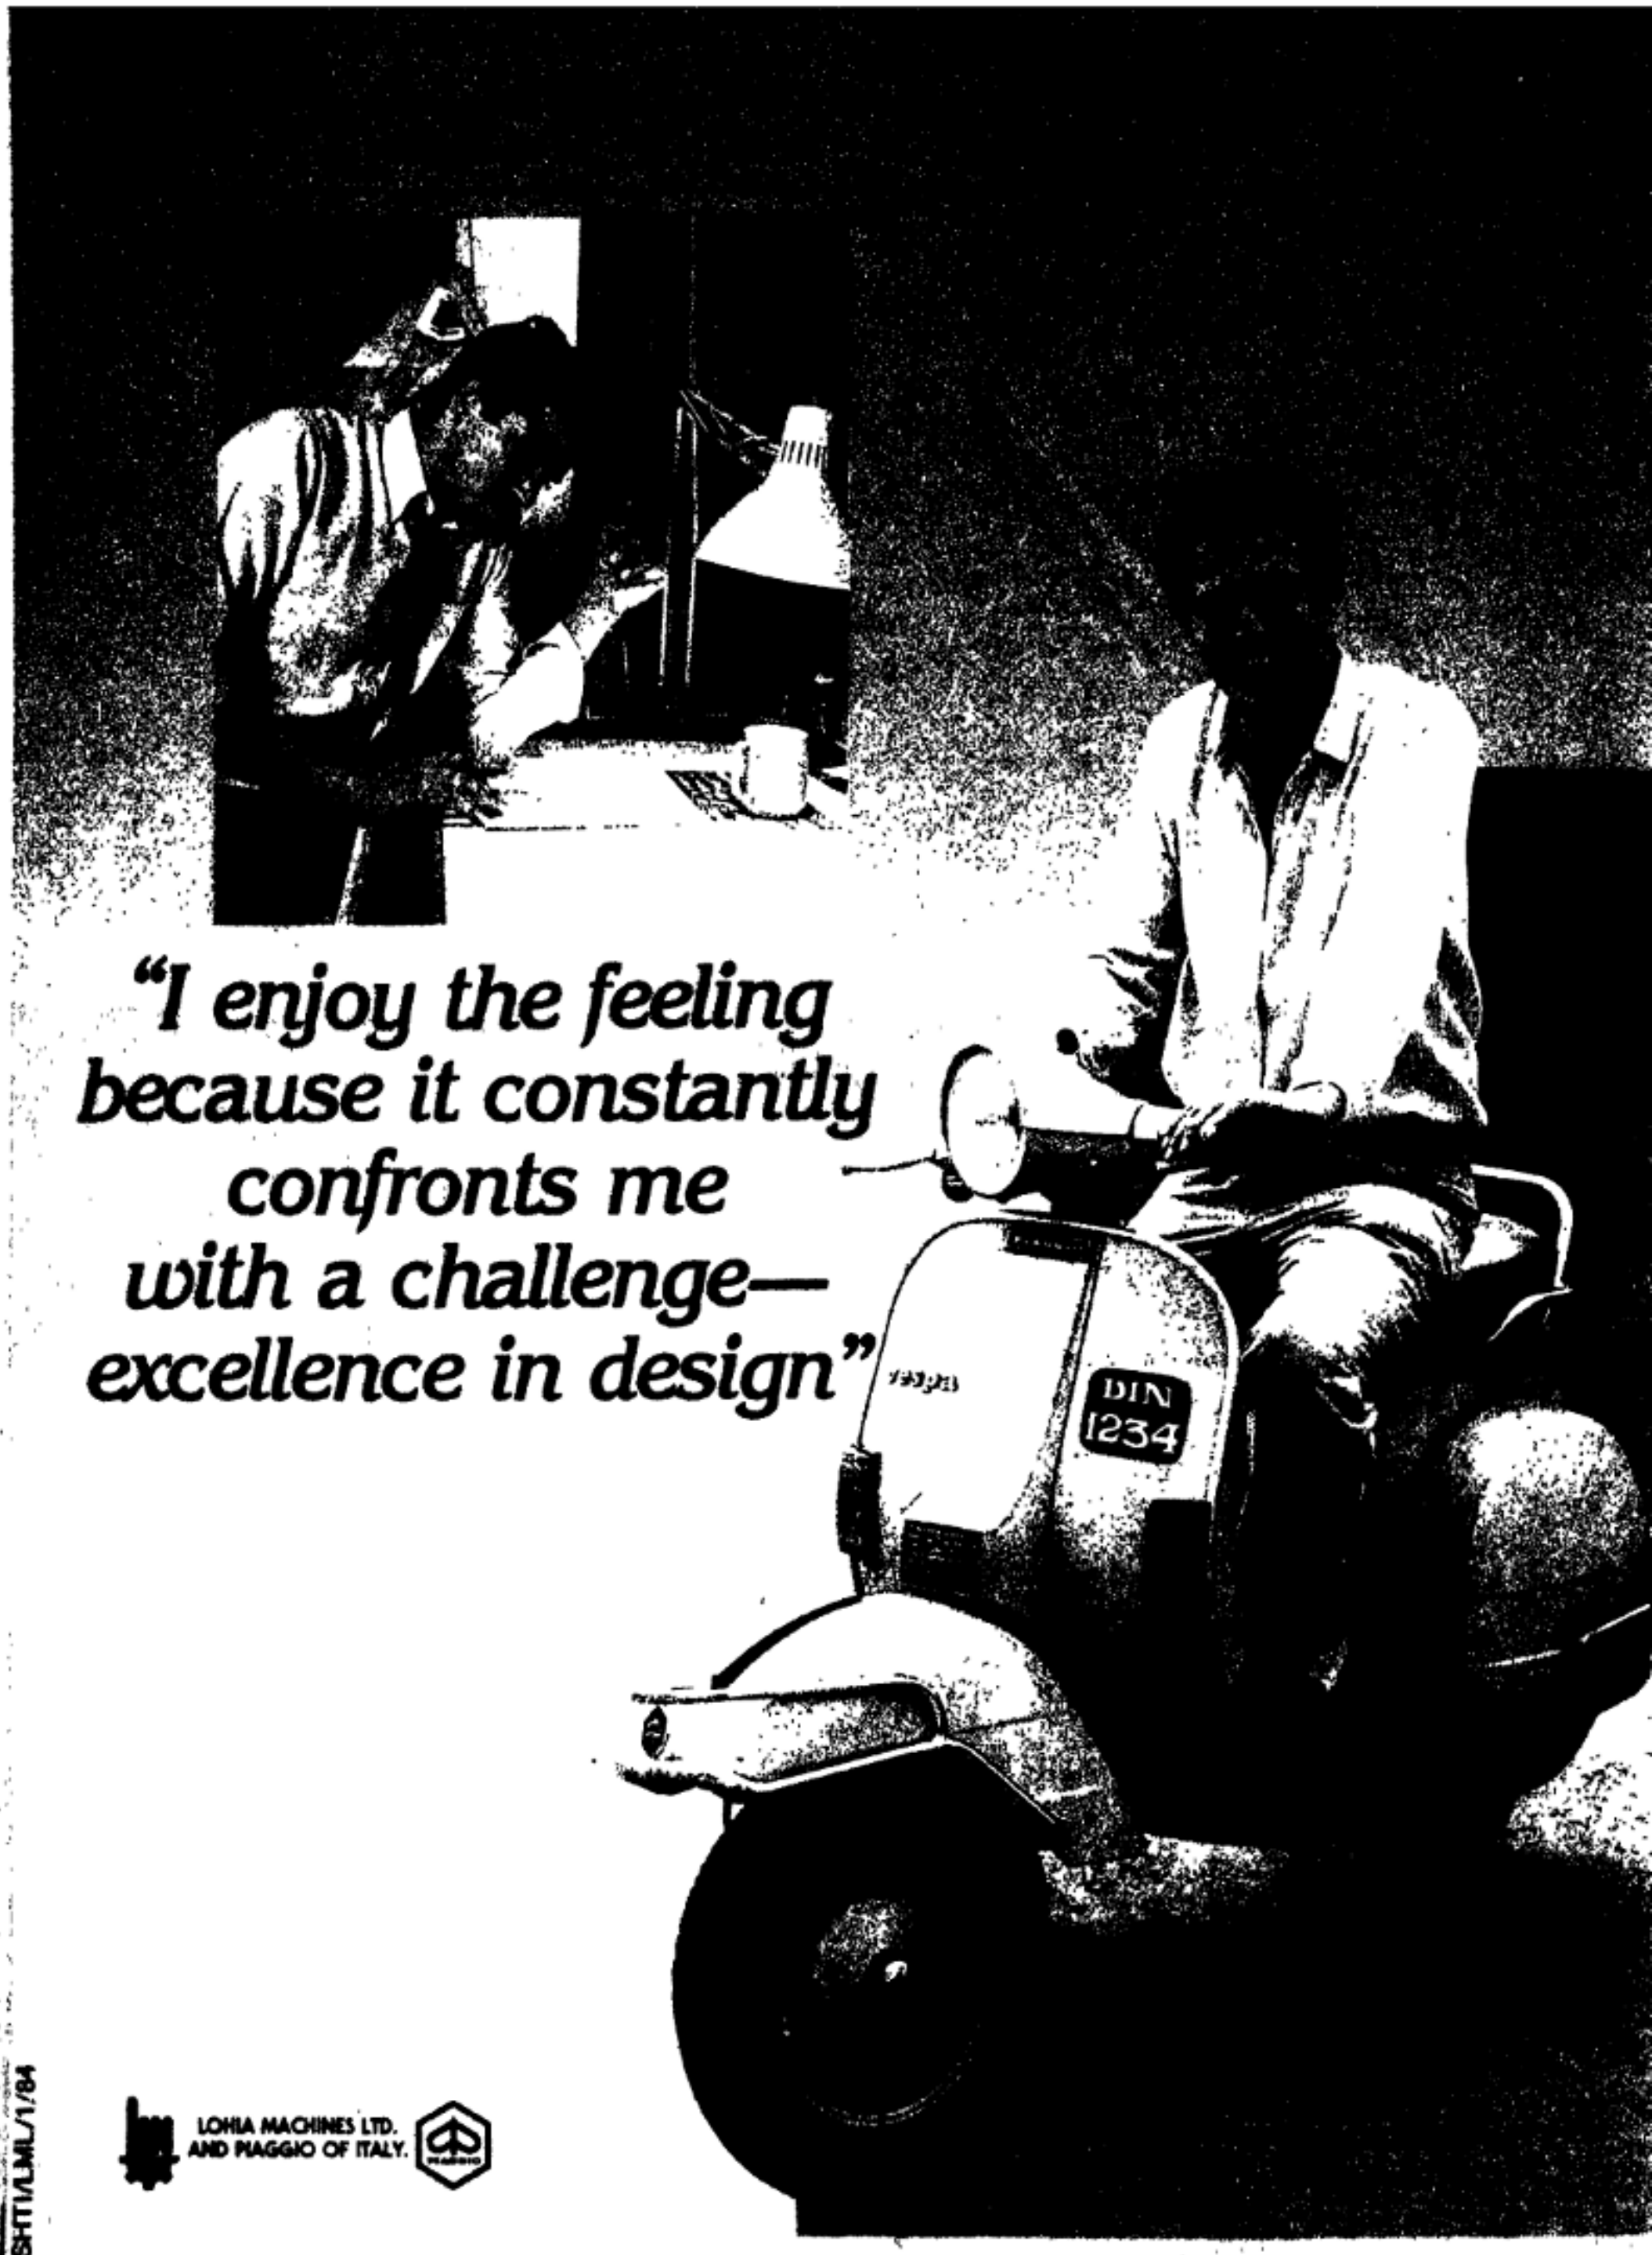
Dr Abdullah, during his tour of POK, addressed a number of public meetings organised by the Plebiscite Front, attended the party's annual convention at Mirpur city in POK and held a series of meetings with the territory's leaders on the political situation there as well as the Kashmir problem. This correspondent, on his recent visit to POK and Pakistan, heard the recorded version of the speech delivered by Dr Abdullah at Mirpur. In the speech he described Kashmir as "our mother" and urged all her sons to fight for their rights. This correspondent was also told about the occasion when Ashraf Shah alias Qureshi, one of the hijackers of the Indian Airlines plane, Ganga, presented a sword to Farooq Abdullah as a symbol of the armed struggle for Kashmir's "liberation from Indian occupation." During the convention, Dr Abdullah returned the sword to the Plebiscite Front leaders saying, "We believe in Gandhian methods only. Keep it (the sword). I am leaving it to you in trust." Maqbool Butt, the then president of the Plebiscite Front, also attended the convention.

There are, however, contrary claims about whether or not Dr Abdullah knew of the existence of the JKLF then and whether he took and administered the oath to remain dedicated to the movement" launched by the militant organisation. "He made many promises but I was even then convinced that this man cannot be trusted," said Mir Abdul Qayyum, a Karachi-based businessman from Jammu and the co-founder of the JKLF. Was Dr Abdullah a member of your organisation? When this correspondent posed this question to Amanullah Khan, chairman of the Birmingham-based JKLF during a telephonic conversation, he said with a rebuff, "Farooq Abdullah is not and has never been a member of the JKLF which was formed in 1977 whereas he has been in Kashmir probably since 1976. He is a hypocrite and cannot be trusted." The fact, however, remains that Farooq Abdullah remained close to the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front leaders during his trip to Pakistan and could have hardly been kept in the dark about the existence of the organisation.



To Liberation Front leaders and many others in Pakistan and POK, Dr Abdullah is "an opportunist and a hypocrite." In fact, Hashim Qureshi even dubbed him a "traitor" and an "enemy" of Kashmirs. While Dr Abdullah might have raised hopes in the hearts of many political activists of POK during his tour of the territory, he was a changed man after his return to India. He acquired Indian citizenship, and gave up the British one.

Most of the politicians of Kashmir including the present chief minister have been associated with the organisation which either challenged Kashmir's accession to India or raised doubts on the issue. If their past can be ignored, why cannot Farooq Abdullah's? What is difficult to understand is how the Indian government granted Dr Abdullah Indian citizenship if his anti national activities were known Perhaps, what can be termed as the final word on the allegations came from the JKLF, following his dismissal from the chief ministership of the state. The JKLF had at that time issued a statement saying that Dr Abdullah deserved what he got as he had been repeating over and over again that he was an Indian.



Yusuf Jameel, Srinagar

It's a hard day's night
I've been walkin' the town
Makin' a living
And I'm feelin' down
I've been on the move
'Coz I got money to make
But after it's all over
A man needs a break
So here's to the good times
It's gotta be said
I'm ready for a Royal
I'm lookin' for the Red

Yeah, I'm lookin' for the Red

WHEN YOU'RE LOOKIN'
FOR A LIFT

"I enjoy the feeling because it constantly confronts me with a challenge— excellence in design"

LOHIA MACHINES LTD.
AND PIAGGIO OF ITALY.

SRISHTI/ALML/1/84

hectic. Meeting new clients, supervising contractors and builders on site, browsing around the market for new building materials. But yet I keep aside a few hours every day for real work. Designing buildings.

And that brings me back to the Vespa XE. It incorporates excellence in design in every area.

It's a reminder. A constant challenge in design that keeps me on my toes.

the vespa XE
from Lohia Machines Ltd
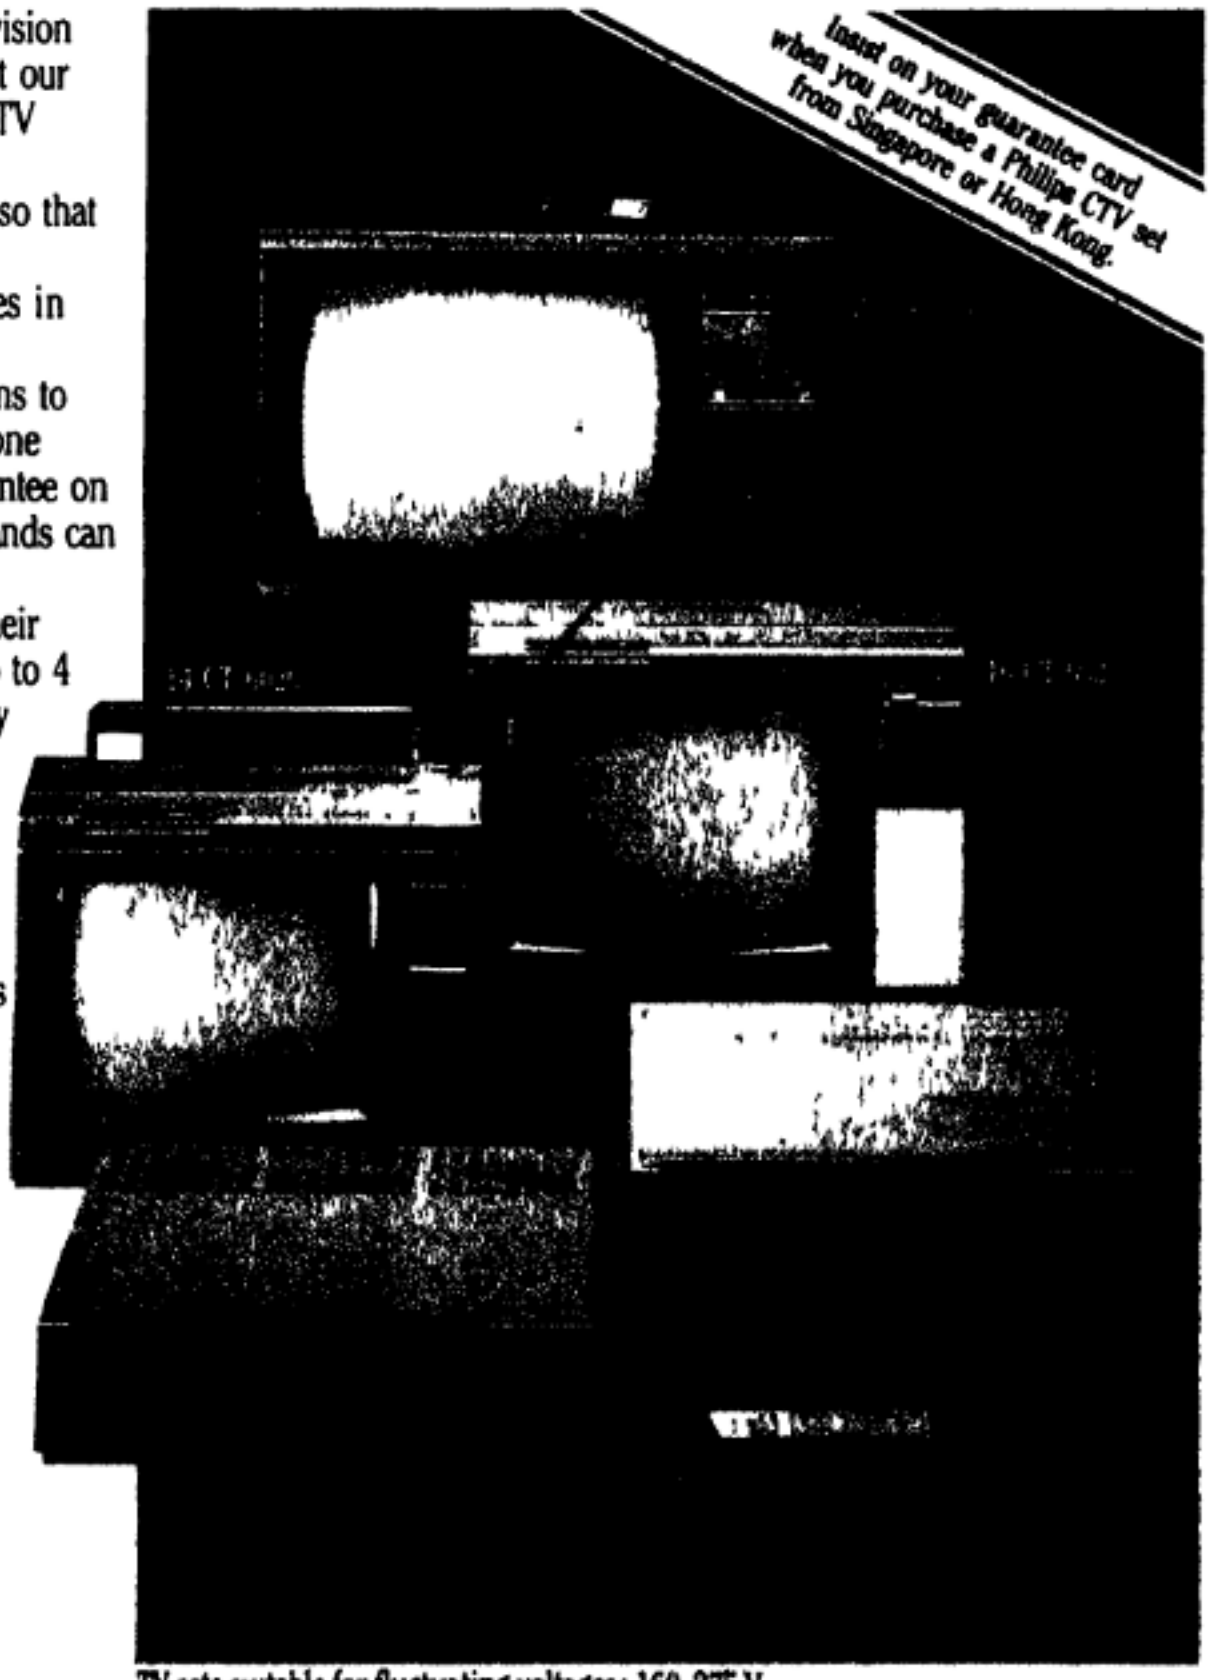
and
Piaggio of Italy

STOP PRESS: PHILIPS HAS PRODUCED ITS 100 MILLIONTH TV SET. IT'S ANOTHER GUARANTEE FOR PROBLEM-FREE VIEWING.

Philips have made a 100 million television sets, so naturally we know more about what our customers want and appreciate in a colour TV



For example, every Philips is FULLY TROPICALISED against heat and humidity, so that you can enjoy problem-free viewing.

What's more, all Philips service centres in India* are fully equipped with sophisticated instruments, with overseas-trained technicians to care for your Philips if you happen to buy one from Singapore or Hong Kong. Plus a guarantee on after sales service that none of the other brands can match!

Philips VCRs come in two models· Their features include high-speed video search, up to 4 hours recording, auto play-back, time display and pre-programming for one event 7 days in advance

For colour televisions, a range of models are available from 14", 16" or 20", with or without remote control. All the models have these common features. Philips famous natural colour from our equally famous Hi-Bri picture tube, Quickstart, and higher brightness level for more contrast, VCR adaptations on all channels, 4 watts sound output, Automatic Fine Tuning for sharp pictures, low power consumption.

Plus superior quality and service that comes from being the largest TV manufacturer in the world.

TV sets suitable for fluctuating voltages: 160-275 V.

* Philips service centres in India
39/43 Nesbit Road Mazgaon Bombay 400 010 Tel 8725528
2 Heysham Road, Calcutta 700 020 Tel 473621
3 Haddows Road Madras 600 006 Tel 812341/7
66 Janpath, New Delhi 110 001 Tel 321125

PHILIPS

Released for information only by
Philips Singapore Pte Ltd , Lorong 1, Toa Payoh, Singapore 1231 and Philips Hong Kong Limited, 27th-29th Floor, Hopewell Centre, Hong Kong.

PHILIPS

SUNDAY 16cm x 23.5

The forest where the dacoits often take refuge

Bihar's Other 'Sarkar'

It is the dacoits who rule West Champaran district

Early in January this year, 27-year-old Santosh, a shopowner in Narkatiaganj, West Champaran district, Bihar, was kidnapped by dacoits. Soon after the kidnapping the dacoits sent Santosh's father a ransom note demanding Rs 70,000 in cash. The note was stamped: "Bihar sarkar (government)." Santosh's is not an extraordinary case. Today in West Champaran district the gun rules supreme. And those who wield it do so with, what they claim, the authority of the Bihar sarkar. The dacoits—there are as many as six groups in the area—have their own areas of jurisdiction, their own laws and law-enforcing machinery.

The spurt of dacoity in this district began in 1980 when some musclemen of a Bettiah-based businessman began committing crimes in the area. Soon they started actively supporting politicians of the area and are even believed to have worked for the victory of former union minister, Kedar Pande, who contested the Bettiah Lok Sabha seat in 1980. After a spate of dacoities, the criminals found a patron in a toppolice official of the district. Senior police officers in Patna are of the opinion that it was this police official who counselled the criminals against committing dacoities. He told them to adopt, what he considered, more non-violent methods of earning money: kidnapping people for ransom. Since then, more than 200 persons have been kidnapped and released only after payment of the ransom demanded.

The police have been singularly ineffective in curbing the criminals or even in helping in the release of those kidnapped. The criminals, however, have been known to release those kidnapped on their own. This happened when Father Chakalackal SJ, a Jesuit priest from Ratan Purwa village was kidnapped and a Rs two-lakh ransom demanded. The priest was voluntarily released by the dacoits when the then Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi, and the Kerala chief minister, K.M. Karunanidhi, took special interest in the case and demanded the priest's release.

Similarly, Manojnath Sinha, the grandson of the Uttar Pradesh Governor, C.P.N. Sinha, was released by the criminals without payment of the ransom amount. Others, however, have not been so lucky. The grandson of the Congress(I) leader and former AICC(I) working president Kamlapati Tripathi who was kidnapped from the Bagaha area was released after Rs 20,000 was paid as ransom.

Scared of the dacoity menace, the politicians of the area had no other way out but to patronise them or "live peacefully without disturbing them." The local people are convinced that there exists a dacoit-police-politician nexus since in the past three years, in spite of the repeated complaints by politicians to those in authority, the police have done precious little: only two dacoits have been killed in encounters with the police.

The police-criminal connection can be ascertained from the fact that hardly a dacoit has been arrested so far. Further, the police officers who have tried to take action against the dacoits have been transferred. Such was the case with Bhagat Prasad, a superintendent of police posted in the district. Mr Prasad was transferred within months of his posting, while his predecessor, despite the censure of the district court for allowing the dacoits to rule the district, was allowed to remain in his post for three years.

Photographs: K.M. Kishan

The criminals have now begun using more sophisticated methods of extorting money. For the past one year, they have been imposing what has come to be known popularly as "Section 144" on some farms of the area. The imposition of the "section" means that the owner of the farm is prevented from working in this field unless he pays the tax demanded by the "Bihar sarkar." Often the labourers are warned not to work by the dacoits. With the police failing to give any sort of protection to the landowners, there are around 50 such farms, varying in size from 20 to 70 acres in the district, which have been abandoned. If the trend continues, the rich farmers of the area may sell their land and move out of the area.

Police picket at Ratan Purwa village where Fr Chalackal was kidnapped in June 1984

Sattan Ahir was perhaps the first major dacoit in Champaran. He was one of the gang members of Sitaram Rajgaria, whose name figures in cases varying from uranium smuggling to political murder. Rajgaria was widely believed to be the financier of Kedar Pande. In fact, Sattan Ahir and another gang member, Lakhan Ahir campaigned for Mr Pande during the 1980 Lok Sabha elections.

In 1982, a senior police official 'forced' Sattan Ahir to surrender while Lakhan Ahir formed his own gang. In the gang were Vyas Dubey, Nema Ahir, Ramjatan Nonia and Rudal Ahir. Soon, differences arose

Police display the corpse of Rudal Ahir, allegedly killed in an encounter with the police and the group broke up. Each one of the criminals then formed his own marauding band. They agreed on their areas of operation.

Dacoit Laxan Ahir killed in a police encounter in Bettiah

Vyas Dubey, who was believed to be responsible for more than 50 kidnappings and imposing "Section 144" on more than 20 landowners, was killed by Nema Ahir on New Year's day this year. Nema Ahir dragged Dubey's body to his village in Bagaha, displayed it to the villagers and disposed it of. Rudal Ahir, another gang leader, was killed by one of his own men, Wakil Mian, last year. Bâsudev Yadav met his end in a police encounter. The gangs which are active now are led by Dhrub Yadav, Dhrub Mallah, Nema Ahir, Ramjatan Nonia and Bhaggar Ahir.

Besides the patronage from the police and the politicians, there are other factors which are responsible for organised dacoity in this district. There are more than 50 villages under the six most affected police stations—Bagaha, Ram Nagar, Narkatiaganj, Lauria, Dumri and Gaunaha—where roads are nearly non-existant and thus, the areas inaccessible to the police. Further, the areas are close to the 100-km stretch of deep forests where the dacoits often hide from the police.

There are also instances of police harassing the families of those kidnapped. A member of a victim's family told SUNDAY, that on 1 January 1985 Nema Ahir snatched a tractor belonging to Uday Bhan Singh to give chase to Vyas Dubey. The tractor was later released by Nema. The police have been threatening Uday Bhan Singh with dire consequences for his "connections with the dacoits."

With the dacoits enjoying protection, people of the area are convinced that nothing will be done to put an end to their activities. Till the time of going to press, only one of the six MLAs of the area. Arjun Vikram Shah of Ram Nagar, met the chief minister to apprise him of the situation and demanded action. It is doubtful if the true Bihar Sarkar will take action.

Yubaraj Ghimire, Bettiah

Inside Don forest: breeding ground of dacoits

PHOTOFEATURE

In Quest of Salvation

On Makar Sankranti day (14 January this year), more than four lakh pilgrims took their once-in-a-lifetime holy dip in the icy-cold waters of Ganga Sagar—where "Mother Ganga" meets the Bay of Bengal—to cleanse themselves of their sins. Photographer Sunil Dutt was at Ganga Sagar to capture man's quest for eternal salvation on earth

(Clockwise from bottom left) A sadhu lies on a bed of thorns while passers-by pay scant attention to him; women bow their heads in prayer; pilgrims performing a ritual at Ganga Sagar; and the temple of Kapil Muni at Sagar Island

BOOK EXTRACT

The Nation's Grandchildren

There have been many political families—the Roosevelts.the Kennedys, the Churchills—but none have wielded power so consistently over their countries as the Nehru-Gandhi family. Tariq Ali in his latest book, The Nehrus and the Gandhis: An Indian Dynasty (published by Pan Books in association with Chatto and Windus and distributed in India by Rupa and Co, 15 Bankim Chatterjee St, Calcutta 700 012, price £2.50) from which this extract is taken, traces the rise of Rajiv and Sanjay Gandhi and narrates the events that moulded them

A family portrait taken in the Kremlin : Left to right Sonia, Rajiv, Rahul, Indira Gandhi, Sanjay, Priyanka and Menaka

Rajiv Gandhi was born in Allahabad in 1944. His brother Sanjay in Delhi in 1946. Their mother's childhood had been, in her own words, 'an abnormal one, full of loneliness and insecurity.' This had made her determined to ensure that her children were never short of love, companionship and children their own age. Rajiv was given an enormous amount of attention during his first three years. They were still in Anand Bhavan. Feroze and Indira were on their own since Jawaharlal was in prison. Rajiv was a happy child, full of fun and laughter. In 1946 he suffered two concurrent blows: they had to leave Allahabad and move to Lucknow and Sanjay was born. His mother wrote: 'I was far from well and I found his tantrums very irritating. Scolding only made it worse. So I tried reasoning. I told him that much as I loved him, his shouting disturbed me.' The following conversation then took place between the three-year-old and his mother.

Rajiv: What can I do? I don't want to cry, it just comes.

Indira: There is a nice fountain in the garden. When you want to cry or shout, go to the fountain and do it there.

Following on this experiment in child psychology, Indira explained that after this episode, 'at the first sign of tears, I would whisper "fountain" and away he went. In the garden there was much to distract his attention and he soon forgot his troubles.' Feroze for his part was a loving and playful parent, not in the least bit authoritarian. He was not, by temperament, a patriarch. Nor was he a hypocrite. He did not therefore, play the part of a severe father. He was constantly making wooden toys for the children and joining in their games. It was hardly a secret that he had been unhappy when Indira took the boys to live with their grandfather in the palatial prime minister's residence in Delhi. What about the boys? Sanjay was still very little, but Rajiv was over four at the time. Whether or not he ever expressed any disquiet at the time, the second move from what had become home must have been an unsettling experience.

Rajiv Gandhi watches awestruck a Canberra jet flanked by his grandfather and mother, November 1953, Palam

One of Rajiv's earliest memories of unpleasantness must have been the communal riots which shook Delhi in 1947, when Sikh and Hindu refugees from Pakistan massacred innocent Muslims in Delhi. Indira and the children had, at the time, been in Mussoorie, a hill resort. Feroze had cabled to say that under no circumstances should they return to Delhi. Indira was puzzled and 'Like all young wives, I began to get suspicious and I thought this was one reason why I should come immediately.' On the telephone Feroze described the horrors that had been taking place every day and indicated that this was not the place for women and children. Indira's reaction was the exact opposite. She packed their suitcases and caught the next train back to Delhi. The two boys must have sensed the tension and then, as they neared Delhi, seen with their young eyes an awful scene. At a Delhi suburb, Shahdara, communal mobs were preparing to lynch a Muslim on the platform. Indira was outraged. Her Nehru temper became uncontrollable. Leaving her petrified sons in the train, she jumped out of the compartment and silenced the crowd by an effective display of oratory. The victim was saved and the train moved on. She later told an interviewer that she would have done a great deal more than just shout at them had it not been for the fact 'that I myself was in the process of dressing.' What effect did this incident have on Rajiv and Sanjay? Children are extraordinarily perceptive at this age and even though they may have repressed their feelings, the image must have stayed in Rajiv's head for some time. He would also have heard his mother describing it to other adults on numerous occasions.

In Teen Murti House, however, the outside world seemed very far away. The Prime Minister's house was enclosed on all sides, with gigantic lawns, huge rooms and lots of people coming and going. Jawaharlal loved animals and the house had acquired a little zoo, which consisted of animals presented to the Prime Minister on his travels throughout India. There were dogs (pedigrees and strays), parrots, birds, squirrels, rabbits and more exciting additions, which provided endless diversions for grandfather and grandchildren. In Assam, Nehru was presented with a red Himalayan panda. It was a cub. They had not seen one before and had to consult a book on Indian animals in an Assam library to recognise the tiny ball of fur. Rajiv named it Bhimsa and it occupied a corner in the boy's bathroom. Their mother was indulgent, but she complained that, 'I could not house-train him and he always climbed on to the towel-rack to do his business, besides racing all over the house.' He was ultimately banished to the garden, and in the summer, when Delhi became too hot, he went to the coolness of Nainital. The Assamese provided Bhimsa with a mate, Poma (lotus in Sikkimese). The two pandas immediately took to each other. It was love at first sight and they produced cubs, an unusual occurrence for captive pandas. Rajiv and Sanjay adored them. So did their grandfather. There was a small-scale rivalry for their affections. Jawaharlal spent time with them morning and evening and Indira wrote that 'they miss him a lot when he is out of station.' When Nehru was unwell, his grandsons would take Bhimsa to his bedroom to see him, an event which always cheered him considerably.

The year before Rajiv and Sanjay were packed off to boarding school, the zoo at Teen Murti was enlarged. Three tiger cubs entered the house. Rajiv and Sanjay took to them at once. Before long they were frolicking with the tigers quite fearlessly. Neither of the boys was scared of them. They treated them as ordinary pets. Other children and adults were petrified of the cubs. They would not go near them, much to the amusement of Rajiv and Sanjay, who used these occasions to show off without inhibition. As the tigers began to grow, two were presented to the zoo at Lucknow. The third had caught the fancy of a visiting world leader, Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia. Nehru gave it to him as a present and it accompanied the Marshal back to Belgrade.

Life for the two boys was full of diversions, but the atmosphere was very different to the Anand Bhavan days in Allahabad. Jawaharlal and Indira had grown up at a time when India was engaged in struggles. The country was occupied by a foreign power. Indira's childhood was coloured by her never-ending visits to prison to see her father and grandfather, then her mother and she had finally spent some time inside herself.

This had affected the intellectual and political formation of father and daughter. During her youth and in her student days, Indira had read Beatrice Webb, Harold Laski, Aneurin Bevan, Bernard Shaw and numerous autobiographies. Later she read Sartre, Camus and De Beauvoir in the original French. Her stay in Europe had made her an addict of Western classical music, Bach and Beethoven in particular, as well as the cinema. Her favourite European city was Florence. In later life her reading had become a little less highbrow. One of the favourites during her last years had been Barbara Cartland, symbolic perhaps of a more general decline in the country as a whole.

Rajiv and Sanjay, by contrast, were brought up in the shadow of power politics. Nehru was a popular political leader, but his period in office was hardly a golden age. The deterioration in political standards had begun during his lifetime. Politics, in the India of the 1950s, as far as Rajiv and Sanjay were concerned, meant endless photographs with their mother and grandfather, accompanying the latter on odd state visits, being polite to visitors and dignitaries from abroad and observing the seamier side of politics when Congress bosses visited Teen Murti House to pay their respects. In short, the brothers Gandhi had become the nation's grandchildren. Whatever else this might have meant, it certainly did not encourage a critical view of India or the world. The ceremonies and rituals associated with power must have had some impact on two impressionable young boys. Their lives and their perceptions of reality might well have been very different if they had lived with their father in his modest MPs bungalow. Feroze Gandhi's lifestyle was markedly dissimilar in virtually every way to the domestic patterns of the Prime Minister's house.

Indira Gandhi listening to father at the 1964 Bhubaneswar AICC session

Feroze was, in an environment of his own choosing, a totally relaxed individual. He hated protocol, state banquets, formality in any shape or form. He was at his best during family picnics, where he could laugh, joke and frolic to his heart's content. Equally important was his refusal to participate in cover-ups of any sort in order to maintain the unity of the Congress hierarchy. He was an iconoclast and extremely critical of the direction taken by the Congress governments under his father-in-law's stewardship. The children, under his care, would not have been so bedazzled by their proximity to power.

As Indira became more and more immersed in every-day politics a decision had to be taken about the boys. Rajiv was twelve, Sanjay was nine. Their education had become a major concern for Indira, Feroze and Jawaharlal. It was decided to send them to the country's leading public school in Dehra Dun, in the Himalayan foothills, where the air was fresh and where, it was hoped, they would find friends from a similar background and a good education. Dehra Dun was the site of India's first military academy and its most-sought-after Doon School, which had been established by an anglophile Indian in 1935.

Education in British India had been an upper-class affair, with certain institutions provided for the middle and lower-middle classes. The oldest schools had been set up to educate the sons of the royal houses, the heirs to the large estates of the gentry in the countryside, and others who were owners of property and inheritors of wealth. The Chief's College in Lahore was, as its name suggested, designed to educate the chiefs of tomorrow Most Indians were kept outside its boundaries, not in order to encourage rapid polarisations, but to ensure that it was the chiefs who became the leaders of the Indians and acted on their behalf vis-a-vis the British. Other schools were, of course, permitted for lesser mortals. The clerks and white-collar workers so vital to the Empire had to be produced from somewhere. As time had passed it was realised that the Chief's College syndrome was no longer sufficient. Polo, cricket and buggery might be sufficient to run a landed estate or a tiny despotism, but something else was needed to produce people who would manage industry and run the country after independence.

During the 1920s and 1930s, a number of schools were established in hill-stations throughout India. These were modelled on English public schools; they placed a great deal of emphasis on sports, but also provided a core curriculum, provided and taught by a set of efficient and relatively enlightened school teachers. There were St Paul's and St Joseph's in Darjeeling; Oak Grove in Mussoorie; Sherwood College in Nainital; Burn Hall in Abbotabad; Lawrence College in Ghora Gali; Bishops Cotton in Simla; St Edmund's in Shillong, and Doon School in Dehra Dun, to name but a few. A network of convents were provided to offer the same facilities to girls, but there were also the women's equivalents of Chief's Colleges, though very few in number. The prefix St was usually affixed to those schools which were run by Jesuits or Catholic brothers. These tended to be extremely strict, but maintained fairly rigorous educational standards. The Catholic brothers, descendants of the Inquisition, were great believers in torture. Beautifully oiled canes were kept on display and 'benders' were regularly administered to recalcitrant pupils. There were also numerous sexual incidents involving the Catholic brothers. 'Six benders now in front of the class or two in my room after school' usually meant that 'the two' would be applied to bare buttocks and in more than one case the petrified boy found that the object he was threatened with was not a well-oiled cane.

Rajiv Gandhi listening to mother at the 1983 Calcutta AICC session

Sujit Ghosh

Doon School was established in the autumn of 1935 on a 70-acre estate in Dehra Dun. Its declared aim was to develop a rounded-out personality. The initial advertisement for the headmaster's job stated that: 'Though slavish imitation is to be avoided, the proposed school will attempt to develop in an atmosphere of Indian culture and social environment many of the best features of English public schools'. In fact slavish imitation was not avoided. Nor could it be. The English public schools had become essential suppliers of army officers and civil servants to service the Empire. In India they were needed to continue the tradition, but with indigenous recruits. It was in some ways symbolic that the military academy and the school were both in Dehra Dun, the Indian Army and the Civil Service would require these and similar institutions throughout the country.

Rajiv and Sanjay arrived at the school in 1955. Everyone knew who they were, but nobody cared. That was one of the best things as far as the Gandhis were concerned. The school was full of young men from privileged families and the fact that Nehru's grandsons had joined this select band was not a big surprise. The friends that Sanjay, in particular, was to make here were to remain his 'buddies' for the rest of his life and their school nick-names 'Dumpy' and 'Roly-Poly' (applied to Akbar Ahmed and Kamal Nath respectively) were to be featured in the Indian press.

The principal of the school in 1955 was a legendary character called J.A.K. Martyn. He had taught at Harrow for ten years from 1924-34 and had then gone to India with Arthur Foot from Eton and helped start the Doon School. He had become the headmaster in 1948 and had stayed at his desk for another 18 years. He had been greatly influenced by the educational theories of Kurt Hahn and had incorporated many of his reforms. He was generally regarded as unassuming and friendly and integrated easily into post-independence Indian society. He loved the mountains, and the school's most arduous climbs were planned by him with great care and an incredible attention to every detail. He introduced countless young Indians to the joys of mountaineering. According to their contemporaries, Rajiv and Sanjay both enjoyed the school, though the younger brother was even then considered far more of an extrovert. Neither he nor Rajiv, however, were ever known to have boasted, or attempted to utilize their grandfather's standing in the country. Their contemporaries included the actor Roshan Seth, who would one day play Nehru in Richard Attenborough's cinema version of Gandhi, and Vivan Sunderam, who would become a Marxist and a painter of the Baroda School, the most exciting and innovative group of artists in India. Apart from them the overwhelming majority of Doscos (the name taken by the school's alumni) were civil servants, journalists, business executives and industrialists. There were also a sprinkling of men who had become senior army officers. Imprint magazine in Bombay published an article on the school in which the author was told by an old Doscovian, nicknamed 'Taggy' (short for Tagore) of an incident during the Indo-Pakistan war in Bengal: 'During the 1971 war on the Pakistan border, a famous commander of an Indian regiment took his foghorn and shouted over to the other side, "Any Doon students out there?" When the answer came back in the negative he said, "OK, then fire!"' There is something grotesque about this story, but it is not apocryphal. There were other incidents of a similar sort which were reported at the time. Many senior Indian and Pakistani officers had been, if not to the same school, to the same military academy in Dehra Dun and after the surrender many old stories were exchanged over glasses filled with an amber liquid.

Nehru with Sanjay (left) and Rajiv

It should not be forgotten that Dehra Dun did not only accommodate a military academy and Doon school. It also had a prison. The two boys at Doon School, had a grandfather, who had spent many years in Dehra Dun prison. Did they ever, during their long stay at the school, take an afternoon off and visit the prison? If they did it must have been a secret, for no one has written about or referred to it. All the indications are that they did not, which is hardly surprising. The colonial period may have been eight or nine years away, but it already seemed distant. The new rulers were firmly embedded in the old soil and prisons were no longer symbols of respectability in the Congress milieu.

In 1960 Feroze had died. Both boys were extremely upset. Rajiv was the more reserved emotionally, but even he had not been able to hide the pain. Sanjay had been visibly upset. Their mother wrote to an old family friend, Mohammed Yunus. "I don't know what to write. I am feeling so utterly desolate and miserable. You know more than anyone else how much Feroze and I disagreed and quarrelled over the years and yet instead of separating or slackening the bond of friendship, we were closer than ever before. We had a wonderful holiday together, nearly a month in a houseboat in Srinagar, and we made so many plans for the future. The boys are of an age when they need a father more than a mother. I feel lost and empty and dead and yet life must go on."

Indira knew how much Feroze and his sons had been attached to each other. Any plans being made by their parents to live together, and it is obvious that this is what was being discussed, would have delighted both Rajiv and Sanjay. The death was a tragedy in more than just a personal sense. It is very unlikely that Feroze Gandhi would have encouraged any dynastic pretensions on the part of either son. Nor would there have been an excuse for Sanjay to become a pillar of support for his mother. Everything that is known about Feroze indicates that he would have found all talk related to the divine rights of the Nehru clan somewhat repulsive and would have been sarcastic, even brutal, at the expense of the sycophant who had suggested such a course. He had himself fastidiously avoided profiting from the fact Nehru was his father-in-law. The sycophantic faction in the Lok Sabha had always avoided Feroze, whose biting humour was well-known. What could even have been in doubt was Indira's own position after the death of Shastri. We cannot take speculation too far, but there is widespread agreement that if Feroze Gandhi had not died in 1960, India's political history—not in its essentials, but in relation to certain particular aspects—might have been very different.

A proud mother and her sons

After the death of their father, Indira confronted a dilemma. The Doon School days would soon be over. What should be done next? Neither Rajiv nor Sanjay displayed any interest in an academic career. Nor had they given too much thought to their futures. Indira discussed the problem with Jawaharlal. He was anxious that at least one of them follow in his footsteps at Cambridge. This was a period when the Indian government was discouraging Indian students from wasting precious foreign exchange by studying abroad. The decision to send Rajiv to Cambridge and Sanjay to study automobile engineering (his idea) was criticised by opposition politicians and the press. If restrictions were to be imposed on Indians wishing to complete their studies in Britain or the United States, then, it was argued, the nation's grandchildren should set an example. Indira's response was characteristically brusque: 'I' couldn't care less what people say. I thought it was necessary for my boys to go to England.' And England is where her boys went. They had not shown the slightest interest in politics till that time. When a journalist later commented on this fact, Indira replied: 'I tried my best to keep them away from it.' That remark was made in 1973.

At Trinity College, Rajiv enjoyed himself. He was a quiet man, extremely modest and generally liked. Occasionally the odd English student would ask him: 'By the way are you related to the Gandhi. Are you his son or something?' Rajiv would smile and explain that all he shared with Gandhi was a name. He never went on to say that he was, however, a Nehru, and that his grandfather was Prime Minister of India. He was still at Cambridge in the summer of 1964, when Jawaharlal died. Friends recall him being extremely quiet and upset for a few days, but he did not discuss the event with too many people.

Cambridge had not managed to interest Rajiv in politics or any academic pursuits. He left without a degree. His most important discovery in this old English university town had been a young Italian woman, Sonia, with whom he fell in love in 1965. He returned to India soon afterwards and declared that he was going to learn flying and become a pilot. Indira was not particularly pleased, but she had no serious alternative at the time. Though she must have cursed inwardly at this hereditary passion for flying that had afflicted the Nehru men. As far as Sonia was concerned, Indira was initially less than enthusiastic and persuaded Rajiv to postpone the marriage for a while. She made no secret of the fact that she would have preferred her son to marry an Indian. Shades of old Motilal had coloured his grand-daughter's vision, but when she realised that Rajiv and Sonia were serious, she gave her consent. They were married in 1968, in Delhi, and Sonia was welcomed warmly into the Nehru-Gandhi family circle. Whereas Motilal had threatened Jawaharlal that if he had wed a foreigner the children would suffer since they would be deprived of grandparental affection, there was nothing remotely similar in Indira's response to her first grandchild, Rahul. The new addition became an instant favourite. Sonia and Indira became extremely fond of each other. It was a relationship that time would deepen still further. Rajiv got a job as a pilot with the state-owned domestic airline (Indian Airlines) and was both satisfied and happy. His voice was often heard in internal flights, but it was always. 'This is your Captain Rajiv...' The surname was never used. Life in Delhi for the new couple fell into an easy groove of parties (both diplomatic and business) and an aimless upper middle-class existence. Rajiv met old friends from Doon School and Cambridge, but that was all. He never cultivated the politicians or the gangster-businessmen who were often trailing behind them.

Meanwhile, Sanjay's life was taking a slightly different course, though equally removed from any involvement with day-to-day politics. Sanjay had not been able to stay at Doon School. It was not that he had been expelled, but his mother had been told that he would do better elsewhere. He had returned from Doon to Delhi and found a place in a day-school in the capital: St. Columba's. When asked what interested him the most he used to make no secret of his passion for cars. He declined the offer to go to a university in either Britain or the United States.

Instead he decided to work as an apprentice with Rolls-Royce in England for a period of three years. Once again he left without finishing his course. His name meant 'victory', but he had allowed himself to be defeated first by Doon School and then by Rolls-Royce. He returned home with an incomplete knowledge about the mechanics of motor-cars. His grandfather was dead, but so was Lal Bahadur Shastri. Indira was Prime Minister of India. Sanjay had never cared too much for his grandfather. He would later admit to a journalist that Jawaharlal had not influenced his thought in any way whatsoever On his return to India, Sanjay could have obtained a job with the already existing car industry. It is unlikely that he would have been refused a place. Instead he began to agitate for a small manufacturing industry of his own. He said he wanted to make a small car for India, more compact and neat than the somewhat unwieldy Ambassadors. Foreign cars are not allowed into the country becuase of tariff barriers, designed to encourage local industry. Sanajay wanted to design and build his 'Maruti' (Son of the wind-god).

His request proved an embarrassment to virtually everyone. Prior to his return from Rolls-Royce in Crewe, a number of teams of experts had been nominated by the government to study the feasibility of a more economic and smaller car. There had been talk of a state-owned industry in collaboration with a leading European firm, but the matter had not been taken any further because of the undisguised hostility of the private sector's powerful lobby of motor manufacturers, which resented any thought of competition. There was a radical opposition to the project from economists who were opposed to allocating badly-needed resources to producing cars, when there was a desperate need in the countryside for bicycles and new buses for public transport. The issue had been shelved.

The Maruti scandal continued to haunt Indira for a long time, but nothing illegal had been done. It was a straightforward case of nepotism. In Pakistan during the mid-1960s, the then military dictator's son had utilised his father's position to set up a flourishing industry with the help of local businessmen. When questioned about the affair by foreign journalists, Field-Marshal Ayub had replied: 'I never knew that my son [he had previously been an army officer—author] had such a talent for business.' A more recent case of the same type has involved the British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and her son, Mark, who accompanied her on a state visit to the de facto British protectorate of Oman, during which visit contracts were signed by the Omani regime and the private company by whom Mark was employed. The resultant furore in the British press was short-lived; a number of MPs alleged many details remained covered. In other words the Sanjay phenomenon was by no means unique or original. Numerous other cases could be cited from virtually every other capitalist democracy.

Two further problems soon arose. The first was that the Maruti never materialised. Sanjay was good at driving cars and fixing his own, but his performance as an industrialist had merely created a set of problems for his mother. A large amount of money had been expended to build Sanjay's cheap, low-petrol-consumption

Nehru

Mrs Indira Gandhi

Then something not so amazing happened. Sanjay refused to be dissuaded from his beloved Maruti project and all the barriers were suddenly lifted, an indication that when bureaucrats and industrialists wanted to move quickly they could do so regardless of any red-tape. Sanjay obtained government approval, which meant that a project being discussed by the state was immediately transferred to the private sector. He then raised the necessary capital, bought land near Delhi (a difficult operation at the best of times) and set up the Maruti factory. Indira had obviously not asked that special favours be accorded to her son, but then this was not considered necessary. She did not oppose the Maruti plan either and that was sufficient for the sycophants. When the oppsition attacked the Maruti affair as India's equivalent of Watergate, Indira was livid. She claimed that the opposition wanted to penalise Sanjay just because he was her son. 'What must I do,' she retorted, 'if my son does not happen to be a professor type?' Her opponents naturally remained unconvinced. They replied that Sanjay could do what he liked, but this was a case of the Prime Minister's position indirectly used to give an inexperienced youth privileges, which would have been denied to the overwhelming bulk of his peers in India.

automobile. People began to ask what had been done with the money. No replies were forthcoming. Sanjay had been defeated for the third time in his young life. To Doon School and Rolls-Royce could now be added the fiasco of Maruti. The second problem developed when Sanjay decided to abandon the small car and move into big politics. The catalyst was the famous judgment of the Allahabad High Court in 1975, which declared Mrs Gandhi's election from Rae Bareilly null and void and gave her a limited period of time to step down as the country's prime minister.

In the autumn of 1974 Sanjay had married a young Sikh woman, Maneka Anand. Her family had a long record of service to the raj in the Western part of the Punjab (which is now Pakistan). They had fled during the partition of the subcontinent and sought refuge in Delhi. Maneka's father was a retired army officer. Her mother had graduated in psychology and then did a post-graduate course at San Diego in the United States. When she was six, her father, Colonel Anand, had been posted to Britain for a special training course in signals. The family had accompanied him and they had settled in a tiny English village Watchfield, near Swindon.

and not far from Cheltenham. For two years young Maneka studied at a NAAFI school, before returning to India.

During a long interview with Dhiren Bhagat in the Illustrated Weekly of India, she confessed that she had greatly enjoyed writing at school, especially children's poems, which 'I must have stopped as soon as I realised that they were bad'. This was not wholly true. She started writing poetry again after her marriage, though she only showed the poems to Sanjay. Her writing also included regular letters to her mother from school. One of these, written when she was fifteen, gives us an idea of her strong sense of loyalty: 'I hope Uncle Minna dies a gory death, I have run through all my schemes of kidnapping his children, poisoning his wife's food, etc., and now I give up.' The aforesaid Uncle Minna had been giving Mrs Anand a tough time!

Her reading, she confessed, consisted of 'studies on the mind'. This had startled her interviewer, who came back with: 'You mean things like Gilbert Ryle's Concept of the Mind?' Her reply was a quick denial: 'No, no, no. I'm talking about ... training schedules. Memorex systems. How the mind can be sort of expanded. Do anything you want... At the moment I'm reading a book called The Possibility of Impossibility... [it's about] how they train psychics for warfare, and how they make them work in hospitals.'

Sanjay Gandhi

When Maneka married Sanjay, she was not interested in politics. Her parents had not been too strongly in favour of the match. They thought that he was too old and a libertine. During the courtship, Mrs Anand used to insist that the eighteen-year-old Maneka was back home by 9.30 p.m. every evening. The couple had decided on a civil marriage, which was legalised in the house of a Muslim friend of the Nehru family, the ubiquitous Yunus:

> Around this time an exciting event took place in my house—the marriage of Sanjay Gandhi with Maneka Anand, on 29 September 1975... Mrs Indira Gandhi, as well as the bridegroom himself, wanted austerity and neither any fuss nor advance publicity. Since the girl's people were known to me, they expressed a desire to use my place for the purpose. This fact was kept a well-guarded secret. The civil marriage and the signing of the documents were over in a few minutes. I was a witness along with the two mothers-in-law.

Maneka's arrival at 1 Safdarjung Road during the emergency further alienated Rajiv and Sonia. They found her enthusiasms irksome and her naivete painful. She later claimed that the emergency had not really bothered her in any way at all: 'You see, I was a new bride. All the time during the emergency the only thing I was aware of was that I was very much in love with Sanjay... My life really centred round Sanjay totally.' She was studying at India's famous post-graduate establishment, the Jawaharlal Nehru University in Delhi, during the emergency years. She claimed that she was oblivious to everything but the fact that her husband was being badly treated:

> I felt Sanjay was being made the scapegoat for everything. Ultimately, everything came back to Sanjay. The chief ministers shared no blame, the ministers shared no blame...all the people in charge were now on the other side accusing Sanjay...in those two years he was blamed for everything.

During these years a veteran Indian journalist, Khushwant Singh, had become a close friend of Sanjay and his mother. Khushwant once described himself to friends as the 'call-girl' of Indian journalism. His vices undoubtedly included political promiscuity and he was used by a wide variety of people, but always in return for favours of which he never made a secret. Thus in return for supporting the emergency he was the Nehru-Gandhi family's nominee for the editorship of the Hindustan Times, a paper owned by the Birla family and traditionally regarded as a government mouthpiece, like eighty per cent of the press in Britain. Khushwant was also presented with the Congress nomination to the Upper House of the Indian Parliament, a largely consultative chamber. He later became a non-favourite and then, as was his wont, revealed all. He helped Sanjay to start a weekly paper, Surya, so that Maneka could occupy herself at the editor's desk. He explained:

Rajiv Gandhi

> Primarily he wanted to get her out. She was really getting into his hair the whole time. And he was getting very tired... After she got married, she was interfering in everything. She was very brash and she never really measures her words before she speaks. And he was getting a little tired and fed up. So Surya started. And the first half dozen issues were almost entirely rewritten by me.

On Sanjay, whom he met regularly during the emergency, Khushwant reported:

> He was obviously a very tough nut. He was very soft spoken. He never used any strong language. He was puritanical beyond belief... And he was quite ruthless. People who crossed his path were shown absolutely no mercy... He was really instrumental in my getting into the Rajya Sabha (upper house) and the Hindustan Times. He handed me a long list of Hindustan Times staff members and he said: these are communists. Watch out for them.' I had no intention of taking note of what he said—though I've preserved the list—but it surprised me that his information was absolutely correct. There were about 25 of them on this list and they were all members of the CPI or the CPI(M).

The family in mourning at the Sanjay Samadhi

Many other people who have written about Sanjay have commented on his semi-fascist streak. He was impatient with democracy, fed-up at the slow progress of industrialisation, hated nationalised industries and the trades unions. His Maruti plant had, on occasion, been disrupted by strikes and he had developed an obsessive hatred against the CPI for that reason, even though it had loyally supported the emergency. Sanjay had taken over the Youth Congress as his special instrument and inaugurated a four-point programme: slum clearance, mass sterilisation, tree planting and abolition of dowries.

All this had backfired after the killings near Turkman Gate. The stories of the crimes had spread throughout Northern India. In August-Setember 1975 casual labourers had virtually disappeared from Delhi. This was unheard of in a city where there is always a rush to find work. The labourers, it was discovered, had returned to their villages to avoid the fatal incision in their genitals. In November 1975, the Nehru birthday celebrations, which always included a large free picnic for hundreds of children, had to be cancelled. Mothers had refused to send their male children to the event in case 'Sanjay Gandhi's doctors' had them sterilized. Fear can create many diversions. What was clear was that the emergency regime could no longer be sustained. The parliamentary majority was slowly being whittled away. Sanjay Gandhi was, without doubt, the most hated man in the country.

Indira was not in favour of postponing elections indefinitely, despite Sanjay's pleas to the contrary. It was not that she was still Jawaharlal Nehru's daughter or that part of the old Congress tradition had rubbed off on her. She was the most astute political leader in India at the time. Sanjay was a novice. She had been aware of the change in mood. She knew that running trains on time did not mean much to the bulk of the country. Most important of all, she understood that if Congress did not quit voluntarily through an election, other methods might become popular and the legitimacy of the whole system, not just the Nehru-Gandhi heritage and the Congress, might be put at risk. Elections had been announced. Sanjay had sulked. His mother broadcast the following message to the nation:

> Every election is an act of faith. It is an opportunity to cleanse public life of confusion. So let us go the polls with a resolve to reaffirm the power of the people and uphold the fair name of India.
>
> Change is the very law of life... This is a time of great fluidity in the world. Contemporary society is beset with dangers to which developing countries are specially vulnerable. Hence all change must be peaceful. This is the legacy of our freedom struggle, of Mahatma Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru.

It is difficult after reading the last paragraph to believe that the 1977 elections were a gross miscalculation on her part or that she had thought she would win. There had been too many writings on too many walls all over India for her to have harboured any illusions on this score. She knew Congress would not win even before the date was announced. One day into the campaigning and she had got a fairly good idea as to the size of her support.

Sanjay had now suffered his fourth defeat. He had lost Amethi, his constituency, despite the support of the local potentate, the Raja of Amethi. He declared, as the results came in from all over the country, that he was quitting politics. If Janata had offered any alternative, he might well have embarked on a new adventure, but observing their bizarre antics and mismanagement, Sanjay with his gang-leader's mentality, observed that this defeat could be transformed into a victory. He re-entered the battle and never left his mother's side during this period in her life. More to the point he began to build the Congress afresh, but on the lines we have already noted above. It was now that Akbar Ahmed (Dumpy from Doon) joined his ranks, a gesture Sanjay never forgot, for in India friends normally disappeared if you were no longer in office.

PUNJAB

Sikh Terrorists Shoot High Priest

Was it an attempt to scuttle the government's peace initiatives?

Giani Kirpal Singh, a Jathedar of the Akal Takht was shot at and injured on 16 January on the Ludhiana—Jagraon road by three Sikh youths. It was no blind attempt to murder as has been the case of many during the peak of terrorist activity in Punjab but a planned conspiracy. The Jathedar had gone to Ludhiana to attend the bhog ceremony of Mr Joginder Singh, father of Mr Mohan Singh Mundiani, general secretary of the district youth wing of the Akali Dal.

According to intelligence reports, Giani Kirpal Singh had made a speech at the bhog ceremony and condemned the terrorists and all those who in the name of panth were fulfilling their vested interests. This, according to sources; added fuel to the fire and the hired assassins who were in all probability present at the ceremony decided to do away with the Jathedar immediately. There is no doubt that these men were hired to kill Kirpal Singh but on 16 January had come to judge the situation and to recognise him.

The real reasons for the attempt to assassinate Giani Kirpal Singh were revealed from a piece of paper in a wallet which the accused dropped at the site of the murder attempt. He was to be killed for not having followed the terrorists' line in dealing with the government after Operation Bluestar and for appearing on television and stating that no harm had been done to the Golden Temple and the Kotha Sahab. Another reason for the attempt is because he exonerated President Zail Singh of the allegation that he was responsible for the army action in June. Terrorists also accuse Giani Kirpal Singh for being responsible for the entry of the police into the Golden Temple on 1 October.

The three Sikh youths had accosted the Jathedar on the Ludhiana — Jagraon road when he was proceeding towards Amritsar. They fired from a very close range injuring, apart from Giani Kirpal Singh, two of his sewadars (attendants), Mr Harbans Singh and Mr Gurdev Singh. The driver Mr Malkiat Singh escaped unhurt and drove the injured to a hospital in Ludhiana. Giani Kirpal Singh received minor wounds on his head and right arm. Miraculously, a bullet was found between his skull and his turban. The doctors did not have to take out any bullets from his body at all and at the time of going to press all the three are reportedly progressing satisfactorily. According to intelligence sources, the three survived this attempt because the ammunition used was 15 years old and thus ineffective. The .45 calibre revolver was also old and manufactured sometime in the forties.

Jathedar Kirpal Singh was a staunch critic of Bhindranwale and was the first person to have objected to Bhindranwale moving of the Guru Nanak Niwas to the Akal Takht. He had even gone on to say that a holy place could not be a place of residence. Kirpal Singh had also imposed a ban on the carrying of weapons in the "Parikrama" of the Golden Temple. But he had to revise his order due to pressure from terrorists. Intelligence sources claim that these were the reasons why the Jathedar was on the hit list.

It was merely two days after General A.S. Vaidya's statement that the army has more or less successfully completed the task of clearing the terrorists from the villages in Punjab and unearthed most of the weapons and explosives hidden in the state that the terrorists struck again. While it is true that most of the terrorists have indeed been wiped out, this incident is a clear indication that many are still at large. Police sources said that the three young men who attempted the murder were quite raw and untrained. Not only did they drop a wallet containing documents but also a blanket. Apart from that they possessed very old ammunition and weapons. This leads one to believe that the young men are new entrants who form a part of a disorganised and leaderless terrorist group. The police have been able to arrest two of the three gunmen and the dropped wallet has yielded valuable clues which have led to the arrest of Devinder Singh Fauji, an ex-servicemen and Darhan Singh Mistry of Dalai village in Jagraon. One suspect is still absconding. According to the district magistrate Mr K.R. Lakhanpal, the weapons and the motorcycle used in this crime have also been recovered from the two hitmen who were administered amrit at a gurdwara in Moga on 15 January when they took the oath to kill Jathedar Kirpal Singh

Mr Prem Singh Lalpura the acting president of SGPC stated that the attack on Giani Kirpal Singh was engineered by the Congress(I). However, Giani Sahib Singh, one of the five head priests of the Golden

Kirpal Singh

Temple said: "It was a cowardly and politically unsound attack on Jathedar Kirpal Singh at a crucial time when some kind of political settlement was in sight. The terrorist purposely struck so that Punjab could not remain peaceful. "Whenever there is a proposal of talks with the centre, the antisocial elements have deliberately sabotaged them."

The irresponsible statements by men like Prem Singh Lalpura, who are hardly known as Sikh leaders, are bound to mislead the innocent Sikh masses. Though the attack on Jathedar Kirpal Singh will not have any effect on any type of future talks with the Akalis it still remains to be seen whether terrorists will keep on striking. A visit by Arun Singh, parliamentary secretary to the PM, to Ludhiana to call upon the injured Jathedar is a clear indication that the centre is now sincerely interested in solving the Punjab tangle.

Rita Sharma, Chandigarh,

THE KISSINGER VISIT

Greeting an Old Foe

Warm welcome for Dr Henry Kissinger

The former national security adviser to the US President and part-architect of the US tilt towards Pakistan in the early 1970s, Dr Henry Kissinger's trip to New Delhi on his way from Kathmandu to Islamabad on 18 January generated a great deal of public interest in the capital.

It also surprised members of the opposition, as Dr Kissinger was the man who had described Mrs Gandhi as a "liar."

The invitation to this latter day Metternich, held in great awe by our bureaucratic elite, was made several months ago. But, the sudden announcement of his visit, while he was vacationing with his wife, Nancy, and friends in Kathmandu gives the impression that the visit was more of a private one. The private visit was hastily transformed into an official one, with the former secretary of state being treated as a state guest.

One of the reasons behind the "invitation" could be the fact that Dr Kissinger, though no longer secretary of state, has a considerable influence over the intellectual elite in the US and is a formidable 'opinion-maker,' especially through the lecture circuit. Senior bureaucrats believe that an exchange of views would perhaps "soften" this brilliant tactician towards India, a country he has been known to be antagonistic about ever since the Bangladesh war. This is clearly revealed in his book, Henry Kissinger: Years of Upheaval, in which he mentions his struggle to get the US Congress to tilt towards Pakistan and to give them military assistance.

For Dr. Kissinger, who is now a highly-paid consultant with several large business conglomerates, this public toasting could only be helpful. In India, after a gap of ten years, he packed in a lot in his brief stay. He met the Prime Minister, spent an-hour-and-a-half with Mr Romesh Bhandari, secretary, ministry of external affairs, met MrG. Parthasarathy, chairman, policy planning committee, the foreign secretary, Mr M.K. Rasgotra, and Mr L.K. Jha, who hosted a dinner for him.

Dr Kissinger, the Nobel laureate (for Peace) also gave a public talk on "An American viewpoint of the world situation" and met senior journalists in an "off-the-record" lunch. In his widely reported talk, he said that since there was no clash of interests between the United States and India, he saw no reason why the two countries could no. come closer.

In fact, he was amazed by some of the accusations made in India that his country was trying to divide India. "I am astonished when I read allegations," he said, "that the United States is involved in some of the sad events that have taken place recently./The alternative of an India that is desperate and engaged in communal disputes and internecine political warfare," he said, "would attract interference from both of the superpowers"A "strong, united and economically developed India" was an imperative of US policy, according to him.

Dr Kissinger's talk was particularly interesting on the topic of non-alignment. He said that he had no problem whatsoever in respecting non-alignment when it reflected the national interest of developing countries, but, he could not quite accept the partisan pronouncements often made. While adding that he had particularly followed the pronouncements of the Group of 77 countries, he had observed that according to them nothing the US ever did was right. The USSR, on the other hand never appeared to do anything wrong. "I believe that the collective impact of the non-aligned countries would be much greater if their pronouncements were more balanced." He did add, however, that to be "non-aligned like India, you need someone who is aligned."

The Kissinger visit went off well and left a few smug smiles in South Block, but its timing left a bit to be desired. The visit coincided with the dramatic arrests of several key government officials on charges of espionage: especially of Mr Kher, the personal assistant to the Prime Minister's principal private secretary, Dr P.C. Alexander. The expose of the existence of an espionage ring right has generated a great deal of speculation and it is being said the spies were working for Western powers including the CIA

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

Henry Kissinger (right) with Romesh Bhandari

POLITICS

Feud in the AIADMK

Minister resigns in protest

The first major discordant note in the AIADMK was struck at 11.30 am on 16 January by minister S. Thirunavukkarasu. At a much-delayed press conference, he announced his resignation from the caretaker ministry adding that he would personally go to New York to clarify certain issues with the convalescing Tamil Nadu chief minister M.G. Ramachandran. With his announcement, the 35-year-old "trusted lieutenant" of MGR brought the hidden cracks in the AIADMK into the open. Mr Thirunavukkarasu was resigning in protest against a "group" that has emerged in the party and has allegedly contrived without M.G. Ramachandran's knowledge, to strip the young minister of his major portfolios of excise (which brings in revenue of Rs 220 crores) and handlooms and textiles, leaving him with only commercial taxes and the noon meal scheme.

State finance minister V.R. Nedunchezian returned from New York after meeting MGR and handed over two letters from MGR to the state governor Mr S.L. Khurana. The first letter stated that he would return and assume office by the first week of February. The other dealt with the reallocation of portfolios following the resignation of two ministers: P.M. Kolandaivelu because he had been elected to the Lok Sabha and M. Vijayasarathy because of his defeat in the Assembly elections. The noon meal scheme which was handled by Kolandaivelu was transferred to Thirunavukkarasu while the other portfolios handled by him—highways gramdan and bhoodan—have been transferred to Mr Nedunchezian. While Mr Thirunavukkarasu has been allowed to retain his commercial taxes portfolio, the others, excise, handloom and textiles have been taken by Mr Nedunchezian.

From the time MGR took ill, a group under the leadership of R.M. Veerappan has emerged as a powerful coterie in direct confiict with the Jayalalitha faction. Mr Veerappan, a shrewd tactician, roped in Mr Nedunchezian into his group as the latter's presence gives the manipulations of his coterie a legitimacy as Mr Nedunchezian is the de facto chief minister in MGR's absence. The other prominent members of this group are: transport minister Mr Muthuswamy and the chief of the MGR fans association Musiri Puthan. Mr Thirunavukkarasu was one of the few ministers who reported directly to Jayalalitha when MGR was active. However, since MGR's hospitalisation, he was the only minister to continue to do so and also explicitly supported her. Electricity minister Panruti Ramachandran and education minister C. Aranganayamak also supported Jayalalitha. When the AIADMK high command led by P.U. Shunmugam was keen on keeping Jayalalitha out of the election campaign, Thirunavukkarasu was the only one who declared openly that Jayalalitha should be allowed to campaign for the AIADMK as she was the biggest crowd-puller in the party in the absence of MGR. His support to Jayalalitha earned the wrath of the Veerappan and P.U. Shunmugam groups. As soon as the election results were announced it was clear that Thirunavukkarasu would be punished by the coterie which has allegedly been taking decisions on behalf of MGR.

Thirunavukkarasu did not wish to identify this "group" in an exclusive interview with SUNDAY, but it is common knowledge that his arch enemy is Mr Veerapan. Thirunavukkarasu resigned because "he suspects that his "demotion" is the work of the coterie without MGR's knowledge. He will, however, continue to be an active party member. An alarming feature in Tamil Nadu politics played up recently by S. Thirunavukkarasu, is what decisions and statements are being attributed to MGR by the ruling coterie. In fact, fearing this, Rajiv Gandhi had suggested to the delegation of AIADMK leaders who called on him in Delhi that it was better for a group of ministers to go abroad to hold discussions with MGR regarding the formation of the new government. However, MGR apparently sent a telegram directing that only Mr Nedunchezian and the chief secretary of Tamil Nadu need meet him at New York.

Mr Thirunavukkarasu has decided to seek remedial measures by going and meeting MGR himself. But it is possible that Mrs Janaki Ramachandran, MGR's wife, may not allow him to meet the CM, particularly as he is a close associate of Jayalalitha. SUNDAY learns from reliable sources that Mrs Janaki Ramachandran, being closest to MGR now, is in a position to dictate terms. While she does not have any political ambitions, she is likely to support Mr Veerappan just to ensure that Jayalalitha's chances are destroyed. Both Mr. Veerappan and Mr Nedunchezian have begun cultivating her as they have the same common enemy: Jayalalitha. All documents and papers for MGR have to be routed through either Mrs

Nedunchezian

Ramachandran or the personal assistant and at the moment she is playing the role of a kingmaker.

But the Jayalalitha faction is also not without its support. SUNDAY learns from reliable sources that Rajiv Gandhi is more in favour of Jayalalitha though at the moment he would not like her to play a very dominant role in politics. SUNDAY also learns that there is no love lost between G. Parthasarathy and Mr. Veerappan's coterie. Thirunavukkarasu says in his interview, they will look to Delhi for support. Jayalalitha group also maintains a good relationship with Vice-President R. Venkataraman.

Before the Lok Sabha and Assembly elections, Mr Veerappan's was the stronger group in the party, and he had around 65 MLAs with him. But during the election campaign, Jayalalitha got oaths of allegiance from the MLAs whose constituencies she campaigned in. The balance has now tilted in her favour according to reliable sources. Out of the 133 AIADMK MLAs, 60 are with Jayalalitha, 40 with Mr. Veerappan, 15 with P.U. Shunmugam, K. Rajaram and Madhavan who have got together to form another group which is closer to Mr Veerappan than Jayalalitha. The rest of the MLAs prefer to remain neutral and it remains to be seen who will swing to the winning side. Technically, Jayalalitha can form a coalition government with the support of the Congress(I). But Rajiv Gandhi is not keen on this at this juncture with

Veerappan

MGR still very much alive. Meanwhile, the centre is exerting pressure on the ruling coterie through the Governor Mr Khurana who has pointed out in a letter to MGR that the latter has not replied to his letter dated 3 January in which he had specifically raised the point of appointing an interim chief minister should MGR's recovery take a long time. In MGR's reply, brought back by Mr. Nedunchezian, this question was neatly sidestepped. The Governor prudently described it as an "inadvertent omission" but sources close to the Governor told SUNDAY that he was fully aware that the ruling coterie was buying time. The Governor has also hinted that he would have to be satisfied probably by means of a physical verification, that MGR was fit enough to take over as CM. The Governor's constitutional powers regarding this issue is not clear but the picture which emerges is: pressure will be mounted to ensure that the new government is installed as early as possible. The Governor is also fully aware of the fact that the administration has come to a total standstill in the state since 6 October, 1984. The span of a 'caretaker government has to be limited as it is not empowered to take major decisions. In this context, Mr Khurana is also vexed that the caretaker government has been taking major decisions such as the ad-hoc payment of Rs 200 to Rs 300 to government servants as promised in the AIADMK election manifesto.

At the moment, there is a regular slanging match going on in the AIADMK with S. Thirunavukkarasu questioning Mr Nedunchezian's propriety in showing to pressmen photostat copies of the confidential letter between MGR and the Governor. Meanwhile, Mr Veerappan has launched a vicious campaign against Mr. Thirunavukkarasu, deliberately distorting the latter's statements regarding MGR's health.

MGR is expected to return on 4 February and at the time of going to press there was no indication when the swearing-in ceremony would take place. From all indications it would seem that MGR will be sworn in as chief minister without portfolio. His portfolios would be distributed among other ministers but the popular belief is that the ruling coterie would step in to distribute it among themselves while attributing the reallocation to MGR. There is nothing really that the Governor or the centre can do regarding this as changes in the cabinet are a party matter. And, neither does Delhi have the jurisdiction to intervene. This is only the beginning of the machinations of the ruling coterie and already one has to confront the absurd situation of Mr. Nedunchezian handling a host of portfolios including finance, legislature, collections, youth, price control, servicemen, public administration, home, molasses, public archives, excise, highways, bhoodan, gramdan, harijan welfare and handloom and textiles.

Anita Pratap, Madras

Jayalalitha

"My Resignation is Not a Protest Against MGR"

S. Thirunavukkarasu told SUNDAY

Q: Did you have an inkling that you would be divested of some of your main portfolios?

A: No, I didn't expect it. It came as a shock.

Q: But you were the only minister to repeatedly assert that status quo should be maintained and that no changes should be made in the cabinet.

A: Yes, from the time MGR was hospitalised, I have been repeatedly saying that no changes should be made either in the cabinet or in the party. Only after the chief minister returns should decisions be taken.

Q: The very fact that you were the only minister to harp on this and that you were the only one to be divested of your portfolios proves that you had expected this to happen.

A: Actually, in a way I expected something to happen. Some people have formed a group in the party and from the time MGR was hospitalised, this group has been wanting to neglect some people in the party like Jayalalitha and some ministers like me. They have been wanting to drive us away, divest us of our portfolios and party posts. I knew they were trying to do something which is why I kept on saying that status quo should be maintained.

Q: Would you care to identify this group that has emerged in the party?

A: No.

Q: Would you agree that this group's action is directed more against Jayalalitha than you?

A: Maybe, but there could also be other reasons. Maybe they have something against me also.

Q: They probably want to punish you for supporting Jayalalitha.

A: Yes, they wanted to neglect her but I supported her from the beginning because my view is that nobody in the party, particularly the promising leaders, should be neglected. Jayalalitha is a top leader, our CM has accepted her well and given her a prominent role in the party. So, I felt that in the absence of MGR his name alone would be enough at the time of the elections. I felt so too, because there was sympathy for him. But still Karunanidhi had to be neutralised and the tempo had to be maintained throughout the period of campaigning. Since Karunanidhi attracted crowds our party and people also liked to have bigger crowds at our meetings. Only in this way could the tempo be sustained. But this group opposed my suggestions. My feeling was proved to be correct. For 20 days Jayalalitha like MGR, did a tremendous job of campaigning.

Q: Would you say then that Jayalalitha is the truest representative of MGR today?

A: That is for MGR to say.

Thirunavukkarasu

Q: What happened during your meeting with V. R. Nedunchezhian (the finance minister) who informed you of the decision to divest you of the portfolio?

A: Nedun (Nedunchezhian) told me that the chief minister had taken a very, very serious view even my comments on Kotteeswaran's statement. Kotteeswaran is a senior member of the party and the most

A: Yes, but if MGR had given it to me I would have been only too happy. Any portfolio given by the CM is acceptable to me. Even if he left me without a portfolio I would not have minded. I would still have worked hard for him and the party. But I doubt sincerely whether this decision (to take away his portfolios) has been taken by MGR. I don't understand what the need is to change the portfolios in a caretaker government. Moreover, the CM is returning soon. Whatever changes he wanted could have been done after he returned to Madras. This group is playing a role to take revenge on me, in MGR's name. My resignation is a protest not against MGR but against this group. If MGR is conscious, if he retains his memory power and if he is vigilant and says that he wants to take away portfolios from me I would not have minded at all.

Q: Are you then convinced that this decision was taken without MGR's sanction?

A: Yes, because the CM was very kind to me right up to 2 October 1984, when I met him last. On 3 and 4 October, I was in Madurai and on 5 October MGR was hospitalised. So, till then he was very close to me. He gave me important portfolios. MGR never praises his partymen openly. Yet, he said at public meetings and to the press that he considered me to be his trusted lieutenant. He said he had confidence in me. That same CM was in hospital and for nearly two months he was unconscious. Even though he was recovering, he was not told of Indira Gandhi's assassination or the death of Madurai Muthu (a senior AIADMK partyman) only very recently. He was not told because he was not in a condition to absorb shocks. There is a [illegible] that the CM was pressured [illegible] by this group and to [illegible] divest me of [illegible] doubt this [illegible] fetch [illegible] him [illegible]

ORISSA

Ministers at Loggerheads

Biswal and Niranjan Patnaik clash over poll results

Even after a comfortable victory in the recent Lok Sabha elections, the Congress(I) remains unable to close ranks and face the electorate unitedly. With just a few months to go before the state Assembly elections, the hastily papered-over cracks in chief minister J.B. Patnaik's cabinet reappeared with the two most powerful leaders—Basant Kumar Biswal and Niranjan Patnaik— renewing their bitter rivalry. The all-important issue this time is the allotment of Congress(I) tickets for the Legislative Assembly elections. In order to increase their influence in the state legislature party, both Biswal and Patnaik are actively lobbying to get tickets for their nominees. But Mr Biswal, the ambitious minister for works, mining, urban development and sports, and referred to as the "super chief minister" has found the state power and irrigation minister Niranjan Patnaik a harder nut to crack than the other anti-Biswal ministers, chiefly because of Mr Patnaik's family ties with chief minister Mr J. B. Patnaik.

Niranjan Patnaik, who has resented Biswal's importance and proximity to J.B. Patnaik, had been maintaining a low profile for the last few years because his adversary had proved to be a more effective political manager. But Niranjan Patnaik who had to eat humble pie when the Congress(I) lost a substantial number of seats in last year's panchayat elections in his native Keonjhar district (as opposed to Biswal's successful campaign in the Assembly constituency area of Tirtol in Cuttack district in the Lok Sabha elections), got the opportunity to turn the tables on Biswal. Today Niranjan Patnaik has reason to claim that he has done a much better job than Biswal since the Congress(I) retained the prestigious seat of Aska where he was the campaign manager by defeating the prominent Janata Party candidate Ram Chandra Rath by over one lakh votes. However, in the other key constituency of Kendrapara, which was under Biswal's charge, the Janata Party leader Biju Patnaik won by a margin bigger than in 1980. In Jagatsinghpur, another constituency left to Biswal's managerial skill, the Janata Party candidate Rabi Ray lost only by a slender and controversial margin of 1,087 votes. In contrast, the second constituency under Patnaik's charge—Keonjhar—was comfortably won by the Congress(I) by a margin of over 84,000 votes.

Basant Kumar Biswal

After the reverses in the Lok Sabha elections, Mr Biswal's angry explanations at the recent PCC(I) meeting resulted in a clash with two other ministers: Gangadhar Mohapatra, minister of education and Basudev Mohapatra, the revenue minister who have been at loggerheads with him for his "overbearing manners." Biswal claimed that the education minister did not redress the grievances of the teachers who were active campaigners against the ruling party in the constituencies under his charge. The education minister, however, pointed out that the policy on how to deal with the striking teachers was drawn up only at the chief minister's behest. Biswal's charge that the revenue minister's supporters in the Jagatsinghpur constituency humiliated him during the campaign has further strained the relations between them, so much so that the revenue minister was not invited to an important foundation-stone-laying ceremony organised by Biswal's urban development department on 12 January. Biswal also repeated his old charge against Niranjan Patnaik. The latter, he said, although holding some important portfolios, was neglecting the Congress(I)'s financial needs. Hitting back, Patnaik reminded him of his successful efforts to ensure the party's victories in both the constituencies left to his responsibility.

Niranjan Patnaik

The reports that Biswal's relations with his mentor, J. B. Patnaik have soured acquired credence after Biswal's charge at the PCC(I) meeting that the chief minister did not pay heed to his counsel to change the state's chief electoral officer, Pyari Mohan Mahapatra, whose open disapproval of the government's poll-eve programmes of foundation stone-laying ceremonies created an anti-Congress(I) feeling among the educated section of the electorate. The chief minister, who was present at the meeting, however, preferred to remain silent.

Both Biswal and Niranjan Patnaik are trying to field as many candidates "loyal" to them for the Assembly polls with the aim of playing an effective role in the post-elections power struggle. The leaders are also trying to ensure party tickets for their family members. Biswal is lobbying for nominations for his maternal uncle Nityananda Samantaray, a special class contractor from Patkura constituency and his aunt Sashiprava Samantaray from Govindpur to form his power nucleus. Similarly, Niranjan Patnaik is trying to secure tickets for two of his brothers, Saumya Ranjan Patnaik (chief minister's brother-in-law) and Amiya Ranjan Patnaik for Khurda and Rourkela respectively to strengthen the anti-Biswal group.

Meanwhile, chief minister J. B. Patnaik and his wife Jayanti Patnaik who have been desperately trying to strike a balance between the Biswal and the Niranjan Patnaik forces, appear to have, of late, started leaning towards the Niranjan Patnaik faction. But according to political observers, Jayanti Patnaik known to be a promoter of Biswal's interests, is likely to make her last attempt to keep him within the family fold with the argument that a feud of such proportions will ultimately spell disaster for the party in the state.

Sarada P. Nanda, Bhubaneswar

PUNJAB

Bhajan Lal's "Greater Punjab"

Controversial proposal is strongly criticised

The Haryana chief minister Bhajan Lal's new proposal to solve the Punjab imbroglio has triggered off a major national controversy. His proposal deals with the merger of Haryana and parts of Jammu and Kashmir, Rajasthan and Himachal Pradesh with Punjab taking the situation back to where it stood just before independence.

Understandably, the proposal has evoked strong but conflicting reactions from different political parties and even from different sections within political parties. On the one hand, the Akali Dal, the CPI and the CPI(M) have opposed the suggestion but for different reasons while on the other, the Congress(I) in Punjab appears to be divided along communal and religious lines. Other political parties like the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), the Janata Party and the DMKP, seem confused as their different state and central units are taking different positions.

Rajinder Kaur, president of the Istri "Akali Dal said: "Mr Rajiv Gandhi's statement that Bhajan Lal's proposal of 'Maha Punjab' would be considered by the ministerial panel only proved that this proposal has been made with the prior consent of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister wants to aggravate the already surcharged communal atmosphere in Punjab to consolidate the support of the majority community behind him before the Assembly elections. This cannot be dismissed as frivolous. My doubt is further confirmed," she said, "by several Congress(I) leaders supporting the proposals. The communal Hindus opposed the principles of demarcation of state boundaries on a linguistic basis in Punjab (after all the Indian states) because the Sikhs were likely to gain a numerical majority in this new Punjab redemarcated on a linguistic basis. The Sikhs had agitated for a long time to get 'Punjabi Suba' and during this agitation the voices of 'Maha Punjab' were raised by communal Hindus to reduce the Sikh strength and make them a political nonentity."

Rajinder Kaur adds, "This proposal is the renewal of the old communal stance of the majority community. The Sikhs will consider it as a challenge to their self-respect and a great danger to their religious entity and will oppose it with all their might. Mr Gandhi is advising the Sri Lanka government to solve the Tamil issue at a political level and not rule by force but he has done nothing to solve the Punjab problem at the political level and is ruling Punjab by force."

The Punjab Congress(I) Legislature Party chief whip, Bir Devinder Singh, has described the merger proposal by Bhajan Lal as a "rotten egg." He, however, has sought to keep his options open by suggesting that a bigger Punjab might be acceptable to his party provided the Punjabi language enjoyed a dominant position. However, former chief minister Darbara Singh and non-Sikh members of the CLP(I) like Om Prakash Gupta, the Ludhiana District Congress chief have supported Bhajan Lal's suggestion for merging the states that emerged following the reorganisation of Punjab on linguistic lines in the mid-Sixties.

Talks with some non-Sikh members and leaders of the state ruling party with SUNDAY reveal that the party is far from united on the issues and betrayed symptoms of a split on religious and communal lines. Senior party leaders belonging to both Hindu and Sikh communities in the Congress(I) were not certain whether Bhajan Lal's suggestion had support from the party high command and are maintaining a discreet silence.

However, the Akali Dal ad hoc committee president Surjan Singh Thekedar and the SGPC (Shiromani Gurudwara Prabandhak Committe) acting president Prem Singh Lalpura have rejected the proposal maintaining that only the Anandpur Sahib resolution could be the basis of any dialogue between the centre and Akalis and as a pre-condition the entire jailed Akali Dal leadership and the thousands of Sikh youths against whom there are no charges should be released unconditionally. The Punjab CPI secretary Avtar Singh Malhotra, while rejecting the merger suggestion wondered whether the suggestion had the tacit support from the powers that be. Malhotra offered a five point formula to solve the Punjab problem.

The proposed formula by the CPI envisages the release of all Akalis and the Sikh youths against whom there are no charges, condemnation by Akalis of all extremists and Khalistani activists, protection of property and lives of Sikhs living in other states and the initiation of a dialogue between the centre and agitating Akalis. The Punjab unit of the CPI(M) has urged Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi not to attach any importance to the merger proposals. CPI(M) politburo member Harkishan Singh Surjit has said the suggestion was not only farcical and funny but if accepted could open a Pandora's box.

Haryana DMKP leader Virendera Singh too, has opposed the merger proposal saying that if accepted it might lead to the slow-down of development in Haryana but also a loss of cultural identity. He described the suggestion as one trying to divert attention from the real issues before the people and the state. Other political parties such as the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and the Janata Party are continuing to vacillate on the merger proposal that has stunned the people of strife torn northern India.

Ritu Sharma, Chandigarh

Bhajan Lal

BUREAUCRACY

Changes at the Top

Efforts to tone up the administration

With Ramachandra Dattatraya Pradhan, former chief secretary of Maharashtra taking over as union home secretary on 15 January, Maharashtra will, in the literal sense of the word, administer Delhi. Mr S. B. Chavan, union minister of home is from Maharashtra, as is Delhi's police commissioner, Mr S. S. Jog. Mr Pradhan's appointment came as a surprise because even Maharashtra chief minister Vasantrao Patil was caught unawares. He did not know of it until the last moment. Speculation initially was centered around other officers including the chief secretary of Himachal Pradesh, C. Pandeya.

Mr Pradhan, a seasoned bureaucrat with 32 years of civil service experience was appointed home secretary after the incumbent, Prem Kumar, special secretary in the home ministry, was appointed commerce secretary in the place of Abid Hussain, who has been made a member of the Planning Commission. Incidentally, Prem Kumar's stint in the home ministry lasted just over two months. He had taken over after the previous incumbent, M. M. K. Wali became the Lt. Governor of Delhi on 4 November after the Delhi riots.

One of the reasons for the selection of Mr Pradhan is probably his efficient handling of law and order and administration in Maharashtra after he was made chief secretary in 1982. Those were the years of political instability when A. R Antulay and Babasaheb Bhosale were chief ministers and communal riots and serious droughts had plagued the state. According to informed sources, Mr Pradhan's efforts at streamlining administration in Maharashtra were also responsible for his new appointment.

Mr Pradhan was director-general of shipping from 1979 to 82 before becoming home secretary of Maharashtra. Even before that he was also a senior consultant to the secretary-general, UNCTAD (United Nations Council for International Trade). He was director, UNCTAD secretariat and as the man in charge of technical assistance to developing countries of the UNCTAD and UNDP, he has led several delegations abroad.

S.S. Jog

Meanwhile, in Delhi there is suspense over the coming game of musical chairs which will take place over secretarial "seats." After Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi split several ministries, more department heads are now needed. Moreover, when the appointment of the new cabinet secretary is made, there is bound to be a minor shuffle amongst the existing secretaries. Mr Krishnaswamy Rao Sahib, retires on 28 February this year, but he may be asked to go on leave earlier and look after Assam before he takes up his post as executive director in the World Bank.

The seniormost among the secretaries is K. V. Ramanathan, presently member secretary in the Planning Commission. But seniority has not always been the only criterion in the selection of the crucial post of cabinet secretary. Other contenders include A. S. Gill, secretary, petroleum, R. M. Kaul, finance secretary and Mohinder Singh, secretary, mines. Mr Gill retires in six months.

Mr Gangopadhaya, secretary, food, is due to retire at the end of this month. Secretaries will also be needed in the departments of culture (with culture delinked from education) which has as its head at present, Dr Kapila Vatsayana, additional secretary. The department of civil supplies has been separated from sports and youth affairs (which is presently headed by B. N. Swaroop), the department of forests, which has an additional secretary as its head, and the department of women's welfare. The Energy Board also needs a new Chairman after K. C. Pant was appointed minister of Education.

Thus, speculation continues and surprises are expected because the new Prime Minister keeps his cards close to his chest. Some of the senior bureaucrats are not accustomed to the no-nonsense style of the young Prime Minister, who in one of his initial review meetings with secretaries snubbed a senior secretary by telling him not to give a "babu answer" to his question about an international collaboration.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

WORLD ZOROASTRIAN CONGRESS

Thus Spake the Parsees

New plans to strengthen the community

The renowned cancer specialist Dr D.J. Jussawalla has exploded the commonly held belief that the Parsis as a community are more prone to cancer than other communities. In a paper on the subject presented at the recently-concluded Fourth World Zoroastrian Congress in Bombay, Dr Jussawalla said, "To begin with, we found that the age composition of the Parsi population was quite different from that of other communities, as the majority were found to be in the middle and older age groups. The total population of Bombay on the other hand had much larger numbers in the younger age groups. Furthermore, a much higher percentage of the Parsi population was found to be in the age groups beyond 50 in men and 30 in women. According to our findings, all diseases which are known to occur at the older ages, should be more common in the Parsis. However, as far as cancer, a disease of the middle and older age group is concerned, its incidence in the Parsis is surprisingly lower than that seen in other communities." Dr Jussawalla added, "Another unusual fact to come to light was the lower cancer incidence in men as compared to women, upto the age of 65. Only after this age do Parsi males present higher incidence rates than the females. In all other communities in Bombay, as well as in other countries, the incidence of cancer is known to be higher in women." He also said that "the breast is the commonest site affected by cancer in Parsi women as is the prostrate in Parsi men, whereas in other communities the mouth of the womb (cervix) is the commonest site for cancer in women and the mouth cavity and throat in men."

The four-day conference was a significant event in the history of the Parsis. There were 1,300 registered delegates of which 250 were from abroad. Jamshed Gazdar, a successful city businessman and chairman of the reception committee, said, "We were most impressed by the participation of students (there were nearly 200 students). The Parsis now feel that their future can be successfully shaped by the community's leadership and the Parsis staying abroad are confident that the Parsis in India have not forgotten them and that they would be continuously supplied with dastoors (priests) and information about the Parsi religion, rituals and practices."

One of the most important decisions taken was to form the World Zoroastrian Organisation based in London to handle problems of the community on a worldwide basis. There are about 10,000 Parsis who have settled abroad and the older ones are worried that their children have not had any exposure to the religion, its customs and rituals. One of the issues discussed was how the Parsis staying abroad, could help those from India who would like to study abroad. "Today," said Mr Gazdar, "it costs around 10,000 US dollars to study abroad and of this, about 6,000 US dollars have to be spent on lodging and boarding. If a system could be found whereby Parsi students could be accommodated by Parsi families staying abroad it would help Indian Parsi students to go for higher studies on a larger scale." Another interesting outcome will be the strengthening of the Parsi Marriage Bureau run by the Parsi panchayat of Bombay which is the oldest panchayat in the country.

About 150 young boys and girls are listed confidentially with the bureau and the Conference has now decided to have a foreign section. The Parsi leadership in Bombay is keen that like the Hindus, young Parsi boys and girls must come to India to find their brides and grooms. The Parsis feel that their community will be 'non-existent' if the practice of marrying outside the faith continues. To encourage early marriage among the Parsis, the panchayat which is one of the richest in India, has decided to put up 1,000 flats in Bombay for young couples wishing to get married. They have found that Parsis marry late because they cannot get accommodation. Today the panchayat owns about 3,800 flats in the city and half a million square feet of FSI (Floor Space Index) on which they can build flats. They are also custodians of about 1,200 trusts throughout India.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

TAMIL NADU

India's Answer to Disneyland

Industrial group to build a 1000 acre "Wonderland"

Where Robert Clive of Plassey once raised a secret army, an industrial group will build one of the most ambitious entertaintment projects in the country. On Secret Island or Marmathivu, an islet in Madras, will come up a 1000 acre "Wonderland," an Indianised version of the American fantasy world "Disneyland." The project planned by the VGP group of industries in the Seventies was finally cleared by the state government of Tamil Nadu in mid-1984. Work has already begun on the 10 crore project which is likely to be ready by 1990.

Initially, Mr V.G. Paneerdas, the chief of the VGP group of industries, had planned for another Disneyland-like attraction complete with roller-coasters and miniature zoos, but his final plans indicate that "Wonderland" will be a totally Indianised version with an emphasis on the projection of 2,000 years of Indian culture and Hindu mythology.

Work on the project site is going on and the construction of a complete set of 22 modern cottages and a whole range of entertaintment facilities are progressing. Massive concrete structures have already been constructed in a 100 acre site which will serve as the reception area. Modern electronic systems, gadgets for utilising solar power and space research programmes have been planned. The progress of ancient Indian science, in mathematics, astronomy and medicine will be demonstrated through sound and light shows, murals and exhibitions. The management also hopes to ensure the participation of the local people in demonstrations of weaving and basketmaking techniques and pottery-making. Children's parks, toylands, museums and an acquarium have also been planned. A regular ferry service will transport the visitors to the island. There are also plans to use helicopters in the near future.

Models in medieval Indian costumes

According to Mr Paneerdas, "The main object of the project is to depict the cultural heritage and technological advances made by India so that Indians and foreign tourists learn more about the country. It will also help to create goodwill and earn a considerable amount of foreign exchange.

Despite the fact that the plans had been submitted to the state government in the Seventies, the project was cleared only in the middle of last year and Wonderland Limited was incorporated as a separate company only on 26 September 1984. Another major problem had been the acquisition of the 1,000 acres of land. The efforts of acquire land belonging to the Nithyakalana Swami Devasthanam, Thiruvidanthai and Sri Nemili Alawanadar Naicker Charities, Mahabalipuram under the control of Hindu Religion and Endownment Charities (HR and CE) department of the state government were not successfuland the application made in 6 September 1979 was turned down in 1981 by the HR and CE commissioner. "By then we had lost a precious amount of time," said a spokesman of the company. The Madras Metropolitan Development Authority has also objected to the development of the project without getting the whole plan approved.

Mr Paneerdas said, "The Gujarat government and some other neighbouring states had offered the necessary land but we did not agree because we wanted the project to be implemented in Tamil Nadu."

T. Raman, Madras

SRI LANKA

Gunboat Diplomacy

Indo-Sri Lankan relations deteriorate

There was a time, and not too long ago, when India and Sri Lanka shared a close and fruitful relationship. The deterioration in the relations between the two countries which began in 1977 when J. R. Jayewardene assumed office, plummetted to an all-time low on 11 January 1985, when the Indian Coast Guard vessel Jijibai, chased and intercepted an intruding Sri Lankan patrol boat P-448 with its crew of seven within India's territorial waters. The seizure was made at Kodikadal, between Rameshwaram and the Pamban lighthouse, said to be roughly five miles within India's border. India has taken a "serious view" of the encroaching Sri Lankan gunboat (the well-equipped 60-feet vessel has been described as a miniwarship) particularly because the cases of harassment of Indian fishermen operating in this area by the Sri Lankan Coast Guard has escalated to alarming proportions in the last few months.

In fact, it was allegedly the harassment of the Indian fishermen by the crew of this particular vessel that led to its capture. Apparently, about 50 fishermen who were returning with their catch, were given chase by the Sri Lankan boat, which overtook the fishermen and opened fire, wounding four Indian fishermen. Several others were allegedly beaten up by the crew with rubber truncheons.

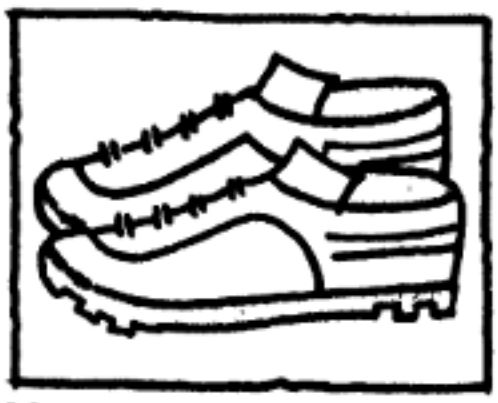
The fishermen's catch of 500 kg of prawns was confiscated as were the expensive fishing nets. Some of the fishermen who managed to elude the Sri Lankan vessel succeeded in alerting Jijibai which was plying nearby. On ascertaining the location of the incident, the far more sophisticated Indian vessel pursued the P-448, intercepted it and brought it along to Mandapam. The Sri Lankan craft captained by Lt. Gunatilake surrendered without a fight. Apart from the prawn catch and fishing nets a cache of arms including automatic rifles, light machine guns, sub-machine guns of Chinese make and an Indian self-loading rifle were recovered. There were also 906 bullets and magazines.

News of the seizure spread like wildfire and the local fishermen from all the adjoining villages converged at Mandapam to give vent to their anger and hostility. Shouting anti-Sri Lanka slogans, the fishermen threatened to take law into their own hands but the police had summoned constables from all the police stations nearby to provide security for the Sri Lankan vessel and its crew. Over the past few months, the wrath of the Indian fishermen has been steadily rising due to the harassment by the Sri Lankan patrol boats: their catch and nets are frequently seized and they are often chased away even though they fish well within India's territorial waters. Sometimes their boats are sunk. On two occasions on 10 December '84 and 7 January '85, Sri Lankan vessels opened fire killing three fishermen. The Fishermen's Association has repeatedly complained to the government authorities who have promised additional coast guard vessels to protect them as well as check the Sri Lankan vessels. The capture of the vessel thus came as a great morale-booster to the fishermen who had threatened to agitate in order to make the government take action.

The Sri Lankan crew was handed over to the state police who lodged them in the government Arts College in Ramnad. Later, they were sent to Madurai. The crew, handed over to the naval authorities for interrogation, can be tried under both civil or military law. The state police have registered a number of cases against them under Sections 147 (rioting), 148 (rioting, armed with deadly weapons), 331 (voluntarily causing greivous hurt to compel restoration of property), 332 (causing hurt to deter public servants from their duties) of the IPC and 6 (A) of the Indian Passport Act, Section 25 and the Arms Act. Under the Navy Act, the crew can be booked for trespassing.

Meanwhile, Colombo swung into action denying that their vessel had encroached upon India's territory. Their official version claims that the Indian Coast Guard vessel chased the patrol craft in Sri Lanka's territorial waters and commandeered it into Mandapam. The Sri Lankan government also denied that the patrol craft crew had opened fire on the Indian fishermen. Thirdly, they decried that India had no jurisdiction to arrest and begin proceedings against the crew of a state vessel as it had immunity from Indian authorities and demanded the "unconditional release" of the vessel.

India on the other hand is willing to settle the issue on a quid pro quo basis. The Sri Lankan boat and crew will be returned only on the immediate release of the 17 Indian fishermen who were captured by the Sri Lankan Navy about three months ago for allegedly poaching in Sri Lankan territorial waters and are undergoing trial for trespassing in Sri Lanka. In fact, it is an indication of the failure of Indian diplomacy that India chose to lie low over the arrest and trial of the fishermen.



Sri Lanka is not inclined to settle the issue on a quid pro quo basis arguing that the two incidents are separate. The Sri Lankans have suggested that the Indian government release the patrol craft before the Indian fishermen are released. A simultaneous release has been vetoed by Sri Lanka on the plea that the Sinhalese masses, terribly agitated by the seizure of the vessel, would jump to the conclusion that Sri Lanka has been browbeaten into capitulation. This, it was pointed out, would undermine the political stability of the Jayewardene government.

The government-controlled Sri Lankan media has since July 1983 deliberately created a war psychosis in the island by consistently raising the bogey of an Indian invasion. Any incident is immediatelyexaggerated and distorted to give the impression that India is about to invade Sri Lanka. President Jayewardene has stated that even if India invades, and Sri Lanka is defeated, she would lose with dignity. More recently, there was a rumour that India would invade Sri Lanka on Pongal, 14 January, the day of the popular Tamil harvest festival. Having been exposed only to the distorted versions the Sinhalese masses are justified if they feel that their government would be capitulating should Sri Lanka agree to a quid pro quo arrangement.

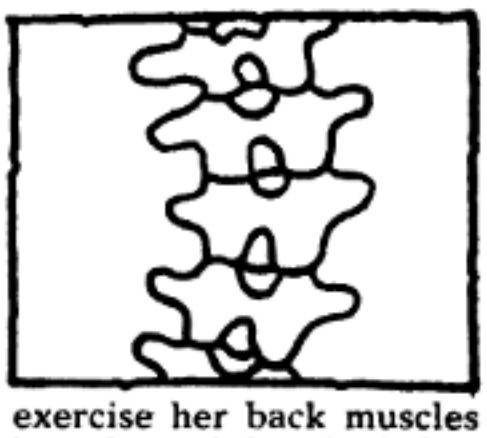
At the time of going to press there was hectic diplomatic activity with the Sri Lankan ambassador, Bernard Tilakratne being summoned to Delhi and K.R. Sinha, the acting Indian high commissioner being summoned to Colombo. However, it is clear that both nations are keen on settling the issue at the diplomatic level. But it is also clear that India will release the Sri Lankan boat only on a quid pro quo basis after a warning to Sri Lanka not to enter Indian territorial waters and harass Indian fishermen. If Sri Lanka refuses, India will proceed with the trial of the crew.

Anita Pratap, Madras

Track Shoes Are Useless

Athletes and joggers, there is a chance that your running shoes may have to be thrown away. The world's first medical conference on sports footwear held at Munich recently revealed that about one in three running shoes and ski boots in the market is practically useless. Moreover, soccer boots are particularly underdeveloped. A Swiss doctor specialising in sports medicine has revealed that the beds of the shoes were often designed as though the heel hit the ground at the same time as the instep. In reality, the outside of the heel is the point of impact. Air cushions might be good as shock absorbers, but they also tend to make the wearer feel he or she is floundering a little. Properly designed running shoes must help to absorb the shock of impact, support the joint and lead the rolling movement of forward motion.

Mental Problems



Over a third of hospital patients suffer from mental problems, according to a Volkswagen Foundation survey conducted by H.W. Kunsebeck and others at Hanover medical college, West Germany. The team checked the mental health of 322 patients in various wards and found that 20.5 per cent claimed to feel depressed while 25.5 per cent suffered from serious social anxiety. Women suffered more frequently than men from mental upset, and lower classes more than upper. There were fewer cases of mental disturbances among the acutely ill than among the chronically sick. In the neurological wards, according to an article in the British Medical Journal, 39 per cent of patients suffer from mental trouble that in three cases out of four is not recognised as such by the doctors in charge.

Olfactory Power

A woman's sense of smell is sharper than man's, according to a report in Science. Between the ages of 20 and 40, most people's sense of smell is most acute. Non-smokers have a keener sense of smell than smokers. A study conducted by Dr Richard Doty and his colleagues of the Clinical Smell and Taste Research Centre at the university of Pennsylvania and the department of statistics, Wharton School, Philadelphia, USA, showed that elderly people—those between the ages of 65 and 80—showed seriously impaired ability to detect odours. Given these findings, it is not surprising that it is mostly old people who complain that food lacks flavour; moreover, they account for several accidental gas poisoning cases each year. Dr Doty emphasises the importance of the human sense of smell for detection of fire, dangerous fumes and polluted environment, in addition to the more enjoyable job of determining flavour and palatability of foods.

Scoliosis: The Spine-Breaker

By day, Marlene Kandall, 16, is a busy dancer who hopes to perform one day with the Joffrey Ballet in New York. But at night, she is a different picture: she applies two electrodes to one side of her back, switches on a battery-operated generator, and lets the machine exercise her back muscles while she sleeps. She does this so that a deformity in her spine doesn't worsen. She is a victim of idiopathic scoliosis.

This disease is a potentially crippling side-to-side curvature of the spine that strikes one out of every 50 children in the United States, mostly girls. Three out of 200 victims have spines that curve less than 20 degrees (a measure of how much a section of the spine has bent to one side or the other from an idealised vertical spine). The disease usually strikes between the ages of ten and 13, when the skeletal frame is developing most rapidly. Left untreated, scoliosis can have terrible effects. As the spinal curve increases, the vertebrae (joints of the backbone) rotate toward the inside of the curve, twisting the backbone and causing the ribs attached to each vertebra to shift. The ribs on the inside of the curve squeeze together, while those on the outside splay apart. Eventually, the entire rib cage narrows, crowding the heart and lungs and impeding their ability to function. Yet, for all its painful results, the ailment is rarely fatal.

Early detection of the disorder is the key. Most children with curves upto 40 degrees can be treated without surgery if the scoliosis is detected soon enough. Some doctors use a technique called Moire topography. The patient stands behind an illuminated fine-lined grid that throws a symmetrical pattern of shadows onto the contours of his back. If he has scoliosis, the pattern will be asymmetrical. Like Marlene, a good number of girls use electronic bracing, a simple electrical treatment, used only at night, that can check mild scoliosis. However, such a technique does not work with some patients. For such people, surgery is the only way out.

Since the Sixties, doctors have used a technique called the Harrington rod implant. The surgeons hook a metal rod with a ratchet mechanism like that of a car jack to the vertebrae above and below the curve, then straighten the curve by lengthening the rod with the ratchet. To form a supportive bony column, they place pieces of bone, usually taken from the patient's hip, along the centre of the vertebrae.

Chromosome Trouble

A good number of illnesses can be traced to one cause: a break in a chromosome. That break can be seen only when scrutinised under a microscope. Recent laboratory work with tissue cultures in America has identified a large number of chemicals which will cause breaks to occur. When those findings are coupled with other research, there is accumulating evidence that such defects in chromosomes are a possible cause of turning cells from a normal to a cancerous state. Fifty one previously unknown weak spots on human chromosomes have been found.

Illustrations Prabir Sen

What do Yogeeta Bali, Moushumi Chatterji, Rekha, Meena, Bindiya Goswami and Kajal Kiran have in common? Vinod Mehra. They were all either married to or had affairs with him and all of them found that the sweetness of his face was deceiving. Vinod Mehra does not seem to have learnt many lessons after all these torrid days. Who is next?

It needed just one film for the south Indian producers to write away the much sung-about Moon Moon Sen. The makers of John Jani Janardhan signed her after seeing and reading a lot about her. She did a sizzling dance number, took of as much clothes as she could but just could not act. She looked a perfect dumb seductress. But that is not what the producers wanted. She spent three days with the unit before she was given the hint. Poonam Dhillon was summoned and what a hit the film turned out to be.

What happens when filmstars come down to earth? Sarika literally came down to earth recently when the autorickshaw, yes autorickshaw, in which she was travelling, overturned. The driver ecstatic at being able to take Sarika for a ride, obviously lost control. Sarika was injured. "What was more painful was the curious look on peoples' faces. They couldn't believe that I was travelling in an auto. Instead of trying to help me they tried to touch me to see if I was real. It was a very nasty experience," murmured Sarika nursing her physical and mental wounds. She could not report for the shooting of two films causing losses to the producers. "But I will make up for their losses," she says. Nirvaan the film in which Sarika appears semi-nude for the first time is due for release. Asked if their were any chances of patching up differences with her mother, Sarika replied: "No" and, she sounded very firm indeed.

If half of what Anita Raaj says is right, she is the queen of the stars. "I have got good films. I am working with all the big heroes and directors. I am out of the gossip press and that is why people think I don't have any work," she affirms.

Pinku Upadhyay

Moon Moon Sen with husband

Dungarpassad

Vinod Mehra with Shabana Azmi

Anita Raaj: in a dream world

THIS INDIA

Illustration: Debasitha Deb

MADURAI: A man attempting to impersonate a woman voter was reported in the Madurai West Assembly constituency. Pandian (21) of Arappalayam was arrested on the charge that he attempted to impersonate Nagarathnam, a voter of West Ponnagaram, in a booth on A.A. Road on 24 December 1984. Pandian was perhaps under the impression that Nagarathnam was a man. The presiding officer, Mr Mariappan, detected the impersonation when Pandian came to the booth, claiming to be Nagarathnam, who had been listed in the rolls as the wife of Thangavelu—The Hindu (S. Murali Krishnan, Tanjore)

CALCUTTA: Nearly 15 officers of a firm at Kamarhati in the 24 Parganas were allegedly stripped and made to march some yards towards the factory gate on 4 January. The incident created a stir in the factory and its management informed the police and a few ministers of the state government. Mr R.K. Bhattacharya, director-general of police, said that the incident was apparently a sequel to the dismissal of an employee of the firm. At about 8.30 am, a group of armed men, suspected to be followers of the dismissed employee, assembled near the factory. When the bus carrying the officials arrived, the gang intercepted it and forced the occupants to get off. The officials were then made to take off their clothes and walk up to the factory's gate—The Statesman (A.K. Guha, Bettiah)

LUCKNOW: Fifty men and women of the Tharu tribe in Balrampur constituency did not cast their votes as none of the contestants was willing to offer them a bottle of liquor. The tribals, attired in colourful costumes, led by their chief, went inside the Sukhrampur polling station in the trans-Rapti areas and expressed their demands. Since no contestant was willing to strike a deal they returned saying, "If a vote is dear to you, liquor is dearer to us"—Indian Express(Narain Dass, Chandigarh)

CALCUTTA: Mr Rajiv Gandhi might have won a massive mandate from the people of India but there is still a category of persons who aren't too sure who he is. At least this is the conclusion reached by the union law minister, Mr Asoke Sen, after an experience on the morning of 4 January. While watching the England-India cricket match at the Eden Gardens, Mr Sen received a message that the Prime Minister, Mr Gandhi, wished to talk to him. He immediately booked a call to the capital, telling the operator, "This is the union law minister and the call is for the Prime Minister." Pat came the reply, "Name please?" Slightly taken aback, the minister replied, "Asoke Sen." To his even greater surprise, the next question was, "Name of the called party?" Mr Sen immediately shot back, "Don't you know who the Prime Minister is?" He received a typically curt response, "If you do not disclose the name of the called party, the call will not be connected." A rather chastened Mr Sen then informed the operator that the Prime Minister's name was Rajiv Gandhi, after which his call was put through—The Telegraph (Jatan Lal Parakh, Calcutta)

BHUBANESWAR: Two ballot boxes containing several hundred votes of a polling booth in Kendrapara constituency fell into a river while being brought in a boat after the polling on 24 December 1984. The polling officer also feil into the river but was rescued—The Hindustan Times (Jaya Satyam, New Delhi)

HYDERABAD: The CPI mistakenly paid homage to the film actor-director, Peter Ustinov, instead of the late Soviet defence minister, Marshal Dmitri Ustinov, in an official press note released in the name of the party general secretary, Mr C. Rajeswara Rao. The CPI leaders were apparently confused between the popular actor Peter A. Ustinov who was shooting what turned out to be the last film of Indira Gandhi when she was assassinated at her residence, and the Soviet defence minister. The press note said comrade Peter Ustinov had played an important role as a minister, a Communist Party leader and party politburo member—The Times of India (Arun Khaitan, Padrauna.)

WITHOUT COMMENT

Victory deludes; and absolute victory deludes absolutely—Minhaz Merchant, on Rajiv Gandhi's landslide victory, in Gentleman

I was relying most of all on one caste—that which is gradually becoming extinct—of Indians—Amitabh Bachchan in Probe India

Antulay is an individual evil. Congress(I) is an institutionalised evil—H.N. Bahuguna in Debonair

Unless three old men—Morarji Desai, Jagjivan Ram and Charan Singh—retire completely from politics there is no hope for the country—Ram Jethmalani in Bombay

We have been left behind for 300 years in the Industrial Revolution and if we miss today there will be a gap of another 300 years—Rajiv Gandhi, on the need for introduction of new technology, in The Hindustan Times

I started my career as an actor and I must die as an actor with the tricolour draped over me. I am already a useless MP—Sivaji Ganesan in Sunday Mid-day

God is certainly not an Indian, he is an Englishman—Sunil Gavaskar, when asked about India's performance in the second innings against England at Madras

Durgaprasad

I am not modest—it takes a lot of guts to be modest—Rekha, in a CBS television programme, 60 Minutes

Give a politician a live audience of a lakh or two and he is in his element...but put him in front of a single television camera and he would freeze as if faced with Yama himself—Anil Dharker in The Sunday Observer

prize Rs 30 for the entry given first

BEGINNING 27 JANUARY 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) If you can curb your extravagant habits, you will be able to weather this bleak period. At home your children may be demanding but do not lose your temper and deal with them diplomatically. Businessmen are advised not to invest in risky ventures. Professionals, too, should be careful while dealing with their superiors. Your health will add to your worries during this period.
Good dates: 27, 30 and 2
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 7
Favourable direction: South

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) This week businessmen will get opportunities to expand their business. Professionals will also be rewarded for their sincerity. Students will get opportunities to study abroad. This is also a good week for lawyers and politicians. Financially, most of you will gain through inheritance. The period is also favourable for love and marriage negotiations.
Good dates: 31, 1 and 2
Lucky numbers: 3, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: East

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This week one of your close friends may let you down. Businessmen in particular should check all important documents before signing them. Professionals, too, should guards against their colleagues. Your economic position may worsen, but avoid borrowing money. Postpone marriage plans. Those above the age of 50 should be careful about health.
Good dates: 29, 30 and 1
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: North

CANCER (15 July—14 August) Financially, this is not a good week. you will have to borrow money to see you through this bleak period. If you are planning to change your job, do so only after consulting your elders. At home someone close to you may suddenly fall sick adding to your financial problems. Businessmen are advised not to make fresh investments.
Good dates: 27, 28 and 29
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North

LEO (15 August—14 September) This is an extremely lucky week for lovers: if you have plans to get married this is the opportune time to do so. The week is also favourable for those employed in government concerns: a promotion is in the offing. Businessmen will get opportunities to expand their business. A journey towards the end of the week will prove financially profitable. But watch your health.
Good dates: 29, 31 and 2
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: South

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) Stellar influences make this an extremely lucky week for all. Businessmen and professionals will make steady progress. Students are advised not to fritter away the chances that come their way. Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans. On the financial front, some of you may gain money from unexpected sources. However, keep a sharp eye on your health.
Good dates: 28, 29 and 30
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: North-east

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) This is not at all a good week for you. Students are warned not to neglect their studies. If you are in business and planning to expand it, postpone such plans by at least a week. Professionals too will have to weather adverse circumstances. Enemies will be active during this phase. Your health too will bother you.
Good dates: 28, 30 and 31
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 3
Favourable direction: East

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) Lovers will find their parents extremely sympathetic to their cause this week. Businessmen and professionals will make steady headway. At home, your children will perform extremely well in their examinations. However, you may be misunderstood by an elderly member of your family. Your health will continue to bother you.
Good dates: 27, 30 and 1
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: West

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) Financial gains from unexpected sources are in store for you this week. A word of advice: save something for the rainy days ahead. A promotion cannot be ruled out for professionals. However, businessmen should avoid risky ventures. If you are unemployed and looking for a job there are chances that you will find one. Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans.
Good dates: 28, 31 and 2
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 4
Favourable direction: South-west

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) This is a week of mixed fortunes. Professionals are advised to deal with their superiors diplomatically. Businessmen should guard against deception. This is not a good phase to settle disputes regarding property matters. This is also not a favourable period for lovers. However, the week is good for creative artists and sportsmen.
Good dates: 30, 31 and 1
Lucky numbers: 1, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: South-east

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) Financially this is a lucky week and you will be able to repay most of your debts. But refrain from lending money. The domestic front will remain peaceful. Friends and relatives will prove very helpful this week. On the professional front, however, you are likely to face opposition from your colleagues. Love and marriage are not well signified.
Good dates: 27, 29 and 30
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: North-west

PISCES (15 March—14 April) The stars are favourable to all of you this week. Professionals and businessmen are advised to push their efforts to the utmost. For those in love, this is the week when you could decide on marriage. At home your children will be a source of inspiration. Social engagements will keep you busy during the week-end but keep a sharp eye on your health and diet.
Good dates: 30, 1 and 2
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: South

For those born on the 28th, 29th and 30th of any month:

Most of you are egoistic by nature. Your propensity to dictate over others arises from your leadership qualities. This, to an extent, makes you unpopular. Some of you tend to indulge in fanciful thoughts and spend a lot of time daydreaming: you do not hesitate to take crucial decisions. Women born during this period are usually extremely fair and they make good housewives.

VARIETY

CHESS

Despite the proliferation of chess literature during the past decade or so, the number of major carriers of chess news has scarcely changed. At the end of last year a new attempt was initiated to provide an effective and regular information and news service for chess enthusiasts, in the shape of Chess Express, a fortnightly newspaper written by chessplayers for chessplayers. One can only hope that it will be able to establish a viable circulation.

Published by Panther House, Mount Pleasant, London W1, at 65p or £14 annually for 26 issues, it is fairly priced and strongly to be recommended for those with an active interest in the game. The opening issue featured all the games from this year's BBC2 series 'The Master Game', including the following typically powerful display by the world champion.

White: A. Karpov. Black: W. Browne. Hedgehog Defence.

1 P–QB4	P–QB4	2 N–KB3	N–KB3
3 N–QB3	P–K3	4 P–KN3	P–QN3
5 B–N2	B–N2	6 O–O	B–K2
7 P–Q4	PxP	8 QxP	P–Q3
9 B–N5	P–QR3	10 BxN!

Browne (Black)

Karpov (White) to move

Andersson's idea, which makes Black's life in the hedgehog a real misery

10 . . .	BxB	11 Q–B4	QBxN
12 BxB	R–R2	13 KR–Q1	B–K4
14 Q–Q2	O–O

An early game in this line between Andersson and Browne went 14 . . . R–B2 15 P–QN3? P–QN4 with advantage for Black, but 15 N–K4 is a clear improvement.

15 QR–B1 P–QN4?! DIAGRAM

Apparently securing easy equality for if 16 PxP PxP 17 NxP RxP. Karpov quickly dispels the illusion

16 Q–K3!	R–Q2	17 PxP	PxP
18 P–QN4!	BxN	19 RxB	P–Q4

20 Q–B5

White already has a virtually won game. The QNP is a fatal weakness.

20 . . .	Q–B3	21 R(Q)–QB1	P–Q5
22 R–Q3	P–K4	23 QxNP	Q–K3
24 R–B5	R–K2	25 B–Q5	Q–Q3
26 P–QR4	K–R1	27 Q–B4	Q–Q1
28 P–R5	N–Q2	29 R–B6	P–K5

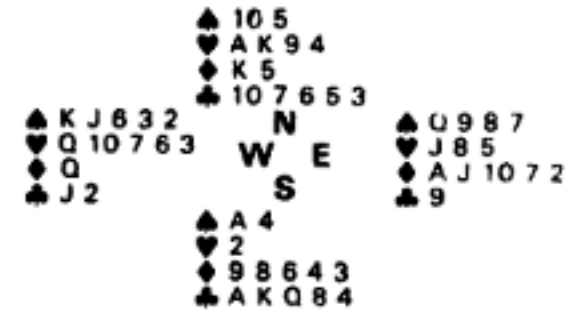
A desperate attempt to swindle an exchange (after which Black would still be lost). Alas, it does not even work.

30 RxP N–K4 31 Q–B5! Resigns.

After 31 . . . NxR 32 BxN Q–B2 33 R–Q7! wreaks havoc.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE



Your side is vulnerable and you hold as South:

♠ A 4
♥ 2
♦ 9 8 6 4 3
♣ A K Q 8 4

The bidding begins:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
—	No	No	1♦
2♣	dble	No	2♦
No	2♠	4♣	No
?

West's double of Two Clubs was of the negative kind, so presumably he holds spades and hearts. How do you assess the position now? Note that partner passed the double of Two Clubs but has now leapt to Four Clubs. Does that sound particularly weak? I don't think so at all. This was a critical deal near the end of the semi-final between France and Italy in the world championship.

South passed Four Clubs, missing an easy game. Phillip Alder wrote in the Bridge Magazine: 'Of course the error was Mosca's (North's) in passing the negative double of Two Clubs.' It is true that North might have redoubled, but surely, if he had been weak, he would have jumped at once to Four Clubs. I think that the missed game was entirely South's fault: with his five low diamonds, the suit bid on his right, the hand was surely going to play well.

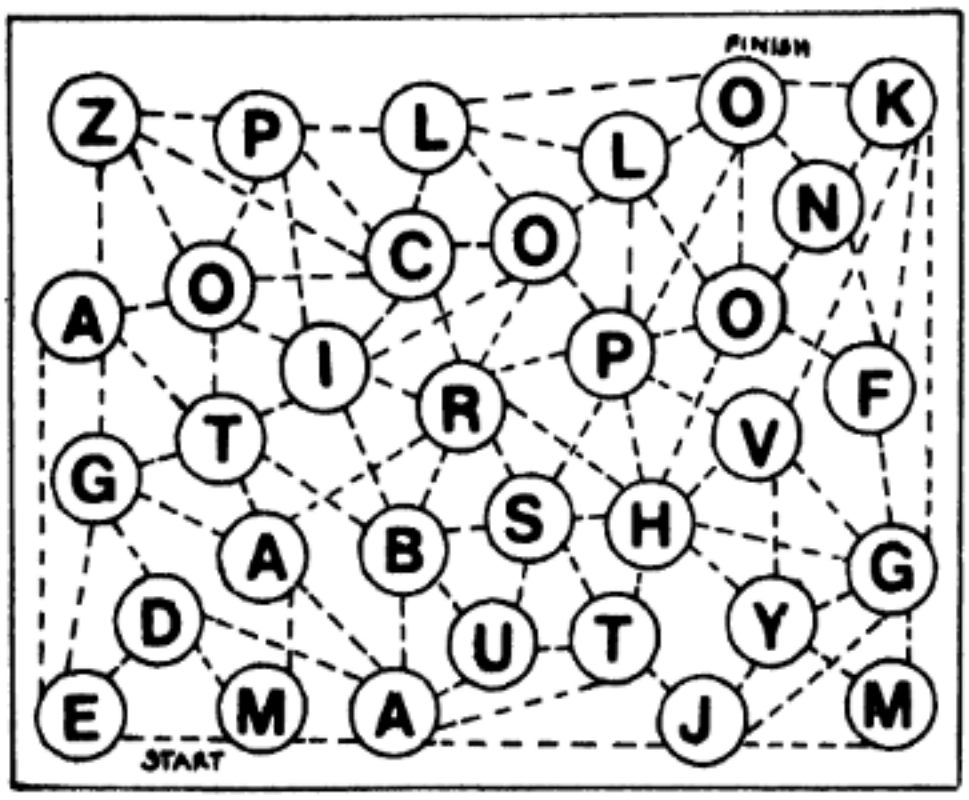
It looked as though the Italians had missed a chance, but it didn't turn out that way. At the other table West opened 2NT, which apparently signified a major two-suiter, and East jumped to Four Spades. South bid 4NT and North, not unreasonably, responded Six Clubs. This was beaten by the lead of ace and another diamond. Unlucky for the French; if they had played in Five Clubs they would probably have won the match.

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. What do Prussia, Estonia, South Vietnam, Lithuania and Tibet have in common?
2. In astronomy, what are Brown Dwarfs?
3. Who is the oldest man to play first-class cricket?
4. Where in the human body is the patella?
5. What are jarns, quimp, grawlix and nittles?
6. Which town or city is known as the Venice of the East?
7. Whose dying words were: "I thank God I have done my duty"?
8. Name the largest manufacturing company in the world.
9. Which indoor game was invented in 1931 by Alfred M. Butts and developed by James Brunot in 1948?
10. Where in India is Kanha National Park?
11. What is the longest palindromic word in the English language?
12. With which British governor-general in India do you associate the Doctrine of Lapse?
13. What does the term "to have a broken feather" mean?
14. Name the oldest known walled town or city in the world?



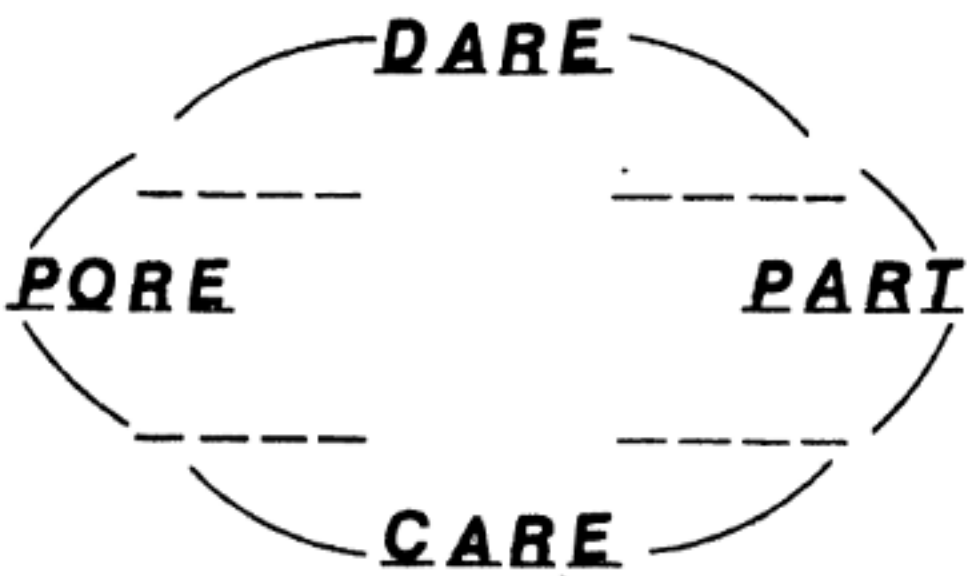
ANSWERS

1. They are all countries which lost their independence in the 20th century.
2. Stars smaller than the Sun, formed of gas which have failed to ignite.
3. C.K. Nayudu at the age of 68 in 1963.
4. In the knee. It is actually the medical name for the knee-cap.
5. Different kinds of squiggles used by characters in comics to denote abusive language.
6. Alappey, in Kerala.
7. The English naval hero Horatio Nelson.
8. General Motors Corporation, the car manufacturers.
9. Scrabble.
10. Madhya Pradesh.
11. Redivider—9 letters. The word Malayalam also has nine letters.
12. Lord Dalhousie.
13. To be associated with a scandal.
14. Jericho or Arlha, believed to be over 10,000 years old.

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Personality Plus



The name of a famous person can be spelt out in the maze above by proceeding from the start and moving on to adjacent letters, without backtracking. The clues given below may help. Can you name the person?

1. This personality was born a Venetian in 1254 when both his father and uncle were in China.
2. Later, when he was 21 years old he accompanied his father to China and ended up as the governor of Yangchow.
3. He returned home by way of Sumatra, India and Persia in the train of a Mongol princess.
4. He commanded a fleet fitted out against Genoa.
5. He dictated an account of his travels while he was a prisoner.

Give yourself points according to the chart:

Without any clue (within a minute)	30
Without any clue (longer than a minute)	26—29
With first clue:	21—25
With second clue:	16—20
Third clue:	11—15
Fourth clue:	6—10
Fifth clue:	1—5

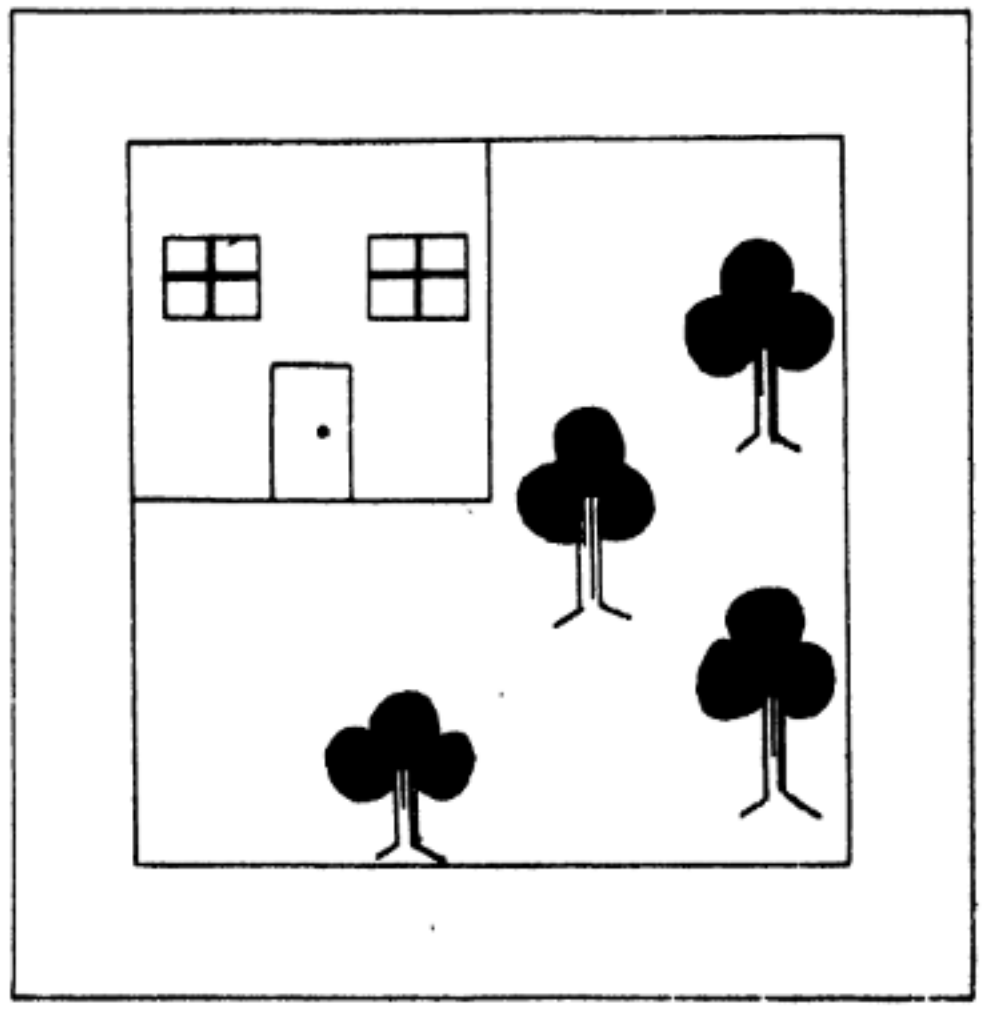
Word Power

Can you complete this chain of words by filling in the blanks, changing only one letter at a time?

What's in a Word

Here's food for thought. Can you replace the blanks with something edible to finish the words? For example S — — — POO, becomes S H A M POO with the blanks replaced with H A M

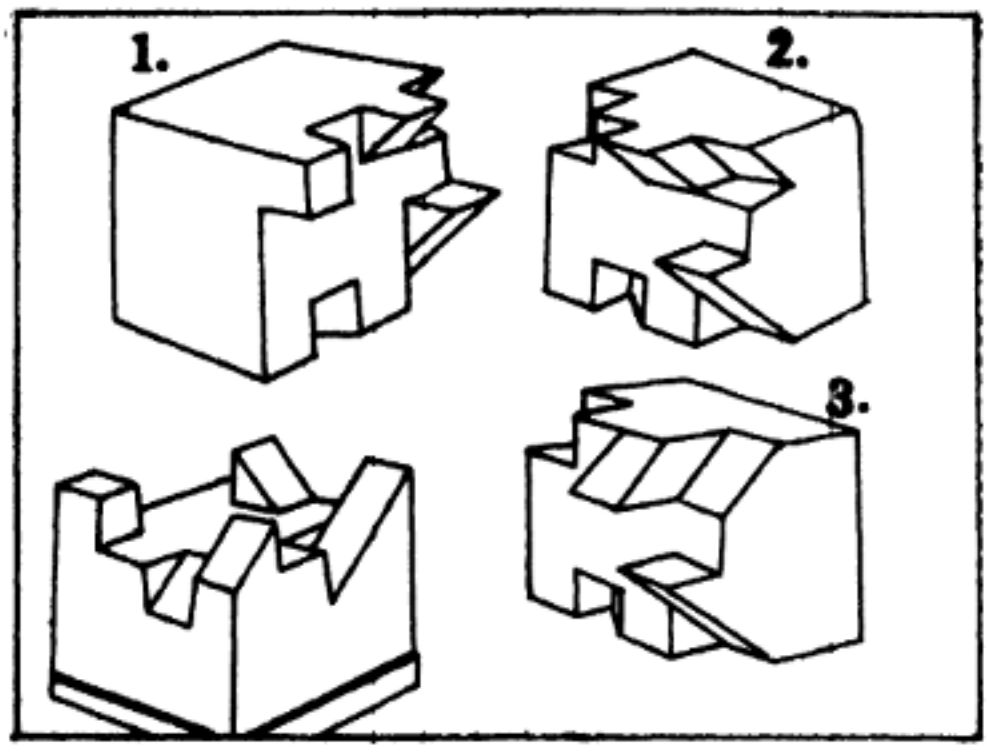
S — — — — L E
— — — — A N T
— — — G L E
S — — — — — E D
T — — — — P S



Witsharpener

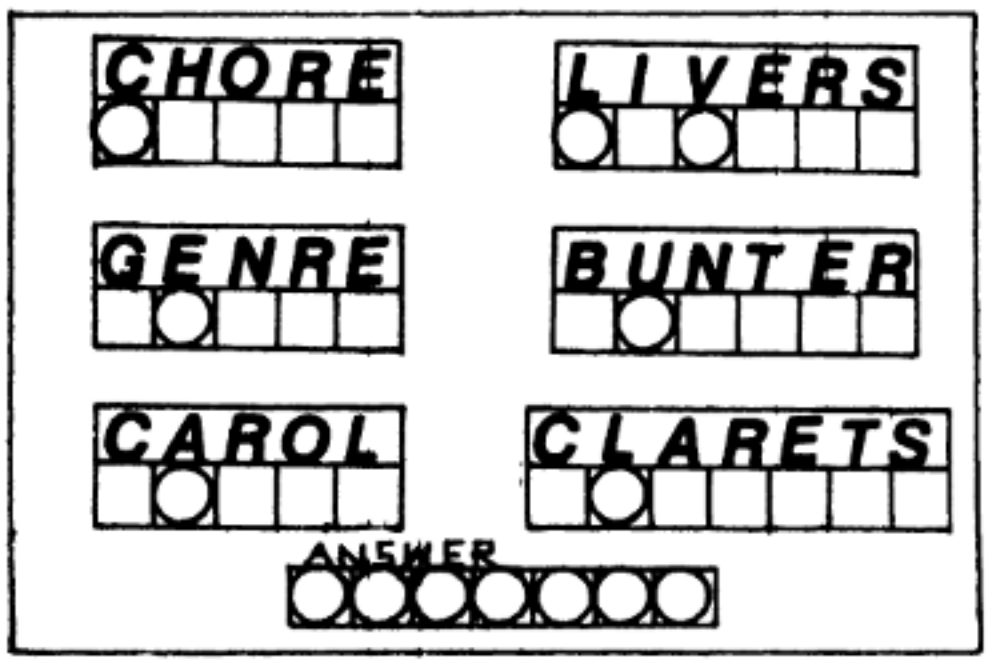
Three couples live in the same area but it is not clear who is married to whom. The names of the husbands are Govind, Rajiv and Aditya, while the wives are called Priya, Bina and Gayatri. We know that:

a) Rajiv lives next door to Priya and works in a shop.
b) Bina's husband is the only one who lives next door to his place or work.
c) Aditya's son used to cycle across to help Bina's children with their homework.
d) All the men work in the same factory



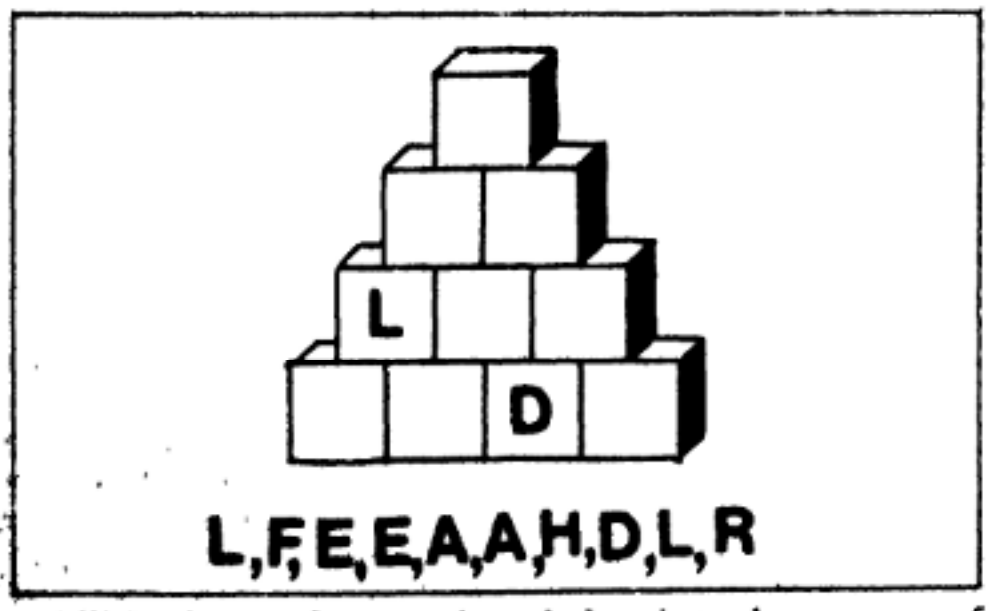
Can you work out who the couples are?

Figure it Out



When Mr Saighal died, he left his property to be equally divided among his four sons. This property consisted of a large house situated in one corner of a square plot, and in the garden grew four mango trees. His sons found that they could very easily divide the house into four identical flats. However, the division of the land proved to be more difficult. But in the end they figured out a way of dividing it into four equal plots which were not only alike in shape but also contained one of the mango trees. Can you figure out how they did this?

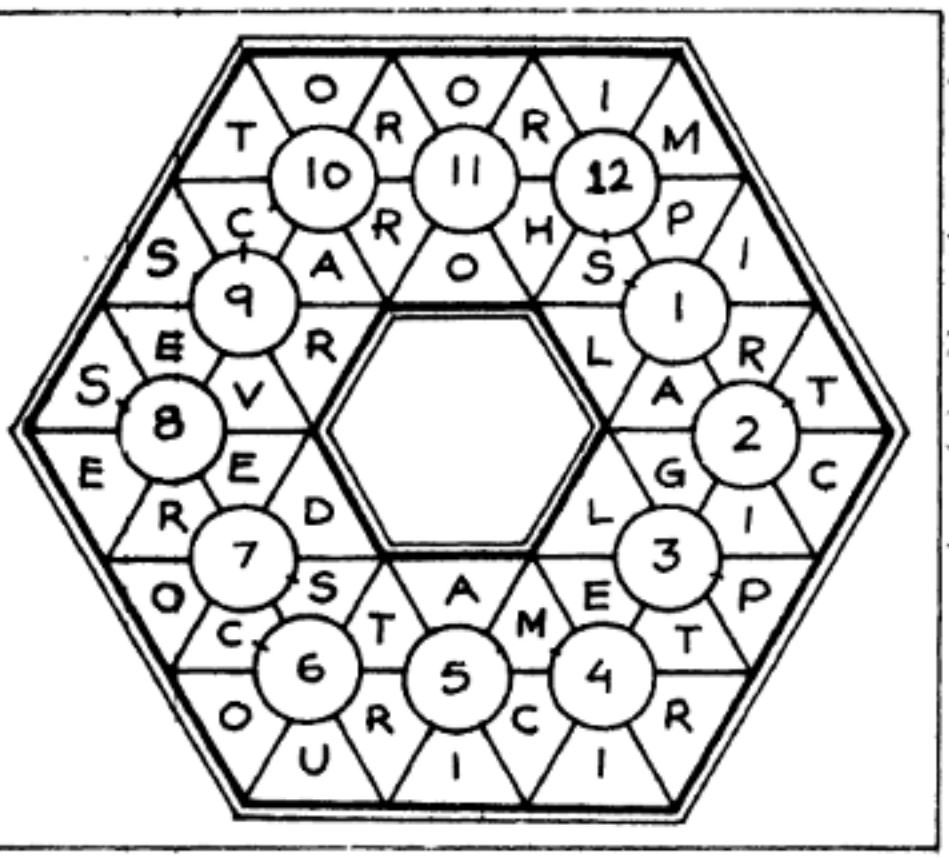
Shape Sleuth



A marble pedestal has broken into two. The base is easily recognised, but can you say which of the other three numbered pieces will fit into it?

Scrambles

Unscramble the letters in each line to form six (6) words. When you have done this, the circled letters rearranged will give you an idea of what all this is about.

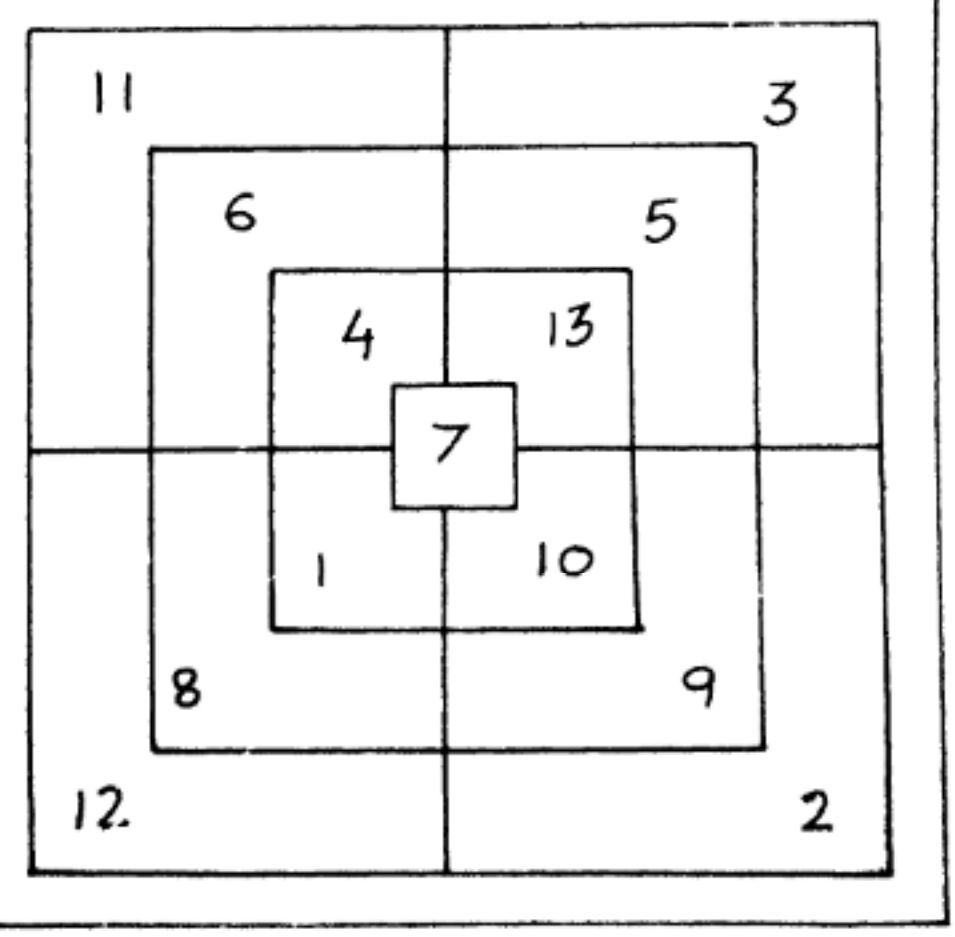


Blockbuster

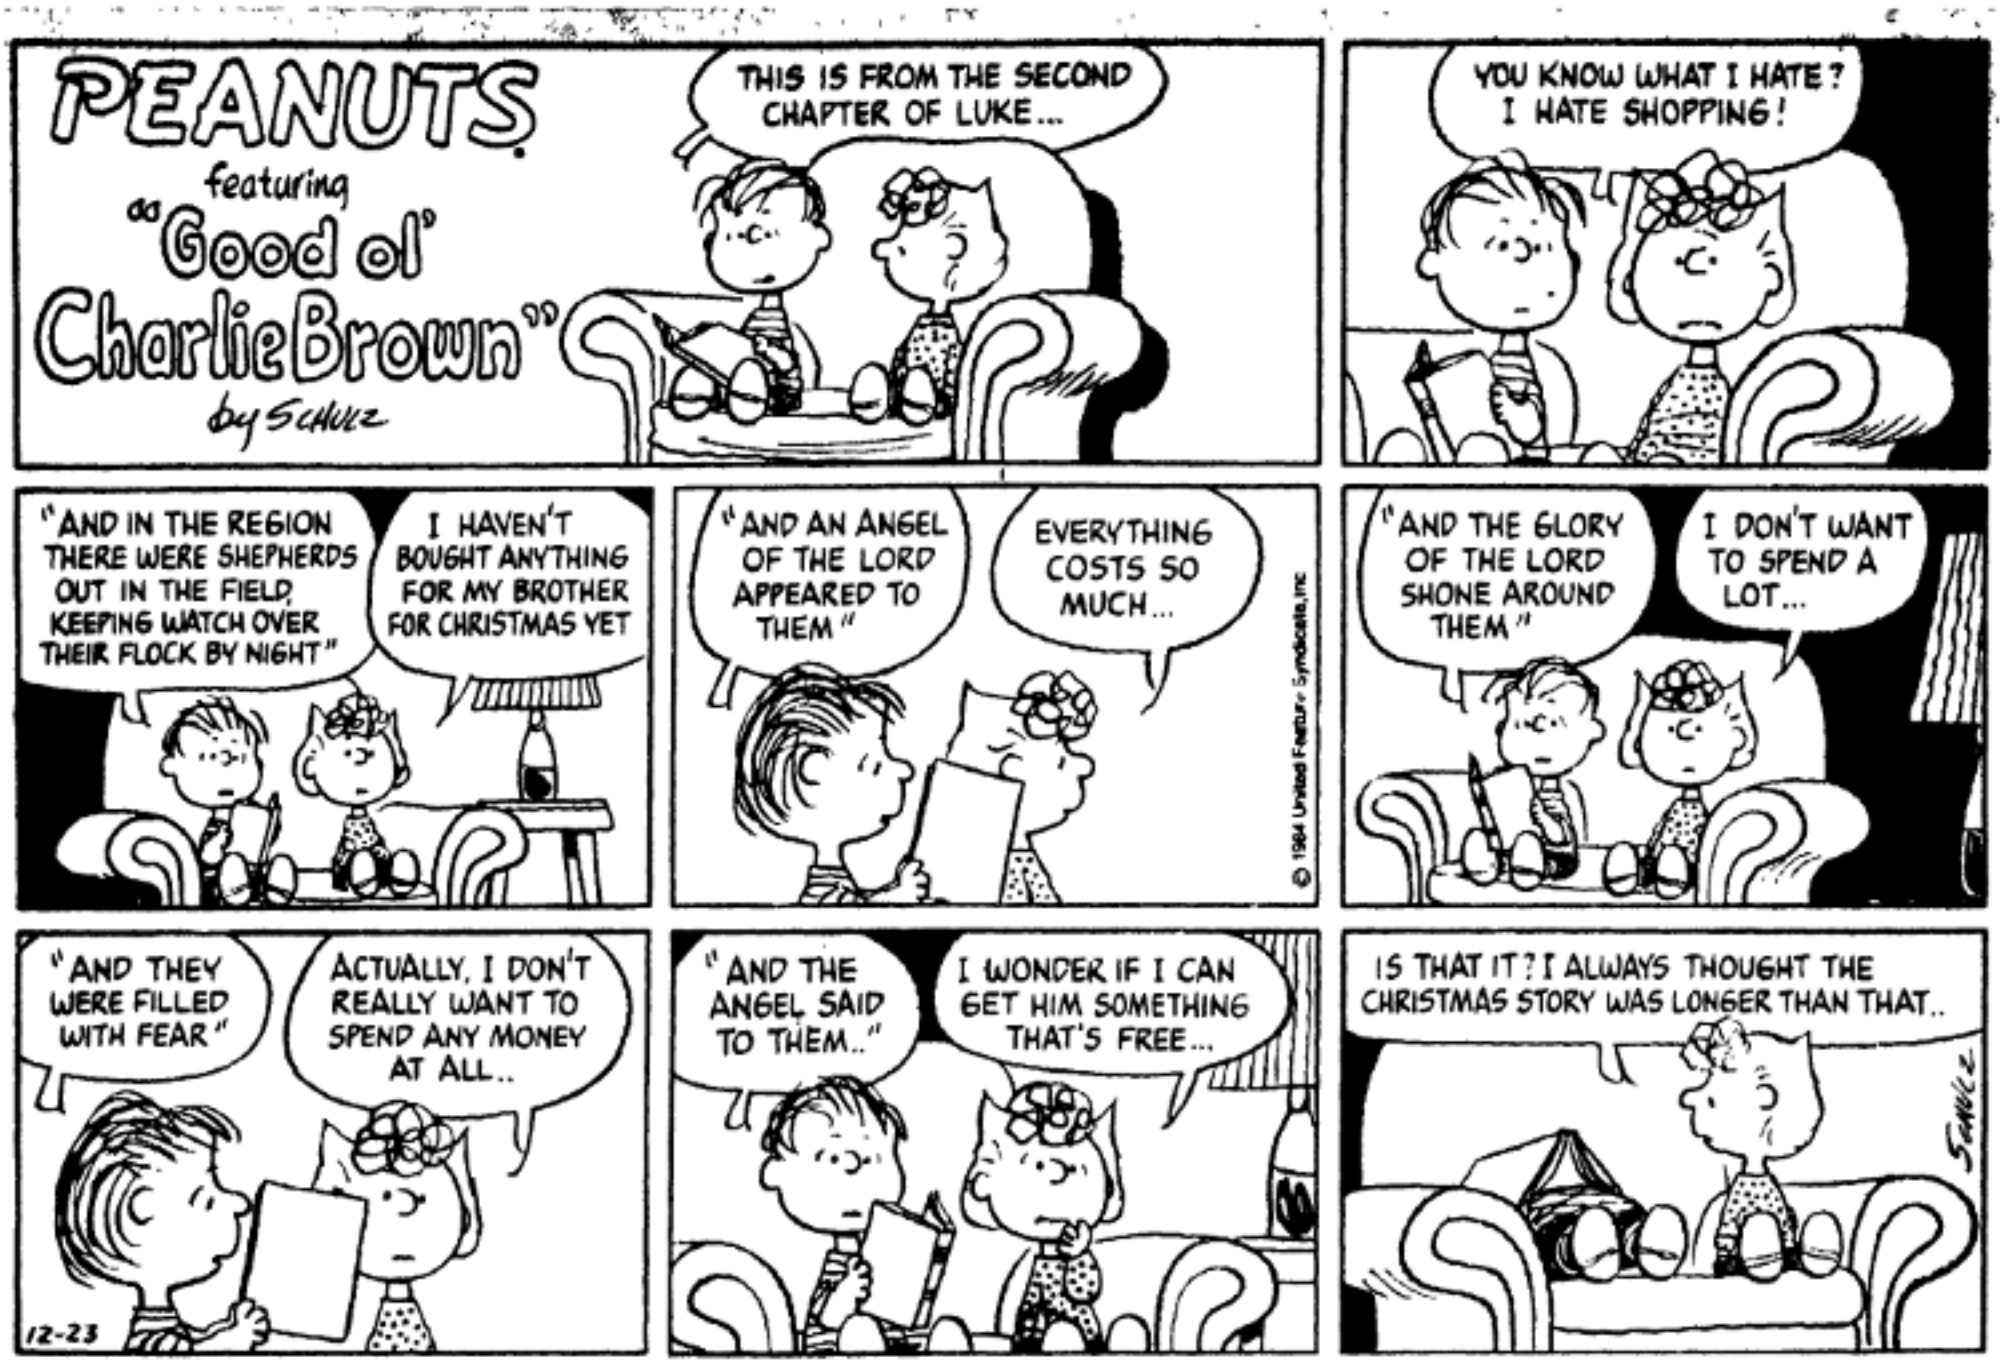
Fill in the ten letters given below into the squares of the blank pyramid so that these form eight four-letter words reading downwards.

Solutions to last week's Teasers:

Wordplay:



Namegame:
Indira Gandhi
Mark Spitz
Carl Lewis
Nadia Comaneci
Lady Diana
Amitabh Bachchan



Quizbizz:
Some of the items are: sandals, shoes, skies, ski-boots, skates, socks, slippers, sneakers, snowshoes, stockings, spurs, soles, etc.

Wit Sharpener:
If a traingle with a thin outline falls inside a triangle, then it belongs to Group 1. The solitary figure, therefore, belongs to Group 2.

What's in a word:
Lemon: A dud, specially a car.
Prune: Cut down, as in a plant
Bananas: To go bananas, means to go slightly mad.
Apple: A satellite or a computer company.
Pineapple: A hand grenade.
Mandarin: An officer under the Chinese empire.
Raspberry: Black eye.

Figure it out:

SCIENCE

Eat Olives to Purge the Body

Scientists joke that Americans are no longer fit to be eaten, because of the unnatural chemicals quartered inside them. A recent study of 3,000 Americans found at least one kind of insecticide in the blood of 99 per cent of those surveyed.

The study used a new technique, called computer-assisted gas-chromatic mass spectrometry, which can detect one part per billion of fluid—akin to pin-pointing a grain of salt in a large swimming pool. In one sweep, it can check for 19 chlorinated insecticides (eg, DDT), a range of chlorinated phenols (PCPs), various herbicides and fungicides and so called volatile organics. The company that invented it, Enviro-Health Systems of Dallas, Texas, USA, went public this week in Britain and Canada, hoping to raise over $1m for an issue of 850,000 shares.

The company thinks patients will pay to be told about the toxins they harbour in their bodies, because of increasing evidence that even very tiny doses of certain chemicals may be mildly harmful. A recent paper in the journal Clinical Ecology, co-authored by Dr William Rea, a private doctor, and Dr John Laseter, pioneer of the Enviro-Health tests, claimed a connection between slightly higher levels of chlorinated insecticides in the blood and lower scores on IQ tests.

The Enviro-Health tests take a small sample of blood, and strip out a particular fraction (exactly how depends on the chemicals being sought). The residue is then turned into a gas and run through a microscopically thin, 100-metre-long glass tube lined with a liquid designed to extract chemicals in order of their volatility—a sophisticated version of the process commonly used to distil spirits. Each chemical compound can be counted by a machine called a mass spectrometer. The price of a test is $75.

Dr Jean Munro is using the technique at London's Nightingale Hospital. In tests for chlorinated insecticides she is finding relatively high levels of DDT-derived chemicals. Yet DDT is banned in Britain. She says it probably piggy-backs in on imported foodstuffs and lingers in the food chain for years.

Given time the body purges itself. But instead of passing out of the body, foreign chemicals sometimes lodge in the fat, where they can reach concentrations 300 times as high as in the blood. Contaminated fat needs to be replaced through a regime of exercise and fasting. This increases the flow of toxins in the blood and, in theory, out of the body. There are two snags, however.

First, while such chemicals lodging in the fat are fairly harmless, thrown back into the bloodstream they can be lethal. So the rehabilitation must be gradual. Second, the fat-loving toxins would prefer to return to the fat. What are needed are chemical escorts that are harmless to man and that will grab the toxins but will not themselves be absorbed by the body. Vegetable and mineral oils seem to work well. Because they resemble fats, they entice the toxins to bind on, and be swept out of the body. The Enviro-Health tests can be used to measure how well different oils work. The moral. eat olives.

By arrangement with* The Economist

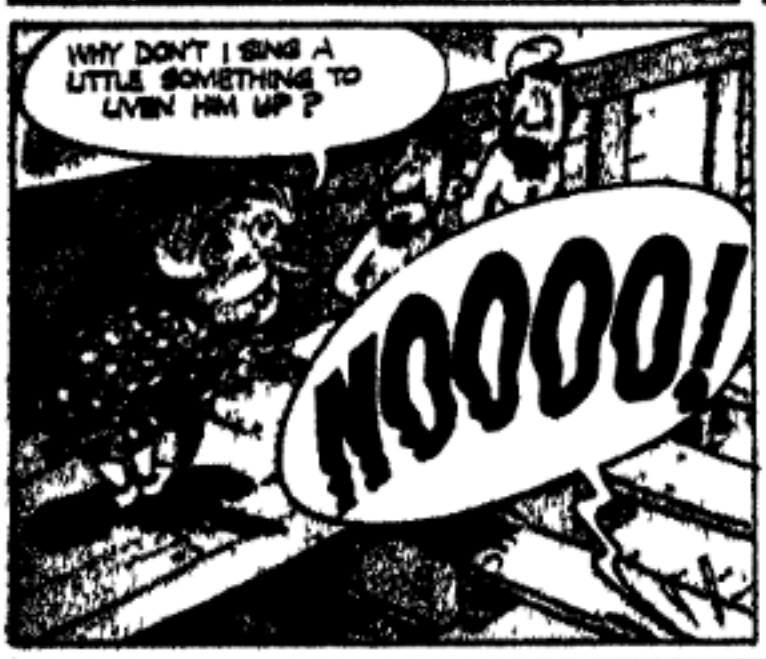
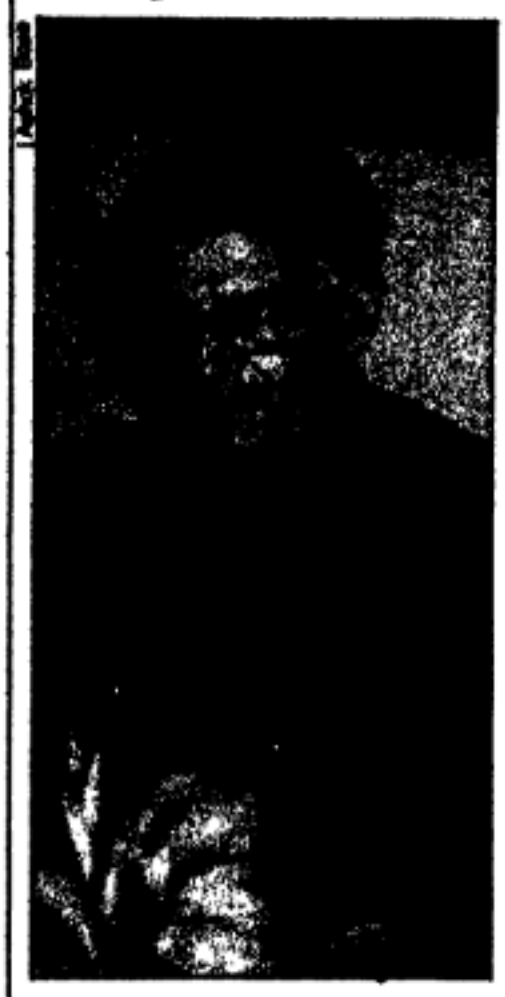
Asterix



THE GLADIATOR BY GOSCINNY AND UNDERZO



DELHI DIARY

Babysitter

Khurshid Alam Khan

The only ministry which looks confused today is the foreign office. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is the external affairs minister and Khurshid Alam Khan is the minister of state. The cabinet-ranking chairman of the policy planning committee, G. Parthasarathy, popularly known as "GP," is the de facto ministerial boss. One of the three parliamentary secretaries, Oscar Fernandes, is also likely to be assigned to this ministry. This has left the officers confused. Whose orders should they seek? Meanwhile, there is also confusion about the level of representation in the forthcoming Indo-Soviet joint commission meetings. From the Russian side, so far Deputy Premier Arkhipov has chaired. If Khurshid Alam Khan is nominated, then the Soviet representation will also be downgraded. If G. Parthasarathy is sent, then Mr Khan will have to look after GP's baby in Parliament, without having any role in the meeting itself. According to the diplomatic grapevine, Mr Khan is GP's "babysitter."

Descendant of Raj

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is a descendant of Raj. "Raj" here does not refer to the British rule. The first "Nehru," whose clan has now almost become a hereditary (elected) ruling family, somewhat on the lines of the Hapsburgs of Europe, was called Raj. In 1716, the Mughal ruler Farukhsiyar visited the Kashmir valley and was impressed by a Kashmiri scholar, Pandit Raj Kaul. He invited Raj Kaul to settle down in Delhi and the family was granted a jagir of a few villages and a house next to the nahar (canal), which ran through the imperial capital then. Thus the "Nehru" or "Kaul-Nehru" family was born, which was to one day rule over the country from Delhi. Pandit Raj Kaul, however, did not have an easy time in the city. Within three years of his migrating to Delhi, emperor Farukhsiyar's reign came to an abrupt end and political patronage of the Kaul-Nehrus was short-lived. When the mutiny broke out in Delhi in 1857, the then head of the family Ganga Dhar Nehru, was a police officer. After the British recaptured Delhi, Ganga Dhar Nehru, father of Motilal Nehru, migrated to Agra. From there the family, after brief periods of stay at Khetri (Rajasthan) and Kanpur, moved to Allahabad. The history of the descendants of Pandit Raj Kaul after they settled down at Allahabad in the late nineteenth century, is almost the history of India: Motilal, Jawaharlal, Indira Gandhi, Sanjay Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi having dominated the politics of the subcontinent in their historical periods.

Whose Symbol?

The symbol-tussle in the opposition has begun all over again. In Maharashtra, the Janata Party wants to contest the forthcoming Assembly polls in alliance with Sharad Pawar's Congress (Socialist), Peasants and Workers' Party and the Communists. The BJP is anathema now but it wants all opposition candidates to have a common symbol: the Janata's "chakra haldhar." Sharad Pawar has offered the "charkha" of the Congress(S) as an alternative. But he is on a weak wicket. While the Congress(S) is a national party recognised by the election commission, its general secretary, Ambika Soni, lost her deposit at Meerut recently on the Janata symbol. If a general secretary of the Congress(S) can accept the Janata symbol, why can't Sharad Pawar?

Sharad Pawar

Diplomatic Move

The appointment of Dr Arjun Sengupta as India's executive director at the International Monetary Fund's office in Washington is a diplomatic move. Dr Sengupta was special secretary in Mrs Gandhi's team, looking after economic matters. He was a student of George Shultz, the present American secretary of state, at Harvard. Dr Sengupta's tenure in Washington, therefore, may see some improvement in Indo-US ties. During Mrs Gandhi's last trip to the USA, Dr Sengupta's Shultz connection had been put to good use. Arjun Sengupta is no stranger to diplomacy, having served in the Seventies as economic counsellor. One hopes better Indo-US understanding will be an outcome of this.

The Stable One

Arun Singh

While Arun Nehru has been deprived of his self-assumed number two position in the Rajiv Gandhi hierarchy, has Arun Singh been demoted? When two more parliamentary secretaries were sworn in addition to Arun Singh, there was talk in some circles that he too had been demoted. While two youth leaders, Oscar Fernandes and Ahmed Patel (both were joint secretaries of the AICC) have become parliamentary secretaries, the person who is going to sit in the room next to the Prime Minister in South Block is Arun Singh. He remains as important as before. Only his burden has become lighter, with Fernandes and Patel also helping out the Prime Minister with parliamentary work.

S.E. Nizamuddin

RADEUS AMC 1 83

NEW!
Amul Chocolates in attractive cartons

Soft and creamy, like Swiss chocolates ...

its creaminess sealed in silver foil ...

and foil-board carton to keep it fresh.

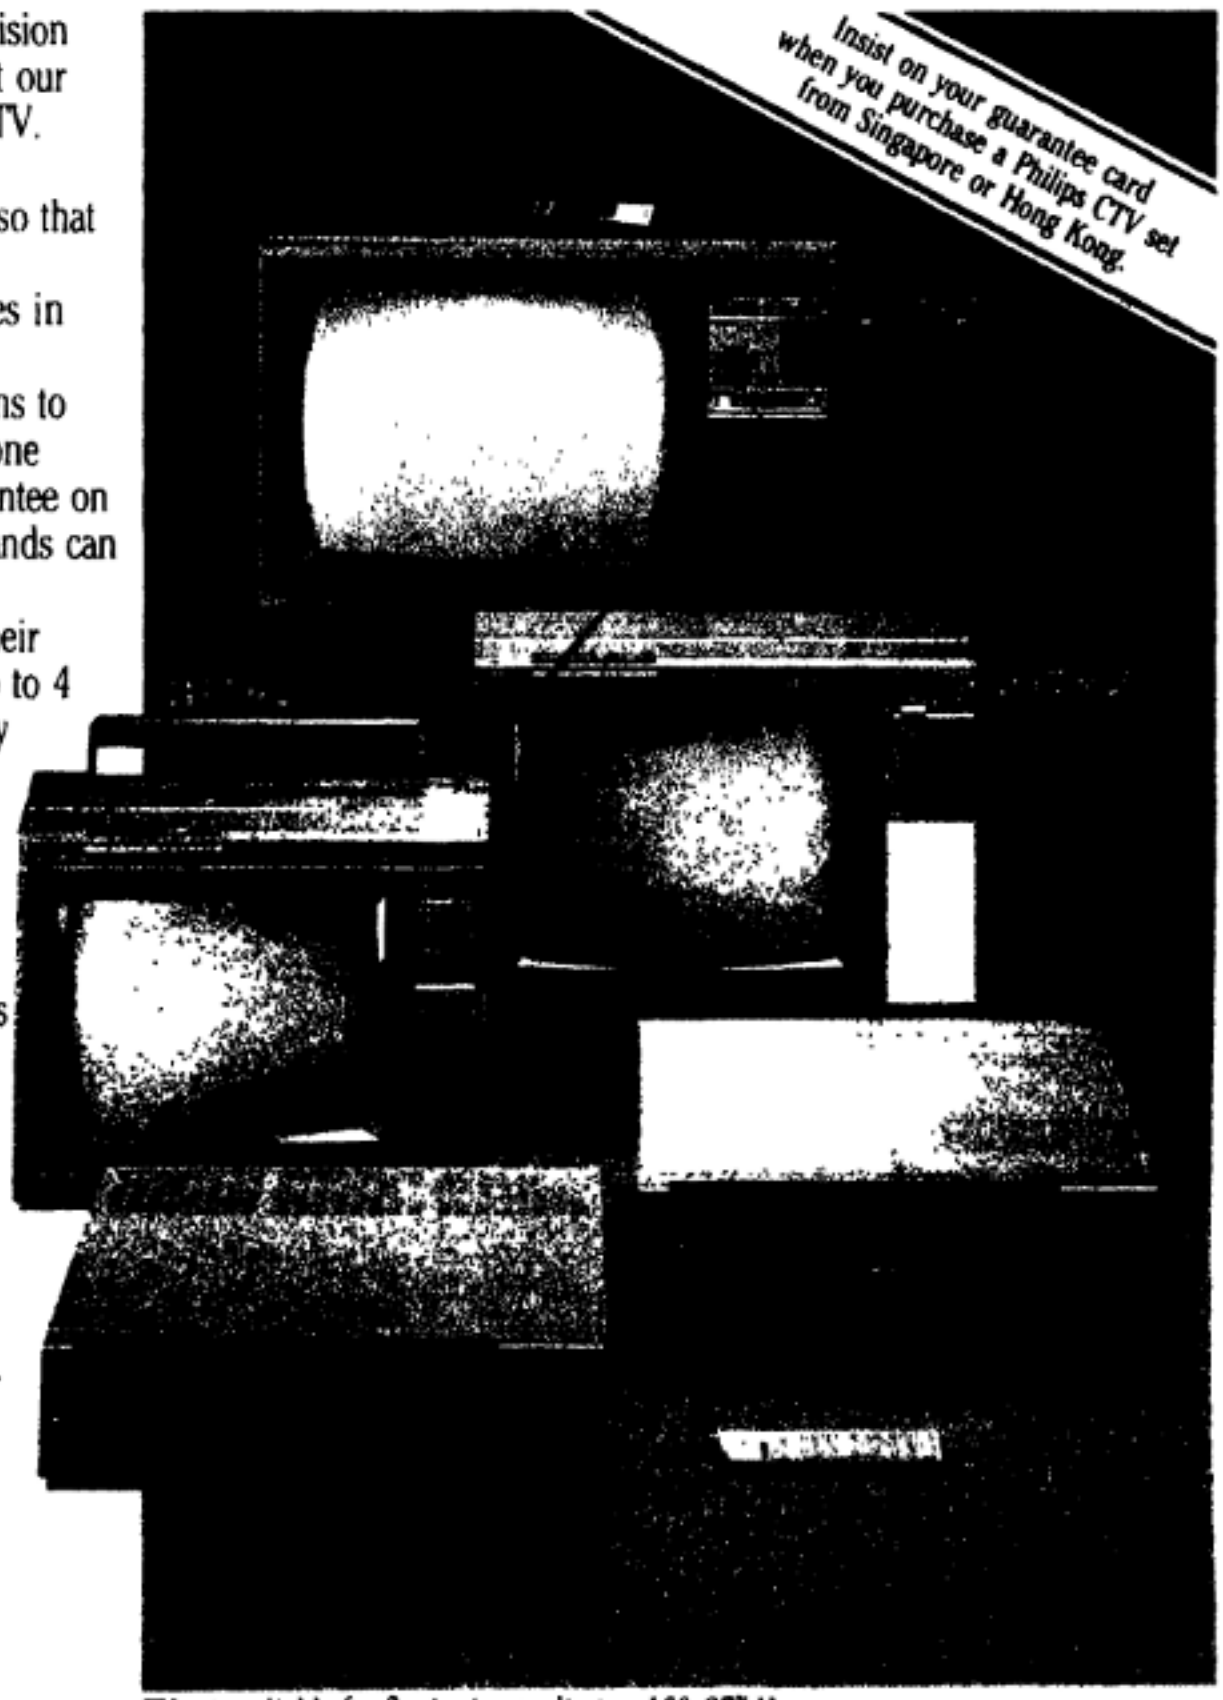
Amul CHOCOLATES
A gift for someone you love

Sunday Weekly 27 January 1985 Regd. No WB CC 256 TN MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680

THE SHERWANI RANGE FROM RAYMOND'S

STOP PRESS: PHILIPS HAS PRODUCED ITS 100 MILLIONTH TV SET. IT'S ANOTHER GUARANTEE FOR PROBLEM-FREE VIEWING.

Philips have made a 100 million television sets, so naturally we know more about what our customers want and appreciate in a colour TV.



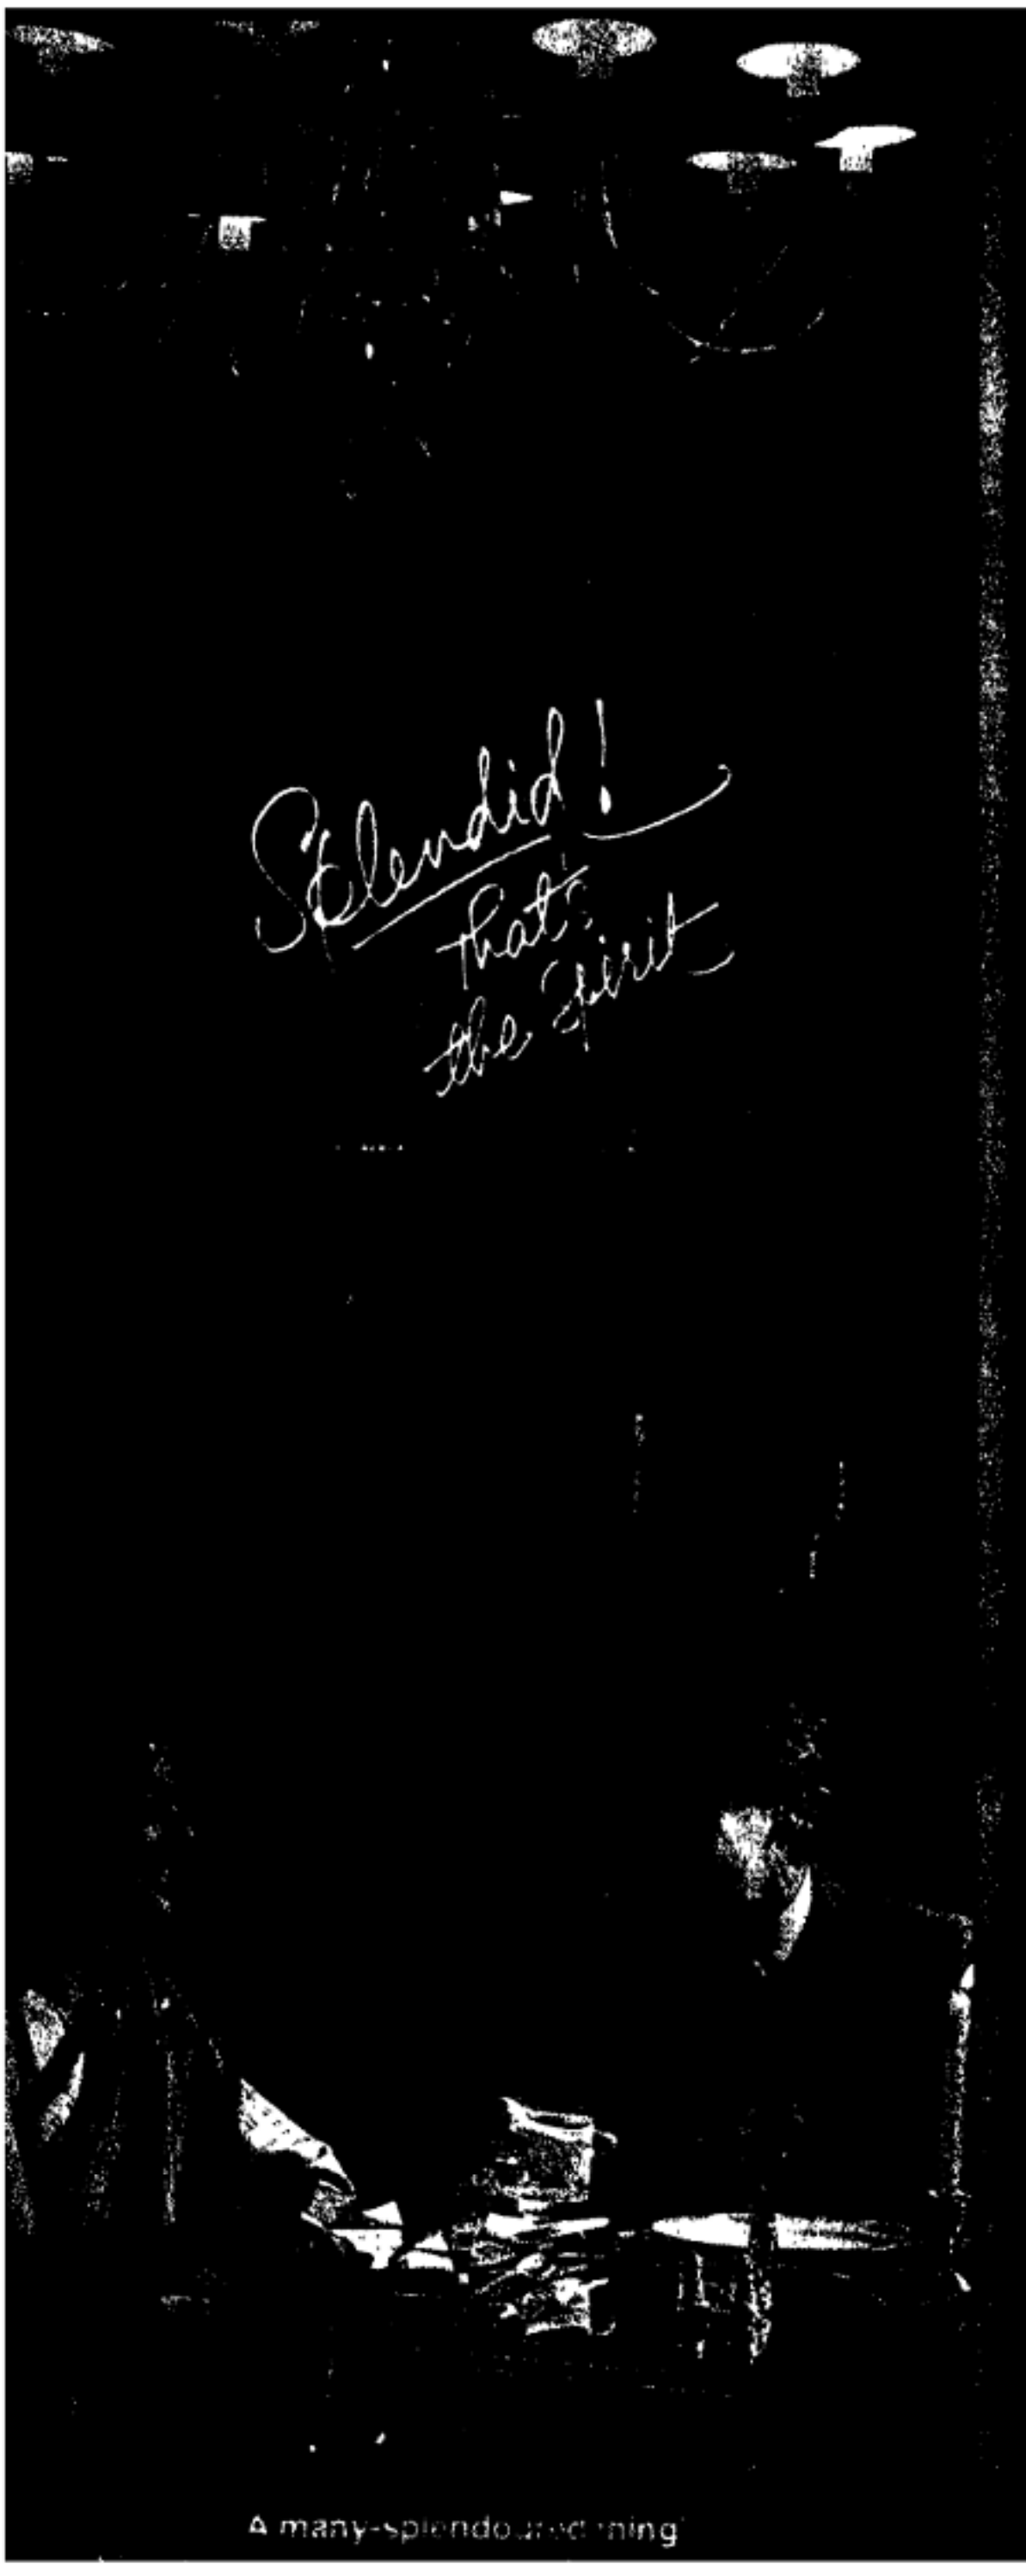
For example, every Philips is FULLY TROPICALISED against heat and humidity, so that you can enjoy problem-free viewing.

What's more, all Philips service centres in India* are fully equipped with sophisticated instruments, with overseas-trained technicians to care for your Philips if you happen to buy one from Singapore or Hong Kong. Plus a guarantee on after sales service that none of the other brands can match!

Philips VCRs come in two models: Their features include high-speed video search, up to 4 hours recording, auto play-back, time display and pre-programming for one event 7 days in advance.

For colour televisions, a range of models are available from 14", 16" or 20", with or without remote control. All the models have these common features: Philips famous natural colour from our equally famous Hi-Bri picture tube, Quickstart, and higher brightness level for more contrast, VCR adaptations on all channels, 4 watts sound output, Automatic Fine Tuning for sharp pictures, low power consumption.

Plus superior quality and service that comes from being the largest TV manufacturer in the world.



TV sets suitable for fluctuating voltages: 160-275 V.

* Philips service centres in India.
39/43 Nesbit Road, Mazgaon, Bombay 400 010. Tel: 8725528.
2 Heysham Road, Calcutta 700 020. Tel 473621
3 Haddows Road, Madras 600 006. Tel: 812341/7
66 Janpath, New Delhi 110 001. Tel: 321125.

PHILIPS

Released for information only by:
Philips Singapore Pte Ltd., Lorong 1, Toa Payoh, Singapore 1231 and Philips Hong Kong Limited, 27th-29th Floor, Hopewell Centre, Hong Kong

PHILIPS

DELUXE

RICH MATURE MELLOW
TO BLEND SMOOTHLY WITH YOUR STYLE

Phipson

A many-splendo[illegible]ning

3—9 FEBRUARY 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 □ ISSUE 13 □ RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

Bureaucrat, Diplomat, Industrialist, Spy

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya traces the nexus among the four in the light of the recent spy scandal.

Decline of the Bureaucracy

A special correspondent analyses how businessmen from national and multinational firms and arms dealers can get their way into the government through bribes.

The KGB and the CIA in India

A report on how foreign agencies operate in India.

BOOK EXTRACT 46

Captain Rajiv

Tariq Ali writes on Rajiv and Sanjay Gandhi in this extract from his book, The Nehrus and the Gandhis: An Indian Dynasty.

Page 14

Page 46

Page 32

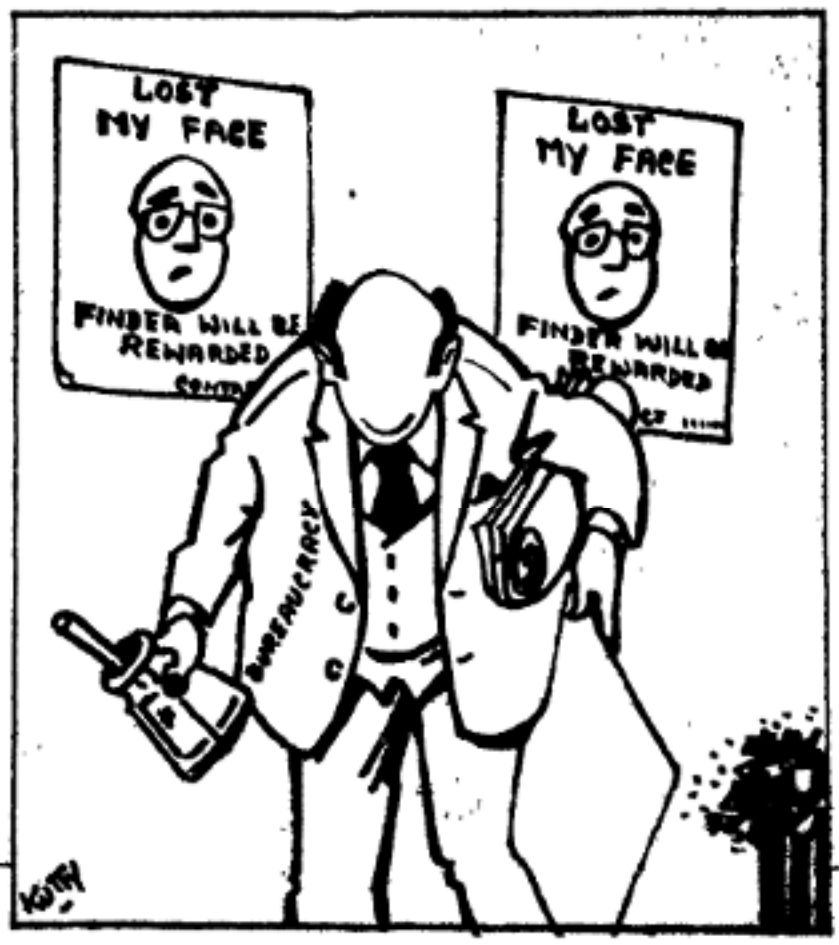
SPECIAL REPORT 32

Jayalalitha's Revolt

On 20 January the infighting within the ruling AIADMK in Tamil Nadu came into the open with Jayalalitha being stripped of her status as deputy leader of the AIADMK parliamentary group. Jayalalitha hit back by accusing the ruling coterie of misusing their powers. A report from Anita Pratap. Plus an exclusive interview with Jayalalitha.

COMMENT

Dateline M. J. Akbar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 8
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12



NEWS 53

At the Receiving End
Earthshaking Events

VARIETY

Science 65
Khaas Baat 66
This India 67

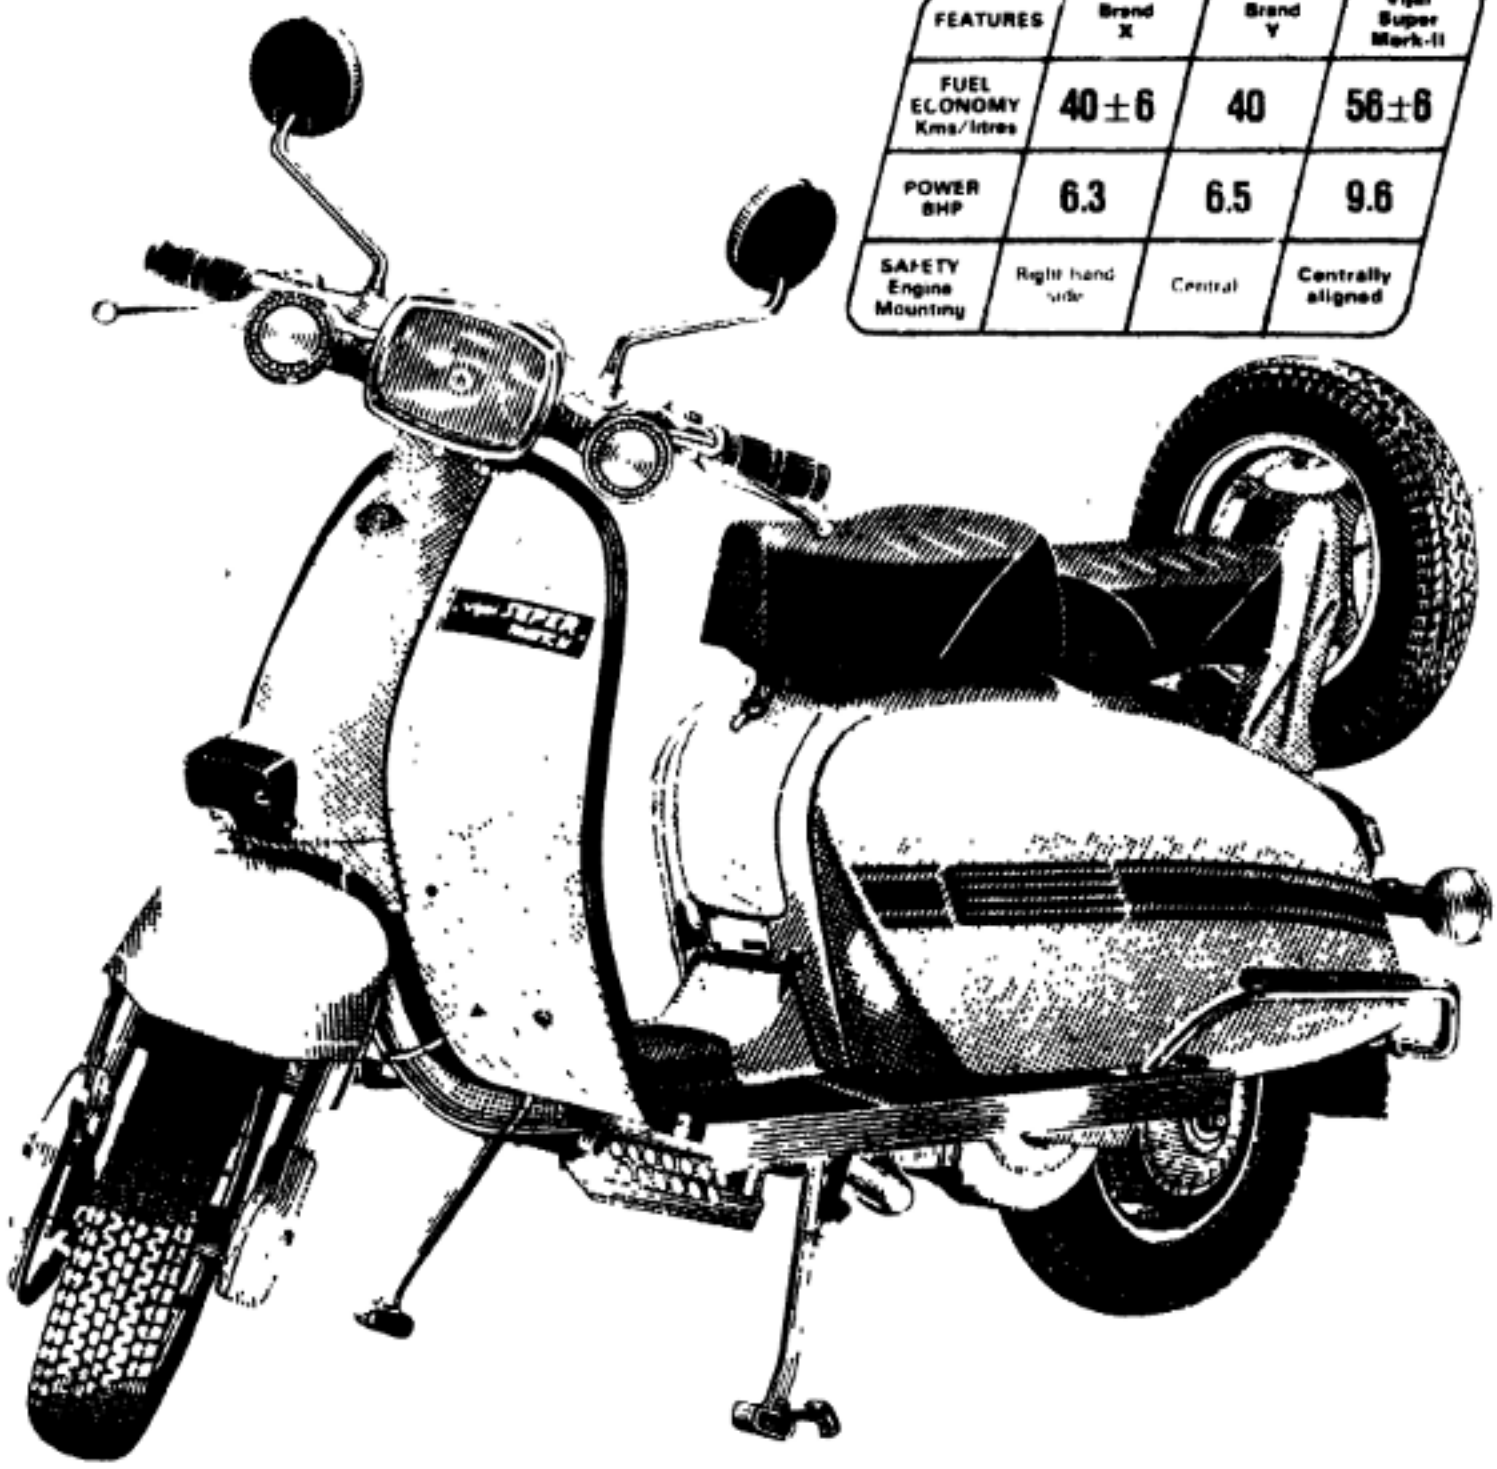
PUNCHLINE/KUTTY

Cover Illustration:
Bulbul Sharma

Editor M J Akbar

Associate Editor Tushar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K John Henry Jacob
Rajiv Bagchi Sanjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi:
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow:
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay.
Olga Tellis
Bangalore
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad:
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati
Seema Guha
Srinagar:
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
An surcharge for North Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex Delhi



THE NEW

Vijai SUPER mark II

Scooters India Limited

There's no 150 cc scooter to match it for ECONOMY POWER SAFETY.

FEATURES	Brand X	Brand Y	Vijai Super Mark-II
FUEL ECONOMY Kms./litres	40±6	40	56±6
POWER BHP	6.3	6.5	9.6
SAFETY Engine Mounting	Right hand side	Central	Centrally aligned

Its here. New Vijai Super Mark-II The latest model from Scooters India Limited — successors to Innocenti of Italy Pioneers in scooter manufacture Vijai Super. The winner of Grand Prix in India and abroad

Super Economy: 56±6 kms per litre

A new variable venturi carburettor, improved cylinder design, increased compression ratio and modified gear ratio impart optimum fuel economy SAVING FUEL.

Super Power: 9.6 BHP

Goes from 0 to 60 kms in 12 75 seconds flat Negotiates gradients with ease And keeps ahead of others

Super Safety

Centrally mounted engine low centre of gravity and wider wheel base make it safer even at high speeds on curves with load

Super Durability

Modified material composition of cylinder, chrome plated piston rings and the use of solid lubricant enhance engine life That is why it carries a warranty of 15 months or 10.000 kms (whichever is earlier) — the longest on ahy two wheeler

It undergoes over 1.000 quality checks before it leaves the factory

Vijai Super Mark-II Distributed and serviced countrywide through 225 outlets

Exported to many technologically advanced countries including Italy — its birth place

THE NEW

Vijai SUPER mark II

The best deal on wheels

ASP/SIL-1/84A

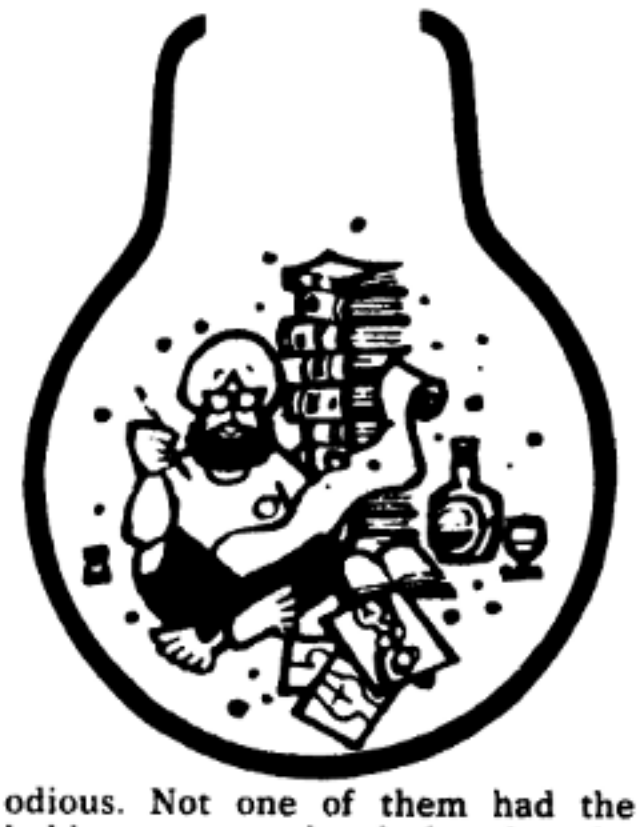
DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

Calcutta: It may not be very much compared to the Himalaya-touched cold of Delhi, or the waves in the night air which sets the land north of the Ganga shivering, but we have our little winter in Calcutta and make an excellent job of our one-sweater season too. There is just the nip in the atmosphere which makes some spirits go up and other spirits go down with equal ease. Calcuttans reserve all their parties for the spell from mid-November to early February. The maidan on holidays is a swarm of smiling faces, people literally enjoying their moment in the sun before they return to the monotony of a difficult existence in the congested lanes of powerless Calcutta. The city's zoo must be the most crowded in the world, particularly around the time of makar sankranti when the Biharis in particular choose to make their annual pilgrimage to both the confluence of the Ganga and the sea, and the zoo. Christmas: New Year's eve: the midnight services at St Paul have been adopted by Calcuttans as part of their cultural history: only Calcutta, perhaps, could make these occasions so truly secular. Middle-class Bengalis queuing up to buy cakes is a sight good enough to sustain the Ray-media industry for a while more. This city, after all, was where the Ray was born even if, early this century, it decided to take its lustre elsewhere. (It is interesting that as long as the British capital was Calcutta, the empire kept expanding. As soon as it went to Delhi, its decline started.) And though the economy of Calcutta may no longer be able to match the interest and consciously felt need among its citizens for the best books and the best bookshops, the Calcutta Book Fair still remains the jewel in the crown of the publishing industry. The world of writers and booksellers still marks this out as the high point of activity. This year, among other visitors, we had a group of the most eminent poets of Bangladesh visiting us, and the reception and warmth between the writers living on two sides of the border proved once again that culture is still much more powerful than politics. My own relations with creative writing (or indeed reading fiction) are extremely tenuous, so I cannot claim to be any kind of commentator on the subject, but it did not need enormous powers of observation at a well-lubricated dinner party hosted by Ananda Publishers to see that Shamsur Rehman and Sunil Gangopadhyaya were talking the same language in more senses than one. The publishers, it often seems to me, show far more dedication to books than authors. The writer gets cash in the bank, liquor in his hand and, most of all, enormous doses of massage to his ever-expanding ego. The publisher gets the dirty work—from proofs to invoices to distribution to collection and, on top of it, treating the author like a spoilt brat.

If in Delhi the winter goes out with the bhang, colour, bantering and fire of Holi, then Calcutta's less intense but immensely more elegant season ends with the Book Fair. Suddenly, as you wander through the stalls or relax at the open air cafes or chatter with friends unseen for months (everybody goes to the fair), the sun becomes Indian, and the heat begins to seep through between the collar and skin.

The party's over.

Shock, surprise, horror. Dr Ashok Mitra, whose lash of tongue and needle-sharp quill have done more to damage relations between the Left Front and the centre, has actually praised the Rajiv Gandhi government. After so many years of dealing with fellow Bengali Pranab Mukherjee, The Man Who Gave You The IMF Loan, he finds soft-spoken, sober Vishwanath Pratap Singh a sensible soul. There is none of the confrontation in the new union finance minister's letters, said the state finance minister: in fact, Dr Mitra was stunned to discover that a dialogue was at all possible. Those who know Vishwanath Pratap Singh will not be surprised that he has managed to woo even the acerbic Dr Mitra. His reputation as a decent human being—apart from being a good minister—is widespread. Rajiv Gandhi was sending out a deliberate signal when he made a gentleman like Vishwanath Pratap Singh finance minister of his first government, after giving him charge of the vital Uttar Pradesh election campaign. V. P. Singh is perhaps the first chief minister of Uttar Pradesh to actually leave the job willingly (Mr Narayan Dutt Tewari, another decent soul could well be the second). And nor had Raja Sahab, as he is popularly known, been offered anything at the centre in exchange or promotion. In fact, Mrs Gandhi was upset when he resigned. But he did so because, as he himself explained, he had not been able to fulfil his promise to solve the law and order problem of dacoit-ridden Uttar Pradesh. Not many people know that Mr Singh's elder brother, a judge, was shot dead by dacoits.



We could easily, in our office, begin a Times of India Alumni Association; quite a few of us began our career there before shifting over to Calcutta or Delhi to work for SUNDAY or Ravivar. Now, for the first time, the reverse journey is being made. One of the finest talents among the journalists of our generation, Surendra Pratap Singh, is leaving the editorship of Ravivar to take over as Resident Editor of Navbharat Times, that hugely-circulated Hindi daily from the Bennet Coleman stable. With a modesty uncharacteristic of his profession, and an ability uncommon among his peers, SP has quietly fashioned a serious political newsweekly which has acquired the very highest reputation in the Hindi-speaking world. Obviously it was the maturity of the editing which prompted Dr Ram Tarneja, managing director of the company, and Mr Rajendra Mathur, editor of the paper, to hand over such a challenging responsibility to him rather than to the numerous seniors who had been expecting to fill the post. Clearly too the generational change is coming about in the Times; the topmost jobs are no longer the preserve of only those who are near their retirement. The extraordinary success of Pritish Nandy in The Illustrated Weekly must have set at rest whatever doubts the owners and management might have had about the wisdom of young people at the top.

As if his achievement in journalism was not sufficient, SP (with the same self-effacing silence he showed in his editing) wrote the dialogue for the award-winning film Paar, an effort which has brought him a deluge of offers from the more sensible part of the film industry. We will miss him at the Calcutta office. Our loss is clearly Bennet Coleman's gain.

New Parliament

I wish the opening of the new session of Parliament was televised. It is a colourful ceremony when everyone of the 700-odd members of the two houses is dressed in his or her Sunday best and is at his and her best behaviour. This is for the simple reason that those present are meant to be seen and not heard. The rostrum of Central Hall is beautifully decorated with masses of Gladioli. Six giant-sized lancers of the President's bodyguard dressed in blue-and-gold flank the throne chair holding their beribboned spears aloft. On the stroke of eleven the fanfares sound and everyone stands up. Pigeons take fright and fly around the hall. Led by six-footer bodyguards come secretaries of the two houses, the President, vice-president, the Prime Minister and other officials—all save the Prime Minister look very diminutive by contrast with their uniformed escorts and all very conscious of their inability to march in step. They take their seats and stand up again as the band strikes up the national anthem. The President clears his throat, takes a sip of water and begins to read the address prepared for him by the government in Hindi. It takes him 40 minutes with two gulps of water to go through the text. Vice-president Venkataraman takes less than 19 minutes to read its English translation. It's all over in one hour. And once more the national anthem strikes and the President, vice-president, Prime Minister and secretaries troop out painfully out of step with their gigantic bodyguards.

The opening day in both houses was a sad affair devoted to tributes to the late Indira Gandhi. It was an opportunity for members to say something which could be quoted for times to come. Alas! Not one speech in either house came up to expectation because no one had taken the trouble to think of something memorable to say. A Jawaharlal Nehru or a Radhakrishnan would have spent hours polishing bejewelled phrases to use at the occasion. Here we had lost one of the most remarkable women in the annals of world history in a classic betrayal of sacred trust, a woman who had been chosen by a nation of 750 million people to hold the reins of their destinies in her hands for over 14 years. And all these second-raters could do was mouth banalities and boast how close they had been to her. Indira Gandhi and any comparisons with her would be odious. Not one of them had the boldness to say that before her the Caesars of Rome and the Tsars of Russia, the Bonapartes of France and the Monarchs of England, the Presidents and Prime Ministers of our times dwarf into littleness. She was not of this age but for all time. We will not see the like of her again. She will be for ever honoured, for ever mourned.

Mrs Gandhi had no political philosophy nor did she subscribe to any dogmas. She could be petulant. She could be petty. But she was committed to any ideal to keep the country united. She had convinced herself that only she or one of her sons could ensure it. That persuasion and belief ripened into faith and became a passioned intuition.

Since the nation has chosen Mrs Gandhi's son as her successor, whatever reservations the more educated of us may have about dynastic succession, we have to accept it as the will of the people. We have also to admit that he has made a promising start. If he treads the right path, it is our duty to support him. At this stage our prayer should be:

"Today he puts forth the tender leaves of hope, Tomorrow may he blossom and may the fruits of honour come thick upon him."

A Pakistani View

A book written on the Sikhs problems by a Pakistani will naturally arouse a lot of interest in India. No sooner Syed Shabbir Hussain's Sikhs at Crossroads was received, I put all my other work aside to delve into it. As is my habit, when it comes to books on Punjab or the Sikhs, I first take a look at the bibliography to see the material the author has consulted. Of the 17 in his selected list only two are Indian: Pran Chopra's Second Liberation of India and The Sikhs by me (coffee-table pictorial with a very brief text). Thereafter I turn to the index to see if I have been quoted, misquoted or maligned. I was not disappointed: the author has taken chunks from my books, some acknowledged, others just lifted without the courtesy of inverted commas; plenty of misquotations and some abuse as an "self-opinionated intellectual". These are small matters. What is more reprehensible is that of the 154 pages if extracts from Indian newspapers and magazines are excised, the book would be reduced by a third. Another third has little or nothing to do with the Sikhs but with the transfer of power from British to Indo-Pak hands. So we are left with 50 odd pages on Sikhs at crossroads. This does not speak very highly of Pakistani scholarship or political journalism.

Shabbir Hussain has no pretensions to objectivity. He describes Mountbatten as "the partisan viceroy"; accuses Sikhs for being "responsible for the largest massacre of Muslims during the partition riots"; and for forgetting that they were not Hindus and making themselves over to Hindu India and not accepting Mr Jinnah's generous offer to them to join Pakistan. Like many half-baked Pakistani journalists, Shabbir Hussain discovers the root of all that is evil in India in "Brahmanic arrogance" and strives to debunk India's claim to secularism which in his opinion is a "theocratic state in the worst sense of the word, intolerant of every non-Brahman culture or creed whether scheduled caste, Muslims, Sikhs or Buddhists wielding the big stick while insisting it is a carrot." He sets out to examine "this fascism of caste Hindus, now at rampage in almost every part of the country." Pakistan, he maintains is the greatest gift an Indian fascist could have hoped for. He can now exploit permanent sense of injury and, at the same time, channel it against the Jews of Modern India—the Muslims, large enough to count as respectable enemy, week enough to be attacked with impunity." He sees the Congress party during the British raj as "almost entirely Brahman." The only exception being Mahatma Gandhi who he describes as a Veshnu (it is not clear whether he means a Vaishnav or a vegetarian). With great glee he quotes Lord Wavell's opinion of the Mahatma as having "more of malevolence than benevolence in him." The Sikhs, he castigates for having "played a major role in the 1971 war"! Shahbeg Singh for training the Mukti Bahini, J.S. Arora for having defeated the Pakistanis. Both Generals paid the price: one being killed in "Operation Bluestar," the other "sulking in agony and wilderness at the destruction of the Golden Temple." Sikhs having performed such "slavish acts under the direction of their Hindu masters" are now victims of "Gandhian malevolence, caste-culture and random use of force."

Chapters on Operation Bluestar and an interview with Jagjit Singh Chauhan who describes me as "Indira's showpiece" are lifted in totality from Indian journals. The only people who come in for praise are Khallistanis living abroad: Chauhan and Ganga Singh Dhillon.

The biographical blurb describes Syed Shabbir Hussain as a "veteran journalist known for his perception of internal and regional situations." It is evident that he has no perception of the problems of the Sikhs and is fast declining into dotage. It is a small mercy that his book is not likely to be available in India.

Gaffes of 1984

Last year yielded a rich harvest of gaffes from the mouths of celebrities. The winner was of course Ronald Reagan. When giving a voice-test for a nation-wide broadcast which unfortunately for him went on the air, he said "My fellow Americans, I am pleased to tell you that I have signed legislation to outlaw Russia for ever. We begin bombing in five minutes."

His voice was okay. Later he tried to explain that he was jesting and did not realise he was in the air. The Russians did not see the joke and maintained that the mindless gaffe revealed the inner workings of the American President's mind. Russians don't have a sense of humour.

A charming slip of the tongue came from Italy. It was the mistranslation of a blurb of a fashion-designer who wanted to advertise a new cut for ladies dress as one which would rouse men's libido. The English version read: "Shaped to be raped". Women's libbers were up in arms but apparently the new design was a great sales success.

From America again came a vituperative attack by Mrs Bush against the Democratic vice-presidential candidate, Geraldine Ferraro. "She is a four million dollar...I can't say it, but it rhymes with rich."

A mark of distinction internationally recognised

Gateway repro Bond

It's your finest spokesman at home or abroad. Because Gateway moves with ease in the best circles. Speaking with quiet authority in a dignified and distinctive style that's highly civilised.

*The Wiggins Teape Group, UK are world right holders of the Gateway trademark

A member of the Wiggins Teape Group UK

TRIBENI TISSUES LIMITED

Tribeni House
2 Lee Road, Calcutta 700 020
Leaders in speciality papers

When continued acceptance involves continuous raising of standards...

What is India Pistons doing about this change?

Leading automotive manufacturers, to whom India Pistons supplies a major share of its production, demand high standards of piston technology

And this standard is not static, but keeps rising to be on par with international standards of product acceptability

India Pistons is alive to the challenge and keeps high technology on par with the highly developed countries of the world

It's not surprising therefore that India Pistons enjoys wide acceptability with leading automotive manufacturers, the retail trade and also with the export market

India Pistons–
responding to the changing environment

INDIA PISTONS LIMITED, MADRAS

MAC/IP/1013

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Appeasing the Sikhs

The government is once again on the wrong track while seeking a solution to the Punjab problem, which is now a Sikh problem. Therefore, the search has to be to find a way to bring back the Sikhs to the national mainstream for they feel hurt and humiliated. The Sikhs today, have developed an inferiority complex in their own country.

The merger of Chandigarh in Punjab or the reference of the waters dispute to a Supreme Court judge is not what can make allies of the Sikhs; nor can a discussion on the Anandpur Sahib resolution. If these important matters had been tackled before the army operation in the Golden Temple at Amritsar, it might have satisfied the Sikhs. At present, the question is how the Sikhs can be brought into the mainstream because they are now living in a world of their own, exaggerating their grievances and imagining the worst.

The ministerial committee, appointed by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, is reportedly discussing the pros and cons of the Akali demands. It is being said that the Anandpur Sahib resolution is not on the committee's agenda since the last Lok Sabha poll is taken as a verdict against it. The committee is also indirectly sounding the Akali leaders to know their stand.

But the Sikh sentiment has gone beyond the demands, beyond the control of even the Akali leaders. Even Harchand Singh Longowal, the Akali chief, who still has the strongest hold on the Sikhs, may not matter much in assuaging the Sikhs' feelings. Nor does Prakash Singh Badal, former chief minister, or Gurcharan Singh Tohra, chief of the Shiromani Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC). G.S. Tohra is considered the villain of the piece. Tomorrow when they are released, they would be denounced and might even be forced to leave their moderate line and become hardliners; moderation does not appeal to a large segment of the Sikh community, particularly the youth, who are in a defiant mood.

Therefore, the problem needs a careful and psychological handling and it is no use rushing things or talking of a time-bound frame. The ministerial committee should first tackle the aftermath of the military operation, not the Akali demands as such. I recall that at a Sikh gathering the other day when I talked about the resumption of talks on Chandigarh, the river waters and the Anandpur Sahib resolution, there was an uproar even at the suggestion of starting negotiations. The entire congregation stood up and said that they had no demands. Obviously, the hurt is too deep, too recent.

That is the reason why the thread must be picked up from Operation Bluestar. There are allegations of atrocities and deliberate killings; there must be an inquiry into these charges because with the passage of time even wild stories are believed. What I heard when I visited the Golden Temple in the end of June is a fraction of what I heard a few days ago.

There is no question of going into the operation part because how an army acts is dependent on the judgment of the commanders on the spot. But the allegation that innocents were killed within the precincts of the Golden Temple is too serious to remain unchallenged; this is not fair to the army and its name. There are allegations that the army has made indiscriminate arrests since the operation; only an independent inquiry into these will bring out the truth. Meanwhile, all those who are in custody without any charges against them, should be released

What has angered the Sikhs most is the rioting in Delhi and elsewhere in the wake of Indira Gandhi's assassination. An omnibus inquiry to find out who are guilty would be ideal but it may not be possible. At least the rioting in Delhi must be probed into because officials put the number of deaths above 2,000. Important revelations have been made by the Public Inquiry Committee, headed by S.M. Sikri, former Chief Justice of India, and by the People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) and the People's Union of Democratic Rights (PUDR).

Names of H.K.L. Bhagat, Jagdish Tytler, Lalit Maken, the three Congress(I) MPs from Delhi and of Sajjan Kumar and Dharam Das Shastri, former MPs, have been mentioned, apart from a few others. A judicial inquiry presided over by a Supreme Court judge must be held to look into the rioting in Delhi and also assess whether the allegations against the present and former MPs and the other Congress(I) leaders are true.

Once the events following the military operation and the rioting are properly looked into, the Sikhs may come round to believe that those who indulged in murder, looting and burning have been taken to task and that the law knows no Hindu or Sikh; all Indians are equal before it.

However, the Sikhs should also try to woo the Hindus in Punjab. The representatives of the two communities must sit across the table and try to understand each other's point of view and sensitivities. The Akali leaders have thus far been shy of meeting the Punjab Hindu leaders. And I have still not found one good reason why the Akal Takht, the highest Sikh body, has not issued a hukumnama (edict) that killing the innocent is against the tenets of Sikhism. The five high priests should start the process.

A judicial inquiry must be held to look into the rioting in Delhi and also assess whether the allegations against the present and former MPs and other Congress(I) leaders are true

New Promises

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya had rightly described The New Wave Government (6—19 January '85) headed by Rajiv Gandhi as "a judicious blend of youth and experience." While selecting his new cabinet, the Prime Minister has placed merit and performance above all other considerations. I also appreciate the secrecy maintained regarding the selection of the ministers and the portfolios allocated to them. Even Arun Nehru, who is so close to the PM, was kept in the dark. At the first available opportunity, Rajiv Gandhi has shown that he is a capable and shrewd administrator.
Ms Lakshmi, Mysore

• My best wishes to Rajiv Gandhi and his new team. The Congress(I) led by Rajiv Gandhi has virtually wiped out the opposition. More than anything else, failure to unite proved to be the opposition's undoing. Instead of criticising each other, the opposition leaders should now try and form a stable, united opposition. I cannot think of democracy without any strong opposition.
Faiz Ahmed Faizi, Calcutta

• I agree with Shubhabrata Bhattacharya that the massive mandate in favour of the Congress(I) was a vote for the integrity of the country (Why the Opposition Lost). Indians were convinced that the country could not be kept united by an opposition that was busy fighting among itself. People trusted the opposition in 1977. But the leaders did not respect the people's verdict. This time the electorate thought that only the Congress(I), with young and clean leaders like Rajiv Gandhi, could pull India out of the present crisis. The opposition leaders should draw a lesson from the debacle and try and serve the people in a more meaningful manner.
Subir Lahiri, Calcutta

• Unless the opposition unites there is very little chance for its comeback. The opposition failed to come out with any constructive programmes. The image they put up was that of a house divided. No wonder the people rejected them. On the other hand Rajiv Gandhi successfully gave the impression that his party alone could keep the country united.
Nirjhar Das Gupta, Calcutta

• Best wishes to Rajiv Gandhi and the newly elected members and my sympathies to the opposition. With the Congress(I)'s landslide victory, a new era in the country's political life has begun.

Ranjan K. Talcher

• The results of the Lok Sabha elections have taken me by surprise. A comfortable victory for the Congress(I) was on the cards, but the complete rout of the opposition came as a bolt from the blue. Several factors went against the opposition parties, the most important among them being the massive misleading propaganda by the ruling party that the country's unity was in danger and that the opposition leaders were siding with the secessionist elements in Punjab. This time our gullible masses did not vote in a rational manner. The shocking defeat of most of the opposition leaders is a grave threat to the future of democracy. There is no one to check the despotic rule of the Congress(I).
Smita Narang, New Delhi

• Tarun Ganguly's assessment of the CPI(M)'s debacle in West Bengal (Stemming the Tide) was correct. However, here are a few more reasons, in addition to the ones mentioned by the author, that were responsible for the CPI(M)'s poor showing at the polls: the Left Front government failed in such vital areas like power, transport and law and order. Moreover, the high rate of professional taxes and the imposition of entertainment tax for TV users were resented by the people.
Ms Raj Kumari Tripathi, Howrah

• The personal ambitions of the opposition leaders led to their downfall in the Lok Sabha elections. Right from 1980 when the Janata Party broke up, the opposition remained splintered. Efforts were made to patch up the differences, but in vain. Every opposition leader wanted to become the Prime Minister. They placed their interests above the nation's. Why should people vote for them?
C. B. Sahai, New Delhi

• The Indian electorate have raised their hands to bid goodbye to the opposition. While the Congress(I) candidates were sent to the Lok Sabha, most of the opposition members were sent to the Parlok Sabha.
Sandip Mukherjee, Patna

• I was disappointed to go through the list of ministers in Rajiv Gandhi's cabinet. In choosing his team, the new PM has maintained his family tradition: axing men who pose a threat to his ambitions. The dropping of Pranab Mukherjee and Ghani Khan Chowdhury is certainly a loss to the administration.
Rajesh Sahay, Hazaribagh

• The near total rejection of the old opposition leaders expresses the electorate's desire for youthful dynamism as symbolised by Rajiv Gandhi. But what is disturbing is the fact that the total decimation of the opposition may lead to a gross misuse of power by the ruling party.
Susanta Biswas, Calcutta

• The historic sweep by the Congress(I) indicates that the people of India has given dynamism and stability precedence over infirmity, sluggishness and instability. The cover story discussed at length most of the ministers in the Rajiv Gandhi cabinet, but a glaring omission was the health and family welfare minister, Mrs Mohsina Kidwai.
Rashmee Roshan Lall, Meerut

• The Congress(I) should now read as Congress(R).
Mahesh Kumar, New Delhi

• I had never known that the people of this country were so emotional. Even while exercising their franchise their hearts ruled over their heads.
Prabhakar S. Harsole, Indore

• The heading of the cover story was justified. The sympathy wave was so strong that women and even men were swept away by it. The immediate problems facing the country took a back-seat. It would be foolish to expect the opposition to do well in such circumstances.
M.H. Rama, Bhubaneswar

Wanted: Discipline

Ashis Ray's special report, Sunil Gavaskar versus Kapil Dev (30 December '84—5 January '85) was illuminating. I was surprised to go through Sandeep Patil's reaction. Such irresponsible statements will only serve to harm the interests of Indian cricket. Now that Indian cricket is passing through a trying phase, I hope that all the players will forget their differences and unite to regain past glory.
Akhaya Kumar Hota, Puri

• I felt proud when I watched on television Kapil Dev holding aloft the World Cup. But that is past. Now I watch with anguish India being humiliated at every step by a relatively weak England side. At this juncture, Ashis Ray's report on the differences between Gavaskar and Kapil was an eye-opener. What is lacking in the Indian Test team is not talent but discipline.
Dilip Kumar Sharma, Nagpur

Angrezi Mein Kehte...

M. J. Akbar's prediction regarding the political future of Amitabh Bachchan was wide off the mark (Dateline, 9—15 December '85). The article was written with a biased, pre-conceived notion. It would be wrong to condemn Amitabh's efforts only because he is an actor.
J C. Sharma, Oman

• H. N. Bahuguna has got a pasting in Allahabad. Allahabad ki Hindi mein kehte hei ki "jeetna itna aasaan nahin," par angrezi mein bhi kehte hain ki "poll predictions are not so easy to make."
Vineeta Prasad, Patna

More Information

I read with much interest the article, A Quiet Revolution (News, 25 November '84) However, I do not agree with the author on certain points. Tapash Mukherjee had said that '20-odd Santhal families of the village are beginning life anew.' I am sure that there is no Santhal family inhabiting that village. Moreover, the Singhivita Adivasi Joutha Khamar Society (SAJKS) is not in Jalpaiguri district but in Darjeeling district. It is also not true that at least one member from each family of the village have spent some years in jail for extremist activities. I would like to add that at present 24 families are involved with the affairs of the Society.
Shyamal Debnath, Siliguri

Unkind, Unjustified Attacks

I was appalled to read some of your correspondent's unkind and untrue outbursts against Khushwant Singh (Opinion, 23 December '84). Mr Singh, alone among the many prominent Sikhs, had the courage to speak his mind openly in the period between Operation Bluestar and the nightmare that followed Mrs Gandhi's assassination. I have not heard Khushwant Singh's BBC interviews but his CBC TV interviews in Canada were balanced. Cosmopoliton bigot is a contradiction in terms. Khushwant Singh has a strong sense of identity, individuality and a sense of belonging. Although I have no exact figures, it appears that about 95 per cent of the adult Sikh males in Canada are clean-shaven and I understand the trend is the same in Punjab. There is an identity crisis among the Sikhs in Punjab and hence the rise of the Bhindranwale phenomenon.
B.A. Kamath, Merritt, Canada

• I read with sadness and amusement the reactions to Khushwant Singh's articles published in SUNDAY. Most of the readers felt that Mr Singh was siding with the Sikhs and against the Hindus. As I live in Punjab and happened to be in Delhi during the riots following Mrs Gandhi's assassination, I know the situation better than anyone else. Most of the people, on the other hand, gathered their impressions from newspaper and magazine reports which were biased. The Sikhs were never against the Hindus. If sweets were distributed on the day Mrs Gandhi was assassinated, it was just a reciprocal gesture as Hindus had also distributed sweets after Operation Bluestar.
A.P. Singh, Hoshiarpur

• The views expressed by readers in response to Khushwant Singh's articles were alarming. Some of them have justified the killing of Sikhs throughout the country by the logic that Hindus were suffering in Punjab at the hands of the Sikhs. They have conveniently ignored the fact that extremists and anti-socials were responsible for the killing of Hindus in Punjab. There were cases when Sikhs too were killed by the extremists because they did not fall in line Anyone who raised his voice against Bhindranwale, irrespective of the fact whether he was a Hindu or a Sikh, was eliminated.
Harpinder Kaur, New Delhi

Eveready to Kill

Let us begin this new year with a firm resolve to fight the killer Union Carbide, who murdered and maimed thousands of our brothers and sisters at Bhopal. Let us fight with all our might the multinational blood-suckers who exploit the Third World poor.
Dr B. Ekbal, Kerala Sastra Sahitya Parishad, Trivandrum

Not True

My attention has been drawn to Yubaraj Ghimire's analysis of the election results of Bihar (The Sweep, 6--9 January '85) wherein the author says that "the CPI national council secretary, Jagannath Sarkar, announced that the CPI would work for the defeat of Karpoori Thakur, the DMKP leader, in Samastipur." This is not true The CPI had extended its support to the Lok Dal candidate Baidyanath Mehta in Samastipur. The party had never given any call nor worked for the defeat of Karpoori Thakur. For the benefit of readers I am quoting the relevant paragraph from our press hand-out:

"Since the DMKP leadership was chiefly instrumental in preventing adjustment of seats among the left, democratic and secular opposition parties in Bihar...so the CPI was compelled to support the Lok Dal candidate in Samastipur." The hand-out made it clear that the "CPI had to do this only to register its protest against the disruptive tactics of the DMKP leadership in Bihar."
Ramavatar Sharma, secretary, Bihar State Council, Communist Party of India, Patna

Bureaucrat, Diplomat, Industrialist, Spy

It is time to break this nexus

When Mrs Indira Gandhi lay in state at the Teen Murti House after her assassination, three gates were marked for the different categories of mourners. The general public filed past a gate towards which her feet were placed. By her side there was a gate from where Indian dignitaries and lesser foreign personalities were allowed to enter and pay their homage. Apart from these two, a special gate was kept open for foreign dignitaries and envoys. One Indian industrialist was seen bribing his way through this gate even on that solemn day. This industrialist, who started off as a clerk in a trading house in the Middle East some years ago, today controls a major blue chip company in the stock exchange. His rise to fame has been due to his clout with a former finance minister and bribing has been his forte. Even by the side of Mrs Gandhi's dead body, he did not hesitate for a moment while bribing the guards. He was accompanied by the president of the Congress(I) committee of the western metropolis, which is his base. His liaison man in Delhi, who was close on the heels of this industrialist, was seen extracting his hand from his pocket and shaking hands with a securityman. No one thereafter objected to this blatant violation of protocol while this businessman, who has been known as the fountainhead of corruption in the past few years, sailed through the special gate and paid his last respects to Mrs Gandhi.

There could be no better example of the influence which moneybags wield in Delhi. If this industrialist was able to make his ill-earned money yield dividends on a day when the nation was griefstricken, one can imagine what money can do in normal times. Many Indian VIPs noticed him doing what he did. But no one dared to object. His money reached far and wide. If it was suit lengths (both for summer safari suits and winter suiting) for the securitymen and the lesser staff, the government's influential ministers and Members of Parliament (cutting across party lines) were recipients of his largesse. For the officers, his attractive convertible debenture issues were always available from the business associate's quota. He is a man for all seasons: and men in positions of influence and power serve him for obvious reasons.

We have given the above example to show how vulnerable the system is to bribing. If a security guard standing by the dead body of the late Prime Minister was accepting bribes and people not objecting to it, then some introspection is called for. Have we reached the nadir of human behaviour? The discovery of a spy ring operating in the Prime Minister's office is a shame. If India's national interests are under attack from the very institution which is entrusted with the task of safeguarding it, then something serious has gone wrong over the years. It is a well-known fact that corruption has been growing by leaps and bounds since the early Seventies. The Maruti project, the brainchild of the late Sanjay Gandhi, was the watershed. Irregularities were committed to please the whims of the Prime Minister's younger son. The officers who stuck to the rules of the book had to regret such insistence. The Official Secrets Act became a mere piece of badly printed official stationery since the time Sanjay Gandhi became the extra-constitutional authority to whom everyone in the government bowed. Sanjay Gandhi's death was followed by the emergence of another coterie which looked into government files without having the sanction to do so. They did not themselves call for the files. The political and bureaucratic culture had become such that officials and ministers alike went to certain persons whom they thought were near the centre of power and showed the files and sought "guidance." It is another matter that those who were interfering in the matters of state without sanction till a few months back have now been given the mandate to do so. But the fact remains that the provisions of the Official Secrets Act have rarely been observed as a matter of rule in the last several years.

Illustration: Bulbul Sharma

The average Indian bureaucrat is a cautious person. A government servant is largely dependent on his pension, gratuity and provident fund after retirement. If any enquiry be pending against him on the date of superannuation, then these are held up. The bureaucrat, therefore, cannot afford to be blatantly corrupt. There is a very small percentage of daredevils, who either because of their moneyed family backgrounds or due to a total lack of fear of God, indulge in corruption openly. Political patronage is the opiate of the bureaucracy. Often currying favour with the political masters becomes the over-riding factor and this leads to the bureaucrat indulging in activities which violate the provisions of the Official Secrets Act and the Prevention of Corruption Act. Corruption in the bureaucracy does not mean big money. Money plays a role, but rarely does an average Indian bureaucrat build a house or buy property from money earned through corrupt practices. Corrupting a government servant in India is a comparatively cheap exercise. The government's pay and allowances are such that it sometimes seems that corruption has been inbuilt into the system. While on tour, a government servant is given an allowance of Rs 22 in normal towns and Rs 37.50 per day in metropolitan towns. This amount is supposed to cover the cost of boarding, lodging and transportation in the place of deputation. It is easy for businessmen to corrupt the officers on such occasions by offering them transport and the use of the luxury guest houses. In New Delhi, the headquarters of the Government of India, if an officer has to travel between two ministries on official work and the official pool staff car is not available, then the government rules lay down that they have to use autorickshaws and not taxis. This innovation in the rules was made sometime during the tenure of Pranab Kumar Mukherjee as the union finance minister. There have been instances when three officers had to travel and they hired a taxi. The bill was not passed. Had they hired three autorickshaws and thereby spent more for the trip than by hiring a taxi, the bills would have been passed. Transport of businessmen and liaison agents is made available to willing officers on such occasions. Even then, an average bureaucrat rarely uses such facilities. But the fact remains that unimaginative rules of the government lay open the bureaucratic portals for corrupt influences.

More than monetary corruption, it is the politicisation of the bureaucracy over the last decade-and-a-half which has threatened the fabric of Indian bureaucracy. The overcentralisation of power in the Prime Minister's office, which is a phenomenon which had its origins during the regime of Indira Gandhi, has been the bane. In the days of Jawaharlal Nehru, there was no centralisation of power in the Prime Minister's office. His aide, M.O. Mathai, tried to become the overlord of government affairs, but this was resisted and Nehru's democratic manner became the biggest safeguard against such aberrations. It may be argued that there is nothing wrong if the PM's office were to become the real centre of power, as it has become in the last decade-and-a-half. The fact which is often overlooked is that the Constitution envisages that "there shall be a council of ministers headed by the Prime Minister." The Prime Minister is the head of a council of ministers, with every minister having his own entity. It is another matter that today all ministers are not of the calibre of the cabinet ministers of the time of Jawaharlal Nehru. Once Maulana Azad had telephoned Nehru, and Mathai, without consulting Nehru, told him that the Prime Minister was busy. The powerful cabinet minister had burst out in anger and pointed out to Mathai that when Maulana Azad telephoned Nehru, Mathai was no one to sit in judgment whether the two should talk or not. Today, not only are ministers bowing before every pillar of the PM's office, but in the last days of Mrs Gandhi, Nathuram, a cook who rose to be the personal attendant, also became a centre of power. (He was removed in the first week of this year, after Rajiv Gandhi cleaned the old moss which had gathered around the PM's office and residence.)

The very fact that sensitive plans like the anti-nuclear strike plan (to destroy the enemy's nuclear installations), cipher code, defence plans and confidential documents of the economic affairs department have been found missing after the spy ring was busted shows the inherent fallacy in trusting the under-secretaries and such junior staff with sensitive documents. One wonders why Dr P. C Alexander did not take the precaution of storing these papers under his personal care.

The seniormost bureaucrat in the government is the cabinet secretary. The creation of a post of principal secretary to the PM which was done to accommodate Mr P. N. Haksar by Mrs Gandhi in late 1971, was the beginning of a parallel centre of power, bypassing the cabinet secretary. P.N. Haksar was a rare bureaucrat. He did not seek extensions when he had retired on reaching the age of superannuation on 4 September 1971. But his services were recalled by Mrs Gandhi and as Haksar had been succeeded by an eminent economist, P. N. Dhar, as the secretary to Prime Minister, Mrs Gandhi created the post of principal secretary to PM for Haksar. But Haksar ran into rough weather soon, as he was unwilling to accept the role which Mrs Gandhi was slowly assigning to Sanjay Gandhi. The early Seventies had seen the last of the tall men in Delhi's power hierarchy. While Haksar was not willing to defend Sanjay Gandhi's Maruti adventure, there were cabinet ministers like Mohan Kumaramangalam and D. P. Dhar who did not appreciate Sanjay Gandhi phoning them on the secret Rashtrapati Bhavan exchange (RAX) telephone. Unfortunately for Mrs Gandhi and the nation, while Haksar left the service in disgust in early 1973, Kumaramangalam died in the summer of that year. D. P. Dhar, who had been shunted as the ambassador to Moscow, died on 12 June 1975—the day on which the Allahabad High Court set aside Mrs Gandhi's election and the country began drifting towards the Emergency, its aberrations and the aftermath, which was even more unsavoury.

The post of secretary to PM, which was the precursor to the principal secretary's post, was created by Lal Bahadur Shastri. Lakshmi Kant Jha was appointed to this post. When Mrs Gandhi became the Prime Minister, she retained Jha for a while and later replaced him with Haksar, who was in the foreign office till then. Haksar's successor was P. N. Dhar. After Haksar quit as the principal secretary in 1973, there was no principal secretary till Morarji Desai became the Janata PM and appointed a retired civil servant, V. Shanker,to this post. Charan Singh appointed a serving bureaucrat, Krishnaswamy Rao Sahab, who continued for a while with Mrs Gandhi after the 1980 polls, till he succeeded the last of the ICS members, N. K. Mookerji, as the cabinet secretary. (Mookerji had the distinction of not only being the last ICS to retire from service, but also serving under three Prime Ministers: Morarji Desai, Charan Singh and Mrs Gandhi.) Dr P.C. Alexander was brought out from retirement (which he had sought voluntarily after the Janata came to power) and made the principal secretary in 1981 He was to have retired soon, but the spy scandal rocked his boat and he had to resign on 18 January 1985.

The major fallout of the present expose is that the civilian bureaucracy has been shown in bad light. Just two years ago the Larkins' case had been busted. The two Larkins brothers, both retired general staff officers of the armed forces were found acting as agents of foreign powers. Their access to the headquarters of the army and the air force had helped them to gather classified information. The entire security system of the defence headquarters had to be revamped after the Larkins case. Some years ago an entire brigade of the army posted in Jammu and Kashmir had been arrested for having spied for Pakistan. After the January arrests this year, there has been a tendency among some military top brass to create an impression that while civilian bureaucrats were caught spying, the military was above such allegations. No section of the government machinery can be singled out for disrepute when spy rings are busted. There are parallels between the Larkins case and the Coomar Narain case. Immediately after the arrests were made in the present case, Delhi was agog with rumours, most of them wild. One leading daily went on to say that a dozen secretaries to the government were being interrogated. On a particular day, it was said that the defence production secretary, Mahesh Chandra Sarin, was being sacked because his personal assistant (PA) had been arrested in the spying case. The fact was that at the time when this propaganda about M.C. Sarin was being done, he was attending a meeting in the defence ministry. No effort was made by the government spokesmen to counter these rumours. Perhaps, no one in the government realised that when press reports said that 12 officers of the level of secretaries were being suspected of being spies (without specifying who the "dirty dozen" were), the morale in the government offices was affected. For over ten days officers looked over each other's shoulders trying to spot a spy. Government work suffered.

There are many stories being planted about the extent of damage done by the spies. In these stories there is an underlying effort to malign the civilian bureaucracy as a whole. While there is no doubt that some junior officers have been nabbed, the effort to show the nascent political bureaucracy (represented by the parliamentary secretaries) or the military as being "clean" at the cost of the civilian bureaucracy can be dangerous. After the assassination of the former Prime Minister, the special security district in the capital has been placed under the charge of a lieutenant colonel and two majors (as if no one among the 3,000-strong IPS cadre could be trusted any more). The civilian bureaucracy may be in a state of deterioration, but it is not an evil; it is a necessity in our democratic setup.

Industrialists, to further their business interests, use bureaucrats and military officers alike to spy on the government's affairs. The defence ministry is a major buyer not only in the domestic but also in the international market. The early Eighties have seen a sudden spurt in India's purchases abroad: armaments, aircraft (both civilian and military), petroleum, cement, electronic kits, power plant equipment and many other items. Many bureaucrats have come in contact with foreigners in the process. Frequent trips abroad have become a matter of routine for some officers. Indian industrialists not only keep the politicians happy but also the bureaucrats and lesser functionaries. The old joke among bureaucrats is that while a secretary is not a permanent person in any ministry, the stenographer or the peon is. The industrialists realise this and the lesser functionaries are kept in good humour. Liaison agents for the industrialists operate in Delhi in a big way. Fortunately in India there are festivals throughout the year unlike the annual Christmas in the western world, which is an occasion for giving gifts. Losing money in a card game to an influential officer is the expertise of a successful liaison man. The Diwali and Holi gifts are not given out of mere affection: a retired officer soon realises that the large posse of wellwishers who used to throng his house while in service disappears as soon as he is out of the saddle.

Industrial espionage is in its infancy in India. But industrialists keep a close tab on the government files. In the pre-budget days, some businessmen are known to influence the budgetary exercise in such a way that their competitors find the going difficult after the budget is announced. The industrialist to whom we have referred earlier, the one who bribed his way through the foreign dignitaries' gate at the Teen Murti House after Mrs Gandhi's death, is a specialist in this field.

The bane of this country in the past few years has been that the line of differenciation between the friendly foreigner and the spy has almost disappeared. The wife of the Prime Minister being an Italian, this particular community in Delhi has of late wielded power. Mrs Sonia Gandhi's sister is married to a Spanish diplomat.' This gentleman was suddenly posted by the government of Spain to Delhi after Rajiv Gandhi became active in politics in 1981. The family of Mrs Sonia Gandhi has been off and on staying as guests of a Sicilian-born Italian businessman in Delhi, Ottavio Quattarochi, who represents Snam Progetti. Even after Mrs Gandhi's death, the Maino family from Milan were guests of Quattarochi in Delhi. The special aircraft which flew over the Himalayas scattering the ashes of Mrs Gandhi carried many Italians. This is not to say that family ties have to be ignored. But when at the highest places foreigners have easy access, lower functionaries of the government are confused. And when corruption is declared as a "world phenomenon" by the highest of the land, spies are bound to take advantage of this "global trend" and exploit this country.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

G.S. Bajpai: ideal bureaucrat

The Decline and Fall of the Indian Bureaucrat

It has been a long journey downhill since the days of Jawaharlal Nehru

On 23 November 1984, all the officers of the government of India received an official circular, saying, "Please find enclosed a copy of the article from the book entitled Management in Government on the role of civil service, then and now, by Dr P.C. Alexander, principal secretary to the Prime Minister." Ironically, by 16-17 January 1985, his entire office staff were behind bars, awaiting trial in the biggest spy case the country has ever witnessed since independence.

Dr Alexander stresses at the beginning of his discourse that he was one of those few selected for the central pool of service on whom rules of tenure (i.e. fixed period of deputation from the state to the centre) did not apply. Thus, he had the unique opportunity of participating in the process of decision-making at all levels of the civil service in Delhi, from under-secretary upwards. At the outset, he says he would like to deal with the general allegation that there has been serious deterioration in standards of quality in the present-day civil service compared with the civil service in the pre-independence days. But, according to him, this deterioration is more because we have not been able to understand the fundamental changes that have taken place in the last few decades.

Compared to the older generations, we are now living in the age of instant communication, computers, shuttles and guided missiles. As a result, according to Dr Alexander, if both the old and the new generations make a sincere effort in understanding the implications and importance of these changes, there will be better understanding of each other and less complaints about the deterioration in standards or quality (in the civil service). Every year no more than half a dozen used to come into the Indian Civil Service. The examination was stiff and the education very expensive for anyone to pursue. There are more than 150 recruited in the IAS every year, besides other allied services, where the entrants run into several hundreds in number. When people speak of deterioration in standards, the dimension of numbers is generally highlighted. We start with the assumption that large numbers mean lower standards. It is because of higher education at low cost and wider opportunities to appear at the competitive examinations, coupled with the dimensions of the administration in post-independence India, that larger number of civil servants are required to be recruited. From simple administration, during pre-independence days, of law and order and the revenue-oriented service to a period of the whole range of development-oriented service, it was a real giant leap forward. Negotiations for trade agreements, UNCTAD, IMF, World Bank, export promotion, management of public sector, family planning and a variety of other tasks which the civil service of today has to discharge are quite new and highly complex, demanding great versatility and competence on the part of the officers.

At which point of time did the deterioration in standards set in, as far as the civil service is concerned? According to Dr Alexander, this is of recent origin and there are some distressing trends. Devoid of political sensitivity, the civil servant becomes a wage earner. He, therefore, observes that it will be a sad day for development administration in our country as well as for the civil service if civil servants take their tasks without involvement. In other words, "committed civil service" is the order of the day rather than an exception. Another area identified by Dr Alexander is the creeping cynicism about the tasks one is called upon to do. According to him, even some new entrants to the civil service have fallen victims to a tendency to be hypocritical and cynical about everything. Finally, a new trend in civil service which has come up during the last three or four years is the tendency to dilute the responsibility for decision-making. Even when there is no need to refer a file to another ministry or officer for comments and views, many civil servants now indulge in this special art of pushing files vertically and horizontally, or raising queries not relevant to the subject in an attempt to involve others also in the exercises.

An excessive tendency to keep every file secret or confidential is yet another new trend. Very often this false system of labelling files only leads to leakage of information which should have been secret and to unnecessary secrecy of information which should have been open. With these profound words of wisdom, we are taking a look at what the civil service was yesterday and what it has become today.

There was a time when a minister combined in himself political strength with expertise in the portfolio he handled. Jawaharlal Nehru as minister for external affairs literally trained the hard core of our foreign service. Those who worked under him say that as and when cables and messages from our missions abroad reached his table, he used to dictate the replies to them and even indicate the level at which a reply should go. He was indeed a one-man training centre for the first generation diplomats. Yet, for a civilian like R.N. Banerjee, then secretary general, ministry of external affairs, the preparation of the brief for the Kashmir debate coming up before the United Nations and the nomination of Gopalswamy Iyenger (father of G. Parthasarathy), it became a matter of such heated argument with Nehru that Banerjee resigned in protest instead of being persuaded by Nehru. Later events proved Banerjee right as it was a disaster for India at the United Nations.

N. R. Pillai and Girija Shankar Bajpai laid down the rules of recruitment to the Indian Foreign Service as R. N. Banerjee did as the chairman of the UPSC for recruitment of officers in the IAS. Such was the approach to the basic structure in these services without any interference from any of the political masters that these standards of recruitment remain valid even today. Under such personalities as Sardar Ballavbhai Patel and Govind Ballav Pant as home minister, the relationship with the civil servant was one of mutual trust and admiration. It is said the S. G. Basu Mullik, then district magistrate, Lucknow, was very fond of playing chess and never missed a chance of catching someone even at the back of a shop to have a game. As chief minister of UP, Govind Ballav Pant knew about it but had no occasion to catch the young officer; such was his trust and respect. The comments given by him were enough for Basu Mullik to rise to the rank of secretary to the government of India in the ministry of commerce.

There were instances of a clash of personalities as well. Bhaktavatsalam, then chief minister of Madras did not see eye-to-eye with his home secretary, J. M. Lobo Prabhu, and transferred him as the district magistrate to Nilgiri Hills, the smallest district in the state. Lobo Prabhu resigned in protest. When B. N. Subba Rao, another brilliant ICS officer, started living with his sister-in-law, leaving his wife, Prime Minister Nehru himself sent for him and asked him to resign. He did not accept the argument that it was a private matter. A civil servant was supposed to live an exemplary life before the people. Through public service, quite late in life, Subba Rao became the mayor of Kanpur.

The first time the country was rocked by a scandal was in the mid-Fifties when Feroze Gandhi made a revelation in Parliament on what came to be known as the Haridas Mundra case. By deft manipulation of bogus shares on huge loans from the Life Insurance Company of India (LIC), nationalised only a few years ago, Mundra was cornering one-big company after the other, leading to jealousy among industrialists. It was said that at the age of 32 years, Mundra's personal wealth was around Rs 35 crores at that time. Even Nehru as Prime Minister could not withstand the allegations of corruption with complicity at high places of the government, between the entire ministry of finance and Mundra. So, in one stroke, the finance minister, T. T. Krishnamachari, the governor of the Reserve Bank of India, H. V. R. Iyenger, the finance secretary, H. M. Patel and the chairman of the LIC resigned and took the blame upon themselves

After a few years again the nation was shaken by another event which came to be known as the pipeline scandal, leading to the resignation of the minister for petroleum, K. D. Malaviya and the secretary, P. R. Nayak.

The people still had faith in the political leadership and the structure of the civil service. Was it not Nehru who recognised the brilliance of the finance secretary, C. D. Deshmukh, who later became governor, Reserve Bank of India? Nehru made him resign from the ICS and contest the general election from Bombay to make him his finance minister. The socialist pattern of the budget was left to such a man to frame and pilot in the Parliament session for quite a few years.

Yet the biggest jolt to the bureaucracy by the political masters came during 1961-62 in the wake of the Chinese aggression. The then defence minister of India, V. K. Krishna Menon would listen to no one, either from the armed forces or in his ministry. He was the most intelligent among all and it was a one-man ministry, receiving orders from him only. The Chinese aggression was a national disaster and it is now a part of history. Gone were the days of complementary roles for the minister and his officials. This was the beginning of the era of wily politicians and chosen bureaucrats. It was said that only after a severe reprimand by the then President of India that Nehru agreed to ask Krishna Menon to resign. National humiliation was ignored with a mere resignation of the minister.

This was the period when the civil servant found out that by currying favour with politicians, he could not only avoid leaving Delhi, but come to prominence in important assignments in the government of India. For such chosen civil servants, a central pool was created to perpetuate their stay and influence in Delhi. Dr P. C. Alexander and P. K. Kaul, the present finance secretary, belong to this group. There was nothing to worry about the continuity of the children's education, change of residence, etc.

This was also the time to get rich quickly, by sharing the fortune with the politician on the rise. One morning there was a theft at the house of S. K. Patil, minister and treasurer of the Congress party. He was out of Delhi when it happened. So, the police was called and V. Shankar, ICS, the guide and mentor of Patil was also informed. Before the police could begin an inventory of what was stolen from the house V. Shankar scolded everyone in the house and no police was allowed inside. The steel cupboards were filled with currency notes and in the absence of the minister, it was the duty of the eminent civil servant to protect the good name of his master.

This tendency also spread to the states, bringing in manipulations in general elections. It was a world of give and take. The post-Nehru era saw the spread of the cancer of corruption without any check in all the important government departments. Tulmohan Ram, a Member of Parliament became a symbol, thanks to his association with Lalit Narayan Mishra, minister of foreign trade and later commerce. It was a common talk of permit-raj in Mishra's ministry. In course of a debate in Parliament, Atal Behari Vajpayee sarcastically commented once: "For our honourable Prime Minister, Srimati Gandhi, everywhere in the government, it is the same: ham do, hamare do—mother and son (Sanjay Gandhi), Lalit Narayan (Mishra) and Tulmohan (Ram)."

S. Shankar's residence at the President's estate

Such was the inflow of loose cash that L. N. Mishra's special assistant resigned his job and became a leading film producer/distributor with Mughal-e-Azam. He has also produced the recent film, Razia Sultan. The special assistant also became a leading local representative of multinational companies like Mitsubishi of Japan, etc. The private secretary of another prominent minister, Jagjivan Ram, a mere stenographer, also quit his job, after 15 years of service at a ripe young age, to become the owner of a guest house in Vasant Vihar, a posh locality of Delhi, besides becoming the sole selling agent of a leading paper industry in the country. He also became the local representative of a number of East European companies dealing in arms and aircraft. What more could a civil servant look for when he was in association with such an eminent minister?

There has never been a looking back thereafter. Either the minister's wife or son or brother-in-law became the business partner with the secretary or additional or joint secretary and it all became a household affair in government business. The businessman from within the country or abroad had only to look around in Delhi as to who was whose contact to finalise a deal, with manipulation in the tender papers, local or global, mark-up in price, managing the negotiating committee, etc.

Giving small tips and presents to the village patwari or the police constable for small mercies has been the age-old practice in India. But the national examples of corruption made the control and supervision of the civil servants down the line disappear. With ever-increasing recruitment of candidates from all sections of society, the temptation to get rich quickly became the sole motive of many after joining the service. Being the district magistrate, the civil servant also became the president of the local Rotary Club with the neighbouring rice mill owner and the petrol pump dealer as his two vice-presidents. At times of inter-state smuggling of rice or hoarding of petrol, the approach to the district magistrate became simple and fast, thanks to the Rotary spirit.

To cite a real life example, a 1970 batch IAS district magistrate of Lucknow was given additional charge of the post of commissioner of the local municipality. By means of membership of the local club, the owner of a huge residential building, where the district magistrate's office was also located, under notice from the Urban Land Ceiling Act, got a certificate under the hand and seal of the district magistrate and commissioner of the municipality that it was a commercial establishment and, therefore, the Urban Land Ceiling Act did not apply. To the surprise of the state government, the owner showed this order in the court and got the case adjourned. Consideration for this official favour was said to be a crore of rupees to the young officer who took so much upon himself. Yet, in course of a vigilance enquiry against him, he got himself posted to a district, on the neighbourhood of Delhi. Here again, he managed a piece of land in his in-law's name, about 50 acres, for Rs 25 a square yard, though the price at that time was around Rs 500 a square yard, took about half a crore of rupees as loan and started a poultry farm. By spending some money, he got his resignation letter from the IAS accepted by the state government and has settled down in a posh locality in Delhi with a few chauffeur-driven cars. It is said this officer is a man worth about five crores of rupees now and is a strong aspirant for the Congress(I) ticket for the ensuing Assembly election from UP. Everyone in the state government knows about this case but political proximity can do wonders.

The distinction of facing the first adjournment motion in 1980, soon after Mrs Gandhi formed her government, went to the then energy minister, whose special assistant, an under-secretary in the central secretariat service, was granting special favours by issuing coal permits to a particular group of dealers in West Bengal. Not only did the government vigorously defend such action by a junior official but the minister was heard boasting later on that the entire opposition could not do what this officer was doing: generating about Rs 20 lakhs a week for the cause of the party The same arrangement continued through the same official when the minister shifted to railways. When the activities came to be well known, the official was suddenly made the chairman of a public sector undertaking, without the re-

A securityman guards Dr P.C. Alexander's house

The CIA's Operations

In the late Sixties, Mr Y.K. Sharma (the names mentioned in this incident are fictitious for obvious reasons) an Indian government official was posted in a western capital. During his stay there he admitted his son to a school in the city. The young boy naturally made a number of friends and among them was an American named Harry. Many years later Mr Sharma rose to occupy an important position in a sensitive department in Delhi. Meanwhile, because of the nature of the work he was handling, the Americans started investigation into Mr Sharma's past, found out about his posting in the western capital and discovered that Harry had studied with his son. Next, Harry, who was then working in the US government, was asked if he wanted a posting in Delhi. In Delhi, Harry renewed contacts with his old friend and persuaded him to copy secret information from the files his father used to bring home from office and hand them over to him. Fortunately, this was discovered by the IB. This is just one example of how the CIA operates in this country to ferret out information.

The kind of information the CIA is interested in relates more to the Soviet Union than to India: principally, details of Soviet equipment in the Indian armed forces. It is aimed at finding out more about Soviet arms development. It is simpler for a CIA agent to operate in a country like India than either in the Soviet Union or any of the East Bloc countries. It is easier and often cheaper, to obtain information from the Indian defence ministry (as has been proved from the recent spy scandal) than it would be from any of the East Bloc countries where a strict tab is kept on visitors from the West.

That the West is largely interested in details of the Soviet arms in this country has been further corroborated by disclosures in the French publication L'Express, following the recent spy scandal involving Alain Bolley, who has been accused of spying for the CIA. According to L'Express, French agents had a meeting with an Indian engineer in a Paris hotel and negotiated the purchase from him of exclusive documents relating to the latest supplies of Soviet military equipment to India. In the Larkins' case what the Americans wanted to know related to electronic, avionics and other fittings inside the MiG-25 and specialised equipment in T-72 tanks. Again, the information that both J.S. Gill and Lt Col Singh were passing on to the CIA from the defence library related to Soviet equipment.

It has been claimed that after Pakistan's crackdown on East Pakistan (now Bangladesh) three crucial Indian decisions: to intervene militarily, to sign a treaty with USSR and to declare a cease-fire became known to the CIA before they were made public or even implemented. Henry Kissinger, in fact, said that a member of Mrs Gandhi's cabinet had revealed that there could be a possible attack by India on Pakistan in 1971. But how much of this is true?

Saumitra Banerjee, New Delhi

quired approval of the Public Enterprises Selection Board (PESB), as indicated by the cabinet secretary seeking approval of the Prime Minister. It was duly approved.

In recent years, with the crack of dawn, the commissioner of police, Delhi, the vice-chairman, Delhi Development Authority, the president of the New Delhi Municipal Committee would start jostling with all and sundry in front of the Prime Minister's residence with some file in their hands to catch a glimpse of either "Madam" (as the Prime Minister was fondly called) or Sanjay or Rajiv (who as a pilot did not have any clue to such solicitations). Many times, it was a fruitless wait, but showing the face first thing in the morning at the first house of the city was important, and part of the official duty. "Close to the house" was a phrase coined at this time, meaning the proximity to the house of the Prime Minister, where even the cook of the family, Nathuram, was a powerful person, arranging darshan on split-second signal. Of course, such a favour was not for the asking and, surely, not without a consideration.

After the death of Sanjay Gandhi, the entire arrangement of such darshans and favours were more streamlined. Every room at 1, Akbar Road, later at house number 2A, Motilal Nehru Marg in Delhi had an expert. Whether a secretary to the government, the cabinet secretary, chairmen of some public undertakings or banks, trooped in with all kinds of papers, secret or not secret, for urgent discussions and directions, they were dealt with promptly. The air was full of awe and expectation, for getting the attention of Rajiv Gandhi, who pondered over the fate of the nation, through such "informal" consultations and till then undecided about joining politics. No one in the civil service ever dared to ask, even in a remote roundabout way, to whom they were showing such papers and having such discussions, and whether such disclosures amounted to anything under the Official Secrets Act.

About a fortnight before the Republic Day parade in 1981, it suddenly occurred to the intelligence bureau and other similar agencies that as the President was going to take the salute and the entire government of India right from the Prime Minister to the mid-level officials would sit and watch the parade, if a rolling tank was suddenly taken round, it would be death for all there. Neither human hands nor rifle bullets could stop such a tank. No one would be able to run to safety since at the back of the place was a stretch of water. The chief of RAW, accompanied by the director of the IB and the director of Military Intelligence discussed the contingency plan, not among themselves but with someone, who is now an important parliamentary secretary, then an executive of a private company, standing on Rajpath at about eleven o'clock.

Dr Alexander in his recent discourse did not find much of a deterioration in standards, except understanding the nature of the problems facing the civil service in its proper perspective. He glossed over the painful distortions in the service under his very nose during his entire stay as the principal secretary to the Prime Minister. If there have been distressing trends among the civil servants, he has not been able to identify them in his otherwise excellent essay on the subject. However, he concluded with a snide remark, which seems to have more meaning than one: A foreign diplomat, who was a great friend of India once told him that in this country, there were three categories of files, "secret," "top secret" and "open secret."

How true since we have discussed only the open secrets in the government today.

A Special Correspondent

Admirable Bureaucrats

There are few heroes among bureaucrats in the pantheon of the Indian civil servants. Ask a civil servant today who the men he admires are and it will be a long time before he comes up with a name. Many ICS officers of the past, the "chosen people" trained by the British to be the "guardians" of society are often thought to have been good administrators and good men, but only in parts. The same is true of the civil servants of the Indian Administrative Services (IAS) who, perhaps, had and have a more difficult task because the Indian political masters of the mid-60s began to impose themselves upon the bureaucracy. The latter-day bureaucrats, considered to be no less in terms of ability, although, perhaps, occasionally in intellectual prowess, might appear to be lesser men. But that is only because the times have changed. Decay has set in the body politic and with the decline in public morality, the decline in the standard of the bureaucracy has come about. Decline, but not fall, insist the bureaucrats.

Civil servants cited most often are Sir Girija Shankar Bajpai, India's first secretary-general, Sir N.R. Pillai, H.V.R. Iyengar, V.P. Menon, Bhagvan Sahay, H.M. Patel, Dharam Vira, R.C. Dutt, N.M. Buch, R.P. Narona, B.K. Nehru. L.K. Jha, K.B. Lall and others from the golden age of bureaucracy. Some of them became larger-than-life figures in the post-independence period. The qualities for which their successors admire them the most are decisiveness, integrity and that now rare ability to talk back to the masters: political or bureaucratic. It was a quality which required independence of mind and a certain toughness. It has now eroded over the years, especially after the Emergency. The Emergency is considered a cut-off point for the independence of the bureaucracy.

Among the civil servants admired from more recent times although not without qualifying reservations are Mahesh Buch from the Madhya Pradesh cadre and P.S. Appu, the former director of the Lal Bahadur Shastri Academy of Administration in Mussorie. The former is admired for his brilliance and his unconventional manner: he did not believe in the PA system, leaving his doors wide open, the latter for having resigned from the service over a matter of principle.

The man who is idolised, and perhaps the only one to whom the formidable P.N. Haksar "pays homage" is Sir Girija Shankar Bajpai whom Jawaharlal Nehru chose as secretary-general in the ministry of external affairs. A graduate in science from the university of Allahabad, Mr Bajpai later read history at Oxford. He sat for the ICS examination in England and was later to become the service's youngest secretary. He was, as were many in those days, a man of many parts. His son, Mr U.S. Bajpai, formerly of the Indian Foreign Service, describes him: "A keen collector of carpets, voracious reader, he religiously read Gibbon, was a master of the English language and was extremely fond of good clothes. In fact, when he became secretary-general, Panditji (Jawaharlal Nehru) took him to his tailor in London to get his sherwani made."

The advice Sir Girija gave his son on how to be a good civil servant stood him in good stead. "When my father was secretary-general and I was a young under-secretary," remembers Mr U.S. Bajpai, "he told me, 'The only advice I can give you is do not sit on papers. Take decisions one way or the other and be prepared to take the rap if it goes wrong Nothing is worse than postponing decisions. Time might eventually resolve the problem but you will not be doing your job.' The other bit of advice he gave me is: 'Do not write reams and reams on files. Be precise and get straight to the point.'"

Nor, as what soon became the norm, did Sir Girija stand outside the PM's door and wait. Recalled Mr U.S. Bajpai, "Mr M.O. Mathai, Panditji's private secretary started writing on the papers my father used to send to the Prime Minister. My father told the PM, that he would rather leave. Mr Mathai stopped writing on my father's papers. Nor did he go through Mathai or stand and wait outside the PM's door— as did many people."

The decline in the bureaucracy was really set in motion in the post-Emergency phase when civil servants came to be divided into "our men" (meaning loyal to the party in power) and "their men" (meaning those in the opposition). In 1977, the Janata government carried out its cleaning-up exercise. In 1980 when the Congress(I) came to power, its broom moved briskly, in fact in 1981, 48 of the 52 secretaries of the government were changed. Purges became the order of the day. The late Seventies saw the unhappy phenomenon of bureaucrats hitching themselves to politicians: to MLAs in the states and MPs at the centre. Since merit was fast becoming an old-fashioned virtue—currying favour with those at the top or those who knew people at the top became the almost full-time activity of many bureaucrats. Appointments and transfers became important levers for the politicians. The ambitious bureaucrats in the middle and lower rungs soon learned to play the game. Says a young bureaucrat: "We no longer have the confidence that we will go up the ladder on our own ability. Many of us do not concentrate upon our work but on contacts, on getting to know so and so. Work gets neglected."

What is more serious is the sense of insecurity prevalent amongst the bureaucrats. "In the days of the raj the babu knew that he would end up with the title of a Rai Bahadur or at least a house. Today we cannot survive. There is nothing to look forward to. Nor are we martyrs, or Gandhians in days when there are no Gandhis around." Another bureaucrat is more direct: "The IAS man today can't afford his daily glass of whisky. The ICS could afford his Scotch. Frankly, I would say that the biggest snare for the bureaucracy is drink."

So, with neither security, nor incentive, nor praise for good work—in addition to being in a sort of straight-jacket which does not allow him to question the boss—the bureaucrat does feel increasingly frustrated. To say that the civil servant of today is worse than his predecessor is unfair and simplistic. With changing times, the present-day bureaucrat has more challenging tasks. He has come closer to the people, than – in the time of the British. But with the task of nation-building and development, his job has been enlarged. With development has also come more money to "deal with," hence the opportunity for making more money.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

Ramakrishna Sarada Mission Matri Bhavan –Hospital

An Appeal for Funds

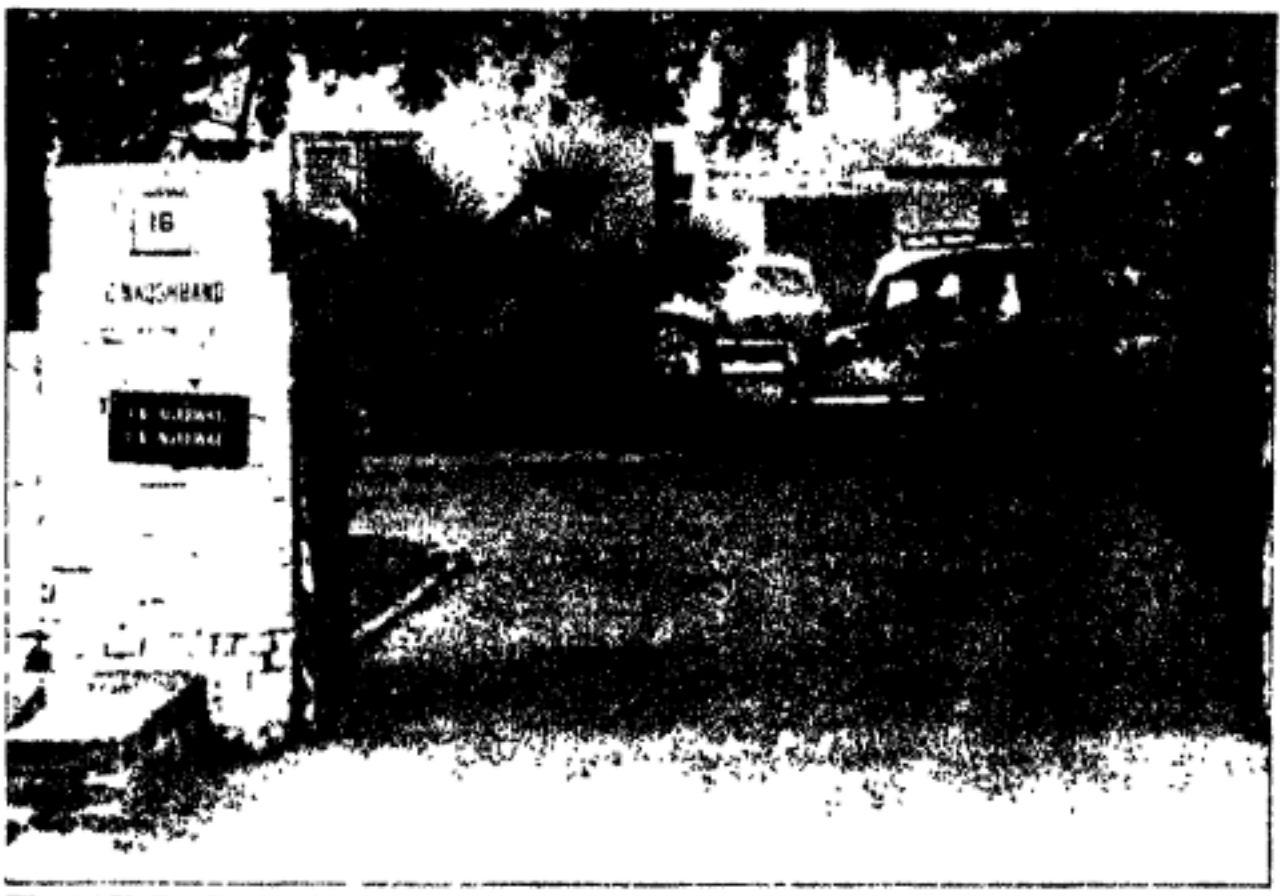
□ Ramakrishna Sarada Mission Matri Bhavan is a charitable maternity hospital run under the auspices of the Ramakrishna Sarada Mission, Dakshineswar, Calcutta 700076, a religious body registered in 1960 under the Act 1860.

□ Started in 1950 with only 10 beds, this hospital has been growing steadily. At present, there are 64 beds, 32 of which are free, an operation theatre, a labour room, a clinical laboratory, outdoor clinics and special baby clinics. Medicines are supplied free to needy patients and children.

□ The cost of diet, medicines and other services have been rising constantly. Today it costs Rs. 10,000 per year to maintain one free bed. The Matri Bhavan has been running on a deficit budget for sometime. Apart from this, the institution has taken up the Poor Children Welfare Scheme since 1967, in which high-protein bread is supplied daily to 200 children from very low income areas, as well as 56 expectant mothers.

□ To render better services to the public, the hospital needs to be extended. The cost of the numerous important constructions, including buying a plot of land near the hospital and maintenance of the wards is about Rs 12 lakhs.

□ We therefore, humbly request the generous public to come forward and help a noble cause.



□ All donations are exempt from Income Tax under Sec 80G of the Income Tax Act 1961.

□ Cheques may be drawn in favour of Ramakrishna Sarada Mission Matri Bhavan and be sent to the Secretary,
Ramakrishna Sarada Mission Matri Bhavan,
7A, Sree Mohan Lane, Calcutta 700 026.

Pravrajika Muktiprana
General Secretary
Ramakrishna Sarada Mission

The Salesmen

Many a bureaucrat's omissions during servicetime are compensated by commissions after retirement. Deferred payments are not unknown in the world of liaison agents, who dominate the corridors of power in Delhi. In the past few years, India's purchases abroad have steeply increased. The importance of the liaison agency business has gone up correspondingly. The liaison agent is not a legal entity. Any Indian individual or foreign organisation dealing with its foreign counterpart requires full disclosure of information to the Reserve Bank of India, under Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (FERA). Postfacto approval is banned. But the foreign firms maintain "reference offices," which can't have monetary transactions in India. The monetary deals are mostly done abroad, nearer home in Nepal, Hongkong or Dubai. It is not possible for most foreign firms to maintain a regular office in India. They prefer to operate through Indian businessmen who have the right connections and in lieu of these services, the liaison agent gets money from his principals abroad. In many cases, especially in defence deals, the government pays agency commission to the Indian agents. They are cheque payments, made in Indian rupees. The principal, if he so desires, can give extra commission to the liaison agent, but the government on its own, while making payments for purchases abroad, makes cheque payments to the recognised agents. The payments made in Indian currency in fact save that much of foreign exchange component in the deal.

The 16 Hailey Road office of SLM-Maneklal

Liaison agents have come under a cloud following the arrest of the Delhi regional manager of the SLM-Maneklal group, Coomar Narain. Two years ago, when the Larkins' case was exposed, another businessman working as a liaison agent, Jaspal Singh Gill, was arrested. A few years earlier, when the Thal Vaishet deal was exposed in Parliament, the liaison agents for the American firm, C.F. Braun (which had been recommended for the grant of the fertiliser plant contract by two highpowered technical committees but bypassed on political considerations; Italy's Snam Progetti bagged the order) were also accused of "spying." In that case, a former sheriff of Bombay, Narendra Kapadia, and his nephew Nanak Sheth (the son of retired ICS officer, G.L. Sheth, former defence production secretary), were arrested because a member of Parliament, K.P. Unnikrishnan, had managed to get hold of the secret files to prove the fallacy in the government's decision. (In the Thal Vaishet case, though respectable people were arrested and paraded as spies, till now the CBI has not been able to book anyone. The case has not made much headway, though it made big headlines in 1981.)

Who are the liaison agents? Many retired government officers enter this trade. In some cases sons of influential politicians and bureaucrats take up this trade because of their contacts. Military officers find this trade lucrative after retirement. If any particular section of the government officers enters this business after retirement, it is the retired services officers. Of these, the officers who have served in the procurement or inspection branches of the armed forces are the ones who soon after retirement start peddling the wares which they were either buying or inspecting while in service. It is a vicious circle: the retired officer can easily invoke the old respect he commanded from his subordinates and have his way while the deal is negotiated. For the serving officer, the lure of a similar job after retirement is attractive enough for him to cooperate with his predecessor, the present liaison agent. If an enquiry is held on the number of retired services officers involved in the liaison business, then the results would be revealing.

There is no particular lifestyle that the liaison agents lead. They are courtesans in a businessman's garb. They entertain, they bribe and have their way in the government offices. The liaison agent can be an excellent cover for espionage rings. Suppose a liaison man is selling a particular type of armament, then while he makes enquiry about classified matters from officers in the clubs and even in the offices, it looks innocent enough—it is rarely suspected that the query has come from a foreign hand.

Liaison agents not only entertain in India, but when official delegations go abroad, then the principals take care of the officers who are sent out on meagre allowances. The average Indian officer's conception of corruption is not big money. Good food, liquor and help in making purchases abroad are enough gestures for most of them to feel indebted. The liaison agent's main friend is the politician—apart from entertainment, the politician looks for political funds. Interestingly, during the recent Lok Sabha elections, Indian businessmen operating at home were not asked for funds by the ruling party. The election expenses did not go down. One wonders from where the political funds came from.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya

'The Bureaucracy Has Been Degraded'

P.N. Haksar tells Madhu Jain

Q: Would you say that there has been a decline in the standards of bureaucracy and bureaucrats?*

A: There has been a lot of loose talk about the decline and fall of the bureaucracy. There is even an assumption that one can dispense with the bureaucracy.. But I would say that as long as you have a state with a capital S—whatever kind of state it is—(a state born out of turmoil, a state born from a revolution....) it cannot function in a vacuum. It has to arm itself. The civil service, army, police force, rent collectors etc.—all these are arms of the state. There cannot be as such a decline and fall of the arms but of the body politic itself. Bureaucracy is a system, it is part of the political administration of a given state or time. If there has been a decline and fall of the bureaucracy, then there has been a decline and fall of political parties, the judicial system, magistracy, the legal system etc. All these are inter-connected.

Q: We are all to blame...

A: If there was something wrong with my arm, the doctor would not amputate it...he would see the body as a whole, would he not? The trouble with us in India is that we see one little thing and come to a false conclusion.

Q: Yes, but all systems do appear to be running down, whether it is the bureaucracy or the police force or...Is something wrong with the basic structure?

A: Things are pretty bad if we start diagnosing... Take (the case of) God. He, according to all religions (whatever its concept of God must have been), created the earth, the moon, the stars etc.— even in Hindu mythology. Now if God created them he could as easily say that they could move according to my whims, but, he felt that this would lead to chaos. They were, therefore, subject to regulations God did not after all make the sun turn around the earth. Bureaucracy is a system which is subject to rules and regulations. Appointments should not be whimsical. Who makes them? The political side of the system makes them. And if the whole system is outside rules and regulations, we are bound to have a decline and fall.

Q: In morality as well?

A: There is this question of public morality. We take it for granted that we are all patriotic But there were Mir Jafar and Jagat Seth who betrayed their countrymen for the East India Company. Today we do not have one Mir Jafar but a spy ring with a lot of people...An antidote to this is patriotism.

Q. What about your own experience as a bureaucrat?

A: I came to bureaucracy from the legal profession...I would say that there is too much political interference in many areas—especially this disease of transfers and postings. My father was in the government service, there was no system of people getting transferred so often. Now this has become the norm: MLAs are even given quotas for transfers; bureaucrats have to pay for these transfers. Therefore, some of them become corrupt.

Q: Did not the British by keeping the bureaucrats segregated from the rest of society, by making them an elite of sorts, prevent their being corrupted?

A: If you were in the Indian Civil Service, it was considered a worthwhile, respected profession. The British were ruthless in observing the rule of meritocracy. But, they looked at all Indians as bloody blackies and they wanted the best of the blackies. Today we have parochial considerations—whether you are from the north, south, etc. The Indianness breaks down under parochialism. This used to be the case at the state level, now it is at the central level as well.

Q: Would you say that there was a golden age of the bureaucracy in the past?

A: Golden past it was not. The ICS was part of the system. We borrowed the systems and did not create either the parliamentary or bureaucratic systems. We might have borrowed the steel frame of the ICS but we did not borrow the framework within which it operated. We shifted it to a society with a semi-feudal outlook.

Q: But some of the maharajas did have a system of administration which worked well, an oriental system so to speak?

A: They had a system of personal loyalty. Can you run the whole of India on this? Not all the maharajas had shining examples of good administration. There were some exceptions though.

Q: Do you think that the PM's office has become too big and has completely overshadowed the cabinet secretariat?

A: Nowhere in the world today can Presidents or Prime Ministers do without a group of people to do their staff work. There are so many economic, scientific, technical, financial areas; Prime Ministers and Presidents do not have knowledge on all these aspects. Nehru had a staff, he also had Sir Girija Shankar who was the first secretary general...

Q: Any ideal bureaucrats?

A: I pay homage to one bureaucrat I have met in my life, Sir Girija Shankar Bajpai. The rest are ok. He was a man of outstanding ability. He followed the morality of a civil servant to perfection.

Q: How would you describe this morality?

A: Whoever your master may be for the time being, you should carry out policies with the utmost integrity—provided there is a policy and not tender your advice divorced from the real facts of the case. Nor should you look to what the boss might or might not like. One should disregard his whims.

Q: Should Dr Alexander's resignation have been accepted? There are some murmurs of discontent amongst some sections of the bureaucracy.

A: Dr Alexander's resignation was normal and natural. If I were principal secretary and had three personal secretaries who were implicated (mine were great men, much greater than I could ever be) I would have resigned, the responsibility would have been mine... when that terrible thing took place, when Mrs Gandhi was assassinated the IB chap was removed, so was the police commissioner. Kao submitted his resignation and it was accepted. There should be accountability, one cannot just say that the little fellow did it.

Q: To return to the subject of corruption, what is really the malaise of our society?

A: The corruption is in our soul. We are often corrupted by our own cynicism. Cynicism is the most corrosive, corrupting thing. We live for the day, shrug our shoulders and say it is bound to be like that. There is no goodness, no kindness. Cynicism is an inevitable product of society when it has no purpose, no shared vision. If a society has no shared vision of its own future, it is fertile ground for cynicism or what I call philistinism.

P.N. Haksar (extreme right) with Pakistani diplomats

Q: Was it not there earlier?

A: Before independence each man and child, even the poor and the wretched, shared a vision of freedom. When freedom came, there was this dream to build something. The ideals gradually eroded. We talk about secularism, we are communalists at heart. We talk about egalitarianism and build rampant inequality....Everyday we violate the fine things in our Constitution like equality, secularism...Look at Bhiwandi, Moradabad etc. First we had Hindu-Muslim riots, now we have Hindu-Sikh riots. Then there is the conflict in Assam...people say it is all regionalism...What is the scheme for diversity as well as unity?

Q: Would you be able to offer any solutions? Is there any?

A: The solution is a common recognition of the problem. I deeply believe there is a solution...but there can be no prescription without a correct diagnosis.

Q: How does one begin?

A: You can't have a complete sweep, the past is there and it has to be understood.. We deal in myths today. We have a Hindu history, a Muslim history and now a Sikh history and now that the great Telugu Desam is going to become Bharat Desam—their history with the Vijaynagar empire... then there is the whole mythology of history of the Justice Party, DK, DMK, AIADMK.

Q: What about the nexus between the bureaucrat and the businessman which exists today? Should the two not be isolated?

A: You cannot live with a chastity belt—it will not work if you feel unsafe from within. The business world is a part of the world. If the people in the business world feel that they are the financiers of the political process, it should be done openly, as it is in the US. I believe in an open system. Companies do make donations here but it is illegal and under the table. Why should it be driven underground? In the US there are these dinners to raise funds—200 dollars a plate or something, but then there are proper checks—let there be public scrutiny.

Q: What about the self-image of a bureaucrat?

A: When I defended the bureaucrat, I wanted to point out that the bureaucrat does not live in isolation, he lives in a real world and works under politicians. During the time of the British, it was under imperialism. Now the surveillance is by MPs and MLAs...in the changing world of business, commerce, trade, international trade one should know that temptations exist in such an environment. Moral standards, standards of public morality should be set at the highest level, it has to trickle down—not the other way round. "Jaise raja, waise praja." Public life has been degraded and along with it the bureaucracy.

Q: Religion keeps getting mixed up with politics, often to achieve political ends ..

A: Religion is a good thing, a sacred matter but it is between human beings and their creators—it is a private and personal matter...Religion is also the last refuge of political scoundrels.

Q: Are you optimistic about our future?

A: I am always optimistic..We still have in the age group of 40 to 50 very dedicated, fine human beings in our services who cannot be corrupted.

Put your conference on its feet without running around in circles

Hand it over to the professionals. Air-India's Congresses and Conventions team will set the stage and see it successfully through.

They'll offer you all their experience in convention planning — absolutely free! They'll work with you right from inception by helping you bid for India as the conference venue. Promoting your conference abroad. Liaising with your delegates. Assisting in preparing their kits. Arranging hotel bookings. And transporting them to Delhi or any other city in India. On a wide range of low, low group and individual fares.

What's more, they'll even provide freighter services at special rates. In case you need to fly in special equipment for the conference.

Of course, they're backed by Air-India's worldwide network of 145 offices. And by Delhi's superb conference venues. Like the Talkatora Stadium or the Indoor Sports Complex. Ideal for large conventions ranging from 3000 to 25000. Or, the 9 new hotels in Delhi, most of which offer excellent conference facilities.

Or even the ultra-modern Shere-e-Kashmir Conference Centre at Srinagar. Which offers you a choice between two large and two small conference rooms as well as a 600 seat auditorium with simultaneous translation facilities in five languages and film projection facilities for both 16 mm and 35 mm. Plus four committee rooms, exclusive documentation and communication equipment, banquet space for 500 persons, an exhibition gallery and a press room. All attached to the superb 5-star Centaur Lake View Hotel right next to Dal Lake.

Naturally, with such services, it's no surprise that Air-India has been closely involved with the 12th International Leprosy Congress, the World Mining Congress, the 59th International Convention of World Association of Detectives Conference and many more.

When you're planning your next conference, get in touch with us at the following address. So as your conference takes off you'll still have both feet on the ground.

Air-India
Congresses & Conventions
6th Floor, Vandana, 11, Tolstoy Marg,
New Delhi 110 001 Tel: 344225
Cable: AIR-INDIA

You host it. We'll organise it.

Member
International Congress
and Convention Association

AIR-1518

The Russians are Here

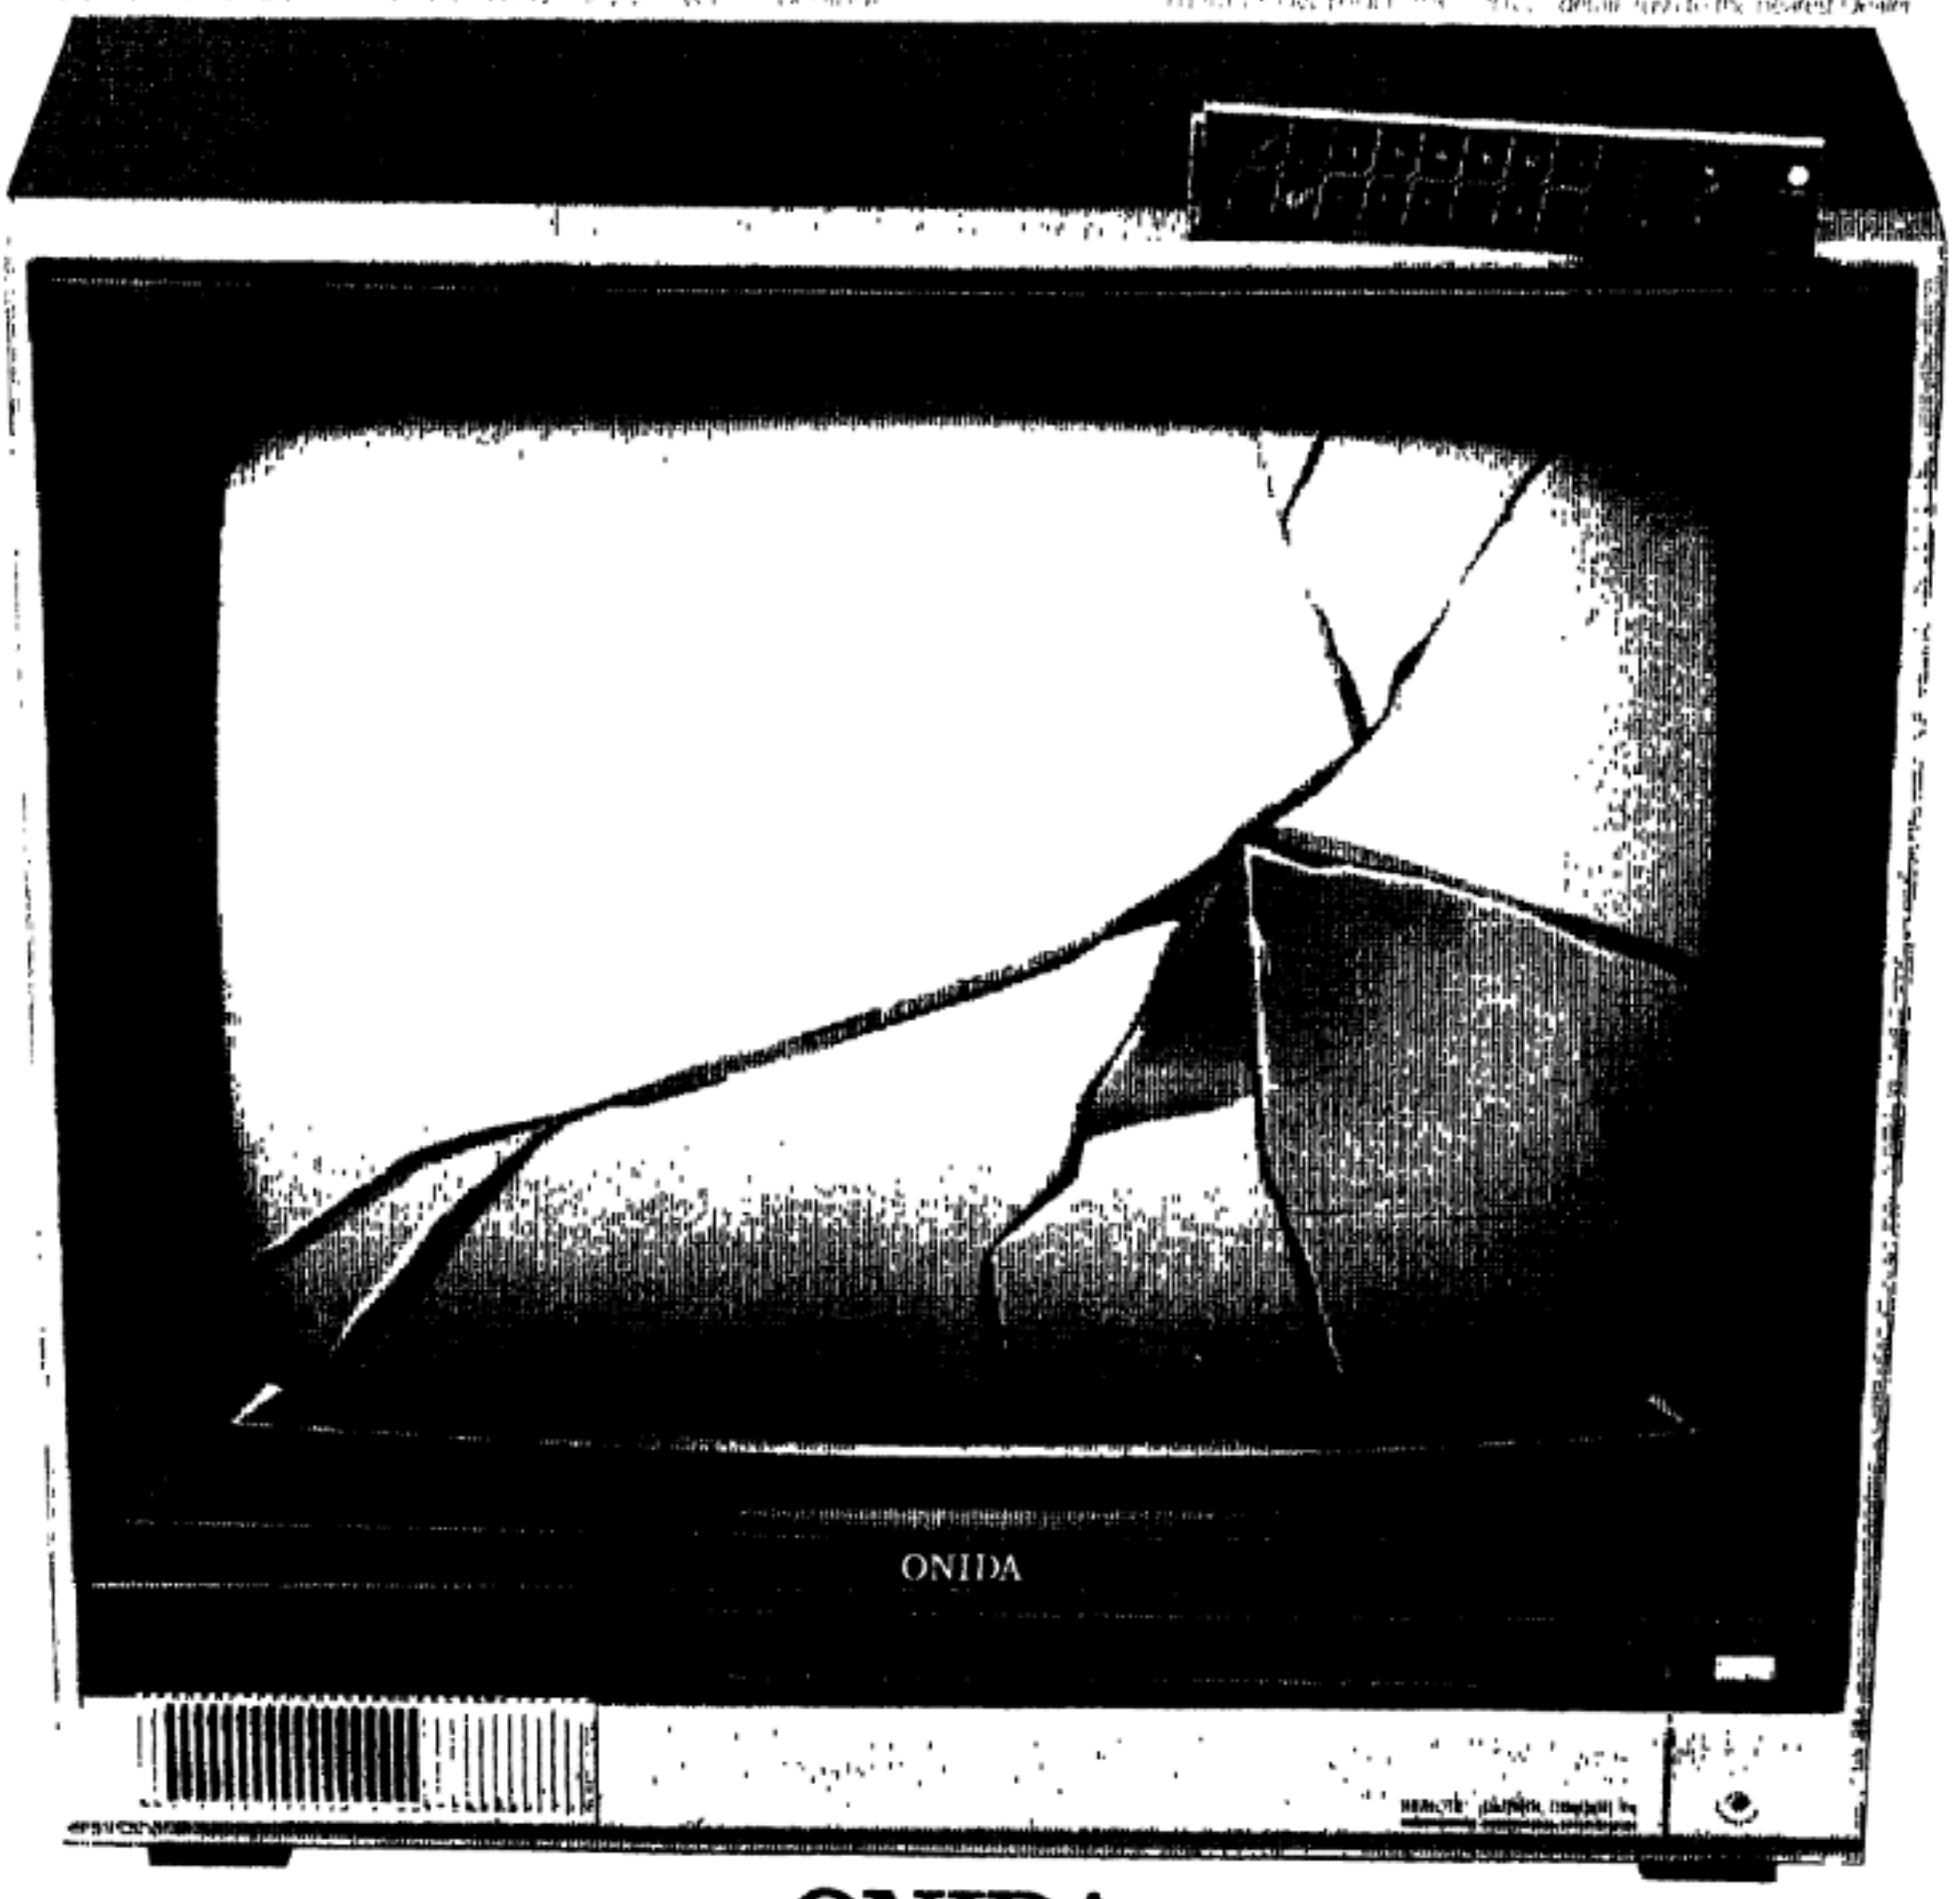
How the KGB operates in India

India is believed to have one of the largest concentration of KGB men in South Asia. The KGB, the successor of Stalin's dreaded Cheka, carries out an important range of secret operations in this country through its first chief directorate (the foreign directorate). In Asia, India has become the key target of the KGB, not so much because it wants to engineer the overthrow of the government but primarily to ensure that it does not swing away from the USSR in policy matters and remains a "friendly" nation. Of course, in addition to this the KGB continues its efforts to capture enemy secrets and to infiltrate opposition intelligence agencies. (India provides a seat to monitor the activities of the CIA in South Asia).

In addition, the KGB has come to perform a number of other, more explicitly political functions: Moscow has broadened its efforts to win friends and influence people. In this it adopts a number of measures: military and economic aid programmes, official propaganda and the grant of scholarships for study in the USSR.

However, there is another level of operation: KGB agents work quietly through leftist politicians and students. And it is here that the KGB has an advantage in India: the presence of communist parties in this country. In the party member the KGB man often finds a kindred spirit, ready to help in furthering ideological goals. Such a person may, without realising it, be helping the KGB man in gathering information and may still regard himself to be as patriotic as any other citizen. It is only his ideological commitment to communism which may make him a willing tool in the hands of the Soviet agent. Besides, finances from the USSR, through various concerns engaged in exporting goods like tobacco and cotton, makes the party a willing ally.

KGB agents too believe in what is regarded as "persuasive conversion." Apart from normal diplomatic contacts, KGB agents develop informal relationships with local people they consider important and occasionally take the opportunity to "remind" them about the "military minded Americans" and the "profit seeking capitalists." And it is usually from such informal contacts that opportunities come to cultivate them more seriously either as spies or as agents who would "help" the KGB whenever required. These people can range from the publisher who would happily accept Soviet embassy advertisements to keep his publication going to a "liaison" man who would willingly work on a monthly salary as an intermidiary in negotiating contracts or simply as a conduit for passing on important information. Friends can also be cultivated by contributing to the election funds of an MLA or by greasing the palms of a senior government official who gets his "cut" out of a trade deal with the USSR.



However, the KGB is known to adopt blackmail as a method to gather information in case its contact refuses to be pliable. For instance, Harry Rositzke, the CIA station chief in Delhi from 1957-62, in his book, KGB: The Eyes of Russia, describes the incident of an Indian embassy employee in Moscow, who was photographed in a drunken orgy and blackmailed into spying for them on his return to India. He was, however, discovered by the IB.

The KGB has been helped in its operations in India by the rupee trade arrangement, while the CIA took advantage of the PL-480 funds which were available in lieu of the wheat imports from the USA in the last decade. Rice and tobacco exports from India were handled by some select firms, run by former communists. Chinar Exports, the largest export house in India, is owned by a group of former CPI cardholders. The editor of a leftist newspaper from Delhi (which has of late been known for its pro-government line) along with an opposition personality, who was active in the World Peace Council activities, too operated on

Illustration Bulbul Sharma

The most envied colour TV within a stone's throw!

ONIDA

20"colour TV with cordless remote. It's been worth waiting!

the trade-cum-espionage front. The progressive credentials of these operators made it difficult for the IB to catch them. The Congress(I) in the last few years hit at the root of this source of Russian funding when rice and tobacco exports were routed through trusted businessmen of the ruling party rather than the traditional CPI-sympathising businessmen. How important these funds were for the CPI can be gauged from the fact that while Moscow has been admiring the Congress(I) over the last few years, the CPI has been vociferously in the opposition camp. While pro-Moscow journalists have been singing hallelujahs for Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi, the CPI has not been appreciating this line. Moscow's support to the Congress(I) became apparent in October 1983, when the present Indian ambassador to the USSR, Prof. S. Nurul Hassan, presented his credentials. That day Pravda wrote an inside-editorial praising the Congress(I).(Front page editorials are a matter of Pravda routine, inside-edits are exceptions, meant to highlight an issue.) In that editorial Pravda praised Mrs Gandhi not only for her international stance, but also for her domestic policies. Despite this the CPI remained in the opposition unity talks.

The Soviet funding pattern was simple: the leading firms which dealt with the USSR trade counsellor's office were supposed to contribute to the funds of the political parties (apart from the CPI, others too received such funds; many leading Congressmen and even some socialists were funded) liked by the KGB. At one stage the jewellery shop in a leading five-star hotel on Sardar Patel Marg in Delhi became the centre of KGB-trading. Some Russian diplomats were seen regularly visiting this shop, apparently to buy jewellery. This shop became the contact point for businessmen whom KGB wanted to cultivate. The "innocent" meetings between these diplomats and KGB operatives led to the businessmen getting their deals through and KGB the information it desired.

The KGB resident in Delhi is not difficult to identify. Any Russian diplomat seen often with the umpteen delegations which flood this country from the USSR can be a KGB operative. And if among them you find a person who drives a luxury car and leads a better lifestyle than most Russians, then the person is a senior KGB hand. The present KGB resident in Delhi holds the rank of first secretary. At times, till two years back, he was seen driving a red Volkswagen "Golf-S"(popularly also known as "Rabbit"). This by itself showed his important status. He was often seen playing golf in the Delhi Golf Club with a senior government functionary. Dr P. C. Alexander has been sent off because his entire office staff was caught spying. In case of the KGB contact man, he took the precaution of taking a quiet walk on the golf course, talking to his Russian friend in the open, where none could overhear the conversation. This Russian diplomat was alarmed when a press report obliquely referred to him and his red luxury car around the time the Non-Aligned Summit was held. Even during NAM, he was seen active in the media centre. Even at Prime Minis-

The Spies from Pakistan

Pakistan monitors the activities of India more closely than any other country in the sub-continent. Given the past relations between the two countries, it is hardly surprising that it does so. For espionage in India, Pakistan has one obvious advantage: it is virtually impossible to distinguish between an Indian and a Pakistani and a citizen of Pakistan can mingle easily with Indians. One of the simplest ways to enter the country and establish contacts is through Pakistani visitors to India (about a lakh of them every year), some of whom belong to the Pakistani intelligence. According to intelligence sources in the capital, those who are sent normally have relations in India so that an initial contact can be built up, through whom the agent gets the opportunity to meet other people to ferret out information. There are, however, other ways for Pakistani agents to enter the country. A commonly used method is to clandestinely cross the border and merge with the local population. Detection becomes difficult and the agent can position himself outside an airbase (to keep a track of the kinds of aircraft leaving the base, the people keeping a watch on airbases, disguised as vendors, are normally from the Pakistan air force), or in cantonment towns to monitor the movement of troops.

As far as recruiting land agents or Indians to spy for Pakistan are concerned, the Pakistanis are supposed to be poor paymasters. Foreign agents remain on the lookout for meagerly paid personnel in defence and intelligence establishments handling sensitive jobs. An example is that of S.D. Pachbahve who was arrested in 1980 on charges of spying for Pakistan. He was a poorly paid dark room assistant in the photography section of the naval headquarters in Delhi. Another example is that of Tikka Ram, a clerk in the defence ministry who had apparently been on the Pakistani payroll for over two decades for as little as Rs 1,000 a month.

Saumitra Banerjee, New Delhi

Coomar Narain's office in New Delhi after the police raid

Never a Week behind.

When the standing world record in cricket was equalled by the legendary batsmanship of Sunil Gavaskar, people were reading the breathtaking details before the match was over.

In The Week.

The first weekly to cover the event.

The magazine is two years old. And not a week has passed it by. Each issue is on the stands ahead of time. And ahead with in-depth analyses of the latest events.

Because The Week believes in discussing events while they still matter. When the assassination of Indira Gandhi paralysed the entire nation, seven hundred million people were crying out for more information. And The Week was there. With in-depth coverage, special features, photographs... a multi-faceted view of the shattering moment. Once again the first weekly to put you in the picture.

That's why, more and more people look into The Week for a sound, wide perspective. Of the ins and outs of politics. The ups and downs of people. And the changing face of today's world.

More and more people are discovering The Week. And putting their faith in it. Because they know that whatever happens — the breaking of a record, or the making of history — they're bound to read about it in the next Week.

MM.263.84 C

"We Were Shocked"

To the managing director and staff of the Bombay-based SLM-Maneklal Industries Limited, the daily newspapers bring a new facet in the life of their employee, Coomar Narayan. Narayan (61), who has been with the company for the last 26 years was basically a liaison man in the Delhi office of the firm. "We were shocked," said Yogesh Maneklal, manging director of the company that has most of its manufacturing operations in Ahmedabad. "Suddenly CBI officials swooped on our offices only to find nothing. They took only two telex messages," said Mr Maneklal.

That Coomar Narayan is probably the most important spy in independent India, is something the company cannot understand. "I read for the first time that he had a farmhouse in Delhi," said Mr Maneklal. "I had never been to his farmhouse nor his house in Delhi. I met him just once or twice a year. We had a very professional relationship. When I went to Delhi, we would meet the officials concerned with our business and that was it. He had very good connections which was part of his job, with the officials in the commerce, industry, defence, shipping and transport ministries." Mr Maneklal said that neither he nor his firm's managers found anything suspicious about the activities of Mr Narayan. "What he did after 7 pm, I do not know. But, he never seemed to misuse our office for anything, at least nothing is obvious to us." Narayan obviously led an exciting, mysterious double life, shuttling between the hub of Delhi and the plush luxury of his Mehrauli farm.

The only French connection that the firm had officially was its collaboration with the French firm Teclemet. A joint venture for the manufacture of hydraulic rubber hoses, the four-year-old company has a turnover of Rs two crores and is based in Baroda. It is a division of SLM-Maneklal Industries Limited which has most of its manufacturing activities in Ahmedabad and a turnover of Rs 33 crores. The company has three major manufacturing lines: industrial rubber, heavy engineering and textile engineering equipment. It is currently negotiating an agreement with an American company for the manufacture of equipment for oil rigs.

Yogesh Maneklal

SLM-Maneklal itself was started in 1946. It was a joint venture with a Swiss company, Swiss Locomotive Machine Works which merged with Maneklal. The company manufactures compressors, pumps, locomotives, plastic machines, etc. and exports to West Germany, East Germany, the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and the African countries. SLM-Maneklal's wide-ranging activities gave Coomar Narayan ample opportunity to meet government officials. In the last ten years the company has been often given contracts by the defence department for the manufacture of floats. The job, said Mr Maneklal, was shared by four other competitors in the field.

There has been no communication between Narayan and Maneklal as the former is presently in the custody of the police. So, said Mr Maneklal, " there is no question of his apologising for what has happened or sending in his resignation. It has caused us a lot of embarrassment as there are many people who have nothing better to do than talk a lot of nonsense without knowing the facts. We get a lot of nasty phone calls and queries. Fortunately, it has not affected our business and our shareholders' confidence in us."

Olga Tellis, Bombay

ter Indira Gandhi's press conference at the conclusion of NAM, this Russian diplomat sat among the journalists and took copious notes. (Certainly it is not the job of a diplomat to attend press conferences.) While the spy ring was busted in January 1985, this diplomat was seen merrily moving among journalists in Parliament House. He has now stopped using the luxury car, uses a Russian-made vehicle instead, but the distinguished number plate of his car singles him out. He also often uses the vehicles of other socialist embassies in Delhi.

India's foreign policy helps the KGB to operate in the country. By all standards, Russia has been India's friend. It has helped India economically (while helping Pakistan in the same vein to set up a steel plant, the Pakistan steel industry, which provides sinews to a developing economy and defence production base, has not been set up by the western powers, but by USSR). Russia has also helped India with arms. Russia has stood by India on the Kashmir and Goa issues and more recently, in 1971 when the Americans foolishly sent the Seventh Fleet to "help" the retreating Pakistan army in Bangladesh. India has been with the USSR on most international issues. Even on a sensitive issue like the Czechoslovak crisis in 1968. India supported Russia in the UN Security Council. Despite grave reservations on the Soviet presence in Afghanistan, India has not taken an anti-USSR stance. The foreign policies of both are complementary to each other. This helps the KGB to maintain its "friendly" presence in India. Even if KGB links are detected, due to reasons of state, these are not exposed. Only during the Janata regime was a KGB spying busted. This was done on the eve of Premier Alexy Kosygin's visit to India. By some coincidence, 17 January 1985 was the day when US leader Henry Kissinger was in Delhi. For India to embarrass the west is easier—the west's lack of appreciation of India's role in world politics and the west's pro-Pakistan tilt coupled with the west-China honeymoon are reasons enough for western spy rings to be busted whenever they are detected. In the case of the KGB detection does not always lead to exposure.

TAILPIECE: The Counter-IntelligenceActivity Cell in the IB is known as the CIA cell. Perhaps, that is the reason why the KGB often goes undetected.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya and Saunitra Banerjee, New Delhi

Jayalalitha's Revolt

Will the centre intervene in the affairs of the AIADMK?

Jayaladitha: 'The AIADMK is my party'

Jayalalitha has burst out to wreak vengeance upon her tormentors and political detractors who, she claims, are "holding the people of Tamil Nadu to ransom." The three-and-a-half months of silence (from the time M.G. Ramachandran was hospitalised) during which time she privately seethed in indignation detonated into a fusillade of acrimony.

On 20 January 1985, the lid of the boiling cauldron blew, exposing the rivalry in the AIADMK. At the meeting of the AIADMK Parliamentary Board, Ms Jayalalitha, the party's Rajya Sabha member and MGR's heir-apparent was deprived of her status as the deputy leader of the AIADMK parliamentary group. Jayalalitha lost no time in convening a press conference and identifying the "ruling coterie" in the AIADMK, which was playing a diabolical charade of issuing bogus letters in MGR's name. Decisions purported to have been taken by MGR were being implemented to annihilate the enemies of the ruling coterie—namely, Jayalalitha and her band of supporters—she said. Jayalalitha then identified R.M. Veerappan, the information minister as the kingpin of the coterie. The other main conspirators, according to her, were finance minister V. R. Nedunchezian, Mr Musiriputhan, the president of the All World MGR Manram (fans' association) and the "lady in New York," Mrs Janaki Ramachandran, MGR's wife.

From the time MGR was hospitalised on 5 October, the coterie started to sideline, humiliate and insult Jayalalitha. There was little she could do to fight back the onslaught. However, at the behest of Rajiv Gandhi, she was roped in to campaign for the elections. Expecting the coterie to once again keep her on the sideline, after she had served her purpose, Jayalalitha began mobilising her supporters. She reportedly collected oaths of allegiance from the partymen for whom she canvassed. She also began seeking support from the centre. Today, she has good working relationships with Rajiv Gandhi, G. Parthasarathy, Arun Singh and R. Venkataraman. Jayalalitha needed the centre's help because though she has a majority of the rank and file supporting her, the ruling coterie's strength lies in heading the AIADMK: V. R. Nedunchezian heads the government, P.U. Shunmugam heads the party and Veerappan is in charge of information dissemination. As for Mrs Janaki Ramachandran, she is the one who is next to MGR and on whom he is helplessly dependent. SUNDAY learns from reliable sources that all visitors and documents for MGR are routed through Janaki Ramachandran. Today, the one thing that binds the coterie together is their fierce hatred for Jayalalitha, who at one time, had bossed over them. The coterie, it is believed, has formed a neat ring around MGR preventing any outsider from communicating directly with him. At the moment, MGR is the most crucial figure because it was he and not the AIADMK that received the massive mandate. Therefore, in order to survive, Jayalalitha had no alternative but to go to Delhi for help. Ironically, the hastiness with which the coterie intended to annihilate Jayalalitha has exposed the charade, strengthening her position and offering a locus standi for Delhi to intervene.

Jayalalitha's press conference of 20 January was a stirring experience even for the most cynical of journalists. Her uninterrupted harangue against the coterie lasted for over an hour. She was consistently cogent, precise and clear in what she had to say, which she did in good English. Her statements were incisive and trenchant. She said she "was 100 per cent convinced" that the letter depriving her of her status did not emanate from MGR. The coterie was producing letters as and when they wanted to take revenge on her or her supporters (Thirunavukkarasu had been earlier stripped of his important portfolios). The coterie, she announced, produces letters as a magician produces rabbits out of a hat.

"You doubt one letter, you doubt all. If MGR is in full possession of his mental faculties, if he is able to issue instructions and answer questions, why are they afraid to let me or anyone close to me, see him? While we are prevented, how do they allow Vardaraj and Bhagyaraj to go and see MGR? If MGR is coming in a fortnight why this hurry to effect these changes?" she asked. Jayalalitha then continued, "I don't want an answer from Veerappan, Nedunchezian or Janaki, I want an answer from MGR because it is he who brought me into the party, he made me the MP and deputy leader. In control of the party now are the deadwood who were earlier sidelined by MGR. After MGR went into a coma, these people resurrected themselves to grab power for themselves. They tried to defeat official AIADMK candidates who supported me by pumping money for the opposition candidates? They say I am going to join the Congress. Why should I? The AIADMK is my party. I galvanised it for three years. Who is Veerappan to make statements concerning the party and government administration? The centre cannot remain silent when a dangerous charade is being perpetrated by a few corrupt scheming individuals."

Jayalalitha with President Zail Singh

Nobody could have exposed the "dangerous charade" that was beginning to cause alarm to the public as effectively as Jayalalitha. As she says, the centre is not going to remain silent. Already the state Governor has set a deadline for the swearing-in ceremony: 7 February. His letters to MGR, though couched in officialese, carry an unmistakable warning that this game cannot continue for long. While the feud between Jayalalitha and Veerappan is undoubtedly an intra-party affair, Delhi is inclined to intervene on the grounds that the charade is being extended to interfere with the administration. In all fairness it must be pointed out that the coterie's actions involving the administration has not been detrimental to public welfare, yet. However, there is a popular feeling that what they are doing is, in principle, wrong. Now that it suits them, the centre is likely to expose the true status of MGR's mental condition. Like the ruling coterie the centre too can start a "war of letters." It would not be difficult to procure a letter from an American doctor certifying that it would be inadvisable for MGR to function as CM as his convalescence must be given top priority. MGR would thus be got out of the way without wounding the sentiments of the people and also thwarting the criticism that the centre was an accomplice in the initial stages of the charade.

The real reason why the centre would like to intervene in Tamil Nadu is that it would like the state to be in the hands of the pro-Congress faction in the AIADMK: in other words the Jayalalitha lobby. Veerappan and Nedunchezian have never been in the good books of Rajiv Gandhi and G. Parthasarathy. The centre is afraid that Veerappan and the others, having evolved out of the Dravida movement, may in a situation revert to their movement to cling to power. They could even join hands with Karunanidhi to drive the Congress out After having recorded an impressive performance in the Tamil Nadu Assembly polls after an eclipse of 17 years, Delhi is in no mood to relinquish Tamil Nadu to the Dravida forces. There is a keen desire to bring the state back into the national mainstream (or, in other words, the Congress-I). In this gambit Jayalalitha is perhaps, the most reliable because she has been nurtured in an ethos untouched by the Dravida consciousness. Her mentor is MGR, who has diluted the Dravida movement and paved the way for Tamil Nadu to join the national mainstream. Jayalalitha is an ideal choice because she has a mass base as well. She is firm, decisive, intelligent and articulate. Above all, she has no allegations of corruption surrounding her. SUNDAY learns from reliable sources that Delhi has struck a deal with Jayalalitha. The centre will support her totally in her bid to gain power in Tamil Nadu and emerge as the chief minister. Jayalalitha is confident of forming a government. She feels that a vertical split can be

"The Ruling Coterie is Afraid of Me"

Jayalalitha told SUNDAY

Q: Why do you think the actions of the ruling coterie are directed against you?

A: Because I threaten the interests of a few selfish individuals. The party is with me, the public is with me. That is why they are afraid of me. They have neither. They have only their current proximity to MGR and their positions in the government. They are afraid because truth and justice are on my side. That is why they are trying to liquidate me.

Q: You have said that the centre cannot remain silent. What jurisdiction does the centre have to intervene in what is essentially an intra-party affair?

A: When it came to depriving me of the deputy leader's status, it is an intra-party affair. But when the actions of the coterie interfere with the administration, then the centre cannot be an idle spectator because it is a fraud on the Constitution. It is no longer an intra-party affair when it concerns the administration of the state. Once the government is formed, those who are in charge of the administration are not accountable merely to the AIADMK, but to the people and the centre When it involves interfering with the state government, it automatically involves the Constitution and, therefore, the centre comes in.

Q. But as far as the administration is concerned, their decisions are in keeping with the party manifesto. For instance, giving the Pongal gift to the government servants and so on.

A: Yes, that is only one, there are others.

Q: The others are against you and that is an intra-party affair.

A: One has to look into the genesis of the matter. They are acting in someone else's name. When the whole thing is a hoax, is not the matter very serious? Is not a fraud being perpetrated on the Constitution itself? They are holding everyone to ransom.

Q: The de facto split in the party has become de jure with you openly identifying R.M. Veerappan as the kingpin of the coterie that is perpetrating this fraud. The AIADMK is beginning to crumble. Isn't this going to benefit Karunanidhi?

A: Why should it? These four individuals do not mean the AIADMK. And these individuals are isolated from the rank and file of the party. Removing these few corrupt scheming individuals at the top, who have nothing to do with the party, will in no way benefit Mr Karunanidhi.

Q: You have said earlier that Janaki Ramachandran did not entertain political ambitions for herself. In that case, why should she connive with the ruling coterie?

A: She may not have had political ambitions earlier, but she may have now. These ambitions may have been put into her head after October (1984). Earlier, what did she have to do with the party? She does not know anything about politics. She is only a housewife. Janaki Ramachandran is being manipulated by the coterie. She is only too willing to be manipulated. I cannot understand how she can be a party to this cruel hoax when these people are selfishly exploiting the person who is supposed to be her husband.

Janaki Ramachandran may not have had political ambitions earlier, but she may have now. These ambitions may have been put into her head after October 1984 ... She does not know anything about politics. She is only a housewife. She is being manipulated by the coterie.

When MGR was active she would not have dared to entertain such notions. Now, how can she stake claim to the mantle of leadership by merely being his wife? I am not interested in embroiling myself in controversies of a personal nature. My fight is a political one directed against a political entity. And, as far as I am concerned, Janaki (Ramachandran) does not exist as a political entity.

Q: You have been humiliated—on a few occasions publicly—from the time MGR was hospitalised in October. Why is it that you are coming out so forcefully now?

A: I was determined not to be rash, hasty or intemperate. I was willing to give them the benefit of doubt. But their actions became more and more intolerable, more and more inconceivable. I was forced to break my silence and protest. And, I must protest because it is not merely me who is the victim of this injustice and manipulation. A fraud is being perpetrated on the people of Tamil Nadu and on the Constitution. Unlike these so-called leaders, I have toured the stateintensely and canvassed for votes. I promised the people that MGR would return. They reposed their faith and trust in me. I have a moral responsibility to them.

Q: You have questioned Bhagyaraj's (the cine actor) credentials asserting that for the three days of campaigning he did, you have done three years. The same thing could be said against you by the ruling coterie who have been in politics for decades.

A: Yes, but there is such a thing as deadwood. Nobody doubts their contribution to the AIADMK in the beginning. But subsequently, they have changed, their attitudes have changed. Just because they put in good service a long time ago, should they be rewarded now, particularly when their performance in the last three years leaves much to be desired? Don't forget these were the people who were shunned and sidelined by MGR himself. He could not cut off the deadwood just like that because of his sentimental attachments. He relegated them (to the background) but he could still not bring himself to throw them out. Exactly like Mrs Gandhi, who because of certain sentimental attachments, could not bring herself to throw the deadwood out of the Congress(I). But Mr Rajiv Gandhi has done so, Mr Rajiv Gandhi has done a commendable job and he has deservedly got the credit for it. In fact, it was because MGR could not rely upon these people that he brought me into the party. It was because they were disloyal and indulging in anti-party activities that MGR felt it necessary for me to join the party. And, when I joined the party there were so many splinter groups. I was an unifying force. And, today there are only two groups: the Veerappan group and the Jayalalitha group. That is why the rank and file support me and the ruling coterie stands isolated in our own party.

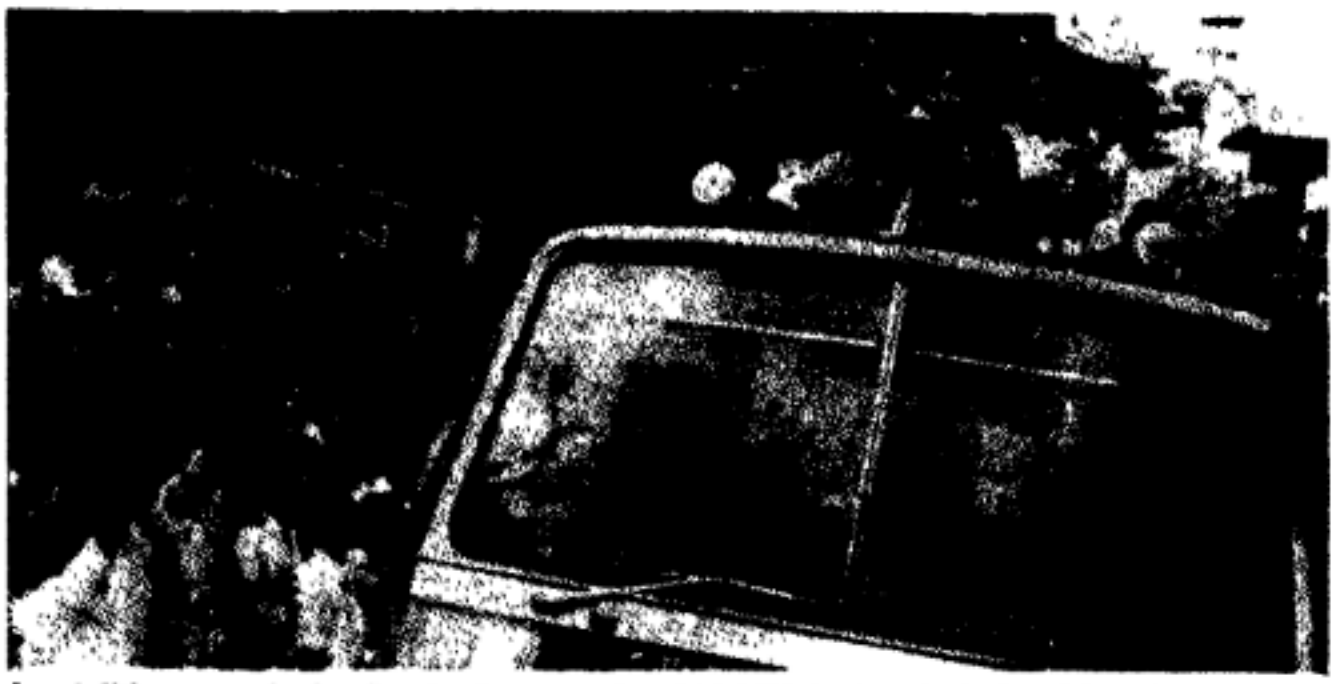
Q: What do have to say about the popular feeling that you are going to join the Congress(I)?



I was forced to break my silence and protest. And I must protest because it is not merely me who is the victim of this injustice and manipulation. A fraud is being perpetrated on the people of Tamil Nadu and on the Constitution.

A: I have said this before: why should I leave the AIADMK? It is my party. It is I who galvanised it. The party has been my creation for three years. I did it with MGR's blessings because he was so busy with the administration.

Q: It is said that with the centre's help you are trying to become the chief minister of Tamil Nadu.

A: How can the centre possibly interfere with that? It is an intra-party affair. Anyway, I am not willing to entertain this question now because MGR is at present our chief minister. Therefore, the question does not arise now. Such a question will have to wait till MGR returns and until the truth is known for an answer.

Interviewed by Anita Pratap

Jayalalitha campaigning for the Congress(I)-AIADMK during the Lok Sabha elections

avoided by winning over Veerappan's loyalists. A few individuals like the members of the coterie would be axed. That would still leave her with about 120 of the 135 AIADMK MLAs. At the moment she has the support of 60 MLAs, Veerappan has 40, P.U. Shunmugam 15 and the rest are neutral. Veerappan is using all his skills to completely isolate Jayalalitha. Already an impression is being created that Jayalalitha has turned against MGR. If this seed of suspicion germinates, Jayalalitha's mass support will crumble because the people are not likely to forgive her. In the meantime, Veerappan is busy promoting popular cine actor K. Bhagyaraj (MGR has gone on record to say that Bhagyaraj is his successor in the film industry) who has at last joined the AIADMK. This is a shrewd move by Veerappan because Bhagyaraj is no threat to him being young, inexperienced and busy in film commitments. At the same time Bhagyaraj too has a large following which would ensure crowds in Veerappan's meetings. The fact is that no other leader in the AIADMK except Jayalalitha attracts crowds. Thus, it is in Veerappan's interest to mould Bhagyaraj as his successor.

According to the same sources, Delhi's price for helping Jayalalitha to become the CM is that she must ultimately join the Congress(I) and bring with her the bulk of the AIADMK infrastructural network. One does not know if Jayalalitha is well disposed to this proposal but she has already started delinking herself from MGR. It was significant that while all the pictures of MGR were not removed in her residence, she chose to remove her own photograph placed next to MGR's near the stairwell. The placement of the two photographs had earlier tempted one to believe that MGR was the man of the house. Is removal of the photographs Jayalalitha's way of heralding the future course of events? It could be. But then she has learnt a lot and she could well be indulging in a charade of her own.

There is, however, a section in the Congress(I) that is wary of Jayalalitha. They are in favour of supporting S. Ramachandran, the electricity minister who is supposed to be in Jayalalitha's camp, as the interim chief minister as the leaders feel that the public is not yet ready for Jayalalitha. But the pro-Jayalalitha lobby in the Congress(I) point out that Panrutti (as S. Ramachandran is popularly called) is undecided about his intentions. Undoubtedly, the centre is going to play an active and decisive role in the politics of the state. But, henceforth Rajiv Gandhi is going to proceed cautiously particularly as he does not want a repetition of the Andhra episode under any circumstances.

The immediate problem of the Jayalalitha group is to come out with an impressive majority in the AIADMK so as to stake its claim to the chief ministership of the state. Jayalalitha has gone on record to say that her only weakness is the lack of money and that this was the weapon that Veerappan was using to vanquish her. Only time will tell what the outcome will be.

Nevertheless, the centre is going to proceed cautiously because as far as Rajiv Gandhi is concerned, nothing should tarnish his government's reputation. Thus, he is likely to bide his time and settle for Nedunchezian (undoubtedly the only person acceptable to a majority of the AIADMK and Congress-I) as the CM, till the Assembly elections are over in March. For Rajiv Gandhi, wresting power in Karnataka from the Janata Party is far more important than propping up a pro-Congress(I) government in Tamil Nadu.

Anita Pratap, Madras

"Jayalalitha is a Danger to the AIADMK"

Agriculture minister Kalimuthu, part of the anti-Jayalalitha 'coterie,' talked to SUNDAY. Excerpts:

Q: What do you have to say about Jayalalitha's outburst?*

A: Whatever it (throughout the interview Kalimuthu referred to Jayalalitha as it) has been saying is totally false. It is acting against the principles of the party. It has even said things against our leader. I think it is better that she goes out of the party. If it continues to be within the AIADMK, it won't be given any respect.

It has been said that the CM is not mentally alert. The public will come to know on 4 February when the CM returns. On that day the people will come to realise that her statements are all wrong.

Q: But there is a popular feeling that Veerappan and others are playing a charade.

A: That's not true. They are our party's senior leaders. They are functioning only as per the CM's instructions. They are not making the CM act according to their wishes.

Q: It is difficult to believe that the decisions MGR has been taking have all been directed against the Jayalalitha lobby.

A: The party leader has every right to effect changes any time he wants. Certain decisions have to be taken quickly for the effective functioning of the party.

Q: But what was the hurry to bring about the changes that affect only Jayalalitha and her supporters?

A: Its activities have been tracked since the time MGR was hospitalised in October. When MGR was in Apollo hospital he was unconscious so he did not know what was going on. After he recovered he has been getting reports on how these people behaved in the interim period. Based on this report he is making these decisions. As a party member, it is proper and correct that one accepts all his decisions.

Q: This is precisely what Jayalalitha is alleging. She says the CM has been given false reports about her?

A: She calls these reports false because the decisions affect her.

Q: Is it true that at the general council meeting in September, MGR had regretted inducting Jayalalitha into the party?

A: Yes, it is true. The general council was called to take action against S. D. Somasundaram. At that time it (Jayalalitha) was removed from the post of propaganda secretary. Even before the CM started talking, some people—Jayalalitha's supporters—raised slogans that she should be reinstated. In response to that, the CM spoke very firmly. He said, "It was wrong on my part to have given her (Jayalalitha) this responsibility. The task was too much for her age.

Agriculture minister Kalimuthu

She was not able to cope up with the responsibilities of the job. At Delhi, she has started talking to some people conveying views about the party which are detrimental to the interests of the party. She issued all kinds of statements claiming that they were authorised by me, when the were not. She stopped consulting me. I think very soon she will switch over to some other party. If those who support her want to leave along with her, let them. I don't care. I am not running this party with her help. We have won so many elections without her," and so on.

Q: Can Jayalalitha ever be the chief minister of Tamil Nadu.

A: (Laughs derisively.) The state won't accept it. The people of Tamil Nadu will not accept it. It (Jayalalitha) hasn't got the qualifications to hold the job. It has not got the honesty. It hasn't got the sense of responsibility.

Q: Why are all the leaders in the AIADMK against her?

A: Because all the genuine leaders of the party want to protect the party and they all know that it (Jayalalitha) is out to destroy the party. They are convinced that she is a great danger to the party. She is a very arrogant woman. Her behaviour, her way of speaking was intolerable. She treated even senior leaders of the party as her servants, ordering them around. She never showed any respect to anyone. She had the audacity to ask Somasundaram and Madurai Muthu for explanations. She tried to throw P. U. Shunmugam out of the party. In a party, there will always be differences of opinion. But she had certain ambitions. There is unanimous opinion in the party that Jayalalitha is a danger to the AIADMK.

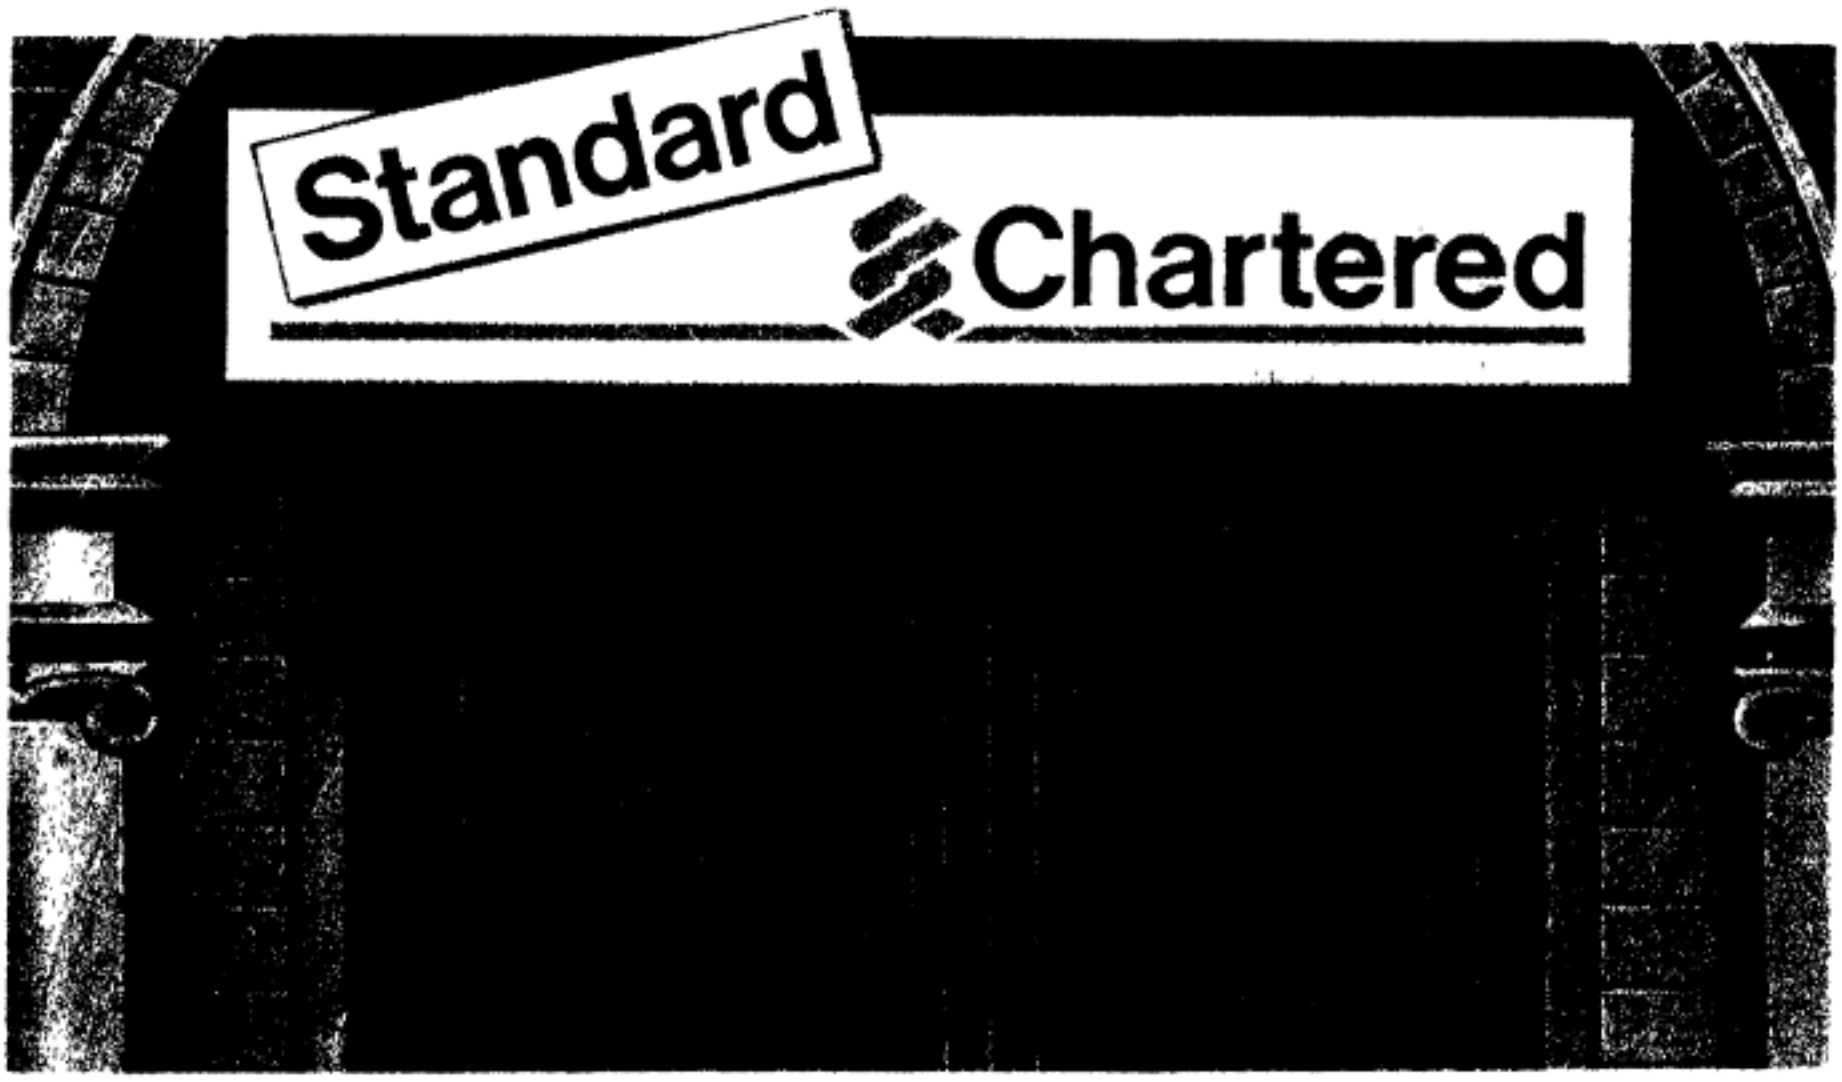
Q: There is a feeling that the centre may support Jayalalitha because she represents the pro-Congress section in the AIADMK.

A: She is trying to give that impression, but the centre will not yield. One thing I can say with full confidence, if it leaves the party, not even one AIADMK MLA will leave with her.

Q: Do you think this is the end of Jayalalitha's political career?

A: Yes. The party will not accept her after her comments about MGR. What little respect she had has also evaporated. It (Jayalalitha) will have to go elsewhere. And wherever it goes she is not going to get the kind of respect that it got in the AIADMK. And don't forget wherever she goes she will foment the same type of confusion.

Q: But she does attract the crowds.



A: Crowds came to her meetings because she was in the party.

Q: But other leaders in the party did not attract such big crowds.

A: Because the others do not have the cinema glamour. Moreover lot of ladies come to her meetings. There is a keeness to see her because she acted as the heroine to our CM in many films. These films are still running in the rural areas. The minute she leaves the party, the crowds will stop going to her meetings.

Interviewed by Anita Pratap

FOR OVER 130 YEARS, WE SET THE STANDARDS. TODAY, WE ADD ÓNE TO OUR NAME.

On January 1st, 1985, The Chartered Bank took on the Group's full name and became Standard Chartered Bank.

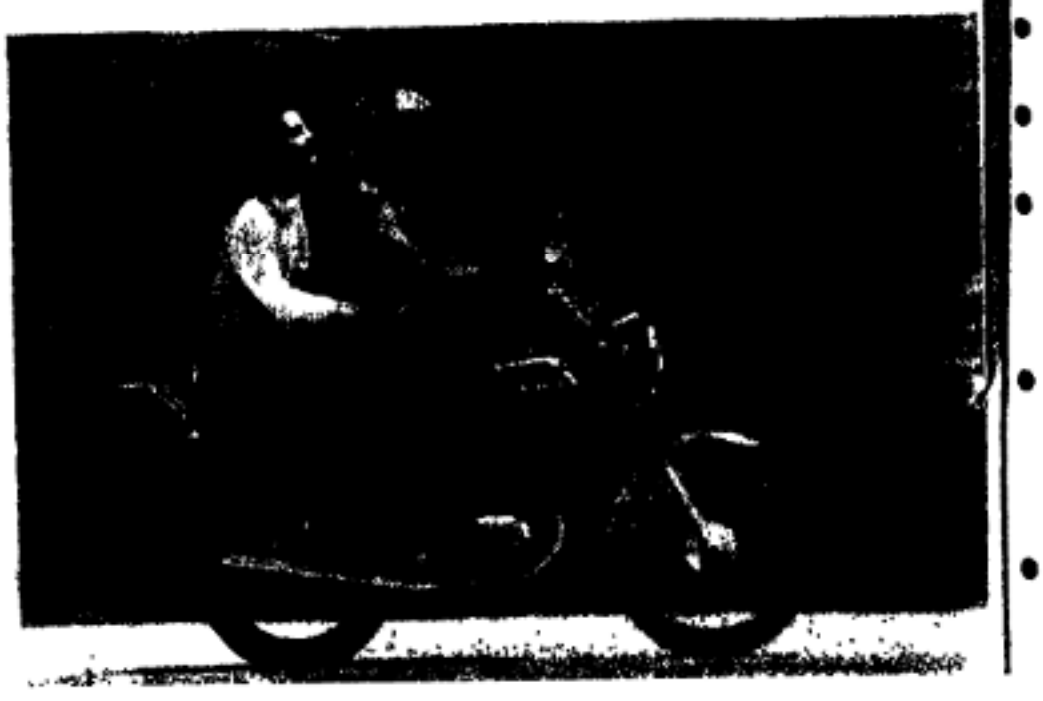
The change reflects positively on the bank's long-standing legacy of international banking expertise.

A bank that's always specialised in global business.

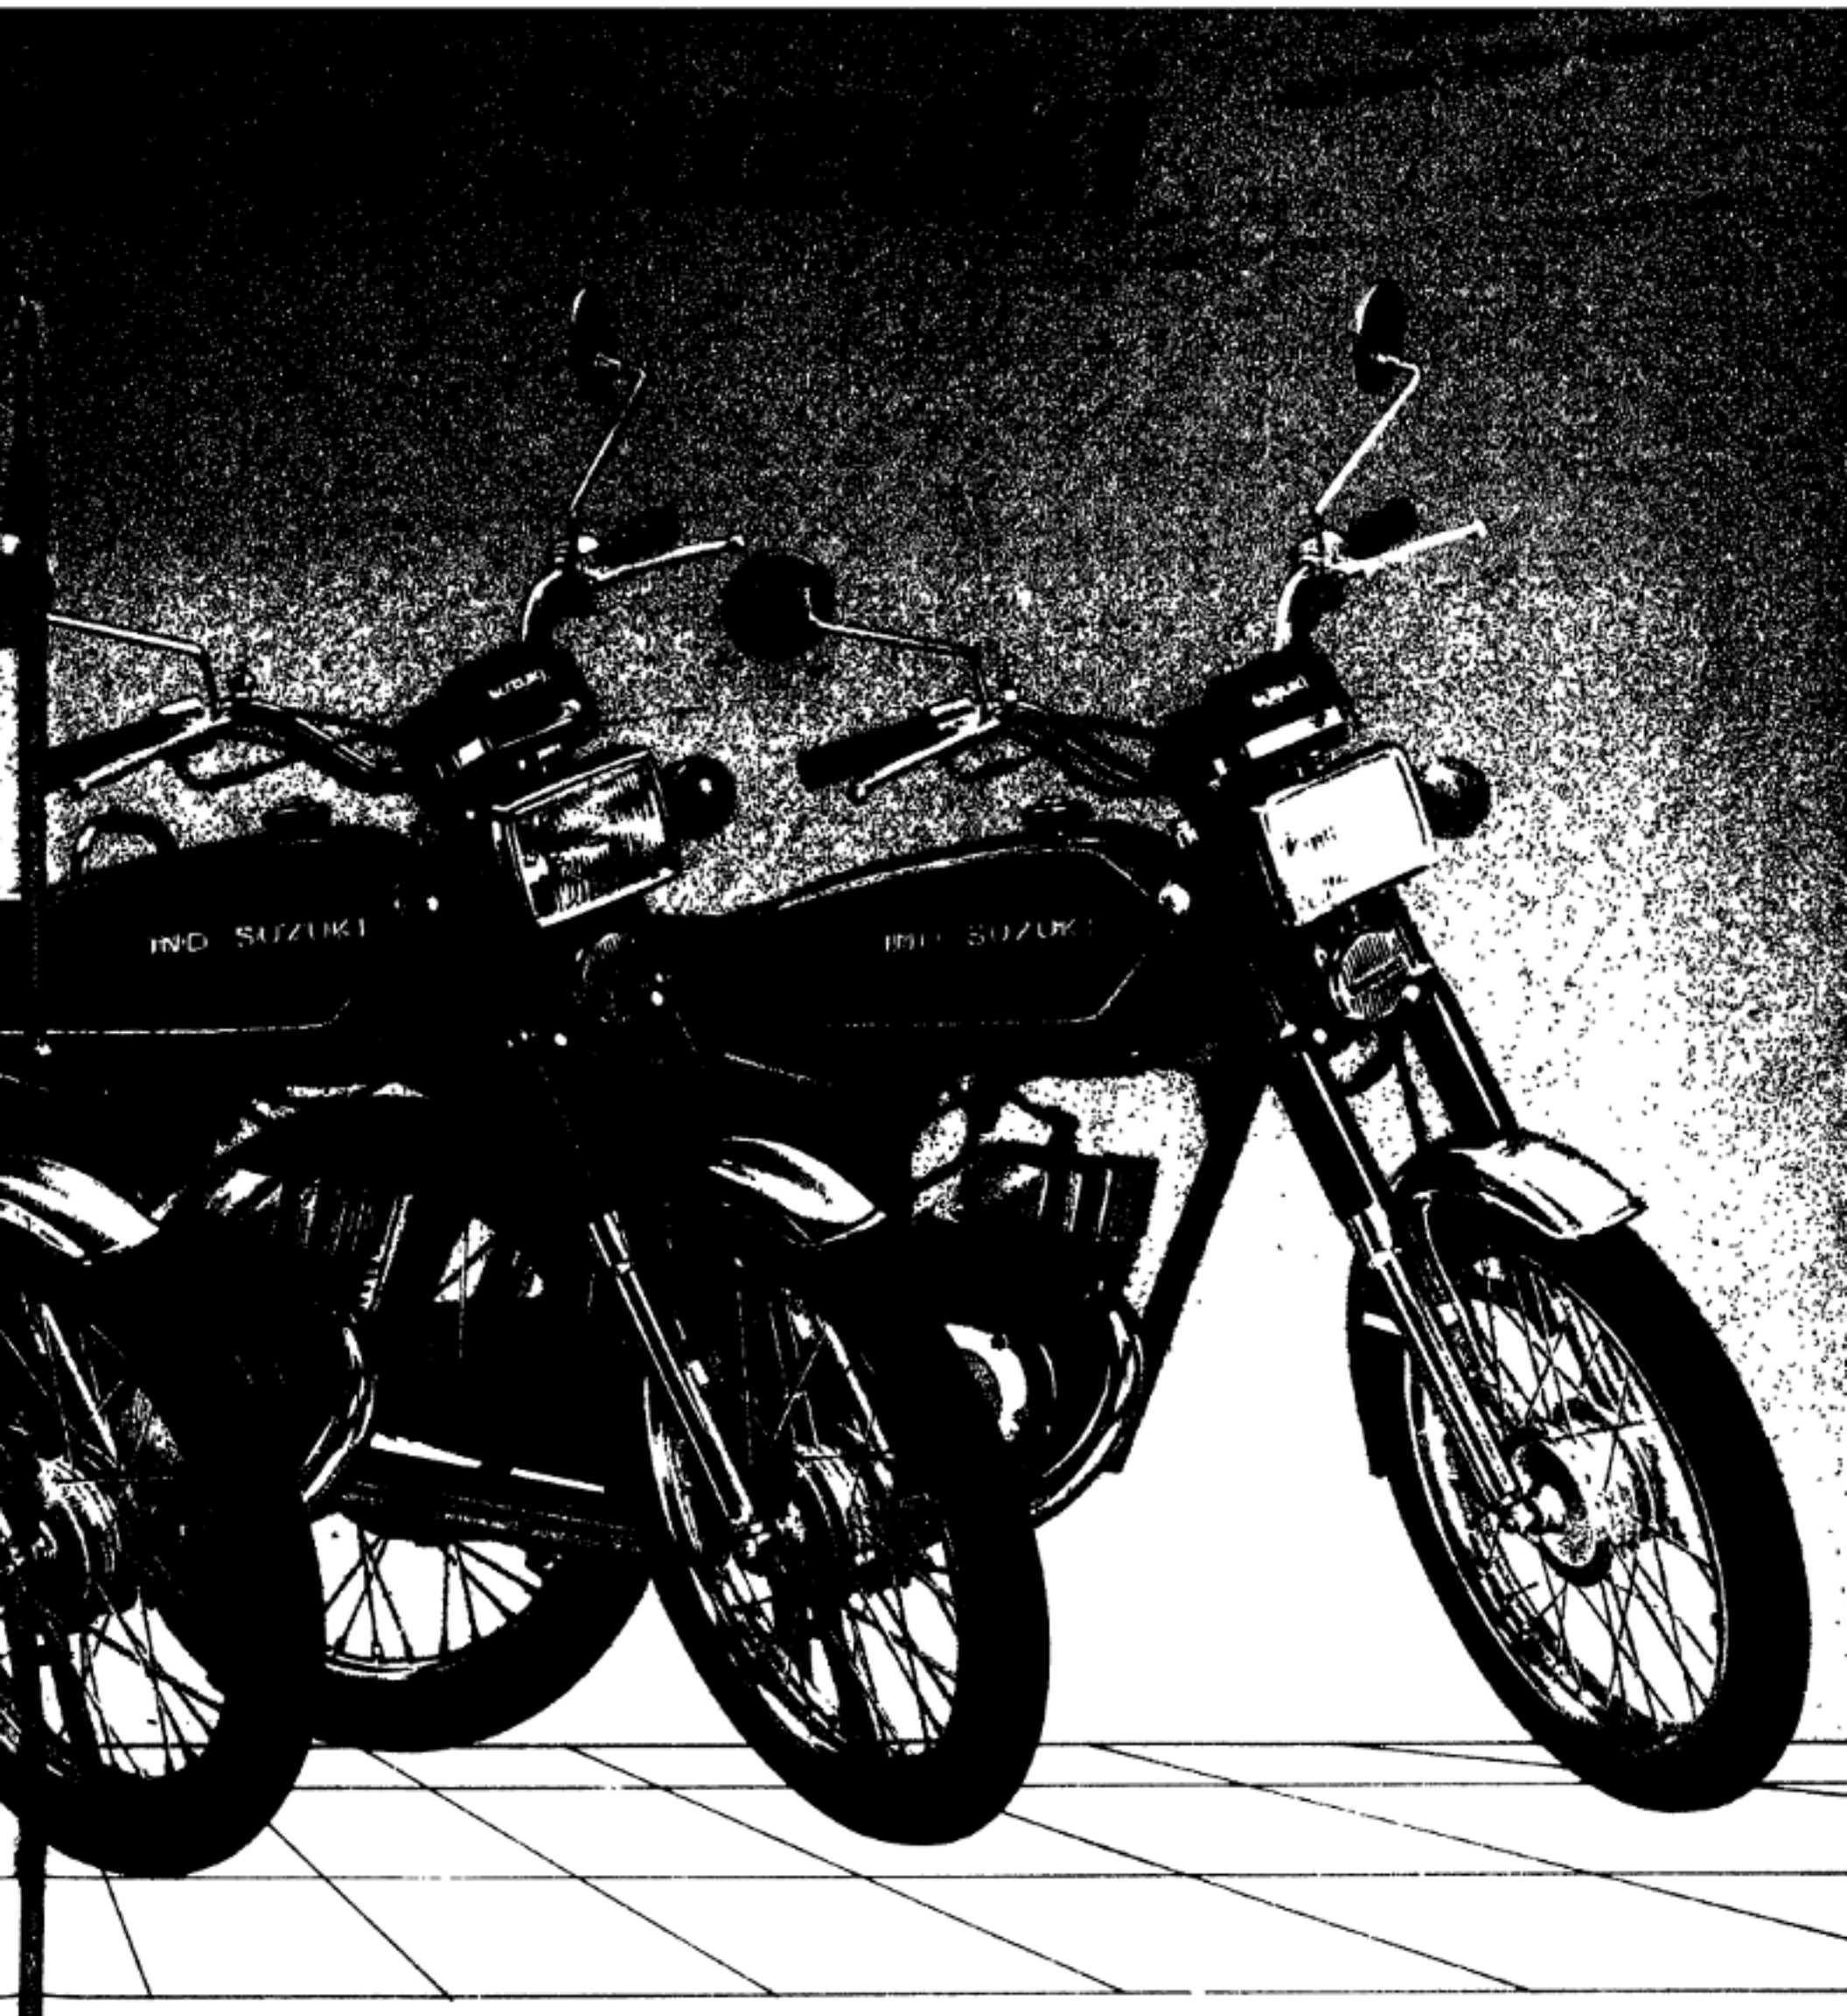
A bank that's earned a reputation in complex financial loans for critical projects, worldwide.

A bank that's set its own standards over the years.

You'll still have access, through any branch, to a worldwide service that extends from travellers cheques to major project finance, and from 24-hour-a-day currency dealing to all forms of finance for imports and exports. And behind our new nameplate, you'll still find the kind of personal and professional service that made the old one famous.



Standard Chartered



Direct banking, worldwide

Branches in India at: Amritsar, Bombay, Calcutta, Calicut, Cochin, Kanpur, Madras, New Delhi, Vasco da Gama

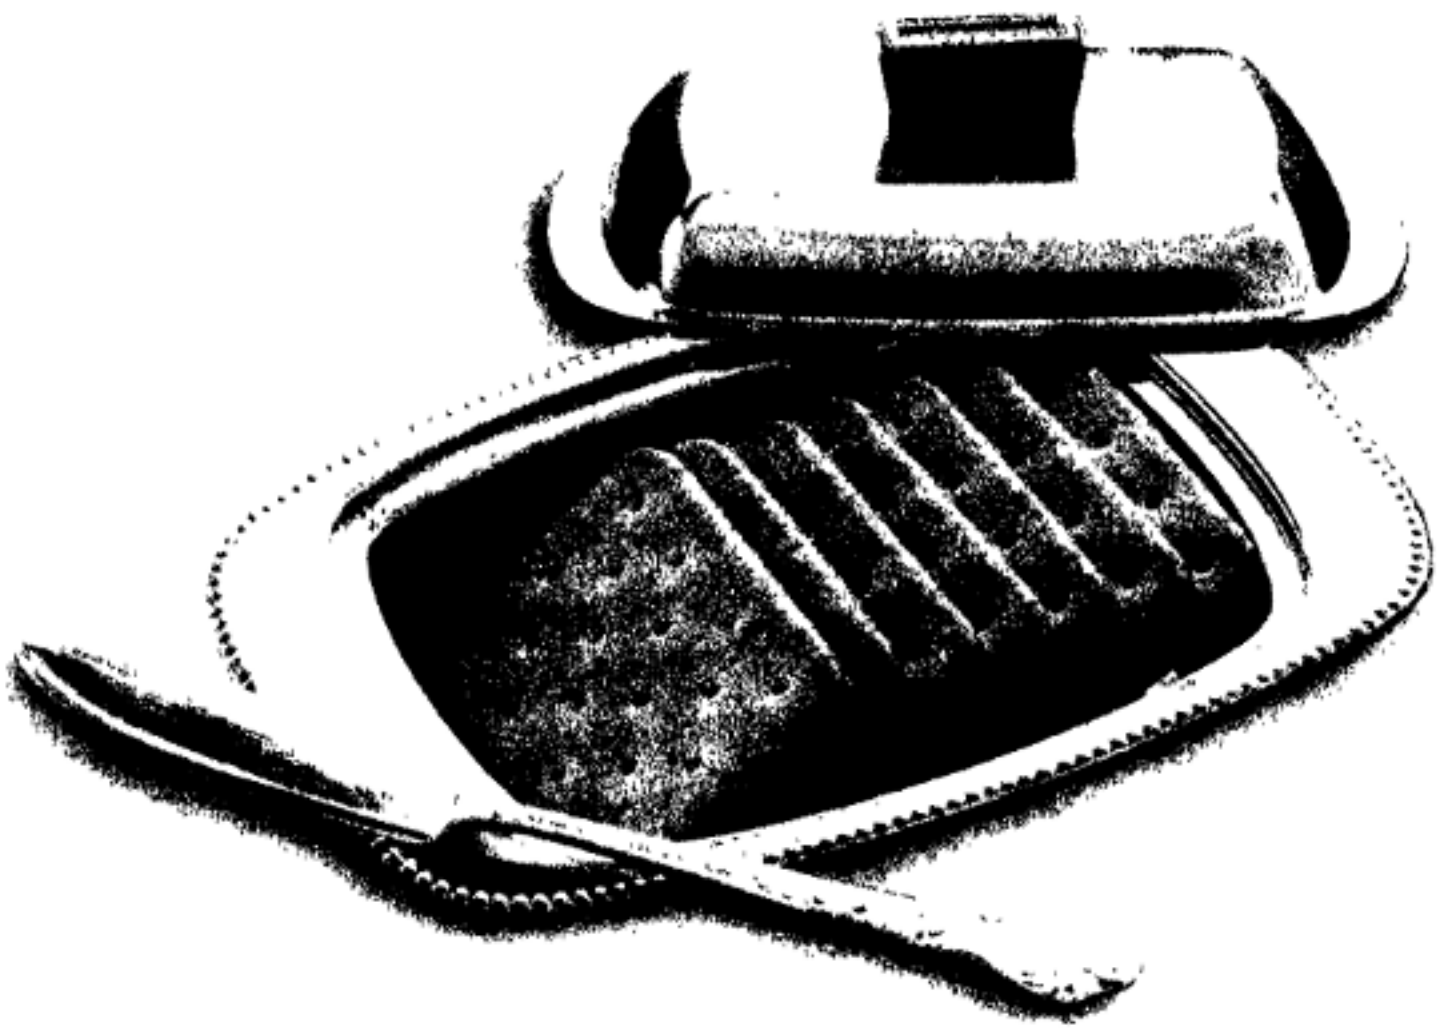
Experience it!

The surge of power in a sleek, virile body.
The trigger response of 4-speed transmission.
The swift pick-up from 0 to 60 kph in just 9 seconds.
You get it all with the Ind-Suzuki AX 100.
Effortlessly, confidently, securely.
Pulsating. Thrilling. Exciting.
That's the sensation of Suzuki.
Come, feel its dynamic features.

- 100 cc 2-stroke engine output 8.25 bhp at 6500 r.p.m.
- Reed Valve induction system for high torque at low speeds.
- Electronic ignition system with automatic advance perfect engine timing. No points. No adjustments.
- Independent lubrication system. Separate oil pump feeds optimum quantity of oil to match varying engine requirements.
- Fuel efficiency: 65 km/litre.

Unmatched performance and several exclusive features, put the Ind-Suzuki AX 100 in a class all its own.

Its highlights include a sophisticated instrument panel with indicating and warning lights; rear view mirrors; turn signal indicators; steering, helmet and fuel tank locks.



A creation of India's most dynamic Indo-Japanese venture.

IND-SUZUKI

IND-SUZUKI

AX 100

Watch it take over the Indian roads.

"Butterlicious"

BRITANNIA

Britannia Top

LINTAS BIN TOP 4 2316

INVESTIGATION

Murder of a Candidate

Who killed Harswaroop Bajpai, the independent candidate from Rae Bareili?

Late in the evening of 23 December 1984, the day before the recent parliamentary polls, a battered and bloodied human form, curled up like a foetus, its hands and feet bound together with a strong rope and its neck strangulated with black insulated electric wiring, was found lying on the Lucknow-Rae Bareili road near the village of Pahurawan between Bacchrawan and Rae Bareili. The pale-faced and frail victim was 52-year-old Harswaroop Bajpai, an independent candidate contesting the Rae Bareili Lok Sabha seat. The next day, Mr Bajpai's 18-year-old nephew, Vijay Shukla, a probable witness to the assault on his uncle, whose whereabouts he had known, was found missing.

Interest focused immediately on the time of the candidate's death because of its bearing on the fate of the polls in Rae Bareili: if it could be technically established that it took place after polling commenced at 8 am on 24 December 1984, the election would be undisturbed, if it had happened before the start of polling the election would stand countermanded by law. As it turned out, the elections did proceed unhindered but only after the police and district authorities, after fumbling initially, spent seven hours keeping the body aloof from the public and delaying its admission to the Rae Bareili district hospital where the victim was pronounced dead at 8.50 am. The next day, although Mr Bajpai's widow, daughter, neighbour and friends say they were informed by the local police themselves as early as 8 pm on 23 December 1984 that he had been murdered and they were taken to see his corpse—the police did not allow them to go near the body—bleeding and tied up for hours together, almost in the condition it was found without the police making any attempts to free it of its bonds. Even when the body was taken to the Bacchrawan police station in a jeep and kept there, the district authorities stoically maintain, he was alive throughout that time. He was alone when he was found lying on the road with a head injury at around 11.30 pm ("We cannot tell you the exact time," they say) on 23 December 1984 and he was finally admitted to the Rae Bareili hospital under heavy police guard at 3.10 am the next day where he was apparently put on oxygen and glucose for a long time before being declared dead, a good 50 minutes after polling had begun, the time mentioned in his health certificate.

From what the authorities say they appear to have struggled for five hours to save the life of the parliamentary candidate but the irregularities in their versions are laid bare by the evidence given by numerous people including Mr Bajpai's next of kin, his friends and the government doctor. Were the district authorities, probably under orders to see that nothing went wrong with the polls, then responsible for concocting the timing? The authorities did not hand over the body to his family after the post-mortem. In fact, the body disappeared completely from their sight once it was taken into the hospital.

After the death was declared on the morning of 24 December, it was put in a vehicle and despite the widow's loud protests and entreaties driven off to Dalmau and secretly disposed off on the banks of the Ganga. Also all official records relating to the death were ordered sealed. Perhaps, one of the first persons to be informed by the police about the candidate's murder was Baba Jagprasad, a chillum-smoking sadhu who lives in a small tent he has pitched beside the main road, in front of his house at one end of Bacchrawan. An unlikely landlord, Mr Bajpai paid the sadhu Rs 60 a month as rent for the two rooms on the ground floor of the house which served as his election office too. Being nearer to where the body was found, the police thought of trying out Mr Bajpai's office for the directions to his house. "It was between 7 pm and 8 pm, I should think before 7.30," said Jagprasad, "when they arrived. 'Bajpaiji koi hai?' they asked aloud, peeping into my tent. First I said there was nobody around but I could help them if they wanted. Then I asked them what they wanted. They said it was about Bajpai. He had been killed.

Mr Bajpai's family were at home in the village of Rampur Samodha when the police arrived in the evening of 23 December 1984. "A jeep came," said Saroj Tripathi, the murdered candidate's married daughter. "There was sepoy Pathak and a constable, Yadav, whom I recognised as someone from the village next to ours. They knocked on the door. I was asleep. I asked who it was. They said, 'Daroga Sahib.' I opened the door and saw Pathak. He wanted me to come to the thana (police station). What is the matter, I asked. He said it was urgent. I told him I would not come out at night but in the morning. But he kept insisting. Then he said my father Bajpaiji was calling me. I found this suspicious. Why should he want to call me at night, I thought. The sepoy must have been lying. When he found me adamant, Pathak turned to Shuklaji (a teacher from the village who had by then joined the crowd of people standing outside the door of the house) and said to him, 'Should I tell her?' I told him to tell me the truth. 'Don't worry I will tell you everything,' he said. 'Aisa hai ki tumhari Bapuji ki katal ho gai hai.'

Gargi Prasad, the Bajpais' next door neighbour and a good friend of the politician, had also witnessed the scene. "There were two of them in the jeep," he recalled, "Pathak had come along with another person who looked like a home guard. They came between 8 pm and 8.30 pm. They must have been here about half-an-hour; after that everyone got into the jeep, the policemen and the women and I."

Was there just one jeep? "No, there was our police jeep in which the two policemen and I and Bajpai's widow, Kamala Devi, and his daughters, Saroj and Ranno, sat," said Gargi Prasad. There was also "the Congress election vehicle in which sat another group including Shuklaji, Ram Krishan Tiwari and others from the village," he recalled. "In all there were about 12 to 15 of us in two vehicles which drove to the spot."

At what time did the vehicles leave the village? Around 8.30 pm. And when exactly did they reach where the body lay on the road? At the most ten or 15 minutes later for it is not very far. Most descriptions of the body, the state it was found in and the time it was sighted, tally remarkably. Apart from being tied up the body had a deep wound on the right temple which bled profusely. Blood from the wound and the nose had been flowing over to the side of the road. Saroj, though shattered by the experience, still remembers what she saw there.

"When we went to the spot where the body was lying, we were stopped near it. The people in the jeep were asked to get off. I do not know who all were there. Of course, as I later learnt, everyone was there. Another Congress vehicle had accompanied the police vehicle. It was about 9.30 pm when we reached Pahurawan. It took ten minutes to reach the place from our village. After some time the body was kept behind the vehicle. We were asked to get off. My little sister Seema had gone there near the body. She saw it from quite close and threw herself on it. But she managed to get close to my father. There was some confusion and the villagers pushed the policemen aside. My mother also ran forward. I was in such a state I had got off the jeep and collapsed on the road."

According to Gargi Prasad and several others, the jeep carrying Mr Bajpai's widow and daughters and himself arrived at the Bacchrawan police station between 9 and 9.30 that night. Saroj Tripathi remembered, "Ram Sagar Verma (a CPI activist and friend of her father) was there. We were made to sit outside first, then brought onto the verandah. We kept weeping and screaming for hours, 'Where is the body? Give us the body. Where is my Bapu? Where is he?' But no one moved. No one cared whether we shouted or ran about or sang or did anything." Exhausted by then, all the family could think of doing was inform relatives about the death. "I sent my younger sister to tell my mama (maternal uncle) and to inform his younger sister. My father's sister was in Hardoi. One of the policemen, however, kept questioning the women about their village. I don't know who it was: Pathak or Mishra. He kept asking us who lived in our village and we told him whatever he wanted to know. He could ask Vijay (her cousin, the son of her father's sister) in Hardoi. He would come in the morning to our Bapu's house (on the main road).

Alas! Vijay too was reported missing. He had been with Mr Bajpai last in the night of 22 December and probably on 23 December and was also believed to have been kidnapped by the murderers. "I don't know who brought the body to the thana," said Gargi Prasad, who had been sitting there with the women. "But it was lying in the jeep parked near the front entrance to the compound. It lay in the thana till midnight and was brought there at 11 pm. Since it was cold the two of us, Yadav and I, decided to go away. We walked back home."

Once they left the police station, Mr Bajpai's widow and daughters never got to see his body again. Asked if she was sure her father was lying dead on the road, when they were taken by the police to see him, she replied almost angrily, "Arrey bilkul (Absolutely)." Was he not rushed to the primary health centre, as the police claim? "No, no, Dr Salahuddin (who was on emergency duty that night) has given his evidence. You can ask him. Nobody came. And who would bring a corpse to the PHC? These are blatant lies. Stories that have been cooked up to ensure that the election is not postponed."

Could Mr Bajpai not have been lying unconscious? If he was, his family would have been shown his body and would have been allowed to take him to hospital and get him treated so that he was revived. And if he was unconscious why was his neck not untied? Several other people including the CPI activist, Ram Sagar Verma, had gone on bicycles to see the body after receiving news of Mr Bajpai's death. Mr Bajpai, who was himself a former CPI worker, was a close friend of Verma and had been meeting him frequently till a couple of days before his death. Said Verma, "On 21 December Bajpaiji told us that he was going to Lucknow to campaign for Mayapati Tripathi (one of his friends). He left Bacchrawan at 10 am. I don't know if he went by train or bus. He had on a kurta pyjama and an old coat and a sleeveless sweater. He was last seen outside the government hospital in Rae Bareili, having tea in a stall, with Kapil Awasthi. Then on 23 December I was busy with a bicycle rally in the evening from Bacchrawan to Mohanlalganj to support our party candidate for the election there, Bhikhalalji. When we returned, we stopped at Pandeji's hotel for tea. It was around 7.15 pm. B.N. Agnihotri, one of those who had taken part in the rally, had his house nearby, and instead of joining us for tea, had chosen to go home straight. In a short while he came back to us looking alarmed. 'Have you heard?' he asked. We said we hadn't. He told us that Bajpaiji had been murdered. His body was lying near Pahurawan, two km from Bacchrawan on the main road."

Ram Sagar Verma contends that it was the SDM of Maharajganj, Kurli Manohar, who first saw the body lying on the road at about 7 pm in the evening of 23 December. "Along with the body was a cloth bag full of election agents' forms. There was a brown coat, but no sign of his footwear. One assumes the body was brought in a vehicle from Rae Bareili because it was dumped a little off the centre of the road." Verma said that the ground did not show any signs of a struggle because except for the stream of blood and the coat and the bag lying on the ground there were no other marks. "We were informed of the death at 7.15 pm when we reached the spot. Ten of us, Ramsagar Verma, Swar Mandal Shukla, Ashok Bhorti Uppal, Brijender Agnihotri, Randhir Singh, Chandman Singh Azad, Chandrashekhar Shukla, Ramanuj Vajpayi, saw the body lying there. It was about 8.45 pm." Also present were sepoy Harish Chandra Mishra, Ram Lakhan Bajpai (Mr Bajpai's guard) and the Congress(I) block chief. A group of Congress(I) workers was also there. They kept shouting, "Sanjay Manch walon ne marwa diya (Rashtriya Sanjay Manch workers have killed him) " and threatened to take photographs. They were abusing the security guard loudly (Bajpai) for not protecting the candidate.

Incidentally, Mr Bajpai had himself asked his two security guards not to bother about shadowing him. "I am an old man, why bother about me?" he said. "And when security guards have killed the Prime Minister herself, how will you protect me?" he is reported to have told them. "As we stood there," Mr Verma went on, "the police took down our names and the names of some villagers from Pahurawan: 20 to 25 in all. We stayed there. Afterwards, the station officer of Bacchrawan police station, Ram Deo Mishra, and Pathak arrived. Mishra told Pathak to go and inform the family while he waited. Pathak took the police jeep. We waited. We were there a full two-and-a-half hours. The body remained where it was, in exactly the same condition as we saw it, when we came it was getting cold. We came away." Mr Verma said he never imagined a dispute to rise over a body that had been lying dead for so long in full public view from 7 pm in the evening. And hence he had not found the necessity of recording evidence on the spot. A group of Rashtriya Sanjay Manch workers who had received a telephone call in Rae Bareili from Bacchrawan drove down to the Bacchrawan police station around 11 pm. Among them was Ram Bardhan Singh, Parmanand Mishra and 10 or 15 others. At the police station, they found a crowd: the body lay in the jeep and the police were not allowing anyone near it, they say. "This group was later joined by another group including our candidate from Rae Bareili, Mr J.N. Mishra, " aid Mahesh Sharma, a party worke: This was around 12.30 am.

However, after several hours at 3.15 am on 24 December 1984, in between 12.30 am and 3.15 am Mr Mishra had taken away Kamala Devi, Mr Bajpai's widow, to a friend's house to console her. When the group returned to file the report around 3 am, the body was gone. The family alleges that the SP of Rae Bareili, Rajendra Singh Dhillon, had taken it away to the district hospital around one am. Of course, the official version is entirely different. It rests on a few premises, each of them vital. That the body was discovered on the road in a critical state between 11 pm and 11.30 pm on 23 December 1984 by the Bacchrawan police; it was taken first to the police station, then to the PHC, where no doctor was to be found, and then back to the police station and later to the district hospital at a little before 3.10 am; that Mr Bajpai died at 8.50 am on 24 December 1984; that it is not the common practice to keep a record of time in such cases and that getting a body to hospital is not just a simple matter—even if the nearest hospital is just 30 kms away (it might even take over three-and-a-half hours)—and that even if a person is alive and found with a head injury from which he is profusely bleeding. It does not matter much if his neck and hands and feet are tied with rope or electric wiring for any length of time and of course, giving over dead bodies—whether they be of parliamentary candidates or anyone else—to the next of kin after a post mortem when the family is screaming for it is best avoided in controversial cases, where bodies are best burnt up quickly and all records sealed.

Getting to R.S. Dhillon, SP, was difficult. A telephone call to his residence brought the reply, "He has gone out with the DIG and we cannot say when he will be back." A visit to his residence was more fruitful. The policeman on duty said he was in fact at home all day. Mr Dhillon himself apologised. Asked if the investigations into the murder of Mr Bajpai and the kidnapping of his nephew had yielded any result, he said, "No. We get to know anything only when we are in touch with the CID which is handling the case." What was his version of the events of December 23-24 1984? "The body was found between 11 pm and 11.30 pm approximately. The station officer at Bacchrawan picked him up and brought him to the thana from where he was taken to the Rae Bareili hospital." When exactly? "We cannot say; he picked him up, from there he went to the thana and from there he went to the PHC. There was no doctor there so he brought him back (to the thana). Then he brought him to the district hospital. "Does he not have a precise idea of when exactly he visited these places with the body? That we cannot say (smiles). It is not something that everybody records at that time. From 11.30 pm to 3.10 am we cannot pinpoint what happened. 3.10 am was the time of entry in the registers of the hospital emergency department. Obviously it was taken to the hospital a little earlier. What condition was Mr Bajpai in when he was found at 11.30 pm? "His hands and feet were bound. And he had a head injury." Was he aware of the electric wiring around his neck? "No, as far as I know the hands and feet were tied." Was there a deep gash on his right temple? "There was a head injury but I am not sure exactly what was the nature of the injury. After 3.10 am he was given proper treatment for several hours." But where was the question of treating a person who as his widow and daughter had been informed by the local police had been murdered, and whose dead body the police had taken the family to see? How could he insist that such a person was alive, when his family along with the police were satisfied he was dead? The reply was cold. "We are nobody to decide whether a person is alive or dead. It is the doctor who decides." True. But even if the person was alive, why leave him in that state for so long—from 11.30 pm to 3 am? "No. The distance from here (Rae Bareili) to Bacchrawan is about 35 kms, and all this takes time. It is very easy to say for four hours or three-and-a-half hours what you were doing. The point is if somebody first tells you that somebody is lying three kms from here, you travel for three kms, look around, then you go back to get another vehicle. You go there and pick him up from there. Then from there you...it's not something that's clockwork." But why was he not freed of his bonds for long? Could that affect his state? "No. If his hands and feet were tied it had nothing to do with his head injury." Indeed if it is true then that Mr Bajpai had died much earlier...as scores of people who have seen him claim (and one is not speaking of a point of law)—and the death certificate gives the wrong time, can the post mortem report be considered a proper reliable document? If it cannot, can the police be depended upon to find out Mr Bajpai's killers, their motive and the missing Vijay Shukla's whereabouts and thus do justice to the bereaved family? Notably, neither the CID nor the Bacchrawan police made any progress so far.

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

A woman casts her vote in Rae Bareili

Out of the World

Three-day meet of godmen in Delhi

"Do wait a few moments. Pilot Baba will go into samadhi right after tea..." said the lady with the batting eyelashes and the big eyes which had, according to their owner, "drunk in the beauty of meditation."

It was tea break on the cold, foggy morning of 19 January 1985 shortly after the inauguration of the three-day international conference on spiritual renaissance, organised by Bharat Nirman. We stood in the sea of Rajneesh orange and magenta, the less startling saffron of lesser international gurus, the milk-white safari suit and electric blue badges and trimmings of the man from Fiji, the brown and saffron of the Buddhist monks and the lush Kanjeevaram splendour of the many women attending or part of the organising crew of the international festival of spiritualism. There were Hindus, Jains, Buddhists, Sikhs, Jews, Sufis, Muslims, Rajneeshees, Bahai's, disciples of Mahesh Yogi, Tibetans and the omnipresent Brahmakumaris.

It was an all-out effort to put spiritualism in its right place. The inauguration was done no less by a personage than the union minister of steel, coal and mines, Vasant Sathe. Dr Nagendra Singh, a judge in the International Court of Justice, was the chairman of the reception committee. The valedictory address was delivered by Dr M.L. Shahare, chairman of the Union Public Service Commission. And the distinguished speaker, addressing this conference to a packed Mavlankar hall (filled with lawyers, judges, bureaucrats or the "literate" as one of the participants described the audience) was India's vice-president and former union minister for defence, R. Venkataraman.

But to get back to the main event that day which was Pilot Baba going into samadhi for 72 hours. That was taking place backstage. On stage, were some people from industry and, of course, a sprinkling of star swamis: the Flying Swami from Canada (originally Kerala), Taj Baba from Brindaban, Mahatma Sampoorna Nandi, Brahmakumari Chandramenji, Yogi Manohar Harkari and others.

Formerly an air force pilot, Pilot Baba (who was earlier flight lieutenant Kapil; he flew in the Pathankot sector for the air force during the 1965 war) went into samadhi a little before lunch: at one o'clock to be precise. The black curtain rose a few minutes before 1.00 pm. Behind it was a wooden airtight rectangular box, six feet by four feet in size. Three of its sides were wood while the front panel was made of glass. Pilot Baba stepped into what was going to be his home for three days and two nights and immediately put himself in the "relax" pose. He was out of the material world within seconds. While people noisily tried to fit the back panel, he went deeper within himself.

Meanwhile, the conference continued. The next day's highlight was Taj Baba, who had some words of advice about the right kind of gastronomical diet. But he did something quite dramatic: he put most of the audience, in the words of one of the organisers, "into a deep state of meditation." Another participant had used the word "trance." Elaborated the articulate young lady again: "The kundalini was awakened. It was like a torch being shone on the eyes. I had tears in my eyes when Baba took people into meditation. It was as if we were being churned inside. The soul feels it is being cleaned." The Baba's dietary description for health, mind and body was not that easy to follow. No food before noon and that too only salads, sprouts and juices. Pilot Baba, who at 70 looks at least 20 years younger, advised the people to choose only lentils, vegetables and chapatis. The Baba was, however, an optimist. He compared the state of the world to a "bad tummy." It would all be worked out of the system, he said. The toofan of sex and violence would blow over.

On the final day we heard the Flying Swami, who has a little plane he flies for peace and nuclear disarmament. Last year, the plane could not take off from one of the Indian cities because the petrol was not pure enough. The Swami with his large following even tried to persuade Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale to follow the path of peace. The final day was also when Pilot Baba was to emerge from his samadhi. His last words to us before he had gone into the wooden box on 19 January were: "See you on the 21st." The Baba looked much the same when he came out. He said that he could "preserve" his energy, ideas and thoughts "as in a freezer" and when he emerged, it seemed he had done just that.

At the end of the spiritual conference, Bharat Nirman passed some resolutions: the decision to launch a spiritual movement throughout the country "to control violence, hatred, disunity, disintegration," according to the press release issued by the conference convener M.C. Bhandari. But clearly many among those who attended the conference had not "surrendered to the divine" as had the dynamic organising secretary, Dilraj Bedi. Bedi had even taken a group of 11 women from the Taj Health Club to a spiritual retreat in Rajasthan last March. Meditation apart, the portly ladies of the club actually lost from three to five kilograms of weight each. Said Bedi, "It was cold but we were sweating in the ardour of our meditation, we were burning our calories."

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

Illustrations: Bulbul Sharma

BOOK EXTRACT

Captain Rajiv

In the concluding extract from his book, The Nehrus and the Gandhis: An Indian Dynasty (published by Pan Books in association with Chatto and Windus and distributed in India by Rupa and Company, 15 Bankim Chatterjee Street, Calcutta 700 012; price £ 2.50), Tariq Ali assesses Sanjay and Rajiv Gandhi as politicians.

During the Janata years there had been a detailed enquiry into Sanjay's financial deals. The Maruti firm had, especially been scrutinised in great detail, but there was no evidence to convict. Much of the money that Sanjay had gathered for the Congress had, in any event, been cash in hand supplied by the godfathers of the smuggling industry in Bombay. This 'black money' was never registered anywhere in the first place, so evidence was not easy to obtain. Colonel Anand, Menaka's father was questioned about some of these matters during this period. He had been upset and complained to his friends about the indignity.

Then one day he was found dead, with a revolver in his hand. Was it murder or suicide? He had left behind a cryptic note containing the words 'Pressure Sanjay Unbearable'. Every media commentator now became a temporary detective. Did the words indicate that Sanjay's pressure on the dead man had been unbearable? Was Sanjay preventing him from speaking, the truth in court? In that case was the murderer engaged by Sanjay? Others argued that Colonel Anand had been depressed by the Janata government's pressure on his young son-in-law and that is why he had killed himself. The truth became a matter for conjecture, depending on the political views of those who engaged in speculation. No evidence was ever found to suggest that the colonel had been murdered, leave alone by his son-in-law. The press, nonetheless, made sure that the incident left a murky impression. They very fact, however, that Sanjay's guilt was believed by large numbers of ordinary people requires no extensive commentary.

Sanjay was now portrayed as something of an enigma. He still had his supporters, but they were not large in number amongst the intelligentsia, a layer he loathed. It is easy to describe him as an assemblage of grotesque incongruities: perifidious and dedicated; selfish and generous; cruel and kind; crafty and simple-minded; intelligent and stupid; villain and hero. The problem with this sort of description is that it could easily be applied to Hitler or Stalin. It is a mystification, but it was in wide circulation during the Nehru-Gandhi family's years in exile. In fact Sanjay's politics were coherent, logical, but marked a definitive break with the populist consensus projected by the Congress Party. What he wanted to do in India was the equivalent of what Thatcher did in Britain and Reagan in the United States. The problem was that such a sharp turn in Indian conditions might well have provoked a hydraheaded backlash, which would have weakened the Indian Federation and its political structures. Indira, in her own way, was aware of this fact, though she perceived the problem with which Sanjay was trying to grapple. Her own solutions were typically pragmatic and their outcome was a multiplication of tragedies throughout the sub-continent.

For the 1980 elections, Sanjay, had prepared his own complement of new, model Congressmen. He was determined to change the physiognomy of the Congress Parliamentary Party and prepare the way not simply for his own accession to office, but for a totally different Congress Party. His friend and colleague, Akbar Ahmed spelt this out very clearly after Sanjay's death. The word youth is a code for the new congressman:

> Sanjay was one of the few people in India who really gave youth a chance. In 1980, in both the Parliamentary and Assembly elections, a substantial proportion of seats went to youth. In Uttar Pradesh over 200 seats out of 425 were given to youth. In today's politics nothing will get done till we get rid of the people who've been for donkey's years...To build India we need a change. And only youth can change things...
>
> Sanjay was one person who wanted to liberate Indian industry from the stranglehold that there were. He wanted to lay emphasis on agriculture, on programmes that would be implemented and wouldn't just remain at the planning stage.

Sanjay's wife Maneka was a tiny bit more critical than Akbar Ahmed. In her picture book on her husband, she describes how she was sometimes forced to communicate with him via a set of poems. She would write one and leave it on his table. One of these was later reproduced by her and provides a glimpse of what life with him must have been like:

> Sanjay Gandhi, ferocious being
> Who never looks without seeing.
> Whose facts are almost always right.
> Whose judgments almost always bite.
> Who's so totally work-oriented.
> That he's driven his wife demented.
> With his fact and figures and complete knowledge.

Sanjay Gandhi with Ambika Soni

And his refusal to indulge in 'lollage'.

Sanjay Gandhi computer man.

Why can't you be more human?

Sanjay's reply to this was not recorded, though he must have relented a bit, for Maneka bore him a son in 1979, Feroze Varuna. When asked by a reporter whether she had waited so long after her wedding to encourage birth-control, she confessed merrily; 'Rubbish—I wanted to wait ten years—this baby's not planned. I wanted to have my husband to myself.'

Sanjay remained extremely busy trying to re-organise the country's politics. He still had no official post in the government, but was behaving more and more as if he were the prime minister. He was planning a large-scale purge of the civil service in order to replace senior administrators with his own tested loyalists. He was also busy ensuring that his new crop of Congress MPs were properly represented in the new government. One reason for Indira to wait a long time to stabilise her 1980 Cabinet was because of the relentless pressure from the 'Sanjay Caucus'. Soon she would be without Sanjay, and Maneka would not regret the lack of family planning that had given her young Feroze.

Just prior to the emergency, Sanjay had learnt how to fly and obtained his pilot's licence. The Maruti disaster had cured him of the car-mania. From then on it was planes, like Rajiv and Jawaharlal. After the defeat of 1977, the Janata Government had taken away his licence on the grounds that he might fly himself and his mother out of the country to escape retribution. He had now got it back. A close acquaintance of his, Karan Thapar, once accompanied him as a passenger in his two-seater. It was a terrifying experience as Thapar reported to a London magazine, the Spectator.

I remember flying with him on one occasion in a single-engined plane, attempting every type of loop of which the little aircraft was capable. After exhausting the pleasures of aerial acrobatics, he set out to scare the local peasants working in their fields by aiming the aircraft straight at them, swerving dramatically upwards at the last minute. Whatever view one takes of such a sport, it requires nerves of steel and tremendous self-confidence.

On 23 June 1980, Sanjay Gandhi left 1 Safdarjung Road at 6.30 a.m. and drove to the Delhi Flying Club. It was early, but he wanted to avoid the heat that began to envelop the city soon after sunrise. He had an appointment with Captain Subhash Saxena, who was going to accompany him on the red Pitts S-2A, a light two-seater American plane. Saxena had not wanted to fly that day. He was due to have a hernia operation and was not feeling too well, but he allowed himself to be persuaded by Sanjay. The flying club's chief instructor advised Sanjay not to fly the Pitts, since it had only been used for the last few days and had not even been test-flown by the club's expert mechanics. 'I must take up this red bird today,' Sanjay had insisted. The discussion had ended.

The Pitts had been the centre of a long controversy. It had been despatched to Sanjay as a 'gift' during the Emergency, courtesy of the British-Asian industrialist, Swraj Paul. By the time it had arrived in India, the Congress had been defeated and Janata was in power. The new government decided to investigate the 'gift'. The American firm panicked and said they would happily withdraw the 'gift' and re-export the plane back from India. While the negotiations were taking place, the Indian electorate had returned Mrs Gandhi to office. The whole investigation was dropped and the firm was happy for the Pitts to become a 'gift' once again.

Sanjay Gandhi: ruthless politics

So on that warm summer's morning Sanjay and his less-than-enthusiastic passenger, Subhash Saxena, flew into the Delhi sky. Sanjay had clearly wanted to impress Saxena, who was an experienced pilot, with his flying skills. He flew the plane over Safdarjung Road and Willingdon Crescent. Then he started at a thousand feet, to demonstrate a few somersaults. The Pitts never came out of nose-dive. It crashed just behind Willingdon Crescent into some trees. Sanjay and Saxena died instantly. The once and future leader was no more. There was a great deal of sympathy for his young widow and his grief-stricken mother and the infant boy.

If the truth be told, there were many former victims of forced sterilisation and 'slum-clearance' who made no secret of their belief that it had been an 'act of God'. It was these people who upheld Voltaire's dictum that: 'One owes respect to the living. To the dead one owes nothing but the truth.' This had been practised in the early years after independence. Indian communists, in particular, had declined to pay posthumous homage to their political enemies. During the late 1950s, CP members of the West Bengal Assembly had refused to stand in silence and pay homage to dead Congress politicians. Apart from the press, there had been no outcry. In fact the West Bengal CPI had gained respect amongst the poor for not indulging in sentimental hypocrisy.

Times had changed. In 1980 it was much more than condolences for Sanjay's mother and wife. What took place was a grotesque act of hypocrisy. Men who had denounced Sanjay endlessly as a 'fascist', a 'Rasputin', 'a hooligan', who had demanded that Doon School should, in honour of Sanjay, be renamed Goon School, were now competing with each other to pay tribute to the departed Caesar. The devil was being transformed into a god

Charan Singh, who had launched a particularly nasty and vindictive witchhunt against mother and son when they were out of office, said: 'It is a tragedy that a young man who dreamt about the greatness of this country is no more with us.' Atal Behari Vajpayee, supposedly a man of principle, albeit a communalist and at the helm of a semi-fascist party, declared: 'Mr Gandhi's death has brought darkness at noon.' The other Mr Gandhi had, it is worth remembering, been assassinated by men who were politically inspired by Vajpayee's own mentors. Indrajit Gupta of the CPI, a party which had been denounced as 'corrupt' by Sanjay declared that: 'All political controversies are still in the face of death'. The other Communist Party's Chief Minister of Tripura announced that Sanjay's loss was not just that of the Congress, but was shared by the country as a whole!

Given this barrage from his enemies, the courtiers had a hard task ahead of them, but old Khushwant Singh managed a personal tribute, which established a certain pattern:

> We bid farewell to our young departed leader with tears that will take an age to wipe off our eyes. His dying has made us rarer gifts than gold (sic). He has laid the world away and poured out the red wine of his youth, and given up the years that were to be his. The best tribute the nation can pay him is to create the India of his dreams: green with teeming forests, cleansed of all the filth in its cities; with small healthy families and smiling happy girls freed of worry over their dowries.

If some enterprising Indian magazine had instituted a 'Golden Chamcha of the Year Award', there is little doubt that the writer quoted above would have been a strong contender for the title in 1980.

Mrs Indira Gandhi near Sanjay's body

Sanjay was embalmed for a day while Rajiv and Sonia returned from Italy for the funeral. Indira had wanted him cremated on the same spot as her father, but at this the opposition protested. For Sanjay's dead body to be set alight by Rajiv on the same spot where the dead man had lit his grandfather's funeral pyre? It was a sacrilege, said the opposition. Rajiv agreed. Sanjay was burned well behind the Nehru site. His ashes were sprinkled into the Ganges near Allahabad.

Maneka and her mother, Mrs Anand, felt that as Sanjay's wife, she should succeed him as MP for Amethi. Wl.en Indira asked Akbar Ahmed: 'Who do we put up in Amethi?' Sanjay's closet friend claims he replied: 'Put up Rajiv.' To be given the following answer: 'Don't be silly. His politics are not like ours. I don't trust him.' When he suggested Maneka's name the response was that she had fourteen months to go before she fulfilled the age requirement. All this changed the minute Rajiv was persuaded to give up flying and enter politics. Maneka felt humiliated. Sanjay's few close friends were also put out in the cold. Most of them had lost their influence overnight, but they accommodated to the new situation.

Sanjay loyalist, Akbar 'Dumpy' Ahmed was angry at the defection. Even 'Roly Poly' had gone. 'I feel sorry for them,' declared Dumpy, 'because they are neither here nor there. Kamal Nath just chickened out, poor chap...He was close to Sanjay and should have stood up when Sanjay's people were being isolated and Sanjay's name was being wiped out. Now Jagdish Tytler is just another chamcha in the Congress 'set-up'.

Dumpy tended towards sentimentality. Most of the Sanjay intake of Congress MPs had been personally loyal to the dead man because of what he promised them

Rajiv campaigning

The leader meets the people

Sanjeev Prem

in terms of politics and economics. Their fondness for Sanjay's style was not based on any aesthetic appreciation of the man, but because he promised to defend their material interests. That had been his main attraction. It was, of course, considered tasteless to say this aloud soon after his death, but it was said, though not by any mainstream publication. In a narrow, old Calcutta street, Mott Lane, and old Bengali Marxist intellectual and one-time poet, Samar Sen had his headquarters. All he did was to produce a weekly magazine, Frontier. He had been a sophisticated supporter of the Chinese in the years that immediately followed the Sino-Soviet split, and his magazine had always had to swim against the tide of public opinion. After Sanjay's death it was Frontier which printed an account that would outlive the mawkish banalities of almost everything else. It was entitled 'What Sanjay Meant'. Its author had preferred to remain anonymous. After describing how the streets of the city where he was had not betrayed any signs of emotion or distress at the news of the heir-apparent's death, the author described how as he was boarding a half-empty plane for Delhi he caught a glimpse of Sanjay's men. His account of these men remains the best description that I have so far read.

> The plane was getting ready when there was fresh activity. Suddenly new passengers started climbing up and pouring in a unending stream of dazzling white, freshly-pressed Sanjay suits, each with a jagged strip of black ribbon pinned either on the arm or the chest. There would be at least a hundred of them There wasn't a seat left any more.

They were noisy, these late entrants to Congres politics and they talked a lot. Frontier's anonymous correspondent observed them silently. As the plane went up, he started to pen the following despatch:

It was then time to make a leisurely survey. This new group of a hundred and more Sanjay suits were all men—hardly a woman—of between 30 and 45, stout and gross, with a fullness of uncouth confidence, reeking of Old Spice, their stomachs round and tight as drums. These were the type I have seen in Andhra's districts, owning homes partly airconditioned and barns large as playgrounds, large and medium farms of tobacco, rice, oilseeds, new and neatly run agroprocessing factories. These were the same men I had seen sitting on the boards of cooperative banks and other government financing institutions engaged in siphoning off money drawn in the name of hundreds of real or imaginary small beneficiaries, to profitable investments and shuffling them over a wide range of portfolios in and away from Andhra Pradesh. These were the men who owned most of the new medium and small-scale industries in town and struck profitable business and marriage alliances in the city, acquired themselves brides in the image of Telugu and Tamil films, each bound by ties of marriage, caste and inheritance with the older generation which had done well and completed the first and most crucial stage of primitive accumulation. They represented the new interacting triangle; the landed gentry in the village, the industrial entrepreneur in the city and the new intelligentsia that belonged to both. Few of them in the plane at all bothered to sidle up to Chenna Reddy or Narasimha Rao as is customary when such dignitaries travel. They kept their own company. Wiping out whole Harijan villages of an evening without batting an eyelid was as much in the day's work to them as buying off quietly and without fuss a hundred confirmed air passengers and dozens more on the official waiting list at 9 o'clock any morning and taking their places on the plane to Delhi at 12.55. The point in either case was to do it efficiently, if need be ruthlessly, and without fuss. Network and understanding, understanding and network.

Priyanka with her father at the Asian Games

Sanjay was dead. His political project, however, was very much alive. And so was his wife.

When Sanjay's death took place, his brother Rajiv had been sitting at the controls of a plane for fourteen years. His friends stated that he was happy. He showed no signs of wanting a change. He had not been particularly happy during the Emergency years. He had little time for Sanjay's politics, but had been helpless to do much about it at the time. He told a friend later that he had not heard too much about the 'excesses of the emergency', but whatever he had been told, he had passed on to the other occupants of 1 Safdarjung Road, who had invariably refused to believe him.

It would be inaccurate to say that he was disinterested in politics. He had held certain views, which were traditional in his circle of friends. He was a liberal-democratic supporter of the Congress. Nonetheless both he and Sonia were totally opposed to his entering the cockpit of Indian politics. At one point Sonia told a friend that she would rather her children begged in the streets than that Rajiv entered politics. She, probably much more than him, regarded politics as filthy, corrupt and riddled with sycophants, whom she disliked intensely. There was, after all, no shortage of them at 1 Safdarjung Road. Whether or not she ever made the comparison between her native Italy and India is not known, but there were many similarities between the Indian Congress and the Italian Christian Democrats. Both parties were in the grip of venal politicians. Both were heavily dependent on both extending and receiving patronage. And then there was the link with the underworld. The Christian Democrats were linked to the Mafia. The Congress was financially in debt to its Indian counterparts. Political protectionism was practised in both instances.

Sonia had not yet exchanged her Italian passport for Indian nationality. After the electoral blow of 1977, Rajiv had informed his mother that he and his family wanted to leave India for a time and settle in Italy. This announcement had created a personal crisis in the household. Indira had pleaded with both of them not to leave her at this time. She had said that she could not bear being without her grandchildren. His mother's pleas had changed Rajiv's mind. Sanjay's cronies alleged that Rajiv and Sonia had regarded the post-Emergency debacle as a catastrophe and had not believed that the family's political fortune could ever recover after such a stunning blow. Rajiv had not participated in the election campaign of 1980, which had been managed by Sanjay. This had been followed by the fatal plane crash. An argument had started over the succession and pressure was brought to bear on Rajiv. There had been two opposing factions. One led by Maneka and her mother, Mrs Anand, and backed by Dumpy which saw Maneka as Sanjay's heiress, who would keep the seat warm for her three-month-old son, Feroze. It was hardly a secret that the two brothers and their families had not been on the best of terms. Sonia and Maneka, in particular, had not even attempted to conceal their mutual dislike. The struggle for the succession with all its grotesque, medieval undertones had started even before Sanjay's cremation. The Maneka Caucus had met at Mrs Anand's house and discussed how to retain its hold on the large block of Sanjay MPs and use it as a wedge to press Maneka's claims.

Indira Gandhi and her close advisers opted for Rajiv. Once they had decided this question, then nothing was left to chance. In August 1980, barely two months after Sanjay's crash, 300 Congress MPs called on Rajiv to step into his brother's shoes and contest the by-election in Amethi. Rajiv hesitated. He was not even an ordinary card-carrying member of the Congress. His wife was still implacably hostile to the idea. Several months later, in April 1981, a respected conservative journalist, Sunanda Datta Ray, wrote in The Statesman: 'Leaders do not issue orders from behind their mother's skirts...They must operate within the constitutional framework, and be answerable to the people for all they do...Mr Gandhi should, therefore, either legitimise his position or be seen to surrender all claims to power...Will the real Rajiv Gandhi, therefore, please stand up and declare himself?'

The following month, Rajiv followed Datta-Ray's advice. He resigned his pilot's job with Indian Airlines and decided to contest Amethi. The seat had been unoccupied for one whole year, a constitutional impropriety since vacant seats need to be filled within six months. It had been Nehru's constituency and after his death it had been filled by his sister Vijayalakshmi, then Sanjay and now Rajiv. Sonia, reconciled to the new plans, quietly gave up her Italian nationality. The crown princess became an Indian citizen.

In June 1981, Rajiv was elected to Parliament in a landslide victory. When questioned about his political ideas he tended to be vague, saying that he supported the Congress manifesto. Yet his differences with Sanjay had not been on fundamentals, but on style. He favoured free-enterprise, foreign investments and modernisation. He disliked corruption, sycophants and gangsters. The problem was that they were not unrelated. Sanjay had discovered this at an early stage and attempted to harness the latter in order to enhance his politico-economic project. Rajiv would begin to discover these hard facts over the next few years. Sanjay's old friend, Dumpy, was enraged by the press descriptions of Rajiv as 'Mr Clean', though even he could not make a specific allegation about Rajiv. What he did say was that:
During the Emergency, Sonia was involved with Maruti Technical Services. If they didn't approve of Maruti as they later claimed then she shouldn't have become a shareholder. It wasn't just that they wanted to help Sanjay. Letters have shown that, during the Emergency, Sonia's brother wanted a liquor contract in India for Italy. Sonia's family was involved in business in India, so how can they say they were not interested in politics?

In 1983, Rajiv took a step nearer to the throne when he was appointed one of the general-secretaries of the Congress Party by his mother. This was his first official post in the party and represented a phenomenal advance given that he had been a member for only three years. After winning Amethi, Rajiv had tasted the fruits of political victory. He confessed to Trevor Fishlock of The Times:
Yes, I do feel excited about going into politics. But daunted, too. Look at the people in this constituency. They have so little and there is so much to be done. How do you begin to make improvements? It will be satisfying to make progress, but I have no illusions about the difficulties.

He told Ian Jack of the Sunday Times that he wanted to attract a new breed of person to politics—intelligent, westernised young men with non-feudal, non-criminal ideas, who want to make India prosper rather than merely themselves.'

Rajiv's politics may not have been too different from those of Sanjay's, but he rapidly made it clear that his brother's followers would not find much room in the new set-up. Instead he relied on a tightly-knit group of old friends, not too different from himself. Rajiv Dhar, the son of the late D. P. Dhar, a Kashmiri Brahmin, and one of the country's most distinguished post-1974 civil servants, had been a friend of Rajiv's for a long time. Then there was the Doon School/Cambridge connection. Arun Singh, was a scion of a princely family and a senior company executive with Reckitt and Colman. He had been a close personal friend at Cambridge, where he had imbibed his liberalism. 'Oh, we were the Beatles generation', he told an interviewer from Bombay's Imprint magazine. He also confessed that life as a business executive had become dull and boring. Rajiv's political turn had been an ideal moment for him, too, to change professions. Arun Singh became a political assistant to the future Prime Minister, but expressed the hope that he would soon end up in Parliament, which institution he regarded as 'being fundamental to democracy'. From the Nehru family, a cousin, Arun Nehru, had already been elected to Parliament from Rae Bareilly. Indira has told an acquaintance that: 'The people of Rae Bareilly are not happy without a Nehru.' Arun had been found and elected. He became another member of the charmed circle. It was the two Aruns who, more than anyone else, helped Rajiv to take important decisions such as the allocation of seats for the December 1984 general elections. Sanjay's advisers had included strongmen from the countryside. Rajiv's men were urban university-graduates, with a technocratic bent. Their affection for computer-predictions and television electoral campaigns did not endear them to the more cautious members of the A-team. The ethos of Rajiv Gandhi and his friends was spelt out by Arun Singh as follows: All the people I know have certain basic things in common. We're all Indians first; we are all secular Indians by any definition. Irrespective of what anybody might say, we operate on a very high level of integrity—personal integrity. I'm not only talking about money, for after all, money is only one of the aspects of personal integrity. Let's say we have a fairly high moral standard, and I think these are assets.

Rajiv Gandhi: shy pilot to bold leader

In December 1983, Rajiv was presented to the Congress delegates in Calcutta as the future leader of the country. The city itself had been festooned with pictures of Indira and Rajiv, which fought for space on the walls with the advertisements for Hindi movies. There was also a poster of Rajiv on his own, with the following caption underneath: 'Today's Leader, Tomorrow's Hope'. One could not help feeling that the Congress's PR men had got this slightly wrong and it should have read: 'Today's Hope, Tomorrow's Leader'.

The only irritant in this regard had been the public campaign launched by Maneka Gandhi, Sanjay's widow, against Rajiv. Maneka had left 1 Safdarjung Road in a blaze of publicity. She told the world that her mother-in-law had asked her to leave and she paraded herself and her son as the wronged members of the family. The truth was somewhat different. Ever since Rajiv's decision to enter politics, Maneka had been plotting her revenge. She had met leaders of certain opposition groups and had decided that she would try and break Sanjay's followers from the Indira-Rajiv Congress Party. It was widely known that she was out of favour, but Mrs Gandhi had not taken any decision to expel her from 1 Safdarjung Road. Maneka had been complaining bitterly to everyone who listened that she was being ill-treated and ignored by her mother-in-law. When she was asked why she did not leave the house and set up her own establishment, she used to reply that timing in such matters was crucial. In March 1982 she had finally walked out, after discussing the matter in some detail with members of the BJP (the former Jan Sangh). Immediately after her departure she announced the creation of the 'Sanjay Forum', which she said would work for 'socialism, secularism and democracy', none of which had been the strong points of her late husband. A year later she formed a political party and named it the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch (National Sanjay Organisation). She also announced that she, Maneka, would challenge the dynasty at Amethi. She would fight Rajiv bitterly for the succession. The Manchies gained a few successes. Dumpy was elected to Parliament in a by-election and the Congress began to take Maneka seriously. She also began to appear at the opposition conclaves and many opposition leaders saw in her a specialised instrument which could be used to damage Mrs Gandhi and her son. Certainly Rajiv and Sonia began to visit Amethi regularly after Maneka's challenge and a lot of money was poured into the constituency in the form of welfare projects. Maneka's main angle at political rallies was to present herself to the poor peasants as a wronged widow, cast out on to the streets by a tyrannical mother-in-law and under the cold eyes of her late husband's cruel elder brother and his foreign wife. This simplistic morality tale was largely a fiction, but it did have an initial impact. The rows between Mrs Gandhi and Maneka over the share of Sanjay's estate and over Mrs Gandhi's legal rights to see her grandson, kept the dispute public. This was used with great effect by Maneka in her public campaigns. In her own way, Sanjay's widow did reveal a certain political flair and gustiness, albeit of a somewhat undesirable variety. With her mother-in-law's assassination, she has lost the most important electoral card in her possession, but she still possesses the Gandhi name. If Indian politics were to continue for the rest of this decade in the same way as they have since 1980, Maneka might be able to exploit her dynastic connections far more blatantly than can be visualised at the present moment.

In the meantime the men of the Beatles generation were beginning to grasp the scale of the problems that confronted them. It was not just the massacres in Assam, the widespread outbreak of communal rioting in places like Bombay or the threatening clouds over the Punjab. It was the state of the Congress Party. The former US Ambassador to India, J. K. Galbraith, had during Nehru's lifetime referred affectionately to the Indian political system as an advanced form of 'organised anarchy'. The Congress Party had by now become an undisciplined anarchy. Sanjay's death had undoubtedly left a vacuum. One of the nastiest demonstrations of this was the conference of the NSUI (National Students

Rajiv with his mother's ashes

Union of India), the student wing of the Congress, in Nagpur in September 1984. The Congress students had become well-known and well-feared since the late 1970s as hooligans without a leash. Sanjay had controlled them for a while, but not for long. The Nagpur gathering was scheduled for only 20,000 'students.' An extra fifteen thousand had turned up. Different groups within the Congress had mobilised their supporters in a show of strength designed to advance their claims for parliamentary representation.

These 'delegates' were not in the least bit interested in the speeches. They looted the shops, raided the liquor dens and fought each other in the brothels. The ordinary people of Nagpur were horrified. Young women were molested and there were a number of reported incidents of rape. The Bombay president of the NSUI, a decent young man, declared that he was extremely worried for the safety of the women delegates and sent them back home. The press reports were too detailed for any Congress leader to rebut the truth. Indira tried to blame the rowdyism on the opposition, by stating that the RSS had infiltrated the session to discredit the government. This was convenient, but false. What had happened was not so different from the AICC session of Congress adults in Calcutta in December 1983. Only the scale was much bigger. The explosion finally came in the Punjab. 'Operation Bluestar' was successful, but the cost was heavy. India's Prime Minister was assassinated by her own Punjabi bodyguards.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Caught in the Crossfire

Governor earns the wrath of Telugu Desam and Congress(I)

The Andhra Pradesh government and the Governor are at loggerheads again. For the second time within six months a delegation of Telugu Desam legislators called on President Zail Singh regarding the controversial actions of the state Governor. In August 1984, N.T. Ramarao led his group of Telugu Desam MLAs to Rashtrapati Bhavan in Delhi to protest against Governor Ram Lal's dismissal of his government and to demonstrate that he had the support of a majority of the members of the Legislative Assembly. It is now Ram Lal's successor as Governor of Andhra Pradesh, Dr Shankar Dayal Sharma, who is embroiled in a political controversy in the state with the APCC-(I) president accusing the Governor of hobnobbing with the Telugu Desam leaders and acting in their interests while the state government is in an increasingly embarrassing position regarding some ordinances which have lapsed and which Dr Sharma has refused to repromulgate. The newly elected Telugu Desam Members of Parliament met the president to explain the situation which has arisen because of the Governor's refusal to sign the ordinances recommended by the state cabinet.

Vijay Lokapally

N T. Ramarao

There are three ordinances which have lapsed after the state Assembly was dissolved. These relate to the abolition of the posts of village officers, formation of the revenue mandals in the state and the amendment of the Andhra Pradesh Payment of Salaries Act to remove the disqualification on a member of the state Legislature from holding the chairmanship of a state government corporation. It is the ordinance regarding the village officers which has put the state government in a difficult position and has generated the maximum controversy, for the former village officers have moved a petition in the High Court on the plea that the ordinance removing them from their post had lapsed and has not been revalidated.

This is the second time in a short period that a Governor's actions have become a subject of major controversy in the state. In August 1983, the then state Governor Ram Lal had been swamped by the controversy over his arbitary dismissal of N.T. Ramarao's ministry and installation of the Congress(I) supported government of Nadendla Bhaskara Rao. The controversy escalated into a month-long agitation in the state by the Telugu Desam party led by NTR and supported by the national opposition parties. The public uproar and the sustained campaign for NTR was highly embarrassing and Ram Lal was recalled to be replaced by the veteran Congress leader, Dr Shankar Dayal Sharma. Though the Assembly session was called within a month, Bhaskara Rao could not prove his majority in the House within the period of one month allotted to him when he was sworn in by Ram Lal. Dr Sharma dismissed the Bhaskara Rao government on these grounds and requested NTR to form the new government on 15 September 1984.

Initially, there was much goodwill between Dr Sharma and NTR after the Governor's smooth handling of the state's political affairs in a troubled period, leading to NTR's reinstallation as chief minister. However, the goodwill dissipated rapidly when Dr Sharma refused to sign the ordinances recommended by the state cabinet after the Assembly had been dissolved. The Governor's action was an important issue during the election campaign for the Lok Sabha in December. NTR raised the subject at every public meeting to show how his government's popular policies were being stalled. The state Congress(I) has now woken up to the impact of the ordinance on the public. As a senior Congress(I) leader bitterly complained, both Ram Lal and Dr Shankar Dayal Sharma have between them given the Telugu Desam party 28 seats in the Lok Sabha.

This has led to the extraordinary situation where Dr Y.S. Rajasekhar Reddy, the state Congress(I) chief has claimed that the state unit of his party was not sure of the Governor's intentions as circumstantial evidence showed that the Governor was not impartial and his actions had "marred the chances of the Congress(I) party in the Assembly elections." The Congress(I) has been bitterly opposing the state government's decision to do away with the system of parttime village officers to the extent of stalling the government bill on the subject in the Upper House where they have the majority. But the party has suddenly changed its stance and urged the Governor not to stand on "some legal formality" for not issuing the ordinance. The APCC(I) chief has now begun claiming the credit for the scheme saying that the idea of abolishing the hereditary posts was first mooted and initiated by the Congress(I).

The state government first issued an ordinance on 6 January 1984, abolishing the posts of village officers. The government bill on the same subject was passed by the Legislative Assembly but the Congress(I)-

Ashok Vahie

Shankar Dayal Sharma

dominated Legislative Council referred the Bill to a select committee. The ordinance was repromulgated four times and the last revalidation lapsed on 6 December, 1984. Some of the part-time village officers whose services had been terminated by the ordinance moved the AP High Court pleading that they be allowed to continue in their posts as the ordinance was no longer in force. The post's part-time village officers were earlier hereditary posts, called patwari and patel in the Telengana region and karnam and munsiff in the coastal districts of the state. The village patwari and karnam were the custodians of the village land records and controlled the revenue accounting. Together with the police, the patels and munsiffs who administered the police functions in the village, the part-time village officers were the leaders of the village. The Telugu Desam government's decision to abolish the post and appoint full-time village assistants in their place has been a welcome move. It was designed to break their age-old hold on the village administration. However, it disrupted the traditional village caste power equations which the Congress(I) party believe was done to strike at their power base in the villages. The Congress(I) have been vocal in their opposition to the abolishing of the village officer system and also the formation of the revenue mandal scheme to replace the panchayat samitis. But the response to NTR's making the subject an election issue has forced the Congress(I) to reconsider its position.

Initially, the state government was given to understand that the Governor was not inclined to revalidate the ordinances as the cabinet was only a caretaker ministry and, therefore, not empowered to take any policy decisions. Mr Ramarao countered that it was only the repromulgation of the existing ordinances which had been revalidated before and as such did not involve any policy decision. As the stalemate dragged on for over a month the chief minister wrote to Dr Sharma that his refusal to repromulgate the ordinances would amount to the executive usurping the powers of the Legislature. For, it would mean that the Village Officers Ordinance would have been repromulgated six times. The practice of promulgating ordinances and repeatedly revalidating them had been criticised by the courts as the provision to issue ordinances was to be used only for special occasions. The Governor has raised a point regarding the constitutional propriety of overusing the provision to issue ordinances which has some validity in the context of certain state governments, particularly Bihar and the central government as well, promulgating ordinances just before the Parliament and legislature session. But, in the present case, the Bill meant to replace the ordinance has been passed by the Lower House. The state Congress(I) leaders have called on the Governor to cooperate with the state government, for they apprehend that the controversy will have its impact on the forthcoming Assembly elections.

Shubha Singh, Hyderabad

KARNATAKA

Congress(I) Wins Over Critic

Firebrand legislator Subbiah to support Congress(I)

Two years ago, even the thought would have been blasphemy. But politics is best spoken in the present tense. When A.K. Subbiah, the firebrand MLC from Karnataka declared in the middle of January that he would support the Congress(I) in the Assembly elections in March, he fully justified the prefix that accompanies his name: maverick.

A.K. Subbiah was arguably the best opposition politician to have graced the Karnataka political scene for many years. His best days were during the Gundu Rao regime between 1980 and 1983, when he exposed major scandals including the ones which forced Gundu Rao's cabinet colleagues, Renuka Rajendran and C.M. Ibrahim to resign. Subbiah had, in fact, terrorised the Gundu Rao cabinet in the Legislative Council and it was natural that he was largely credited with bringing the Gundu Rao government to its knees.

President of the state BJP during the January 1983 Assembly elections, under Subbiah's leadership his party won 18 seats in the state—its highest ever—and lent crucial support to the Janata Party enabling it to come to power. But his woes began soon after when he was hounded out of the BJP, allegedly by pro-RSS elements. Subbiah contends that Ramakrishna Hegde saw in him a threat and had him eased out of the BJP in connivance with the pro-RSS elements.

A.K. Subbiah

Since then, Subbiah performed the most ludicrous political tricks to survive. First, he started a regional party called Kannada Nadu and when it began to falter, he invited the matinee idol, Raj Kumar, to join him. On the eve of the Lok Sabha elections, Subbiah joined Charan Singh's DMKP and was nominated all India general secretary. But the uneasy relationship broke up after the elections.

The importance of Subbiah's support to the Congress(I) is more psychological than numerical. In fact, Subbiah's public following has dwindled due to his political callisthenics—he contested as a DMKP candidate from Bangalore South in the recent Lok Sabha elections and lost his deposit. But his image is largely untainted and his reason for supporting the Congress(I) is that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has begun cleansing public life.

But Subbiah also invited ridicule by glossing over the corrupt regime of Gundu Rao which he himself had exposed thoroughly. Said Subbiah: "The Hegde government is the most corrupt and inefficient government Karnataka has ever had. By any standards Gundu Rao, Veerappa Moily and K.H. Patil are much better." The statement is apparently a product of exasperation. Since his exit from the BJP his political fortunes has steadily gone down. For this, Subbiah blames the Janata Party and Ramakrishna Hegde, who have undermined his importance and stature as a politician. There is also some truth in Subbiah's contention that Hegde has antagonised and crushed the very forces that enabled the Janata Party to come to power—first it was Bangarappa, then the Raitha Sangha and now Subbiah. How much this will cost the Janata Party, the coming Assembly elections will show.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Bangalore

MAHARASHTRA

Fighting for the Farmers

Shetkari Sangathana prepares for Assembly elections

The third convention of the five-year-old Shetkari Sanghatana held in Dhule, 340 kms from Bombay on 21 and 22 January was significant because of the veiled conciliatory postures towards Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi by Sanghatana leader Mr Sharad Joshi. The majority of the rank and file however, wanted "immediate and prolonged struggles" and opposed participation in the elections, and they made this clear at the working session at Dhule.

Sharad Joshi said that Pandit Nehru with his sophistication exploited the farmers by appealing to their sense of patriotism and undertook industrialisation at the cost of agriculture. Mrs Indira Gandhi was even more direct in exploiting the farmers. The capital base, he said, was increased not only in heavy industries but in consumer durables during her regime.

"I am not against industry" he said. The ploughing back of agricultural savings into industry is necessary, but it must not be at the cost of agriculture. The agriculturalists can probably initiate "industrial development that would be more meaningful to the country and in keeping with the needs of the country," said Mr Joshi.

"Rajiv Gandhi now wants an ultra-modern India and this can only increase the tension in the countryside and this discontent could only be controlled by dictatorial or fascist means. Disastrous economic policies spawn disputes like language troubles or the Punjab problem. There will be a reimposition of tighter rule. Every aspiring Hitler," Joshi added, gets a Parliament House which is conveniently burnt down.

However, Joshi said in a talk later that if the young Prime Minister accedes to the simple demand of the farmers then "we will be willing to revise our stand." Joshi said that he wanted to bring out the fact that he had no sympathies with any particular party. He supported the opposition candidates only to try and see that there was some balance between the opposition forces and the ruling party as it would be in the interest of the farmers. The situation is different now because of the sweeping majority that the ruling party got in Parliament.

Joshi agreed with some of the farmers who said that they could not remain totally out of the elections. He also said that the farmers should know that they can never win elections in the present circumstances because the government, the media, TV and radio and the election machinery belong to the ruling party and therefore the path of agitations should be dropped.

Joshi admitted that since the Sanghatana started in 1979, the farmer has not gained much by way of remunerative prices, but in terms of awakening of the farmer to the exploitation by 'India,' the effect has been tremendous. "Agitation is part of the education process. There is only one solution and that is agriculture must become paying," he said. Joshi also admitted that the "farmers cannot remain in the trenches all the time. At some point of time they will have to come out into the battlefield. But that time and place will have to be carefully chosen by the farmers themselves."

Sharad Joshi

The coming elections pose a dilemma to the Sanghatana as it will have to discard their present ambivalent position and take a stand in some way or other. His farmers belong to different political parties and there is pressure from these farmers to tell them what should be done in the elections. "We have innumerable statistical options" said Joshi, without spelling them out. "If we do not support the opposition parties we may resort to measures like preventing ballot boxes from being kept in our villages."

Joshi had invited all political parties to come and address the third convention of the Sanghatana and all the main opposition parties like the Congress (S), the Janata Party, the BJP, the PWP and other organisations like Shiv Sena and Bharatiya Congress came to the meeting.

The Sanghatana which had kept a low profile in the last two years, came into the limelight during the recent Lok Sabha elections when it debarred people like Mr Vasant Sathe and Mrs Usha Chaudhari and others from entering the Sanghatana strongholds and questioned their performances in Parliament. Though not a single opposition candidate supported by the Sanghatana won, it claims that it helped to reduce the margins by which the Congress(I) won, especially in the case of Mr Vasant Sathe, Mr Gulab Nabi Azad and Mr Vairale. This impression was reinforced by the presence of the opposition leaders who, despite their resentment against Joshi were present at Dhule in the hope of getting his support. Whether this was Joshi's ploy to get the opposition leaders to demonstrate to the farmers the clout they (the farmers) wielded, or whether he was seriously interested in supporting them, is difficult to say. The point is that he has put almost impossible conditions to them for the Sanghatana's support. He has said that the opposition should put up one candidate under one symbol, one manifesto and one leader.

Against this demand, and his vaguely perceptible "give Rajiv a chance" line, Mr Joshi is still keeping his options open. He has appealed to the Prime Minister to include the farmers' demand as the 11th point to his ten point programme which even includes cleaning the Ganga. "The farmers too, are hungry," he said.

"Not all farmers are prosperous," Joshi emphasised. "Prosperity is confined to farmers who are on the ruling party's bandwagon, the political farmers or those getting the side effects of political patronage like the legislator, chiefs etc. Otherwise, the bulk of the farmers of India, for all the sweat and toil he puts into the soil, gets back only indebtedness."

Olga Tellis, Bombay

GUJARAT

Another Sweep?

The Congress(I) expects a repeat of the Lok Sabha polls

The announcement on 22 January of the date for the Gujarat Assembly elections on 5 March left the Opposition in disarray. In contrast the ruling Congress(I), which has swept the Lok Sabha elections winning 24 of the 26 seats, appeared to be optimistic, even complacent.

Within hours of the announcement of the poll date, most Congress(I) men expected their party to easily win more than 130 to 135 of the 182 seats in the Gujarat Assembly. But opposition leaders did not want to predict a result at such an early stage and kept harping on the point that the elections to the state Assembly was a vastly different proposition than the national election, implying that the ruling party may not do as well in the more localised state polls as compared to the Lok Sabha elections. Even the ordinary voters are not too optimistic about an opposition victory. Not one of the common people this correspondent talked to, said that the Congress(I) would lose the election.

Even as the poll date was announced, the Congress(I) has been involved in the process of choosing its nominees. After the recent electoral success, hundreds of aspirants have been knocking at the doors of the Gujarat Pradesh Congress(I) for a party ticket. In fact, political analysts believe, anti-party activities by disappointed partymen could hurt the ruling party in the Assembly polls.

The Gujarat Congress(I) continues to be deeply divided into two camps: the followers of the chief minister, Madhavsinh Solanki, and his opponents, led by Jinabhai Darji, one-time mentor of Mr Solanki. The party high command had taken the easy way out in selecting candidates for the 26 Lok Sabha seats by retaining all but three of its sitting MPs. Selecting nominees for the Assembly elections is much more complicated because all the 142 sitting MLAs would be vying with hundreds of others for a ticket.

In the selection of candidates in 1980, for both the Lok Sabha and Assembly elections in that year, the Congress(I) had broadly followed a policy of nominating candidates from among the Kshatriya, Harijan, Adivasi and Muslim (KHAM) communities as far as possible as they form about 70 per cent of the electorate. The strategy was successful with the party bagging 25 Lok Sabha seats and 140 Assembly seats. The strategy had alienated the populous farming community of the Patels, who form about 20 per cent of the voters but their alienation did not cost the Congress(I) much in the Lok Sabha elections.

Almost everybody, including chief minister Solanki, agreed that the Assembly election was altogether different from a Lok Sabha election. How far the alienation of the Patels could cost was one of the imponderables of the coming elections. The Solanki faction has been claiming that since the CM fell out with Mr Darji, he never subscribed to the KHAM theory.

However, it was also true that a majority of the sitting Congress(I) legislators were supporters of Mr Solanki. His support base within the party could be eroded if the dissidents succeeded in getting a sizable number of new faces who did not owe allegiance to the chief minister. At the time of writing, there was no way of knowing how far this could happen because the feud between the Solanki group and the dissidents has been simmering for the past six months.

The dissidents who suffered a setback when most of the sitting MPs were renominated for the Lok Sabha polls are taking solace from the two setbacks for Mr Solanki. Yogendra Makwana, a dissident, was retained in the new Rajiv Gandhi cabinet, the only representative of Gujarat in the central council of ministers. Then on 10 January, C.D. Patel, MP from Surat and a staunch follower of Mr Darji was made a joint secretary of the AICC, again the only such appointment from Gujarat. Nevertheless, the dissidents have to cope with the fact that the Gujarat Congress(I) leadership is heavily staffed by Mr Solanki's followers. Barring the internal feuds in the ruling party, most Congress(I) men are not apprehensive of going to the polls in March.

Madhavsinh Solanki

Mr Solanki, who had in September 1983 sent a detailed note to Indira Gandhi on how to strengthen the Congress(I)'s image among the poor, has already introduced a mid day meal scheme covering some 50 lakh primary school children. He followed this up with yet another sop for the KHAM electorate. The state government has decided to raise to 28 per cent of the government jobs and seats in education at institutions for socially and educationally backward classes. The decision was based on the recommendation of a commission that looked into the question of such reservation since the 1972 Bakshi Commission which first introduced limited reservation for 82 castes and communities judged as backward. These were in addition to the scheduled castes and scheduled tribes. The total reservation of seats now goes up to 49 per cent. The government, however, did not accept a vital recommendation of the Rane Commission, which suggested that with the increase in number of reservations, a new criteria of occupation-cum-income be adopted for determining social and educational backwardness. It said this was not in the terms of reference of the Commission.

Although this was clearly perceived as a vote-catching device, curiously enough there has not been much of a public uproar. "Even the opposition was wary of alienating the KHAM classes," said an opposition worker. On his part, Mr Solanki has gone about his work carefully. He does not want to alienate the non-KHAM classes and the low key announcement that the quota of reservations was being raised was made by Devji Vanvi, minister of state for social welfare. Past experience shows that the Congress(I) has done well in the Assembly polls when it has fared well in the Lok Sabha elections. The 1985 Assembly elections will probably not be very different.

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

THE POLICE

At the Receiving End

All-India session highlights police weaknesses

Rarely has a uniformed force placed its head on the chopping block as did the police recently, in Bombay during the four-day 18-session all-India symposium on police-public relations. The functioning of the police was roundly criticised during the session which the director general of police, Maharashtra, Mr K.P. Medhekar, called a "novel open house" experiment. While guest speaker after speaker criticised the police for what Mr M.G. Khatre, special IG, Maharashtra Police, summed up as "domineering behaviour," regarding the recruitment of policemen on the basis of physical strength and men who are corrupt, offensive and on the side of anti-social elements." The director of the Bureau of Police Research and Development, New Delhi, the controversial Mr P.S Bhinder said "We have discussed our weaknesses, we are aware of them" and added that during his 26 years in the police force the gap between the police and the public is wider than ever before. He said if we can arrest this widening process, the situation would be considered satisfactory.

A very relevant and powerful factor that emerged on the side of the police was that the "police are not their own masters." Mr N.N. Virmani, inspector general of police, Madhya Pradesh said that in 26 years of his career as a policeman he has seen that police-public relations has not made much headway as it ought to have, considering the "various things expected of the police, the sermonising given to the police, projects suggested to the police for taking society in a comprehensive manner." He said "it would be in order, to examine whether the police has an opportunity for self-evolvement, a real opportunity to change its own course of destiny, its actions. Does it really have the opportunity to aspire towards objectives projected by its masters or the society? Is the police its own master? What are we getting all the blame for?" he asked Mr Virmani claimed that in the past 20 years, conferences of inspector generals of police have come up with various recommendations which have not been implemented. He said that there have even been various commissions like the National Police Commission but nothing has been achieved. "This focusses attention on the ability of the police. If the police really has no ability and the real masters lie somewhere else why should we not examine this question. Is it the politicians who do not want the police to change as it will not serve their purpose? Is it other civil services who do not want change because police power and image will be far too different and that it will not serve their purposes. What really lies at the basis of the recommendations not being implemented? Tomorrow if I want funds for training, do I have the funds to do it? If I want more vehicles for police stations to improve mobility in rural areas to change the concept of rural policing altogether can I have them? If I want to formulate programmes vis a vis the press and community to implement social legislation do I have the capacity, means and authority? Where does the blame lie for this? This core issue will have to be examined," he said.

Prof. Panwalkar, head of the department of community development, Tata Institute of Social Sciences, one of the eminent speakers, wondered if anyone had the answers to the questions Mr Virmani raised and added a bit of fuel to the already bruised feelings of the police when she said: "Our own experience in the riot areas of Bhiwandi was that the type of confidence people expressed in the army, was not expressed for the police. We are aware that the police force spared no effort and took the major brunt of the situation. But is it to do with the all-India nature of the army which comes out more forcefully as an apolitical system, and somehow the police are not able to project that image because of the state level image?"

Provoked at the comparison with the army, Mr K.S. Dhillon, director-general of police, Punjab, said: "Far too much emphasis is being placed on things which are internal to the police, but over which the police have no control. To say that the army is able to do certain things and the police not able to do, is really begging the question, because the army is placed in an entirely different position in our society. To elucidate: in 1962 during the Chinese aggression, the army had reached a critical stage but at that time the government of India did realise that interference in the policies and actions of the army was going to convert the army into a people who would not be able to defend the country. The police reached this critical point in 1975, during the Emergency. It was later that a greater awareness dawned on the leaders of society and the country that the police should be kept away from pressure groups and interference because they also play a crucial role. Hence the National Police Commission was set up. But it was soon realised that any change or reform is not going to be to the advantage either to the political parties or the civil service. The sufferings of society at the hands of the police, of injustices, the unfairness which is obvious in the functioning of the police are of no consequence to political parties or to the civil services I dare say, because they use the police for their own purpose." Mr Dhillon said that the seminars on the problems of the police have had little effect because the problem is beyond the capacity of the police. "Who is interested in police reform? Not the politician, not the civil service, not the government. If they were interested there were many occasions and opportunities for police reform. We keep on talking about so-called measures like courtesy week, baby kissing by policemen, police clubs, etc. Unless the police have the esteem of society and of their own government and of the law of the land which accords a very low priority and position to the police they can have little meaning. We know what is wrong but are unable to do anything about it. We have listened to the sociologists, psychologists, intellectuals telling us what is wrong with the police. We know what is wrong with us, but are unable to do anything about, it is not in our hands," Mr Dhillon said.

D. Ramachandran, special IG(CID) speaking at the conference. P.S. Bhinder is on the extreme right

The time for change could not have been thought of at a more opportune time with a young Prime Minister trying to take the country into the twenty-first century. The police, unbelievably are still governed by The Police Act of 1861. As one very young officer at the symposium said: "These seminars are important, but more important and imperative is the social and economic uplift of policemen who are the cutting-edge of the administration, namely, the constables.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

ORISSA

Mismanagement at Jute Mill

Congress(I) interference responsible for labour trouble

The only jute mill in Orissa—Konark Jute Limited—at Dhanmandal in Cuttack district is in dire straits, thanks to the interference in its working by the ruling Congress(I) bosses of the state, purely on political considerations. Set up as a joint enterprise of the state-owned Industrial Development Corporation of Orissa Ltd and the National Cooperative Marketing Federation (NAFED) in 1979, it has already eaten into half its stock of capital. The unit, constructed at a cost of Rs eight crores, has so far suffered a loss of over Rs four crores. With the management playing second fiddle to the politicians, the mill has worse days ahead. In fact, plans to have more jute mills in the state have been shelved because of the dismal performance of Konark Jute.

Labour troubles, a creation of the ruling party politicians, have been the unit's biggest problem. While the public remains unaware of the real cause of the problem, the facts available during the investigations made by this correspondent, reveal the complicity of the chief minister J. B. Patnaik, the local Congress(I) MLA, Sitakanta Mohapatra, and some of their men in aggravating labour relations in their bid to strengthen their hold on the workers for their political ends. The embittered relations between the different workers' groups have resulted in a series of violent incidents, including the murder of a worker, Darshan Mallick, during the last three years.

It was at the chief minister's instance that the Konark Jute Shramik Congress was floated under the presidentship of Sitakanta Mohapatra in 1981. The chief minister's aim was to appease a section of the dissidents of his party, including Mohapatra, who

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF MINISTER, ORISSA

No. 6213 /CM. 21.10.81
Dated, Bhubaneswar, the Oct.'81.

To

Shri Subal Charan Mohanty,
Working President,
Konark Jute Workers' Union.

Sir,

I am desired to request you to please meet the Chief Minister on 1.11.1981 at 11.00 A.M. at his residential office.

You may please bring with you Sri Ranjan Kumar Khuntia, General Secretary, Shri Ramakanta Pati, Executive Body Member, Shri Laxmidhar Behera, Office Secretary and Shri Akshya Kumar Misra, Vice-President of the Union.

Yours faithfully,
[illegible] 21.10.81
Private Secretary to Chief Minister.

A letter showing the chief minister's involvement were with the dissident leader Kahnu Charan Lenka and also to crush the opposition political forces in the area. Then followed efforts to bolster the strength of Mohapatra's union, which, although a minority one at the time of its formation, was accorded recognition and foisted on the majority of the workers. Despite the gross indiscipline and the deterioration in the law and order situation the union has created, the management, at the behest of the politicians, has been protecting it against the interests of the mill.

Following a strike by the rest of the workers, initiated by the HMS-affiliated Dhanmandal Mazdoor Sabha on 8 October 1983, Mohapatra's union forced the factory management to run the mill. The officers in charge of the mill were not willing to run the factory with the help of a few "rowdy" followers of the union but Mohapatra's followers had to be allowed into the factory after "instructions" were received from "Bhubaneswar" Mohapatra wanted to break the strike and browbeat all the workers to join his union and a group of the union's members went on a rampage in the factory after forcing their entry into its premises late in the night of 8 October. They abused and assaulted the officers after their demand for payment of overtime allowances and supply of free food were not agreed to. The general manager (works), S.K. Ghose, the management's seniormost representative at the factory was threatened and was forced to finally concede their demands. However, the police officers present in the factory remained silent spectators.

According to the FIR lodged by S. P. Parija, manager (administration), Konark Jute, at Barchana police station on 9 October, "11 of them (the miscreants) were in a drunken state and armed with deadly weapons like knives and iron rods." The FIR stated that the mob included Bishnu Charan Mohapatra, general secretary of the MLA-led union. S. K. Ghose in a confidential note to the managing director, Konark Jute, on 8 March 1984, had pointed out, "the prime movers of the hostility" also included five of the workers who were repeatedly recommended by the legislator for recruitment in the factory. Mr Sitakanta Mohapatra had, on previous occasions, "insisted and pressurised" the management to absorb some of the "notorious characters" in the mill, Mr Ghose alleged. What was more shocking was the presence of two workers along with the MLA during talks with the management to devise ways to break the rival workers' strike. These two workers, according to another confidential note on 8 February 1984 by S. K. Ghose, "are marked miscreants and were involved in the case (of hooliganism) of 8 October 1983." The mill's top executive has said, "these are the persons on whom the president of the union (Sitakanta Mohapatra) depends for his hold over the workers in the factory."

But Mohapatra and his mentors and supporters have succeeded in their attempts to control the workers and the management through their strong-arm methods, overlooking the effects it might have on the economy of the jute unit. The seven-month-old lockout was used to consolidate the Congress(I)-backed union. The enrolment of workers on political considerations is continuing. The unit, according to insiders, is saddled with over 600 workers more than the optimum level. Though the present strength of the workers is about 2,800, 50 out of the 200 looms of the mill are idle. The unit has a top-heavy administration with over 200 supervisory officials, many of whom are posted at Bhubaneswar. Retired hands from other organisations have also been appointed.

That Mohapatra has been using the labour situation for serving his political ends was clear from a letter of the general manager (works): "He (Mohapatra) had also said (during talks with the management) that he would not make any move for reopening the factory before the election of the panchayat chairman, which may be risky for his party." The pressures from the ruling party leaders on the management regarding recruitment were evident from the general manager's letter to the managing director on 20 August 1983. "I am sending herewith a copy of the total number of persons recommended by S. K. Mohapatra and on the body of the letter (is) written—to be appointed as apprentices and mazdoors—presumably by the industry minister himself without signature."

The management had, perhaps, no other alternative but to support the S. K. Mohapatra's union since it was formed at a meeting of some workers' leaders at the chief minister's residential office on 1 November 1981. The chief minister's interference is even admitted in a printed leaflet circulated in the name of Mohapatra's union which expresses its gratitude to the chief minister "for having forced the management (to submit) by exerting the state's political pressure."

Sarada P. Nanda, Bhubaneswar

General Manager (Works)
P.O. DML.

Managing Director, M.O.,
BBSR.

KJ/GM/CON/366

08.02.1984

We had a meeting with Congress Union. Mr. S.K. Mohapatra, Mr. Braja Samal, one of his Congress worker, one Finishing Deptt. Clerk, one Spinning Merkman, and one Preparing worker joined on behalf of congress union. The Preparing Worker as well as the Spinning Markman are marked miscreant and were also involved on the case of 8.10.1983.

Sri S. K. Mohapatra at the beginning accused us about not ~~taking the issue of~~ moving the labour machinery for declaring the strike as illegal or unjustified. He said that the Labour Commissioner had sent for him and told him the same thing. He also said that the Dhanmandal Mazdoor Sabha Union held a meeting with approximate participants of 60 to 70 workers, whereas in his Congress Office meeting which was not even propagated, he had an assembly of more than 150 workers. Therefore, undoubtedly he claims that he still has the popularity.

In the question of Piece-rate and wages, his people as well as finally he himself opined that this could not be sold out as instant repulsion from the workmen thinking that the present wages at the present productivity level will be reduced at least by Rs.20/- to Rs.30/-. He also demanded that there must be a positive proposal from us with increase of wages. In each and every case, we declined to accede to his demands and said that there is no possibility of the Mill having any viability unless the level of efficiency rises to 65 % and there is no chance of any increase of workers wages. He, however, wanted another round of discussion on 10th inst. between his workmen and our Departmental people to spell out the pros & cons of the Piece-rate system. This will be held on 10.2.84 at 2.30 P.M. where our Works Manager & Personnel Manager alongwith Departmental Staff will meet them.

He had also sounded that before Punchayat - Chairman Election he would not make any move for reopening the factory which may risk the election.

Part of a letter showing S.K. Mohapatra's interference in the company's affairs

THE SUNDARBANS

Where Teeth and Claws Rule

Most of the men in the villages have been killed/by tigers

Rampada Sau lives in Bijoynagar, a village deep inside one of the largest deltaic forest tracts in the world, the Sunderbans, near the mouth of the river Ganga. Though most of this huge area falls under Bangladesh, there are 119 densely forested islands on the Indian side. The Sunderbans also has the largest concentrations of tigers in the world. Officially the number is placed at 264, but unofficial and more conservative estimates put the figure at around 200, which still makes it the biggest tiger sanctuary in the world.

Rampada lives in crass poverty. He hardly gets any work through the year. The Sunderbans, with its excessively saline soil, manages to produce only one annual crop. During the lean season he works as an agricultural labourer. Sometimes the government digs ponds or repairs bunds and he gets works. But the months of March and April, are extremely important to him. That is when the forest blooms and the entire area is invaded by bees and their honey combs. It is at this time that Rampada with hundreds of his brethren goes inside the forest to collect honey.

He had gone last year too. It had been a gruelling day. He and his friends had scanned large tracts without any signs of honey and were returning to their boats to have dinner. Just then, Rampada saw a tiger coming towards them. Before he could even cry out, the tiger was upon him. "I am very strong babu, but what can one do against a demon," he says. His friends, however, hit the tiger and droye it away. Rampada spent six months at the hospital and today lives to tell his tale. But he is more or less maimed. He cannot use his right hand and has four scars on his neck to remind him of that day. But if Rampada lives to tell his tale there are at least 640 of his brethren who do not. Every year they go into the forest as dire need forces them to and each year some of them perish. The same is the case with the fishermen, firewood gatherers and everyone else who goes into the forest.

"The man who goes into the forest," the saying goes "is also the man who gets killed." Between 1969-70 and 1983-84 at least 650 persons have been killed by tigers according to official records and according to conservative estimates, there are another 200 persons who have been killed "unofficially," that is, those who have gone into the forest without the permission of the forest department. Apparently if you do not have a licence and enter the forests, the Tiger Project treats you as if you never existed.

Consequently, something which in ordinary course would have been bizzare, has happened. There are villages just 90 kilometers off Calcutta, where almost all the families have at least one widow. These villages in local parlance are called Vidhaba Pallis or Widow's Villages. Arampur, a village near Gosaba, is one such. Each of the 125 families residing there has a woman, whose husband has been killed by tigers. And it is something very normal. "If you go into the forest you are bound to be killed," says 55-year-old Bishnu Syana, who is still alive. "Death," he says "is only a matter of time."

Even though urban ideas are slowly seeping into the area and the villagers do look at the tiger differently, they staunchly believe that the tiger is a god and an unfriendly god at that. The legend goes that all tigers in the Sunderbans descended from a tiger called Dakshinaroy. The jungle was then ruled by three gods called Shahjangalee, Bonobibi, and Gaji Saheb. Once a boy called Dukhe, who fell into the clutches of his wicked uncle, was about to be used as a human sacrifice to Dakshinaroy when Bonobibi saved him and it was he who popularised Bonobibi as the saviour of those who worshipped her.

Today a ceremony before going into the forest is customary and as much a part of the routine as the trip itself. Even the Tiger Project staff, who carry guns, have some sort of a ceremony before going on long trips. What is most interesting is that Bonobibi is a Muslim god but is also worshipped by Hindus.

For Arati Mondal, whose husband Shibapada was carried away by a tiger a few months back, there is no hope. She is 25 and has two young children. The only way out for her is to do menial jobs at other's homes and get Rs 20 to 25 per month for it. Sometimes, the widow's in-laws or her own family give her a place to live in. Otherwise, the widows have to migrate to the urban areas surrounding Calcutta in search of jobs. Some have taken to prostitution and many have crossed the border into Bangladesh and have embraced Islam to get married again.

The Tiger Project does have a system of compensating these widows. But there is a catch. Anyone going into the 2,586 square kilometer Tiger Project area, for any purpose, has at first to take a permit. All permit holders if killed inside the buffer zone of the project are entitled to a flat Rs 2,000. If they are killed in the core area of the project, which is exclusively for the tigers, no compensation is given.

Says Chinta Pramanick, whose husband was killed near Pirkhali, "We have to go into the core area because there is no other way out. To travel from one area of the buffer zone to another we have to cross the core area. And then how do we know which is the core area and which is not. Have they taken the trouble of informing us." Chinta received Rs 2,000 from the Tiger Project as compensation, for Pirkhali falls under the buffer zone. Her husband was one of those rare people who did start a Janata accident policy but subsequently did not have the money to pay the premium and the policy lapsed.

Widows whose husbands have been killed by tigers

But Subhadra Mondal was not as lucky as Chinta. Her husband, Hazarilal, went into the core area and her application for compensation was rejected. In fact it is difficult for her even to get witnesses to prove that her husband was actually carried away by the tigers. Going into the core area is a crime. And reporting Gopal's death would have meant paying a Rs 1,000 fine and also getting her boat confiscated. But Subhadra says, "I know when Ma Bonobibi wants you nothing matters, but who is the forest department to stop us from fishing in a land that belongs to us. After all we have been living here for ages. Don't we have a right?"

And that sums up the attitude of the villagers. Everywhere in this area is an air of inevitability. The residents of the area are devoid of any romanticism that the World Wildlife Fund attaches to the tiger. While the tiger is a god, it is also their enemy. Why the forest department should attach so much importance to the tiger, is totally incomprehensible to them. They nod when told, that after all, it would not be nice if the tiger was wiped off the face of the earth, but they fail to understand why the tiger should live at their expense. "After all it would also not be nice if all our men got wiped out," they retort.

A villager who was maimed by a tiger

Aniruddha Mookerjee

Aniruddha Mookerjee, Calcutta

ASSAM

Earthshaking Events

Victims' wait for aid may be in vain

Even as a large number of westernised urban Indians were attempting to bring in the New Year with the proverbial bang, in the sleepy town of Silchar and the surrounding areas in the Cachar district of Assam the New Year came not only with a bang but an implosion from which thousands of people in the area have not yet recovered. At 5 am on that cold winter morning the sleeping populace were jolted out of their slumber by a "tectonic earthquake" which lasted for five seconds and left in its wake a trail of destruction, death and despair. Spread over a radius of 12,000 sq km covering the four administrative blocks of Sonai, Chhotabanda, Kaptanpur and Kajidahar villages, the earthquake left 20 people dead, damaged at least 3,000 houses and affected 5,000 rural families.

The earthquake, the most severe since 1897 and one of the worst to hit Assam (measuring six on the Richter Scale) has caused panic not only amongst the estimated 30 individuals injured due to walls caving in and thatching trapping oblivious inmates but also inhabitants of the surrounding villages. Afraid to sleep in their propped-up huts, the villagers are huddled in makeshift thatch and wattle structures out in the cold ploughed fields. The telltale signs are evident everywhere though in some cases there are no survivors left to tell the tale. At Kajidahar in his mudwalled hutment, Manajir Ali was asleep with his two sons and two granddaughters when the wall and roof came tumbling down killing them. Forty-year-old Soyen Banu and her two-year-old son are the only survivors of this once seven-member family—only because she had decided to spend the night with her infant son at her father's home. A few houses away, a young widow was asleep next to her five-year-old son. The mud wall tumbled down killing the child. The mother is still recovering from shock. In Sonai, a small fishing village no one died but the earth cracked open in several places and several mud huts were destroyed. "As the tremors began, the cries of roosting birds woke us up and we rushed out of our dwellings and watched them collapse," says Nandalal Das, a carpenter.

Earthquakes in Cachar

Date	Magnitude
10 January 1869	7.5
30 January 1924	6.0
23 October 1926	5.6
12 December 1957	5.6

(Measurements on the Richter Scale)
Source: Government reports

Others have been physically injured. A few houses away thatching from the roof fell on a worker, Naresh Chandra Das's sleeping wife knocking her out "I didn't even know there was an earthquake. I woke up in Sonai Hospital the next day later hardly able to lift my head," she told this correspondent.

And apart from rendering a large part of the rural populace homeless, the damage to the region is worth over Rs eight crores according to one estimate. Large scale subsidence in various stretches along the bank of the Sonai river which meanders through the region have increased its width and affected its course. The river bank near Sonai police station sank ten metres. Two bridges on the Sonai Kachidharam road caved in while three others have developed wide cracks disrupting all communications in the district. Numerous cracks, some over seven inches deep, have appeared all over the affected area and large chunks of disgorged earth leaving left yawning gaps in the paddy fields. However, what has frightened survivors and confounded experts most is the pungent oily black liquid that is oozing out from these fissures. When this correspondent visited the affected areas, the local populace were wary of going near these pits.

The banks of the river Barak which sank after the tremors

Both the state and union governments and voluntary agencies have quickly rushed aid to the quake-affected people though some confusion seems to have persisted over the nature and quantity of aid to be given. According to Montu Sengupta, an executive officer of the local Red Cross Society and president of the 600-strong Cachar Tea Employees Association, who was in the forefront of the voluntary relief effort in some villages such as Chhotabanda, the only relief provided was that organised by the Red Cross." With the help of the Indian Tea Association, we distributed 400 blankets, some medicines and large quantities of polythene sheets which can be used to cover roofs to a number of quake-affected villagers immediately after the tremors subsided. Once we got a little more organised, we were able to distribute clothing to children and foodstuffs. In fact, we distributed over 900 kg of rice, large quantities of atta and some edible oil to some of the victims," says Sengupta.

The victims themselves are not very impressed with the government efforts. "We were huddled in the cold school room for one night without any blankets or protective covers and the next day we were told to go back to our broken, ruined huts Since then we've been here watching and praying, afraid to leave the vicinity for too long should even the shells of our homes that are somehow standing come tumbling down," said one disillusioned farmer. This sentiment appears to be shared by all.

Yet relief was available but on a selective basis to deserving candidates that local political bigwigs signalled out. Touched by the sorry plight of the tremor victims Mrs Rajendra Kumari Bajpai, the general secretary of AICC(I) sanctioned Rs 15 lakhs on the spot. The state government too has done its bit.

The Assam chief minister Hiteswar Saikia and six cabinet colleagues had rushed to the spot and payments amounting to Rs 10,000 per deceased member of a family were made to the next of kin and promises of home rebuilding grants of up to Rs 1000-2,000 were made. Since then, it has been chaos. The smell of easy money has brought in its wake a deliberate distortion of facts and events. Consequently, a large number of villagers not affected by the quake, with the encouragement of unscrupulous politicians, are believed to be dismantling their dilapidated homes so as to claim the home rebuilding grant. According to one report, over 400 families in Lakhipur and Narsingpur block sought shelter in local schools three days after the quake although no reports of damaged dwellings came from these areas initially. Her hefty compensation package has made Soyen Banu the most sought after widow in the neighbourhood—proposals of marriage are coming in every day.

And yet there are people who have remained naive. "The panchayat pandas advised us to remove the props and let the huts collapse—we would get more money, they said. But where will we go after that happens?" Naresh Das asked this correspondent.

The overall picture is far from clear. Officially the death-count is misleading since the number of victims is increasing every day. "To ensure the magnitude of the damage and identify the genuine victims, the staff of the state land revenue department are currently conducting a house-to-house survey. "Once we have the correct number depending on the availability of government funds, we will commence giving financial aid," said a senior bureaucrat who refused to be identified.

But onerous promises notwithstanding, the amount of the rebuilding grant is likely to be pegged at the Rs 1,000 to Rs 2,000 range, which is hardly enough since at today's prices, the cost of rebuilding a mud-and-bamboo thatched structure is not likely to be less then Rs 5,000. The state government's kitty on this account is not likely to exceed Rs 20 lakhs, which will barely cover a small percentage of the total value of the estimated 18,000 claims registerd so far. Given the bureaucratic procedures and political favouritism, the prospects of the victims are bleak.

The fact that this region has been jolted five times by severe tremors since 1869 should be taken into account. A continuous monitoring of the seismic changes in the district's subterranean regions is overdue. Stirred out of its somnolence, the government is now sending geologists to the area to gauge its seismological behavior. Lengthy reports and erudite academic treaties will surely emerge from this overdue exercise. But for those hapless victims of the fateful New Year's night, the trauma of the tremors is not yet over.

Debjani Sinha, Silchar

THE NORTH-EAST

Predictions of Doom

Experts warn about violent earthquakes in the Eighties

Will a series of high-intensity earthquakes wipe out large parts of the country's North-east region in the near future? The New Year Eve's severe tremor in eastern Cachar has come as a grim reminder of the periodic warnings by geo-scientists that the entire North-east, a siesmologically-vulnerable zone, may fall victim to severe earthquakes in the Eighties.

At least on two occasions, the experts have warned about earthquake disasters in the North-east. At an international workshop on Strong Motion Instrumentation at Honolulu in Hawaii in May 1978, the geophysicists unanimously agreed on the possibility of violent tremors in North-east India in the "next few years." The Regional Research Laboratory (RRL), Jorhat, has officially stated that tremors, similar to those being periodically experienced in California, will strike the region in the Eighties. According to Dr M. M. Saikia, deputy director of RRL, over 200 micro-tremors hit the region every year. Dr Saikia told SUNDAY "The time has come for the people in the North-east to realise that it is neither flood nor ethnic insurgency, but the quakes which are the potential threat for them."

According to the geologists, there are at least three factors which have made the North-eastern region earthquake-prone. First, the rocks in the region are geologically quite young. For instance, rocks in Cachar mostly belong to the 70 million years old Tertiary age. Stresses occur in such young rocks which eventually lead to ruptures along the established lines and surfaces of weakness, which are geologically known as faults. Second, tectonic activity in the earth's crust is common in the North-east, which falls under the siesmologically active Trans-Asiatic earthquake zone. Third, the continuing northwesterly tilt of the Indian plate (the earth's crust is made up of a number of plates) has been creating major subterranean tensions in the region. In fact, the Indian plate is gradually sinking under the Himalayas.

Land subsidence near the river in Cachar after the earthquake

Surprisingly, little has been done regarding the drawing up of a siesmic map of the region pinpointing the vulnerable zones, even though forecasts of doom are common. One reason is the lack of relevant geological data. Dr B. K. Rastogi, an assistant director of the Hyderabad-based National Geo-physical Research Institute (NGRI) told SUNDAY that the Institute would soon increase its number of surveillance stations in the North-east to 14, by setting up six more centres for monitoring the siesmic activity in the region's underground rock folds. He said the NGRI, basing its work on the new data-stream, would soon update its siesmic map of the North East, which only shows two major faults (Dawki and Red river) and four major thrusts (Mismi, Lohit, Naga and Disang).

The Shillong Siesmological Observatory's inability to correctly pinpoint the epicentres of the tremors was revealed during the Cachar earthquake. While the observatory has pinpointed the epicentre in the Surma valley in Bangladesh, the NGRI and the RRL scientists, following a preliminary geologic post-mortem, pinpointed it in eastern Cachar, which bore the brunt of the damages of the tremor.

The absence of any multi-disciplinary approach to the problem of earthquakes in the region has come in the way of proper siesmic monitoring and any possible earthquakes prediction. Dr Saikia is in favour of deploying zoologists in the task of earthquake predictions, along with siesmologists. He said that Prof. Tsunei Rikitake of the Tokyo Institute of Technology recently carried out a statistical analysis of 159 cases of unusual animal activity before 47 earthquakes in Japan. Quoting Rikitake, he said mice disappeared before the Nobi tremor in 1891 and catfish leapt out of the rivers in panic before the Kanto earthquake in 1923. A study of animal behaviour also helped the Chinese to successfully predict an earthquake in Liaoing province in 1975.

The Cachar earthquake is the fifth in a series of big tremor-disasters in the North East region in the past 115 years. However, it would seem insignificant if compared to the 15 August 1950 earthquake in Upper Assam, wich damaged life and property over a 39,000 sq km area. The 1897 earthquake killed over 1000 persons in the Cherrapunji hills alone. The Cachar tremor, which measured 5.6 on the Richter scale, killed a dozen persons in house collapses and damaged over 2,000 mud and thatch dwellings over a 80 sq km area. The underground impact of this tremor was, however, severe. According to Dr Rastogi, it was 30 times heavier than the impact of the atom bomb on Hiroshima during World War II.

Santanu Ghosh, Silchar

CHILD HEALTH

Taking Care

More aid for children

The controversial CARE (Committee for American Relief Everywhere) aid programme which had been the centre of many controversies a few years ago, after complaints of mismanagement and misappropriation of funds, has now been linked to the Integrated Child Development Scheme (ICDS), another aid programme of the United States. This kind of joint venture is the first of its kind in any American aid receiving nation and the move is expected to strengthen the utilisation and monitoring of aid. At the height of the CARE controversy, questions had been raised about permitting voluntary organisations to work within India and handle millions of dollars in aid. Many of the voluntary agencies, it was claimed were funded by the CIA and the Americans had threatened total withdrawal of the CARE programmes and the closure of the food-for-work programme employing over 1.18 million people at that time. Such problems, however, are now over.

"The CARE-ICDS link-up will be developed as a model to show how the future American aid programmes should be structured," Miss Julia Chang Blough, an assistant administrator in the Agency for International Development (AID), claimed in Madras. An extra 15 million dollars have been added to the funds for programmes this year. "The American thinking on the subject of aid had always been to help the recipient nations to stand on their feet and the time has come to review the US-Indian aid relationship," said Miss Blough a naturalised Chinese American. "The aid relationship will slowly give way to that of trade links in course of time" Miss Blough was quick to add that she represents a new and young generation of American aid officials and it was their desire to establish stronger ties with all nations for mutual benefit. "The one billion dollars of aid to sub-Saharan Africa should speak volumes for the US stand on aid commitments," was her spirited reply.

According to a recent UNICEF report on the state of world's children, three million children die every year due to oral dehydration and for want of immune injections, in India.

T. Raman, Madras.

BURMA

Need for Economic Reforms

Insurgency and Ne Win's policies have spelt doom

Burma remains another conspicious example of a potentially affluent Third World country steeped in poverty. Despite the best efforts of the policy makers, the once flourishing economy continues to be sluggish, and the gap between promise and fulfilment is rising. While Burma's Gross National Product (GNP) is now one of the lowest in Asia, the increase in population at an annual rate of 2.3 per cent is also causing major problems. With the intelligentsia representing only a small percentage of the population, the country's political future is also not very encouraging.

According to the 1984 World Bank report, Burma's annual average growth of per capita GNP in the period between 1960 and 1982 was only 1.5 per cent. The per capita income in Burma of 190 dollars (1982 figure) makes it one of the poorest countries in the world. The main reason for the economic decline of this rice-timber-oil rich country are the insurgency operations which have been plaguing Burma for the last three-and-a-half decades. The movements which began after Burma attained independence in January 1948 are led by both communists and ethnic groups.

General Ne Win

Burma, before World War II, was the world's largest exporter of rice which till recently, was the leading foreign exchange earner. Indeed, even now, the fertile mud flats still produce despite the insurgency operations enough rice to feed the 26 million people of Burma and leave a surplus for export. But over the years, rice production has declined steadily and export earnings have been reduced considerably (from 487 million dollars in 1982 to 378 million dollars in 1983) mainly because of convoluted economic thinking, irrational priorities and obsolete methods of farming.

The industrial sector which accounts for only about 11 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product (GDP), has not been able to adequately utilise the abundant natural resources like oil, timber, particularly teak and minerals. Oil production has also slumped; from 9.2 million barrels in 1979-80 to 7.4 million barrels in 1983-84.

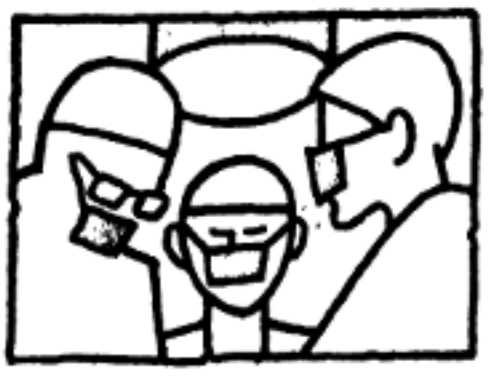
Not only is the economy losing ground, but the strongly regimented political system appears to have exhausted its capacity to innovate new policies and handle crises. Burma had suffered a major political setback just before independence when General Aung San, the father of modern Burma, and most of his cabinet members were assassinated, but for a period parliamentary democracy had flourished. Apart from Israel, it was the only Asian country to experiment with democratic socialism and the band of young democratic socialists who ruled the country in the early 1950s were courageous enough to undertake radical reforms.

But with the increase in aid and assistance to the insurgents by both the USSR and communist China, the country—especially Upper Burma—became almost ungovernable. In 1958, the Burmese Prime Minister U. Nu invited General Ne Win to help him put the country in order. Ne Win, then PM U Nu's second in command, was voted to office by the Burmese Parliament and steadied the country's political situation before the elections in 1960, which U Nu won by a big margin. But Ne Win seized power in 1962, in a bloodless coup and since March 1962, has been firmly in charge. Although the 74-year-old general relinquished his position as President sometime back, he is still the chairman of the ruling Burma Socialist Programme Party, the only political organisation which the regime allows to function.

But all is not lost. Recently, the government decided to revamp the languishing economy by extensive economic reforms. Much, however, will depend on when the ageing Ne Win decides to bring about changes in the stagnating political superstructure of the country.

Bhola Chatterjee, Calcutta

A Watery Problem



Mothers, here is a piece of advice; do not give too much water to your babies. For, if you do, there is a possibility that they may suffer diseases ranging from simple restlessness to convulsions. As Robert E. O'Connor of the Wilmington Medical Centre in Wilmington, Delaware, USA, puts it, if infants are fed with excessive amounts of very diluted formula, they may develop an extremely rare but fatal disease called water intoxication. Here, body cells swell and cellular metabolism is disturbed. Symptoms are restlessness, nausea, vomiting, diarrhoea, weakness. But, Dr O'Connor warns, giving infants too little water when they are ill could lead to dehydration.

Not Just for Coffee

Caffeine, which is present in coffee may be useful in pest control. New research shows that caffeine in plants helps defend them against bugs by giving insects a chemical jolt that kills them. James Nathanson, a neuro-pharmacologist at Massachusetts General Hospital, fed caffeine or a synthetic compound similar to it to tobacco hookworm larvae, and found that the chemicals triggered a deadly build-up of cyclic AMP, a substance that conveys messages through the insect nervous system. When the caffeine-like compounds were used along with commercial pesticides, the effect was ten times as powerful as either of the toxicants used separately.

A Revolutionary Operation

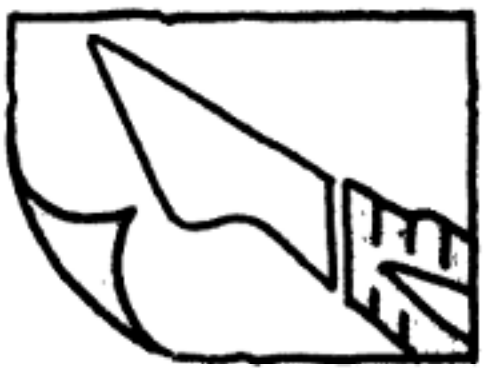
Julie Hunt, an 11-year old girl, could go down in the annals of British medical history, as the first girl to have performed a unique operation: the affected thigh section of her leg was removed and replaced with the lower part of the limb. The operation, which was first pioneered in Austria was performed at Sunderland General Hospital by an Amsterdam surgeon, Dr Jan Van Der Aiken.

Julie's ankle and foot will beused as a knee joint, and a false lower leg and foot attached to allow her complete freedom of movement. During the nine hour operation, Julie's right leg was completely separated from her body after about 90 minutes. The complete calf, ankle and foot section were separated from the diseased part, moved up and connected to her hip to replace her thigh and knee. All that was retained of her original thigh were the nerves, blood supply system and tendons.

Normally, patients like Julie would have had to undergo an amputation. In Julie's case, a very high amputation would have been necessary and an artificial limb would have been almost impossible to fix.

The Power of the Brain

All of us are familiar with the classic experiment of Ivan Pavlov, the Russian physiologist: dogs salivated when a bell rang because they had been trained to so that their brains associated the sound with the presence of food. Now US scientists have evoked a conditioned reflex to show that the brain can exercise direct control over cells of the immune defence system, the body's main bulwark against disease.



One series of experiments has shown that the activity of certain immune defence cells called natural killer cells can be greatly enhanced by the brain's trained response to totally foreign stimulus: a strong odour.

In the experiments, mice were exposed for three hours at a time to the odour of camphor. This had, however, no perceptible effect on the immune system. Some of the mice were also given injections of a synthetic chemical called poly I:C (for polyinosinic-polycytidilic acid) which is known to enhance the activity of natural killer cells. The exposures were repeated nine times in a strategy similar to Pavlov's experiment. In each session, the mice were exposed to the odour and given injections of the chemical. Then, in the tenth session, the mice were exposed only to the odour of camphor. They received no injections at all. Yet, every mouse showed a large increase of natural killer cell activity.

Useful Waste

In China, farm slurry, human waste and leftovers from food processing provide the food source for a flourishing network of fish ponds. In the integrated farms, manures from pigs, ducks, geese, chickens, cows and sheep are fed into the pond to provide plankton. The pond-bottom humus is later employed to fertilise crops grown on adjacent dykes.

Away With the Scalpel

Surgeons can now do away with the scalpel. Researchers at London's Hammersmith hospital have discovered a new surgical technique that can make the scalpel redundant. Prof. David Allison, director of diagnostic radiology at the hospital's medical school, said the technique involved ultra-fine tubes "armed" with a variety of tiny implements and guided along veins and arteries to the kidneys, liver, brain and other parts of the body. He said the tubes can be used to seal arteries after stabbings, road accidents or in the treatment of ulcers. Kidney stones and gallstones can also be removed using the new technique, and blocked arteries in the limbs, kidneys and even the heart can be cleared.

Illustrations Prabir Sen

The way some of the stars from Bombay behaved at the inauguration of the Delhi film festival was shocking. It looked like they had never faced a dignified audience. Some of them said they were almost taken by force to Delhi. Salma Agha, Asha Sachdev, Arti Gupta were noticeable because of their revealing dresses and grotesque hair styles. Even cheap fashion shows have better dressed showgirls.

Smita Patil has bagged one of the most challenging roles by signing for J. Om Prakash's Asisa Kyoon. The script is written by Dr Achala Nagar who had also written Nikaah. Most of Bombay's leading stars vied for the role and when Smita Patil bagged it, the back-biting started. Said one of the stars who is now sulking: "I don't think Smita will be able to do justice to the character. I would have done it better. Omji will realise his mistake when he sees the ultimate results and then regret his decision." The comment reached Smita but she refused to be drawn into another long cold war. "I know who must have said that. It is very obvious," was her reply.

Smita Patil: prize role

After getting a wife, all Kumar Gaurav needs now is a new life as an actor. His latest release Hum Hain Lajawab, a flop, has almost put him out of the race. Today, distributors are not willing to touch Kumar Gaurav films even with a bargepole and many of his films are now gathering dust instead of money. All hopes of salvation now rests on the up and coming director Mahesh Bhatt who is directing two Kumar Gaurav films, Aaj and another to be produced by Gaurav's father Rajendra Kumar. But Gaurav exudes optimism: "I know I have it in me."

Sunil Dutt is finding it difficult to live the dual role of saviour of the masses and of film producers. He is busy giving finishing touches to two films, Yash Chopra's Faasle and Sanjay Khan's Kaala Dhanda Goray Log. People in my constituency are expecting miracles from me. I have to find time for them. I can't give up films. They give me my daily bread," says Dutt.

Sunjay Dutt and Tina Munim ; new life

The new Sunjay Dutt has started concentrating on films. There was a time when he could not live without drugs but his stint in an American clinic has done him a world of good. "Life was just a series of motions of the body. There were times when I did not know whether I was coming or going or whether I was sleeping or awake. Now I feel like a new man." Prakash Mehra has signed Sunjay to play the lead. Does Mehra see a potential number one in Sunjay?

VARIETY

THIS INDIA

Illustration Dropsy's Den

POLUR: Residents of Kelur, a small village ten kilometres from Polur (in North Arcot district) woke to the sounds of chairs being pushed about, books and files falling with a thud and metallic containers being thrown down inside the building of the Indian Overseas Bank's branch on the night of 9 January. Obviously a thief was operating inside! In a trice, almost the whole population of the village surrounded the bank, ready to tackle the intruder when he tried to make good his escape. The police were quick to arrive too. The branch manager, who was residing in a neighbouring village, also duly arrived with the office keys, by two in the morning. With the villagers standing on the alert, the bank building was opened and lo! Out came the 'thief' who had caused the turmoil—a joyously barking dog. It sprang out and bolted before anyone could stop it. Some of the villagers developed stomach pain with the nonstop laughter that ensued—Indian Express (K.C. Fazal Ahmed, Kilvisharam, Tamil Nadu)

NEW DELHI: A cat led the fire brigade to a merry dance in Connaught Place on 10 January. It had been trapped in the second floor of the N Block post office since the previous night. The chowkidars tried their level best to scare away the animal. In desperation they called the fire brigade which, accompanied by a police patrol car, rescued the animal—The Hindustan Times (A.V. Ramamurthy, New Delhi)

BOMBAY: A special arrangement—a zero watt bulb glowing when a censored scene or a word appears on a screen—was made at the request of Mr Justice Kania of the Bombay High Court to enable him to see "cuts" suggested by the censor board. "Please stop that. Let me enjoy the play," the judge told the person operating the switch, Mr Kamlakar Sarang, the producer and director of the controversial play by Mr Vijay Tendulkar, Sakharam Bainder, when it was being staged before him. Mr Justice Kania was hearing a petition on the play—The Times (Waheed Khan Bawadiwale, Hubli)

ANANTAPUR: Officials of the Anantapur district society for self-employment scheme were surprised when none applied for the three-month training programme in tailoring and masonry. The society had called for applications to impart training to 60 harijan men and women. A stipend of Rs 125 a month was offered but even that failed to lure anyone—The Hindu (M.V.S.S. Prasad, Kakinada)

BANGALORE: The city police have played the role of a match-maker for a girl residing in Bharathinagar. The girl was to be married on 6 January, but just before the marriage ceremony, the boy's parents allegedly picked up a quarrel and walked out. On her father's complaint that the bridegroom's family had walked out with some valuables presented to them earlier, the police not only succeeded in getting back the gifts but also found another groom for her—Indian Express (Amarjeet Singh Bhatia, Dehra Dun)

HYDERABAD: A teenager here held his own parents to a Rs 25,000 ransom to satisfy his urge for a luxurious and faster life. The 17-year old Sreenivas Rao, a first year Intermediate student, had even sent a typewritten note to his parents residing in Himayatnagar, specifying the way in which the money should be delivered. While his parents were agitated, the boy proceeded to Hanamkonda in Warangal district to bide the one-week time given to deliver the ransom money, which was "to be kept on a rack in the backyard of the house." Meanwhile, the boy's reluctant father contacted the Narayanguda police who kept a vigil on the house. When the boy returned home to collect the ransom, he was caught red-handed by the policemen while he was searching for the money in the box which, however, contained only waste paper—Indian Express (Avula Ramesh Chander, Hyderabad)

WITHOUT COMMENT

They (the opposition) are not the conscience keepers of the nation. We are the conscience keepers of the nation—Rajiv Gandhi in The Hindustan Times

The opposition is suffering from a generation-gap crisis—Ramakrishna Hegde, Karnataka CM, in Herald Review

The Indian electorate is the most sophisticated in the world—M.V. Kamath in Surya

If I have to choose between politics and poetry, I will opt for the lattet. If poetry is taken away from me, I will commit suicide—Srikant Verma, AICC(I) general secretary, in The Sunday Observer

I have always been a Congresswoman at heart—Vyjayanthimala in Femina

A tidal wave starts with a ripple, it takes time for some storms to gather—Jayalalitha, after she was dropped from her post as the deputy leader of the AIADMK parliamentary group, in Indian Express

Dumpsreak

No minister should be there for more than five years, because people run out of ideas—Swraj Paul, on the dismissal of Pranab Mukherjee, in India Today

I want to listen to advice but suddenly one isn't a child any more. People say that when you're 21, but I think it's when you hit 40—Princess Michael of Kent, on reaching 40, in The Times, London

For me, even now a five paisa coin has as much value as it did say seven years ago—Rati Agnihotri in Savvy

prize Rs 30 for the entry given first

BEGINNING 3 FEBRUARY 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) This is a good week for academicians and businessmen Professionals, especially those employed in government service, will benefit from the gesture of their colleagues. The domestic front will remain inspiring Financially, this is not a good phase avoid speculative and risky ventures This is also not a good time for lovers

Good dates: 3, 5 and 7
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 8
Favourable direction: West

LEO (15 August—14 September) Professionals are likely to get transferred to a better place. If you are planning to change your job, do so only after consultations with elders. Financially, this is a good week some of you may even win a lottery. However, businessmen should be careful while dealing with their customers. Love and marriage are ill signified Watch your health closely

Good dates: 4, 5 and 7
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: South

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 February) This is a week when you will have to be on the alert, since your enemies will be looking for an opportunity to harm or defame you. Professionals and executives, however, are likely to perform well. Good news for those unemployed Jobs are in the offing. A letter from abroad will bring good tidings. Those in love are advised to postpone marriage.

Good dates: 4, 8 and 9
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North-west

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) This is not a good week for lovers postpone marriage plans The professional front is also discouraging some of you may have to quit your jobs. Enemies will be active during this period. do not believe even your close friends However, some of you will gain money through inheritance. A pleasure trip towards the end of the week will prove financially profitable

Good dates: 4, 6 and 8
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: South

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) This is not a good week for those in service be wary of a colleague who will be working to embarrass you. At home your children will be demanding. Financially this is not a good period. you may have to borrow money to tide over this lean phase. Your health will also add to your financial burden. The time is also not favourable for love and marriage negotiations.

Good dates: 5, 6 and 8
Lucky numbers: 5, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: South-west

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) This is a favourable week for most of you. Officers and company executives, you may come in for a lot of criticism from your superiors. But do not lose heart Businessmen, avoid speculation The atmosphere at home will remain peaceful Keep an eye on your health and diet. Lovers, this is not the opportune time for marriage Avoid pleasure trips this week

Good dates: 3, 5 and 6
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 4
Favourable direction: North

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This is an extremely lucky week for businessmen push your efforts to the utmost and do not waste time on socialising Friends and relatives will prove very helpful The time is equally favourable for those connected with the fine arts. On the economic front, some of you may gain money . Lovers should avoid adventurous plans

Good dates: 5, 7 and 9
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 3
Favourable direction: North-east

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) This is a favourable week for students most of you will be successful in your examinations. This week will entail a good deal of expenditure but curb extravagance. For those in business, you can go ahead with your plans. Take care of your health. Problems may come from unexpected quarters, but do not be disheartened.

Good dates: 6, 7 and 9
Lucky numbers: 2, 7 and 9
Favourable direction: East

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) This will be a very good week for you. Speculators and gamblers will benefit from this lucky phase. Money may come from an unexpected source, but avoid extravagance. Problems in the house, financial or otherwise, will be solved Do not hesitate to seek favours from influential persons A lucky phase for those in love and intending to get married.

Good dates: 5, 7 and 8
Lucky numbers: 1, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (15 July—14 August) A word of caution for those in love and intending to get married do not take impulsive decisions. Professionals are warned to be careful while dealing with their superiors. Your health will add to your worries this week However, the period is good for businessmen do not hesitate to take risks The domestic front will remain peaceful Avoid pleasure trips this week

Good dates: 3, 4 and 6
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) This is a week of all-round progress. Sportsmen in particular will make much headway. Businessmen will be successful in their ventures, but guard against deceit. Youngsters should listen to elders. Lovers, you can go ahead with matrimonial plans. Letters will bring good tidings. Poets and novelists will also be successful during this lucky phase.

Good dates: 3, 6 and 8
Lucky numbers: 1, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: South-east

PISCES (15 March—14 April) The week begins on a bright note for you. Businessmen will continue to be successful in their ventures. Some of you might even win a lottery or gain through inheritance Those in service will continue to be in the good books of their seniors You will tide over your problems in the family. A pleasure trip is in the offing. Keep a sharp eye on your health.

Good dates: 4, 7 and 9
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: West

For those born on the 5th, 6th and 7th of any month:

Most of you are very practical in all your dealings. You also possess an adventurous spirit The wonders of the unknown fascinates you You are also gregarious by nature you love to be surrounded by friends and relatives. Financially, you are extravagant but you live within your means. Most of you enjoy good health. Women born during this period are extremely fair and they make good housewives.

VARIE

CHESS

Chess openings are very fashionable and fashion starts at the top. The major theme of the past two world championship cycles has been the re-emergence of the TMB (Tartakower-Makagonov-Bondarevsky to give it its full name) defence to the Queen's Gambit as the brick wall upon which players of 1 P–Q4 are invited to bang their heads.

The risk of brain damage led to the search for alternative methods for White, of which the Queen's Gambit with B–KB4 (instead of B–N5) found most favour and thus prompted most examination.

White: A. Miles. Black: A. Belyavsky. Queen's Gambit. Wijk aan Zee 1984.

1 P–QB4	P–K3	2 N–QB3	P–Q4
3 P–Q4	N–KB3	4 N–B3	B–K2
5 B–B4	0–0	6 P–K3	P–B4
7 PxBP	BxP	8 Q–B2	N–B3
9 P–QR3	Q–R4	10 R–Q1	B–K2

11 R–Q2!?

This alternative to 11 N–Q2 had been secretly put under the microscope many moons ago, but never wheeled into the

Belyavsky (Black) to move

Miles (White)

field of battle. Tony discov

11 . . . N–K5! 12 Nx

BRIDGE

The deal below looks interesting but not specially remarkable. Yet there were strange events at three tables in the semi-final of a national tournament.

Dealer West Love all

	♠ J 10 9 ♥ A 4 3 ♦ K Q 7 ♣ K 10 8 5
♠ A 8 7 6 5 4 2 ♥ 6 ♦ 8 4 2 ♣ 8 2	N W E S	♠ K Q 3 ♥ J 10 9 8 2 ♦ J 8 ♣ A 7 3
	♠ — ♥ K Q 7 5 ♦ A 10 9 5 3 ♣ Q J 9 4

The first table was the quiet one. After a transfer response to 4NT North became the declarer in Five Diamonds. Playing it carefully, he was satisfied to make eleven tricks.

At the second table of bidding went:

South	West	No
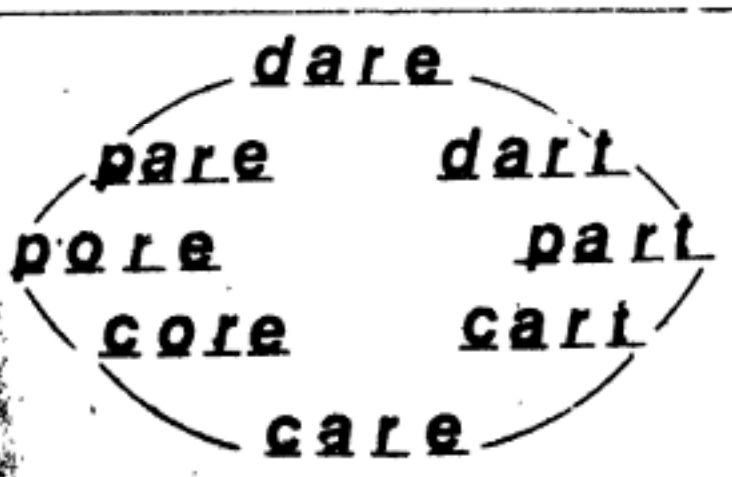
—	3♠	N
4NT	No	5
6♦	No	N

South ruffed the ace of s two rounds of trumps wit queen.

ORNELL." Can you find what other words are

c) therefore his wife ya. That leaves Gov- nd Bina as the last e. To summarise, the es are: Rajiv and ri, Aditya and Priya Govinda and Bina.

net, Scarlet, Coral



Answer: Colours

Sleuth: Number 3

Blockbuster:

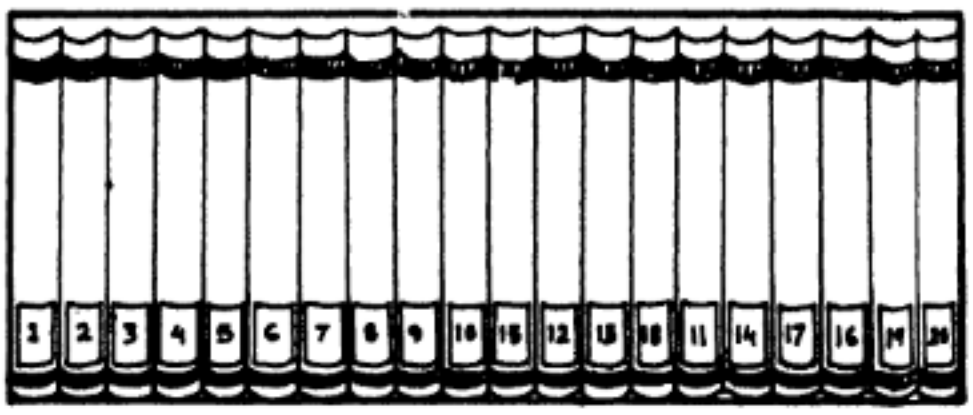
Power:

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. What do the following have in common: helium, radon, argon, krypton and xenon?
2. Cricket bats are traditionally made from the wood of which tree?
3. The secretion of Coccus Lacca is an industrially useful product. What is it?
4. What is a sextant?
5. Who is at present the head of the Church of England?
6. In the Mahabharata, whom did Lord Krishna forgive a hundred times before killing him?
7. Sabena is the national airline of which country?
8. How is the laughing jackass better known as?
9. What is Abstract Expr
10. The well-known scie 2001: A Space Odysse Kubrick was based on a Arthur C. Clarke. Name th
11. What is the study timepieces?
12. What is the "official" la Gypsies?
13. How is Lord Greystoke figure in comics and pop better known as?
14. Lee Harvey Oswald President John F. Kenne Oswald?

ibles:



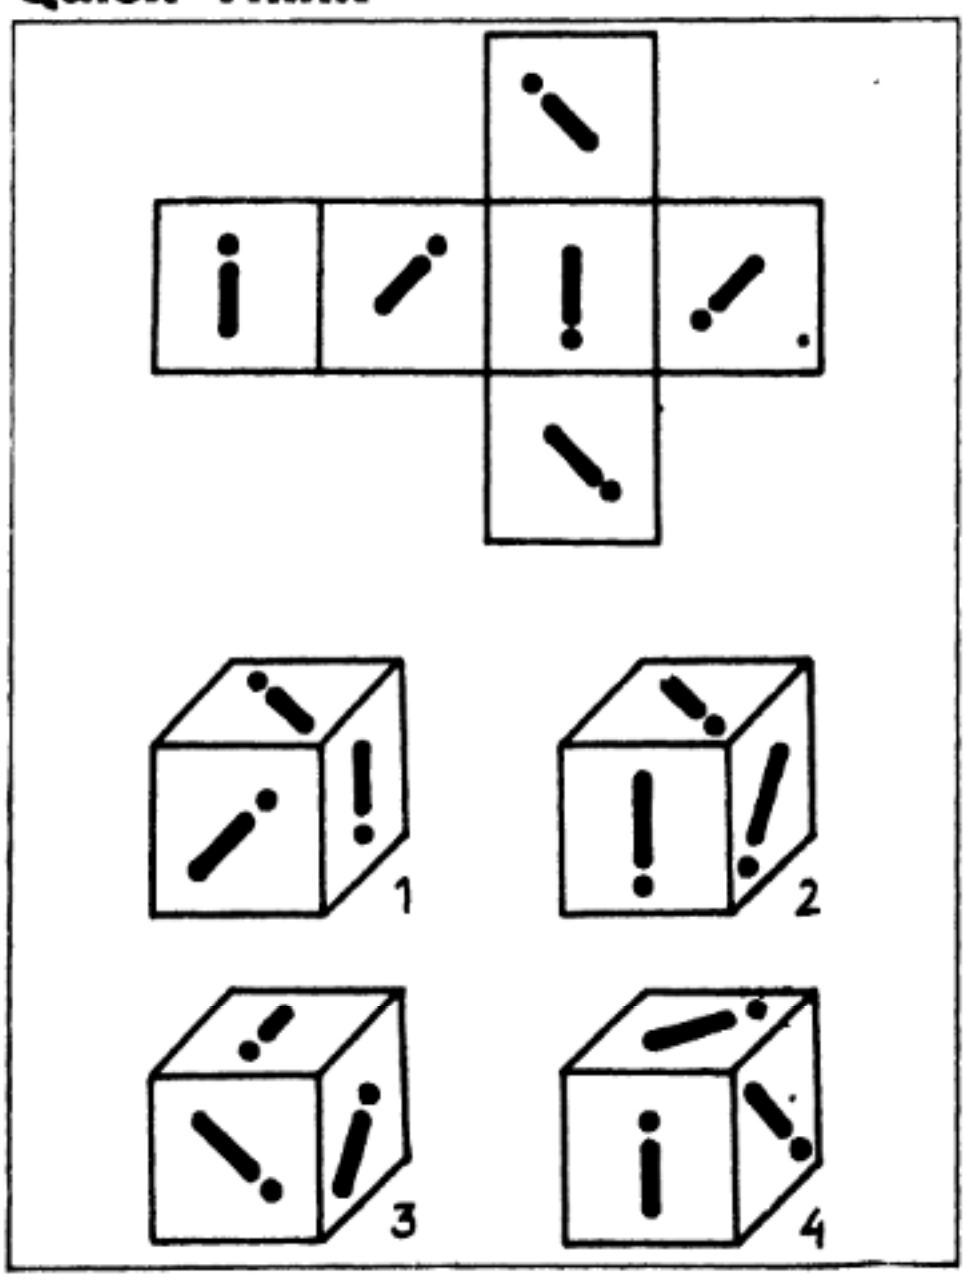
, Silver, Green, Bur-

Power:

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Mind Bender



In a library, the readers have not put the volumes of the Encyclopedia in order If two books are interchanged each time, what is the minimum number of moves required to put this set of encyclopedias in order?
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 15 12 13 18 11 14 17 16 19 20

Wit Sharpener

Study the price list below, and complete the prices of the last two items:

Wonton	Rs 2.00
Christmas tree	Rs 3.00
Fur coat	Rs 4.00
Mixers	Rs 6.00
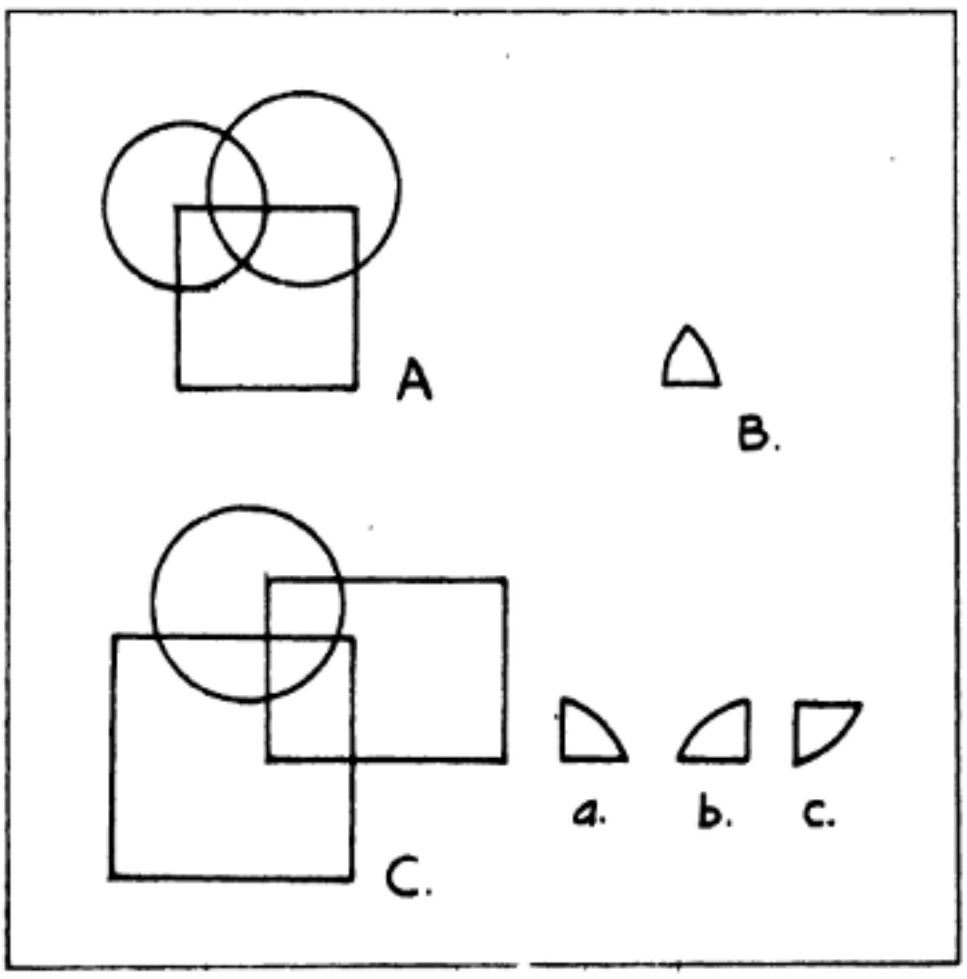
Fishing net	—
Vanilla essence	—

Quick Think



When the 'net' shown here is folded into a cube, which of the four numbered dice will it look like?

What's in a Word?

Insert six Greek letters in the blanks below to form six common English words:

1. Taurus
2. — ––lately
3. Ca———cum
4. ———ef
5. — ––mbus
6. D———in
7. S––nal
8. A––al

Figure it Out

In this analogy, Fig A is to Fig B, as Fig C is to a), b) or c).

Missing Link

Insert the same three-letter word in both sets of blanks below to make two sets of two new words each.
Example: PL———LER GR———IQUE
Insert ANT, and the words formed are: PLANT, ANTLER and GRANT, ANTIQUE.

i) GAT———MIT ii) F———UAL iii) PR———NESS
MAS———ON TR———OR C———ROUS

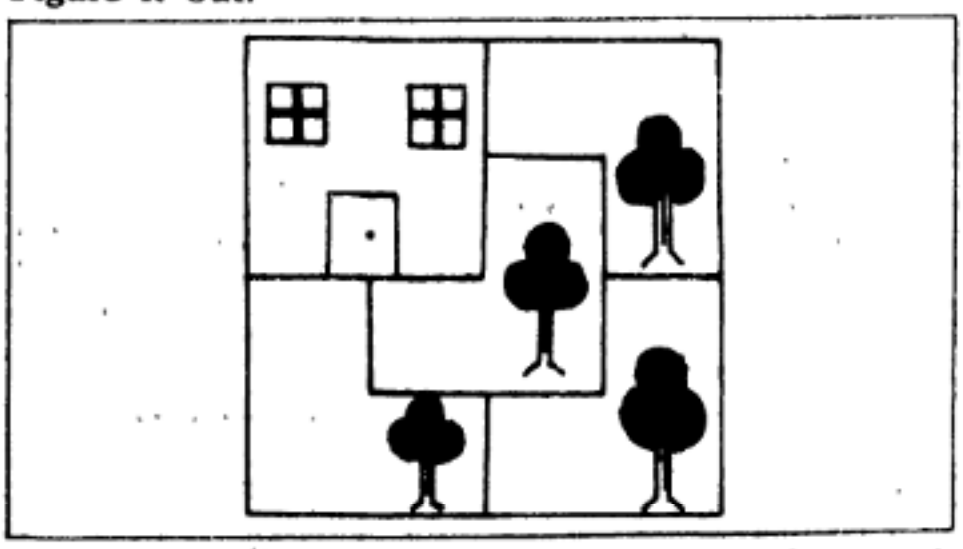
Word Power

The answer to each clue is a common two-word phrase or a compound word that has two rhyming halves, like "SOOPER—DOOPER." The initial letters of the two halves are provided:

1. Sleight of hand	H— P—
2. A mixture	H— P—
3. Masses	H— P—
4. Trickery or mischief	H— P—



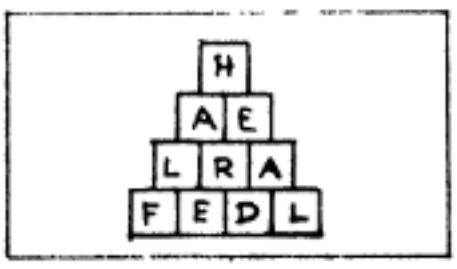
Shape Sleuth

Each figure above tells a story. The first one, Corn and L say "CORNELL." Can you find what other words are represented by the illustrations?

Solutions to last week's Teasers:

Figure it Out:

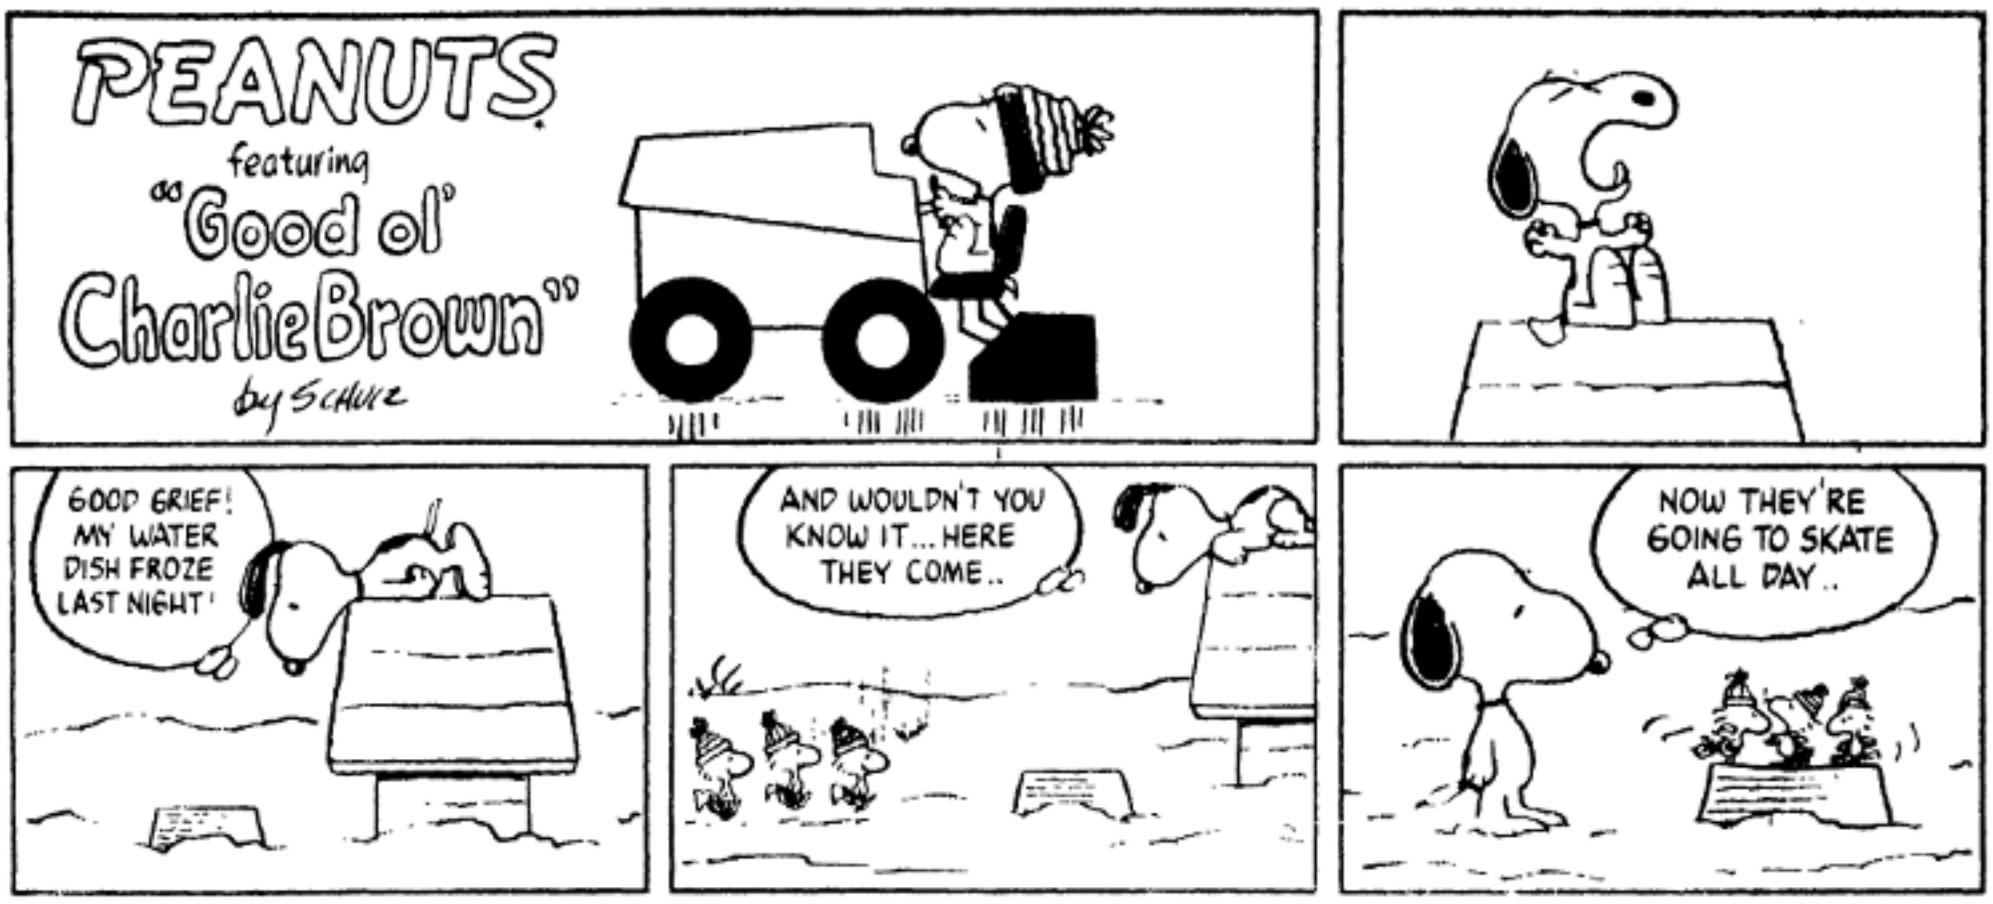
Personality Plus: Marco Polo



What's in a Word:
Startle, Peasant, Bungle, Screamed, Triceps.

Witsharpener:
Since Rajiv lives next door to Priya (clue a) they are not married to each other. Also since he lives next door to Priya and her husband, he cannot be Bina's husband (clue b). Therefore Rajiv must be married to Gayatri. Aditya is not married to Bina (clue c) therefore his wife is Priya. That leaves Govind and Bina as the last couple. To summarise, the couples are: Rajiv and Gayatri, Aditya and Priya and Govinda and Bina.

Shape Sleuth: Number 3



Scrambles:
Ochre, Silver, Green, Burnet, Scarlet, Coral
Answer. Colours

Blockbuster:

Word Power:

Dabur Chyawanprash

The 3000 year old recipe of the rishis—recreated!

Our rishis of old knew many secrets about nature and how it could benefit the human body. One of these was a special formulation called Chyawanprash.

About 3000 years later, Dabur recreated this formulation in Dabur Chyawanprash.

Made from more than 40 natural ingredients like fresh amla, dashmool and ashtwarg, Dabur Chyawanprash builds up your family's resistance to many diseases and keeps them in good health.

Dabur

CHYAWANPRASH

Your family's natural health tonic

OBM/9487/R

COMICS

Asterix

THE GLADIATOR BY GOSCINNY AND UDERZO

DELHI DIARY

Superstar

Sunil Dutt Durgaprasad

Vyjayanthimala Gopal Shetty

Of the three filmstars elected to the eighth Lok Sabha, who will be the superstar? On the opening day, 15 January, Amitabh Bachchan stole the show.

Dressed in a black high-neck suit, he sat in the first block of the treasury benches, behind the cabinet ministers. He was flanked by the minister of state, Madhavrao Scindia, and Balram Jakhar on the sixth row. The first block is occupied by important ruling party members. (There are six blocks of seats in the Lok Sabha, of these more than four are now occupied by the treasury members.) Sunil Dutt, wearing a light coloured western-style suit, occupied a seat on the seventh row of the third block.

Murli Deora, Bombay Congress(I) chief, sat next to him. Vyjayanthimala Bali was on the tenth row of the fourth block. She wore a saffron-coloured shawl, which made her look somewhat like the Telugu Desam members, who had donned yellow outfits.

Efficient Bureau

The Press Information Bureau (PIB) under U.C. Tiwari has put commercial newsagencies to shame. The PIB had set up a computer analysis system for the Lok Sabha elections and within three days of the results of all 508 seats coming in, produced a neatly printed 57-page document called, Lok Sabha elections 1984: a computerised analysis. The professional agencies charged Rs 77,000 for the service which PIB offered free. During the counting, the PIB issued daily analyses and backgrounders.

Their record put All India Radio and Doordarshan to shame. Now it has been decided that during the forthcoming Assembly polls, the PIB will be relied upon by AIR and Doordarshan. In the past the PIB used to take six months to compile similar data. The highlight of the booklet is an analysis on "shift of parties under regional bias," both in terms of seats and ballots. U.C. Tiwari's PIB certainly reflects the performance of the new wave government.

The Odd Man

Most Telugu Desam Party (TDP) Lok Sabha members chose to take their oath in their mother-tongue. This made the swearing-in of the largest opposition group see empty visitors' galleries since only a few understood Telugu. A young TDP leader, Ananda Gajapati Raju, however, chose to be sworn in in English. Perhaps, due to this, there was not much of cheering from his partymen when he finished reading the oath. He was a successful minister in the N.T. Ramarao team before becoming an MP. His father, P.V.G. Raju, was in the Lok Sabha for many years. Among other distinguished sons of former MPs who took the oath in the eighth Lok Sabha were Vijay Mishra (son of the late L.N. Mishra), P.Rangarajan Kumaramangalam (S. Mohan Kumaramangalam's son), Hari Kishore Shastri (Lal Bahadur Shastri's son), and, of course, Rajiv Gandhi (son of Feroze and Indira Gandhi).

Changed Times

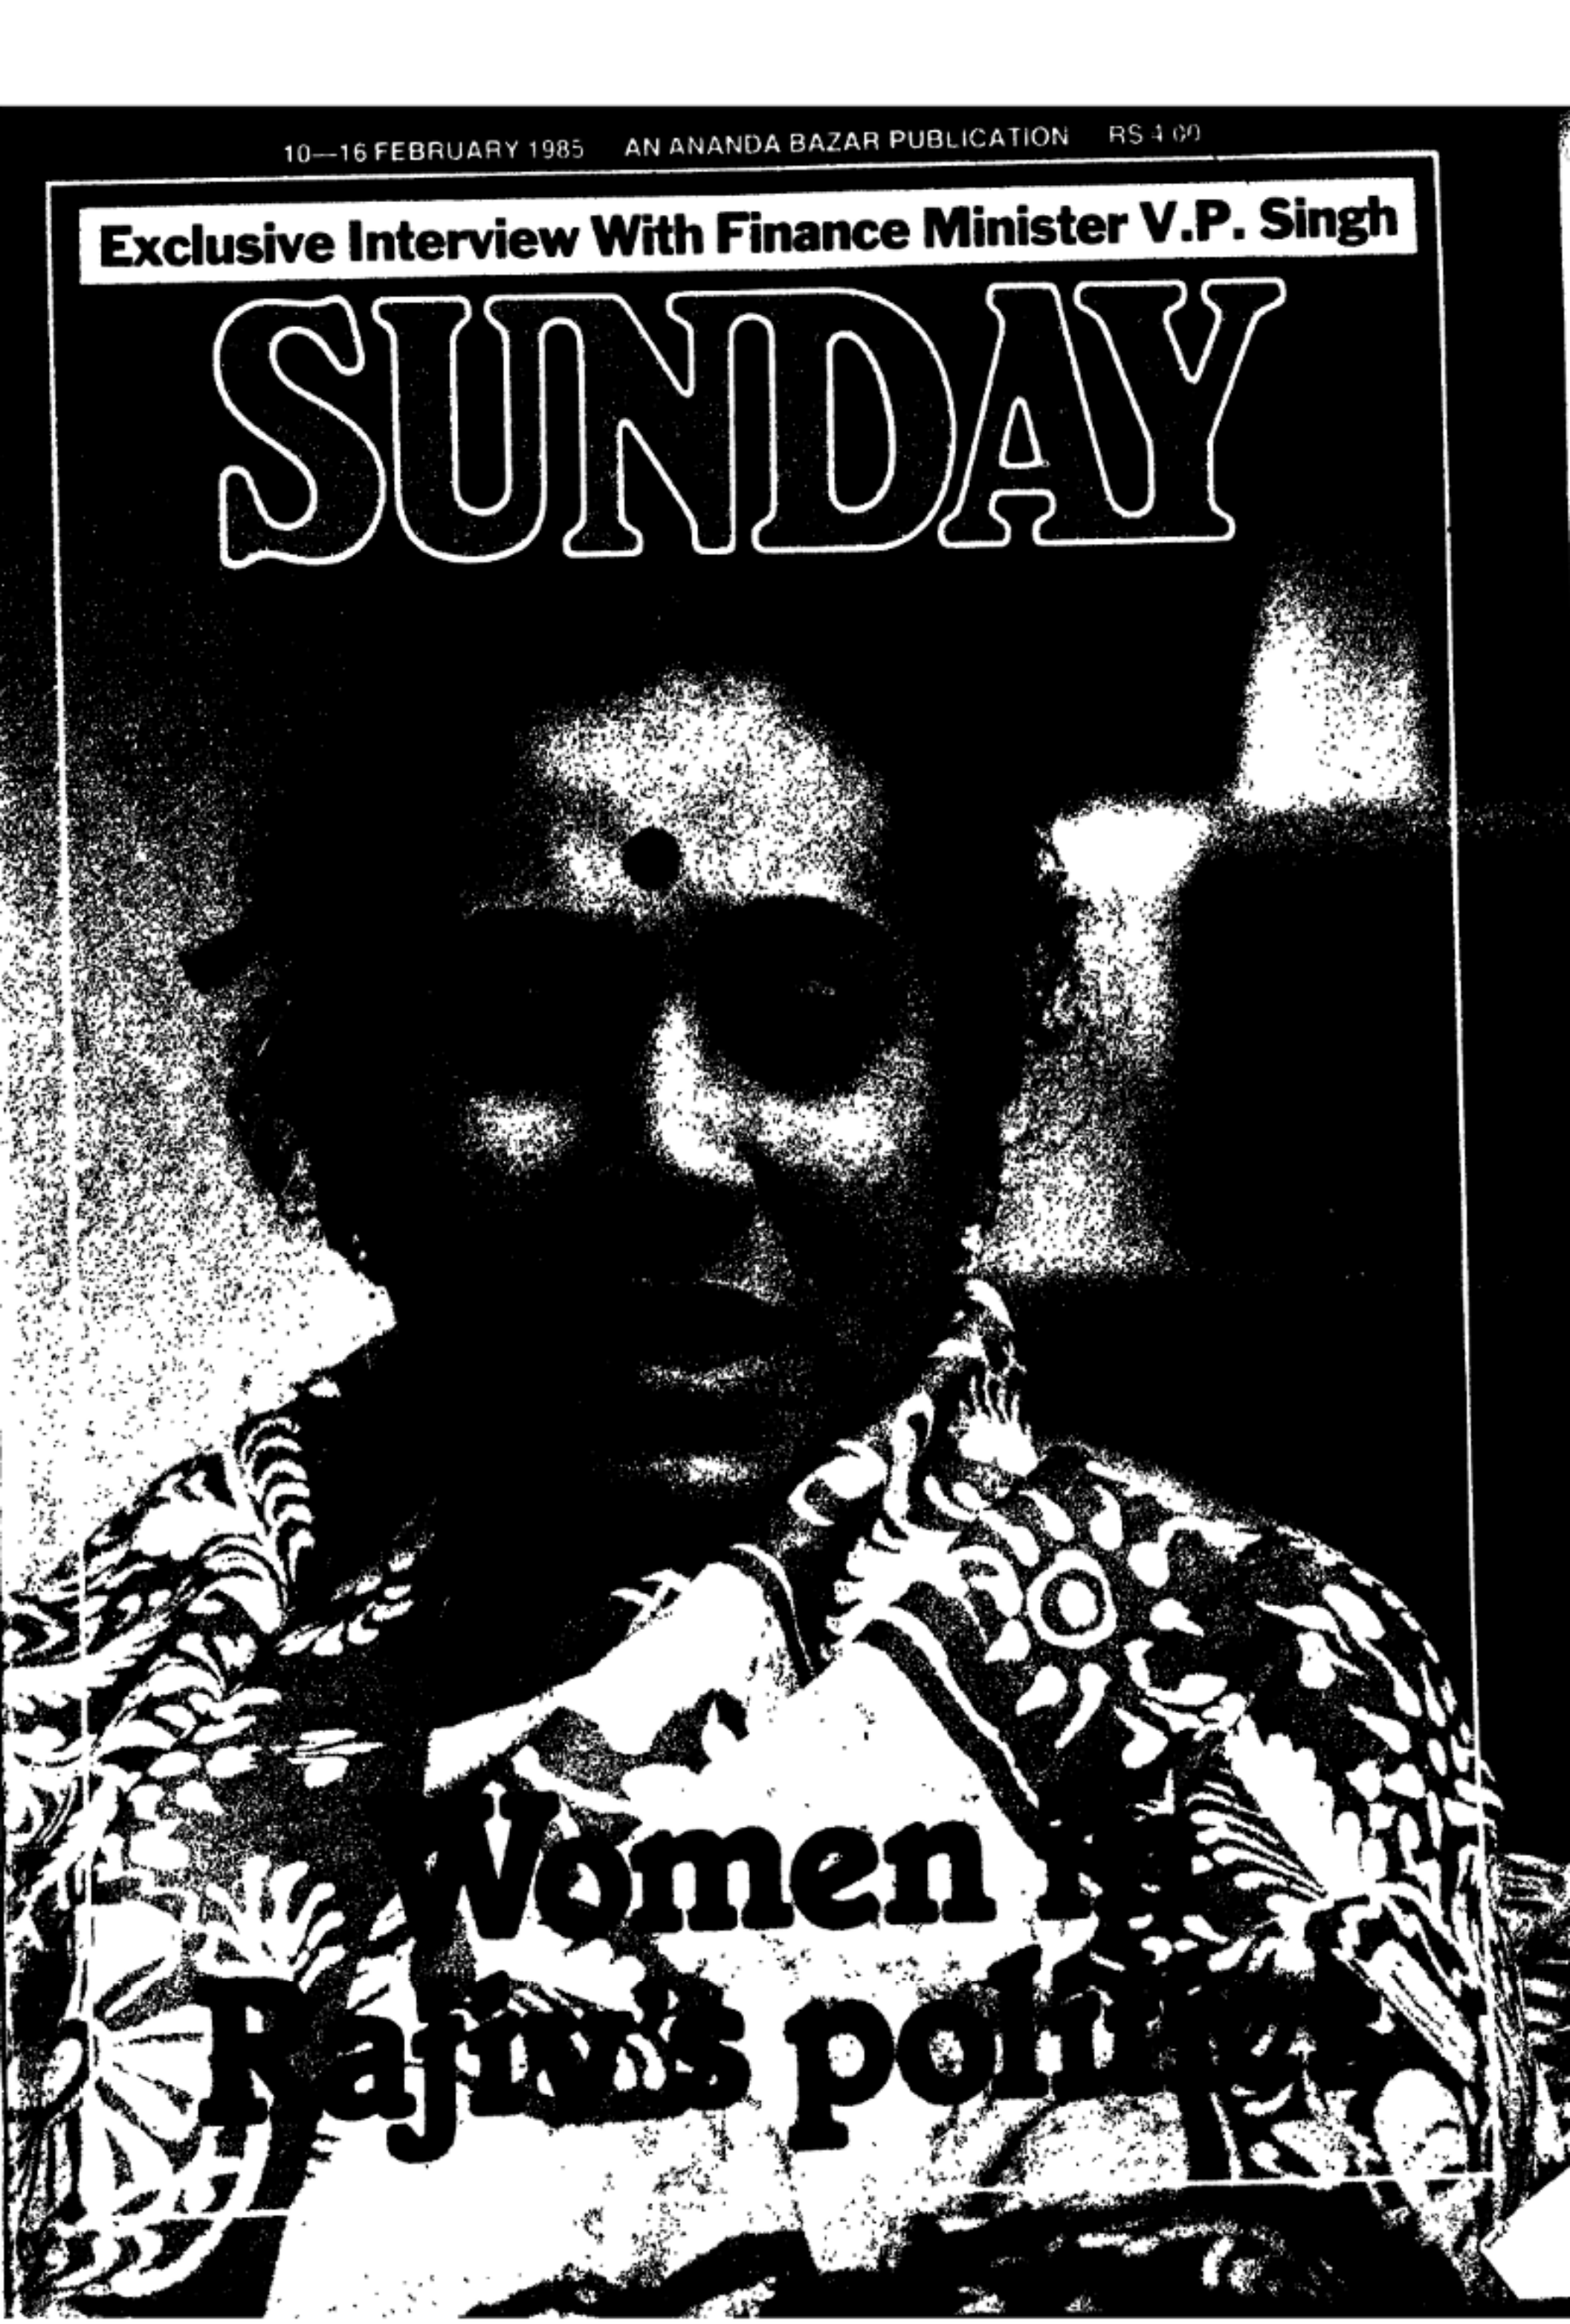
Some new members reached Parliament House on 15 January without the basic document—the returning officer's certificate—which entitles them to enter the hallowed portals of Parliament and the right to be sworn in. Union ministers Chandulal Chandrakar and Arif Mohammad Khan were among them. Priya Ranjan Das Munshi realised his mistake after entering the House. But no one had stopped him from entering the House in 1985, as was the case in 1971. A 25-year-old, the youngest-ever member then, Das Munshi had been stopped at the gates in 1971 despite the returning officer's letter being in his hand. The watch and ward staff could not believe that he was an MP. Young faces are, as a rule, not exceptions now. In the eighth Lok Sabha, there are around 50 members who were in the Youth Congress when Das Munshi was the all-India president, between 1972 and 1975.

Arif Mohammad Khan

Priya Ranjan Das Munshi

Training Strains

The move to streamline the education policy has been welcomed. According to a story in the capital's grapevine, there were two brothers: one was trained for politics, the other for flying aircraft. Their respective trainings did not help them. The one trained for politics attempted to fly and failed. The pilot reluctantly landed in politics and succeeded. Did education matter after all?



TAILPIECE: What is next best to being the country's finance minister? Doing a round of the temples, it appears. At least that is what discarded finance minister Pranab Mukherjee plans to do.

D.E. Nizamuddin

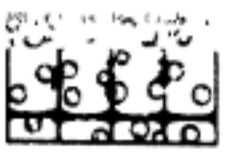
10—16 FEBRUARY 1985 AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION RS 4.00

Exclusive Interview With Finance Minister V.P. Singh

SUNDAY

Women in Rajiv's politics

Stop bad breath. Fight tooth decay.



Give them the Colgate Ring of Confidence!

Regular brushing with Colgate gives your family clean, fresh breath, strong healthy teeth. That's the Colgate Ring of Confidence.

This is how Colgate's trusted formula works for you every time you brush:

Bacteria grow in food particles trapped between teeth, causing bad breath and tooth decay.

Colgate's unique active foam reaches deep to remove odour-causing food particles and decay-causing bacteria.

Regular brushing with Colgate gives you clean, fresh breath and strong, healthy teeth

Make sure your family brushes with Colgate after every meal
Stop bad breath, fight tooth decay
Give them the Colgate Ring of Confidence

GK&E B64 55

You'll love its fresh minty taste!

Why veil your colours when you can be temptingly different

Colours are meant to show whether they are walls or furniture or sanitaryware. You don't buy furniture that fades into your walls. So why do it in your bathroom ?

By blending the colour of your sanitaryware with the colour of your bathroom walls ... you are losing out on their beauty.

Now you have the option of using sanitaryware that contrasts beautifully with your walls. Cera—sanitaryware that comes in 30 marvellous shades, to give your bathroom endless mindblowing combinations.

CERA
VITREOUS

Madhusudan Ceramics

'Ankur Building'
Near Dinbai Tower
Mirzapur Road
Ahmedabad 380 001

Props Madhusudan Vegetable Products Company Ltd

Cera-sanitaryware to colour your fancies.

CERA

Shilpi 2 CERA 29/84

Corners bathed in liquid pearls

Only DULUX Velvet Touch can help you create rich, luxurious atmospheres. Because no other wall finish offers you the sheen of pearls and the smooth feel of velvet. Even corners become an area of beauty.

DULUX Velvet Touch is a premium wall finish available in 29 shades including four Natural Whites. Apple White, Rose White, Heather White and Lily White.

Such an exclusive range is a beautiful persuasion to create different moods for your home. So that you can come home to luxury every time.

Dulux
Velvet Touch

The feel of velvet, a glow of pearls

CLARION C-ACCIVT-3

Come home to luxury with Dulux Velvet Touch

10—16 FEBRUARY 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 □ ISSUE 14 □ RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

Women in Rajiv's Politics

After acknowledging the support the Congress(I) received from women during the Lok Sabha elections, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi announced a number of welfare schemes for them, besides setting up a separate ministry for women. Will women play a more important role in Indian politics under Rajiv Gandhi's prime ministership? Madhu Jain takes a look at the women in Rajiv Gandhi's politics.

ESSAY 44

Envy, Jealousy and Hate

Envy, jealousy and malice are all basic human chracteristics which transform into hate. Khushwant Singh in his essay analyses these psychological traits with the help of anecdotes and quotes from great thinkers.

Page 14

Page 30

CONVERSATION 30

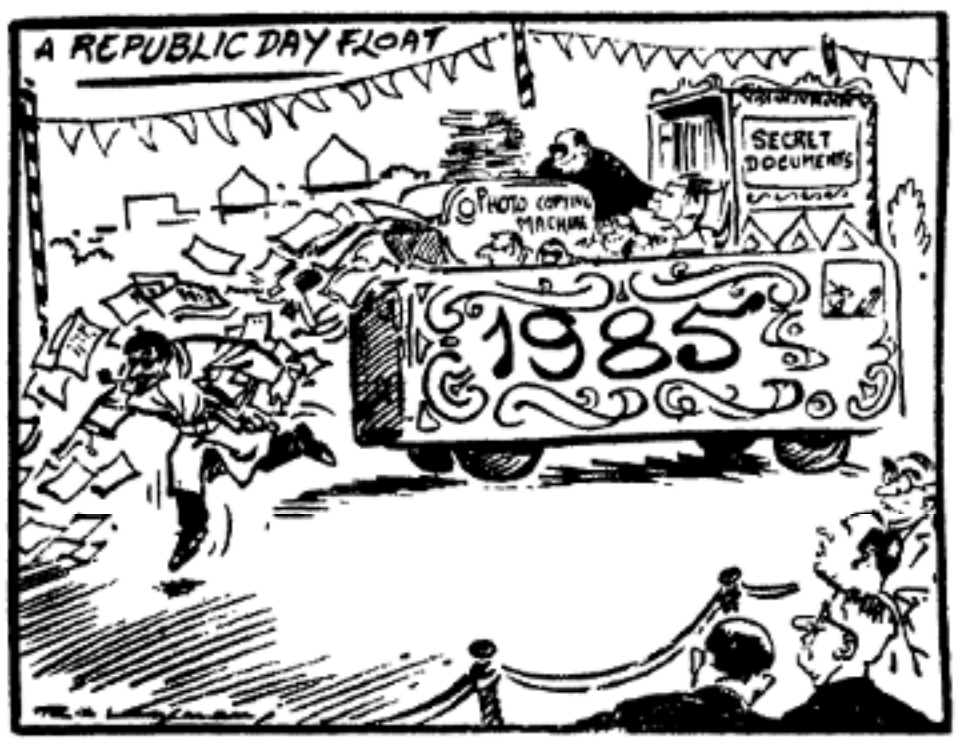
Interview With V. P. Singh

In his first-ever interview as union finance minister, Vishwanath Pratap Singh discusses with M. J. Akbar the economy of the country and the problems facing him.

COMMENT

Dateline M. J. Akbar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 9
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12



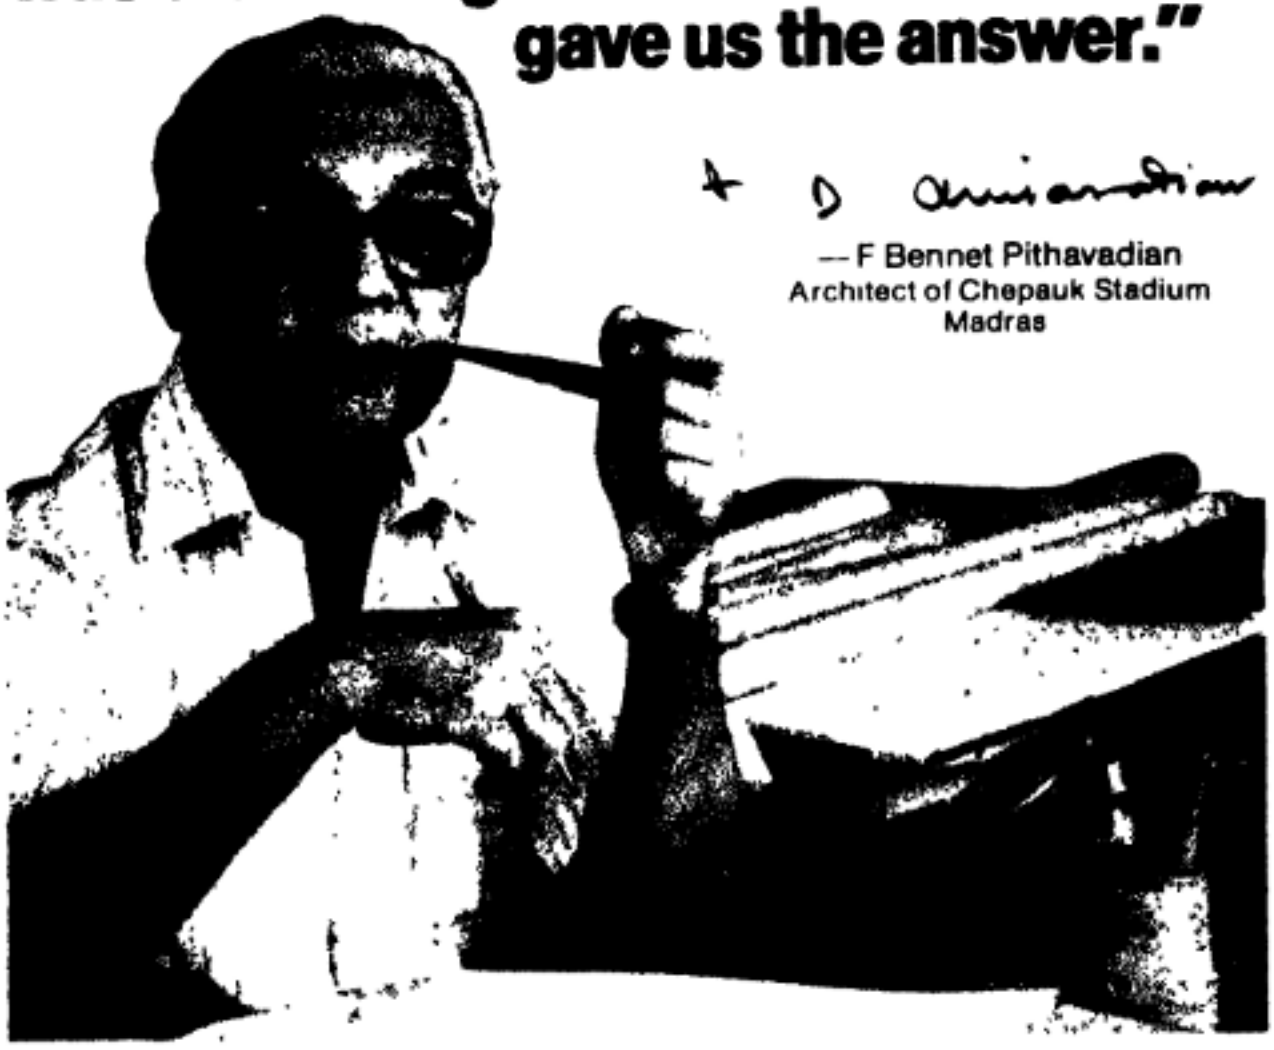
VARIETY

Science 65
This India 67
Sundayweek 68
Chess/Bridge/Quiz 69
Teasers 70
Peanuts 72
Khaas Baat 73

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Delhi Diary 74

PUNCHLINE/R.K. LAXMAN



Editor M.J. Akbar

Associate Editor Tooshar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K. John Henry Jacob
Rajiv Bagchi Sanjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi:
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi.
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow:
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay:
Olga Tellis
Bangalore.
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad:
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati:
Seema Guha
Srinagar:
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

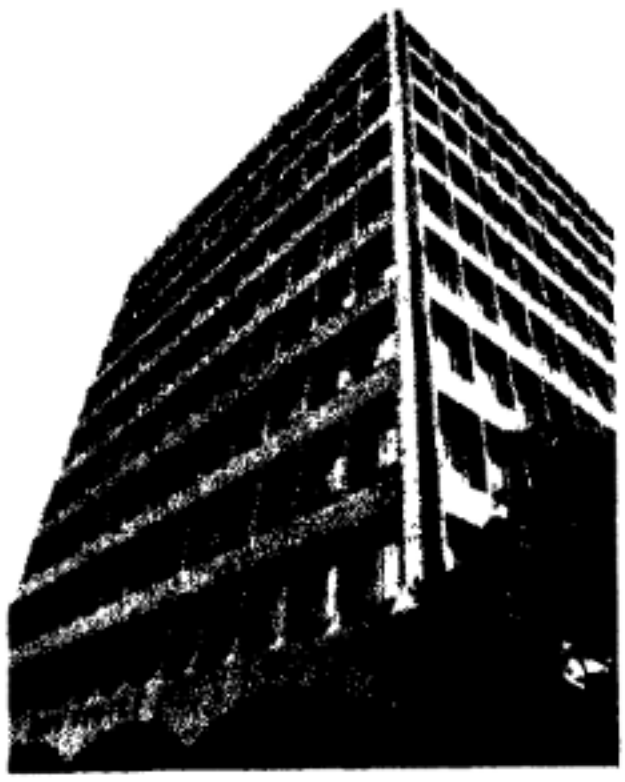
Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 10 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex-Delhi

Cover Transparency:
Jagdish Yadav

"The structure of the large stadium was a challenge...and TISCON gave us the answer."

— F Bennet Pithavadian
Architect of Chepauk Stadium
Madras

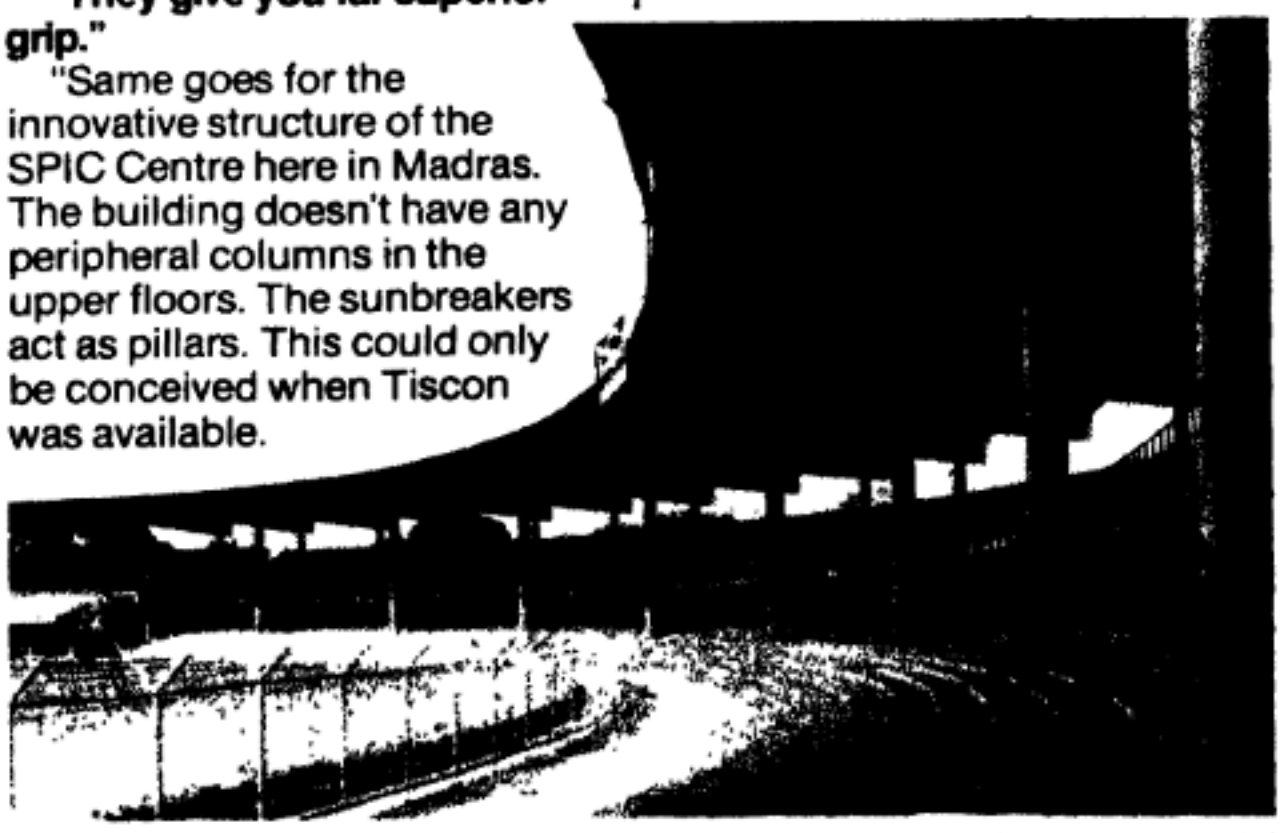
Mr Pithavadian, with several major projects in India to his credit and who has served as a Consultant in Bangkok, Jordan and Cyprus, strongly believes that good architecture depends as much on materials as on design. While working on the Chepauk Stadium he undertook challenging innovations because he could depend on Tiscon reinforcing bars for the structural solution he needed. Let's find out from him why he found Tiscon suitable.



"They made the pillars strong enough to withstand the heavy load."

"You see, we had this 28 metre span roof. But we couldn't place any supporting pillars in front of the gallery as they would block the spectators' view. We decided to place pillars only along the centre of the gallery. This called for a large cantilever span. Which meant a great portion of the roof had to be left without any support. And that's where Tiscon bars proved their worth. They made the pillars strong enough to withstand the heavy load."

"They give you far superior grip."



"Same goes for the innovative structure of the SPIC Centre here in Madras. The building doesn't have any peripheral columns in the upper floors. The sunbreakers act as pillars. This could only be conceived when Tiscon was available.

Because Tiscon bars have a superior rib pattern, they give you far superior grip and yield stress."

Not only Mr Pithavadian. Most top designers and engineers in India now prefer Tiscon. The proof can be seen in almost every major project in the country. And all because of Tata Steel's commitment to developing superior products to meet specific customer needs.

For more information write to any of our Sales Offices.

TISCON

The superior ribbed reinforcing bar

TATA STEEL

TIS-5583

DATELINE / M.J.Akbar

Asansol: Once upon a time, not all that long ago, red was the colour of either side of the Grand Trunk Road as you left Calcutta by this most famous of highways. All over the country, in 1980, Mrs Indira Gandhi had smashed both pretension and claim, but the red fort of the CPI(M) in West Bengal held very firm indeed. Howrah was commanded by Politburo member Samar Mukherjee, while Bally, Serampore and Hooghly were proud to wave the red flag in harmony. Burdwan, of course, was unquestioned CPI(M) territory and if Ananda Gopal Mukherjee had taken Asansol away by a slim margin, this was attributed more due to the complacency of the local unit of the party than any significant rise in the strength of the "bourgeoisie and antipeople" Congress(I). More than 200 years ago, another red army had begun a march from Calcutta up the Grand Trunk Road, but that was the army of white businessmen with imperial ambitions, intent on painting the map of India red. Perhaps some within the revolutionary red ranks, buoyed by the commitment of their supporters and the sight of a prostrate national opposition had begun to entertain similar dreams? From Bengal to Bihar, then eastern Uttar Pradesh, then Awadh, while flanks subdued the Marathas in the west, and consolidated the south, before the richest prize of all, Delhi, fell to the red flag? It was not that impossible a dream, and it may not have taken as long as the redcoats did to achieve either. But the key lay in the preservation of Calcutta as a kind of political Fort William.

A trip from Calcutta to Asansol shows just how threadbare that fortress has become. What was once red has now become tricolour. Goliath Mukherjee in Howrah fell to David Munshi. In the second division league match in Serampore, it was again the Congress(I) which won, the veteran Professor Bimal Kanti Ghosh defeating the CPI(M)'s Ajit Bag. Hooghly has never surrendered since 1952, but this time the CPI(M)'s warhorse Rupchand Pal lost to the comparatively unknown Indumati Bhattacharya. Sudhir Roy in Burdwan managed to keep the red flag flying, but not as high as in the past; and Ananda Gopal Mukherjee in Asansol proved that 1980 was much more than an accident. The tricolour has not only managed to hold its own against the red flag, but has made significant inroads.

Nor is it difficult to appreciate why. The state of the Grand Trunk Road, to begin with. And why, on top of the awful track punctuated so often with railway crossings, does this national highway need so many bumps to irritate the long-distance traveller? There is a sense of arbitrariness, of lack of accountability, of working on a whim rather than a plan, that permeates traffic decisions as much as decisions of higher policy. The few schools visible from the road are all of 1950 vintage or older, the unhealthy dark smudges on the unpainted walls a reflection of the decay in education. The worst is that the countryside of Bengal never looks poor. It is a constant lush green interspersed with ponds and huts that form a continuous film before the eye. Why should there be such poverty in such rich fertile countryside, when once-barren Haryana can be converted into a granary? Not, as the uncharitable would put it, because the people are lazy. That is rubbish. The poor are never lazy; only the rich or the middle class, content that their meal will not be denied them whatever they do, can afford to be lazy. But they remain poor because they cannot get the agricultural science and technology that is needed to build green revolutions. There is not enough money with the West Bengal government for that. Apart from the difficulties with a hostile centre, the white collar trade unions (allegedly the backbone of the CPI-M in West Bengal but behaving more often like a leech stuck to the brain) drain away too much of the available resources. The bill has been handed in, and the political price must be paid now. The CPI(M)'s might turn out to be the only revolution which was destroyed by the loyalty of the clerk.

On the fringe of Durgapur, along the highway, is a new kind of snack bar: the Jai Ma Kali Video Coffee Shop. This unique synthesis of religion, culture, commerce, the most sacred ancient faith and the most insouciant modern toy, could only take place in our country. We are an open people and an open country: we take our influences and inspirations from where we want. Nor do we worry too much about the juxtaposition of the sacred with the profane: I cannot quite, for instance, see a Prophet Abraham Video Games Parlour springing up anywhere. But Hindu belief and faith is not rooted in the awe that defines the Judaic religions; it is more intimate, more personal and familiarity with the deity is not perceived as frivolity or licence or disrespect. If Jai Ma Kali provides the strength, and the good fortune, then she will have the medium through which the fortune is made named after her. Perhaps men cannot emulate the gods, but surely the gods can be brought down to the level of men.

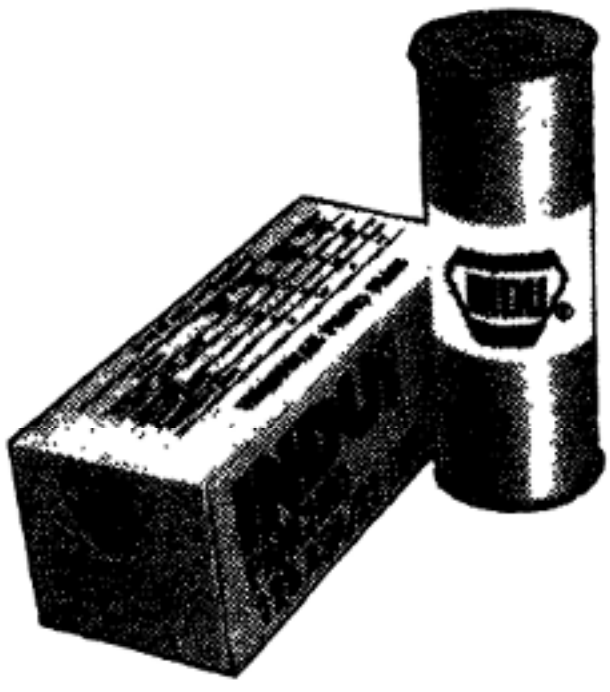
The salesman at the counter was taken aback when, at 4.45 in the morning I asked him for a first class train ticket to Calcutta, just in time to catch the second Burdwan-Howrah local. His surprise was understandable. Who in his right mind would actually buy a first class ticket on one of these trains? Well, no one perhaps but a journalist. I had not been on a suburban train for some time, and I dearly wanted to see what a compartment, ambitiously labelled first class, looked like these days.

First image: a bombed out shelter. The front first class compartment of the Burdwan-Howrah local, via the chord line, leaving Burdwan at 0454, was almost certainly the worst compartment on that train. The seats were as wooden as in the second class, but that was no surprise; incorrigible theft had long since (to use a literal metaphor) knocked the stuffing out of the cushioned seats. But one did not expect the windows to look like they had just returned from the battlefront. Naturally, they would not shut. Neither would the door, and soon someone vented his anger against the belligerent door by smashing it up a little more. Even that early in the morning, the compartment was soon full within a few stations. No; no one else had made the mistake of buying a ticket. In fact, if a ticket collector had come in to demand first class tickets from the passengers, he would have been greeted by helpless laughter. The atmosphere was rather fun, the commuters being that special breed who belong largely to the service industries and must begin their work early. (A home guard, incidentally, chose this journey to strike up/renew a friendship with a vibrant lady; by the time she had left, he had bought a round of tea and told the tea man to return the change the next day, which is sufficient indication of the storms stirring in his heart.)

But why do the railways insist on calling a few of their compartments on the local trains first class? There's not even any hope of getting extra revenues, because only a sucker like me would buy a ticket. So where's the percentage? The next time tough Mr Bansi Lal comes to Calcutta, he should not restrict his sightseeing to the underground or the circular railway. He should really try and travel in a first class compartment of a suburban railway.

"Eat up, puppies, before mamma comes!"

Random memories. Life is full of them. Memories of happiness, love, pride and fun. Fleeting moments that you just have to capture. They can happen any time. They may not happen again.



Take a picture.

In black and white.

Only black and white pictures don't fade for years and years.

Keep the pictures in the family album.

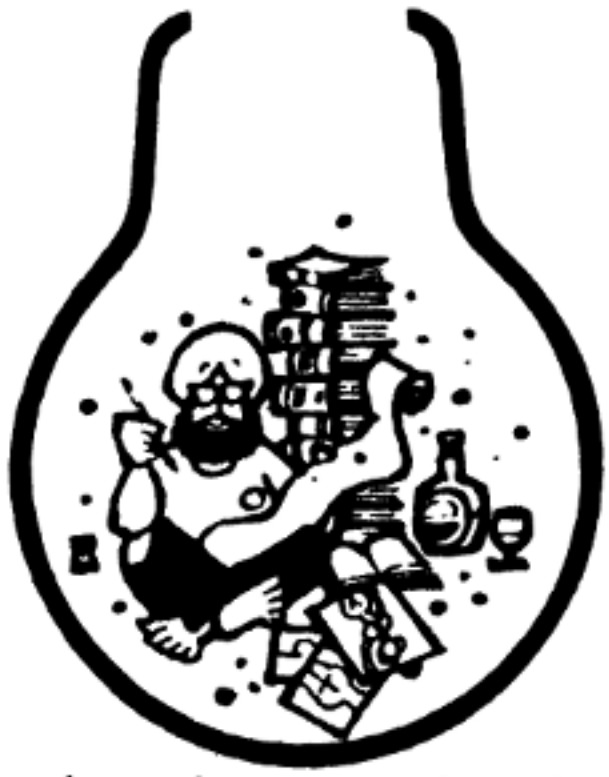
Later, you can share your memories. And relive the happy times.

Capture the moment

INDU

Indu Roll Film and Bromides

Sista's-HPF 23984 N



First Black Mark

Rajiv Gandhi's government has earned its first black mark which no one except he can erase. This is his government's refusal to hold a judicial enquiry into the widespread anti-Sikh violence following the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. The President's address claimed that violence had been "fully and effectively controlled in the shortest possible time." Facts tell a totally different tale. And now we have two reports which present a damning indictment of the government and the ruling Congress party. Unless these reports are effectively countermanded, the only conclusion that can be drawn is that neither the government nor the party which forms it have the moral courage to face the ugly truth. So far all it has done is to authorise a senior police officer to investigate and make a report on the failure of the Delhi's police to discharge its duty. This is not good enough.

The first report entitled Who are the Guilty? was published a few days after the occurrences. The investigations were jointly conducted by the Peoples Union for Democratic Rights and the Peoples Union for Civil Liberties headed respectively by Gobinda Mukhoty and Dr Rajani Kothari. Amongst 16 politicians named as answerable are cabinet minister H.K.L Bhagat, sitting MPs Lalit Makan and Jagdish Tytler, two members of the Delhi Metropolitan Council, three members of the Delhi Corporation and several leaders of the Youth Congress. It also names 13 police officers and constables and almost 200 others. Since the violence involved murder, arson, loot, gang rape and abduction of women, one would have thought these gentlemen would themselves take steps to clear their names of calumny. None of them has so far bothered to do so.

The second report released on the eve of the Republic Day is on behalf of the Citizens' Commission presided over by retired Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, S.M. Sikri. Its members include men who held the highest positions in the civil service and are respected for their integrity: Badr-ud-Din Tyabji, Rajeshwar Dayal, Govind Narain and Srinivasvardan. This report does not name anyone but its pronouncements are equally damning of the government and the Congress party.

My attempt to raise the issue in the Rajya Sabha was greeted with derision by members of the Congress party. In his reply the Prime Minister made no reference to my demand for a high powered judicial inquiry. Evidently the government has no intention of instituting one and by sweeping all the muck under the carpet hopes that it will soon be forgotten. Muck under the carpet is known to stink. This certainly will. Will future historians get nothing besides two reports as source material on the post-assassination violence?

All I can do is to plead with the Prime Minister to keep his image as clean as it was when he took office. He must have this tragic episode thoroughly investigated and punish those whose hands are soiled with innocent blood. He must wipe this ugly stain off his face.

Gas as Weapon

Ever since the ghastly tragedy in Bhopal, I have wondered whether our army has considered the use of poison gas as a weapon. I hope not. I hope it will never cross the minds of people in power to consider using anything as dirty as killer gas on the field of battle. Hence I was appalled to read in the New Statesman of England that a cricketing nation like the English is keeping its options open "in the light of the massive Soviet capability in chemical weapons." (Mrs Thatcher).

What leaked out from the Union Carbide factory in Bhopal and killed 2500 people in a matter of hours was chimney smoke compared to what the super powers have in store for the world. The Germans were the first to develop chlorine-based gas in World War I. In later years of the same war they tried another gas called Phosgene. Neither caused much havoc as gas masks gave adequate protection against it. Mercifully none of the belligerents thought of using gases in World War II. The age of nuclear and hydrogen bombs, long-range missiles and laser beams had made gases somewhat passe. Nevertheless, both the Americans and the Russians have developed more lethal gases and have stock piled large quantities for possible use as alternatives to conventional weapons. These nerve gases are said to be 100 times more potent than the one that went on the murderous rampage in Bhopal. They go by sweet sounding names like Tabun, Sarin and Soman and are stored in liquid form. All that is needed is to fire their containers into the air where they explode and come down as drizzle or vapour. One breath of the gas-fouled air of a few drops on the body will kill humans and beasts within a matter of seconds as well as destroy plant life on which it descends.

On second thoughts what difference does it make to the person who has to die whether he is axed, shot, bayoneted, blasted or gassed? Many states in America have introduced intravenous injections or gassing as more human methods of execution than hanging or shooting. What consolation is it to a person knocked down on the road that he was not run over by a garbage van but a Rolls Royce?

Year of the Ass

The year of 1985 has been declared as the Youth Year. I do not know what this kind of declaration means any more than I understand the Chinese cycle of years named after beasts: Year of the Dog, Year of the Rat, etc. However, since the younger generation has in fact taken over the affairs of the country, permit me to relate an anecdote before suggesting an appropriate title for 1985.

At a function to celebrate the anniversary of the Ramayana, a young newly-elected member of Parliament was the guest of honour. In his inaugural speech, this youthful neta after paying tribute to the sage Valmiki, author of the classic, wanted to impress his audience of the changed times and the heavier responsibilities his generation of leaders have to bear. He said: "Brothers and sisters, at the time of Sri Valmikiji, Hindus, Muslims, Christians and Sikhs lived in complete harmony with one another and there were no communal problems. Today, we have to deal with these tensions all the time." An appropriate title for 1985 would be "Year of the Ass."

Behind your charming face, the work of unseen hands.

The care and craftsmanship at Triveni Sheet Glass is legendary.

Anyone can buy the best machines and employ the best processes for glass manufacture.— like Triveni Sheet Glass. But Triveni believes that people are just as important. Triveni's team of the best glass makers in the country turns the concept of quality into flawless sheets of glass. That meet the stringent requirements of customers, not only in India, but around the world.

Highly skilled technicians and workers ensure that all raw material meets the high Triveni standard. Strict temperature control, round-the-clock, maintains the homogeneity of molten glass. While experienced checkers scrutinise every square metre of glass so that not an air bubble escapes their vigilant eye.

So next time you smile at your mirror, remember the countless hands from Triveni that have perfected it.

Triveni sheet glass is used :
For mirrors — the finest mirrors depend on Triveni's 'selected' glass for undistorted reflections.
In laminated and toughened glass — for automobiles, railway coaches and factories.
For glazing—in doors, windows and furniture, etc.

Triveni Sheet Glass . The house of glass with a foundation of steel.

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Why R.K. Dhawan was Dismissed

R.K. Dhawan, who worked with Mrs Gandhi for 24 years, still does not know why he was asked to quit. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi once described him as a "walking computer" for the detailed information he had of men and matters, but it is Rajiv who told him that he had been "working too hard" and that he should "have some rest." And again it was Rajiv who took him along to the oath-taking ceremony and gave him the impression that his services were still indispensible.

Had another job been offered to him, Dhawan would probably have accepted it. But it was not, and he considered it humiliating to ask for one. Since he resigned from government service when Mrs Gandhi went out of office in 1977, he had no government job to go back to. And because he resigned he did not even get gratuity.

It is not known which forces operated to push him out, but there had been reports after Indira Gandhi's assassination that he would be dropped. Unlike Dr P.C. Alexander, former secretary to the Prime Minister, he was on a contract job and a note on whether he should be kept in his post was among the first papers sent by Dr Alexander to Rajiv Gandhi for orders. The file lay on the Prime Minister's table for a few days, and that gave grist to the rumour mills that Dhawan might not be retained. However, Rajiv Gandhi signed the note, as well as the note retaining H.Y. Sharada Prasad, information adviser.

Over the years Dhawan had become a controversial figure Though after Mrs Gandhi's return to power in 1980, he adopted a low profile and seldom helped Punjabi bureaucrats as he used to do before 1977, there was no doubt that he was an influential man. Mrs Gandhi used him to convey messages to chief ministers, cabinet ministers and top bureaucrats. He could have resigned before the election results were out. His successor, C. Venkataraman, was interviewed by Dr Alexander in mid-December, but there is no doubt that Rajiv Gandhi's polite suggestion to him to quit came as a surprise. Dhawan, despite rumours, did not expect that he would be asked to go without any other job being offered to him.

Dhawan had served the Gandhi family loyally. When the Janata government was desperate to bring Indira Gandhi to book, Dhawan was offered every temptation, even a diplomatic assignment, if he could give proof of her involvement in any deal. But his reply was that though he was prepared to reveal the extent of involvement of ministers and bureaucrats in Emergency excesses, as far as Mrs Gandhi and her family were concerned, he would not open his mouth, whatever be the punishment Nothing came of such pressures, though his role in the government during the Emergency is evident from the Shah Commission's proceedings. Still the Commission did not single out Dhawan, unlike Siddhartha Shankar Ray, former chief minister of West Bengal. The Commission, in its findings, has recorded: "What happened in the months following the declaration of the Emergency with regard to the High Court judges appears to have been merely an extension of the idea conceived on the night of the 25th on account of which Shri S.S. Ray had felt very uneasy and had also spoken to Smt Indira Gandhi before leaving her residence."

Dhawan's position was too important; M.O. Mathai, who held the same post in Nehru's time, had ticked off even powerful ministers like Gobind Ballabh Pant, the home minister, though ultimately such outrageous behaviour led to Mathai's downfall. Dhawan never flaunted his power like Mathai, but it appears that it was continuously dinned into Rajiv Gandhi's ears that Dhawan was not the right sort of person to continue in his post as special assistant. Dhawan is somewhat rattled by rumours that he might be "involved in one case or the other." But he also takes these things in his stride. What can he do if they do so? This appears to be his attitude.

During Mrs Gandhi's lifetime some of Rajiv Gandhi's backroom boys had tried to remove him. But the former PM had brushed them aside. She even looked into certain allegations of corruption against her personal assistant when Giani Zail Singh was the home minister. But after he was exonerated she stood by him. Rajiv Gandhi too seemed to have shed the doubts he had about Dhawan. Apparently, he could not resist the pressures from some of the people around him. Though Dhawan has reportedly said that he did his job diligently and faithfully and showed due respect to all, he may have irritated some, perhaps unwittingly. Some suspect that Dhawan's proximity to Swraj Paul, a foreign-based industrialist, was among the factors that led to his undoing.

But what worked most against Dhawan was the stature he had acquired over the years. The Prime Minister apparently decided that it would be better to have some uncontroversial person for the post, and Venkataraman, who once was Lal Bahadur Shastri's personal assistant, was considered the best choice. Dhawan has no fixed plans for the future. But he may some day write a book on his years with Indira Gandhi.

Dhawan's position was too important; M.O. Mathai, who held the same post in Nehru's time, had ticked off even powerful ministers like Gobind Ballabh Pant...Dhawan never flaunted his power like Mathai, but it appears that it was continuously dinned into Rajiv Gandhi's ears that Dhawan was not the right sort of person to continue in his post as special assistant.

A Burning Question

The cover story, Should the Akalis be Banned? (20—26 January 1985), by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya made interesting reading. It may sound revolutionary but there is no use banning the Akali Dal, the Muslim League, the RSS and other parties of a similar nature. If they are banned on the sole consideration that they are spreading communalism, the same prescription should also apply to other national parties. In this country, where so many religions co-exist, there is bound to be communal feelings. All that is needed from the leaders of such parties is that they must get rid of their separatist feelings and activities. The other parties should protest whenever such communal parties raise divisive slogans.
Moinak Gupta Choudhury, Ranchi

• SUNDAY keeps on publishing photographs of militant Sikhs. You should also print some pictures which show mobs killing Sikhs, burning their houses and looting their property. The entire Sikh community has been held responsible for the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. Many of them have been taken off key positions and sensitive jobs. Now that a spy ring has been busted, who is going to punish the community represented by the spies?
Dalip Singh, New Delhi

• The cover story was well-timed. The socio-religious organisations instead of bringing about harmony among different religions are, in fact, doing the opposite. The communal politics of the ruling party as well as that of the opposition is destabilising the nation. The need of the hour is freedom to practise one's own religion, and not give a special status to a particular religion. Such a gesture can help in averting a Punjab-type situation.
Abir Padhy, Behrampur (Orissa)

• Rajiv Gandhi deserves to be complemented for giving top priority to the Punjab issue. The appointment of a three member cabinet panel is a step in the right direction. The Sikhs are part and parcel of India and their contribution towards the building of independent India cannot be ignored. It is time that the Hindus and the Sikhs forgot the recent past and once again joined hands to build a stronger India.
K. Chidanand Kumar, Bangalore

• In Wanted: Action Against Extremists, Seema Mustafa has failed to come out with any concrete ideas to solve the Punjab imbroglio.
Subal Chandra Saha, Calcutta

• The cover story was illuminating. It is a burning question as to whether political parties of a communal nature should be allowed to operate. I expect SUNDAY to publish a few more articles of this nature.
Shibu O.G., Varkala (Kerala)

• The Sikhs have contributed in no small measure towards the prosperity of India but of late they have acquired a bad name primarily because of the Akali Dal. The Dal has been encouraging extremists over the last few years. The government should have taken strong steps before. We cannot allow the Akalis to hold the country to ransom.
M.G. Sundaram, Madras

• It would be wrong to equate the Sikhs with the Akali Dal. I appeal to all the Sikhs to cooperate with the government to solve the Punjab tangle. It is foolish to nourish the idea of Khalistan for we belong to India. But some enemies of India are trying to disturb the peace from outside. We must be wary of them.
Major Balbir Singh Bhasin, Patna

• This has reference to the question, Should Communal Parties be Banned? In my opinion religion and politics should not be mixed. There are a few parties in India which are openly communal. The most tragic part is that in our country elections are fought on communal lines.
Husain E. Beguwala, Bombay

• Communal parties like the RSS should be banned.
T.N. Venkateshamurthy, Bangalore

Brutal Force

Yubaraj Ghimire's illuminating article, Police Massacre Harijans (20-26 January '85) made interesting reading. I was shocked at the brutality of the police force. The Harijans had rightly raised their voice in order to protest the rape of a housewife by a landed bhumihar of the village. As usual in our country law is always on the side of the moneyed and the police instead of arresting the landlord went berserk killing and burning the huts of the Harijans. In order to justify the killings, the police cooked up a story saying that the Harijans killed were notorious Naxalites. Had not SUNDAY exposed the fraud, the police would have gone scot free.
Mabud Ali, Deulgram (Howrah).

Not Apt

I did not appreciate Kuldip Nayar's comparison of the Special Courts Act with the Rowlatt Act (Exclusive, 20—26 January '85). The latter was meant to curb the rightful freedom of the Indian people while the former is primarily meant to deal with the Sikh extremists in Punjab. It is the duty of the government to protect the lives and property of the people but a situation has arisen in Punjab and elsewhere, where the prevailing laws are not effective enough to deal with the situation. Hence the need for special powers. Thousands of extremists have been arrested in Punjab and it is necessary to dispose off the cases speedily.
M.S. Jagadish Babu, Bangalore

A New Formula

M.J. Akbar has at last admitted that he is a bad astrologer (Dateline, 20—26 January '85). But he has suggested a novel formula to envigorate the opposition: they should counter the growing influence of filmstars with filmstars. Putting up Rekha against Amitabh Bachchan in the next elections is a good suggestion. As regards the campaign theme of Amitabh, here is my suggestion:
De De Pyar De, Pyar De, Pyar De Re Hame Pyar De Bijoy Kumar Rath, Kakiriguma (Orissa)

Serampore
Falkenhra Public Library

Bitter and Sour

From henceforth Khushwant Singh's column should be called, Bitter and Sour. Mr Singh's outbursts in the wake of the riots following Indira Gandhi's assassination was understandable, but what baffled many of us was his attacks even after things cooled down.
V.C. Nair, Calcutta

• The Gossip column needs to be sobered down. Now that Khushwant Singh has emerged as the champion of the Sikhs, he should temper his writings to suit his new-found status.
C.A. Menon, New Delhi

• Of late the Gossip column has become more bitter than sweet and sour. But nevertheless I admire Khushwant Singh's sense of humour.
Mrinal Kanti Mahapatra, Singhbhum

• In Far Eastern Economic Review Mr Khushwant Singh has been quoted as saying, "The names of the two assassins (of Mrs Indira Gandhi) will be read into the scroll of martyrs for years to come. It is the greatest honour for the Sikh to give his life to preserve the sanctity of the Temple." But this is hardly the view of an honourable Indian. A renowned journalist should not issue such provocative statements.
Rashmee Roshan Lall, Meerut

• It is natural for a man to become passionate while talking of one's religion. But Mr Singh should realise that his articles are read throughout the country by thousands of readers. As such he should be a bit more responsible.
H.P. Choubey, Jharia

• I was shocked to read the articles of Khushwant Singh appearing in SUNDAY. In one of his columns, Mr Singh writes: "If the Sikhs sink, India will sink with them." Such irresponsible statements are not expected from a journalist of Mr Singh's calibre.
Sudhansu Mohan Mishra, Jeypore

• Khushwant Singh's articles are clearly biased. If he thinks that 1.86 per cent of the Sikh population has the strength to sink India, then he is living in a fool's paradise.
Krishna Murari, Bokaro

• This is an appeal to Khushwant Singh to stop his outbursts against Hindus. In Delhi, Kanpur and Indore many Hindus sheltered Sikhs from the wrath of fanatics. It would be wrong to blame the entire Hindu community for the riots following the assassination of Indira Gandhi.
A.B. Jahagirdar, Bangalore

• Nobody wants the Sikhs to sink. The Sikhs are part and parcel of Hindu society and as such they should try and live peacefully within it. By now they should have realised that hostility only breeds hostility.
B.K. Malhotra, Patiala

• Ever since the assassination of Indira Gandhi a lot has been said and written about Khushwant Singh. Riots, whatever be their nature, must be condemned in the strongest terms and Khushwant Singh has been doing just that. Operation Bluestar was certainly an unfortunate incident and had steps been taken timely, the operation could have ben avoided. But our political managers decided to drag their feet with the result that the sacred Golden Temple was converted into an arsenal.
Mustasad Ahmed, Azamgarh

• It was nice to read Khushwant Singh's comments on crime and punishment (To Fit the Crime, Gossip, 20—26 January '85). I agree with the author that it is time the country's lawmakers took a look at the Indian Penal Code to amend it in the light of our present circumstances. However, I disagree with Mr Singh as regards the punishment meted out to sexual offenders.
Subir Lahiri, Calcutta

• I wonder what punishment Mr Singh would recommend for those who glorify murders and make martyrs out of cold-blooded killers.
M.S. Nair, Durgapur

Old Faces, New Roles

The New Wave Government (6—19 January 1985) has begun well and we must wish Rajiv Gandhi and his team all success.
V.N. Narayanaswamy, Madras

• The Congress(I) has secured a massive mandate in the elections It was not a vote for the unity and integrity of the nation. In my opinion, the people have betrayed themselves by voting the Congress back to power. The late Prime Minister's persistent efforts during the last 17 years to discredit the opposition and other democratic institutions including the press have paid dividends. The prevailing corruption has destroyed the vitality of the people. Today, naturally the masses look for charisma, which can only be found in the ruling party. There is no democracy in India; we are living in a family raj.
Usha Sumit, New Delhi

• Shubhabrata Bhattacharya was right in observing that the new ministry is a judicious blend of youth and experience. The introduction of professionals is a novel feature of the ministry. But what was surprising was the axing of Pranab Mukherjee and A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury. However, the new team consists mainly of old faces in new roles How far they will be able to fulfil the promises they made, only time can tell.
Partha Pratim Banerji, Howrah

• Congratulations to Rajiv Gandhi and the Congress(I). But it is very sad that there is virtually no opposition in the Lok Sabha. But whose fault is it: the electorate's or the stubborn and egotistic leaders of the opposition parties?
Md. Anwar Alam Qumaispuri, Patna

• When in his election speeches Rajiv Gandhi said that he would take us into the 21st century, did it mean that he and his party would be ruling the country for the next two decades?
Lakshmi Kamalakar, New Delhi

• Why the Opposition Lost should serve as an eye-opener to the national opposition leaders. The opposition lost because the present generation could not trust the 'old stalwarts.' When the opposition leaders were busy quarrelling with each other at the cost of the "unity of the country," the youth decided to vote a leader who promised an Akhand Bharat.
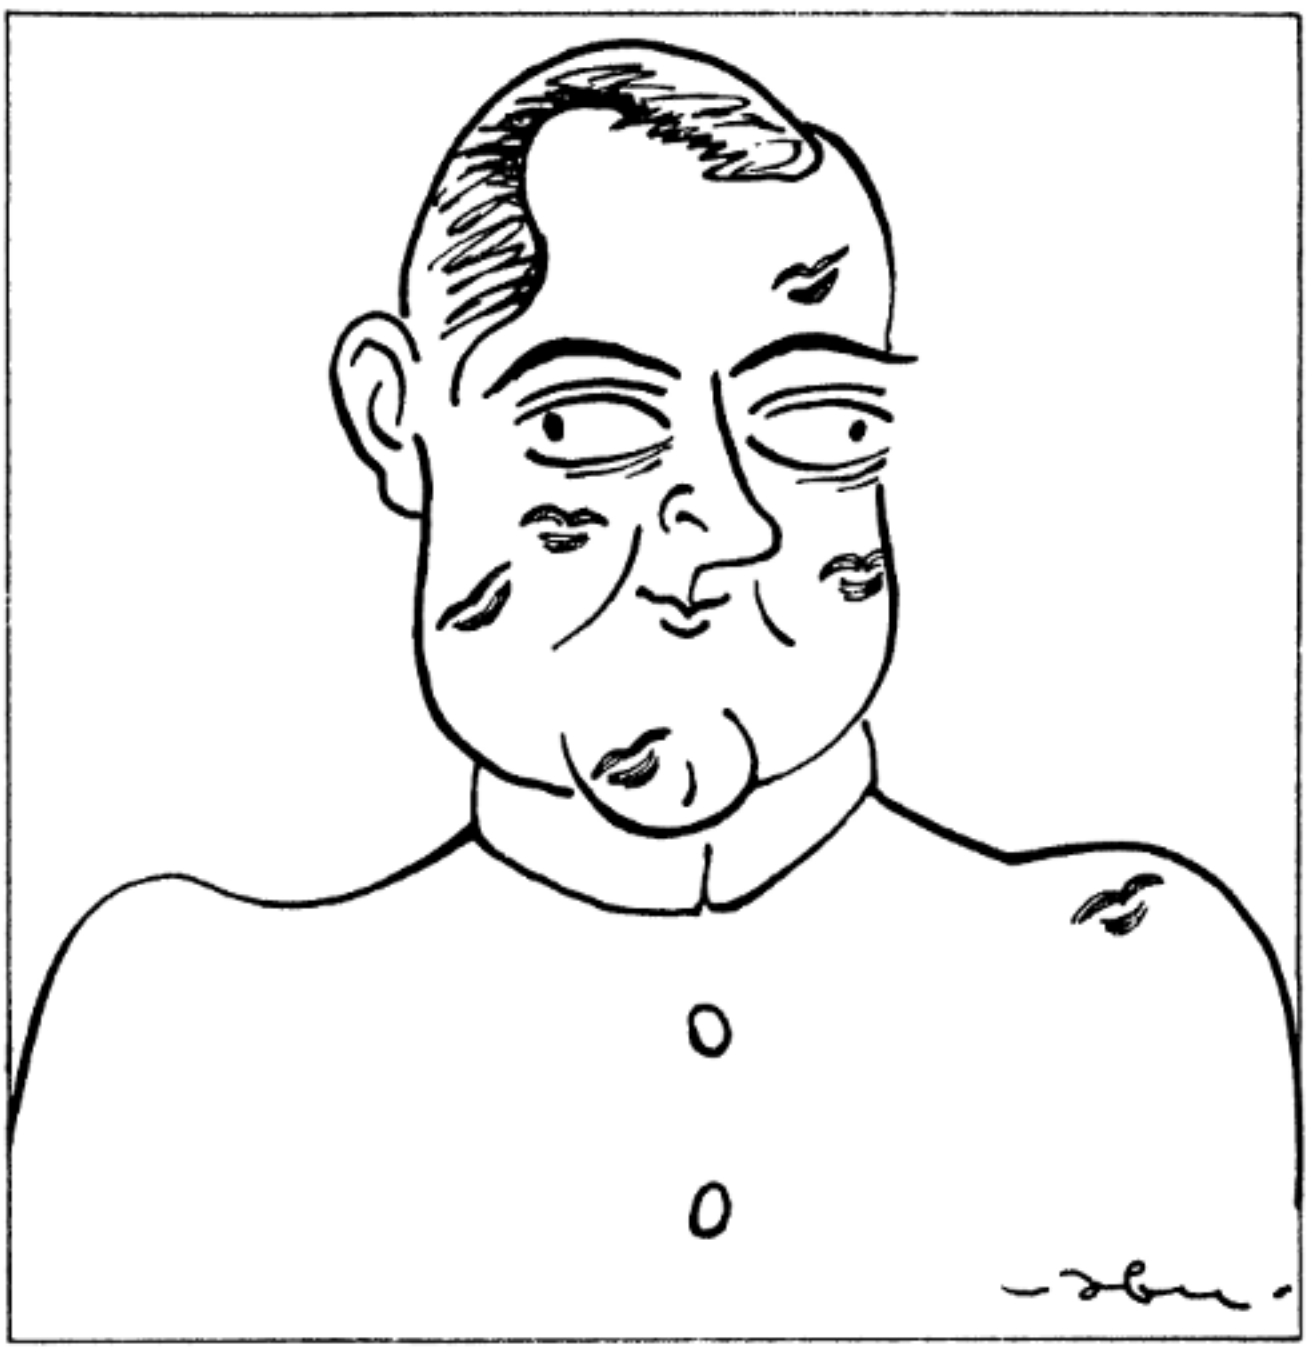
Sujit Ghosh, Cuttack

• The opposition leaders have been taught a lesson. The people voted for Rajiv Gandhi because it was felt that he alone would be able to steer the country out of the dangers faced by it.
Duryodhan Mohanty, Palli Raghunathpur (Orissa)

• After the recent elections, haven't we shown the world that we as enlightened democrats can be successfully and successively governed by man (Jawaharlal Nehru), woman (Indira Gandhi) and child (Rajiv Gandhi).
Mohan Ramchandani, Indore.



COVER STORY

Women in Rajiv's Politics

The Prime Minister has taken the first steps towards the emancipation of women

The Prime Minister being welcomed to Parliament by one of the women MPs: beginning of a new era

To fight ignorance is the first step towards emancipation. The new wave government of Rajiv Gandhi has taken a long, difficult leap forward by making education free for girls upto high school. From many of the signals being given by the new Prime Minister, it is becoming increasingly clear that he intends to bring the women who comprise 50 per cent of the population into the national mainstream. The United Nation's "Decade for Women" comes to an end during the middle of this year but for most of the women in India the 20th century has yet to become a reality, while the rest of the world has long been talking about the 21st century. Mr Gandhi, so keen and in such a hurry to enter the next century, has clearly realised that women cannot be left behind on the threshold of the next century.

The signals so far: A separate ministry for women and social welfare was the Prime Minister's new year gift to women. The ministry is headed by Maragatham Chandrashekhar, a senior Congresswoman who was a member of the Congress Parliamentary Board. Women were given a special mention in Rajiv Gandhi's maiden speech to the new party MPs. Women were spoken about again in President Giani Zail Singh's address to the joint session of Parliament when free education for girls until high school was announced. The election manifesto of the Congress(I) has a section on women which states that the party will "fight the reprehensible practice of dowry and attendant social evils, initiate a big programme to improve the educational status of women and improve the economic opportunities for them."

The intentions have been announced. Women have to be brought into the national mainstream. In this quest, Rajiv Gandhi has tried to give women important political positions. It is ironic that while there was no women cabinet minister other than herself in Mrs Gandhi's tenure, one of the first things Rajiv Gandhi did was to give cabinet rank to Mrs Mohsina Kidwai, presently union minister for health and social welfare. While the women in the new cabinet might not be too many, their presence is likely to be felt more keenly. Margaret Alva, formerly the convenor of the Mahila Congress which Rajiv Gandhi started in 1983 while he was a general secretary of the All India Congress(I) Committee, is the minister of state for parliamentary affairs. Ram Dulari Sinha is minister of state for home affairs, and M. Chandrashekhar heads the ministry for women's affairs. By selecting Najma Heptullah to be the deputy chairman of the Rajya Sabha, Bibi Amarjit Kaur as the joint secretary in the AICC and retaining Rajendra Kumari Bajpai as general secretary of the AICC, Rajiv Gandhi has shown a determination to involve women in party affairs as well as in the difficult task of nation-building.

Mohsina Kidwai

Why women? This is a question one could well ask. There are now 66 women in Parliament, 42 of them in the Lok Sabha and 24 in the Rajya Sabha. The Congress(I) had fielded 38 women in the last Lok Sabha elections and 36 of them won. Rajiv Gandhi has talked a great deal about his cleaning-up exercise, for which a giant broom is needed. And women wield the broom much better. Less dirt might be shoved under the carpet and the broom would reach into the hidden corners as well.

While there are more women in Parliament, there are likely to be more women in the Legislative Assemblies. Rajiv Gandhi is said to have told the Parliamentary Board that the percentage of women in the Assemblies should be far greater than what it is in Parliament. The Mahila Congress (which in a year enrolled ten lakh members), had recommended that women be given one Assembly seat in every Parliamentary constituency for the coming Assembly elections in March. The Prime Minister in his quest went a step further and said that at least 20 per cent of the seats should be given to women.

His call to women was obviously heard. Outside the AICC office on Akbar Road or in front of the houses

'Women Will Take Long Strides in the Years to Come'

Mamata Banerjee, MP, told SUNDAY

For Mamata Banerjee (27) it has been a journey from an ordinary Congress worker to an elected representative of the people in Parliament. Unassuming and confident, she is now the youngest woman MP in the Lok Sabha and one of the three women to have been elected from West Bengal. She won by a margin of 20,000 votes from the Jadavpur constituency defeating the veteran CPI(M) leader Somnath Chatterjee. Known as a crusader for the cause of women in her state, Mamata Banerjee was optimistic about the future of women in this country and pledged to make her contribution to the same. Excerpts:

Q: What role do Indian women play in national politics today?
A: I think they will emerge as a new personality especially because of the re-naming of a ministry for women. It is said that morning shows the day. I think in the same way Rajivji, by taking this step, has paved the way for the progress and development of women in India. He has given an important sanction for education of women and child welfare.

Q: What role do you foresee for women in the development and integration of the country?

A: After the death of Mrs Gandhi, the newly elected women MPs will be the spokesmen for women in India. Seeing us, the others will get motivated and play a more active role in politics and social welfare. Together we will try and do our utmost for women's welfare. We will try and organise a large section of women from all walks of life. For example, there is the anti-dowry law which is not being utilised. Rajivji has already stated in Parliament that there will be free education for women, which is very important. With this step taken, I have already spoken to the women's welfare minister, Mrs Maragatham Chandrashekar, to do something for equal employment opportunities for women. I hope the Prime Minister agrees to this. In 1975, during the International Women's Year, Mrs Gandhi had notified the ILO convention No 100 for the right to equal wages for women. Now we want that the right to equal employment should also be given to Indian women, according to their status and qualifications.

Q: What other steps should the government take to help women?

A: He (the Prime Minister) has already proven that the faith reposed in him by women will be paid back in kind by these things and he has fulfilled his promises. He has already, in a few days, done invaluable work for women and now he is trying to implement other projects and ideas given to him.

Dilip Banerjee

Mamata Banerjee

Q: What role will the women MPs play in this?

A: We will be the voice of millions of women. If there is any case of atrocity against women or their negligence we will definitely raise it in Parliament. In the next session we will try to utilise the anti-dowry bill and law. We will also not hesitate to oppose any steps taken by the government which goes against our demands and make sure our voices are heard as a group.

Interviewed by Ritu Sarin

of members of selection committee (more women have also been appointed to these selection committees), large numbers of women could be seen. Signs that the dawn of a woman's era was on its way could be read on the faces of the women. There was confidence and candour and an awareness of women's rights. The new guidelines for the selection of candidates—honesty, education, hard working, etc—had been taken seriously. While this correspondent was talking to Srikant Verma, general secretary of the AICC, a young woman from Chhatisgarh came to see him. On the slip she had sent, in the "reason for visit" column, the lady had penned: "Regarding a ticket for the Assembly elections." Mr Verma displayed his enigmatic smile and said: "See the difference with women. Most men would have put down 'official' as the purpose of their visit. Men beat about the bush,

Jagdish Yadav

Shiela Dixit

women are generally more direct and honest in this approach."

This lady obviously knew her rights and could not understand why she had not been given a ticket thus far. "Rajivji," she told Mr Verma, "has said that he wants the seats to be given to the minority community, to women and to educated people. I am a woman, a Muslim, educated and hard-working. I deserve a seat..."

Whether it was the lady from Chhatisgarh or the countless others who had trekked to Delhi in search of a ticket, or the urban elite,

'PM Has a Positive Approach Towards Women'

Najma Heptullah told SUNDAY

The grand-niece of Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Najma Heptullah,MP, was in the news when she was nominated the deputy chairman of the Rajya Sabha. Interestingly, Najma Heptullah is from Bhopal which was once ruled by women for four generations. She completed her doctorate in zoology at the age of 23 and was a member of the committee set up for the International Women's Year in 1975. Politics came naturally to her, and once in Parliament in 1980 she had a powerful platform from where to express her views. Now, as deputy chairman of the Upper House, she plans to voice her demands for development of Indian women.

Q: With your varied experience of women's welfare,how would you view the plight of Indian women?*

A: A very healthy trend exists in the country today. During Mrs Gandhi's time there was tremendous effort to uplift the cause of women. The same attention has been transmitted to Rajivji and he has been able to inplement his ideas in a better form by giving a larger representation to women in the elections and is going to do the same thing in the Assembly elections. Never before in the history of Indian Parliament have there been so may women in the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha, as this time.

Q: What impact have the recent statements made by the Prime Minister had on the status of women?

A: With his announcement about women being given free education, I think my own views have been put into actuality. I was lucky because I got higher education. My grandmother (Maulana Azad's sister) was the inspector of a women's school 50 years ago. But all women are not so lucky. Especially the rural women who I feel should also get education and employment.

Q: What steps should the government take now to implement its plans in this regard?

A: I congratulate the Prime Minister for the great step he has taken within a few days of his election. Another thing which I am really happy about is his formation of a separate ministry and more so, giving it in the charge of a woman, who I am sure will go deep into the problems of women. I am glad that she (the minister) has already organised a meeting of all women MPs regardless of their party affiliations, to make them into one party as far as their problems are concerned. This step was taken above party politics and individual problems of women in each state were discussed. Now what we have to decide is how best we can utilise our national resources like education, social welfare, exployment for the entire country and how to prepare our womenfolk to start thinking in a modern fashion. Being a science student I strongly feel a modern and scientific outlook in life should be formulated in the minds of women.

Q: Do you think other women MPs propose to use Parliament as a platform to voice your demands?

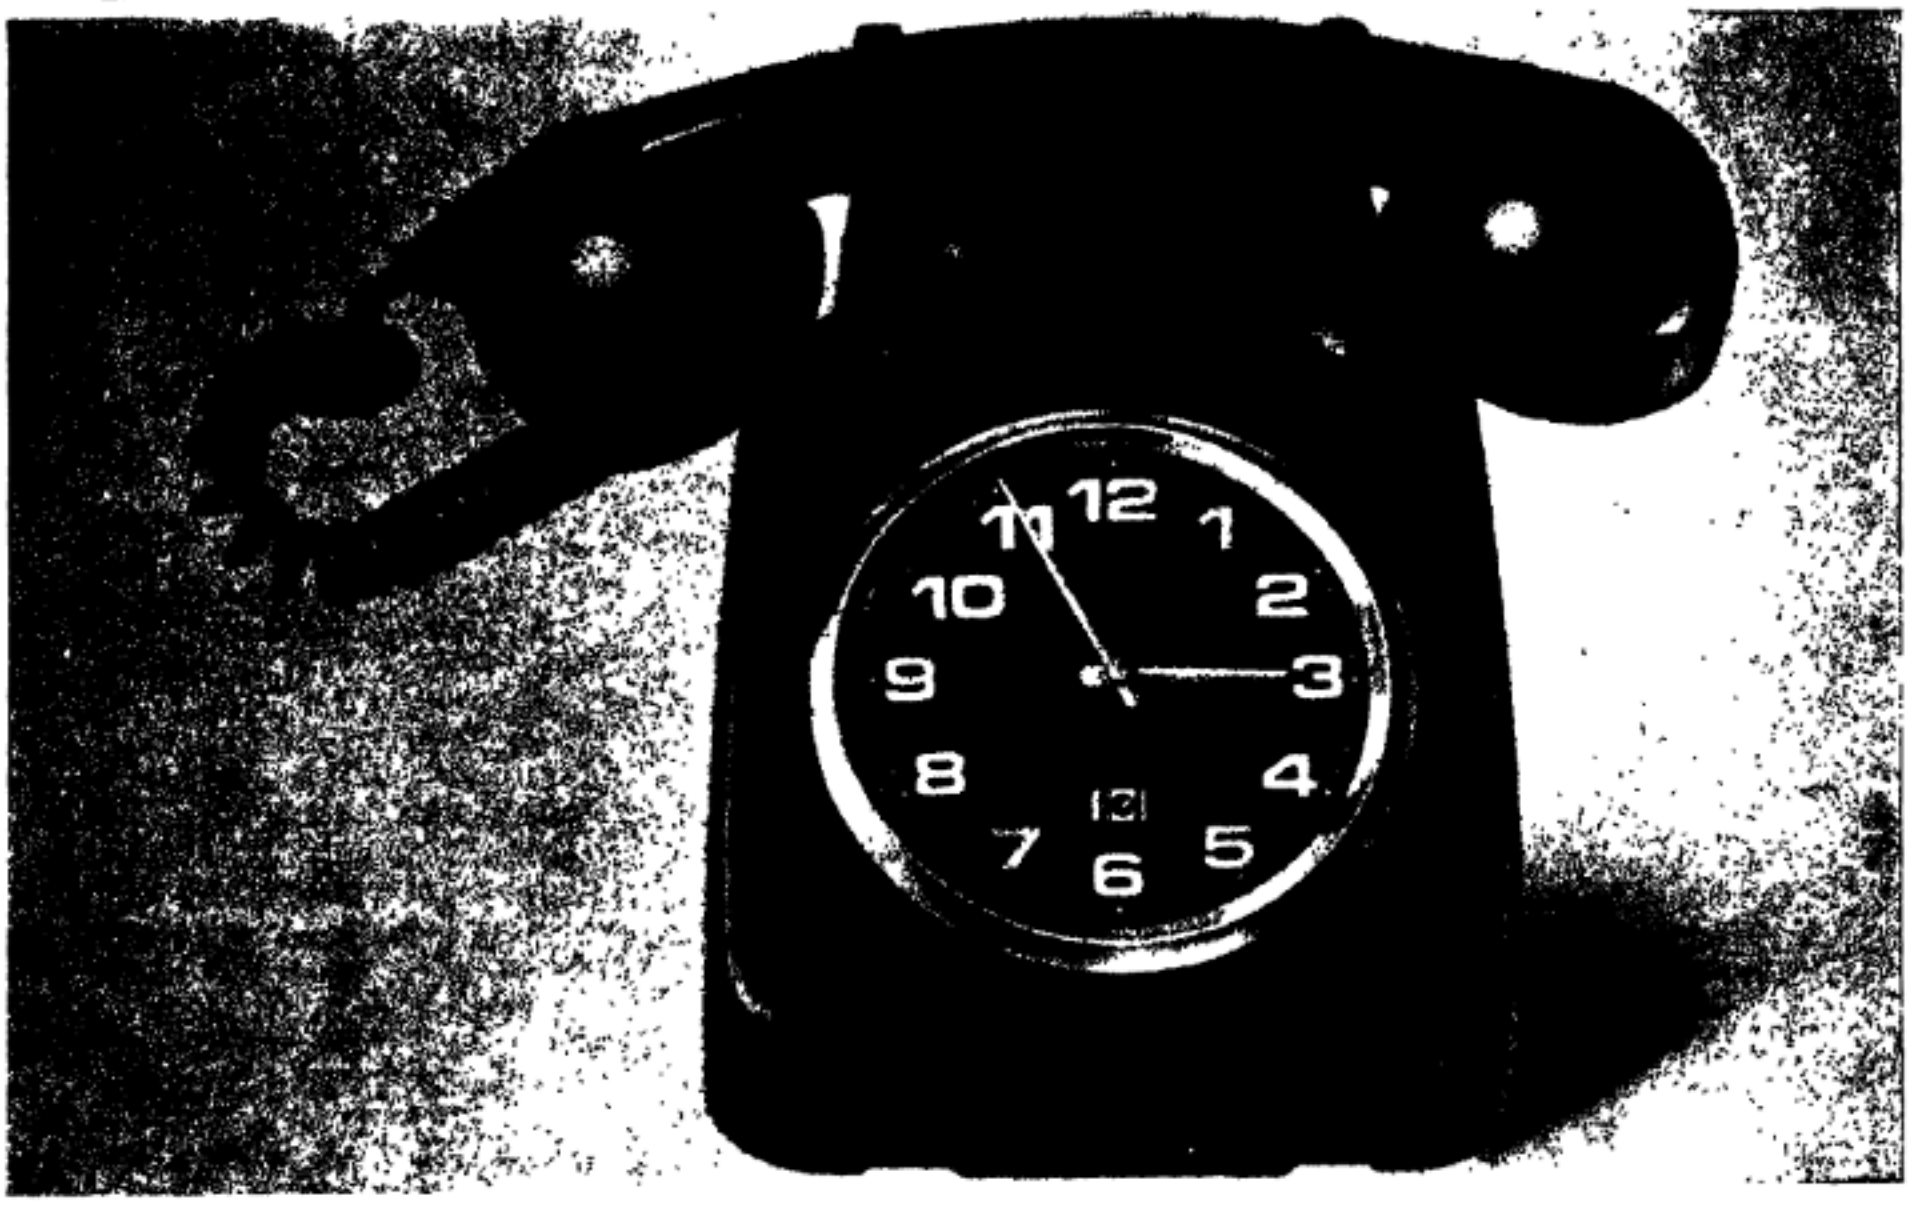
A: We have a lot of work to do. All the information we have collected will be computed and compiled. We want to form an overall policy with the approval of Mr Rajiv Gandhi. I think the steps he has already taken are not steps but a giant leap for women. Free education is the basic thing. Once Indian women are educated and play a more significant role in politics, then the country as a whole can progress.

Rajivji has kept his promise to the country and has a very positive approach towards women. But now it is up to each woman herself to act according to her role as a housewife, worker or politician to fulfil her responsibilities towards the country. Women from all castes and creeds should realise this and make use of the great opportunity Mr Rajiv Gandhi has placed before us.

Interviewed by Ritu Sarin

women obviously believe that it is time for them to enter politics. Undoubtedly, a large number of women will presently sit in the Assemblies throughout the country. The crucial question which emerges is: Will they make a qualitative difference to public life in this country? Social problems have generally been neglected in Parliament and in the Legislative Assemblies and it seems that women have generally not been the keenest or persistent exponents of women's causes, but with the influx of women in politics, a large number of them social workers, Parliament might concern itself with the more basic and human problems. The bill on dowry, for instance, took a long time to be passed and even then the amendments to it were not good enough for most of the women's groups. Similarly, bills on social legislation have gathered more dust than interest in Parliament.

Women are more keenly aware of prices, of the drastic fall in human values, of the progressive deterioration of the quality of life. Simply put,



Jagdish Yadav

Vyjayanthimala

women might give a more human touch to Parliament. The women in the eighth Lok Sabha are educated and articulate, many of them with long years of social work behind them. Most of them, unlike the older generation of women, are not profes sional politicians. The earlier generation comprised those who entered politics through the freedom movement but the new generation is made up of politicians who have other professions. There are actresses, doctors, social workers, teachers and academics, although it must be said that many of them entered politics on the bahu-beti-biwi (daughter-in-law, daughter, wife) bandwagon. For instance, the bahus of Lokepati Tripathi and Uma Sankar Dixit: chandra Tripathi and Shiela Dixit, respectively; the wives of the chief ministers of Orissa and Bihar: Jayanti Patnaik and Manorama Singh; Kishori Sinha is the wife of Bihar

When service has come to mean– prompt action, no delays and 'on call round-the-clock'...

What is India Pistons doing about this change?

India Pistons is working hard on this objective Appointing more service engineers and sales representatives to strengthen the field operations

India Pistons' service has improved and has become better than ever Both customer service and technical service have been updated and streamlined . to provide prompt action, no delays and service round-the-clock.

Infact India Pistons today has developed a new assurance in .. answering customer queries, solving customer problems and orienting itself totally to customer service.

India Pistons–
responding to the changing environment

MAC/IP/1014

INDIA PISTONS LIMITED, MADRAS.

'Rajiv Gandhi Owes His Success to Women'

Roda Mistry, MP, told SUNDAY

Essentially a welfare officer, Mrs Roda Mistry, MP, calls herself an "accidental politician." After working for the Congress actively for over 20 years, she joined the opposition in January 1984. She continues to be the All India President of the Indian Council of Social Welfare. For two decades she has fought for the cause of rural women. She left the Congress "because I was frustrated and could not get things done." Now she plans to continue her crusade against oppression of women from the floor of the House.

Q: The Prime Minister has recently announced that the government will take up the cause of women on a priority basis and there is also a special ministry set up for women welfare. How will this help the cause of women in future?*

A: That is all very well. But the fact remains that the number of women who have won acclaim and who are in the forefront, can be counted on your fingertips. This Parliament has now so many women MPs. This time of course God has been very kind to women and the figure has gone up one-and-a-half times (and it is expected to go higher in the byelections). But I am not happy with this. Why are we making such an issue of something which should have come naturally to us?

Q: In the elections, it was seen that the overwhelming support of the women electorate to the Congress(I) was largely instrumental in its victory. What do the women now expect of the government and the Prime Minister?

A: That is very true. Mr Gandhi owes his success totally to the women and the youngsters. During the campaign when I was touring the BJP strongholds all the women were in favour of the Congress(I) because they thought Rajiv Gandhi looked very handsome! Now, I am told by the Congress party MPs that he is trying his best to fulfil his promises made to women. Even in the allocation of tickets for the Assembly seats, he wants to give a generous quota to women. He has renamed the ministry as the ministry of social and women welfare. In fact, when I met Mrs Chandrashekhar, the minister, during the first meeting of the ministry, I told her I was very happy that the government of India has at last woken up. But I also pointed out that in Andhra Pradesh, Tamil Nadu and Karnataka we have had such a department since the last two decades. In 1978 I had toured the entire country demanding such a department but only Karnataka agreed to implement my suggestion.

Q: As the Prime Minister who has won with a historic mandate, what steps should Mr Rajiv Gandhi take so that women can play a more crucial role in national policies?

A: I will only repeat what I have said for years. The best thing that the Prime Minister can do for the women is give them the right to work. We have done so many things for women which have proved to be a failure. All the unattached women should be given a job by the government by right. Or, they should be given unemployment relief. Now the Prime Minister has said that he will give free education to all women. These are things that make us very happy, but will he be able to achieve this? There are so many things Mr Gandhi has said and we are watching his performance, but I doubt if he will be able to fulfil all his promises.

Q: Do you then foresee a dim future for India women?

A: No. I am sure the changes will be substantial but I am afraid only of one thing. The government should be able to give certain facilities to them. What upsets me is the stubborness of the government. For example, in the Legal Aid Cell, we had to force the Lt-Governer to appoint a lady officer. They have named the cell as anti-dowry cell. I have been screaming since two years that it should be renamed as atrocities against women! But this has not been done. This shows what facilities the government can provide women. What is the point of setting up a cell which cannot handle cases of all atrocities against women. How and whom can we convince about such things? I sincerely hope that Rajiv Gandhi can make the required changes and expedite such projects.

Interviewed by Ritu Sarin

leader Satyendra Narayan Sinha, Dr Sumati Oraon, widow of the tribal leader, Kartik Oraon, Begum Abida Ahmed, Usha Verma, Premilatai Chavan and many others.

Many of these women appear to be efficient and practical. Shiela Dixit (45), who was elected from Kanauj and is an MA in history has been informally involved in politics since 1969, when her father-in-law, Uma Shankar Dixit (the present Governor of West Bengal), fell ill and she had to help him. Social work is her mainstay and she intends to continue it. She is interested in health programmes, especially the health of women, who are generally neglected or expected to suffer in silence. She feels that a Parliament with more younger people and more women has a "more 21st century look." Mrs Dixit, who is married to an IAS officer, also has a no-nonsense air about her. She appears to take the ticket-seekers touching her feet in this season of ticket hunters in her stride and tackles people in a firm and decisive manner.

Rajendra Kumari Bajpai

Ashok Kr. Verma

The youngest woman member of Parliament is Dr Mamata Banerjee (27), who has already become famous for having defeated the CPI(M) leader Somnath Chatterjee in the Jadavpur constituency near Calcutta, a Marxist stronghold.

Actress Vyjayanthimala is, of course, the most visible among the new women MPs and has been seen speaking in Parliament quite often.

Whether the women MPs form a lobby within Parliament to espouse the cause of women is not certain. Traditionally, the women have kept

'The Government Has Never Discouraged Women'

Kiran Bedi told SUNDAY

Mrs Kiran Bedi was the first Indian woman to join the IPS in 1972. She was the deputy commissioner of police (DCP) Delhi, and later the DCP (traffic). She faced a major challenge while handling traffic arrangements for the Ninth Asian Games held in the capital and the Commonwealth Conference in Goa. In 1978, she was awarded the police gallantry award and nominated the woman of the year in 1980 by the Jawaharlal Nehru Foundation. Presently she is the deputy director of the Industrial Contingency Board. She was frank and candid while talking to SUNDAY. Excerpts:

Q: What role do you see for Indian women today?

A: I foresee a very equal role though it is far from equal. If you see the mandate which has brought this government to power, it (has been possible because of) the youth and women. So when women have played such a crucial and instrumental role in voting the Congress to power, there is no reason why the women should not take an active role in shaping the destiny of the country.

CNS

Kiran Bedi

Q: What do you think of the recent steps taken by the Prime Minister and accordingly announced in Parliament for the upliftment of women?

A: The step has raised a very optimistic and positive hope in our minds. As women we are very hopeful by nature, and the declarations made by the Prime Minister show a very clear and determined mind and also that he means to do something positive for the welfare of women. The most important step taken by him is creating a welfare ministry exclusively for women. But it is only the results which will fulfil them or shatter hopes.

Q. In the police set-up what changes can be brought about by the government to ensure that women play a more active role in the profession?

A: I'm afraid women have yet to make a breakthrough in this field, since they constitute a very small percentage in the Indian police. Women have a very important role to play not only in the IPS, but also at the police station level where ordinary, uneducated, rural women come to report. The presence of a woman in a police station is important so that the female complainant can pour out her grievances to the reporting officer. I feel at least if we have women duty officers in metropolitan cities, it would go a long way in encouraging women to report their plight without hesitation. These proposals are with the government but awaiting sanction. It should, in fact, be made mandatory to have women duty officers. This can wipe away a common grouse of thousands with one stroke.

Q: Do you think the speed of development of women will be accelerated in years to come?

A: The speed will be much faster as can be seen by the initial steps taken by the Prime Minister, but the cause will have to be the women themselves. The government has never discouraged women from coming into the limelight but Mr Rajiv Gandhi has a very unique opportunity before him to help the cause of women. One important factor is that he is a man: Mrs Gandhi as a woman, doing something for women may have seemed chauvinistic. As a man, Rajiv Gandhi has a plus factor. If he does something for women he is only fulfilling his duties as Prime Minister, and will be seen as a large-hearted man who wants to do something for the oppressed sex.

Interviewed by Ritu Sarin

themselves away from joining such pressure groups. But it does seem that they intend to get down to business. Ten days after Parliament opened, the minister for women's development and social welfare, called a meeting of women MPs to discuss issues relating to women. Some of the measures which will be taken up include a bill for interim maintenance for women seeking divorce. The bill has already been introduced. An anti-dowry bill which envisages educational opportunities for women and jobs is another. Other measures being considered are health cards for prostitutes and the abolition of the practice of devadasis.

The Mahila Congress which was made a frontal organisation of the Congress(I)—in a manner similar to which the Youth Congress was in the mid-Seventies—has emerged as a recruiting ground for future MPs and MLAs. The realisation of the fact that the women had voted in such large numbers for the ruling party in the last Lok Sabha elections, has led to women being given a greater role in the coming Assembly polls. While the Parliamentary Board had in its guidelines suggested that 20 per cent of the seats be given to women, the Mahila Congress, the women's cell of the All India Congress Committee has only been able to recommend 400 women candidates to the Board.

Gandhiji brought women out of their homes during the struggle for independence. Jawaharlal Nehru followed in the same vein to some extent. The new Prime Minister appears to want women to become a "real" political force. One of the major reasons for this step is that women could bring about change more quickly, especially in the sensitive and often politically costly task of family planning. Women could also bring more and more women out of the homes and translate their increasingly visible power to the benefit of the ruling party.

The cynics might say that Rajiv Gandhi brought in the women because of the growing importance of women as an independent and important votebank They could be partially right. But women, and this men in Parliament concede, are prone to be less corrupt, more hard working, meticulous, with an eye for detail and loyal. The women in Rajiv Gandhi's politics are certainly going to change the style and tempo of Parliament. Perhaps, the first step has already been taken: A women's election manifesto has already been prepared by 150 non-political women's organisations of Gujarat

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

It's a hard day's night
I've been walkin' the town
Makin' a living
And I'm feelin' down
I've been on the move
'Cos I got money to make
But after it's all over
A man needs a break
So here's to the good times
It's gotta be said
I'm ready for a Royal
I'm lookin' for the Red

Yeah, I'm lookin' for the Red

WHEN YOU'RE LOOKIN' FOR A LIFT

ROYAL

Moments of happiness...

moments for
Regent King

REGENT
KING

A happy blend of taste & freshness

STATUTORY WARNING: CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

BAWSM/185 A

The Woman in Rajiv Gandhi's Life

It was initially a tale of three women and a man. There was Rajiv Rattan Gandhi in the centre. On his side, in front, was his mother Indira Gandhi. Behind him, his wife Sonia Gandhi. On his other side, was his choti bhabi, Menaka Gandhi. It was a picture of a happy family. But the horrible afternoon of 31 October 1984 changed all that: Indira Gandhi had gone and Menaka Gandhi had moved out into the arena of opposition politics.

From then on there has only been one woman in the life of Rajiv Gandhi: his wife, Sonia. Sonia Gandhi, said to be an intensely private person (interviews are taboo) has preferred to remain behind the curtains of 1 Safdarjang Road. But she has had to step into the limelight, albeit reluctantly, and until now behind very dark glasses. January saw the Prime Minister's wife hazard into the territory of photographers. There was the Republic Day parade, the folk dances, the official visit of the King of Bhutan, the banquets given by the President and her husband, the Prime Minister, for the heads of state who had come to Delhi for the one-day summit on nuclear disarmament.

The public life of Sonia Gandhi had begun. It is being said that the Prime Minister's wife might set up a secretariat to help her in her public duties. After all, Nancy Reagan has one, as have the wives of many world leaders. Rajeshwari Tandon who has been appointed as social secretary in the PM's office (Usha Bhagat resigned shortly after Mrs Gandhi was assassinated), might lend a helping hand. The duties of a PM's wife would involve, in addition to playing hostess, considerable amount of correspondence and, of course, inaugurating various functions. However, at present, Sonia Gandhi is busy setting up house in the PM's new residence on Race Course Road.

What kind of person is the PM's Italian-born wife? A very private person, her whole world centres on her husband and their two children, Priyanka and Rahul, who have since 31 October not gone to school. Says a friend: "She loves her family but her husband is her life. You should see that when one of them walks into a room, the way the face of the other lights up..."

Rajiv Gandhi with Sonia Gandhi at the Asiad: supportive role

The house is the centre of the universe and the kitchen a very important part of this universe. Sonia Gandhi loves to cook. She has mastered the art of Kashmiri cuisine, but the pastas and the lasagnas are not neglected either. Good bread is one of the weaknesses of the Gandhi household. In more carefree times, when their circle of friends was larger and not under the supervision of the security men, she would often make special dishes and take them to friends' houses for dinner.

Sonia Gandhi has another duty now. With Indira Gandhi no longer there, she is the one to be concerned with the larger Nehru family. When last month, the Jawaharlal Nehru award for International Understanding had to be given, it was Sonia Gandhi who made frantic phone calls to trace the various members of the Nehru family and invite them for the function. She shares with her mother-in-law an eye for detail and the ability to remember the smallest of facts. Says another friend: "She is so considerate. She will remember to send a particular kind of heeng (a kind of spice) to a Kashmiri relative, or what there was for dinner when so and so came many years ago."

Languages interest the PM's wife. She speaks Russian, French, Portuguese, Spanish, English, Hindi and, of course, her mother tongue, Italian. In fact, it was while learning English at the School of Languages in Cambridge that she met Rajiv Gandhi. Art is another love. She learned restoration of paintings at the National Gallery of Modern Art. Music, especially opera, interests her a great deal.

Sonia Gandhi's shyness notwithstanding, she has played an important role behind the scenes in her husband's political life, though by and large over the telephone. She may, as her friends say, have been reluctant to let her husband enter politics, but once he decided, she played the ideal supportive role. For two years, upto the elections she went to Amethi for three days every month to visit the villages and distribute medicine. Her Italian-oriented Hindi went down well with the villagers. "Bahu rani, do not come here, we will vote for you anyway," they told her. And, they did.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

'A Country Cannot Forge Ahead Without Women'

Mohsina Kidwai told SUNDAY

While India has had a woman at the helm for 16 years, women ministers have rarely been given cabinet rank. Mohsina Kidwai in Rajiv Gandhi's new-look cabinet is the third woman in India to have been made a cabinet minister: Raj Kumari Amrit Kaur in the Fifties and Indira Gandhi in the Sixties were the other two. Ironically enough, a woman Prime Minister did not have any woman minister—other than herself—with cabinet rank. The soft-spoken, union minister for health and family welfare is greatly respected—even by her own colleagues—because she has made it the hard way up the slippery political ladder. She entered politics in 1960 through one of the small doors: she was elected to a local body and was later made a member of the Upper House in Uttar Pradesh. Elected to the Vidhan Sabha in 1974 from the Barabanki Assembly constituency, Mrs Kidwai became well-known nationally in 1978 when she won the Azamgarh Lok Sabha seat on a Congress ticket. She became the first person from Mrs Gandhi's freshly-split party to make a comeback after the staggering 1977 defeat when the Congress lost all 85 seats in Uttar Pradesh. Mrs Kidwai was president of the Uttar Pradesh Congress Committee (UPCC) for a brief period. On Mrs Gandhi's return to power in 1980, she was given a berth in the labour ministry, from which she moved on to the ministry of health. Later, she was made minister of state with independent charge in the ministry of rural development.

In the 1984 Lok Sabha elections, Mrs Kidwai won from the parliamentary constituency of Meerut. Fighting for the cause of women, Mrs Kidwai intends to improve the condition of women, both through legislation and through greater participation of voluntary organisations.

PM campaigning for Usha Rani Tomar, Congress(I) candidate from Aligarh

Q: I believe that you called a meeting of all women members of Parliament including opposition MPs. This must be the first time such a meeting has taken place.*

A: Yes, I called the women MPs and I must say that the response was good, even from the opposition. I wanted to seek their help in increasing the people's participation in matters of health and family planning. All of them showed a genuine concern about the population growth: they saw it as a national problem.

Q: Did you face any discrimination as a woman, either from your family or society as such in your political career?

A: I faced no discrimination at all. My mother's brother, Shafiqur Rehman Kidwai, the first education minister in UP, was part of the Khilafat movement. We belonged to the zamindar class, but we revolted during the freedom movement. My father-in-law, Jamiur Rehman Kidwai, encouraged me to enter politics In fact, when he fell ill in 1960, people said that only a member of our family could become a member of the Legislative Council from Barabanki. That is how I came into politics.

Q: Why is it generally only the bahus (daughters-in-law) or the betis (daughters) who are the ones to enter politics?

A: My joining politics as a bahu was just by way of an introduction. After all, I could not have continued for so long on the basis of being a bahu. My father-in-law could just as easily have asked one of his sons to enter politics instead of me.

Q: Wasn't the fact, that you as a Muslim were entering the political world, an enormously big step?

A: My family were good Muslims, but they were progressive. We were never compelled to stay indoors, there was no bandish (obstacle) to our going out. My father-in-law worked for the upliftment of women and I was a social worker. I think I am still primarily a social worker and (continue to be) absorbed in this. It is to the great credit of our leaders that they did not want 50 per cent of the population of the country, women that is, to get left behind. A country cannot go ahead without women. It was very difficult at that time: mothers-in-law at home did not always approve, neither did many husbands...Those were difficult times. There were some women who delivered their babies in jail.

Q: With 42 women members in the Lok Sabha, will there be a qualitative change in Parliament and in public life?

A: The present Prime Minister wants a change. He wants respected, devoted and dedicated parliamentarians. There is a lot of work to be done and a lot of changes are to come. We have to get ready to step into the 21st century.

Q: Will the separate ministry, which the Prime Minister has created for women's affairs, really help the cause of women?

A: This step shows the Prime Minister's keenness for the upliftment of women. He has also emphasised the need for women to be educated, to be freed from the bonds of illiteracy. Mahatma Gandhi used to say that if you teach a woman, the entire family is taught. The move to de-link degrees from jobs also shows the PM's intentions. A new ministry is important because it also involves an increase in the budget. Mrs Gandhi talked about drastic changes. The changes are now taking place.

Q What are the priorities?

A: The first is education. This should be done not only through books. Education should inculcate a certain amount of broad-mindedness. Today mothers-in-law trouble their daughters-in-law for dowries. There are so many atrocities (committed) on women.

Women must speak up. In my own ministry the most important task is concerned with population growth. From two or three children, the thrust (now) is on two children. But coercion or shakti (being tough) will not help, only education will. We have to explain how important family planning is for the family.

Q: Would you say that women are the main motor of social change in India?

A: Yes, women are the motor of social change. Whenever there have been great changes, the youth and women have been responsible. During the time of the British, when Gandhiji said that nobody should wear clothes made outside the country—and you know how fond women are of clothes and jewellery—women were the first to make a bonfire of the pardesi (foreign) clothes. When Jawaharlal Nehru made an appeal for help during the 1962 war with China, women happily gave their jewellery.

Q: What measures would you advocate for women?

A: Working girls should be looked after. I feel that society as a whole should respect women and not look at them with a buri nazar. We work shoulder to shoulder with men. This attitude of theirs, the way they consider women should change...Our films with all the sex and violence feed this unhealthy attitude.

Q: Are women coming forward to contest in the Assembly elections?

A: There has been an awakening among women; they have recognised their rights. 38 per cent of women in the rural areas did not know anything earlier. During its Bangalore meeting, the Mahila Congress asked Mr Rajiv Gandhi to ensure that 20 per cent of the Assembly seats be given to women. This might be a little high for the time being but we should definitely get 15 per cent (of the seats).

Q: The Prime Minister's guidelines for choosing recipients of tickets for the Assembly elections are quite novel: scientists, doctors, educated people, youth, women, ex-servicemen are unusual. Is it the beginning of a new era?

Women should concentrate on human problems...They should go out and tell villagers about the need for education...Child marriages ought to be stopped. A girl gets married at the age of 12 and is a mother by 13, while she is still a child. Legislation cannot really solve social problems. Society has to change; sati was so cruel, but society did not accept it. This should also happen with dowry.

A: There is always a nava zamana (new era). But I would like to emphasise the fact that a woman has in her all the qualities of a good social worker: honesty, truthfulness, mamta (maternal feelings) and decisiveness. A woman can deliver the goods. Look at it this way: it is she who has to decide what is to be cooked, which school to send the children to, get the house cleaned and look after its maintenance...There are a hundred decisions to take in the house every day.

Q: To return to your personal life for a moment. Was it not difficult to incorporate political duties with your duties at home and as a mother?

A: I have three daughters, two of whom are married and a 15-year-old with me. And I am a proud grandmother. But you see I was lucky. My father-in-law protected me. I could not have managed without my husband's cooperation. My parents-in-law put me into politics and they looked after my children.

Q: Will there be a change in the approach to family planning? It has been a sensitive subject thus far because election speeches do not mention it.

A: I think that men should also be trained. Laproscopy appears to be quite simple and easy. I would not only like to emphasise the government programmes. Voluntary organisations should be brought in. I believe it should be done for the people and by the people—family planning is a way of life. Private practitioners should also be involved in family planning.

Q: Isn't politics a dirty game?

A: If you are clean yourself, there is no dirty game. You have to decide what you want to do and achieve it. This Anti-Defection Bill is a good thing. It will put an end to this daily badnami and restore democracy.

Q: What is expected of the new lot in Parliament?

A: Sincerity, hard work. Women should concentrate on human problems—on the problems of the women and the poor. They should go out and tell villagers about the need for education. I think child marriage ought to be stopped. A girl gets married at the age of 12 and is a mother by 13, while she is still a child. Legislation cannot really solve social problems. Society has to change; sati was so cruel, but finally society did not accept it and it (was) finished. This should also happen with dowry. Dowry is a complex phenomenon: it is an economic problem. People want a high standard of life, easy money. Girls are, therefore, given an inferiority complex.

As I said earlier, education is the crux of the matter and the most important age is the pre-primary when the stamp is put on the child's mind. We should have good trained teachers who know something about child psychology.

Q: So, you would say that the presence of so many women in Parliament will make it a softer, more human place.

A: Yes...it will.

Interviewed by Madhu Jain

'Women are Equal Partners in Nation Building'

Margaret Alva, minister of state for parliamentary affairs, told SUNDAY

In her early Forties, Margaret Alva, minister of state for parliamentary affairs, is a leading woman member of the Congress(I). Founder-convenor of the Mahila Congress, the party's womens' wing, Mrs Alva has been a prominent leader since the early Seventies, when she was made a joint secretary of the AICC. She left Mrs Indira Gandhi's party in 1979, became a leading opposition member in the Rajya Sabha, and rejoined the party in 1983. She is an active housewife besides being a leader: our correspondent found her helping her with her child's homework when he went to interview her.

Q: You are a successful woman politician, having become a minister. Your mother-in-law, Mrs Violet Alva, too was a leading woman politician in her times. Have you ever faced any discrimination or obstruction from men in politics?

A: You see I think it is a question of attitudes. For instance, there are many who believe that being a minority is a handicap. But as Christians, we have always come into Parliament with the support of the majority community. Whether it is the Rajya Sabha or in the local elections, I have never felt that I was different from the rest: I just fitted in. So also I have found as a woman. It is true that probably one has to fight a little more and may be some of us appear to be a little more aggressive than we should be, that is because you always feel that you have got to prove that you can do something, that you are as good as the men or generally better than them if you are to be accepted. So, in that sense, it is a tough battle every woman fights. But I must say that nobody has ever held it against me in any field that I am a woman—whether while I am speaking on a public platform or while being member of committees—I have always foundthatone has been appreciated if you are prepared to do the job or if you are capable of doing it. But I don't think any woman in politics can be pushed out or not be allowed to do something. But the point is that one should not expect to get something just because you are a woman. That would be reverse discrimination. There are some who believe that because women must be given representation, whether you are fit or not whether you can do the job or not, you must get it because you are a woman, I think that is also unfair.

Q: There is a new thrust on women in the government's policies. What is the reason for this?

A: I think the party has gratefully acknowledged the role that the woman voter played in the recent elections. The massive mandate which the Congress(I) received was in a large way due to the votes of the women. Besides that, I think even in the party, the Mahila Congress had played a very big role in the last one year and particularly in the recent elections in mobilising voters for the party. I think it was very gracious of the Prime Minister that in one of the first statements after the victory, speaking in Delhi, he thanked the women voters for the support which they extended to the party. I think it was but natural that he kept the women of India in mind while formulating the policies of the new government. The first thing he did was the setting up of the separate ministry for women and social welfare. We did have emphasis on women's programme before, but now there is a ministry with a woman minister, that too a senior person like Mrs Margatham Chandrashekhar, member of the Congress Parliamentary Board, with a long innings in politics. This shows that the Prime Minister wants something to emerge, something concrete to come from this new ministry Even in the President's address to the joint session of Parliament, a special mention was made about a new approach to women's problems and the President announced the scheme for free education for girls upto the high school level. This I think is a very welcome step in the right direction. Women have never lagged behind in their desire to do something, but I think education and training for the Indian woman is a prime necessity if they have to play their role as equal partners in nation building.

The Congress(I) has gratefully acknowledged the role that the woman voter played in the recent elections. The massive mandate which the party received was in a large way due to the votes of the women. Besides that, I think that even in the party, the Mahila Congress had played a very big role.

Q: You were the founder-convener of the Mahila Congress and still occupy this organisational post. Why was the Mahila Congress formed, earlier only a cell in the AICCdealt with women...

A: Well, there were some who sarcastically said that it was only an election gimmick and that once the elections are over we would be forgotten. But I must say that ever since Rajivji took over as the general secretary of the party, he was very particular about revitalising the front organisations While women did constitute a very large part of the membership as well as the support base of the party, women were just pushed into what used to be called the women's wing, or the women's front or the women's cell—it was variously known in the different states—which really did not enjoy an independent or autonomous status. When Rajivji came, he said if the youth had been given so much of freedom to act and so much scope for initiative, then why shouldn't the women get it also?

It is very significant that in the eve of the centenary year of the Congress the women got an independent headquarters in Delhi as the national headquarters of the Mahila Congress. We were given all the necessary facilities: we were consulted on the question of selection of women candidates for the Lok Sabha elections. Now, for the first time, state conveners of the Mahila Congress are members of the state election committees, which gives them the right to select women candidates in the states. In the past, the selection of women was left entirely to the men. It is basically Rajivji's approach. He said that unless you get the women involved and allow them to feel that they have some sort of status, and some kind of stake in organising and mobiling, the women will not be able to really contribute their best. Now the Mahila Congress has an independent constitution. That in itself has given the women more self-confidence and the desire to do something. Of the 38 women put up by the party in the recent elections, apart from two in Andhra Pradesh, all have won. Now we have the largest number of women in the history of the Lok Sabha.

Q: What is the criterion for giving tickets to women candidates?

A: You cannot eliminate any one section and bring in someone else. But I would say one thing. For instance, when women candidates were discussed, there were many who said that Mahila Congress should be discussed, there were many who said that the Mahila Congress should take the seats where there were no sitting members of the party, which meant we should take all the seats where the party had lost in the last elections. So we said that the women cannot be expected to take only those seats which had gone to the opposition for one reason or the other. So far, women have been given tickets not only because they are members of the women's wing, but because they have been recommended by either the chief minister or the PCC president. Now we are insisting that if you want to build women's organisation in the party, then tickets have to be given to party functionaries, (and to) the women who have given time and energy to the party. And in that sense, the trend really is changing now As far as your question about the criterion is concerned, we would certainly want the young and the experienced. We cannot go on with the same faces for ever. But we would also think of bringing women from the reserved constituencies. Men normally corner the reserved seats for the scheduled castes and the scheduled tribes: we want women also to be nominated from these constituencies. Besides, we are getting many educated, professional women who want to contest the elections. So, I think the composition would be quite a mixed bag: age, rural, urban communities to be represented. In fact, this time we are trying to push the idea that we should have one seat per parliamentary constituency to be contested by

No woman can be successful in politics without the support of her husband. From the beginning if I have been able to do anything outside the house it has been because I have a very understanding, encouraging and patient husband. But with the children I had to give up a lot of things which I would have enjoyed doing...

women. If this is done, we would have, apart from the district convener of the Mahila Congress, perhaps, also the local MLA to build up the nucleus for the organisation at the district level.

Q: Talking of professional women, you yourself are a lawyer. Have you taken up any women's cases in the court?

A: Yes, I have always felt most involved in issues which concerned women. Or, where the question of constitutional rights were involved. My husband and I fought the air hostesses case which went to the Supreme Court—the female cabin crew of the Indian Airlines felt that they were being discriminated against purely on the basis of sex. They knocked on many doors, but even the unions were not prepared to help them, because they were also male-dominated. So, finally on my advice they agreed to go to the Supreme Court. I would not say that we got a 100 per cent victory, because we were asking for parity in all service conditions, including retirement age, with the male staff, who go on working till the age of 55 or even upto 58 years, whereas the female staff had to retire at 30 years or with great difficulty, extended upto 35 years. But now it has been accepted that the women can work till they are 45 years old. Earlier, the air hostesses were not allowed to marry, or even if with permission they married, they were barred from becoming mothers. And even if they did not marry and did not have children, they still had to get out at 35 years. So, all this has gone now, they can marry, have children and not stop working at the age of 35 years. I have told them what we can do now is go to court again when you reach the age of 45 years and say that there is discrimination (LAUGHS) and, perhaps, win the right to work as long as men do.

Q: A last question and a personal one. I find that you are an active housewife apart from being an active politician. How do you reconcile the two roles?

A: I must say it's very difficult. I have four children and the youngest is just five-and-a-half. It's a real challenge. For one thing, you just don't really want to let somebody else take your role as mother. In fact, nobody else can take this role. So comes the question what you (have to) give up to make your presence at home felt, particularly the growing children. There have been times, particularly in 1980, when my youngest child was just three months old and my (Rajya Sabha) term was expiring that year. I said that I had enough of politics and I wouldn't contest the elections and concentrate at home. I was literally forced by my political colleagues that time to contest. For one thing, you realise that the children miss you when you are not at home and for another, for a politician there are no fixed hours (of work)—I give credit to my husband, no woman can be successful in politics without the support and patience of a husband. From the beginning if I have been able to do anything outside the house it has been because I have a very understanding, encouraging and patient husband. But with the children I had to give up a lot of things which I would have enjoyed doing, for instance, whether it be seeing movies, or going regularly to a club, and socialising. Even a simple thing like shopping, marketing, becomes a family affair. I take the children along, so that they can spend that time with me. It is not difficult for a working woman to organise her time. If you are working, you have to be organised.

Interviewed by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya

Did Women Vote Rajiv Gandhi to Power?

Yes, writes Ranjit Gupta, after analysing voting trends

On 24 December large number of women throughout the country turned out to vote in the elections. It was a big day for women. Even those from the less affluent classes put on their holiday best and queued up before the polling booths. Newspapers carried photographs of 90-year-old women being carried to polling stations to cast their votes. Adult franchise gave the lowest, the most down-trodden in the country the occasion to assert their rights.

A woman casts her vote in the Lok Sabha elections

But 1984 was a remarkable year in electoral history. The average turnout of voters in 1980 was 56 per cent. It had never been above 63 7 per cent for the last ten years But this year in West Bengal, for example, the turnout reached a record 69.01 per cent The countryside average was also higher than ever. In the three Calcutta constituencies—Calcutta North-East, Calcutta North-West and Calcutta South—and Jadavpur, the average of eligible voters was higher. The important point is that the women came out in record numbers. Take the case of Jadavpur, the Lok Sabha constituency in the south of the city. Jadavpur had been a dominant left political arena, till the recent polls. It was here that a comparatively unknown young woman, Dr Mamata Banerjee (a Ph.D. in history and a lecturer in the Jadavpur college) defeated the formidable CPI(M) candidate Somnath Chatterjee (an affluent barrister-at-law) by nearly 20,000 votes. The Jadavpur parliamentary constituency is not entirely urban: parts of it are rurban areas like Jadavpur, Mathurapur and Baruipur. These areas have for so long been dominated by the CPI(M) that they have come to be known as the Red Fort of the CPI(M). But the votes swung slowly but determinedly in these areas in favour of the Congress(I) Baruipur went to Mamata Banerjee as did Mathurapur. Only in Jadavpur proper, Somnath Chatterjee had a semi-marginal lead. In Behala, the tide started turning powerfully in Mamata Banerjee's favour. What was remarkable was that in Kabitirtha (the Kidderpur area), Muslim women came out in masses along with the men and voted for the Congress(I). Unprecedented things happened in the Red Fort areas too. Elderly women, who in the past had always voted left, led younger women voters to the polling stations. Judging by the results it can be presumed that the majority of them voted for the Congress(I) this time. This could be guessed from the earlier opinion polls, organised by the Telegraph (the English daily from Calcutta) in the middle of December 1984.

In the Telegraph-MODE opinion poll conducted in the Calcutta South constituency, 47 per cent of the people interviewed said they would vote for the Congress(I), 25 per cent said they would vote for the CPI(M) candidate, while the number of "can't say/won't say" was 22 per cent. Similarly in Calcutta North-East constituency, 49 per cent of those questioned for the survey said they would vote for the Congress(I); 26 per cent for the CPI(M) and 22 per cent remained non-committal. In the Jadavpur constituency, 44 per cent said they would vote for the CPI(M) candidate, 36 per cent for the Congress(I) and 17 per cent said they could not say/would not say who they would vote for. In the Calcutta North-West constituency, 62 per cent of those interviewed for the opinion poll said they would give their votes for the Congress(I), 15 per cent said they would vote for the Left Front (here a Forward Bloc) candidate, and 19 per cent remained non-committal.

Now from this non-committal percentage of the electorate, a shrewd man, even if he is not a psephologist can make a good guess: the majority of the "don't knows" would vote against the government. They do not speak out because of possible ruling party reaction. This correspondent spent most of his service life in the Congress regimes and just before the polls those days too "no commitment" meant a vote against the party in power. It was noted that slum women from the south-west and the south-east city constituencies also voted en masse for the Congress. Let us go back to the Muslim-dominated area of Kabitirtha. It is, in fact, a gigantic hovel of the urban proletariat The women of the Muslim poor are socially worse off than their sisters from other religions. That Mamata Banerjee was able to grab the votes of these female hewers of Ranjit Gupta is president of the Institute of Social Research and Applied Anthropology. The institute is presently testing voting trends in areas in Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and West Bengal wood and drawers of water was remarkable. It would not be surprising if the longshoremen husbands (and part-time smugglers) also were persuaded, by these underfed and sometimes physically tortured wives to follow their political path, while ordinarily it is the other way around

In West Bengal, the Left Front won in 26 seats, a setback result but not necessarily dispiriting. What may have caused widespread Leftist dismay is the aggregate total of the votes polled partywise: the Congress(I) 50.5 per cent, the CPI(M) 37.7 per cent; the RSP 3.7 per cent; the Forward Bloc 4.3 per cent and the CPI 3.9 per cent.

This unhappiness on the part of the Leftist leaders may have been enhanced by the fact that the Left Front was in power when the polls were held. The fact that large bodies of voters were left out of the list, creating pocket boroughs in many parts of the state cannot be ignored when other measures of winning votes were available. In consequence, the poll results may have conveyed to the ruling party's leaders that the mass of the voters have turned against them. They have, together as the Left Front, and separately as members of the constituent parties, tried to examine the causes of the voters' volte face. The CPI(M) conclusion has been that they have drifted away from the electorate, a truism which need not have been blared forth. The other parties with partial justification have blamed the major party—the CPI(M)—for their political arrogance and consequent electoral setback. In other parts of the country, for example, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and the Janata Party have blamed the Indira hawa; the only person who has expressed his complete bewilderment is Chaudhary Charan Singh. But then this gentleman has been in a state of bewilderment for years.

Rajiv Gandhi has himself tried to analyse the causes of the Congress avalanche. He has not been as simplistic as to attribute his victory to the "Indira hawa;" for a triumph like his could not have been caused by a hawa but only by a hurricane called "Indira." Rajiv Gandhi has regarded the verdict as a vote for a change and continuity. This is a good rationalising effort. He has also pointed out that a large percentage of the voters were below 40 years of age who wanted to vote for a young team of the hundred-year-old Congress. It has also been mentioned that the vote meant a support for stability and security, in ensuring which the Janata government of 1977 had not shown any particular skill. These are all true, but each in itself is inadequate to explain the high tide of support for the Congress. It may be argued that most analysts may have left out the major, but the overwhelming dominant factor that is the vote in cold fury by the women en masse for Indira Gandhi's Congress. It is something much more than "sympathy" for Rajiv Gandhi. We are aware that we do not have a system of proportional representation in the Parliament but direct representation, in which a plus or minus of five per cent votes can mean a victory or defeat. Therefore, if and when the women vote en masse for a certain party, a landslide victory for that party is assured.

Sujit Ghosh

Women waiting to vote

There were powerful reasons for such support from the women. As Indira Gandhi herself said before her death that the women in India were second class citizens. They are not much better off in many other countries, including those in the West, but in India their lot is particularly dismal. The only ethnic groups where the women are and have to be treated with respect are mainly the adivasis and the matriarchical communities and these too do merge in several cases. But elsewhere in India until the mid-nineteenth century, the woman used to be burnt on the funeral pyre of her dead husband as sati, for merit for herself, or for financial gain for the relatives. The female children, as potential non-earners, used to be killed. If this is not a general practice in many communities now, the arrival of a girl-infant causes dismay. For when she grows up she has to be married off, usually with a dowry. This pernicious system is widespread, and has even penetrated into the Muslim community. A Muslim has not merely the right to divorce his wife by word of mouth and ritual right to marry more than once; nowadays, instead of agreeing to den-meher in the marriage contract (as the alimony for possible future divorce), many Muslim young men have been known to demand dowry in cash and kind. In north India, in particular, a disagreement on dowry between the two parties has been known to cause "bride burning." The women workers get lower wages in the fields and factories. She, after feeding her growing children, and demanding husband, has the least to eat (a matter which has been demographically suggested). She is subjected to worse fates. She has been known to be the victim of physical torture by her husband, rape by men, and then to the ultimate act in torture: slaughter.

To these Indian women, Indira Nehru-Gandhi governing hundreds of millions of people, a ruler at whose bidding thousands sped, was a person of admiration and respect. Yet they sometimes voted against the Congress for some valid reasons. But when Indira Gandhi was slaughtered by two men who were paid to protect her, the Indian woman realised that Kamrunissa Khatun, Nilima Devi and Indira Gandhi were all sisters under the skies. Since then, there has grown in the minds of women a sense of identification with Mrs Gandhi and it is a feeling which has come to stay. Rajiv Gandhi will win many more victories and the opposition may take note of the feminine thinking. There have been defeats for the Congress in isolated pockets in the last elections but there were other major factors to neutralise the women's votes. Every woman cannot be Abhaya of Sarat Chandra Chatterjee or Chitrangada of Tagore or Lysistrata of Aristophanes. But she can at last combine with other women and vote Rajiv Gandhi to power. There are enough facts to support this contention.

CONVERSATION

"This Generation Has to Pay for Its Future"

Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh told M.J. Akbar

Finance minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh is perhaps the least self important chief of this vast and vital ministry that we have had in recent times. Without oozing any of that bogus Uriah Heep humility, he conveys an easy camraderie and approach characteristic of a man who does not need an office or a chair to define his worth and his ability. It was this self-confidence which prompted his resignation from the chief ministership of Uttar Pradesh—perhaps the second-most powerful political job in the country. Nor did he do so because he was forced to, which by itself is enough basis for entry into the Congress(I) hall of fame. The truth is that power has chased him rather than the other way round. Mrs Indira Gandhi was not too happy when he resigned, considering that he had the best image among the party chief ministers at that time. She later inducted him into the union ministry and gave him the sensitive commerce portfolio, safe in the knowledge that here was one minister who would survive a tenure in this ministry with his reputation safe. Mr Singh left government to take charge of his party's affairs and election campaign in Uttar Pradesh, his home state, when Mrs Gandhi was still Prime Minister.

And when Rajiv Gandhi formed his first true government, he showed he had even more faith in Mr Singh than his mother had. Pranab Mukherjee was dropped and Vishwanath Pratap Singh was made the new finance minister. Typically, within a short while of taking over, V.P. Singh had won praise from both ends of the political spectrum—Chaudhary Charan Singh on one side and Dr Ashok Mitra on the other. The first exclusive interview that the new finance minister gave was to M. J. Akbar. While, in view of the coming budget specific details could clearly not be either discussed or even mentioned, the interview provides a glimpse of the new finance minister's view of the economy, and the priorities that have been established in his thinking.

Q: Mr Finance Minister, you have been given an enormous responsibility to control and give shape to the economy of the Rajiv Gandhi era. First, what are the most serious problems which you have inherited? Second, what are the most serious problems which you foresee in the immediate future—both long and short term? And what ideas do you have to tackle them?

A: The first thing, of course, is that I don't think the finance minister controls the economy as such; he is a part of a general effort. Only his contribution is deeper. As far as the management of the economy is concerned, finance is just one part of it. But before discussing the economy, I would like to mention the parameters within which our economy is functioning: one, ours is a democratic set-up; two, it is a mixed economy; three, there are foreign exchange constraints; four, poverty is an economic reality. It is within these parameters that you have to make a response. You can find a brilliant economic solution, but it may not be conducive to political stability; a democratic set-up may not be able to absorb it.

V.P. Singh: 'Growth has been possible through democracy'

It is a remarkable feat of the political leadership in India that growth has been possible, through democracy, with half the population below the poverty line. We could raise resources from these people to finance and fund the development of India from the stage it was at independence till today, and yet retain the ballot box; to coax and persuade these people to contribute as well as have confidence is a very major political achievement. A democracy also generates hopes from the government that a certain minimum of development will take place. Growth, progress is essential for the success of democracy.

Now, you are under constraints of foreign exchange today, concessional flows are drying up; more and more commercial borrowings will be the only window open to you. So how do you respond to this problem. These two issues are very linked. For instance, if you drastically cut your inputs (into the economy) the political fallout may become a problem. There is a cycle, it doesn't just stop here: political discontent can lead to ideal conditions for destabilising forces. If you try to solve the crisis only through borrowings you will walk into a debt trap. So you have to find your way in between We have however, managed very well so far as reserves are concered; the debt management, repayments are good.

Q: But soon you start IMF repayments, don't you?

A: Next year.

Q: How much pressure will that put?

A: This will initially increase a little pressure but it will still be well within manageable proportions. Coming back to what I was saying; poverty is one factor, and then there are the parameters of political development and commitment to democracy. Equity becomes very, very central in this structure. Equity, greater utilisation of existing resources is the key because you have constraints. There is also a rupee constraint. Poverty being what it is, there is a limit to what you can raise by saving.

Now you have to understand the parameters of the private sector and the public sector. You have to judiciously decide what extent of the resources you allow in the private sector for reinvestment and generation of growth, and how much you mark for investment in infrastructure where the private sector is not going to come—roads, railways, telecommunication, social services. I am talking simply of the basics I am not talking of medicine, though there are social investments in health and education, investments in human capital. So now here is another judgement to be made. Now the public sector has also played a very important role in the development of the Indian economy. At the same time, now it has to contribute to resource promotion

Q: So you are saying straight that profit accountability in the public sector has to be sharpened.

A: How does one convert savings, resources into investments? For this you will have to have imaginative policies. These are the parameters within which you have to think, and from here the smaller steps of specific decision making must begin.

In the recent period the economies of developing countries have moved through a crisis. Even in that period we have been able to keep our heads above water.

Q: I don't think there has been a single finance minister who at the beginning of his term has not spoken of imaginative policies. Somehow they don't seem to emanate later.

A: Well, finance is a very conservative ministry; and imagination. You have those doubts rightfully and I don't think I should start claiming right at the beginning that I will be very much different from any other finance minister. My claiming so might just prove how green I am! But I think we will talk about imaginative policies after the budget.

Q: One of the serious problems is the deficit that has been building up. The expenditure caused by the social problems that have bedevilled us particularly in the last year, seem to have widened the gap. Are we going to see some different approaches to solving this deficit?

A: The deficit crisis, as I see it, cannot be mechanically solved. It is again linked with a certain minimum of democracy, hope, ambition of the people. But we cannot go on having large deficits year after year because

Mediaphoto

This generation has to pay for its future. There is unfortunately nothing free, and least of all progress. It has to be paid for.

ultimately the people will pay for it. You get nothing out of printed money, you cannot generate wealth by printing money

Q: The escalation has been enormous in the last three years

A: Certain investments, even developmental investments, are inflationary in nature, you have to consider, for instance, the gestation period for a project But we cannot go on having fresh projects without completing the last lot. When you go on spending money, pumping in money and you are not getting the products or the services against it, it is bound to be inflationary. So I think it is a better policy, it is more judicious to complete the ongoing projects at an earlier period rather than go for new starts all the time. It looks nice to lay foundation stones (laughs)...

Q: There should be fewer foundation stones, yes.

A: But fewer not as a matter of policy; we want of course more. But we do not want only stones, we want buildings. We want more projects certainly. It is not my policy to have fewer projects; that will give a wrong picture. Certainly I want more projects—but more completed projects.

Q: There has been a certain feeling in the space of the last month that there is a definite shift in the stress, if not necessarily in the policy, towards more cooperation through the private sector with the West which has better technology, better product management or production processes to offer. Is there some truth in this contention?

A: There has been liberalisation generally in our import policy as well as in our industrial policy to open up industries and bring in technology, needed for areas where we don't have the technology, or where it is important for us for our growth or for our exports. It is a good policy, and it has brought results in the growth of the corporate sector.

Q: It has certainly led to a boom in share prices. The stock exchange seems to have more faith in the government than ever before.

A: Well, it is not only the corporate sector which is in the private sector—the largest private sector is agriculture.

Q: Absolutely.

A: The largest private sector we have is agriculture and if you can manage even a small per capita income increase in agriculture it doubles the income growth in the lower segments. So from the equity point of view it is this sector which is very, very important.

Q: Yet the signals (we are reading only signals at the moment) say that television sets are getting higher priority than any major effort to create new wealth in the rural areas.

A: You see, in such a large country, there are serious problems. Unity is a crucial one. You yourself have brought out a book on unity. Media is a very powerful instrument which can be used to forge national unity. And audio-visual media is one of the most powerful instruments.

Q: As indeed we have seen in the last elections.

A:(Laughs) Well, it was the issues, not the strength of the media then. But television in the rural and remote areas can be a medium for education, for imparting new ideas for bringing those areas into modern India, the modern world and in that sense the order of the investments is very, very small. And the development of the country lies not only in factory building—it is the attitude of the people, it is their preparedness for going ahead, understanding the challenges and responding to them. And that is where the media matters, your press matters. If the newspaper matters, certainly television matters.

Q: There is only the small difference that the newspaper is not government controlled as yet.

A: But the opposition did not get any more votes because they got time on the television (laughs). They were given time on television but that did not fetch them any more votes. Perhaps they would have got more votes if they had not appeared on TV

Q: It is in this context that I wonder if you welcome or consider an accusation in Charan Singh's statement that you seem to be taking a leaf out of his book in your assessment of our problems.

A: I saw his reaction only on the teleprinter print-out and that's it. It is for him to raise such things. I have no comment

Q: What are the kinds of stress, that you will give to the rural sector? Not only in terms of direct economic inputs but also social inputs like education.

A: As for education, the Prime Minister has taken a very important decision—that girls will have free education right upto high school. I think that is a very important decision. But with our resource constraints I think we will have to take resourcesaway somewhere else.

Q: Have you considered the idea that the cuts could come, as in the West where this is a big issue, through a smaller government? Quite a large chunk of developmental expenditure actually is soaked up by the nature of the bureaucracy itself.

A: Well, that has to really depend from project to project, because some projects are highly capital intensive. Where social services are concerned there is no question of calculating a profit and loss.

Q: But the wastage factor becomes...

A: Certainly, this is something we have to look into and whenever it is possible we shall have to try to cut it.

Q: Well, if you do look into it you will be the first person to have done so.

A: Well, I don't think it is something which one person can look into. But I suppose it is time we will have to examine this. Not because we necessarily want to look into it, but perhaps we now have to.

Q: Where will you look for additional resources?

A: Well, resource raising has not been that much of a problem. We have been able to raise resources. But two things: one is that in the states there has been a heavy erosion of their resources, in terms of the electricity board and state transport and all that has gone down those drains. This has been a severe problem of the states. And then there is the finance commission report, you see. I think (it is) Rs 1,500 crores straight off. So that is one rise of the non-plan expenditure. And then there are subsidies also. You produce more fertilisers, you spend more on subsidies. That becomes a priority area because if you don't spend on fertilisers you will be importing grain, which will involve foreign exchange which we don't have.

Q: The question remains: Where do we get more from? There has been talk of some kind of cess on agricultural production beyond a certain limit, and this talk has been going on for some years.

A: Take resource raising as two things: first, resource raising in the sense of what goes into the government kitty. The second is tapping savings for investments which may not necessarily be in the government's purview, but which certainly go to promote economic activity and thereby employment and thereby the gross domestic product goes up. That is one way also of mobilising total resources of the country. When you are thinking of the country it is not only the government you are thinking of. It is the total activity in the country.

But certainly you will have to mobilise more resources and as I have said right at the beginning, this generation has to pay for its future. There is unfortunately nothing free, and least of all progress. It has to be paid for.

Q: This progress we would gladly pay for, were it not that too much cynicism has crept into the ability of the government to utilise the money we have given them, productively and not indulgently.

A: Well, you may point out this defect here and that defect there, but overall if you see from where, as I said even earlier, the total leadership led the country to, you will find much to applaud.

There may be criticism here and there and even valid criticism I don't say everything is perfect. But overall there has been trust and people have believed and trusted and certainly there has been scope for... But there should be no grounds for complacency

Q: I agree. Four years before this country got independence, millions were dying in Bengal and we have solved that problem at least.

A: No, but even in the recent period the economies of developing countries have moved through a crisis. Even in that period we have been able to keep our heads above water.

Q: Now, to take unplanned expenditure. In the last five years, for inst-

We do not want only foundation stones, we want buildings. We want more projects certainly. It is not my policy to have fewer projects...

In 20 years we've moved house seven times but I have always retained my dudhwala!

Yes, Amul Milk Powder has been a trusted friend. With Amul around, you are never without milk in the house .. whether you need it for curds, kheer, halwa, cake, milkshake, rasogollas, gulab jamuns or even a cup of tea.

And you know how fussy children... and grown-ups... can be. They want their lassi, dahi, pudding, etc. "just right", day after day after day. With Amul Milk Powder it's easy, because the consistency of the milk remains the same. Has remained the same, in fact, for 20 years.

Amul MILK POWDER

It's like having a dairy in your home.

Marketed by
Gujarat Co-operative Milk Marketing Federation Ltd Anand

RADEUS/AMP/9-83

ance ...

A: Non-plan is a technical sort of definition. Because if there is a plan, the next year it becomes non-plan. There are continuing shifts in definition.

Q: Agreed, but two obvious examples in the span of the last five years are both Asiad and Maruti. The money for both came from outside the plan. Are you going to allow, whatever the stress or priorities that may crop up, much of this sort of expenditure? Or will you try and fight this?

A: As far as the Maruti project is concerned the very demand of Maruti proves that it was the right investment.

Q: No, I am not challenging whether it was right or wrong. That is not the point. My point is that the Rs 250-300 crores which went to Maruti must have come from outside the plan allotments.

A: (With a smile) I think Arjun will answer (Arjun Sengupta had just entered the room). Akbar is asking that if you suddenly come up with projects which have not been included in the plan, how do we cope up with the resources for that? It must be a cut on other things. (Returning to questioner) The right of planning does not end with one document, it is a continuing process. So when it is decided to take up a new project in the middle of a plan it is because of a change in overall priority.

Q: The trouble with this sort of thing is to prevent it from degenerating into licence

A: Of course, you will see that there is no...

Q: You had a very rare beginning in the sense that two of the most trenchant critics of the Congress government—Charan Singh and Dr Ashok Mitra—have both ended up praising you. What kind of policy are we going to see in the states?

A: Realistic.

Q: A very short word which has very large implications.

A: It couldn't be otherwise.

Q: (Laughs) No, I mean will the language of confrontation continue or will there be some effort to sit down and settle issues?

A: Confrontation is not the essence of the situation, so why should we make an issue out of it?

Q: This is a question one has been asking for a long while actually.

A: If it is basic to a situation then of course one can raise the question. But if you make a question out of any situation, then it is different. It has to be cooperation (between the centre and the states); it cannot be confrontation. But if confrontation means that you draw as much as you want from the Reserve Bank and nothing should be pointed out to you, then I don't agree with the definition of confrontation. If someone points it out and you say that it is confrontation then it is a different definition of confrontation.

Q: Well, I know the West Bengal government pleads guilty to that but the justification that it tries to present is that it is not the most guilty in these matters. There are other Congress(I) ruled states

A: Economically, it is the same whether it is West Bengal or UP. They all have problems. States have to show a certain amount of growth. I think in this we have to start a dialogue, we have to understand the overall situation. We cannot be so insensitive to their demands; their need for developmental growth, etc. So, I think we have to sit down and collectively work things out. You see, nothing comes out of accusing one another. Of course, who has done what is obvious, but that is not the solution.

Q: One of the accusations that have been levelled against your government in the last few years is the one concerning the presentation of the sweet budget which means that you raise administered prices either before or after the budget and then present a budget which does not truly reflect the quantum of economic changes or the resource mobilisation that you have done. Are we going to see prices being raised before the budget or after? Are we going to see a political budget or a financial budget after a long time?

A: Presenting the budget is not the sole economic activity of the government. So, you cannot hope that everything will be in the budget and thereafter there will be no economic activity. It is a continuous process, including the budget.

Q: But it is a kind of theme song of the year, isn't it?

A: The budget basically reflects the tax structure and our financial managements during the course of the year. Prices depend on the exigencies of the period

Q: Well, if it is economic exigencies we are talking about, it is fine. But if it is political exigencies that you are referring, then it is different.

A: Many times prices go up because the costs of the raw materials or wages have gone up. There are so many factors, so these have to get absorbed. You can go easy for some time but sooner or later these factors have got to be absorbed.

Q: We can, perhaps, round up this discussion with the question: What personal challenges do you foresee in the near future? Challenges in terms of what is most likely to affect economic growth. What are the problems that you foresee that you will have to tackle very urgently

A: I think I will talk about this after the budget.

Q: So, let us come to the other part of the conversation: UP politics. Or can't you talk about it till after the Assembly elections?

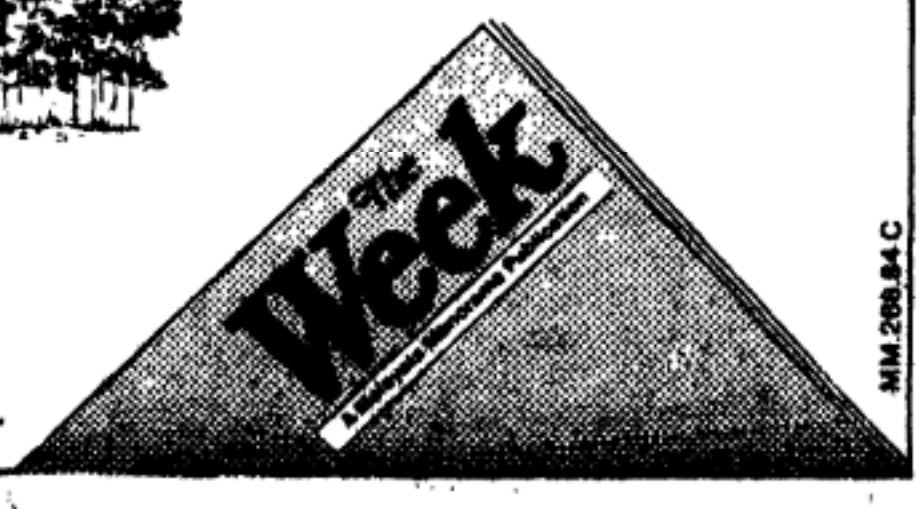
Mediaphoto

The deficit crisis cannot be mechanically solved. It is linked with democracy, hope, ambition of the people. But we cannot go on having large deficits year after year because ultimately the people will pay for it. You get nothing out of printed money.

Ninetyfour years in a Week

The Week is two years old. But behind it is a ninetyfour-year-old name that has become an institution. Malayala Manorama : freedom fighter, patron of the arts, voice of social awareness.

With the second largest circulation in India. Among all English and language dailies.



What makes Malayala Manorama so special? The rich experience of having communicated with the most literate audience in India, for nearly a century And the knowledge and authority that are self-evident in the acclaimed Malayala Manorama Year Book

That's the inspired, distinctive background against which The Week stands. And that s why, in just two years, its circulation has crossed 1.5 lakhs · something of a record. Which isn t surprising. Because people now acknowledge The Week as an authentic spokesman. With first hand accounts of all the important events.

Take the storming of the Golden Temple : The Week had a man on the spot. Or Sunil Gavaskar's record making match . The Week interviewed his family — and published it before the match was over. In fact, The Week's correspondents are so hot on the heels of the latest news, that one found himself on board a hijacked plane!

Today, more and more people are discovering The Week. And putting their faith in it. Because they know that whatever happens, they're bound to read the best of it in the next Week!

MM.268.84.C

Never a Week behind.

A: No, nobody can throw me out because of that.

Q: Though it is a bit late, I have always wanted to ask you: What happened in the aftermath of your resignation as the chief minister of UP? You resigned to make the point that law and order had crossed an acceptable level in UP, which we realised when we were covering atrocities in Sadhopur or wherever. Do you think your departure helped to improve the law and order situation in the state?

A: No, it was not that way. It was not that law and order had gone out of hand, and I had not resigned on that. I had resigned on grounds of credibility and even in my letter I had said that so far as the dacoity menace was concerned the police had done a very good job. Otherwise, that would have been a stigma on the sacrifice of the honest officers. All the top grade dacoits were liquidated during my chief ministership.

Success was complete on this front. But it was a question of credibility: What happens if in spite of liquidating the major gangs, an incident does happen? Now if I go on stating that I liquidated these gangs, you say that such an incident has happened, then it is a question of credibility.

In fact, during my chief ministership Chhabiram was liquidated. For ten years no one could touch him. He had a gang of about a 100 men. Anar Singh, Mahavira, all were eliminated during that time. I fulfilled my promise which I had taken in 1980, that these gangs would be eliminated—all the top gangs. When I say all, I mean all Phoolan was a creation of the newspapers, but all the others were eliminated by the time I left office. I think I am proud of it and the police are proud of it. But it was a question of credibility.

Do I go on arguing with the people by presenting data and facts and the names of the gangs or say yes or no. I stood by my word since there was an incident, I don't want to argue with it.

This is an area where there are no rules of constructive responsibility and dialogue with the people. There are no reference books and it is entirely within you and the language you want to talk is entirely yours.

Q: You lost a brother to some dacoits.

A: Yes, then this was a question of...that I made a promise. There has been tremendous success. Never in the history of UP has there been such success. And everybody recognises this: you go to Mainpuri and the people there say that development or no development they have got their night's sleep because of me. But do I go on arguing and give data to people if I say I have promised this and this is going to happen? After all, it was one washerman who raised the question of Sita and Sita was banished. He didn't argue I put her in fire, she's chaste and she's very...he didn't produce any arguments that I have gone through these tests (laughs). This is a dialogue between languages...

Q: I think we should introduce classes of Ramayana among politicians.

A: This a difficult language you see, you have to be...

Q: The problem still remains in East UP to a large extent. The gangs you were talking about were really from...

A: (They) Ran away to Nepal during my time.

Q: Did they? I thought they were under the protection of politicians, some including your Congress variety. You know this business of patronage between politicians and dacoits in Bihar and UP has reached serious proportions. You know the realities and it is not a disease which is restricted only to the Congress.

A: Gorakhpur in east UP was the area where (Virendra Pratap) Shahi and Hari Shankar (Tiwari) operated. Both are now in jail. Both fought the election, but we put up our own candidates and we won. So the political answer is also being given and of course the administrative answer has also been given. So that's how you fight it. So far the Congress has shown its determination in this regard.

Q In Bihar the record is not quite the same, I'm afraid. Some of the Congress MLAs' supporters have less than clean records. Will we see a better list this time in the interests of a clean government?

A: I think the opposition can answer this better.

Q. No, no, no, the opposition we can ask separately.

A. They have more to say on this subject. Some of these parties have been... if you draw up a list of opposition party members the thanedar's list and their membership list will be the same. The Sanjay Vichar Manch was built that way in UP. As far as the character of our candidates is concerned you may have seen the statement of the PM and there will be no compromise on this.

Q: Is there any prospect of a change in UP's chief ministership?

A: Certainly not till the elections. There has not been any discussion on what will happen after the elections.

As far as the Maruti project is concerned,the very demand of Maruti proves that it was the right investment.

Reachi

The world of the spastic is one w colours are muted. Some ho cruel bodies. Yet, in spite of the infectious. Our photographer enthusiasm in a school

(Clockwise from left) The first steps; in a playful mood; striving to )FEATURE

ıing Out

where hope is a rare dream and all hose intelligent minds trapped in heir deformity, their enthusiasm is er Sunil Dutt was touched by this ol for spastics in Calcutta.

ng to read and a game of football

(Clockwise from top) "You can't keep us down," the young boy seems to say; climbing stairs; and in a classroom: towards a better tomorrow

Sri Lanka's Voices of Reason

Sinhala liberals advocate a solution to the country's ethnic problem

The Indian media has had the opportunity to frequently report the travails and viewpoints of the oppressed Tamils of Sri Lanka. The attitude of a majority of the Sinhala politicians and the Buddhist Maha Sangha, which planted the seed of Sinhala-Buddhist chauvinism in the nineteenth century, has also to a certain extent been reported. But one of the most significant aspects of the ethnic conflict in Sri Lanka which has remained hitherto unreported is the existence of the "Sinhala liberals." There is a small but articulate section of the Sinhalese which, untainted by Buddhist revivalism, has been advocating a political and not a military solution to the Island's ethnic strife.

The Sinhala liberals, or the Sinhala Radical Intelligentsia as they are otherwise called, are essentially drawn from the academic institutions. They comprise university professors, members of research organisations, scholars, historians, political and social scientists. Having studied the ethnic relations in its entirety, these academicians have been able to adopt a dispassionate historical perspective of the troubled relations between the Tamils and Sinhalese of Sri Lanka. The liberals have been drawing more followers among the educated members of the Sinhalese public who are beginning to support and appreciate their viewpoint.

The Sinhala liberals have not only gone to the extent of repeatedly asserting that a political solution is the only way to settle the ethnic conflict. They have also specified that a political solution implies the provision of regional autonomy for the Tamils. In this context one can understand India's reportedly "lukewarm" attitude to Commonwealth secretary-general Shridath S. Ramphal's views regarding the Sinhala liberals and his efforts to bring about a consensus. India was naturally not very enthusiastic about the proposal because it means traversing a diplomatic ground which has already been covered. Besides, what is the point of starting talks with the Sinhala liberals when they have repeatedly expressed in black and white their viewpoint on the resolution of the ethnic crises—which incidentally coincides perfectly with India's suggestions? The all-party conference which was initiated following the July 1983 race riots was only due to India's efforts and has proved two things: first, that there can be no consensus regarding a political solution as far as the Buddhist organisations and opposition parties are concerned and second, the disastrous conclusion of the all-party conference (the drafted proposals were dropped) has raised serious doubts about the sincerity of the UNP government to resolve the issue amicably. The series of measures initiated by the national security minister, Mr Lalith Athulathmudali, indicate that the UNP government is more in favour of a military solution to the problem. Having been made to realise the futility of holding negotiations, India today is naturally reluctant to start all over again the charade of time-consuming negotiations, particularly when a lot of valuable time has already been lost.

The "goon squads" of the UNP cabinet ministers

As the opinions of the Sinhala liberals run contrary to that of the establishment, the former has come in for scathing criticism from the government-controlled press. The views of the radical intelligentsia are suppressed and all avenues of popular communication are blocked for them. This has effectively prevented the percolation of their views to the Sinhala masses. Consequently, the liberals have no option but to hold seminars and symposia where they can freely express their ideas. As and when the government gets wind of their activities, vilification campaigns are launched against them in the press. They are portrayed as betrayers of the national cause, which is of course the establishment of a Sinhala Buddhist nation. Apart from being branded as fifth columnists and traitors they are also accused of being Soviet stooges.

The Sri Lankan Movement for Inter Racial Justice and Equality (MIRJE) which has been active for the past five years has been continuously stressing the need for a "just political solution" as it is convinced that the "ethnic strife cannot be solved by increasing military action or by repressive laws." It points out that a "structure of decentralisation and devolution" should be offered to the Tamils. MIRJE's stand is that any interruption or cessation of the search for a political solution would only result in new levels of brutality and carnage and would entail "further loss of the democratic rights to which we have been accustomed, further brutalisation of our people and the strengthening of the authoritarian trends that are already evident in our society."

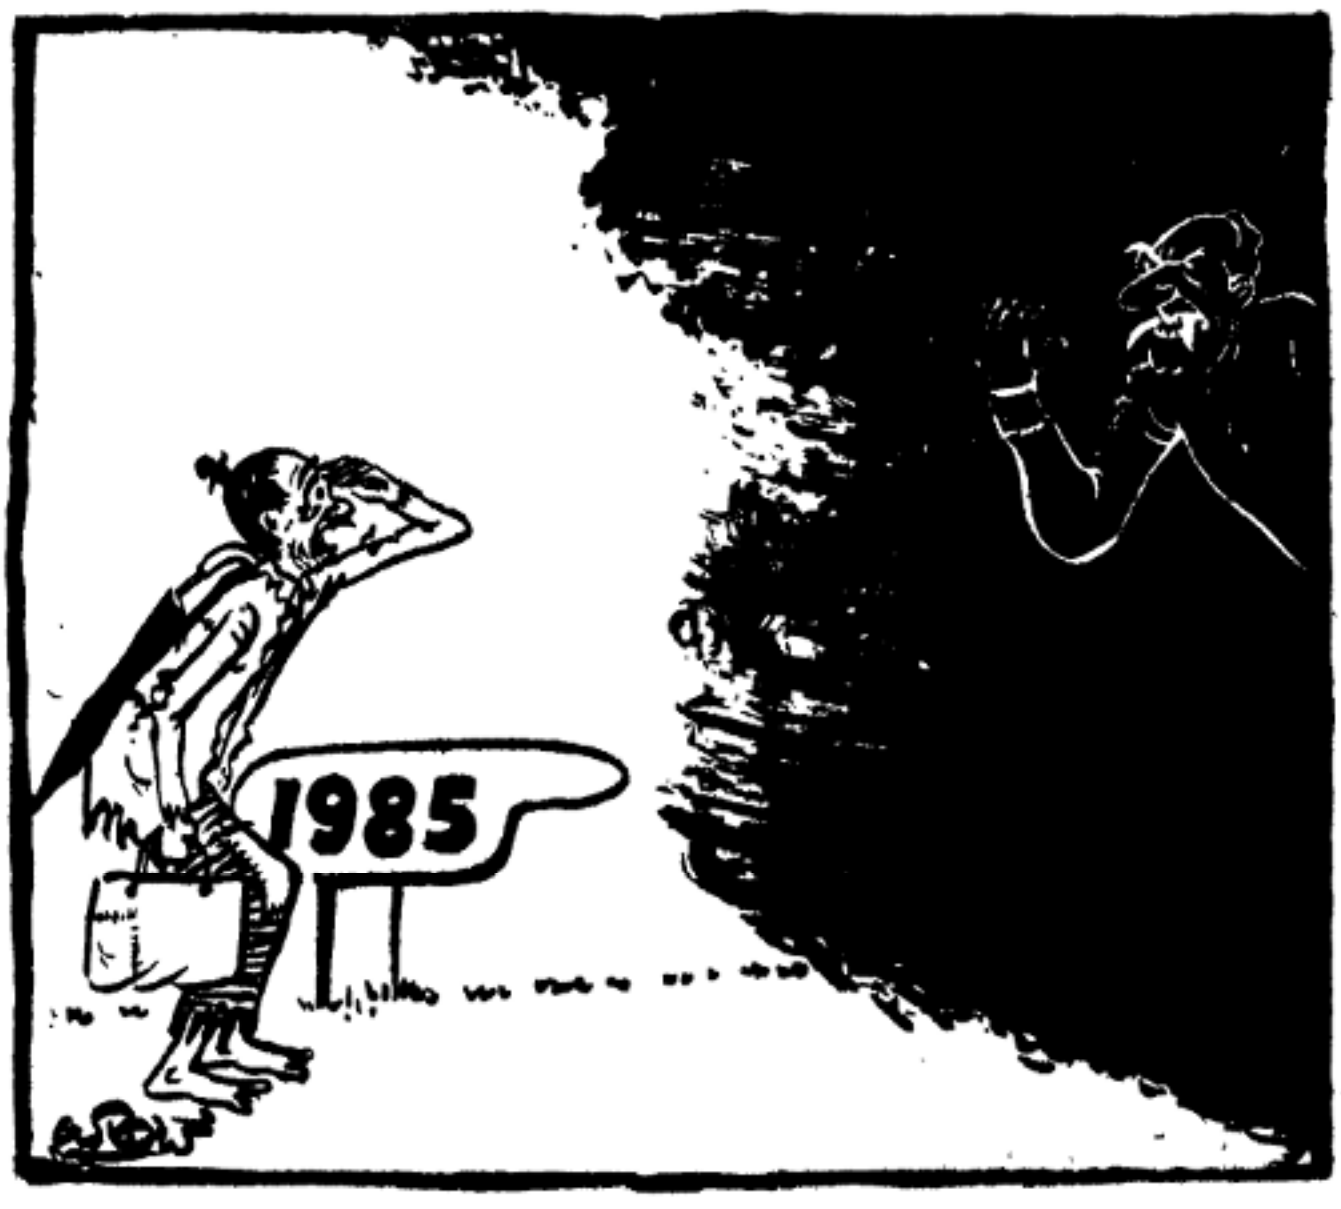
That the Sinhala liberal opinion is spreading is evident from the fact that Sri Lankan women got together to form their organ, called the Women for Peace and Ethnic Harmony. This group is vocal and active. They have taken out many peace marches, trying to mobilise opinion in favour of a political solution to the ethnic crises. The women have been urging an "immediate political solution over a military one," and have called upon "the women of Sri Lanka of all ethnic groups to work for a lasting peace in our country."



A spokesman of the Sinhalese liberals disclosed to this correspondent that due to the Buddhist Maha Sangha's constant emphasis on the "historic mission" to convert Sri Lanka into a Sinhala Buddhist nation, racism today has cut across all class and caste barriers of the Sinhalese community. Earlier, the working class had no interest in racism. However, since the Sixties even the Communist parties turned communal to retain their dwindling votebank. Time and again the Sinhala opposition parties sabotaged pacts that sought to fulfil the legitimate aspirations of the Tamils. Every time the ruling party came towards settling the problem, the opposition parties spread the campaign that they had "sold out" to the Tamils, compelling the ruling party to renege. The spokesman revealed that all the Sinhalese politicians feared the Buddhist Maha Sangha and did not dare initiate any kind of action that would be frowned upon by the Sangha. The fear stemmed from the belief that the Sangha controlled the masses. As mass support is vital for the ruling party to stay in power, none of the politicians dared to risk the wrath of the Sangha. The spokesman added that the popular belief that the Maha Sangha controls the masses could well be an artificially created one.

President Jayewardene

According to the spokesman the resentment of the Sinhala masses against the Jayewardene government is rising to alarming proportions. The army is demoralised because it is unable to crush the Tamil militants. The Sinhala masses are unable to cope with the high cost of living. As the economy is in a shambles, the people oppressed by the yoke of inflation are turning against Jayewardene. The ripples of public unrest could escalate into a groundswell if effective steps are not taken. There are any number of Jayewardene jokes doing the rounds. Most of the jokes are mordant and often vicious and in a sense mirror the bitterness of the Sinhalese masses. The spokesman revealed another interesting piece of information. According to him more Sinhalese were emigrating (primarily to Australia and Canada) than Tamils. Insecurity has infected the entire nation: there is a general feeling that the system is collapsing. Worst of all there is political instability. According to the spokesman, President Jayewardene's position is shaky because of the intense factionalism in the ruling party. There is a palpable fear that the racist elements could group together to overthrow Jayewardene.

In 1979, at a seminar organised by the Social Scientists Association, several prominent Tamil and Sinhala liberals assembled for the first time to discuss and analyse some aspects of the social, economic and ideological roots of the continuing ethnic conflict. The papers presented by the eminent historians and social scientists have now been reproduced in the form of a book entitled Ethnicity and Social Change in Sri Lanka. The book is a must for all Sri Lanka watchers because the scholarly arti-

What will 1985 be like for Jayewardene?

Jayewardene shuts his ears to the din raised by national security minister Lalith Athulathmudali (left) claiming that Tamil terrorists have been put down and by Upil Mathews (right) saying that nothing has been done regarding the terrorists cles are together an artful synthesis of historical research and practical realities. In addition to being an encyclopaedia of invaluable information, the book is a symbol of the soul-searching that the Sinhala liberals are capable of. The well-documented studies expose the mythic nature of the Sri Lankan history that traces the beginning of the island's civilisation to the arrival of King Vijaya and his band of followers from north India.

The papers point out that in actual fact the island had been for a long period inhabited by a people who were primarily agriculturists and that it was an amalgam of those inhabitants and subsequent migrants that laid the foundations of Sri Lankan society. A Sinhalese author traces the beginnings of the Sinhala Buddhist consciousness that was essentially based on the myth that the Sinhalese are of Aryan descent. This myth has been steadfastly developed over the years to the present time to legitimise the claims of the Sinhalese to Sri Lanka. The paper points out that the concept of a Sinhala Buddhist hegemony, which is to be protected from the inroads of a Tamil group from south India, has been pervasive from around the fourth century and even today forms the basis of Sinhala Buddhist chauvinism and of ethnic conflict. Tamil scholars trace the evolution of the Tamil consciousness which has "arisen as a response to the growth of Sinhala chauvinism." The economic aspects, the communalisation of the leftist parties and the colonial legacy, the education and employment policy that has exacerbated relations between the Tamil and the Sinhalese, the situation of the Tamils of Indian origin are all dealt with by the different authors.

One of the most brilliant papers has been presented by Prof. W. I. Siriweera, a senior lecturer in history at the university of Perandeniya. The dissertation exposes the prejudices that have crept into historical records. As most of the chroniclers were Buddhists, historical facts were often twisted or distorted to cater to their interests. Unfortunately, these versions have had a tremendous influence in shaping contemporary attitudes. As the prominent leftist leader Dr Colvin R. Desilva put it in a recent article, "The UNP government is shrieking from the housetops that our country is in the gravest crisis of its history since independence. The contention is true. But the crisis of which the government is shouting is not the true crisis. The crisis to meet which the government is summoning the nation to rally round it is a military crisis. The cause of that crisis is presented as Tamil terrorism. The task before the country is formulated as the task of defeating, destroying and rooting out that terrorism, that terrorism is a major element in the present crisis is true. But terrorism neither constitutes the crisis nor is its prime cause. The crisis we are facing is a crisis of the nation. The roots of that crisis lie in what history may characterise as our failure in the post independence period to build a Sri Lankan nation in which the majority and minority communities can co-exist peacefully."

The resentment of the Sinhala masses against the Jayewardene government is rising to alarming proportions. The army is demoralised because it is unable to crush the Tamil militants... President Jayewardene's position is shaky because of the intense factionalism in the ruling party.

Anita Pratap, Madras

Cartoons are from the Communist newspaper, Atthha (Truth)

ESSAY

Envy, Jealousy and Hate

BY KHUSHWANT SINGH

A handsome young athelete who had covered himself in glory having won a match for his side was standing on the pavement surrounded by his admirers. A man who had never seen him before nor had any interest in any game ran his car over him. When charged with murder, the man confessed that he had nothing personal against his victim but could not bear to see him being lionised.

In 1967 a succession of fires broke out in the hostels of Cornell University in which several students were roasted alive. The dormitories were specially chosen as they housed the best students of the campus. The coroner held that the arson had been committed by other students out of "human malice."

A middleaged spinster took the child of a close friend in her pram for an airing. She was suddenly overcome with envy of her friend's happiness in having a child and hurled the pram with the baby into the river... A 17-year-old boy shot dead his closest friend for no reason other than that the other was elected head of their class... A poor man walking along the road was overcome with envy and set a line of cars along the pavement on fire. When questioned by the police he said, "I could not afford to own an automobile, and I didn't want anyone else to have one."

All these incidents are true. Many more can be cited from India and elsewhere because envy, jealousy and hatred are a universal phenomenon. All of us suffer from envy, most of us also become jealous when our relationship with another is threatened. However the utmost most of us do is to indulge in malicious gossip against those we envy or endanger a relationship we have enjoyed. If allowed to go unchecked, envy and jealousy can turn to hate.

There is no language in the world which does not have words for envy and its manifestations like jealousy, hostility, malice, backbiting, gossip and scandalmongering. The closest Indian equivalents of envy are hasad in Urdu, eersha, jalan, lalsa and dah in Hindi.

Sophisticated societies have devised an etiquette whereby outbursts to envy are restrained. In less evolved societies like ours envy, jealousy and hate often play havoc with the smooth running of administration. No institution, office or department of government, not excluding the defence services bound by rigid rules of discipline, is without the envious and the envied. It is common knowledge that some Test matches are lost because some fielders deliberately drop easy catches to prevent good averages by their own bowlers.

Nirad Choudhuri is of the opinion that envy is born of fear. He goes on to state that "fear of enemies haunts Hindu life. This fear is, of course, descended from the primitive fear of strangers, but was extended to an absurd degree. All relatives, neighbours, acquaintances, even wives and sons were regarded as potential enemies. Often quite unjustifiably, every Hindu regarded some of his acquaintances as his actual enemies and attributed his failures to their machinations. Beyond them were the unknown enemies, like the unknown gods of Greeks. In the social outlook of the Hindus the enemies of a person far outnumbered his friends. So one preoccupation in their life was to disappoint the enemies. So all well-wishers urged a man not to give joy and comfort to his enemies by quarrelling with friends and relatives. In Bengal, for instance, if two brothers quarrelled, a well-wisher would ask why they were providing joy for their enemies. Looking at a healthy child a grandmother, mother, or aunt would say: 'May he grow up like this and put ashes in the mouths of our enemies.' In the village the news of a woman in labour would not be given for fear that some enemy would utter spells to delay the birth of the child... Thus all religious observances and rites had a protective orientation. In addition, there were particular dieties and rites to ensure welfare and security. Some of the rites were meant to enlist support from a god or goddess against evil, others to bribe a mischief-making deity. For instance, in Bengal a goddess called Mangal Chandi or Chandi of Welfare was worshipped every Tuesday in order to secure insecurity from evil, and every Saturday Sani (Saturn), who in Hindu mythology is the personified evil eye, was worshipped to be bribed off from mischief-making."

Illustrations: Subrata Ganguli

Nirad Choudhuri is, as usual, harsher on Hindus than on other communities. As a matter of observation there is more evidence of uncontrolled envy among Arabs than amongst Indians and from Arabs more inherited by Indian Muslims than other Indians. Amongst agricultural communities like the Jats (Hindu, Sikh or Muslim), Rajputs and Aheers no sooner one of them becomes the village headman he has to watch out for the envious lest they bash in his skull.

Envy can be a creative impulse if it can be canalised into competitiveness—to do as well or better than others in the same field. Such one-upmanship should lead to progress. But when it is allowed to take the shape of wishing ill to others doing better, then it corrodes a person's inner being.

"Envy is a drive which lies on the core of man's life as a social being, and which occurs as soon as two individuals become capable of mutual comparison," writes Helmut Schoeck in his definite work on the subject Envy (Secker and Warburg). He further clarifies that envy requires at least two characters, the envier and the envied. "The more closely and intensively the envier concerns himself with the other person, the more he is thrown back on himself in self pity." It is a directed emotion which cannot occur without a target.

Psychologists have ascribed many reasons for this almost entirely human emotion (there is no evidence of it amongst animals). Melanie Klein in her work Envy and Gratitude is of the opinion that the root cause is sibling rivalry i.e. between children of the same mother for her attention. This is too simplistic an explanation. Before we go to its genesis, it is best to define the borderlines between envy, jealousy and malice.

Envy Versus Jealousy

Envy, as has been noted earlier, is largely a relationship between two people. Jealousy invariably requires three or more. It is the craving for the affection of another mingled with fear of losing it to a third party. Jealousy erupts when a rival appears on the scene Envy does not have to await a rival. As Schoeck points out, "Jealousy is only directed against a definite transfer of coveted assets or their removal elsewhere, never against the asset as such. Envy very often denies the asset itself." Envy is hateful emotion inasmuch as besides corroding the envier it seeks malevolent pleasure in seeing adversities befall the envied person. To wit Dryden:

> Envy, that does with misery reside,
> The joy and revenge of ruined pride.

Schopenhauer believes that the envier employs two methods—to praise what is bad, or alternatively, to remain silent about what is good. He goes on to add: "There is no vice, of which a man can be guilty, no meanness, no shabbiness, no unkindness. which excites so much indignation among his contemporaries, friends and neighbours, as his success. This is the one unpardonable crime, which reason cannot defend, nor humility mitigate, 'When heaven with such parts has blest him, have I not reason to detest him?' "

For some obscure reason the Germans have quite a sizable literature on this "vindictive, inwardly, tormenting, displeasure... in which one begrudges others their personal or material assets, being as a rule almost more intent on their destruction than on their acquisition." The professional thief is less tormented, less motivated by envy, than is the arsonist. Envy manifests itself when there is proximity as between relatives, friends and neighbours. It is roused as a Russian proverb says when a man sees with his ears as well as his eyes It afflicts all humans of all ages: if envy was a disease, the world would be a hospital. Not many people are willing to admit that they are sick with envy. The Swedes are an exception and have coined an expression "royal Swedish envy" for people who resent other people's prosperity. By Swedish law every citizen is allowed to examine another's tax return. A firm which publishes lists of families which have incomes above 36,000 dollars a year makes handsome profits out of people's desire to know which of their friends or neighbours are doing better than themselves and why.

A Deadly Sin

Many sayings are ascribed to Prophets. "Men should not envy one another what I give them out of my fulness," said Jesus, "The plagues of religion are envy, vanity and pride." The Prophet Mohammed denounced hasad as "something that devours faith as fire devours wood " An Imam declared: "The true believer is he who wishes others well and who does not molest them, while the hypocrite is a man who is envious and who does not suffer any other to be happy."

Admonitions by prophets had little effect in excising envy out of their followers.

Gods and goddesses of Hindu and the Greek mythology were victims of envy. Episodes in the Ramayana and Mahabharata are replete with instances of envy amongst co-wives, stepmothers, cousins and neighbours. The classic story of Agamemnon's triumphal return home roused the envy of the gods.

Rare are those mortals who a friend arrayed
In fortune's smiles with eyes unenvying view:
The fateful poison rankling at the heart
A double smart inflicts, the sufferer mourns
His own peculiar woes—then at the sight
Of others more successful, sighs again.
I know mankind full well, nor need to learn
That empty as the shadow of a shade
Are many who with smiles may presence hail."

Clytemnestra greets her husband with the following words:

Oh! blest immunity from threatened woe!
Envy, begone—too well we grief have known.

Envious Practices

In all societies rites by which people hope to harm those they envy or hate are current as are rites by which those who wish them harm can be frustrated. Different forms of black magic were, and are, practised in different countries. Indian politicians hire tantrics to perform rites to harm their rivals. Mrs Gandhi's admirers were known to engage pandits to perform rites to preserve her from harm. The commonest evidence of envy among common people is belief in the "evil-eye." Nazar lagaana is to cast an envious eye on other's health, wealth and children. Of all slogans painted behind trucks and scooters the most popular is "buree nazar say deykhney waley tera munh kaala! (You who cast your evil eye upon me, may your face be blackened!") Although not as commonly used as the Urdu "buree Nazar." Hindi has an equivalent in ku-drishti. Some people have effigies made of people they envy or hate and stick pins in them. In most agricultural communities peasants take precautions to preserve their cattle from the ill-effects of envious neighbours. In Bavaria and Austria peasants still mix "envy herb" with fodder to protect their cattle against verneiden or "envious sorcery."

An envious person will happily do harm to himself if by so doing he can also do harm to the person he envies. I recall litigation between two brothers who owned the largest cloth store in Lahore. I was appointed arbitrator by the court. When all attempts to divide bales of cloth failed, I suggested that each bale be cut in half. Even this suggestion was turned down. They agreed to cut the bales down the middle so that they could be of no use to either of them.

Another evidence of the prevalence of envy is the greater readiness to believe and derive pleasure from hearing news of another's misfortune than joy in their success. "Any one can sympathise with the sufferings of a friend, but it requires a very fine nature to sympathise with a friend's success," wrote Oscar Wilde. Bad news makes better news than good news. The Germans have the most appropriate word for pleasure derived from another's misfortune—schadenfreude. It has a Persian equivalent in Mathat.

Envy in Poetry

In the Canterbury Tales Chaucer lists "the foul sin of envy" amongst the seven deadliest and defines it in the words of St. Augustine as "sorrow at another's prosperity and joy in his harm." In The Paradise Lost Milton writes of the snake's envy of Adam & Eve in paradise

"Who first seduced them to that foul revolt?
Th'infernal serpent! He it was, whose guile
Stirred up with envy and revenge, deceived
The mother of mankind...."

And later in the same poem Adam warns Eve:

"... for thou know'st
What hath been warned us, what malicious foe,
Envying our happiness, and of his own
Despairing, seeks to work our woe and shame
By sly assault."

Price of Success

"He who attains renown rouses envy amongst his compeers," said Aristotle. "It is the practice of the multitude to bark at eminent man as little dogs do at strangers," wrote Seneca. Envy only exists amongst equals. The more nearly we are equal to the man with whom we compare ourselves, the greater is our envy. Bacon was of the opinion that the envy-ridden are often deformed or impotent—or persons "who cannot possibly mend their case and hence attempt to impair anothers." Kant regarded envy as belonging to the "abhorrent family of ingratitude and schadenfreude....the vice of human hate that is the complete opposite of human love. He defined it as the "tendency to perceive with displeasure the good of others, although it in no way detracts from one's own....it is only an indirect, malevolent frame of mind, namely a disinclination to see our own good overshadowed by the good of others, because we take its measure not from its intrinsic worth, but by comparison with the good of others and then go on to symbolize that evaluation."

Nietzsche made a perceptive analysis of schadenfreude which according to him came into existence only after man had learnt to see other men as belonging to his own kind and forming a society. He wrote: "Malicious joy arises when a man consciously finds himself in evil plight and feels anxiety or remorse or pain. The misfortune that overtakes B, makes him equal to A, and A is reconciled and no longer envious. If A is prosperous, he still hoards up in his memory B's misfortune as a capital, so as to throw it in the scale as a counter-weight when he himself suffers adversity. In this case too he feels 'malicious joy' (schadenfreude). The sentiment of equality thus applies its standards to the domain of luck and chance. Malicious joy is the commonest expression of victory and restoration of equality, even in a higher state of civilisation."

Neitzsche like many other philosophers believed that the idea of equality is in fact an expression of envy. He wrote: "When some men fail to accomplish what they desire to do they exclaim angrily, "May the whole world perish!" This repulsive emotion is the pinnacle of envy, whose implication is "If I cannot have something, no one is to have anything, no one is to be anything!"

Democracy as a Form of Envy

"Envy among other ingredients, has a mixture of love of justice in it. We are more angry at undeserved than deserved good fortune," wrote Hazlitt. "Envy is the basis of democracy," opined Bertrand Russell, "It is the passion that has given driving force to democratic theories." H L. Mencken in his essay A Blind Spot wrote: "No doubt my distaste for democracy as a political theory is due to an inner lack, to a defect that is a good deal less in the theory than in myself. In this case it is very probably my incapacity for envy...In the face of another man's good fortune I am as inert as a car broker before Johann Sebastian Bach. It gives me neither pleasure nor distress. The fact, for example, that John D. Rockefeller had more money than I have is as uninteresting to me as the fact that he believed in total immersion and wore detachable cuffs. And the fact that some half-anonymous ass has been appointed a professor at Harvard, or married to a rich wife, or even to a beautiful and amiable one: this fact is as meaningless to me as the latest piece of bogus news from eastern Europe."

"Democracy is depicted as brotherhood, even as altruism. All such notions are in error," he writes. "There is only one honest impulse at the bottom of Puritanism and that is the impulse to punish the man with a superior capacity for happiness—to bring him down to the miserable level of 'good' men i.e. of stupid, cowardly and chronically unhappy men. And there is only one sound argument for democracy, and that is the argument that it is a crime for any man to hold himself out as better than other men, and, above all, a most heinous offence for him to prove it."

There are people who enjoy making others envious. Grand wedding banquets, limousines and other forms of ostentatious display of luxuries usually designed to make others envious. An anthropologist who rewarded his native interpreter and asked him how would you spend the money got the reply: "I shall buy the biggest drum I can find and beat it in the village. Then everybody will envy me."

Not all manifestations of prosperity rouse envy. The style of living of Presidents in Rashtrapati Bhavan, the Kennedy's in White House or British monarchs in Buckingham palace do not rouse envy in the minds of the champions of equality because envy, as has been said before, operates only amongst equals It thrives in an egalitarian society and largely amongst people in the same profession "Have you ever been so imprudent as to praise an artist to another artist, praised a politician to another politician of the same party? praised an Egyptologist to another Egyptologist? asks Bertrand Russel And answers: "If you have, it is hundred to one that you have produced an explosion of envy." Russel was also of the opinion that while women regard all other women as their competitors; men as a rule only have this feeling towards other men in the same profession. "Beggars do not envy millionaires, though of course they will envy other beggars who are more successful."

The cult of equality, the sense of justice and injustice are born out of man's capacity to envy. At the same time the rich and the privileged who are envied also suffer from a feeling of guilt towards the poor and the under-privileged and expiate it by gifts to charity, by indulging in radical talk and at times by joining revolutionary groups. This is particularly noticeable among the intellectual elite as "envy-avoidance behaviour."

Punitive Taxation

"Neither democracies nor dictatorships are averse to depending upon the supposed mutual envy in the population to produce maximum honesty in tax matters," writes Schoek. Not only tax payers willingly give information about other people in their business but in many countries including India tax authorities reward informers for snooping in other people's private incomes. In Switzerland tax returns are open to public scrutiny and in some cantons children sell from door to door copies of tax returns made by local residents. Punitive and confiscatory taxes are not levied from humanitarian motives, for the benefit of the poor but out of envy—the dissatisfaction produced in men not by what they lack but by what others have.

How to Overcome Envy

Envy as a positive force can fire innovators to invent new things in the spirit of "now I'll show them" attitude. As a destructive force it can band the envious together and insist on status quo.

The problems of most egalitarian societies are to foster positive envy and contain its destructive powers. Renouncing the world by taking sanyas rarely succeed in rooting out envy. More satisfying is acceptance of kismet—fate which gives more to some than to others. It is best to canalise it into a force of achievement: the will to outdo others on the same occupation as farmers, artisans, typists, business executives, scientists, painters, musicians or whatever.

Bertrand Russel found an antidote for envy in admiration: "Whoever wishes to increase human happiness must wish to increase admiration and to diminish envy." He discarded selflessness propagated by saints as a cure for envy because most saints envy other saints. "Merely to realise the cause of one's own envious feelings is to take a long step towards curing them," he advised. "Envy evil as it is and terrible are its effects, is not wholly of the devil It is in part the expression of a heroic pain, the pain of those who walk through the night; blindly, perhaps, to a better resting place, perhaps only to death and destruction To find the right road out of this despair, civilised man must enlarge his heart as he has enlarged his mind."

ANTI-DEFECTION BILL

A New Beginning

Efforts to clean up political life

In one step, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has covered a lot of ground. The passage of the Anti-Defection Bill, while strengthening his already strong position in the party, has shown him as a crusader for clean politics. It has also shown that as in the days of Jawaharlal Nehru, the ruling party is in for an era of inner-party democracy once again. Furthermore, the contradictions within the opposition have been laid threadbare all over again. Politics had become a dirty word since 1967, when the phase of the aya ram and gaya ram (the phrase was coined by the late Y. B. Chavan, when he was the union home minister) began. Defections by politicians had made the people at large begin to hate politicians.

In a democracy, while clean politics is imperative, the image of the politician, especially the elected representative, is important. Defections symbolised opportunism in totality. The people haplessly looked on while the elected MPs and MLAs switched sides with impunity and thereby mocked the popular mandate. People voted for a party, and rarely for an individual. The mandate of 1977, which brought about the fall of the Congress government, was negated when the disease of defections affected the Lok Sabha in 1979. The people reacted against this and voted Indira Gandhi back to power. In 1984 again, defection politics within the opposition parties was rejected by the electorate which chose to give the Congress(I) a mandate for stable politics. Appropriately, the new wave government chose the Anti-Defection Bill as its first step towards reassuring the people that politics had not become a dirty word after all.

This is not to say that the "Mr Clean" image of Rajiv Gandhi is unblemished. As AICC(I) general secretary, he did not murmur when defections were engineered in Haryana and Himachal Pradesh soon after the Assembly elections in these states by Bhajan Lal and Ram Lal, respectively, to form Congress(I) governments. When governments were toppled by defectors in Jammu and Kashmir and Andhra Pradesh and the Congress(I) rushed to the defection leaders, G. M. Shah and N. Bhaskara Rao, to help them form governments, then too Rajiv Gandhi did not protest. The Moily Tapes scandal in Karnataka and the blatant use of money power to topple the Hegde government in Karnataka too did not attract Rajiv Gandhi's censure. In Sikkim and in Nagaland, defections were not scorned at. But that was the Rajiv Gandhi of 1984. The Rajiv Gandhi of 1985 has his eyes set on the next century. And for a leader to be able to sustain popular appeal, image-building exercises combined with preventive measures to ensure that the people's mandate is not reversed in any way other than elections, are necessary. By bringing forward the Anti-Defection Bill, while ensuring that he acquired a better grip over the party, Rajiv Gandhi also excused himself from the people for not having been able to do anything more concrete while he went back to them to seek votes in the Assembly elections. Nothing has happened on the Punjab front. Assam remains unresolved. The prices have not shown any downward trend. Apart from catching spies, the government has not been able to produce any other tangible result to show itself as the "government that works." The timing of the Anti-Defection Bill, therefore, was wise. It has given the ruling party an achievement worth shouting from the rooftops of having cleaned public life. And the people may gratefully acknowledge this.

Mediaphoto

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and President Zail Singh entering Parliament House

The introduction of the Bill was an exercise aimed at showing that Rajiv Gandhi believed in the politics of cooperation and consensus. By getting the Bill unanimously passed, after "bowing to the opposition's wishes" regarding the controversial clause 2(1) (C), Rajiv Gandhi has shown his "magnanimity." This was in sharp contrast to the Indira Gandhi era. The Nehru years seemed to shine back once again. (In the controversial clause, which was dropped on the floor of the Lok Sabha, it was envisaged that an MP would be disqualified from Parliament "if he has been expelled from a political party with the procedure established by the Constitution, rules or regulations of such a party." Apart from the opposition, a vast majority of the Congress(I) members were also opposed to this. The controversial clause would have vitiated inner-party democracy. Some senior ruling party members, like Mool Chand Daga and Narain Chand Parashar, while speaking in the meeting of the Congress(I) Parliamentary Party, pointed out that the dadas of the district towns would be in a position to hold the legislators to ransom by threatening them with expulsion from the party and thereby the Legislature, if this clause were to be passed.

The opposition to the clause came from as many as 13 of the 15 speakers at the CPP(I) meeting. Apart from two lawyers who have been elected to the Rajya Sabha, Madan Bhatia and Murlidhar Bhandare, almost the entire party opposed this. Priya Ranjan Dasmunshi, former union ministers Bhagwad Jha Azad, Kumudbehn Joshi, Vijay Naval Patil (now AICC(I) joint secretary) and Mohammad Usman Arif, former cabinet minister and Governor, A. P. Sharma, former Uttar Pradesh chief minister Sripati Mishra, Sharad Dighe and K. S. Rao joined CPP(I) secretary M. C. Daga and the Himachal Pradesh parliamentarian, N. C. Parashar in attacking the clause. Rajiv Gandhi patiently listened to this criticism. In the very first session of the eighth Lok Sabha, the ruling party provided inner-party criticism. This was a major departure from the Indira Gandhi days. He took his critics, both within the party and in the opposition by surprise by letting the clause remain in the Bill while it was tabled and then by suddenly withdrawing the clause at the end. He also took the opportunity of exposing the opposition's disunity. Initially, the largest opposition party, the Telugu Desam along with Farooq Abdullah's National Conference and the "friendly" Anna DMK had supported the clause. This led the Prime Minister to mock the other "national" opposition parties, by pointing out to them that he could listen only to the parties which had a strength of at least 20 MPs. The opposition could not provide effective opposition to the Bill even initially. On the first day when the Bill was mentioned in the House, the opposition leaders, Sharad Pawar and Madhu Dandavate did not provide even a feeble protest. K. P. Unnikrishnan, who is among the seniormost members on the opposition benches, was also not heard on the first day, though later when the discussions took place with the Prime Minister, he played his due role.

In the past two decades, over 2,200 legislators have crossed the floor. Altogether 212 ministers have acquired their positions due to defections, 15 chief ministers have come to power due to defections. Now that era is over. Interestingly, four of the present 14 cabinet ministers have been defectors—Rao Birendra Singh in the Sixties, Virendra Patil (who was the Janata candidate against Mrs Indira Gandhi at Chickmagalur), Abdul Ghafoor and K. C. Pant (who were in the Congress(U) after 1978)—constitute more than one-fourth of the cabinet which introduced the historic bill in Parliament.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

KARNATAKA

The End of an Alliance

Janata Party-BJP alliance breaks up before Assembly polls

Like most divorces, it ended in rancour and recrimination. In the last week of January, the Janata Party and the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) in Karnataka, which had maintained an uneasy relationship for two years against odds, finally fell out. The parting of ways came after a squabble over sharing of seats for the Assembly polls in March.

The ending of the two-year-old alliance was widely called a "divorce," even by the leaders of the two parties. For the past two years the BJP had been accused of "grumbling" because, in spite of its support to the Janata government led by Ramakrishna Hegde, it has consistently criticised the shortcomings of the government.

There was little inkling that the alliance would end so abruptly. Despite their uneasy marriage, it was widely believed that the two parties would somehow arrive at an agreement. They had done so for the Lok Sabha polls, after some initial misunderstandings. But the Lok Sabha elections itself turned out to be the turning point in the relationship. The Janata Party had fought 23 seats, giving four to the BJP and one to the CPI. The BJP lost all four seats, three of them by a margin of over one lakh votes. This caused some leaders in the Janata Party to speak disparagingly about the BJP's performance (the Janata Party did not lose any seat by a lakh votes).

Ramakrishna Hegde

Subsequently, when talks began about the sharing of seats for the 5 March Assembly polls, there was a large discrepancy in the "demand and offer" of seats. But the differences were not only over seat sharing. Even the atmosphere in which the talks were conducted was full of tension. There were also hawks in both camps. The Janata Party itself was split on continuing the alliance with the BJP. Most of the Janata Party leaders felt that the relationship would go against the Janata Party's chances in the election. Some leaders felt that the party would lose the minority votes if it had an alliance with the BJP. They backed this premise with the argument that the Muslims had supported the Janata Party in a big way in the 1983

Assembly elections. The BJP had then fought alone. Again in 1983, the Muslim League had campaigned against the Congress(I), indirectly helping the Janata Party. The Janata Party-BJP alliance would now erase all that, it was argued.

This hawkish group had a big say in the negotiations. Not even Ramakrishna Hegde's plea that the Janata Party had a "moral obligation" to fight along with the BJP due to the latter's unstinted support to his government for two years, helped. Said B.B. Shivappa, president of the state BJP, "Even as the talks began, we could feel that many Janata Party leaders simply did not want a seat adjustment. Talks were just a formality that preceded the sabotage." In the end, the BJP leaders walked out in a huff.

The BJP had demanded 40 seats out of the 224 comprising the Karnataka Legislative Assembly. The Janata would not agree to more than 24. The BJP had 18 sitting members in the dissolved Assembly and its first condition was that all the 18 seats should be left to them. That apart, the BJP wanted 14 other constituencies where it came second to the Congress(I) in the 1983 elections. But the BJP also demanded eight more seats where the party felt it had a "good chance of winning." Some of these seats have sitting Janata Party MLAs, and in some other places the BJP did not contest in 1983. The BJP's logic behind the demand of 40 seats is that it also needs to survive as a political party and not just an appendage of the Janata Party. Said Shivappa: "Suppose we agree to 24; we are not going to win all. So the next time the Janata Party will give us just the seats we have won. Our party will go on shrinking."

The break-up is a severe setback to the Janata Party's chances of coming back to power. But the Janata Party leaders seem undaunted by the reverse and are now pinning their hopes on the minority and backward class votes. Soon after the defeat in the Lok Sabha elections, Ramakrishna Hegde had told SUNDAY that the intelligentsia did not support the Janata Party. Now the Janata leaders are confident that the urban votes will go to the Janata Party.

Besides the BJP, the Janata Party is also not sure of support from the two Communist parties. Both the CPI and the CPI(M) claim that they have been given a raw deal by the Janata Party in matters relating to seat-sharing. More recently, the spectre of NTR's Bharat Desam hangs over Karnataka in the form of a "Kannada Desam."

Chidanand Rajghatta, Bangalore

CONGRESS(I)

Ticket Bazaar in Delhi

Heavy rush for Congress(I) tickets for Assembly elections

A gold rush for Congress(1) tickets for the Assembly elections in March has begun. Roughly 2,500 constituencies, spread over 11 states and the union territory of Pondicherry attracted two-and-a-half lakh bidders most of whom were in New Delhi to give their cases a final push. "Look at the rush. I am meeting more than 500 people everyday," said Srikant Verma, newly-appointed general secretary of the Congress(1), not so much with weariness at having to handle the "unprecedented dash" as with pride that so many were really lining up at his gates. "And the remarkable thing is," he continued, "the number of young people that have come this time. Our new Prime Minister has generated new hope and enthusiasm in the youth.., there is a new force coming up."

Whether it was due to a "new will for political work" that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has "generated' among the young or just a matter of political opportunism is debatable. but youth presented itself conspicuously in the Congress(I) ticket bazaar.Leaders just out of college, the street-corner rallyist from some district town, the Youth Congress(I) activist who has worked for the 20-point programme first with Sanjay Gandhi and now with Rajiv Gandhi and the one who went about talking of his "personal contribution" to the Family Planning Scheme: they were all hoping to hitch their wagons to the lucky star. "Rajivji ke saath rajniti ne chhalang lagaya hai, hum bhi kyoon na kuden (Politics has taken a leap with Rajiv Gandhi, why should we not jump into the fray too)?" asked Khardusan Singh, a young ticket-seeker from Madhya Pradesh, confident that age would tilt the balance in his favour.

Srikant Verma's room at 24 Akbar Road, the AICC(I) headquarters, was

Sandeep Shankar

Ticket-seekers for the UP Assembly elections patiently waiting at UP Nivas spilling over with bio-data, thousands of them from every corner of the country going to the polls in March. Against one stack of papers sat Rampujan Prasad, an old man from Bhojpur in Bihar, bent on sheaves of foolscap, penning details about his life: the number of times he went to jail during the freedom movement, the numerous occasions when he came to Delhi to speak, his unflinching loyalty to the Congress. "I have written these things so many times without result but this is thelast,"he said, adding his own bit to the stack. Rampujan Prasad's history would perhaps remain unread. Not many in the Congress(I) today are interested in histories and as Srikant Verma himself admitted, "It is impossible for me to go through all the material." Besides, the AICC(I) was never the real stage of the ticket-drama.

Instead, undisclosed venues were in fashion. The stock answer for any question about where a particular state committee or sub-committee was discussing ticket-distribution was: "Nobody knows." On 30 January a huge crowd of ticket-seekers had gathered at the Maharashtra Sadan on hearing that Maharashtra chief minister Vasantdada Patil was holding a meeting there. Within minutes, however, it was learnt that the entire team had slipped away to Parliament House. There was a dash for Parliament House but the party had left again, this time for an "undisclosed venue."

Similar were the tactics adopted by leaders from other states too but soon the ticket-seeker came up with a counter strategy. They split up into groups, one at the state Bhawan, another at the concerned minister's house and yet another stationed in the lobby of a five star hotel. The state guest houses in the capital functioned as nothing but political brokerages. The busiest and the liveliest were the state Bhawans of Bihar, Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh. A mini-township had come up in the area as it always does on such occasions.

At the Madhya Pradesh Bhawan, lists of Congress(I) VIPs in town with the phone numbers had been pasted, but "on instructions" the authorities were not saying who was staying with them. There was a big queue for booking calls to various places in the state. On the lawns a shamiana had been erected. The ticket-seekers were all crowded around the reception desk trying to find out who was meeting whom and where. Near one of the side entrances stood a blue Contessa car, drowned in a restless cluster waiting for the MP chief minister to emerge from his room. But before Arjun Singh, P.C. Sethi came out from another door. "Sethiji, Sethiji," the crowd rushed forward and Sethiji was immediately swallowed up by frantic, passionate petitioners. But Mr Sethi was already in his car and drove away without a word. "Arre ab inki baat nahin chalti ab to Scindia ka jor hai (Nobody listens to him now. It is Scindia who matters)," remarked one bystander as Sethi moved off.

There were so many centres of decision-making and so different were the levels of people involved that even sitting MLAs of the Congress(I) often did not know where matters were being clinched. Some who had gone campaigning to Kamalapati Tripathi's residence came back totally disillusioned. "Panditji said he was helpless and left for the Rajya Sabha," said Narmada Shankar. He was one of the many who had come from UP in search of a ticket.

The scene kept shifting from one venue to another, from one group to another and finally, from one committee to another. Srikant Verma had claimed that with the "democratic committee system we have eliminated lobbies in the party" but how flourishing lobby-politics is in the Congress(I) was only too clear. Maharashtra chief minister Vasantdada Patil is being besieged by supporters of union home minister S.B. Chavan and the rest of the "Maharashtra Congress Syndicate." Former Bihar chief minister Jagannath Mishra is ganging up with AICC(I) treasurer Sitaram Kesari and Bihar PCC(I) president Bindeshwari Dubey to embarrass chief minister Chandrashekhar Singh. In Madhya Pradesh it is chief minister Arjun Singh versus P.C. Sethi versus Madhavrao Scindia. In Karnataka, K.H. Patil is duelling with Gundu Rao. If the reaction of ticket-seekers was any indication, it was quite a see-saw battle. "Sabki alag alag dukan hai, jiski dukan par jada bheed samjho usi ka bolbala" (Everyone has his own shop and the one most crowded is the strongest in the market), was how Mirza Haleem, a bearded old man from Bahraich put it. Most leaders had their own lists, the more names you had on them, the more powerful you were, the more crowds you gathered.

"All these committees are quite a hoax. What ultimately matters is how much money you have, what your caste is and who you know in Delhi," scoffed one man at the Uttar Pradesh Niwas. He apparently knew he stood no chance. How big the rush was for hitting the Congress(I) jackpot was even more evident after a round of the opposition party offices. They remained unhurried, quiet and rather placid.

SankarshanThakur, New Delhi

RAILWAYS

Musical Chairs at Rail Bhavan

The reshuffle of senior bureaucrats continues

Rail Bhavan is the problem-pit of the central government's bureaucracy. It is perhaps, more prone to controversies than any other department. In the last three years many major squabbles have broken out in Rail Bhavan, all of which have had to be sorted out by the intervention of the top brass. In late 1981 the then railway minister, A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury had a difference of opinion with the then Railway Board chairman, M.S. Gujaral, and after a bitter battle finally succeeded in shunting him out. In June 1983 Mr Ghani Khan Chowdhury was again in the news. This time he was on a collision course with his minister of state, C.K. Jaffer Sharief. Mr Sharief had complained to the Prime Minister about the way the railway minister was "squandering railway funds" in his home constituency in Malda, in West Bengal. A peeved Ghani Khan Chowdhury was also reported to have withdrawn most files from him. At one time, Sharief's powers were curtailed so much that he spent most of his time in Bangalore, his hometown. In 1984, immediately after the train accident in Byculla, Bombay on 22 November, K. T. V. Raghavan, chairman of the Railway Board and C.K. Swaminathan, member (traffic) were "forced" to proceed on leave. The railway minister's excuse was, of course, the accident at Byculla, but Rail Bhavan gossip had it that both were being "punished" for "opposing the pampering of Malda" by the railway minister. Both were "reinstated" within ten days, due to the intervention of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. Ultimately it was Ghani Khan Chowdhury who left Rail Bhavan soon after the elections. Controversies, however, continued to dominate Rail Bhavan despite his departure.

Bansi Lal

On 30 January, the Rail Board chairman, K. T. V. Raghavan retired at the end of his term and almost immediately Rail Bhavan's circular corridors started buzzing with speculation. Who would the next chief be? Would it be a new man, the choice of the new minister, Bansi Lal, or would Raghavan get another six-month extension? Would there be another shakeup in the railway hierarchy? There was suspense for one full day and then it was announced that J.P. Gupta, member (staff) of the Railway Board would be the next chairman.

Why was K. T. V. Raghavan not given another extension even though Bansi Lal was said to have recommended it? Why did J. P. Gupta supercede C. K. Swaminathan, the seniormost member of the Railway Board after Mr Raghavan? Why was Mr Gupta selected if he is due to retire on 30 June, barely a month after Swaminathan is scheduled to retire? If Mr Gupta does not get an extension, he will have the shortest-ever term a Railway Board chairman has had.

The official reason being given for the decision not to grant another extension to Mr Raghavan is that extensions are taboo with the pre sent regime. Another factor, however, which might have contributed to the denial of an extension to Mr Raghavan was his role during the regime of Ghani Khan. It was common knowledge that Raghavan, along with some other senior officials actively opposed the Malda operations of Mr Ghani Khan. Spending Rs. 56 crores on the construction of air-conditioned rest houses, new railway staff quarters, recreation rooms and a swimming pool for a district-level railway station like Malda was simply not palatable to these officials. The Prime Minister, it is said, has taken exception to officials having such "extra constitutional interests." This is what, perhaps, messed up Swaminathan's chances, too. He was one of Mr Raghavan's chief lieutenants in the anti-Ghani Khan, anti-Malda lobby.

What seems to have gone in J. P. Gupta's favour is more than just his non-involvement in "extra-constitutional" activities. He is known to be a good management man, a field that is in vogue with the new government. About five years before becoming member (staff) on 1 August 1984, Mr Gupta had had a fairly successful stint as director of management services in the Railway Board. An added advantage for him, perhaps, was that his career graph looked more professional, from 1963 to 1967 Mr Gupta was a railway adviser to the West German government. He is a Jamalpur apprentice, and therefore, the cream of India's railway engineering cadre. But the game of musical chairs has begun in the Railway Board all over again. A phase of uncertainty will grip the railways unless Mr Gupta's tenure is specified. If his innings is to end in June, then the line of succession should be clear. Otherwise, chaos will prevail.

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

First an Indian, Always an Indian

On 29 January 1985, when folk dancers from different parts of India called on the Prime Minister at Teen Murti House, Mr Rajiv Gandhi sportingly donned their colourful costumes and headgear. He certainly drove home the point that in India there is unity in diversity.

Photographs by Central Newsphoto Service

PUNJAB

Still No Solution

No change in stands of the centre and the Akalis

With Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi categorically refusing to even discuss the controversial Anandpur Sahib resolution of the Akali Dal and with terrorists threatening their lives, Sikh leaders including the five high priests of the Akal Takht and the leadership of the Akali Dal and the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC) today find themselves in a difficult situation. The recent developments have also bewildered the people in Punjab who were hoping that a solution was finally round the corner.

Most people were hopeful because Rajiv Gandhi was expected to solve the Punjab problem after he assumed office with a massive mandate behind him. Things however, have started taking a turn for worse when the Panthic leadership called the Anandpur Sahib Resolution the basic instrument of policies and programmes of the Akali Dal and the Sikh community and the only basis for any negotiations with the centre. Junior leaders are also demanding the release of party chief and morcha dictator Sant Harchand Singh Longowal from jail on the grounds that he was the only leader to begin talks with the centre.

The Akali Dal ad hoc committee convenor Jathedar Surjan Singh Thekedar and Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee acting President Prem Singh Lalpura have gone on record to say that there can be no settlement without the Anandpur Sahib Resolution as the basis. They have asserted this even after Rajiv Gandhi has made it clear that there could be no discussion on the Anandpur Sahib Resolution, let alone treat it as the basis of any dialogue between the centre and the agitating Akalis. Describing the resolution as secessionist and separatist in nature, Rajiv Gandhi has, however, said that the Akalis were free to place it before the Sarkaria Commission already appointed to examine centre-state relations. This offer on the other hand has not found favour with the Akalis and other Panth leaders who in face of extremist pressures are finding it difficult to climb down from their stand.

The attack on Jathedar Kirpal Singh has made things still more difficult for the Panth leadership. They are aware that if they climb down from their stand on the resolution, the terrorists would not spare their lives. Central and state intelligence agencies and security experts in Punjab feel that the lives of the leaders are in danger anyway. This has already been brought home by the attack on Giani Kirpal Singh.

Intelligence sources believe that besides his good luck, Giani Kirpal Singh owes his life to the lack of training of his would-be-assassins. Following the attack, the state administration has offered the five head priests top security cover, but they have declined to accept the offer. Their refusal has placed more responsibility on the local police. But the lackadaisical constabulary may not be able to save them from the determined extremists.

The attack on Giani Kirpal Singh has scared every important leader of the Akali Dal and the SGPC as well as the five head priests. While some leaders of the Akali Dal and the SGPC have accepted the security provided by state agencies, others have made their own security arrangements. The Akali and SGPC leaders are keeping their movements a secret. Very often, they first decline invitations to attend social ceremonies but turn up at the last minute. Political observers are now wondering how this latest impasse created by the determined stand taken by the central government and an adamant Akali leadership on the Anandpur Sahib Resolution was going to be overcome and the union government would release the top leaders or even Sant Longowal to pick up the threads of the talks once again. However, experts feel that attempts to sort out the issues might not be easy since the assault on Giani Kirpal Singh and a shootout at Dasuya in Hoshiarpur district in which two persons were killed and two others injured have once again proved that the law and order situation in the state continues to be far from normal.

The five head priests of the Akal Takht: terrorists' targets

Rita Sharma, Chandigarh

BUREAUCRACY

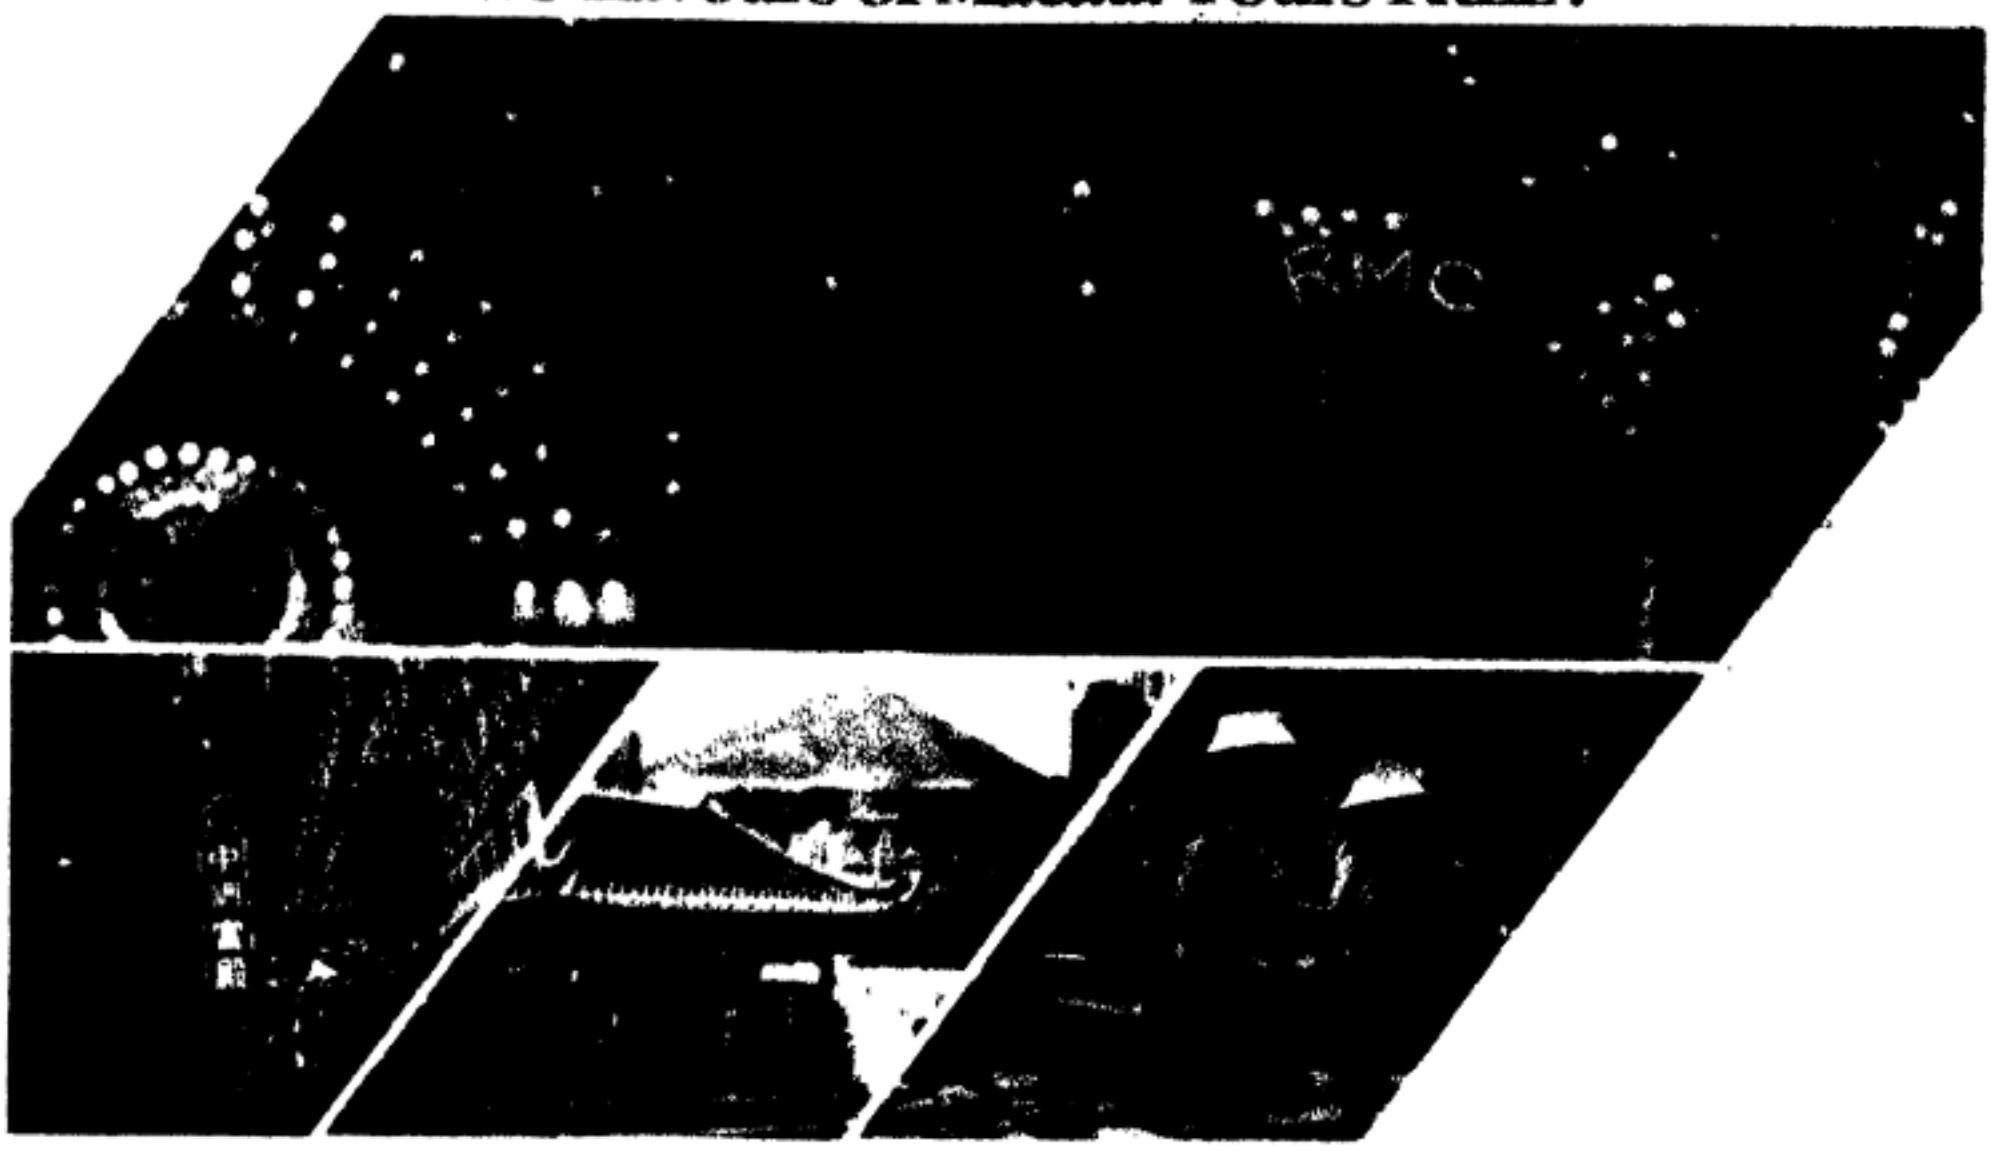
The Old Order Changes

New faces in the Prime Minister's office

With the sudden departure of the Prime Minister's principal secretary, Dr P. C Alexander in the aftermath of the spy scandal, Arun Singh, parliamentary secretary to the PM has clearly become the most important figure in the Prime Minister's office, second only to the PM. Arun Singh is a chief of staff of sorts. Today the PM's office is in a rather amorphous state with the functions of the various officials overlapping each other. The advent of the three new parliamentary secretaries (Oscar Fernandes, and Ahmed Patel are really there to assist Arun Singh) has led to the departure of the ever-present special assistant to the PM, R K Dhawan and the transformation of that post to a non-political one. Significant changes are shortly expected in this office B Y. Venkatram, a joint secretary has replaced R K. Dhawan and his job is a completely political one.

These changes have involved the restructuring of the PM's office, the most important one being the abolition of the post of principal secretary Pandit Nehru's private secretaries held the rank of joint secretary: H V.R. Iyenger was Nehru's second private secretary, and was succeeded by A V Pai Trilok Singh, Nehru's first private secretary held on to this post for only a few days.

A decision may soon be taken to replace the principal secretary by the parliamentary secretary, a post resurrected after about 18 years. Lalit Sen who was Lal Bahadur Shastri's parliamentary secretary was the last incumbent to this job. While most of the political work previously done by Dr Alexander and R K. Dhawan is now being looked after by Arun Singh, Gopal Krishna Arora, one of the three additional secretaries in the PM's office has emerged as a key man in administrative matters and is at present handling some of Dr Alexander's duties. Mr Arora, who was once special assistant to D.P. Dhar, is handling the portfolios of defence, home administration, including the crucial appointments committee and some economic matters.



The new Prime Minister who was occupied with the Lok Sabha elections until now has got down to reorganising his office and perhaps, redefining the roles of some of his secretaries At present there is only one official with the rank of secretary to the government. H.Y. Sharda Prasad, with the designation of "information adviser," looks after information and publicity and is the official spokesman. Dr Arjun Sengupta, who was promoted to special secretary last year and was responsible for economic affairs, will soon be India's director on the IMF board in Washington D C. His replacement is Montek Singh Ahluwalia, a Rhodes scholar, who has been given the rank of additional secretary. C.R.N. Gharekhan, a career diplomat, is responsible for foreign affairs and is getting increasingly tied up with foreign trade.

V.S Tripathi, designated as "adviser" and who resigned from the IAS last year, now looks after rehabilitation, home and the implementation of the 20 point programme and information and broadcasting. The creation of the posts for three parliamentary secretaries has resulted in Tripathi ceasing to liaise with political administrators. His designation is now personal adviser to the Prime Minister. Tripathi had previously handled the home ministry, monitored intelligence and worked on the appointments committee. Arvind Pande, an IAS officer from the Madhya Pradesh cadre, a Cambridge graduate in economics who worked in the World Bank in Washington, looks after science and technology, wild life, environment and is also involved with economic affairs as joint secretary

Arun Singh, Oscar Fernandes and Ahmed Patel being sworn in by Rajiv Gandhi as Parliamentary secretaries

History by sunlight ... glamour by strobe light.
Two flavours of Macau. Yours FREE!

Brought to you by

CAPSTAN flavourscapes

Holidays at handpicked places, blended with the flavour of unforgettable experiences.

Macau and mainland China Free with Bangkok, Pattaya and Hong Kong.

An hour's hydrofoil ride from Hong Kong lies a magnificent island locked in time: Macau.

A city which is a unique blend of the 16th and 20th centuries. History whispers in its cobbled streets, crumbling forts and sleeping churches, unfolding the romantic nostalgia of a bygone era. But once the sun sets, Macau transforms itself into a tinsel world of the 20th century casinos, baccarat, roulette, blackjack and the Crazy Paris Shows--a riot of amusement and glitter.

Capstan offers you the unforgettable flavour of this oriental kaleidoscope with the added attraction of a trip to mainland China.

Capstan brings you this unrivalled experience of Macau and mainland China Free with Bangkok, Pattaya and Hong Kong.

Flavourscape Macau in a 11 day holiday package covering Bangkok, Pattaya, Hong Kong, Macau and mainland China.

Flavour is the Capstan world.

Capstan has searched the world and handpicked experiences to give you a truly memorable holiday. Now there are no other holidays. Just flavourdays.

And many more flavourscapes for you from only Rs 5999/- onwards.

Capstan Flavour. Nothing Less.

Tours subject to RBI approval.

CLARION C-CFK-7

For details of Capstan Flavourscapes contact.

TRAVEL HOUSE

We make travel simple And flavourful

Head office: 102 AVG Bhawan, M-3 Middle Circle Connaught Circus, New Delhi and branch offices at- Royal Insurance Building, 14 Jamshedji Tata Road, Bombay and all Welcomgroup hotels : Maurya Sheraton, New Delhi. Mughal Sheraton, Agra. Banjara, Hyderabad. Sea Rock, Bombay. Chola Sheraton, Madras. Windsor Manor, Bangalore. Mansingh, Jaipur. Cidade-de-Goa, Goa. And all Air India offices or your Travel Agent.

In co-operation with AIR-INDIA

STATUTORY WARNING: CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

The perfect gentleman.
He always wears a Cherry smile.

LINTAS(CI/CB/34/2416

The PM's office has three directors: Wajahat Habibullah (son of the former major general E. Habibullah) of the Jammu and Kashmir cadre, who is involved with the implementation of the 20-point programme and prepares messages for the Prime Minister to sign. He assists both Sharda Prasad and Tripathi. Rajeshwari Tandon, from the Indian Tourism Development Corporation is the new social secretary. Her predecessor Ms Usha Bhagat, who used to teach Rajiv and Sanjay Gandhi many years ago, resigned from the PM's office shortly after Indira Gandhi's death.

The director who has, perhaps had the longest innings in the PM's office is N.S. Sriram who assists G.K. Arora on home affairs and defence matters. He was personal assistant during Pandit Nehru's time and has been in the PM's office since then. The PM's office has since 1970 been a pivotal centre, with a smaller, parallel centre of power at 1, Safdarjang Road. In Rajiv Gandhi's regime, 1 Safdarjang Road has ceased to be a mini-White House. Power is, today concentrated in the first floor of South Block. Says one of the officials in the PM's office: "Nobody is asked to come to the PM's house any more. Now the PM is here and he calls people to the office."

Moreover, Rajiv Gandhi has reduced the daily morning darshan to thrice a week and that too from 8.00 am to 8.30 am. There has been a quickening of the tempo in the PM's office as well. The PM, characterised by bureaucrats as "a man in a hurry," wants "everything done yesterday." His car reaches South Block at 10.00 am sharp, not 10.01 or 10.02 am." And "he is here until late in the evening often after ten." Rajiv Gandhi, incidentally keeps his Sundays free, spending time with his family.

There are other signs to show how the office is gradually changing to the image of its new master. The department of elections is in the process of installing a new computer, near Dr Alexander's former office. It is a change with continuity as the men in his office say. The most obvious change, other than the black-outfitted but polite commandos, is the palpable tension in the air after the spy scandal.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

ANDHRA PRADESH

Congress(I) in Confusion

Telugu Desam confident of victory in the Assembly elections

After its crushing defeat in the Lok Sabha elections in the state, the Congress(I) remains unable to make any headway. There is also no evidence of any moves to revitalise it in order to face the Assembly elections, with any confidence. Such is the level of despair into which the Andhra Pradesh Congress(I) leadership has fallen after its debacle in the Parliamentary elections, that the party made practically no effort to win the two byelections to the Lok Sabha and the results were almost a foregone conclusion with the Telugu Desam Party raising its tally in the Lok Sabha to 30 seats by winning the byelections in Srikakulam and Rajampet. Byelections were held on 28 January in these constituencies because the elections were countermanded due to the death of independent candidates. As the Telugu Desam Party chief Mr N.T. Rama Rao had confidently predicted both Telugu Desam candidates scored convincing victories winning by over one lakh votes.

However, none of the Congress(I)'s senior leaders in the state campaigned seriously for the party candidates, most of them saving their energies for the forthcoming Assembly elections. At Rajampet, the party had fielded a "fresh candidate" but at Srikakulam it was Mr B. Rajagopala Rao, one of the senior-most members of Parliament who lost to Mr H. Ayyappa Dora of the Telugu Desam. Mr Rajagopala Rao has represented

Vengal Rao

Srikakulam since 1952 except for a single term in 1964 when he lost by less than 10,000 votes. This time, Mr Rajagopala Rao could get only labour minister Mr T. Anjaiah to speak to his coastal Andhra electorate. At Rajampet, Mr S. Palakondarayudu of the Telugu Desam defeated Mr A. Sai Pratap of the Congress(I).

The Congress(I) high command has decided not to change the present APCC(I) set-up till the Assembly elections are over despite the fact that both Mr Vengal Rao and Mr K. BrahmanandaReddy are waiting to take over the leadership of the party in the state. Neither of them wanted to be associated with the candidates in the byelections and the youthful leadership of the APCC(I) president Dr Y.S. Rajasekhar Reddy made no impact in the election campaign. On the other hand, the points that he suggested Mr Rajiv Gandhi raise in his election meetings in Andhra Pradesh—including a reference to Mr N.T. Rama Rao not being able to continue for a full term like the Janata government at the centre, only reminded the public of the Congress(I)'s help to Mr N. Bhaskar Rao.

For both former chief ministers Mr Vengal Rao and Mr Brahmananda Reddy, the Lok Sabha elections have not been easy affairs. Mr Brahmananda Reddy, who headed the State Coordination Committee was defeated in his home constituency of Narsaraopet. Though Mr Vengal Rao was elected from Khammam, it was the one constituency in the state where the Telugu Desam sponsored seat adjustment broke down. Both the Communist parties, the CPI and the CPI(M) fielded their candidates at Khammam and the combined votes of the CPI and the CPI(M) candidates were more than the total votes polled by Mr Vengal Rao. Both the leaders face strong opposition within the party and they have few supporters since they have not been actively involved in the state politics for some time.

None of the other Congress(I) leaders in the state have the stature to counter the Telugu Desam leader Mr Ramarao. Nor can they draw large crowds. The Congress(I) will have to fall back on the Telugu filmstars though even the crowds at the meetings of popular heroine Jamuna and hero Krishna who has an organised fan club were not very large. With the Assembly elections due on 5 March, Congress(I) members are hopeful of doing well because their candidates polled more votes than the opposition candidates in 70 Assembly segments in the Lok Sabha elections though they could win only six seats.

Shubha Singh, Hyderabad

RAJASTHAN

Catching Smugglers and Spies

New measures to tighten security network

After the recent discovery of the spy ring in the capital, a number of counter-intelligence agents have begun operations in the border state of Rajasthan. The government has tightened security measures after the recent disappearance of some important documents and is trying to check the large-scale smuggling and gun running operations across the Indo-Pak border. Right after Operation Bluestar, the central government had claimed that a large number of arms found in the Golden Temple were smuggled into India across the Indo-Pak border through Rajasthan which has a long border with Pakistan, stretching from Ganganagar to Barmer. Rajasthan chief minister Shiv Charan Mathur quickly denied the central government's version, claiming that smuggling of Pakistani arms into Rajasthan was unlikely because the state government had been keeping a strict vigil. The denial, however was as perfunctory as it was quick, as official figures show that large-scale smuggling is still continuing.

Bhairon Singh Shekhawat

At a press conference in the third week of January 1984, the director general of police said that goods worth over Rs. one crore had been seized by the police in a special anti-smuggling drive in two districts of Barmer and Jaisalmer alone in 1984. The figure does not take into account the district of Ganganagar from where most of the smuggling of arms and ammunition into Punjab took place.

Unfortunately, there is hardly any rapport between the Border Security Force (BSF), the other central agencies and the state police. According to reports in most cases, no action is taken against the smugglers by the police. In fact, the leader of the opposition of the Rajasthan Legislative Assembly Bhairon Singh Shekhawat, openly alleged in April last year, that sophisticated arms being used by the terrorists in Punjab were smuggled into the country from Pakistan through the Jaisalmer region. His allegation that the activities of Pakistani spies were increasing every day was dismissed by the government as a political stunt. But he was proved correct when four important top secret maps disappeared from the tehsil headquarters at Nachna in Jaisalmer in August 1984. The maps contained details of the Rajasthan Canal command area and the strategic bridges and roads in the area.

Just over a year ago, two Pakistani spies were arrested in the Rajasthan Canal area and important documents seized from them. More recently, two officers and a driver of the Central Bureau of Intelligence were caught smuggling a large number of tape recorders and calculators from Pakistan in their official jeep.

Milap Chand Dandia, Jaipur

Will the French Arms Deal Fall Through?

SUNDAY learns that unless the French government comes out as soon as possible to explain who exactly is Lieutenant-colonel Alain Bolley, France's chances of getting the contract for a very large weapons deal will fall through. It is understood that the government of India was on the threshold of deciding on "the source of supply" of defence equipment that involves anti-aircraft and anti-tank rockets among other things. This deal is said to be even bigger than the original Jaguar deal.

Others in the running for this anti-aircraft and anti-tank rockets supply contract were the British, Germans and Italians as one group and individually the French, the Swedes and the Austrians. The French seemed the most likely to clinch the deal due to India's friendship with France as well as the increasing arms purchases from France. Last year, France signed a 510-million dollar deal with India involving the purchase of 40 multirole Mirage-2000 combat planes. India has been moving away to other shopping centres when shopping for arms, in order to decrease her dependence on the Soviet Union. Hitherto, the bulk of the weaponry came from the Soviet Union. In recent years, Britain, Sweden, France and Germany have been approached and given lucrative contracts.

As France comes closer to India, the British, the Germans or the Swedes do not seem to be happy from the commercial angle. It is generally accepted that French technology in the weapons system is the best in the world. The French naturally would give weapons only to those countries with which they are politically close. This political closeness had been delicately nurtured in recent years by the late Prime Minister Indira Gandhi.

With the exposure of the French diplomat and two other French businessmen, the whole episode has become an embarrassment to the French government. If it is proved that the French government is behind Alain Bolley's activities, it could embarrass the French government no end, particularly since it has been claiming friendship with India.

The spy drama that is currently unfolding is two-pronged. On one level is the sale of information to benefit a commercial deal running into crores of rupees. The other is political espionage relating to the country's defence preparedness in case of an attack from neighbouring countries. One does not know at this stage whether the two are inter-related. But what is interesting to know at this moment is whether the spy drama was unearthed following the tipsy utterance of an assistant of Coomar Narain, the liaison man of a Bombay-based manufacturing group. Or, was it a deliberate leak by a superpower like the British, wanting to embarrass the French?

Olga Tellis, Bombay

What Has Happened to the Larkins Case?

Just when people in India were waiting for the outcome of the Larkins espionage case which began 15 months ago, they received another jolt with the news of the involvement of officials from the President and the Prime Minister's Secretariat in another spy case.

The spy ring which was busted in November 1983 allegedly involved three former senior army and air-force officers and an arms dealer working allegedly for the American Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

Larkins (extreme left) after being arrested by the police

Thanks to the vigilance of group captain (now air commodore) Jasjit Singh, in the air force headquarters major general F.D. Larkins (Retd.), his brother air vice marshal K.H. Larkins (Retd), Lt col Jasbir Singh Malik and the arms contractor Jaspal Singh Gill were arrested.

The Larkins brothers were the first to be arrested on 10 November 1983. Then on 13 November, Jasbir Malik was apprehended and on 19 November, Jaspal Singh Gill was arrested in Bombay. The case was handed over to the police about three weeks after the arrests of the Larkins brothers.

The counter espionage wing of the Delhi Police took up the case with the help of the Intelligence Bureau when Jasjit Singh informed the senior officials that the accused had approached him for certain classified documents in April 1983. The police charge-sheeted the accused within 90 days of their arrest. In between, Mr Gill was granted bail by the Sessions Court. His bail was however, later cancelled by the Supreme Court. The bail petitions by the other three were also rejected. All the accused are in judicial custody in Tihar Central Jail.

At present, the case is under trial in the court of the Additional Sessions Judge of Delhi, Mr J. D. Kapoor and the proceedings of the case is going on in camera. The police have [illegible] 200-page charge-sheet [illegible] of the [illegible] court, [illegible] and meetings with different officials, foreigners and the nature of secret documents they had passed on to their contacts.

As in the present case, the Larkins brothers were in touch with a foreign diplomat. In fact, Harry L. Wealtherbee, an American, was asked to leave the country in November '83 after the case came to light. Of the 60 prosecution witnesses including senior officers of the army and air force listed by the police, 26 have been questioned so far. They include Lt general E.Q. Pattengell (Retd.), whose secret telephone diary was found in the house of Jaspal Singh Gill, air commodore Jasjit Singh, on whose behest the case came to light, and air vice marshal C.V. Gole. The other important prosecution witnesses to be examined are air marshal S. Raghavendran, air vice marshal M.L. Sethi, major general Kailash Chand (Retd.), Lt general [illegible] Sinha (Retd) and Mr V.I. Chacko, protocol officer in the external affairs ministry. The additional chief metropolitan magistrate of Shahdara who had recorded the confessional statement of F.D. Larkins also deposed before Mr Kapoor, on 25 January 1985.

In November 1981, the special branch of the Delhi Police had arrested Rajan Bakshi, a young lawyer at the Patiala Courts in New Delhi and a dark room assistant in the navy headquarters Subash Pachbhave for allegedly passing on classified documents of the Indian Navy to Pakistan. Pachbhave was arrested on 21 November 1981. He was caught red-handed near the Jama Masjid while passing on some documents to an employee of the Pakistan Embassy. The next day Rajan Bakshi was taken into custody from his Vasant Vihar residence and the police seized some incriminating documents.

At that time the Indian government had expelled three employees of the Pakistan Embassy for their unlawful activities. They were [illegible] Zaman, Munawwar Ali Shah and Mohammad Marshan. Subsequently against the Indian government action, they published [illegible] employees of the Indian Mission in Pakistan. The [illegible] this case is over and the [illegible]

GUJARAT

Searching for a Strategy

The opposition stands disunited before the Assembly polls

After the failure of the electoral adjustment of the opposition parties in Gujarat in the Lok Sabha polls, the parties are frantically looking for a more viable strategy to fight the coming state Assembly elections. Not only do they have an uphill task, but if the Lok Sabha poll performance is any indication, their chances of dislodging the Congress(I) from power are clearly remote. The opposition won only two of the 26 seats in the Lok Sabha elections, and finished ahead of the Congress(I) only in 43 of the 182 Assembly segments. The Congress(I) won 53.24 per cent of the total votes cast, marginally lower than in 1980. The Janata Party which contested 12 seats, got only 16.59 per cent of the votes cast while the BJP (Bharatiya Janata Party) polled 18.64 per cent. The DMKP (Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party), the third partner in the electoral adjustment of the opposition parties fought only two seats and got 2.31 per cent of the votes.

It was a difficult task to work out the electoral adjustment in the Lok Sabha seats and at the moment it would be more so because of the deep distrust between the Janata Party and the BJP now. The Janata Party workers are seething with indignation over what former Prime Minister Morarji Desai himself described as a "betrayal by the BJP" during the Lok Sabha polls. The BJP had broken the seat adjustment accord in Baroda by nominating a former police commissioner, Jaspal Singh, as a candidate although the seat was allocated for Manubhai Patel of the Janata Party. In the end, both Mr Singh and Mr Patel lost. The Janata Party men in Surat grew dispirited because of the failure in opposition unity in Baroda and the dampening of enthusiasm was noticeable in almost all constituencies.

The traumatic experience has led many Janata Party workers to worry about their party's political future in the state. They pointed out that although the Janata Party fought 12 seats, as against 11 by the BJP, it got fewer votes than the BJP because of BJP's electoral adjustments with communal elements. The Janata Party, they allege, was forced into an adjustment by the Patel lobby which rules the roast in the Gujarat Janata Party. Many party workers were unhappy about the electoral adjustment with the BJP and would want additional safeguards if the Janata Party seeks another adjustment with the BJP for the Assembly polls. What has upset the Janata Party leaders more was the claim by the BJP that it had polled more votes than the Janata Party, although both bagged one seat each only in the Lok Sabha from Gujarat. This was despite the electoral accord which specifically said that no one party would claim the votes as its own because it was a joint effort of the Janata Party, the BJP and the DMKP.

While the Janata Party leaders were groping for a viable strategy, former chief minister and president of the Lok Swaraj Manch, Mr Babubhai Patel, who had formulated the Lok Sabha electoral accord, was once more trying for another adjustment. He sent a letter in the first week of January to the three opposition parties proposing that they form a united front to provide a more formidable challenge to the Congress(I) in the Assembly elections. He recalled that in 1975, parties in the state had come together to form a loose Janata Front, a forerunner of the national Janata Party. Mr Babubhai Patel had become the chief minister of the Janata Front government formed after the 1975 elections and was in power up to 1980, barring a brief period when it was toppled by the Congress(I).

However, Mr Babubhai Patel's proposal did not evoke any immediate response, apart from the DMKP, which was enthusiastic. The Janata Party, while talking of the need to provide a united challenge, could not make up its mind till the third week of January. It got conflicting advice from its top leaders. Mr Morarji Desai was not in favour of loose adjustments, if there was no unity of hearts. Mr Ramakrishna Hegde, chief minister of Karnataka, who came to Ahmedabad to address a Janata Party convention, however, favoured electoral adjustments for the Assembly polls, but described unity efforts as a futile exercise.

Babubhai Patel

Political observers have noted that while Mr Babubhai Patel was dreaming of a resurrection of the 1975-type Janata Front, he tended to overlook that the opposition parties had the 'fallout benefit' of the 1974 Nav Nirman agitation which had made the Congress government very unpopular. Still, the Congress(I) got as many as 75 seats, only marginally less than the Janata Front which could come to power only with the support of some independents.

No such fallout in the coming Assembly polls is likely. Again, Mr Chimanbhai Patel, the chief minister who was toppled by the Nav Nirman Movement is now in the Janata Party. On the other hand, the Congress(I) is very confident of driving home the advantage of the massive victory in the Lok Sabha polls in the Assembly election too. In 1980, the Congress(I) had won 25 of the 26 Lok Sabha seats. Later that year, it bagged 140 out of the 182 state Assembly seats.

With the state Assembly elections in March, the demoralised opposition has to come up quickly with a cohesive strategy for the Assembly polls. Even for the adjustment of the 26 Lok Sabha seats, the opposition leaders faced problems and for the 182 seats for the Assembly polls, it would be even more difficult to reach an understanding. Having learnt a bitter lesson from the BJP's breach of accord in the Lok Sabha poll, the Janata Party would be taking a tougher stand. Then, as the Lok Sabha experience showed, mere electoral adjustment is not enough and the opposition would have to come up with a more convincing and broad-based programme than a one-point strategy of uprooting the Congress(I).

Opposition leaders are drawing comfort from the fact that the Congress(I) is not united either. They hope to draw advantage from the division among the Congress(I) men because while in the Lok Sabha poll, these differences did not matter, in the more localised Assembly election, they would make a very big difference.

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

ORISSA

Biju Patnaik's Last Battle

But the Congress(I) holds the upper hand

Besides the chief minister J. B. Patnaik, the two other leaders who are hoping to return to power in Orissa after the Assembly elections on 5 March are the former chief ministers Biju Patnaik and Nandini Satpathy, although the ruling Congress(I) looks all set to win the polls with a comfortable majority. The Lok Sabha polls have, however, proved that the Janata Party under Biju Patnaik's leadership is a viable alternative to the Congress(I) despite the fact that the Congress(I) repeated its 1980 performance of bagging 20 out of the 21 Lok Sabha seats. That the Janata Party has emerged as the only strong statewide opposition political force was demonstrated from its share of 32 per cent of the popular votes in the 1984 polls against 14 per cent in 1980. While the Janata Party had fielded candidates in all the 21 constituencies in 1980, in 1984 the Party left two seats to its allies: the CPI and the CPI(M). The two Communist parties together had got another 3.3 per cent of the votes which gave the three-party alliance over 35 per cent of the votes.

The improved performance of the Janata Party was evident from the reduction in its margins of defeat in as many as ten Lok Sabha seats, besides a three-fold increase in Biju Patnaik's victory margin in Kendrapara. The second best performance by the Janata Party came in Jagatsinghpur where Rabi Ray was controversially defeated by a margin of 1,087 votes while his margin of defeat in 1980 was over 60,000 votes. The losing margins of Janata Party candidates in the two western Orissa constituencies of Kalahandi and Bolangir were substantially lower than in 1980. The Congress(I)'s share of 57.46 per cent of the votes was a marginal increase of 1.7 per cent over its 1980 figure against the Janata Party's increase of 18 per cent.

Mrs Satpathy's state-based party, Jagrat Orissa, which fielded only three candidates, polled less than one per cent of the votes in the Lok Sabha polls. This performance, however, is no reflection of Mrs Satpathy's actual political strength in the state. While neither she nor any of her party's leading figures contested the Lok Sabha polls, Mrs. Satpathy and two Jagrat Orissa legislators, Balgopal Mishra and Haladhar Mishra will seek election. The party is likely to contest around 90 seats and will go it alone. There is no possibility of an alliance between Biju Patnaik and Mrs Satpathy.

Mrs Satpathy has the least chance among the three contenders of becoming chief minister. The Lok Sabha elections showed a polarisation of political forces in the state between the Congress(I) and the Janata Party leaving by the wayside all other parties except the Janata Party's two Communist allies. While all the defeated candidates belonging to the Janata-CPI—CPI(M) combine retained their deposits, all the candidates of all other opposition parties lost their deposits.

For Biju Patnaik, this will, perhaps, be the last electoral battle of his life. The 70-year-old stalwart, who had an open heart surgery in the USA in 1982 has announced his intention of remaining in state politics and will naturally be the CM if his party is voted to power. His appeal to the people at a recent public meeting had a touch of emotion as he reminded them of his remarkable services to the state during his brief tenure as chief minister in the early Sixties. He called the electorate to give him his "life's last chance to serve you."

J. B. Patnaik

Biju Patnaik

Bhola Chatterjee

Nandini Satpathy

Biju Patnaik hopes that local issues such as corruption, nepotism, irregularities and the deteriorating law and order situation during the four-and-a half-year-old Congress(I) rule which was not a major issue before the electorate in the Parliamentary polls because of national considerations of unity and integrity will greatly influence the voters during the Assembly elections. With fewer resources at his command, Biju Patnaik's hopes of achieving a majority in the 147-seat state legislature will be shattered if the local issues which would go against the ruling party, do not sway the electorate. It would enable the Congress(I) to achieve a repeat of its performance of 1980 when it won 117 seats.

Sarada P. Nanda, Bhubaneswar

NEW DELHI

A House for Rajiv Gandhi

1, Safdarjang Road to be a memorial for Indira Gandhi

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is moving into a new house, leaving 1, Safdarjang Road, which has been the PM's house for 17 years. Renovated at a cost of Rs 15 lakhs, two bungalows, numbers 5 and 7 Race Course Road were selected for the Prime Minister after weeks of scrutiny. Number 1, Safdarjang Road will be converted into a memorial for Mrs Gandhi. The Prime Minister and his family wanted a new house, following the traumatic events of 31 October 1984, when Mrs Gandhi was gunned down on the lawns of 1, Safdarjang Road. After the assassination, top intelligence personnel advised Mr Rajiv Gandhi to shift to a new house. It was decided that a permanent residence for the Prime Minister would be constructed and till it was complete, he would be provided with a temporary accommodation. Before the bungalows on Race Course Road were selected by special teams of the works and housing ministry and the intelligence bureau (IB), houses at Rajendra Prasad Road, Akbar Road and even Teen Murti House which now is a museum, were inspected.

The bungalows renovated by the Central Public Works Department (CPWD) have been the official residences for many prominent persons. The house at 5 Race Course Road, which will be the residential wing of the Prime Minister's house was till recently occupied by Dalbir Singh, the former minister of state for energy. Both Charan Singh and later Giani Zail Singh stayed there when they were home ministers. The house had also been allotted to P.V. Narasimha Rao when he took over the home portfolio. The second bungalow which will be the office wing, was last occupied by Shiv Shankar, former energy minister. Its former occupants include Raj Narain and Vidya Charan Shukla.

The bungalow to the right of the Prime Minister's new house is presently occupied by V.N. Gadgil. The bungalow to the left is to be allotted to Arun Singh. The twin bungalows have been connected by a passage from within the house. The office will be used by the Prime Minister to hold cabinet meetings and host official functions. The office wing will have a conference room, board room and a study for the Prime Minister.

On instructions from the Prime Minister himself, the special task force of the CPWD that took charge of the premises in the first week of January decided that no fresh construction would be undertaken. The Prime Minister wanted the cost to be kept to a minimum, since he would be staying in the house only for a short period. The only new structure being put up is a reception centre outside the office wing and the original design of the bungalows, built in the Thirties, has been retained. The impressive reception centre erected at a cost of Rs 4.5 lakhs is made of prefabricated material. A module of high-density opaque fibreglass with a golden corrugated sheet on the roof has been used. The roof rests upon galvanised structures with insulated glass panels. The entire reception area will be fire-resistant, sound-proof and weather-proof.

Vinod Jha, chief executive of Zenith Systems Building, the company constructing the reception,said that the entire module was erected in a record time of two weeks and will take the same time to dismantle and erect it at the PM's new residence. "The reception will be the first of its kind in the country and will meet all the security specifications given to us," he told SUNDAY. He added that the reception will have a large room for security personnel, headed by an assistant commissioner of police and senior members of the Prime Minister's security staff. There will be a communication wing, equipped with telephones, hotline connections, telex and teleprinter machines.

In the large, well-furnished reception, the PM's staff will screen all visitors and guide them to the waiting room. Visitors to the house and office will have to alight from their vehicles, pass the reception and if cleared by security, walk through a metal detector to the office. Even the Prime Minister's close friends and cabinet ministers will not be permitted to drive their vehicles inside. Regular traffic at the race course will be prohibited and the Gymkhana Club (which faces the PM's house) and the residence of V.N. Gadgil have been provided with alternate entrances and surrounded by barbed wire fencing.

The latest technology will be used for the PM's security, details of which are being kept secret. For both the bungalow entrances, hydraulic gates made in Pune have been installed. They open and close electronically. A boundary wall topped with wire fencing has also been erected and after a three-foot gap there are impregnable earthen embankments across the front and back of the bungalows. In between, commandos armed with sten-guns and carrying portable wireless sets slung to their belts, will maintain vigil. Though it has not been disclosed, it is understood that commandos of either the Indo-Tibetan Border Police (ITBP) who were in charge of security at 1, Safdarjang Road after Mrs Gandhi's assassination, or members of the crack force of the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF) will be on duty.

However, the PM has requested the intelligence agencies to keep security inside the house down to a minimum. He has even expressed a desire to reduce the number of domestic staff. The house itself has a built-up area of around 3,000 sq. ft. and will have a large pillared porch in front, a drawing room with a built-in fireplace, a dining room, a bedroom for the Prime Minister and his wife and one room each for the Prime Minister's children, Priyanka and Rahul.

Senior CPWD officials working at the site, described the house as "modest by any standards." They also pointed out that because of its old architecture, there were some inbuilt disadvantages. For one, the house has as many as ten entrances which will be a security hazard. When this correspondent visited the house and went around the rooms, masons, carpenters and plumbers were working 20 hours a day in an effort to finish the job. Said Ramchandran, a mason who had previously helped in the renovation of 1, Safdarjang Road: "The structure of the house is very old. But since we have been told not to change even the paint on the windows, we are leaving it as it is."

The renovation has been handled by CPWD workers, electricians, and 20 CPWD engineers. Heading the team is Harish Chandra, chief engineer, New Delhi zone who did not want to disclose the nature of his assignment because "it was a sensitive subject." He, however, said that the renovation has been monitored and supervised by the intellligence men. Other workers said that commandos of the ITBP were always present at the site, sometimes dressed as workers. Some professionals, including Sharat Das, the chief architect of the Indraprastha Stadium were asked to visit the site and give their advice on the progress of the work.

Though it is Mrs Sonia Gandhi who is "in charge" of the operation, the Prime Minister has himself seen the work in progress on two occasions. On 1 January, he was accompanied by Arun Singh and was taken around the office and house and is said to have suggested some minor changes. In almost all matters like the colour of the walls or the design of furniture for the reception, the opinion of the first lady was sought. The entire house will be painted white, the favourite colour of the PM. The couple have asked the workers not to fix any ceiling lights or wall lights, as almost the entire house will be lit by pedestal lamps as in the Prime Minister's former residence. To economise on cost and to retain the old-fashioned style, the workers have not replaced the 50-year-old Persian tiles in the fire place, the outdated ceiling fans or the door-handles of the house.

Sonia Gandhi: in charge

Once the family shifts on around 10 February, the search for a permanent residence for the PM will begin. An announcement is likely to be made shortly, inviting architects to participate in a national competition. Though the site has not yet been decided, a location within the sprawling Presidential estate is being considered. The deadline given by the Prime Minister to complete construction of his new house is December 1985 though according to CPWD officials the house is likely to be completed only in 1986. Till such time the house is built, the Prime Minister will live in his temporary well-guarded residence, an accommodation which was described by a leading architect as "far from suitable for the Prime Minister."

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

ENVIRONMENT

Under a Canopy of Acid

Unprecedented levels of pollution in Bombay

The people of Bombay, the commercial capital of India which has an industrial belt in Thane-Belapur unrivalled by any other industrial region in the country, have had to pay a high price in terms of pollution. While environmental science is a relatively new concept in India, Maharashtra has been a pioneer state in enacting water and air pollution laws. Last November, it set yet another record in this field with the amendment to the Motor Vehicles Rules to curb automobile pollution. "It is estimated that automobiles are responsible for about 50 per cent of the pollution in Bombay," said Mr C. D. Oomachen, chairman of the Maharashtra Pollution Control Board. In collaboration with the traffic commissioner and transport commissioner, over 500 car owners have received warnings and have been told to send their cars to garages for repairs as their cars emitted carbon monoxide beyond the permitted limit. Almost all the cars belonging to the ministers in the Mantralaya were "found guilty" when subjected to the test.

However, despite the plethora of laws which cover most of the aspects of environmental pollution, Bombay's citizens are increasingly becoming victims of pollution. Environmentalists believe that the heavy misting over Bombay particularly during the winter months of January and February is because of a photochemical smog caused by automobile exhausts. Heavy concentrations of carbon monoxide, one of the deadliest pollutants from petrol vehicles, and smoke from diesel cars and trucks causes smog.

One of the more dangerous effects of automobile pollution in Bombay is the little known fact that children living in slums on either side of the Express Highway develop a low IQ because of the constant inhalation of lead dust from motor exhausts. It is also believed that many criminals escape the clutches of the police because automobile exhausts make it difficult for police dogs to pick up the scent of the culprits. Despite the 42nd amendment to the Constitution of India which among other things says that the protection of the environment is the duty of every citizen, conscientious citizens and officials like Mr C. D. Oomachen are fighting a losing battle against state-owned corporations and foreign multinational companies.

In Chembur, a suburb of Bombay and the home of oil refineries, the prestigious Bhabha Atomic Research Centre and a host of fertiliser and chemical factories, as well as film studios, people are literally living under a canopy of pure acid. Human beings, as one environmentalist said, "are not made of stainless steel, so one can imagine the incalculable damage being done to the human system." Chembur has the highest rate of lung and respiratory diseases and according to another environmentalist, the largest number of miscarriages occur in pregnant women living in Chembur.

It is ironical that the central government which has a ministry for environment and forests is one of the biggest culprits. Citizens and the Special Committee on Environmental Safety are presently fighting a losing battle with the giant state-owned Rashtriya Chemicals and Fertilisers (RCF) Ltd., to close down its old nitric acid plant. A report following the visit of the committee members to the plant in Chembur recommended that "it is not safe to operate the old nitric acid plant in its present condition." This is one of the ten recommendations dealing with every aspect of this giant plant which is responsible for creating acid rain in the area, particularly, during the monsoon and on days when there is heavy dew. The committee found that the control panel in the old nitric acid plant is faulty, the feed flow rate is not indicated at all and there are no standby storage tanks for methylamine and nitric acid.

The operators of the plant are not trained to handle abnormal operational problems like the rise of pressure in the system and are not properly conversant with safety devices like self-contained breathing apparatus. There is no continuous monitoring for ammonia and hydrogen in the ammonia plant, carbon monoxide in the methanol plant and oxides of nitrogen in the nitric acid plant. The safety valves and pressure indicators in the ammonia, methanol, methylamine, sulphuric acid, nitric acid and phosphoric acid tanks are either corroded or are not functioning properly. The committee found a total of 14 major deficiencies in the plant.

Early this month, the RCF's Thal-Vaishet plant was responsible for the death of a three-year-old child, Dhore V. Swamy, son of one of the Kamathi workers. While there was a controversy as to whether the child died of ammonia poisoning or pneumonia, the fact even according to the police is that the child died of ammonia poisoning. During the trial run of the plant from November 1984, the waste stored in a one lakh-cubic metre open storage tank was left untreated as the equipment for the treatment plant had not arrived. The soil of the Konkan being porous, the ammonia from the untreated effluent gradually seeped into the soil and affected the surrounding area. With the Bhopal tragedy still fresh in the minds of the people there was a scare of an ammonia leak in the area which is across Bombay harbour. The Maharashtra Pollution Control Board issued a prohibitory order against the unit "for wilfully violating the conditions of the no-objection certificate issued by them and asked them to meet all conditions by 17 January." The RCF asked for time till 31 January when its treatment plant is expected to be completed under the supervision of an American company.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

KERALA

Expensive Paper

Are shredded rupee notes being used by paper mills?

The next time you write make sure the paper you write on is not worth a few thousand rupees. It could be possible, if the 20 bundles of shredded rupee notes, found unclaimed in a suburban railway station in Kerala, finds its way to the Punalur Co-operative Paper Mills, Areeplacheri. A source, close to SUNDAY discovered the bundles in remote Punalur railway station, a short distance from Shenkotta in Kerala last week. Altogether 20 sacks containing neatly shredded rupee notes which should normally have been burnt in an incinerator by the Reserve Bank of India were found.

Investigations by SUNDAY revealed that the consignment seemed to have been booked from Bombay under the consignee, director (paper), Khadi and Village Industries Commission, Bombay. The railway receipt details point out that it could also have been loaded from Nasik Road. The railway receipt number 678095 P. 20 containing the inscription of Punalur Khanka Co-operative Areeplacheri was not immediately traceable in the Madras railway station through which the parcel could have been routed.

Normally, thousands of rupee notes are collected and bundled together and examined by the representatives of the RBI and the scheduled commercial and other banks before being sorted out and marked for destruction. Every day, in all the RBI offices all over the country, thousands of kilos of such shredded notes are incinerated. For instance, in Madras, there are seven or eight incinerators in operation every day burning up tonnes of rupee notes. Enquiries by SUNDAY show that there is no procedure to enable the paper mills or any other user to make use of the shredded rupee notes. It is surprising how such a huge consignment could have bypassed the tight security and found its way to the Punalur station.

Talk of using the high quality rupee notes after "defacing" (the term employed by the Reserve Bank for the notes after shredding operations are complete) for making paper or paper mache dolls have been going on since the early Fifties when the total value of the notes in circulation was around Rs 5,000 to Rs 6,000 crores. But now, the value of notes in circulation exceed Rs 25,000 crores making it impossible to provide for adequate precautions before being used for pulping purposes. "The best way out is to burn all the shredded notes under tight security," said local bankers. In fact, the Reserve Bank of India had recently imported a number of high velocity shredders and fast burning incinerators to speed up the process.

The paper manufacturers in the country, at the height of the paper shortage in the Seventies had demanded through the Indian Paper Mills Association (IPMA) that they be allowed to use the high quality shredded rupee notes. After examining all the relevant procedures, the Reserve Bank turned down their request on grounds of security. It is not known how the Punalur Co-operative Mill was able to secure such a huge quantity of top-security shredded paper. But according to some people at the railway station, the paper was not meant for the Punalur paper mill but for use in a small private, paper-making plant near Kottayam, Kerala being run by a retired railway station master.

Some railway men told SUNDAY that the paper bundles may have been booked as waste paper from Nasik Road or Bombay and according to the usual procedure, the railways may have accepted the consignment and forwarded it to the Punalur station. "After all, we handle tonnes of waste paper including imported paper every day. Only last week we handled a whole container train load (40 wagons) of imported waste paper," they added.

After booking the parcel, a forwarding note is sent to the concerned railway at the receiving end. The party who books the consignment, sends the copy of the railway receipt to the consignee and both are tallied by the receiving station's officials before the parcel is handed over. "There is no way the railways can find out whether the parcel booked is what the consignment note says or not," said local railway sources. "If there was a standing instruction from the government not to accept such cargo from Nasik or Bombay, the railways would be obligated to check up each and every consignment. It is possible that the consignment escaped the railway's notice," he added.

Mr D.P. Sethi, director (paper), Khadi and Village Industries (KVIC), Bombay, said that they were experimenting for the first time with shredded notes from the Reserve Bank of India, for repulping purposes. The KVIC has about 400 units making recycled paper mostly in backward areas and is the only source of employment for the poor in these areas. Altogether 263 units are presently working while the others are in various stages of being set up. The KVIC provides financial assistance, technical knowhow and even raw material to these units as they are for the benefit of the poor in backward villages. Mr Sethi said that "earlier, the Reserve Bank used to sell shredded notes through tenders to paper mills. So we approached them and said that there is a demand for this from our production units and the government of India agreed to give it to us. It is the first time that we are going to experiment with repulping with shredded notes. At the cooperative paper mill at Punalur, they will be doing the repulping on a trial basis."

T. Raman, Madras and Olga Tellis, Bombay

Water and Sunlight for Energy

A team of scientists in England has found a way of splitting water into hydrogen and oxygen using light. The experiment helps achieve commercial production of a pollution-free fuel that is hydrogen. Moreover, it is an attractive method of producing a conveniently stored source of energy from unlimited supplies of water and sunlight, especially as a replacement for natural gas, the first of the natural energy supplies likely to run out.

New Artificial Ligament

A new artificial ligament designed by surgical engineers and textile experts in England now comes as a blessing for those with damaged knees or joints. The new ligament, which is abrasion-resistant, helps reduce post-operative convalescent time. Patients do not need to have their limbs in a plaster for months anymore. Now, it is a matter of days. For nearly a decade, orthopaedic surgeons have been using implants made of carbon fibre. The combined research is aimed at improving still further the behaviour of the carbon fibre ligaments both during surgery and in use. The advancement has come through a careful combination of a carbon fibre core encased by a new polyester sleeve. Carbon fibre is ideal for ligament replacement because it is not rejected by the body, and acts as a "scaffolding" for the growth of new tissue.

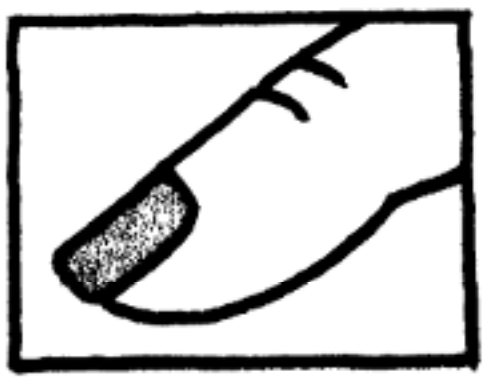
Mirrors for Better Vision

Mirrors come to the rescue of artists, designers and draughtsmen suffering from tunnel vision. In this disease, a region of blindness forms around the central fovea of the eye, which then spreads onwards to the periphery of the retina, at the same time moving more slowly inwards. As only a small portion of the viewed surface is visible, the artist or designer has great difficulty in controlling the balance of a composition, painting or design.

The system involving mirrors works in this way. A large plain mirror about 90cm×60cm is mounted above and behind the user. A second, smaller mirror approximately 20cm×15cm is placed directly onto the working surface or desktop. By adjusting the tilt of the large mirror and its distance from the head, the user can see a large portion of the work surface and his hand reflected in the small mirror. Ths has the effect of increasing the distance to the work surface and reduces the size of the overall image so that the user can see much more in a small space. After two or three minutes' practice, the artist or designer can draw or paint while looking at the reduced image in the mirror, without referring to the original object, book illustration, photograph or small sketch. Even tunnel vision sufferers who wish to play large board games or have an interest in art will benefit from the mirror system.

Detector that Checks a Corpse

A West German electrician, Dieter Robers, has designed a device which can detect whether a corpse is really dead. It will prevent persons who have been officially proclaimed dead, but are, in fact, still alive, from undergoing a very nasty experience. The equipment picks up signals of brainwaves. As soon as such impulses occur, a booster triggers off an alarm system. The air-tube provided with the device to be fitted into the coffin is of greater psychological importance, for there can be no greater nightmare than the thought of being buried alive.



Robers began working on his invention following a harrowing experience he underwent seven years ago. "My uncle Josef had been officially proclaimed dead, and was laid on his back in the coffin," he explained. "When the coffin was opened in the family vault shortly before the funeral, Uncle Josef was lying on his side. He had moved."

Wanted: Iodine-Enriched Salt

Nearly ten million people in West Germany suffer from goitre due to iodine deficiency, although the complaint may not always be clearly visible. Lack of iodine means an alarmingly high incidence of goitre due to thyroid trouble. Iodine deficiency is mainly a nutrition problem: nearly all food other than fish and seafood contain too little iodine to ensure an adequate supply. People might need an intake of only 150-200 millionths of a gram per day. The disease particularly affects infants. Using iodine-enriched salt is an effective means of checking goitre.

Just Press your Finger

If you want to measure your blood pressure, you do not have to use the sphygmanometer. All you have to do is press your finger onto a small pad. This blood-pressure device is called the Finger-sphyg, and is being developed by Britain's Oric medical company. It doesn't involve the sleeve being rolled up, is less time consuming and the doctor doesn't have to stop work to take a reading. It will give an electronic readout of both blood pressure and heart beat in an easy-to-read digital form. Besides, it can be used by both the layman as well as by the trained professional.

Illustrations Prabu Sen

Headache?

The one solution ANACIN

Trust its extra pain relieving power.

Anacin contains more of the pain reliever doctors the world over recommend.

Effective for the aches and pains of colds and flu, headache, toothache, backache and muscular pain.

Trust only Anacin.

Now in a protective foil pack.

Strong and trusted

ANACIN*

India's No. 1. pain reliever

GM-2-R-84

* Licensed user of T.M : Geoffrey Manners & Co. Ltd.

SCIENCE

ARTHRITIS

Tracing the Cause

The treatment of rheumatoid arthritis has made unhappily slow progress. Scientists know a lot about the symptoms of the disease, but its causes have remained obscure. That is beginning to change. As with other mysterious diseases (such as AIDS), the culprit could be a virus.

Rheumatoid arthritis is the kind that affects joints throughout the body and not just in old age; it ruins many people's lives. The symptoms have been neatly described as the body's over-reaction to injury. Normally, when tissue becomes injured in a joint, chemicals called prostaglandins are released from the damaged cell walls. They in turn can help encourage the immune system to clear up the damage It deploys two kinds of cell to do its work: white blood cells to release antibodies which attach themselves to any foreign substances present, and monocytes to gobble up the debris.

In arthritis, however, the inflammatory process runs amok. The immune response fails to remove the initial cause of injury; the body starts making antibodies to fight its own naturally occurring antibodies.

The most common treatment for arthritis uses aspirin-like drugs. These interfere with prostaglandin synthesis (some also prevent the movement of immune cells to damaged tissue), but they cannot stop the progression of disease because they attack its symptoms

So what is the cause? One thing is for sure: studies with identical twins have revealed a definite genetic link. This has been pinned down to a gene called HLA DR4, which is common to about 60 per cent of rheumatoid-arthritis sufferers. It belongs to a class of genes which code for proteins that act as identity markers, helping the body to distinguish itself from what is foreign. They also help to control the immune system. But the HLA DR4 gene is present in 22 per cent of the population, whereas only one per cent get rheumatoid arthritis. So other factors must trigger the disease.

Some believe viruses are the prime candidates. Most viruses remain hard to detect, even with fancy new techniques. Some are very small, others seem to disappear once inside the cell, by incorporating themselves into the cell's own genetic material. There is convincing evidence that one virus can trigger chronic arthritis in old goats, but for man there is only circumstantial evidence:

- Some viral infections can cause temporary bursts of arthritis in the body's joints on top of other symptoms. Ross-river viruses, transmitted to man by mosquitoes can cause epidemics of arthritis. Rubella virus, or even rubella vaccination, induces arthritic symptoms
- Excessive quantities of antibodies designed to attack various viruses, including cytomegalovirus, have been detected in the blood of people suffering from rheumatoid arthritis. However, the presence of antibodies to these viruses might simply mean that the arthritic patient is less capable of dealing with infection.
- Viruses have also been identified in tissues taken from synovial membranes (which encase joints), or cells cultured from them. The most recent example has been provided by Dr Robert Simpson and his colleagues from Rutgers university in New Jersey, who have detected the presence in arthritic patients of a virus similar to the parvovirus that is normally associated with illnesses in cats and dogs.

By arrangement with* The Economist

VARIETY

This India

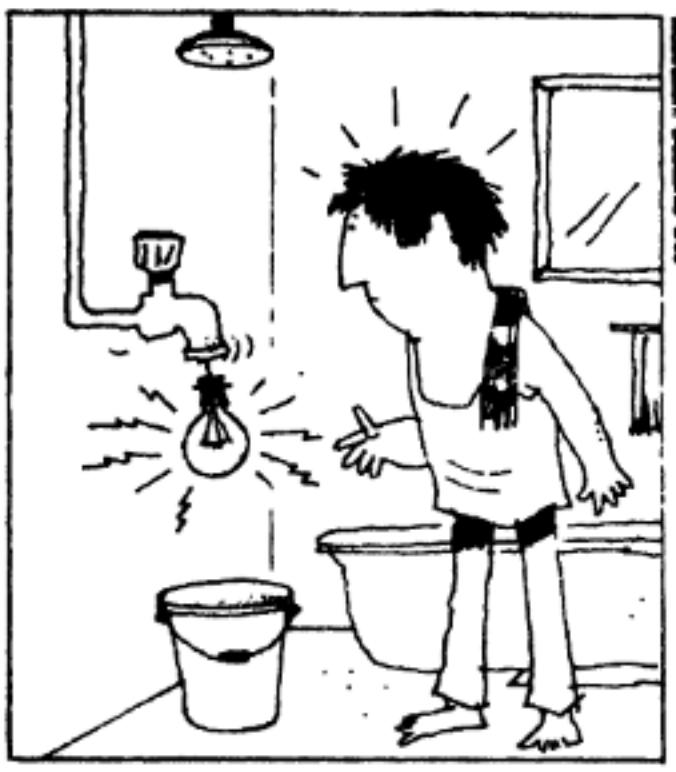

Illustration: Debarshi Das

NEW DELHI: If you have a problem with the water supply, you go to the Municipal Corporation; if you have a problem with the power supply, you go to the Delhi Electric Supply Undertaking. What happens, however, when you get electricity through water taps? This is what some residents of the MIG flats in Sheikh Sarai in south Delhi had to figure out on 14 January. When they opened their taps that morning, water came in great gusts seasoned with electric current—The Hindustan Times (K. Chakraborty, Calcutta)

AMBALA: At times a peon or a gardener is ordered to officiate as headmaster of a government school in a village in Patiala. This has been under the orders of the headmaster of Government High School, Khellan village, seven kms from here—The Tribune (Surinder Arora, Ludhiana)

NEW DELHI: Stengun-toting and walkie-talkie equipped police personnel stormed into the branch office of a multinational company at Connaught Place here on 7 December on being informed of a "clash". But the policemen were stunned when they were told that a woman staffer of the organisation had decided to call in the police when her boss refused to settle a quarrel she had with the canteen boy—The Hindustan Times (Veenu Bhatia, Dehradun)

MADRAS: Two English cricketers steered two college girls to safety and away from a watery grave. Bruce French and Jonathan Agnew had been given time off from the Chepauk test to visit Mahabalipuram on 15 January. As they were wading in the sea, they heard cries of 'help' from a panicky pack of college girls. As luck would have it, French and Agnew responded to their call. It was a tough swim for both as the current was strong. Indeed, at one point, both were as close to being sucked in as the two girls they were trying to rescue. The cricketers managed to bring in the two girls to safety and also render them emergency-aid measures—The Hindu (C. S. N. Murthy, Bangalore)

SHAMLI: "Amitabh Bachchan," was the prompt but sarcastic reply of a rustic, witty, old farmer to the poser—"Who can rule the country now?" The question was asked by Dr Z. Nazir, a close associate of Dr Farooq Abdullah, at the first election meeting in UP addressed by the DMKP leader, Mr Charan Singh, on 6 December. The answer evoked peels of laughter—The Times of India (Sanjay Chandwani, Allahabad)

DINDIGUL: Manickam, belonging to a village near Karur, has been sitting atop a 156-foot police control tower here since the morning of 21 January, refusing to come down. He says he has been sent to jail 20 times for various offences and now wants to live as a good citizen. But the community does not permit him to do so. Repeated requests to the authorities to help him financially for his rehabilitation have gone in vain—Indian Express (N. Balan, Madras)

SABARIMALA: A young tusker was among the hundreds of beggars who had spread their towels along the pilgrim path for alms from those climbing the hillside to the shrine of Sabarimala — The Times of India (Prasanna Kumar Das, Rourkela)

NEW DELHI: It was an amusing case of kissa kursi ka regarding the seat of the chairman of the standing committee of the Municipal Corporation of Delhi on 22 January with three Congress members occupying it within a span of 30 minutes—an all-time record! The standing committee meeting to consider the budget of the water undertaking started with Mr Jagdish Anand occupying the chairman's seat as both the deputy chairman, Mr Fazlur Rehman, and the chairman, Mr Jai Prakash Agarwal, were not present. Fifteen minutes later Mr Anand had to vacate the seat as the deputy chairman arrived. Much to everyone's amusement, Mr Rehman had to leave the chair another 15 minutes later as Mr Agarwal turned up—The Times of India (Sumathy, New Delhi)

Without Comment

The unhappy marriage has ended in divorce—B.B. Shivappa, Karnataka BJP president, announcing the end of the BJP-Janata Party alliance, in The Statesman

Veerappan (Tamil Nadu information minister) has called me a 'Phoolan Devi.' He needed a Phoolan Devi to conduct the AIADMK election campaign, which left to themselves they knew they would not be able to manage—Jayalalitha in The Week

Rajiv (Gandhi) himself is enjoying a classic politician's honeymoon, during which he can essentially do no wrong—S. Nihal Singh, former editor of The Statesman, in Newsweek

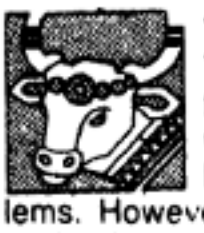
I think the boys are in a much better mood for settlement—Rajiv Gandhi, on the Assam issue, in India Today

A cricketer has to be treated as a human being, he has to be honoured for his talents; his dignity has to be respected; you cannot, must not, exploit him—Ashok Mitra, West Bengal finance minister, in The Illustrated Weekly of India

Our greatest battles lie ahead...We can change America forever. That's some great and beautiful music we've been playing the past four years—but the way I see it, from here on it's shake, rattle and roll—Ronald Reagan in International Herald Tribune

Bombay is far more professional...In Bengal they tend to spoil you. There is so much more love and forgiveness, that your faults are overlooked—Moon Moon Sen in Frontline

BEGINNING 10 FEBRUARY 1985 BY AMRITLAL



ARIES (15 April—14 May) Success in your ventures is a certainty for all of you this week Professionals and businessmen will make steady progress. Lovers will find their parents extremely compromising. On the economic front most of you will gain money or property through an unexpected source However do not involve yourself in legal matters this week
Good dates: 10, 11 and 13
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 4
Favourable direction: South-east

LEO (15 August—14 September) There is good news for those unemployed. a job is in the offing. Those employed will find their colleagues and superiors extremely cooperative. This is an ideal week for marriage negotiations. On the economic front, some of you will gain through inheritance The week-end will be a socially hectic one. Those above the age of 40 should be vigilant about their health.
Good dates: 12, 14 and 16
Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: North-west

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) This is an extremely lucky week for businessmen and gamblers; do not hesitate to invest in risky ventures. The domestic front will remain inspiring Your financial position will improve. For those in service there is good news you will be promoted or transferred to a place of your liking The period is equally favourable for marriage.
Good dates: 10, 13 and 14
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: East

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) This is a week of mixed fortunes Domestic problems will bother you. You will also be plagued by financial problems. However, this is a good period for professionals: some of you may even get a promotion Businessmen will bag lucrative deals. Your health will improve markedly during this phase. The week is also favourable for love and marriage negotiations
Good dates: 11, 12 and 14
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: North

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) The stars are favourable to all of you this week Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans. Professionals and businessmen will make steady progress. The domestic front will remain peaceful. Your financial status will also improve, but avoid extravagance. Those above the age of 45 should be careful about their health.
Good dates: 10, 12 and 14
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: South

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) Financial gains from unexpected quarters are in store for you this week. The professional front will remain inspiring. At home your children and wife will be a source of joy. However, one of your close relatives may suddenly fall sick. Things are not so bright for lovers: a misunderstanding may lead to estrangement. Watch your health closely.
Good dates: 11, 14 and 15
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 7
Favourable direction: North-east

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) Social engagements will keep you occupied but do not neglect your job. On the domestic front a minor upheaval will disturb you. Financial loses are also indicated. However, those in business will find this period very favourable. do not hesitate to take risks. Friends will prove very helpful, particularly in love affairs. Your health will improve.
Good dates: 12, 13 and 15
Lucky numbers: 3, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: West

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) This is not a good week for those in love petty quarrels and misunderstandings may lead to estranged relationship Your health will also bother you throughout this period. Businessmen should be wary of deception. check all documents meticulously. However, this is a good period for those employed in the private sector.
Good dates: 11, 13 and 15
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: North

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) Friends and colleagues will be trying to embarrass you: do not enter into unnecessary arguments and deal with them diplomatically. Financially this is a good week but you will face problems recovering debts. This is a favourable phase for artists and sportsmen. Lovers will also find this period favourable. But keep a close eye on your health.
Good dates: 12, 13 and 14
Lucky numbers: 6, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: West

CANCER (15 July—14 August) This week enemies will be out to harm you do not rely on your friends and relatives on crucial matters. Your deteriorating health will add to your worries. Be prepared for setbacks on the professional front However, this is a good period for those in love The phase is equally favourable for gamblers and speculators. A letter will bring good tidings.
Good dates: 13, 14 and 16
Lucky numbers: 4, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) This week your domestic front will pose fresh problems do not be upset and deal with those at home diplomatically. On the financial front you may lose heavily if you indulge in risky ventures. Businessmen in particular should be careful while taking up new assignments. However, this is a favourable period for love and marriage.
Good dates: 12, 15 and 16
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: South

PISCES (15 March—14 April) This week you will be occupied with parties and social engagements but do not over-strain yourself as this will have an adverse effect on your health. Businessmen and professionals will make steady progress while sucess is in store for sportsmen. The domestic front will remain peaceful. However, this is not a favourable week for marriage negotiations.
Good dates: 10, 13 and 16
Lucky numbers: 4, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: South

For those born on the 11th, 12th or 13th of any month:

Most of your are born leaders and extremely good in oratory You will prosper in the legal profession. You may also join politics. Your tendency to dictate over others makes you unpopular at times. But you have no dearth of friends and admirers who look upon you for advice. However, some of you are arrogant. Women born during this period are very social by nature and their pleasing temperament makes them ideal housewives.

VARIETY

CHESS

Continuing last week's theme of useless extra pawns, I give a further and even more deceptive example of the value of an extra pawn, however lame it may at first sight appear to be.

In the endgame, which quickly arises, Black warms to the task of picking off White's sick isolated pawns, only to find he cannot do so without in return losing some of his own healthy connected ones. As a result he finds his own forces driven into increasing disarray, so that by the time material equilibrium is finally re-established he is quite lost.

White: L. Polugaevsky. Black: G. Sosonko. Queen's Gambit Ragosin System.

1 P–Q4 N–KB3 2 P–QB4 P–K3
3 N–KB3 P–Q4 4 N–B3 B–N5
5 PxP PxP 6 B–N5 P–KR3
7 B–R4 P–KN4 8 B–N3 N–K5
9 N–Q2!?

A nice idea. If 9 . . . NxQN 10 PxN BxP 11 R–B1 BxP? 12 Q–R4+ N–B3 13 RxN or 11 . . . BxN+ 12 QxB with clear compensation

9 . . . NxB 10 RPxN P–QB4!
11 PxP N–B3 12 P–K4 BxN!
13 PxB Q–K2 14 Q–K2 B–K3
15 PxP BxP

Sosonko (Black)

Polugaevsky (White) to move

Black appears to have equalised the game White's ragged extra pawn cannot be worth anything – unless of course Black tries to win it back

16 QxQ+ NxQ

Already haring off in the wrong direction. Correct is 16 . KxQ concentrating on development and forgetting about pawns.

17 B–N5+ K–B1 18 O–O R–B1
19 P–QB4 B–K3

Committed to his plan of winning back the pawn On 19 . B–B3 20 N–N3 everything is protected and White is better developed.

20 N–K4!

Announcing that he is not going to give up the front QBP for nothing. If 20 B–B4 21 N–Q6 RxP 22 NxNP.

20 . . . P–QR3 21 B–R4 BxP

Regaining his pawn, but the wrong one.

22 KR–Q1 P–B4 23 N–Q6 RxP
24 NxNP R–Q4 25 R(Q1)–QB1!

Now Black will be made to pay for the weakening effect of 22 . . . P–B4. The seventh rank is now open

25 . . . B–N4 26 B–N3 R–K4
27 R–B7 K–N2 28 N–Q6 R–K7
DIAGRAM
29 P–QR4! Resigns.

If 29 . B–Q6 30 R–Q1, else 29 . . B–K1 30 B–B4 and Black's rook is driven off the K file – 30 R–K4 31 P–B4 R–K6 32 K –B2

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE

The Canadian player and writer Eric Kokisb remarked recently that modern bridge experts clearly ranked a cut above those of the past. Another Canadian, Frank Vine, questioned this, recalling some deals played in the 1950s, on one of which I played a walk-on part.

Dealer North Love all

	♠ 9 4 3 ♥ A K 4 ♦ A 4 ♣ A 10 9 8 6
♠ 10 5 2 ♥ J 5 2 ♦ Q 10 9 8 2 ♣ 7 5	N W E S	♠ ♥ Q 10 9 7 6 ♦ K J 7 6 3 ♣ K Q 2
	♠ A K Q J 8 7 6 ♥ 8 3 ♦ 5 ♣ J 4 3

North opened One Club I overcalled with One Heart, and South, Johnny Crawford, soon reached Six Spades My partner, Leslie Dodds, led the 2 of hearts.

It looks as though the declarer must fall back on the combination finesse in clubs However, these hands where you hold all the top controls offer many chances, and Crawford's line was to play off five rounds of trumps. He arrived at this position

	♠ – ♥ A 4 ♦ A 4 ♣ A 10 9
♠ – ♥ J 5 ♦ Q 9 8 ♣ 7 5	N W E S	♠ – ♥ Q 10 6 ♦ K ♣ K Q 2
	♠ 7 6 ♥ 8 ♦ 5 ♣ J 4 3

South now played ace and another diamond, on which I had to throw a heart, followed by ace and another heart. Then I was end-played in clubs.

Reverting to the general question, I don't think that in Britain there has been any improvement among the top players. Add to Gray, Meredith, Konstam, Dodds, Albert Rose, half a dozen or more who are still with us (just), and you won't find their equal among the moderns

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. What is the hygrometer used for?
2. Where in India, is the National Institute of Sports?
3. The deficiency of which vitamin in the human body leads to scurvy?
4. Rabindranath Tagore wrote the Indian national anthem. Who wrote the national song?
5. For what is the Uber Cup awarded?
6. The Majlis is the parliament of which country?
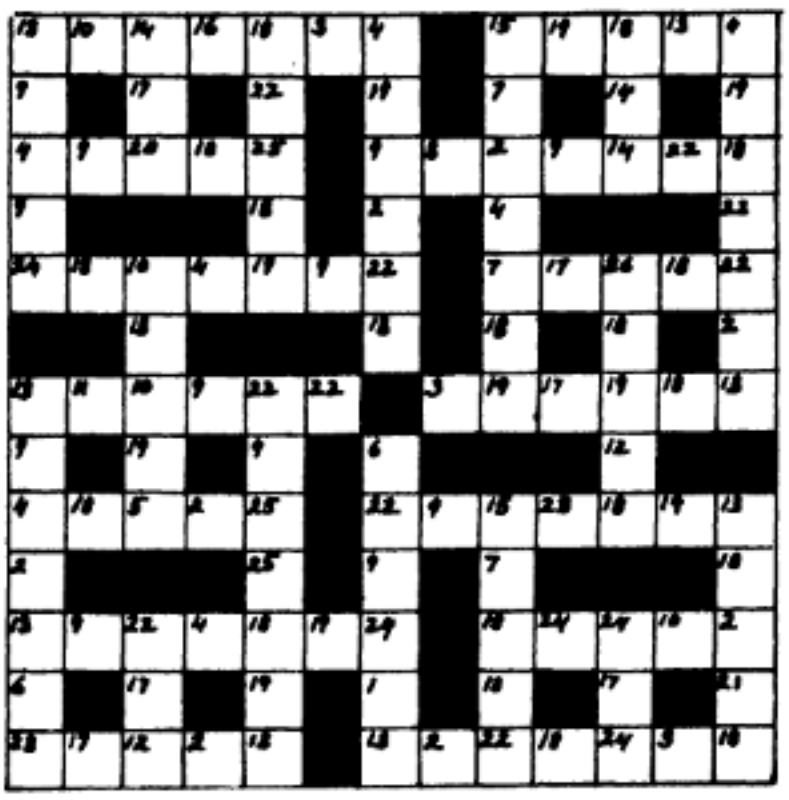
7. The first man on the moon was Neil Armstrong. Who was the second?
8. Garlic, asparagus, caviar, ginseng and honey are reputed to have a common property. What?
9. Name the well-known Spanish author who lost an arm in the battle of Lepanto in 1571.
10. The first attempt in England to codify a constitutional document was the signing of the Magna Carta in 1215. Name the king who signed it.
11. What is the collective noun for jellyfish?
12. St Columba, is believed to have described what is considered to be a mythical creature as a "fearsome beast-...something like a huge frog," in a lake in Scotland in 565 A.D. What is this creature called today?
13. George Orwell wrote 1984. Which well-known British author has written a book on the same theme called 1985?
14. What do the following have in common: Tomcat, Eagle, Fighting falcon, Hornet and Tigershark?



ANSWERS

1. The humidity in the atmosphere.
2. Patiala.
3. Vitamin C.
4. Bankim Chandra Chatterjee—Bande Mataram.
5. Badminton.
6. Iran.
7. Edwin Aldrin.
8. The are all believed to be aphrodisiacs.
9. Miguel de Cervantes.
10. King John.
11. A smack.
12. The Loch Ness Monster.
13. Anthony Burgess.
14. They are all names given to the American fighter aircraft of the "F" series. (F-14 is Tomcat, F-15 is Eagle, F-16 is Fighting falcon, F-18 is Hornet and F-20 is Tigershark.

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

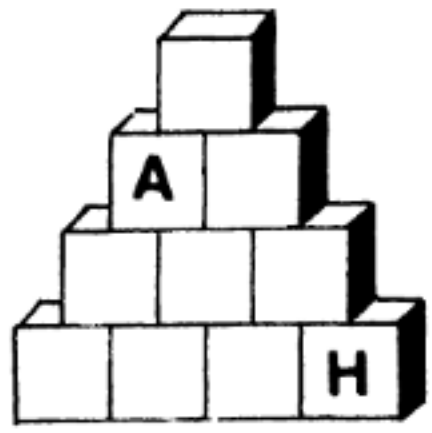
Cryptocross

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13
		C

14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26
					R				Y

Each number in the main grid represents a letter. The same number always stands for the same letter. To help you make a start, three letters have been given. Can you now substitute the rest to complete the grid?

Quick Think

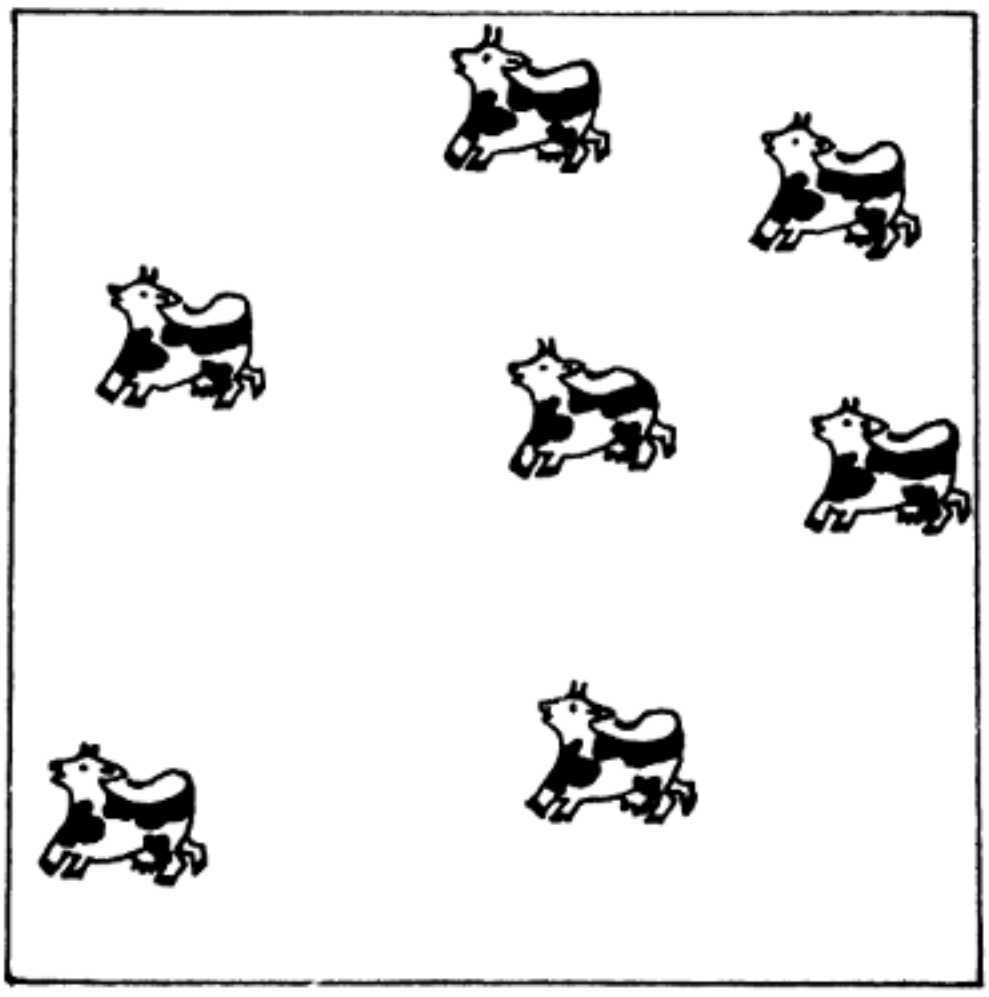


What should go into the blanks?
1) B, E, I, N, —
2) A, C, D, G, H, I, M, N, O, P,—, —, —, —, —

Witsharpener

The senior section of the school that Ram went to was short of teachers. There were only three teachers who between them taught five subjects. These were English, Hindi, Mathematics, History and Geography. The time table had to be worked out very carefully because no subject was taught by all the masters though each teacher taught three subjects. We know that:
a) Mr Sen did not know how to handle logarithm tables
b) Mr Rao was unfamiliar with the Devanagiri script
c) Mr Das had only a vague idea about what the trade winds were.

Can you work out which subjects each master took?



Blockbuster

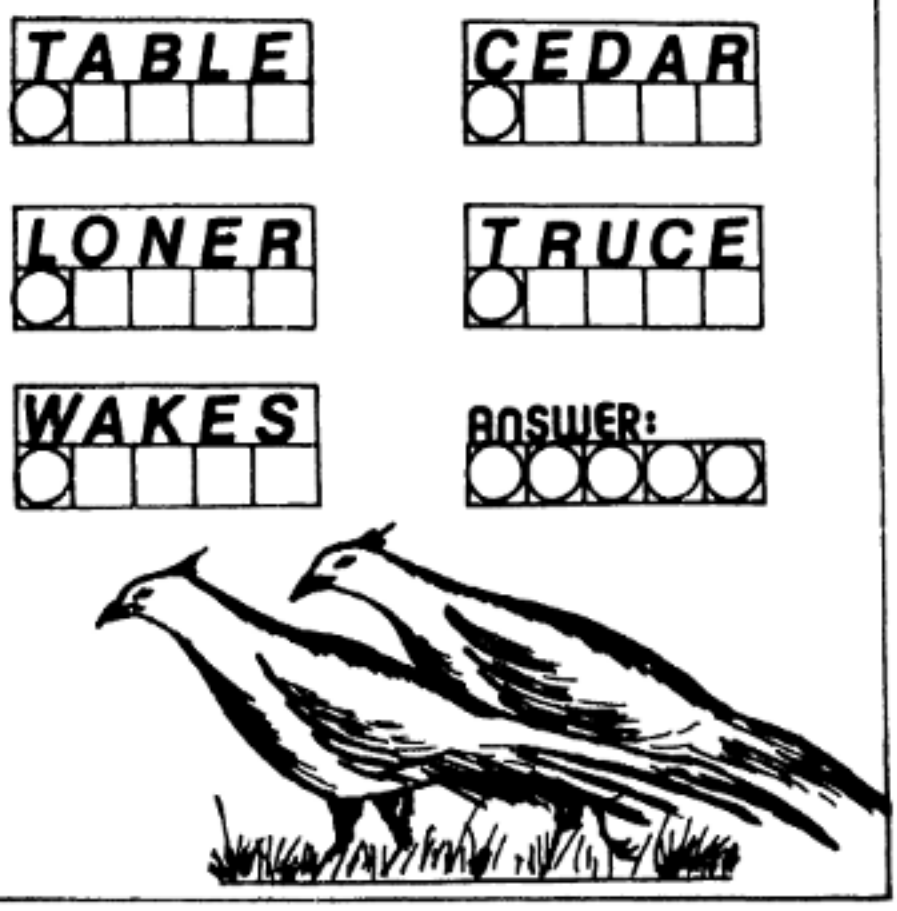
H,M,S,L,T,N,D,A,B,U

Fill the ten letters given below into the pyramid so that they form eight four-letter words reading downwards. Two letters have already been placed to give you a start.

Figure it Out

With the help of three straight lines, can you enclose each cow in its own pen?

Quick Think

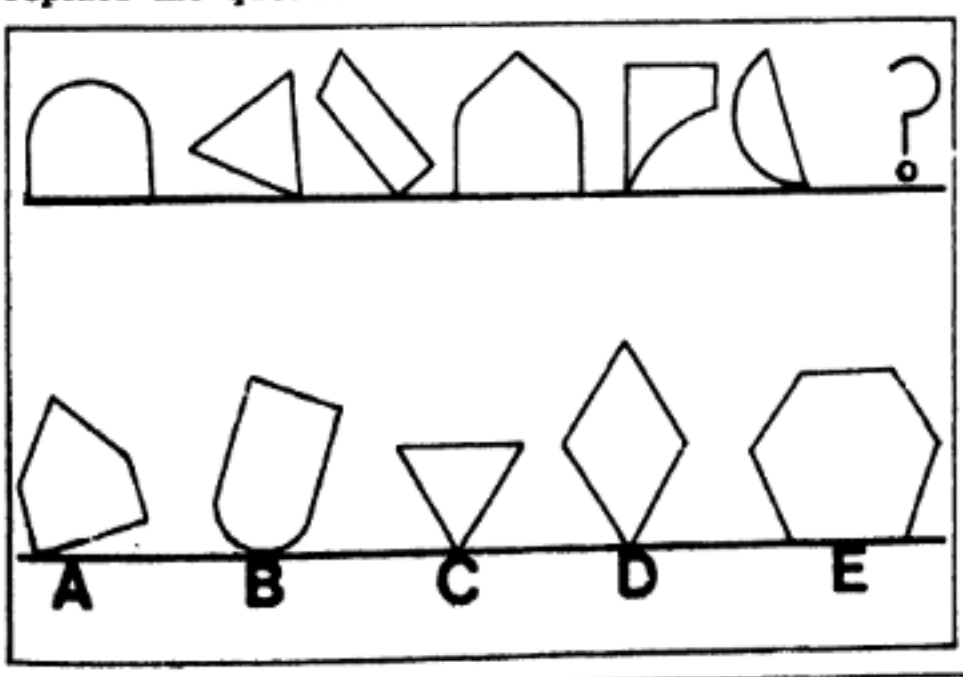


Five cats take five minutes to catch five mice. How many cats will it take to catch 100 mice in 100 minutes?

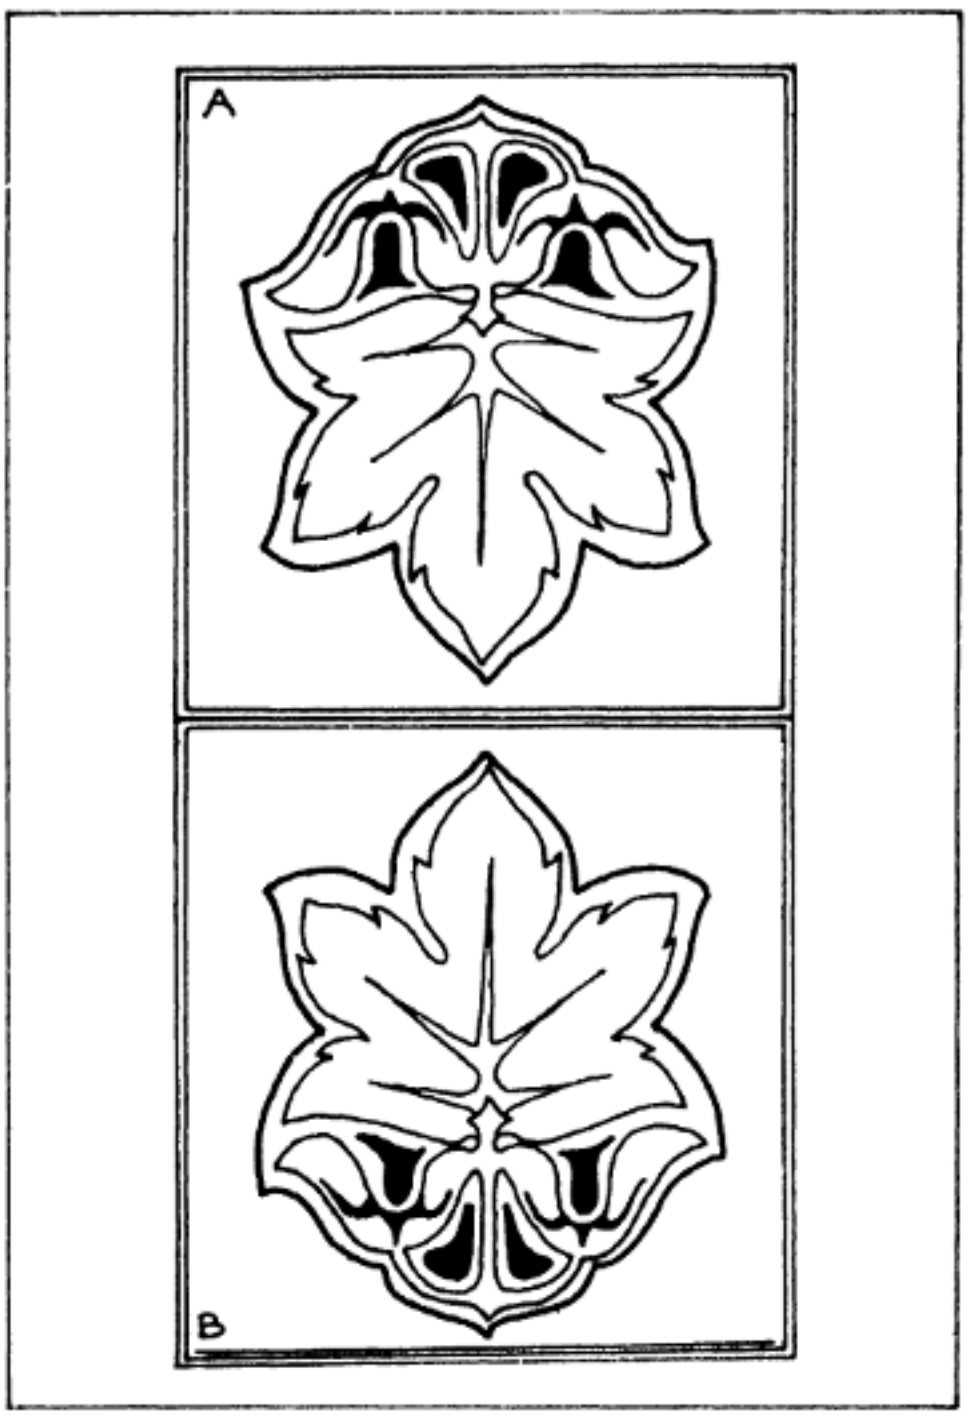
What's in a Word?

If you were to add the letters T O before and after M A, you would get the word T O M A T O. In the following words, we give you only the middle letters. The beginning and ending consist, as in TOMATO, of the same letters in the same order. Can you complete the words?

1) — — V E — —
2) — — G I B — —
3) — — A T — —
4) — — S U L — —
5) — — I T — —



Scrambles



Unscramble each of the five words given to make a new word. Then rearrange the circled letters to give you a pair of birds.

Shape Sleuth

Which of the lettered shapes in the line below can replace the question mark?

Eyewash

What's the difference? There is just one difference in detail between Figure A and Figure B. How soon can you find it?

Solutions to last week's Teasers:

Witsharpener:
Each item on the list contains the number: Wonton, Christmas tree etc. So fishing net would cost Rs ten and Vanilla essence Rs 11.00.

Quick Think:
Dice 1

What's in a Word:
Philately, Capsicum, Chief, Rhombus Detain, Spinal and Axial.

Figure it Out: b

Missing Link:
1) HER 2) ACT 3) ONE

Word Power:
Hocus Pocus, Hotch Potch (or Hodge Podge), Hoi Polloi, Hanky Panky

Shape Sleuth:
Nottingham, Bombay, Isotope, Shakespeare and Business.

Mindbender:
Three moves:

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 15 12 13 18 11 14 17 16 19 20

15 12 13 18 11 16 17 14 19

15 12 13 14 11 16 17 18 19

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20

It does not need an oracle to say that no man ever became a top-notch manager in his sleep Leadership calls forth the sedulous cultivation of the highest qualities in man like, for instance, a capacity for sound judgement In business there can be no readymade solution that would act as a magic wand and solve all problems in a miraculous manner Each problem may involve the exercise of the faculty of judgement to the utmost to decide how a particular situation should be met The manager must possess the unerring power of intuition to ensure that his judgement is at once suited to the specific situation and is entirely in consonance with the norms that already exist in the environment

The leader is one whose judgement has become matured and mellowed by exposure to many a knotty problem Far from avoiding a problem, he regards it as a challenge to be met with all the resources at his command

MBA ENTRANCE

TO THE MBA ASPIRANT

JUDGEMENT:

TUITION OR INTUITION ?

Would you like your portrait to fit this profile ?

At Brilliants we mould managers-to-be. We build self-confidence and knowledge that constitute the basis for sound judgement, to help you to meet the world head on . to face the challenge of the MBA tests as those of IIM, IRM, XLRI, Bajaj, AIMA etc

BRILLIANT TUTORIALS

12 Masilamani Mudali St, T Nagar Madras-17 Ph 442099, 443308

EMINENCE THROUGH EXCELLENCE

EP.BT 117/84

After a gloomy period, Poonam Dhillon has started seeing light again. She has just signed some good films and hopes to concentrate on films once again as love, fun and marriage are far from her mind. Her experience with Ramesh Talwar was bitter enough. "It was embarrassing and humiliating to stay at home doing nothing and watching other girls walking ahead, but I did not lose hope. I knew better things would come... " she says with confidence.

The writers of Manmohan Desai's Mard were asked to make changes to suit the new status of the hero Amitabh Bachchan,MP. K.K. Shukla, one of the writers engaged to polish the script said: "We can't take chances with Amitabh now. He is a leader. We can't show anything cheap. People will watch Amitabh very closely and his critics will watch Mard with a lot of interest to find loopholes. We have the responsibility to take care of his image." Writers of two other starrers, Khabardaar and Giraftaar, are also working overtime to cast a heavenly glow on Amitabh Bachchan

Everybody is talking about Anil Kapoor but success still evades him. He has had a hat-trick of flops. Mashaal won him all the applause but the film flopped inspite of Dilip Kumar and Yash Chopra. His second film Laila also failed and his latest Love Marriage is a disaster

The way Raj Babbar is going, he can only end up in Parliament He campaigned for Sunil Dutt and his speeches could only have been delivered by a veteran politician. The victory of Sunil Dutt and Amitabh Bachchan has given him enough encouragement. "I may enter politics at the right time," Raj Babbar says. And if Raj Babbar takes the plunge, will Smita Patil, whose father is a politician, stay far behind?

Sridevi: very close to Mithun

Durgaprasad

Poonam Dhillon: on the way up?

Nagrai

Mithun Chakraborty and Sridevi: who is not talkingabout them? And, of course, both of them are baffled by all the eyes that are probing their movements. "We first came to know each other only after Raakesh Roshan, the producer of Jaag Utha Insaan introduced us. We became very good friends during the making of the film. We had the same likes and dislikes. We got along well and I knew I was in for trouble. I wonder if these people who spread these wild stories realise how much harm they cause the family of the affected persons. But I have got used to it and so have Sridevi and Pinky (wife Yogeeta Bali)." Mithun says.

The one actress whose fortunes are on the upswing in South Indian films is Sarita who was discovered by K. Balachander. She has proved herself as one of the few actresses in the South who can do something other than take off clothes and put on vulgar acts, through films like Thaneer Thaneer, Maro Charithra, Achamillai Achamillai. "I don't believe in signing up films but in choosing my roles. I even wonder whether I have signed up more films than I should," she says. Sarita has acted in Tamil, Kannada, Telugu and has made her debut in Malayalam films through Sandarbham. More than anything else she might be a sobering influence on the hip-swaying crowd.

DELHI DIARY

New Image

Jagdish Yadav

Margaret Alva

What is the difference between the last government and the present one? The Rajya Sabha members have been feeling the change. In the last regime, the minister of state for parliamentary affairs was Kalpnath Rai. His manners were far from suave. He had become a minister within a month after SUNDAY published a report about the way his political opponents in Azamgarh district's Ghosi area were being harassed. He has now been replaced by Margaret Alva. Her gentle ways are in sharp contrast to those of Kalpnath Rai.

Made for Each Other

The spouse of a MP is issued a pass to enable him or her to enter the Parliament House and to go to the Central Hall and witness the proceedings from the distinguished visitors' gallery. The spouse pass had never before been taken as seriously as in the eighth Lok Sabha. Dr Bali, husband of Vyjayanthimala, the film-star-turned-parliamentarian from Madras, is seen in the gallery whenever she is in the House. And if you fail to locate him in the gallery, all that you have to do is notice the direction at which Vyjayanthimala is looking. If you follow her stare, it will invariably lead you to the seat in the gallery where the distinguished Dr Bali is seated.

Vyjayanthimala Bali

Creating History

In the Congress centenary year, history is being misquoted. In his maiden speech to the Congress Parliamentary Party on New Year's eve, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had referred to the inaugural Congress session in Bombay held in the end of December a hundred years ago. This was not the first time that Rajiv Gandhi was referring to the Congress centenary. He had set the ball rolling at the October 1983 session of the AICC held at Bombay. But his concern for the party's glorious past is not matched by his knowledge of history. Time and again, he has been referring to one "S.N. Banerjee" while talking of the first session of the Indian National Congress. Surendra Nath Banerjee was not in Bombay when the inaugural Congress session took place. It was Romesh Chandra Bonnerji who presided. But abbreviations apart, Rajiv Gandhi's bid at creating history has to be appreciated.

Political Stars

Sondeep Shankar

Shabana Azmi

Filmstars have not only entered politics, but politics too has entered into the lives of the filmstars. The closing ceremony of the Tenth Film Festival was not star-studded. Even a MP like Amitabh Bachchan was not there. Reason: Sivaji Ganesan, the Rajya Sabha member and Tamil film hero, had been asked to preside over the show. So, neither Amitabh Bachchan nor Sunil Dutt, two other star MPs, were around. Shabana Azmi, a jury member, too was missing. There was speculation about her absence. Shabana Azmi has no political ambitions (at least, so far) so, Sivaji Ganesan could not have upset her. Had she disagreed with the jury's verdict? There was no proof of this either. A rumour went round that she was unwell. Some added spice to it by saying that she was pregnant. At this point a film producer. with whom Ms Azmi is currently shooting, vehemently protested. He scotched the rumours by announcing that she was suffering from bronchitis, so she could not be present. Filmstars must be regretting the entry of their colleagues into politics now.

Practical Minister

Oldtimers in the steei department say that the efficient days, which had not been witnessed since the death of S. Mohan Kumaramangalam in 1973, are back again. The minister of state for steel, former diplomat Kanwar Natwar Singh, has begun the streamlining operations with a bang. To begin with, the minister has dropped all the frills: even at the airports, he has been seen checking in at the airlines counter, like an ordinary passenger. When the orientation classes were held for new MPs, Natwar Singh preferred to sit among the audience and refused to be on the dais, because he was attending the course as a student. The Steel Authority of India Ltd (SAIL) was a brainchild of the late S.M. Kumaramangalam. With efficient ministerial guidance and the chairmanship of S. Samarapungavan, who was close to Mohan Kumaramangalam, SAIL may at last turn a new leaf in the coming months.

Jagdish Yadav

K. Natwar Singh

D.E. Nizamuddin

Hawkins the safest fastest way to tasty food

* Illustrated above is the 6.5 litre standard base model.

Sensible cooking of tasty food

Pressure cooking saves time and fuel. It retains better nutritive values in certain foods, particularly proteins and vitamins. Hawkins have 127 delicious recipes in their cookbook available in English and a choice of 12 Indian languages given with every cooker.

Hawkins cooks fastest because of its more economical construction and the greater space for steam circulation. Trials prove that Hawkins saves about Rs. 300 every year.

Hawkins for your greatest safety

Hawkins is accident-proof. Its lid fits inside the body - it can be opened only after the pressure falls. Its safety valve is under the handle bar which deflects steam safely downwards.

Every Hawkins undergoes the strictest quality control and has a 5-year written guarantee. 144 Authorised Service Centres give free expert service and carry genuine spare parts.

The most durable product - in 38 models

As the Hawkins gasket is not rubbed sideways each time the lid is opened or closed, it lasts longer. The metal safety valve has a longer life than ordinary rubber ones. High-quality plating prevents rusting.

Choose from Hawkins' widest range of pressure cookers in the world - 38 models in sizes from 2 to 22 litres. Available with or without separators, standard or heavy base. In thermal-efficient aluminium or stay bright stainless steel, or unique 'Satilon' which combines the advantages of both.

Free booklet to help you choose

To get the address of your nearest Hawkins dealer and a free colour booklet giving details of the 38 exciting, lovely Hawkins models, write to: Hawkins, Department 112, P.O. Box 6481, Bombay 400 016.

Hawkins®

The finest Pressure Cooker for your finest cooking

® Registered Trade Mark
© 1985 Copyright by Pressure Cookers & Appliances Ltd

Regd No WB CC 256 TN MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680

The sweet 'n' salty meeting point.

PARLE

Some say it's sweet, others swear it's salty. All agree that it's tasty, crisp and crunchy.

Buy only this pack. Because genuine Krackjack is never sold loose. Never.

World Selection Award Winner

PARLE Krackjack Biscuit
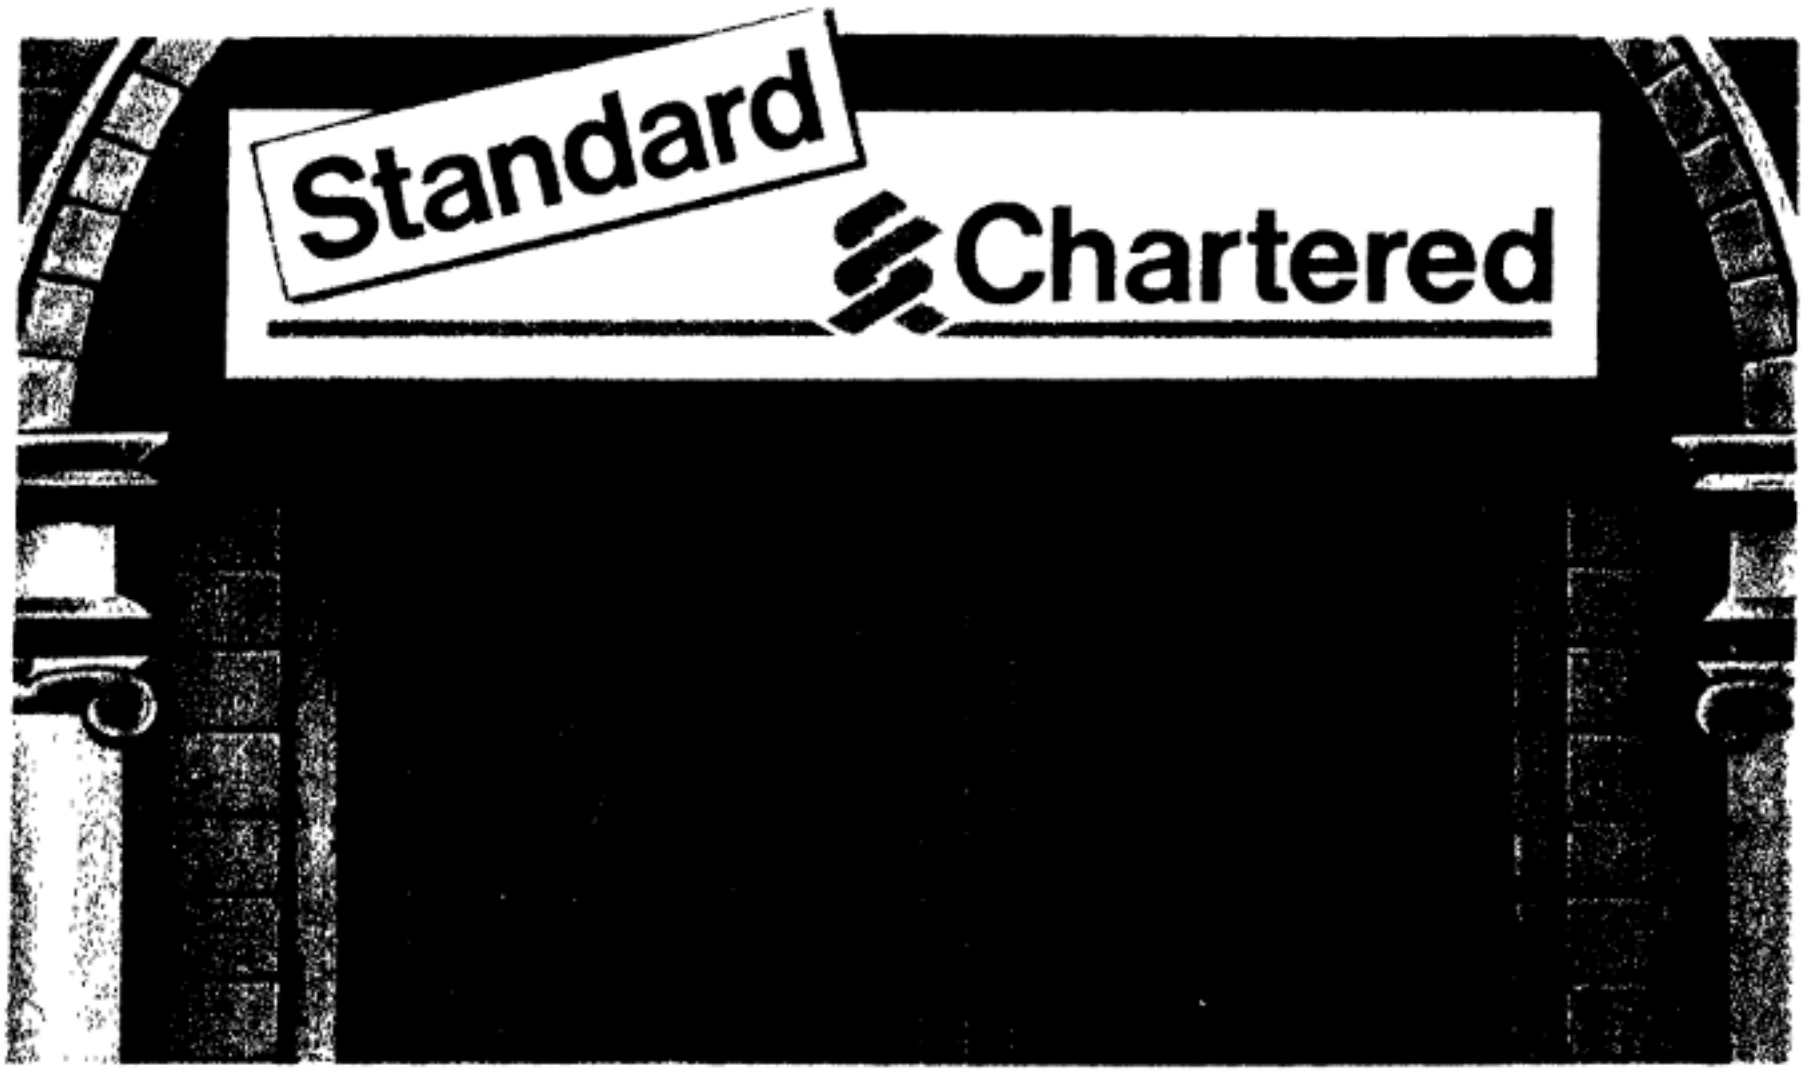
— the sweet and salty temptation.

.everest/84/PP/33

17--23 FEBRUARY 1985 AN ANANDA BAZAR [illegible]UCATION[illegible] RS 4.00

Investigation: How Bakhia Escaped Again

SUNDAY



The Hero At Home

[illegible]HAMMED [illegible]AHIDDIN

[illegible]en [illegible]ons

FOR OVER 130 YEARS, WE SET THE STANDARDS. TODAY, WE ADD ÓNE TO OUR NAME.

On January 1st, 1985, The Chartered Bank took on the Group's full name and became Standard Chartered Bank.

The change reflects positively on the bank's long-standing legacy of international banking expertise.

A bank that's always specialised in global business.

A bank that's earned a reputation in complex financial loans for critical projects, worldwide.

A bank that's set its own standards over the years.

You'll still have access, through any branch, to a worldwide service that extends from travellers cheques to major project finance, and from 24-hour-a-day currency dealing to all forms of finance for imports and exports. And behind our new nameplate, you'll still find the kind of personal and professional service that made the old one famous.

Standard Chartered

Direct banking, worldwide

Branches in India at Amritsar, Bombay, Calcutta, Calicut, Cochin, Kanpur, Madras, New Delhi, Vasco da Gama

GK&E B84.113

The best things in life are worth a little more

Improved technology makes a Hitachi more efficient and the Allwyn refrigerators

Yes. The Allwyn does cost a little more. But what it offers you is a lot more. A lifetime's deep gratitude. Because an Allwyn is engineered to last. To give you year after year of superb service and smooth efficiency. Allwyn has Japanese technology behind it. And Japanese technology puts Allwyn in a class by itself.

It gives you better cooling, better performance with never a rumble of trouble. Even at today's price an Allwyn is a great investment.

Allwyn comes in a wide range – six models to choose from. 90, 165 and 300 litres in single door. 165, 300 and 350 litres in the double door models. There's size to fit your need right for your family.

Take a look at what Allwyn offers you.

Hitachi at the heart!

The Allwyn compressor is made under licence from Hitachi. Made for negligible compressor failure and smooth, silent operation.

Who needs a voltage stabiliser?

Allwyn is like voltage. It matures from 160 to 260 volts. So you don't need a stabiliser.

Ice in a trice!

Its simple. Ice [illegible] makes ice cubes more quickly than ever before. In just [illegible].

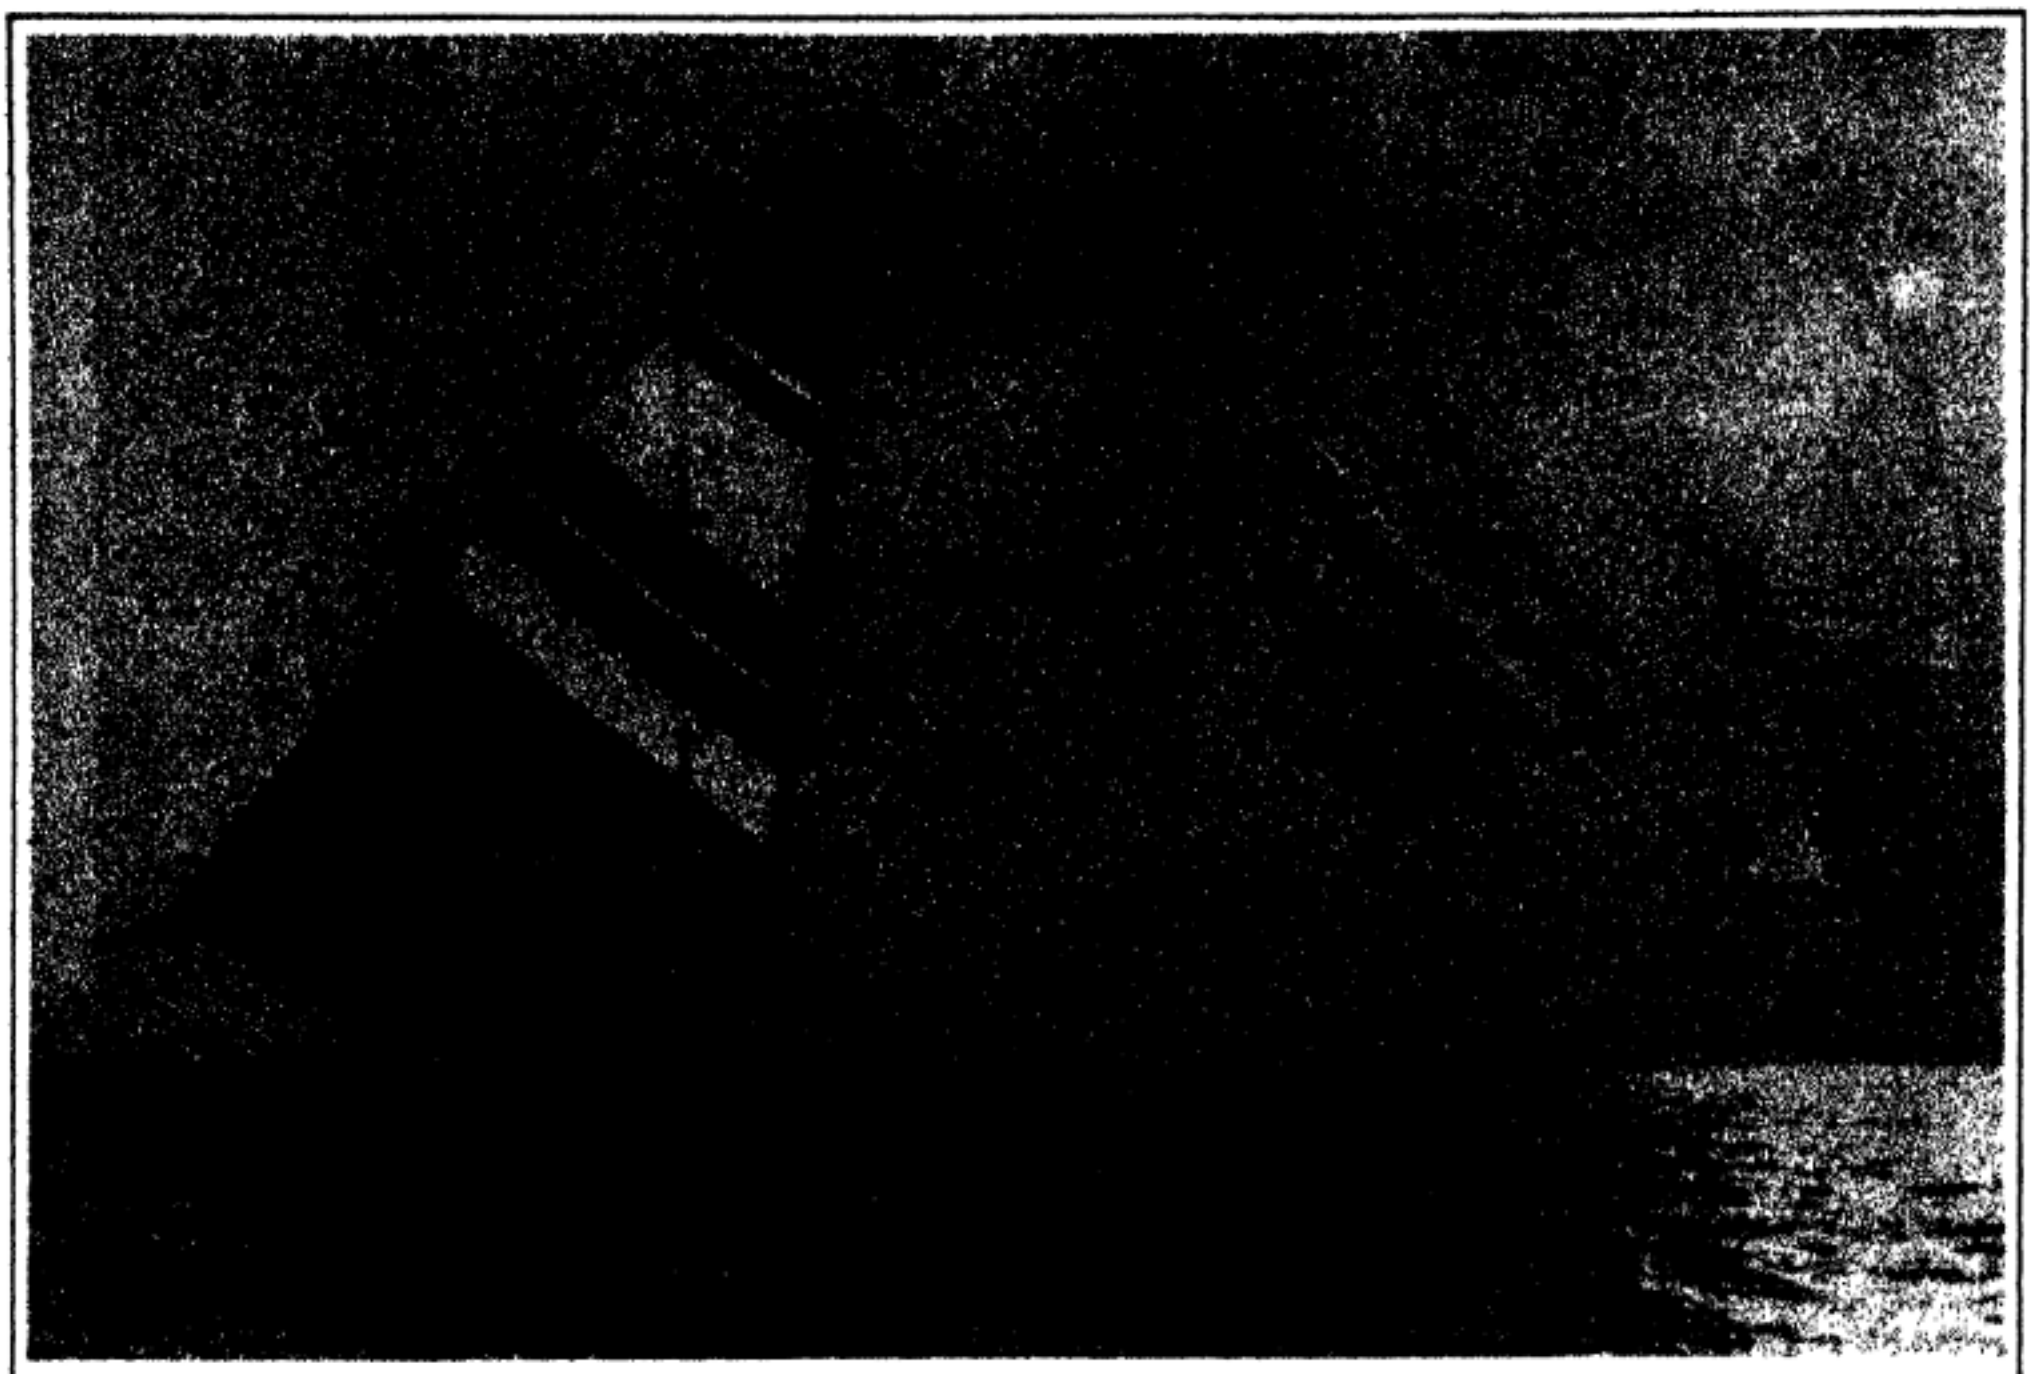
Savonara huge big electricity bills

The Allwyn [illegible] consumption. Its [illegible] to the bone.

Defrosting never was so easy

Auto defrosting saves you the pain of defrosting. Hitachi has developed [illegible] defrosting.

Service before you can say Allwyn!

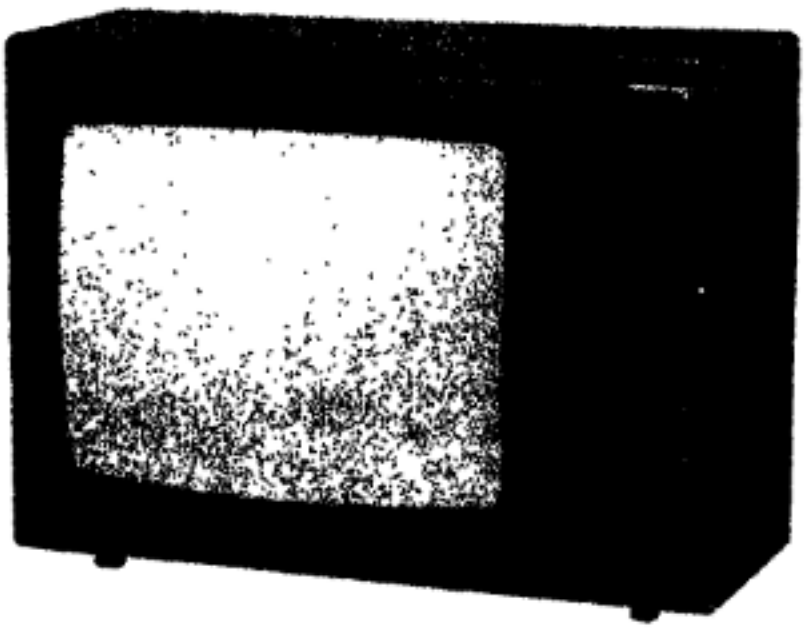


A [illegible] service network [illegible] Hitachi [illegible].

The ready to take on the world refrigerators

[illegible]

HITACHI



MAA (S) ALN 1C

The colours of the Rainbow

Rainbow deluxe

A TV that can capture the wild colours of nature in all their glory. From the luminous red of a sunset to the most subtle shade of the rainbow, the Rainbow deluxe brings it all home to you.

This is how

A 51 cms. black-strips picture tube ensures rich, crisp, natural colours.

A 4 W audio output gives full-tone natural sound.

Advanced Indian technology, components from Grundig, W.Germany, combine to give you a TV that gives the true picture of things.

Always.

KONARK TV

Konark Television Ltd. (A Govt. of Orissa Enterprise) B2 & B3 Industrial Estate Bhubaneswar – 751 010

ACL/KTV-2364 /R-2

17—23 FEBRUARY 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 □ ISSUE 15 □ RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

Public Library

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

When Dreams Come True

There was one bright spot for India in the otherwise disastrous series against England: Mohammad Azharuddin. Mudar Patherya profiles this young cricketer from Hyderabad who has set a new world record by scoring three successive centuries starting with his debut in Calcutta. Plus exclusive interview with Mohammad Azharuddin.

SPECIAL REPORT 26

Coomar Narain: The Multinational Spy

The confession by Coomar Narain, the alleged kingpin in the recently busted spy ring, that he spied to further the business interests of his employer, has added a new dimension to the case. A report by SankarshanThakur

INVESTIGATION 34

Sukur Naran Bakhia's Latest Escape

The famed smuggler from Daman has once again escaped from custody. An investigation by Sankarshan Thakur

Page 14

Namita Ghosh

Page 48

SUNDAY SPECIAL 48

Victor's March

Victor Banerjee's portrayal of Dr Aziz in David Lean's A Passage to India has shot him into international fame. Susmita Gupta talks to the actor on the making of the film and his future plans.

SPECIAL REPORT 43

MGR Takes Charge

After battling successfully against a crippling kidney ailment at a hospital in New York, MGR has returned to Tamil Nadu after three months to take up the reins of chief ministership

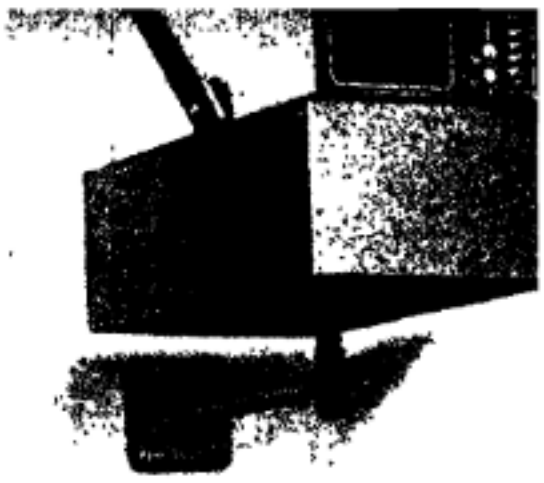
COMMENT

Dateline M.J. Akbar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 9
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12
Red Tape A Special Correspondent 32
Guest Column M.A.K. Pataudi 14

VARIETY

This India 71
Sundayweek 72
Chess/Bridge/Quiz 73
Teasers 74
Khaas Baat 77

PUNCHLINE/R.K.LAXMAN



Courtesy Times of India

Cover transperencies by Tarapada Banerjee and Jayant Sett

Editor M J Akbar

Associate Editor Tushar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K John Henry Jacob.
Rajiv Bagchi Sanjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi:
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi:
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow:
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay:
Olga Tellis
Bangalore:
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras.
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati:
Seema Guha
Srinagar:
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex-Delhi

The heart has started beating again

Cardiac Equipment from BPL. For diagnosis, monitoring and resuscitation.

When a dysfunction in the heart occurs, the Defibrillator is used, as a last resort, to discharge a measured amount of electrical energy into the patient's heart to restore its natural rhythm. The monitor displays the ECG continuously and the recorder makes a copy of the wave forms.

The Defibrillator, now a byword in the medical profession, is just one example where BPL has used electronics for life saving applications. Electro-cardiographs and Patient Monitoring Systems complete the range.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Instrumentation (Industrial & Measurement), Computers, Communications, Components, Office Automation and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Fukuda, Japan; Siemens, West Germany and Nihon Kohden, Japan. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL. Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

BPL-INDIA

In pursuit of perfection

Computers • Communication • Components

Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement) • Office Automation • Consumer Electronics

1112

DATELINE / M.J.Akbar

Calcutta: Every birth is dramatic, but most so the birth of a great career. Not all the seats were full at the Sisir Manch at five in the evening when the show was scheduled to start, but it will not be very long before all such theatres will be packed when Damul is shown. Perhaps the experience was more enthralling because one's expectations were subdued. Mrinal Sen had telephoned to suggest that I go to a special showing of this new film, and said that its maker Prakash Jha wanted to chat with me. I am not the world's greatest fan of films, particularly of the modern/serious variety. The medium is vitally important etcetera etcetera, but I prefer to receive my little knowledge through that old-fashioned thing called the written word. If celluloid (as its votaries insist) is the only passport to the twentyfirst century, then I would prefer to live a little longer in the twentieth. On the few occasions that I do indulge myself, I rather prefer the heroics of Dev Anand, the saucy dancing of Sheila Ramani, the embarrassed romanticism of Raj Kapoor or the exquisite delicacy of Waheeda Rehman. Revolution is best packaged between covers, at least in my scheme of things.

Mrinal Sen's generosity of the younger filmmakers is wellknown; one felt that he was perhaps being his moral helpful self, when he decided to literally introduce Prakash Jha and Damul to Calcutta. Mrinal Sen did us all a great favour. Damul is one of the finest bits of creativity to have appeared on the screen in recent times, and Prakash Jha has the ability to become one of the best directors in cinema. This is his first film, and its depth and power overwhelm the viewer. This is the village of Bihar which the filmmaker understands, because he has lived in it and has not forgotten it when the lights of Bombay's film industry could easily have erased the darkness of the nights of West Champaran. This is the village that urban filmmakers (the greatest of them) will never understand since rural poverty and inequity are only paper concepts to them. This is the village where there are no heroes and villains, just the reality of oppression, its perpetrators, its instruments, its agents, and its consequences of blood and bondage. This is the world of partial democracy, where power flows as much from consensus as the country-made gun. Morality is the handmaiden of survival here, and has been for countless centuries: the brahmin landlord Madhav Pande is a guardian not only of religious ritual but also of traditional hierarchy, he does not rant and rave; it is almost with a tinge of regret that he silently watches his munim cheat yet another low caste retainer into a lifetime of bondage through the old ruse of moneylending. If he sleeps with the young widow, he is also her protector, as he reminds her when she begins to show signs of dissent: who else could have protected both her five bighas of land and her body from the greed of the young? What he cannot quite come to terms with is this sudden birth of aspiration among people who have known their place for so many generations. The widow can be allowed her grief at her abortion; that is natural enough. But what right does she have to resent the decision to abort, and then to challenge the authority of Madhav Pande. This is crossing barriers; that is unacceptable; that is sin which the widow must pay for with death. The low caste bonded slaves must repay their loans by stealing cattle, but if one of them dies in the process they have no right to bring the bloodsoaked body to the door of his house. Madhav Pande's peace cannot be disturbed by the groans of thieves, his courtyard cannot be stained with their blood. This effrontery must be punished; dogs who receive crumbs have no right to bark. And if the labourer on his project suddenly begins to get ideas, if the word has reached even West Champaran that there is a land called Punjab where the daily wage is ten rupees plus two meals, where at the end of the season a man might even buy a small radio with the price of his sweat, then such ideas must be crushed before they take on the proportions of a challenge. The balance is delicate, and it needs all the dexterity at his command to keep it tipped in his favour.

Prakash Jha — Rajiv Basu

Once, not so long ago, it was much easier. Madhav Pande's father used the whip, the knife, the spear with fewer problems. But now these new ideas were seeping through. There was democracy, even if the vote could be manipulated. There was a judge, even if the policeman could be bribed. There was a popular government, even if the politician could be corrupted. Once the world lived at the mercy of the king and the priest; life was simpler then. Hotheads who thought that the gun could become a more efficient replacement of the whip and the spear did not understand that the environment was changing. Once, the king and the priest made the law, they were the law, no matter if their mood was whimsical or generous, cruel or magnanimous. Not so anymore. The old order did not yet have to bow to new pressures, but it must understand that its main weapons had changed. The modern institutions had to be used to keep the old equation steady. If corruption did not work, use deceit. If the judge did not take money, buy the witnesses. But the point was that the Pandes themselves must not kill anymore, not with their own hands at least. They must merely ensure that it was the judge who ordered the hanging. That was the true test of their ability. Modern society and its most venerable institutions must be converted into participants in the game, they must on no account be flouted. The policeman must be averted, the politician must be flattered, appeased; the judge must be left with no option but to announce death on the scaffold. The damul still had its part to play in the preservation of the status quo.

In the year of the Lord 1984, there was still only one answer left to the sharp thud of the scaffold. A scream. A loud and unending scream whirling towards the future.

How far can you stretch a rupee?

Just think. For less than a rupee a day, you can buy your family security and peace of mind. With New India's Domestic Insurance Package scheme.

1. Personal accident cover
2. Hospitalisation policy
3. Fire & Theft insurance
4. Electrical appliances breakdown
5. T V set damage
6. Pedal cycle insurance
7. Baggage loss cover
8. Personal liabilities

Today a rupee will perhaps buy you half an ice cream Half a soft drink Maybe three or four cigarettes

But n t much more

Yet for the same amount you can secure your home and family against a range of mishaps that could leave you financially shattered

For less than a rupee a day, our Domestic Insurance Package scheme safeguards your family in 8 vital areas

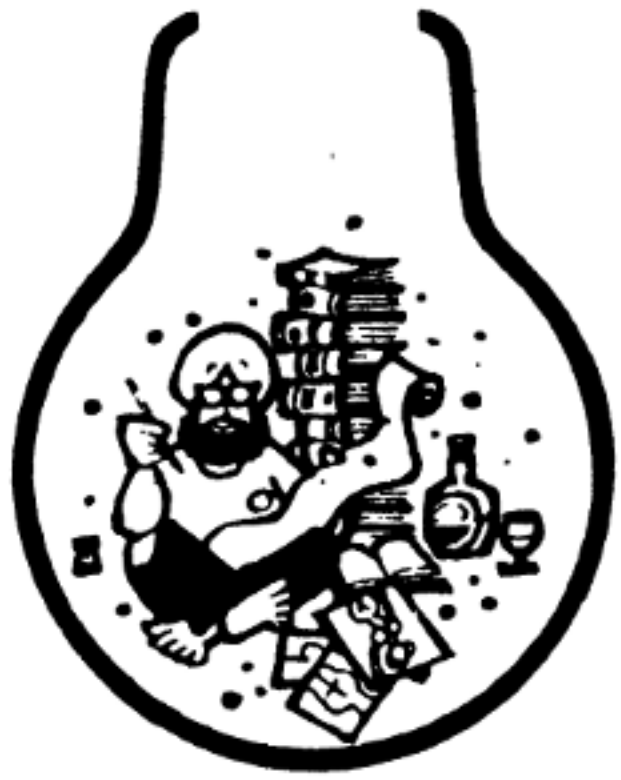
Depending on the type of cover you find most suitable this package scheme gives you all the security you need

For less than it takes you to buy your child an ice-cream, everyday, you ll be buying your family so much more

Call or write to your nearest New India office We'll be glad to give you complete details

NEW INDIA ASSURANCE

So much security For so little.



Contour Ads-NIA-960f/83

Indians Abroad

The emigre Indians' attachment to their homeland can be both heartwarming as well as nauseating. The first generation suffers from home-sickness and guilt because they have quit their poor country and are enjoying the good things of life not available to their countrymen. They open up their purses and give generously whenever any calamity strikes India. At the same time they carry their little Indias about them and refuse to integrate with people. And although most have acquired foreign citizenships and passports they continue to be obsessed with Indian politics and Hindi films. Despite the superficial gloss acquired by being suited-booted and wearing neckties their behaviour remains Indian rustic. In London I saw a smartly dressed Sardarji out for a stroll with his Sardarni and their child. He walked a few feet ahead, hisSardarni with a baby in her arms walked respectfully a few feet behind. It was bizarre kind of conversation: He addressing the air in front, she replying from the rear.

Wherever there is an Indian community of some size it will have its own newspapers in English, Urdu, Hindi or Gujarati. They make interesting reading. The front page is invariably news from India. The next few will be devoted to community affairs in the country with lots of matrimonial ads spelling out religion and region with the usual addendum "caste and dowry no bar." Remaining are devoted to Hindi films. Another regular feature is the ceaseless war they wage against our missions which they have to approach for visas when they wish to visit ex-mother India.

I have just received several copies of a fortnightly The Link published from Vancouver edited by Promod Puri, brother of the scholar-journalist Balraj Puri of Jammu. He is Hindu, a majority of the Indian community in Canada are Sikhs. They have a grouse against our consel general Jagdish Sharma and are making life very difficult for the harassed diplomat. Mr Sharma thought it would not be a bad idea to get some Canada-based Indian editors to visit their homeland on a kind of refresher course. His first choice was a fellow Sharma, Bhanu Pratap, (Ben to his friends) who edits Mid-Vancouver News and the Overseas Times. Ben turns out to be quite a lad. He made the headlines of Vancouver dailies for making unwelcome passes at his employee, Renee Calligan. When interviewing her for the job he asked her whether she liked strippers or enjoyed sex. We don't know her response but she got the job. Thereafter. complained Renee, he ran his hands across her bottom and her chest. This was followed by a bear hug to celebrate a good advertising sale. The next day Renee Calligan quit her job and filed a complaint before the Human Rights Board. The Board ordered Ben Sharma to pay up a month's salary (640 dollars), one thousand dollars in damages and costs of suit. However Ben has had a Bharat darshan free of cost or obligation.

Only, Na

I am intrigued by the way many Indians, particularly, Bombayites, otherwise fluent in English add the word "only" at the end of their sentences and na before every question: "I was there only ... it is being screened at the Plaza only." And "I have to see the doctor na?" "Only" is not a translation of an Indian language expression. I find it as irritating as another Indo-Anglianism "You-all" used as synonym for "others" by Indians who fancy their English. Na is obviously an Indianism for "Isn't it?"

"Only" should be used to indicate that there is nothing besides. The exact placing of the word makes a world of a difference, should you say, "this could only happen once?" or "this could happen once only?" Both expressions are correct. "Only" relates solely to the word it precedes; hence "could only happen once" would mean that it could take place by accident only at one time and thereafter by design." However, "this could only happen once" sounds much better to the ear than "this could happen only once." But there is no excuse whatsoever to end a sentence with it. Indians do it only. I was compelled to draw your attention to this na?

Geet Gobind

The widening rift between Hindus and Sikhs has caused anguish in the hearts of sensitive people of both communities. To them it is inconceivable that two people as close to each other as nails to the flesh of fingers could be so cruelly torn apart in so short a time. The anguish is much deeper in the hearts of millions of Hindus whose families have for generations worshipped in Sikh gurudwaras, revered and read the Granth Sahib as their holy scripture and looked upon the Sikh's ten gurus as their spiritual guides. One such sensitive soul is poet-writer P.K. Nijhawan who describes the warrior-Guru Gobind Singh as "My hero, my saviour and redeemer, the redeemer of my dharma." In his own words "I often talk with Guru Gobind in the small hours of the night, half awake, half asleep."

The result is a lengthy poem Shri Guru Gobind Geeta. This inspiration is Sri Krishna's dialogue with Arjuna on the eve of the battle of Kurukshetra wherein the avatar persuades Arjuna to perform his sacred task to engage in the battle for righteousness which is the theme of the Bhagwad Geeta. Nijhawan has chosen to construct a similar dialogue between Guru Gobind and Madho Das, better known as Banda Bairagi, to whom the Guru entrusted the secular leadership of the Khalsa Panth shortly before he was assassinated at Nanded. The meeting between the two took place in Bairagi's hermitage on the banks of the river Godavari. The Guru's sermon convinced the hermit to abandon sanyas and wage war against Mughal tyranny. The first success of Sikh arms came under the leadership of this Hindu hermit, who Sikh historians like to describe as Banda Singh Bahadur. He was later captured by Farrukh Siyar and along with hundreds of his followers including an infant son was executed after terrible torture in Mehrauli.

It is a moving epic poem full of learning and profusely illustrated. The only thing against Shri Guru Gobind Geeta is its price of Rs. 165.

Watch your conference take shape without putting it together

Do nothing.

And watch Air-India's Congresses & Conventions team organise just about everything. To put your conference together in the shape you'd like it to be.

Watch them bid for India as the conference venue. Promote your conference abroad. Liaise with delegates. Assist in preparing their kits. Arrange their hotel bookings. Transport them all the way to Delhi or any other city in India On a wide range of low, low group and individual fares.

What's more, they'll even provide freighter services at special rates In case you need to fly in special equipment for the conference.

Of course, their job is made easier by Air-India's worldwide network of 145 offices. And by Delhi's superb conference venues. Like the Talkatora Stadium or the Indoor Sports Complex. Ideal for large conventions ranging from 3000 to 25000. Or, the 9 new hotels in Delhi, most of which offer excellent conference facilities.

Or even the ultra-modern Shere-e-Kashmir Conference Centre at Srinagar. Which offers you a choice between two large and two small conference rooms as well as a 600 seat auditorium with simultaneous translation facilities in five languages and film projection facilities for both 16 mm and 35 mm. Plus four committee rooms, exclusive documentation and communication equipment, banquet space for 500 persons, an exhibition gallery and a press room. All attached to the superb 5-star Centaur Lake View Hotel right next to Dal Lake.

Naturally, with such services, it's no surprise that Air-India has been closely involved with the 12th International Leprosy Congress, the World Mining Congress, the 59th International Convention of World Association of Detectives Conference and many more.

Best of all, Air-India offers its conference planning services absolutely free! Now that you know, don't just rub your hands together in glee!
Get in touch with:

Air-India
Congresses & Conventions
6th Floor, Vandana, 11, Tolstoy Marg,
New Delhi 110 001 Tel: 344225
Cable: AIR-INDIA

You host it. We'll organise it.

Member
International Congress
and Convention Association

AIR-1519

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Indian Antiques Go West

South Indian bronze idols, particularly of the Chola period, are on the top of the list of antique smugglers. Thieves pass them on to receivers in Bombay, Delhi, Madras or Calcutta, who in turn ship them out of India after acquiring by cheating or bribery, certificates saying that they are not antiques, and so can be exported.

Doubts have been raised about the way the certificates are being issued, and the Tamil Nadu director general of police has suggested to New Delhi that photographs of South Indian bronze idols, which are to be exported, should be sent for a second check to the Tamil Nadu director of Archaeology in Madras. He has also proposed that police officers of the rank of sub-inspector and above should be empowered to take action.

The Arts and Antiques Control Act 1972, authorises only officers of the archaeological department to take action, and New Delhi does not think that more specific powers are necessary for police officers as they can at any time seize property suspected to have been stolen and arrest whoever possesses it. "Whether a particular item is an antique or not," the Tamil Nadu DGP has been advised, "is a technical question which can best be decided by the experts."

There is merit, of course, in the suggestion for a second check, but what the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) proposed some time back seems to be more sensible. The CBI's proposal was to have a comprehensive, computerised data bank, with details of idols and the temples where they are, along with those of idol thieves and receivers for ready reference. But before collecting this information, the CBI should find out what happened to similar data collected a few years ago. Owners of antiques more than 100 years old and of manuscripts more than 73 years old had then filled in long forms and submitted them with photographs. Apparently, they have not been properly collected. The CBI has a division to coordinate offences involving "culture" property, including idols. But the information submitted by antique collectors never reached the CBI.

That may be the reason why the 50,000 art pieces smuggled from India in the last decade as stated in a UNESCO report, have remained more or less untraced. According to the reports of the Archaelogical Survey of India lodged with the police, 3,050 statues were stolen during a period of three years; that means an average of 1,000 a year, about three pieces a day.

In fact, many thefts are not reported; indeed, many are not even noticed as thieves often put replicas in place of stolen antiques. A few years ago Douglas Barret, an expert, alleged that the idol of Nataraj at the Shivapuram temple was a fake and the genuine one was abroad. This allegation turned out to be true. The real idol, three-and-a-half feet high and weighing 50 kg, is at the Norton Simon Foundation Museum in America. It is strange how it was smuggled abroad. A five-metal idol from the Ishwaran temple in Tamil Nadu and several idols of Nataraj have made their way to the Texas Museum. Sculptural panels from two temples known for their exotic art, one in Madhya Pradesh and the other in Karnataka, have been cut and presumably smuggled abroad. Recently some gifts received from Dr Rajendra Prasad, India's first President, kept at the Patna Museum, were stolen. These include a gold sword, a gold medal and gold-plated images.

Practically all museums abroad, particularly those in the US, seem to have acquired antiques stolen from India. The Mithun idol from Orissa is in Philadelphia

Tapan Das

An 8th century brass artefact

Museum; there are Jain idols and Sirpur Tara at the Los Angeles Country Museum, the 12 Gupta period memorials of Thaneshwar near Udampur are in the London Museum; the Buddha's hand removed from Mathura is in a museum in Switzerland and Baroda's Sun statue is at the Frankfurt museum.

As the DGP of Tamil Nadu has suggested, comprehensive legislation similar to COFEPOSA needs to be formulated to check the smuggling of antiques from India. The CBI has argued that the Antiquities and Art Treasures Act, 1972, does regulate the export trade in art treasures and provide for the prevention of fradulent dealings in antiques. But it is obvious that something more effective is needed.

It is a pity that despite the fact that American and European countries are signatories to the UNESCO convention of 1970 aimed at curbing the smuggling of art objects, they are most guilty of encouraging idol smugglers.

It is a pity that despite the fact that American and European countries are signatories to the UNESCO convention of 1970 aimed at curbing the smuggling of art objects, they are most guilty of encouraging idol smugglers

OPINION

Modest Ambitions

The Ambitions of NTR (27 January—2 February '85) are modest and devoid of selfishness. Unlike most politicians, NTR joined politics so that he could serve the people of his state. I am sure that he will guide the nation in the right direction if he comes to power at the centre.
Debiprasad Panda, Patna

• The people of Andhra Pradesh have full confidence in NTR. NTR, on his part, has been successful to a large extent in removing the evils plaguing society and providing relief to the poor by initiating a number of welfare schemes.
B.N. Bose, Jamshedpur

• Ever since NTR came to power in Andhra Pradesh, regionalism has eaten into the minds of the people of the state. Result: they have been alienated from the national mainstream. Moreover, the numerous welfare schemes initiated by the government is only a cover to hide the administrative failures of the NTR administration. The poor have become poorer under the present government. The people of India should not be misguided by yet another NTR gimmick: the Bharat Desam.
T. Pavani, Visakhapatnam

• I was surprised to learn that NTR is trying to bring the opposition parties together through the Bharat Desam. But I wonder how parties with different outlooks and conflicting ideologies can stay together for long. NTR, it seems, has learnt nothing from the failure of the Janata experiment.
K. Kumara Sekhar, Eluau (AP)

• There is nothing wrong with NTR's decision to launch a national party, but its structure as conceived by the leader will certainly make it vulnerable. A federation of various regional parties cannot hold together for long. At least this is what the Janata experiment has taught us.
T.V.S. Murthy, Guntur

• The idea of launching the Bharat Desam reminds me of the Janata Party. Parties with different ideologies coming together for the sake of grabing power can never steer a country towards prosperity.
T. Pillai, Ahmedabad

• Kutty's cartoon (Contents) depicting NTR's bid to rescue the opposition was a masterpiece.
P. Masilamani, Salem

Why Ban the Akalis?

Banning the Akali Dal is not the answer to the Punjab problem (Should the Akalis be Banned? 20—26 January '85). It will alienate the Sikhs further. If a party serves the interests of a particular community without harming others, I see no reason why it should be banned. The present government should opt for reconciliation with the Sikhs rather than confrontation.
Akkiraju Nataraj, Hyderabad

• The Akali Dal should be banned only if it is established beyond doubt that it is communal by nature. The Punjab problem requires a more sympathetic approach and such arbitrary decisions will only serve to alienate the Sikhs.
P. Govind, New Delhi

Ambiguous

It is not very clear from Adoor Gopalakrishnan's interview ('I Have Mixed Fact With Fiction,' 20—26 January '85) whether the director is trying to ridicule the Communists or the anti-Communists in Mukhamukham. Or, is he trying to criticise the entire political set-up?
Muyyam Rajan, Singrauli (MP)

• In my opinion Sreedharan, the hero of Mukhamukham, represents all men with revolutionary zeal who lack moral courage.
J.M. Hasan, Mastandam

Intelligence Failure

The Enemies of the State (27 January—2 February '85) should be immediately brought to book. The intelligence set-up in our country has always failed whenever the country has faced a crisis. I wonder how a spy ring operated for so many years. Moreover, nowadays the bureaucracy is full of officers who are willing to do anything for money. Rajiv Gandhi should first cleanse the government of such officers.
Mrinal Kanti Kundu, Belur (WB)

• Shubhabrata Bhattacharya's special report on the spy scandal was exhaustive. The article was successful in pinpointing responsibilities.
Subhas Dutta, Ranchi

• The spy scandal is undoubtedly one of the biggest of its kind in the history of independent India. It is also one of the biggest intelligence failures. The assassination of Indira Gandhi had exposed how ineffective our intelligence wing was. The entire set-up should be reorganised if we are to save this country from foreign forces.
Debasis Roy, Vijayawada

Not True

In the article, Assam: Solution Ahead? (20—26 January '85), Seema Guha is all praise for Assam chief minister Hiteshwar Saikia for successfully steering the state out of a major social and political crisis. But this not true. More than anyone else, the AASU and the AAGSP themselves are responsible for the death of the movement against foreign nationals. People shied away from the student activists since, with the passage of time, the movement took on a communal colour. Mr Saikia cannot demand credit for killing the movement.
Mifah Laskar, Silchar

• In her report on Assam, Seema Guha has written that the CM of Assam, Hiteswar Saikia, has won the goodwill of the people of Assam by drawing more funds from the centre to the state. But who have benefited from these funds? The chosen few of Hiteswar Saikia. Moreover, Mr Saikia is running the state without the support of the people. In connivance with the centre he is behaving like a dictator.
S.C. Malakar, Margherita (Assam)

Crime and Punishment

Khushwant Singh's suggestion for punishments To Fit the Crime (Gossip Sweet and Sour, 20-26 January '85) does not take account of the fact that the criminal is also part of our society and should be given a chance to reform. If he is subjected to public lashings and is ostracised, it will compel him to continue his criminal activities. Administering crippling drugs to criminals are still worse. Latest studies show that such drugs have dangerous side-effects that are transmitted to the next generation. That means the criminal's offspring will have to pay the price for no fault of theirs.
Partha Sarathi Baishya, Calcutta

• Punishment for murder should be death by hanging. The convict's earnings should go for the maintenance of the prison. Punishment for rape should neither be castration nor drugs. Seventy lashes in public is an apt punishment. Antabuse is a good drug for alcoholics and the sale of alcohol should be banned.
Rana Zafar, Calcutta

• We cannot root out a disease by treating the symptoms. So castration and death sentences will not help. What criminals need is a healing touch. The punishments like drugging as suggested by Mr Singh are like those of the medieval ages. A criminal whose sex drive is decreased by drugging can still harm women. Only attempts at reforming will help in the long run.
S. Ram Mohan, Vijayawada

• Parliament should discuss the novel penal measures suggested by Khushwant Singh.
D. Manuel Reddy, Visakhapatnam

• Khushwant Singh's suggestions are welcome. But why didn't Mr Singh suggest punishments for women who rape men. Foreign newspapers frequently carry such reports. Removal of one or both the breasts, depending on the cruelty of the crime, will be an appropriate punishment.
V.N. Narayanswamy, Madras

• Mr Singh should persuade his family members to experiment with Antabuse on him. It will save him and all his readers a lot of trouble and heartburn.
Kanailal Datta, Barrackpore

• The police say: once a criminal, always a criminal. Putting them behind bars and feeding them is a waste of national resources. So, life imprisonment should be changed to death sentence. Islamic law—an eye for an eye—can, perhaps, control those who cause bodily injuries. Sterilisation is an appropriate punishment for child abuse and attempted rape. Smoking should also be treated at par with drinking.
M.J. Edwards, Bangalore

• Most of the punishments suggested by Khushwant Singh are apt. But reducing the sexual urge of a rapist is not proper.
P. Rajesh, Durg

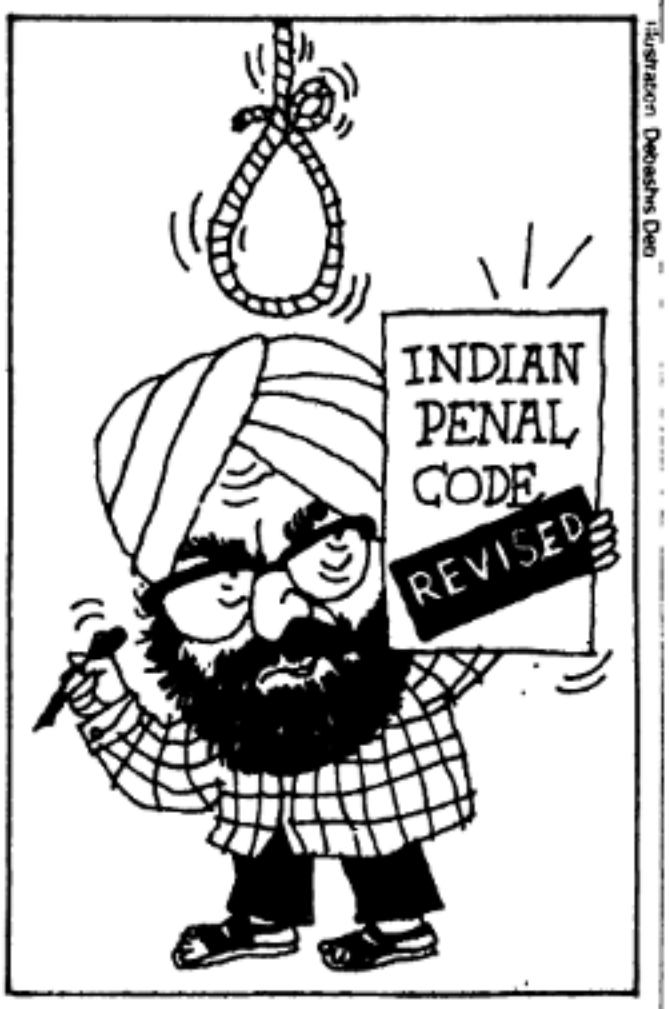

Illustration Debashis Deo

• While suggesting drugs as a mode of punishment for sexual offenders, Mr Singh has ignored the social life the criminal will lead after he has been punished. Drugs have bad side effects which can be transmitted to the family of the criminal.
Sanjay Rath, Khariaguda (Orissa)

• By emasculating a person with drugs, we not only punish him for life but also his wife and family. Khushwant Singh is wrong in saying that the enlargement of the male breast is "no great calamity." These drugs increase the chances of cancer in the male breast and can aggravate a benign tumour. They can cause fatal complications if the person happens to be suffering from heart, liver or renal disorders. Medical science, moreover, should not be used to harm anyone. It is against medical ethics. The Medical Litany says: "From putting knowledge before wisdom/Science before art/Cleverness before common sense/Good Lord, deliver us."
Dr Shuba D. Priya, Tuticorin

• As a young college girl who travels by bus everyday, I know fully well the problems girls have to face. But even then, I shudder to think of the types of punishment that Khushwant Singh suggests. Pray for God's sake, don't revive those medieval punishments. It is much more painful for us to see those horrible sights of public flogging and castration and amputation of limbs, etc , than for criminals to bear them. Such punishments will only complicate matters. Most crimes are committed in a sudden fit of emotion and so the punishment should not cause any permanent damage.
Nita Ghosh, New Delhi

• The punishments suggested by Mr Singh for sexual crimes are not at all appropriate because sexual urge is not the only cause of rape. If sexual urge forces one to rape, why aren't women raping men? It is the male's dominant attitude that leads him to such acts. If he is castrated, his urge for domination will find some other outlet. Despite all the punishments, crime is on the rise. The root of such crimes should be discovered and remedied.
J. Venkateshwar Rao, Warangal (AP)

• Khushwant Singh's remedies to reduce incidence of crime is yet another of his incongruous antics. It is preposterous to suggest confiscation of the personal property of a criminal and pass on the same to the family of the victim. How could the family members of the criminal be responsible for his acts? Such unwise andunjust steps would jeopardise the very foundations of a developing community. His other suggestions are not even worth considering.
N.S. Sarnik, Bhilai

• Drugs cause permanent damage to the human body and as such I am against Mr Singh's suggestions.
Mrinal Biswas, Burdwan

• The punishments which Khushwant Singh talks of is prevalent in the Arab countries but it will not work in a democratic country like India. A rapist or a drunkard should not be punished by drugs. Punishment should be aimed at reformation and not maiming of the body.
M. Arivazhagan, New Delhi

GUEST COLUMN/M.A.K. PATAUDI

The Decline of Indian Cricket

The background to the recently-concluded contest is worth mentioning. The West Indies had mauled India and the Australians had beaten her conclusively in a series of one-day games. The same West Indies had battered England into humiliation with an unprecedented 5-0 victory. When David Gower arrived, the bruises still showed and both sides as indeed both captains, were intent on rehabilitating their reputation. To some extent Gower succeeded, but Sunil Gavaskar did not, and inevitably people began to propound their various theories regretting the decline of Indian cricket. After all Gavaskar had not lost a series at home, but it was forgotten that most of Gavaskar's wins had been against teams which had suffered wholesale defectionsto Kerry Packer's World Series Cricket. Also to suggest that there was a decline was to assume that there had been a gradual incline This was plain nonsense for this has never been the case in Indian cricket. There have been great individuals in the past, as there are at present, from C K Nayudu through Vinoo Mankad, Subash Gupte, Vijay Hazare, the three great spinners of the Sixties and early Seventies, to G. R. Viswanath, Gavaskar, Kapil Dev, and now hopefully Mohammad Azharuddin, but rarely if ever had they combined to make a composite team which could produce consistent performances over a period of years.

In the bad old days, if one is to believe senior cricketers, the infighting was vicious, catches were actually dropped on purpose and players spent more time Machiavellian schemes than playing cricket. The board also got into the act by appointing and dropping captains on vague whims and fancies. Sometime in the late Fifties, matters improved when the players realised that if personal differences were kept off the field there was a better chance to win, and winning brought longer lasting benefits. Yet, India rarely won because never and at the same time was she strong in all departments of the game. When a Vijay Merchant or Gavaskar was flourishing, the middle order was brittle; when India had world class spinners, there were no opening bowlers. And when Kapil Dev eventually turned up, the spinners had gone. Now Sivaramakrishnan has taken wickets but Kapil can now only average two wickets per match.

This in effect has meant that in Test cricket (till Sri Lanka was given full membership) India has been contesting for the bottom place with New Zealand, Inspite of producing a far larger number of quality players. Ofcourse, there have been moments of triumph, three successive wins, of which two were abroad, when Ajit Wadekar was captain. And while the country was basking in the glory of a self-styled world champion, Wadekar knew better and organised his benefit before India was bowled out for 42 and he had announced his retirement.

Gavaskar was the greatest, and while no one doubted this it is strange that only some Bombay players paid him sycophantic homage. Perhaps the others were jealous but no matter how hard he tried many cricketers from elsewhere were unable to give him their full trust.

India, against odds quoted at more than 500 to 1, won the World Cup, and once again the route from Santa Cruz to the Bombay Cricket Association office was crammed with people waiting for a glimpse of their heroes. This lasted till the West Indies descended like a wolf on the fold, and while their cohorts may not have gleamed, their pearly white teeth certainly did, as they systematically butchered the bowling and took their revenge. All India did was to change captains, and hope for further miracles.

Gavaskar has had more influence on India cricket than any other captain. There are not many who are prepared to argue with 30 centuries and 8,000 runs. During his first tenure and quite by accident the more important posts, including three members of the selection committee belonged to Maharashtra. At the same time the North was emerging from a long sleep and producing cricketers who could compete with the best in Bombay. (Previously this had been the privilege of the south) and when players like Suru Nayak were, prefered to one of their own, the north felt slighted enough to make a concerted move to have Gavaskar removed. The plan was ill-conceived for the north had only Kapil Dev to offer, and though enough pressure was brought to bear, for the plan to succeed, it became apparent very soon that Kapil Dev was not captaincy material no matter how fine a soul he may have been. Back came Gavaskar, and this time certain new aspects which had crept into Indian cricket became more apparent.

Wadekar (left) and Venkataraghavan

Money was one of them. Prize money came into the game about 16 years ago, and it was at a team gathering that Wadekar suggested that it be shared. Nobody objected, least of all the captain, who had to spend two years and twice the amount that he had won, in legal fees to convince the income tax department that this be treated as incidental income of an amateur or an outright gift and that income tax did not apply. Gradually and as TV caught on, those wishing to advertise themselves or their products began to offer substantial amounts. I suppose the players got a kick appearing on TV offering envelopes stuffed with cash. The players had become too wise to accept cheques. As each one received his due he handed it over to a player. Usually it was Venkataraghavan when he was in the team (not only because he was honest, but he had the knack of dividing thousands by any number and arriving at an even figure). After the prize distribution was over each player would collect his share and go home. So far so good.

But then Gavaskar opened up entire new vistas of making money. He had noticed how cricketers once out of the limelight were actually shunned by the same people who had fussed over them, fought for the pleasure of inviting them home and queued to have photographs taken with them. In Bombay only money seemed to matter, and there was more than one way to make it. Gavaskar found them all. Advertising, film producing (this may have been for a lark), writing articles (on the same match but for different publications), taking a fee for organising matches, writing instant books, which were spiced to sell better, appearance money (one paid for the pleasure of entertaining the team) and signing contracts with the manufacturers of sports equipment. He became the first Indian millionaire through cricket, rich enough to buy a flat in central Bombay. In a capitalist cricketing country he would have been considered a financial genius. In India they began to call him a mercenary, and within the team he became the envy of some who felt that their contribution to Indian cricket was not being fully appreciated. Why should Gavaskar hog all the publicity as well as the money? The answer was simple: he had reached those dizzy heights to which no Indian cricketer in his right mind would even dream of aspiring. As importantly he was articulate where others were dumb, he was controversial where others dared not to be, he could even be witty, and this made him ideal material for the media and the advertiser.

Gavaskar was the greatest, and while no one doubted this, it is strange that only some Bombay players paid him sycophantic homage. Perhaps the others were jealous but no matter how hard he tried, many cricketers from elsewhere were unable to give him their full trust (Dilip Doshi is an example). They felt that Gavaskar stood for Gavaskar though he had often clashed with authority for the benefit of his team. Had he not managed to organise the first benefit match in Sharjah for himself which had netted him US dollars 50,000? Further, was not the second beneficiary in the same year his own uncle, now richer by another few thousand dollars? Was it not due to him that the unsavoury aspect of writing books questioning the integrity of his own team members come into the game? And was it not entirely his doing that Kapil Dev was disciplined at New Delhi? The public believes this implicitly but the Indian public sees what it wants to see and an Indian captain must not only captain but be seen to captain. Gavaskar inspite of all advantages has not managed to project an all India image. And remarks like "I'll never play in Calcutta" or batting left-handed at Madras have not helped. Nor has the quest for money been without misunderstandings, which have at times reflected in the performance of the team.

As soon as India lost to an ordinary English side there was a cry for another captain, but who wants to head a losing proposition? The odds in Australia are far from favourable and Indian cricket is no more advanced than it was a generation ago. As such it does not matter if Gavaskar and his team lose. The fault does not lie in the player alone, but in the system which has never produced consistency. And what about Gavaskar himself? Soon after retirement, the same public which has been critical, will remember only his great deeds. Twenty years from now he will be a hero, far larger than C.K. Nayudu or Vinoo Mankad. In the meanwhile he has secured himself and his family, which has not been the case with many other Indian cricketers. He may not drive to work in a Mercedez but no one is ever going to shun him.

Gavaskar with the Maruti car he got as a gift

Gavaskar opened up entire new vistas of making money...In Bombay only money seemed to matter and there was more than one way to make it. Gavaskar found them all...He became the first Indian millionaire through cricket, rich enough to buy a flat in central Bombay. In a capitalist cricketing country he would have been considered a financial genius. In India they began to call him a mercenary.

COVER STORY

Don Azharuddin

A new star on the Indian cricket horizon

What Mohammed Azharuddin has achieved can be gauged not from his scores but the effect on Hyderabad in general. When this correspondent, alien to the city, stopped at Narayanguda and slowly recited, "3-5-569" to the garland vendor with a temporary stall there, the reply was tentative. "Lekin koi address to hoga na (But there must be some address)?"

With my telegraphic descriptions of the destination quite inadequate, I had another try. "Wo cricketwalla Azharuddin kahan rahta hai (Where does the cricketer Azharuddin stay)," I asked.

"To aisa bolo na, saab. Auto ko bolo Virtalwadi le javega. Wahan koi bhi bachcha se pooch lena (Why didn't you say so? Tell the auto-rickshaw to go to Vittalwadi. Ask any child there)."

Traces of Azharuddin's remarkable achievement were evident en route. Outside a State Bank of India branch was a banner: "Congratulations to Mohd. Azharuddin."

It was no problem finding his house. It had to be the one with a crowd outside. But Azharuddin was not at home that evening. He had gone to a function organised by an Exhibition Society in his honour, his brother said. I would be back again next morning at 10 am, I informed. I left a note. On an afterthought the time for the appointment was preponed to 9 am.

8 February. At 10 minutes past eight o'clock in the morning I was standing outside Azharuddin's house. With approximately fifty people waiting outside with requests ranging from "Ek autograph bas" "One photo with you please" to 'Happy birthday. We brought this garland for you.' Add to that two policemen who kept a benign vigil.

Inside his house in an ante-room' as one could call it, sat a few newsmen, four photographers, five of the local TV crew and well-wishers. Sitting space was out of the question.

At 8.35 am, Azharuddin, churidar-pyjama clad made his appearance. He was 22 that day. The crowd surged forward. While Azhar's father and cousin tried to keep the well-intentioned crowd at bay with intermittent cries of 'Line please, line please," garlands were offered,

Azharuddin in action during the recently concluded series against England: rare brilliance sweets thrust forward, cameramen clicked and schoolgirls shyly presented their exercise books for an expansive scrawl. Finally, Azharuddin ducked, weaved, apologised and was lost into one of the inner rooms.

But even this was mild in comparison to the reception accorded to him when he arrived in Hyderabad. The crowd went berserk at the airport.

My memories of Azharuddin go back to Jamshedpur last year. West Zone were playing South Zone and Azharuddin's innings on the third day breathed some life back into a game which had by then gone beyond South's grasp. Azhar made 72 with the ease of a vacationing employee and was out not too long after he had gone in.

The last I saw of him afforded an insight into the stuff he was made of. We had got ourselves into an animated conversation on the game; we comprised Daljit Singh, a few South Zone players and journalists. Azhar sat in a corner quiet, head buried into a copy of the Sun magazine Pages flipped, the magazine was finished but apparently Azhar would turn back and start afresh. He sat secluded in that corner as if in a form of enforced detachment and spoke not a word. Finally, when time of his departure back to Hyderabad by a train that evening had drawn near, he got up, went to each one, whether he was acquainted with that person or not, shook him by the hand, nodded his head as a substitute for a greeting and then was gone. Typical introvert. The next one saw him was at Calcutta.

Azharuddin exhibited, as he had that evening in Jamshedpur, that he possessed most of the attributes of greatness. He played the ball late, almost posthumously, rolled his wrists over, he also played as straight and close to the body as was possible.

From a basic adherence to the textbook, Azharuddin improvised. There was this sweep shot at Madras. Edmonds pitched it outside the leg stump and slightly short of a length. Azhar took a step or two down the wicket, took his bat in a circular arc behind him, and once with the backlift completed, brought the bat down vertically, not horizontally, with the face of the blade "open" to the wicketkeeper. The impact was made the moment the ball pitched; the timing was perfect and the shot whistled past Downton,unaware ,for four. Noted critic Robin Marlar wrote in his column in The Sunday Times: "People ask you to define perfection in sport This was it " Lala Amarnath was tempted to place the boy beside Denis Compton. His strokes were shown among the highlights of the news over national hookup that evening. Two weeks later, his century at Kanpur and the consequent record of hundreds in the first three Tests of one's career was the lead item on the newscast. The recall by France of their envoy to India was second.. What a way to start a Test career!

Azharuddin has endeared himself to the millions. The other day he was invited to his old school and presented with Rs 10,000 for his achievements. Without a thought, Azhar gave half of it right back in memory of his grandfather. A fine, modest man Azharuddin. His ancestors from the maternal side came from Bukhara (Iran) to join Aurangzeb's army.

That reminds one of a joke. Azharuddin found an interested listener in a British journalist while he spoke of his grandmother from Scotland, Azharuddin kept a straight face for that one.

Mudar Patherya, Hyderabad

Photographs Tarapada Banerjee and Tapan Das

Today, every other stereo system becomes yesterday's!

Orson presents the Sony Series 44 Stereo System.

At last there's a new stereo system in India that isn't old hat in the rest of the world

The Sony Series 44 Stereo System From Orson

We can't list all its features. We can only whet your appetite for more!

Take the Sony TC-FX44 Cassette Deck. It employs the Dolby C noise reduction system DD.* When the best Indian decks have just about graduated to Dolby B DD* The silence speaks!

The Sony TA-AX44 Amplifier gives you 240 watts of total peak music power. It reduces harmonic distortion to 0.008% -- when other amps still boast of 0.05%!

The 3-way SS-S440 Sony Speaker System brings you "live performance" quality. These are the only speakers in India with solid state tweeters for high frequency response.

And now, for the first time, you've got a choice of a remote control unit. No stirring out of your comfortable armchair.

Incidentally, you can buy the equipment separately. If you're forced to!

Orson brings it all to you

When Sony was looking around for someone to bring the best equipment in the world to you, the decision was easy.

Orson.

Not just because Orson has the kind of manufacturing facilities that Sony was impressed by.

But also because Orson has the same attitude towards quality as Sony.

So now you can get the best without leaving home.

There's Sony.
The name the world trusts.
And Orson.
The name Sony trusts.

ORSON

ORSON ELECTRONICS LIMITED

Bombay Regional Office: 209-210, 'ARCADIA' Nariman Point, Backbay Reclamation, Bombay 400 021. Tel. 224096/224146.
Madras Regional Office: Mecs House, 4th Floor, 47, Annasalai, Madras 600 002. Tel. 840671/849039.
New Delhi Regional Office: 13, Community Centre, Basant Lok, Vasant Vihar, New Delhi 110 057. Tel. 673519/678493
Calcutta Regional Office: 3, Woodburn Road, Calcutta 700 020. Tel. 433743.

* Dolby® and DD are registered trademarks of Dolby Laboratories Licensing Corporation

Sony's-OEL-894/84

'It Was Pray and Play'

Mohammed Azharuddin told SUNDAY

Q: Quite suddenly you are at the centre of all attention. A couple of months ago however, your presence had not been greatly noticed. How has life changed for you?

A: Well, take today (8 February) as an example. I woke up at 5.30 am to say my prayers. At about 7 am people started queueing up outside with garlands and for autographs. After that was done with there were a couple of interviews to newsmen around 8.30 am and an interview to the local television centre around 10 am. After that I went to my school as they had organised a function to felicitate me. Following that, I went to the mosque to offer my Friday prayers at one o'clock. Once that was over I had to attend an official function by the AP Legislative Council organised by Mukassir Shah. Once that had finished I was invited to attend another function quite close by. Then I was invited to another at ... I can't remember which place it was (smiles sheepishly). After that I came straight home as it is my birthday and we had some ceremonies to be observed. We also had a lot of people coming home. Yesterday all this continued up to midnight. It is 9.20 pm now and I expect that it should also continue to about midnight tonight. In fact, I have been extremely busy for the last few days. Moreover, I cannot now walk freely in my own locality. I'd be mobbed.

Q: You had been appointed as a clerk in a bank in recognition of your sporting achievements. What work did you exactly do there?

A: My work was only limited to the administrative side of things, no transactions were involved. I was in the recruitment board and had to merely check certain forms. That was all.

Q: You have been promoted to the level of a junior officer now. What work will be expected of you now?

A: I wouldn't know as I shall join only after coming back from Australia. At present I am on special leave.

Q: At the start of the season you were just one of the aspirants for a berth in the Test team. You were not selected for the tour of Pakistan.

A: Yes, but I did not feel anything about it. Perhaps, I was not considered good enough to make it. On an afterthought I would say I expected that I might have got through but when the team was announced I was not really disappointed that my name was not in the touring side.

Q: You must have, at the start of this season, made a mental plan for yourself. Did you feel that if you managed to play even one Test this season you would have made considerable progress?

A: Yes, I did want to grab whatever chance came my way. I would have been satisfied had I been told in advance that I would play in at least one Test in the series. I was however psychologically prepared to make the most of that solitary appearance and be selected again!

Q: Now that you have scored three hundreds in your first three Tests, don't you feel that your achievements have far outstripped your expectations?

A: I do feel that. The credit for that, of course, goes to God. Moreover, part of the credit goes also to the people of Hyderabad for their blessings and folks all over in India.

Q: You mentioned God. How often do you invoke his blessings?

A: I am a Sunni Muslim and pray five times a day even on tours. While touring I make it known to my roommate that I would be getting up at around 5.30 am in the mornings and praying. Nobody has had any objections till now.

Q: What about when you are playing in a game? Don't you miss your afternoon prayers?

A: I do as often there are few facilities in the dressing rooms. I make up for that when I come back to the hotel.

Q: Coming now to something on cricket, after that 52 at Jaipur against England you expected to be in the team playing the English at Ahmedabad.

A: I did as the game was scheduled to be played between the English and the under-25 Indian side. I had played as part of this side in Zimbabwe, so I thought I certainly had a good chance of being included again. But there were other problems apart from my inclusion. I had sustained a finger injury much before that game and had been out of touch. Also a cable from home just when I was ready to go in and bat made me extremely tense.

Q: What cable?

A: It had come from home and said that my grandfather was unwell. I remembered his advice to me when I took leave to attend the game. He had said that if I was destined to get a hundred I would. He had asked me to play my natural game.

Q: How did you get the telegram?

A: It was just before I went in to bat. I was handed a folded cable and looking at it I had a feeling that things were not okay, that something was certainly fishy. And there it was. I had left my grandfather in a perfectly fit condition and now he was seriously ill. My first reaction was of

Azharuddin being hugged by his mother on his arrival at Hyderabad

Photographs: Snaps India

Is Gavaskar Jealous of Azharuddin?

For over a decade Sunil Gavaskar was Indian cricket. He was the best opening batsman in the world, one of the greatest Indian batsmen ever, an astute and successful captain, and the holder of just about every batting record in test cricket. In the hit-and-miss world of Indian cricket, he was a phenomenon. With success came fame, fat paychecks and the adulation and affection of millions, something which Gavaskar may well have taken for granted.

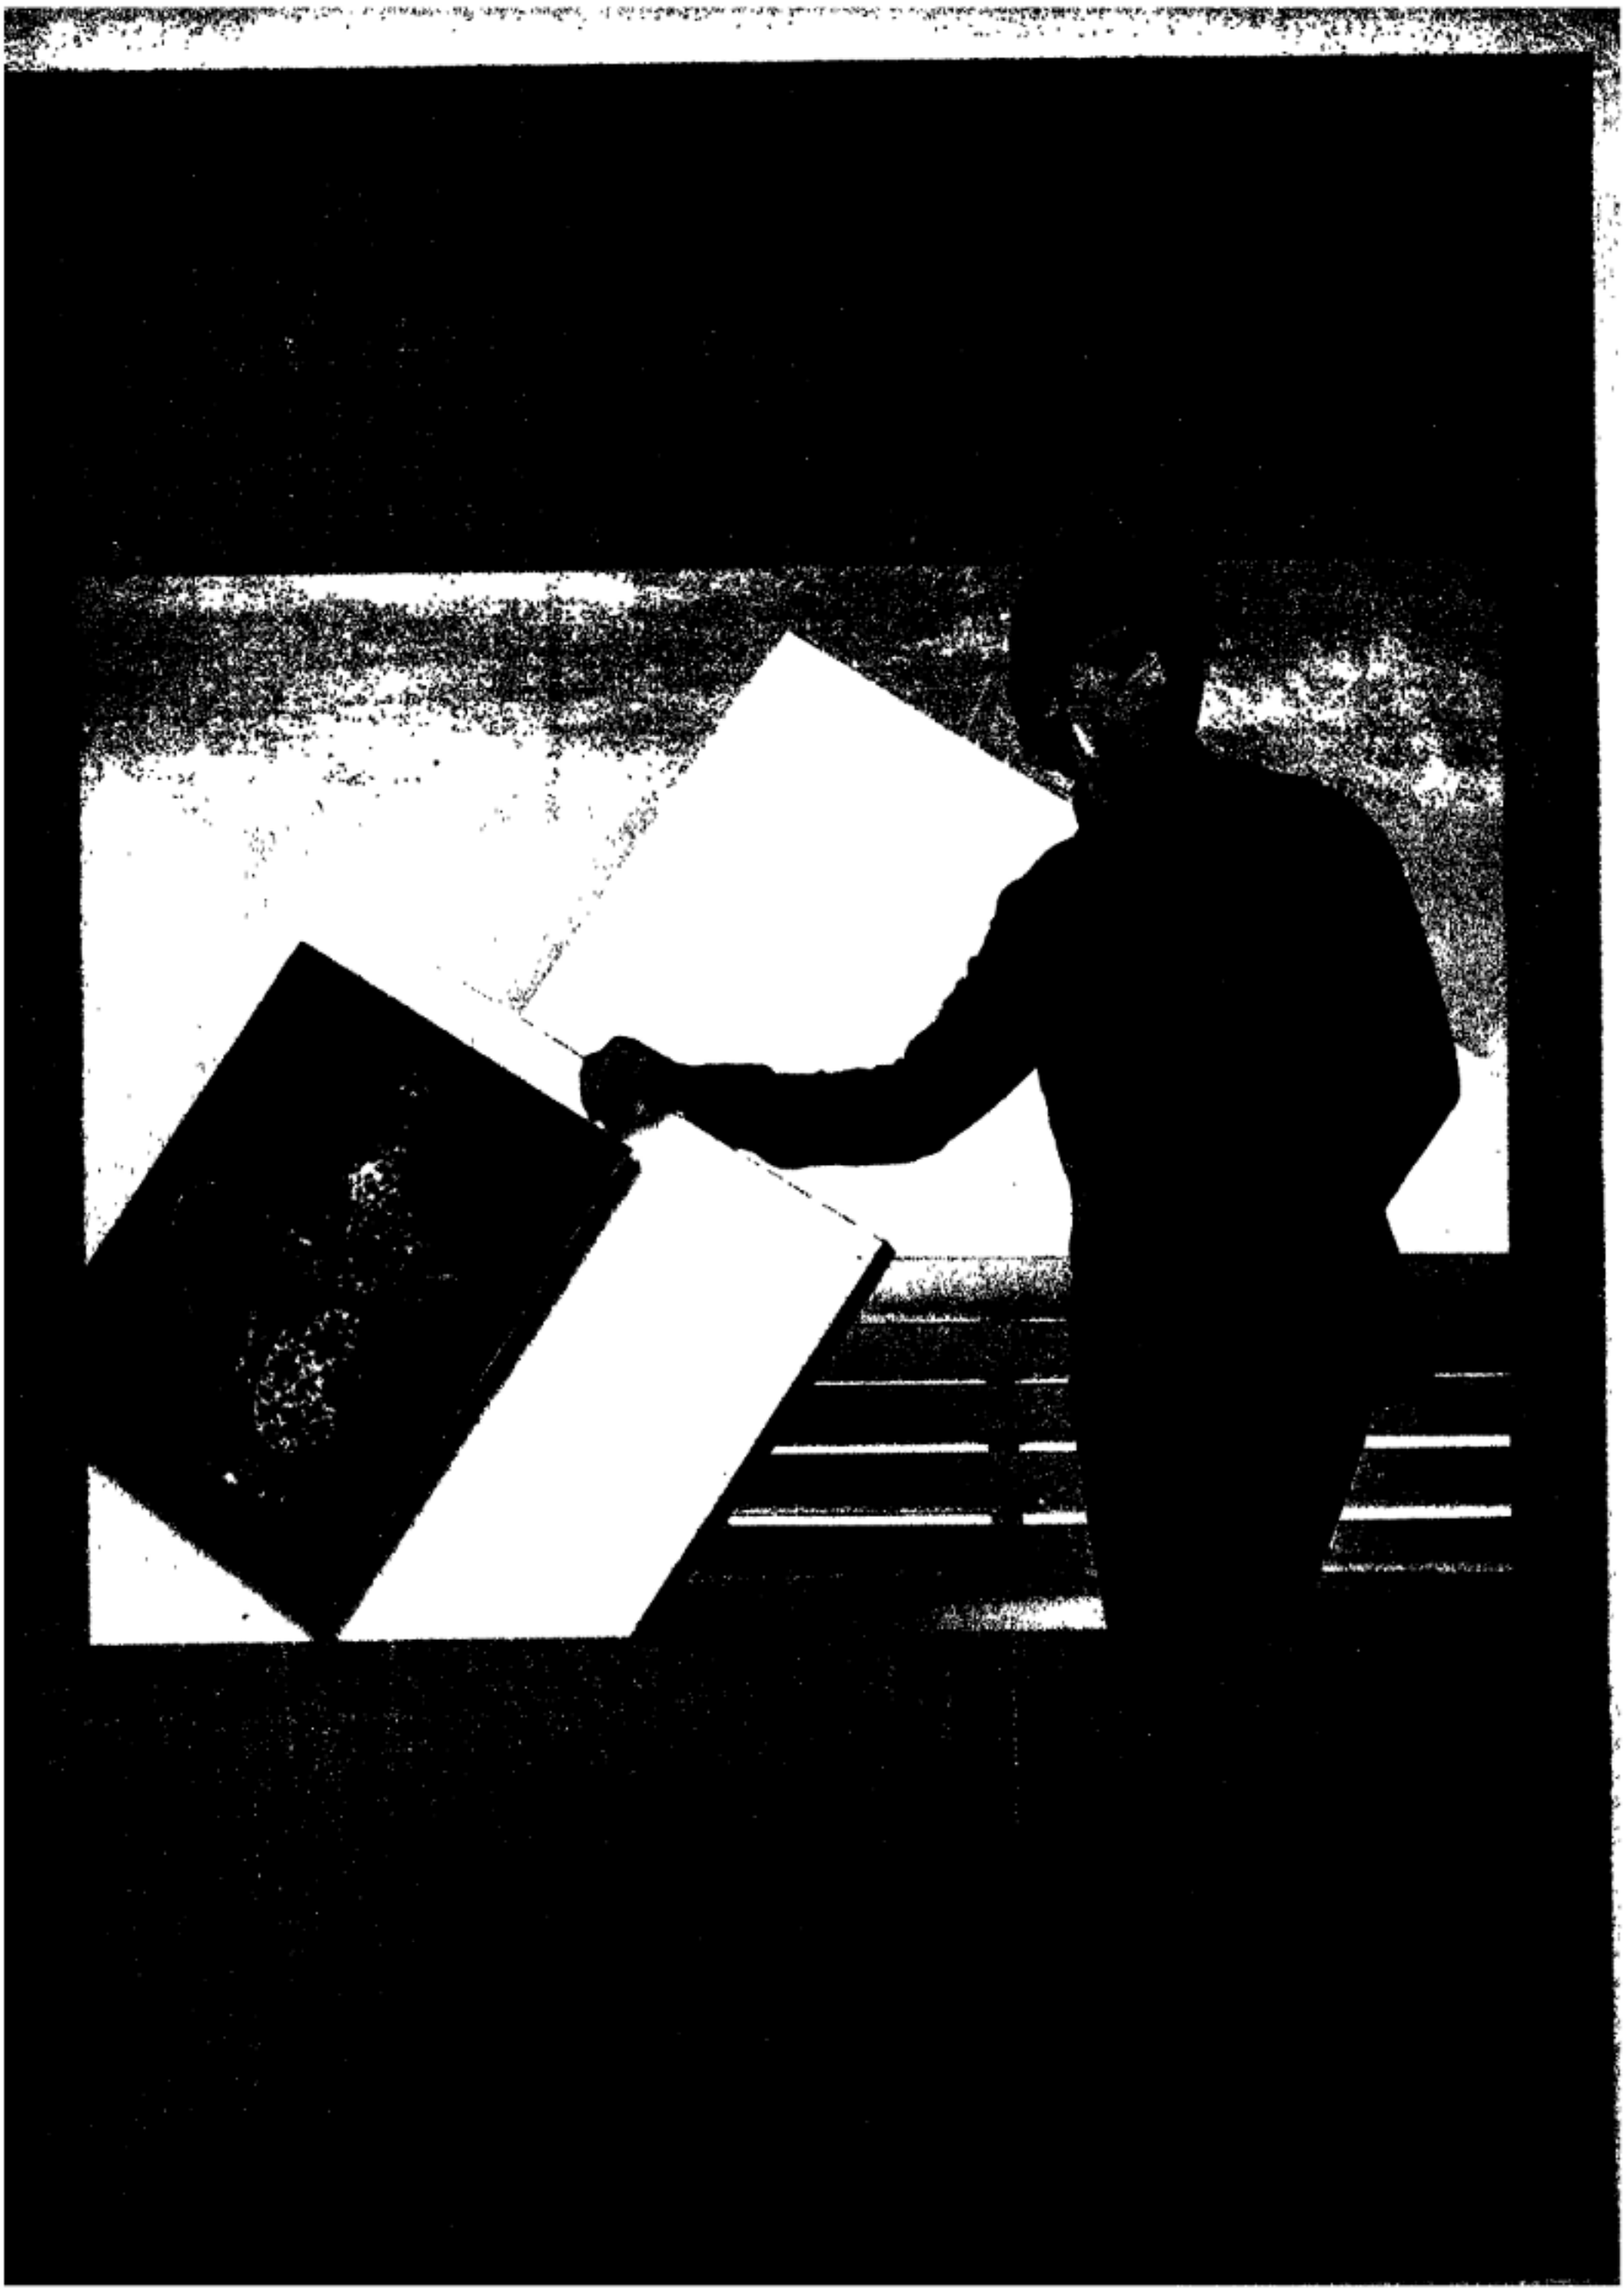
More recently, however, there have been more ruins than runs for Gavaskar, a phase which has coincided with the rise of Mohammed Azharuddin. His first series has been as magnificent as Gavaskar's 1971 tour of the West Indies and he has quickly replaced his captain as the cult figure of the game. Cricket-lovers all over the country are already lining up behind Azhar. Is Gavaskar missing his status as a Messiah? And more importantly, has he deliberately tried to place obstacles in the young super-star's way?

With Sandeep Patil dropped after his suicidal dismissal in the lost Delhi test, one place in the middle order was vacant. It was Gavaskar's plan to drop down the order, not to give it a semblance of stability as was the original excuse, but to find his touch—his failures with the bat were continuing. But the selectors, the men Gavaskar had once called jokers, strongly, and this time rightly opposed his plan. This was the right time, they decided, to blood a promising young cricketer and Gavaskar would have to open the innings. And in what was one of the dreariest test matches in recent history, only Azharuddin sparkled.

Again, after Gavaskar's by-now-all-too-familiar early dismissal in the Indian first innings at Kanpur, it was surprisingly Azharuddin who replaced his skipper at the batting crease. Admittedly, Azhar was the man in form and Gavaskar's Bombay colleague Dilip Vengsarkar the regular one-drop batsmen in the side was not, but it was only Azhar's fourth test innings and there was another far more experienced batsman, Mohinder Amarnath who has regularly batted in this pivotal number three position. And why was a young batsman pushed up the batting order just to protect an out-of-form senior batsman?

When Azharuddin did get his third and by far his best century on the second morning, his teammates applauded from the players' enclosure as the crowds rose to a man to greet their new hero. Only the man who ought to have led the applause was very conspicuously absent. Since Sivaramakrishnan had sent the English side spinning to their doom during those brief moments of euphoria at Bombay few things had gone right for India, and this was one of the few. The Gavaskar of old, more a leader of a combative, fighting-fit team, than of a surly bunch of highly-talented individuals would have been the first on the balcony. This time he refused to make an appearence. What [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

To HIMACHAL with love



Kangra miniature, 1800 A.D

For more information please write to: The Commissioner Tourism, Himachal Pradesh, Daizy Bank Estate, Shimla-171001. Tel. 2028, 3136 or contact our Tourist Offices:
New Delhi Tel. 345320, Calcutta Tel. 446847, Bombay Tel. 219191/284, Chandigarh Tel. 26494, Madras Tel. 812955, Pathankot Tel. 316, Dalhousie Tel. 36, Dharamsala Tel. 362, 363, Palampur Tel. 81, Shimla Tel. 3311, 6037, 5071, Manali Tel. 25.

HIMACHAL TOURISM

DYNAMICS

Policemen in ceremonial attire escorting Azharuddin home from the airport must have been quite unnerving?

A: There's an explanation for that too. I had played the entire lot of players on two previous occasions: at Jaipur and Ahmedabad. I had also scored quite a few runs against them, so there was really no reason to be awed by the situation.
Q: What happened when you went in for your first Test innings?
A: Dilip Vengsarkar was at the other end. He had a word with me, bringing to my notice that Edmonds was extracting turn from the wicket and that I should be careful. A bit later, Shastri came in and asked me how the wicket was behaving. That pepped me up.
Q: The second day of the Test match was marred by rain.
A: We played only about four overs on that morning and went in again. Since I batted well into the third day mind must have been the longest innings in Test cricket by a debutant (laughs).
Q: Your century came on the third day. What was the first thought that crossed your mind?
A: My grandfather's saying that I merely had to wait for two months for everything to go right. That evening I offered special prayers in my room—'shukrana'—and thanked God for everything. We had a small party in the captain's room after that. Sunnybhai said. "Well done and I am sure that there will be many more to come." Similarly, each of the players came up and congratulated me
Q: The first innings at Madras was the only occasion when you did not get a fifty.
A: Unfortunately it was at a time when I was just beginning to get my shots. I tried to play for a single, got the inside edge, the ball hit my pads and hit the stumps. I cursed myself.
Q: What about the second innings?
A: Even though I went in at a fairly critical stage I was not tense. I began getting all my shots. When eventually I was out on the following morning I felt that my best was not adequate in saving India.
Q: The Kanpur century got you your third in succession. But you were on 98 at the end of the first day. That must have surely been a good reason for you to be a bit edgy.
A: There was no tension really but everyone seemed to say 'Bas, ab do run karne hain.' (Only two more runs.) Next morning I did get the runs and my first thought was of course, of God. I thanked him. But I did not get my runs too smoothly. In fact, the 24 runs that I scored in the morning took me almost an hour-and-a-half.
Q. People began comparing you to Bradman and Viv Richards.
A: I don't think that it would be right. I have seen Viv Richards In fact, it would be wrong to compare anyone with him. Moreover, I would not be the right person to answer this question.
Q: Coming to your childhood, you must have had certain ambitions. What did you want to become in life?
A. It may all seem appropriate now, but I always wanted to be a Test cricketer. Look, I was never that good in studies to become a doctor or something like that. I always saw myself playing in a Test match; that used to be my childhood fantasy.
Q: What about your beginnings at the game?
A: I bagan playing gulli cricket at the Old MLA quarters–that is where we stayed years ago. We had our own gulli team and contributed money, formed a club and played. I used to play a lot; studies never really suffered if you know what I mean. I managed promotion each time though as a student I was just about average. Parental interference was out of the question; I used to stay with my grandfather.

Friends and relatives greet Azharuddin at his home

Q: You must have been beaten up by your grandfather quite often. Do you remember any such instance?
A: Well, one day I found a sparrow sitting on top of the fan. It was doing something so I took a stone and threw it at the sparrow. It fell down. When my grandfather saw what I had done he became really wild and beat me up. I cried quite a bit after that.
Q: Did you as a kid think you would eventually make it to Test level?
A: By the time I was in the eighth standard I was convinced that I was going to make it. I played cricket seriously, never for the heck of it. In fact, in those days I used to follow the progress of the Tests and used to hear a lot of Gavaskar and Vishwanath. Today I am playing alongside quite a few of them. It's a great feeling.
Q: What about your religious bent of mind? Was it inculcated since childhood?
A: Yes it was. It was pray and play side by side. In fact, the atmosphere at home was such. As far as fasts are concerned I observe all 30 in Ramzaan except on match days.
Q: Prayers must also be a psychological boost.
A: I too feel so. After the morning prayers, one feels confident in whatever one is doing. I get this feeling ki ab to out nahi honge, subah ki namaaz jo padh li hai (that I will not get out now that I have performed my morning prayers.) That confidence is instilled..
Q: You are a young man. Do you go out with girls?
A: I don't. I am an introvert. I try to keep within myself and find that this helps me to concentrate on the game better. I usually push off to bed by 9 pm each night. Even at home, I fall asleep while watching television. Therefore, partying as you might call it, is out for me. I'd prefer solitude.

Interviewed by Mudar Patherya

Hyderabad's Boy Wonder waves to crowds

'Azhar Has Always Been Dedicated'

Mohammed Azizuddin, father of Azharuddin, spoke to SUNDAY

Q: What was your attitude to Azhar's progress at cricket when he was young? Did you at any time try to impress upon him that all this was useless and that he should be more attentive towards his studies?

A: No, we encouraged him right from the start. He was an average student, nothing outstanding, and kept being promoted after each year. There were no problems on the academic front till the B. Com stage when he missed out on attendance because of some national tournaments.

Q: But when Azhar was young didn't you want him to become a doctor or an engineer? Surely you cannot have foreseen that he would one day become a Test cricketer.

A: As far as all my children are concerned I had left it entirely to their inclination. They were free to choose what they wanted to become. Jo banna hai bano aur apna apna dekh lo (Do what you want to). Initially, of course, I too thought that one of my sons should be a pilot, doctor or engineer but soon I was forced to give up my belief. By the way, cricket is also a profession in itself.

Q: When Azhar was, say in the tenth standard and pretty serious about the game, did you feel that he was going to make it to the top?

A: Yes, we were very confident. Azhar has great will-power and determination. Hats off to my son for that. In fact, every match, whether it be an important one for him or an ordinary one, he used to take very seriously. That dedication was always there. For example, he scored some 245 runs in a Vizzy Trophy game. Those 215 on his debut in the Duleep Trophy. Of course, I was convinced that one day he was going to become a great cricketer.

Q: Did you think that he was going to do so fast?

A: We had realised that he score a century on his debut. And we three batsmen were out and then Azhar made 105.

Q: What were you doing when he got that century at Kanpur?

A: We were all watching television at home. Some friends who have a colour television had invited us to their place to watch but we preferred to stay home and watch. When Azhar got to 98 we felt that he would get the century that very evening but he didn't. Of course, we were sad but here again we admired his temperament: he had got stuck at 65, 91 and 93 but had not been tapped into making errors.

The hero at home

Q: There must have been tension that night as Azhar was unbeaten on 98.

A: Not really but when he came out to bat the next morning the tension was unbearable. On the previous night I was convinced that he would do it but now when he actually came in to bat my heart was in my mouth. There was pin-drop silence in the room while all of us watched [illegible] moments of my life. Later in the day we also offered special thanksgiving prayers for the century. It was God's doing. Also behind all his centuries, Azhar's grandfather's blessings were there.

Q: How would you explain that?

A: When he was young, Azhar stayed most of the time with his grandfather (mother's father). He had a deep attachment to him.

Q: How are you coping with the amount of attention that you are now getting?

A: Till that second century there was tom-tomming in the locality that a boy from the Vittalwadi had become the only Indian and fourth in the world to score centuries in his first two Tests. When he returned from Madras there was no reaction as such from the people as he had dropped in to see us only for about 20 minutes around 5 am. He had come from Vijayawada and was pushing off to take the flight to Delhi and then onwards to Chandigarh. But when he came back from the Kanpur Test the reaction was unbelievable. There was a procession from the airport to our house led by horses. In fact, at the house itself people had queued up to see him. Quite a few people wait everyday even upto midnight outside the house to be able to catch a glimpse of Azhar. Bilkul chain nahi mila saab (We don't get any rest). We are spending sleepless nights. In fact, Azhar goes to sleep around 1.30 am and wakes up around 5 am to offer his prayers. He cannot go out because he might be mobbed. Earlier, he would have left after prayers for his physical training but in the present circumstances he cannot do so.

Q: What was Azhar like as a child?

A: He was very quiet, very submissive. He never gave us any trouble. He may have been mischievious but apart from that there were no complaints. In fact, I have never beaten him in my life. He has never given me a chance to do so.

Q: Did you observe any [illegible] Azhar's success?

A: [illegible] to pray [illegible] distributed it [illegible] [illegible] by Shyjal Patherya

SPECIAL REPORT

COOMAR NARAIN

The Multinational Spy

What was the nature of SLM Maneklal's involvement in the spy scandal?

The courtroom of metropolitan magistrate P. K. Dham on the first floor of New Delhi's Patiala House The multinational spy, Coomar Narain is making his two-hour, fifteen-page confession in camera. Outside the glass paned doors stand a posse of policemen and in one corner, a plump, middle-aged lady in a blue silk saree and rubber chappals, clutching a couple of plastic bags. It is Mrs Coomar Narain. Every now and then Mrs Narain tries to break through the security cordon and peep into the room When prevented, she complains and asks why the press has been allowed in the corridor. As soon as Coomar Narain emerges from the courtroom, the cameras begin to click Mrs Narain gives him a handkerchief to cover his face. Then, elbowing the policemen around him, she tries to tell him he should not speak "in such a state of mind " "I have made up my mind. Let me get rid of it," replies her husband as he is whisked away. She demands a court-order again banning the press in the court for all the "lies" they have been writing about her husband.

Mrs Geeta Narain is, perhaps, the only one who knows Coomar Narain best, even though she keeps insisting she has no interest in Narain's "business affairs" and thus knows little. She lives separately, rather like a recluse on a four-acre farm in Mehrauli. Initially, she refused to talk to us, protesting through a crack in one of the three giant gates to her farm, about the behaviour of the press. "I have nothing more to say," she said, wanting us to return. But she yielded finally on the condition that our questions would only concern Coomar Narain the man, not the scandal that he is involved in. Even before this correspondent could question her, Mrs Narain started speaking. Her first question:

Mrs Narain: What do you want to know about my husband? Narain is a rather simple person, there is nothing special about him. There isn't much to tell.

Q: Did you ever suspect he could be spying?

A: Never. He is not the kind of man to do it. He is so simple and quiet. He did not even mix with his neighbours in Defence Colony. Go and ask them about Narain and they will tell you (so). There was nothing suspicious about him.

Q: What was his usual day like?

A: He went to his office in the morning and came here for lunch at about two in the afternoon. Then back to his office. In the evening he used to go out for a walk around his office. But in the evenings he did drink at 16, Hailey Road with his friends. I don't know them, though. Then he came back to Defence Colony and always rang me up before going to bed. You see, he is a blood-pressure and diabetes patient, so we were always worried. That is why he always took a walk and drank karela-juice regularly. But he didn't have any special tastes...even if there was some extra salt in something he would quietly eat it.

Q: Why were you living separately?

A: No, no, Narain was coming here every day but this place is too far from the city and he was very afraid of the snakes on my farm. Besides, he didn't like my activities here.

Q: What activities?

A: All the farming and gardening

Coomar Narain (centre) being taken to court by securitymen that I do...looking after the cows and the dogs and cats. I have dedicated my life to this farm...I want to do something creative. Even the men who had come here to conduct the raid were appreciating my garden. But Narain was never interested. He only did his business.

Jagdish Yadav

Q: Did you ever know what was happening at the Defence Colony residence?

A: Not really. I went there only occasionally. But I know nothing out of the way was happening there. We had a common servant who used to cook for Narain in the night and spend the days here, so I knew. In any case, I was not interested in what Narain did and he never told me.

Q: When did you shift to this farm and why?

A: In 1969, I was living with Narain in Defence Colony when someone told us this plot was available so we bought it. I was always interested in developing a farm.

Q: Where did you get the money from?

A: I had my savings. In 1956, only a year after our marriage, we bought a house in East Nizamuddin for Rs 10,000 only. I rented out some portions and collected the money. But that was a very small place, so we took this house in Defence Colony in 1964 for Rs 75,000 and I remember at that time I had only Rs 15,000 with me. So I had to mortgage the Nizamuddin house for Rs 60,000. I bought this farm again with the money I collected from rent. In all this, mind you, Narain had no role. He was not interested.

Q: What was your reaction on hearing of his arrest?

A: I was naturally shocked. My husband could never do such a thing.

Q: But he has himself confessed it in court...

A: Oh, I don't believe this confession. I have my own suspicions about it. Not one thing being said or printed is true. Everything is being presented in a twisted manner. I am sure Narain never said he had been spying for 25 years. He must have told them he was working for Maneklal for 25 years and they came out to tell the world he was spying. And this is very strange...the entire world knowing details of a confession that was supposed to be in camera. I think Narain is being framed. Even if he was spying for the last 25 years, my question is what were the intelligence agencies doing all the time? And do you realise the kind of people that would be involved in the so-called scandal if Narain had been operating for such a long time? I am sure Narain is being set up.

Q: Who could be doing that?

One of the suspects covers his face to avoid indentification

CNS

A: Who else but these intelligence agencies?

Q: But why?

A: They have to please Rajiv Gandhi, their new master. They have to show him how good they are at their work. They have to cover up their faults so they went about catching every Tom, Dick and Harry.

Q: What makes you suspect he has been framed?

A: I will tell you something interesting. The morning after Narain's arrest I had gone to 16, Hailey Road looking for him because I still didn't know what had happened and was worried. When I reached there, I found the place sealed and they wouldn't let me in. Then my driver, who has been with us for very long, came rushing out from inside and told me: "Madam, aapka khel khatam ho gaya (Madam, your game is up)." I don't know what he was talking about? What game and what did it have to do with me? And if there was a game, what did he know about it? I was surprised with his glee that morning. Later, some intelligence men cross-questioned me and I knew all their information came from my driver. He had been planted and was spilling the beans for a pittance.

Q: So there were some beans to be spilled...

A: No, no, no. I was just talking about what Narain was doing for the company. You know he was the liaison officer here and his company had many foreign collaborators. Naturally he had to keep contacts. Every liaison man does that, what was wrong if Narain did it. But I feel some of his friends have used him. I used to tell him not to drink in the office but he just couldn't say no to people. He should have kept an eye on the people he had below him but he treated them as members of his own family. They have taken undue advantage of such a simple man. Even this driver of mine, he grew rich so suddenly in the last few months. He has even bought a house. I had been telling Narain about his suspicious behaviour but he would hear none of it. How mean this driver has turned out to be! He even punctured my tyre before he walked out on me.

Q: What convinces you your husband was not spying?

A: Because he was not. Whatever he was doing was only for the company. A lot of rubbish has been let out about him which I am not ready to believe. Look at this preposterous thing about Narain being involved with call-girls. This is fantastic. Narain is not the type to involve himself with girls, in fact he shies away from them. Maybe in his younger days he had affairs but not since he married me. Here again, I think he was a victim of his mild manners. I know who brought those call-girls and forcibly introduced Narain to them. There was this neighbour who lived in Defence Colony who used to go to Narain's office accompanied by these girls but Narain couldn't stop them from coming even though he didn't like it.

Q: Who is this man?

A: No, I am not taking any names.

Q: If your husband was not spying, what about the documents recovered from his office?

A: Look, whatever Narain was doing he was doing for the company. On the instructions of Yogeshbhai (Yogesh T. Maneklal). The documents must have concerned the company's work.

Q: In other words, your husband was spying for the company...

A: I don't know but sometime ago

Is Yogesh Maneklal Involved?

In an earlier interview, Mr Yogesh Maneklal, managing director of S Lal Maneklal had said that the country's intelligence organisation which had been caught napping was now desperate to prove something. He implied that they were now over-reacting and implicating any and everybody. He was confident that he was in the clear. He said they had raided his offices—located from the first to the sixth floor of Vaswani Mansions in south Bombay on 21 January and found no incriminating documents. After that Maneklal had spoken to the press on 22 January. Then on 5 February, the intelligence branch people from Delhi were back at his plush home on the 17th floor of Woodlands and his office. They were armed with a warrant of arrest for him, as Maneklal's liaison man in Delhi, Coomar Narain, had mentioned to the investigators that he had kept his boss in the know of everything that was going on.

From reports that have appeared so far, which has all been officially handed out, Coomar Narain was operating at two levels. At one level he was operating as a commercial spy, which in reality is supplying commercial or market intelligence as it is called officially, and at another level he was also supplying vital, sensitive political intelligence. The point is whether Coomar Narain sent Yogesh Maneklal in Bombay, both commercial and political intelligence that he picked up. And, if he did send Mr Maneklal politically sensitive intelligence reports, did the latter just file it away, throw it away or give it to forces outside the country who could use it to weaken the country's security? So far, the information leaked to the press only mentioned that Maneklal confessed to entertaining senior government officers in posh hotels. He further said that he had regular contacts with persons in the defence ministry. This is nothing unusual because his company manufactured specialised rubber sheets for defence. Five-star hotels in Bombay and elsewhere are full of Indian businessmen entertaining senior bureaucrats and ministers. In fact, it is said that the businessman-politician who is the chief of the Bombay Congress(I) used to personally pick up former finance minister Pranab Mukherjee's five-star hotel bills in Bombay. In another case, a minister of state for finance who stayed at the Oberoi Towers at the cost of a business house was thrown out of his job summarily and the business house did not bother to pay the bill despite several reminders.

Commercial espionage is not a crime and has been practised in India. The work of every liaison officer in New Delhi is collecting commercial intelligence. The liaison men supply comparative statements of prices of tenders and all such related information about competitors. Maneklal obviously used this information in his negotiations. The implications behind Maneklal's arrest makes it necessary to separate commercial espionage which is not a crime against the country. The fact that Maneklal's liaison man Coomar Narain was in direct touch with embassies shows his link with political espionage. He was giving the French military attache information not only about defence contracts but also about the country's defence plans.

Was Maneklal involved in political espionage? Maneklal had collaborators mostly from the West while his exports were primarily to East European countries. According to Coomar Narain he got business from the Poles and the German Democratic Republic (GDR) because he supplied them political information. The Poles and the East Germans do not have their own intelligence network and they were obviously being used by the Soviet network, the KGB. From the West he was importing technology and setting up manufacturing units. This was being done on tender basis from government departments and commercial intelligence is vitally important in such cases.

Maneklal took over from his father who died in the early Seventies. His family had always been [illegible] and this is evident from the fact that [illegible]

Yogesh Maneklal (right) on his way to the court

Suspects being taken to a court in New Delhi

Jagdish Yadav

Yogeshbhai had asked Narain to look after the interests of Poland and GDR because otherwise they would have lost their business. Another thing, look at the amounts of money the company is spending now. When Narain had joined they never had such big money. This company has landed Narain into all sorts of problems. Even the whisky bottles that were recovered from his office were not his but the company's, lying there for being taken to Bombay. And poor Narain got blamed.

Q: Have you ever met Yogesh Maneklal?

A: Yes, and also his father Trikamlal Maneklal. He was very fond of Narain and took him on in 1960.

Q: Why did Narain leave the government job?

A: He was tired of the problems there. You know these constant intrigues and suspicions. Some of his friends suggested Maneklal.

Q: Was he under suspicion then too?

A: No, no. But he was quite frustrated with the government job.

Q: How has Yogesh Maneklal behaved with Narain?

A: He used to be very good.

Q: How many times have you met him?

A: Just a couple of times. But after this problem he has changed. Narain has been with the company for 25 years but not a man came to enquire how his family is after his arrest.

Q: Where did you meet Maneklal? Did you go to parties hosted by Narain?

A: No, I never went. He hosted parties in clubs and hotels but his wife was never with him. I was never interested.

Q: What was your family life like?

A: Fairly ordinary.

Q: Any relatives?

A: No. He doesn't have any relatives, neither do I. He has a brother but we don't know where he is or what he is doing. We haven't been in touch.

Q: Mrs Narain, why were you trying to stop your husband from making his confession that day?

A: Because he is not in a stable condition. The poor man is bearing the brunt of the pressure and suffering. Even two days before he was arrested, he had complained of pain in the chest. In the few weeks of detention, he has become so weak.

The driver of Coomar Narain

He is not getting his karela juice, nor the medicines he needs. In such a situation, I fear he might break down some day.

Q: Haven't you been able to give him the medicines?

A: I did try in the court but couldn't. They haven't been allowing me.

Q: Is there any pressure on you too?

A: I am naturally concerned and very depressed with all this bad publicity. This shouldn't have happened to us at this age. So many wrong things have been said. People are almost beginning to believe we have made millions cheating the country. But I can tell you we are not very rich. Narain earns a good salary and my farm is doing well. I run my house on the interests I get from a fixed deposit account that I have.

Then, as if to prove herself, Mrs Narain took us on a tour of her house. Two large bedrooms, each with a television set. Another in her large, well-kept living room, fitted with a Japanese music-system—"Narain isn't interested in music, I am," she said—and decorated with pieces of china and rosewood. In her kitchen were two cooking-ranges.

Out on the farm was a tractor, 30 Jersies and Holsteins and a couple of seed-bulls in the cowshed and a dung heap on which worked two little girls: Renu and Radha, the adopted children of the Narains. They were farm hands. Mrs Narain had told someone earlier that they did not go to school because they were not interested in studies. The reason she gave us was: "They have stopped because of the current problem."

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

INDO-FRENCH RELATIONS

Is the Honeymoon Over?

The two countries will have to work hard to rebuild the relationship

The Indians and the French were just short of becoming bhai-bhai when l'affaire Bolley suddenly soured the relations. Nearly three billion dollars were in the pipeline from France for various contracts and projects in India. On the anvil were many more, especially in the fields of telecommunications, energy and arms.

While South Block has thus far refrained from naming France, the anger and hurt in the involvement of a French diplomat in an espionage ring which struck at the most important and nodal point in the country—the Prime Minister's office—is barely disguised. "We are now back to square one with the French... they will have to work hard to rebuild the relationship or win back that confidence and trust we had placed in them," said a senior bureaucrat.

The lune de miel (honeymoon) between the countries was seen to be over when the French envoy, Serge Bodevaix, a senior career diplomat, was "recalled" to France on 1 February. France announced the recall (which is not the same thing as withdrawal), two days after the Indian envoy in Paris Narendra Singh called on the French foreign minister, Roland Dumas, at the Quai d'Orsay. The move might have been no more than a courtesy call for the outgoing Indian ambassador but it is being said in New Delhi, unofficially, that the Indians made it known that the recall of the French ambassador would help restore Indo-French relations and smoothen the ruffled feathers.

Although the French did make this gesture, officials insisted that the ambassador was not being recalled but transferred after two years in India. The fact that M Bodevaix has been promoted to assistant secretary-general in the ministry (he is number three at the Quai d'Orsay) indicates that the transfer is a face-saving device. The French ambassador's transfer is in some way comparable to Dr P. C. Alexander's resignation (or rather the acceptance of his resignation): Both of them were held to be morally responsible for what was going on in their office, although neither of them were involved. This is the first time that an ambassador has been called back or transferred from New Delhi on the prompting of India, according to a senior official. This only indicates the extent of the anger of the government of India.

What is significant is the fact that although Coomar Narain, Colonel Bolley's supplier of intelligence of the most sensitive kind, had named the East Germans and the Poles as his customers, not too much noise has been made in Delhi about the involvement of these two Warsaw Pact countries. One of the reasons for the low key reaction on the part of India (the external affairs spokesman is ominously silent on the subject) could be that this country does not have any military transactions with either of the countries. "We have an easy relationship with these countries," says an official. In the ministry of external affairs, whether East Germany and Poland passed the information on to the USSR is another matter. But the reaction of the supposed involvement of the KGB has been muted. It is almost common knowledge that both the CIA and the KGB are actively involved in espionage in this country.

With the French, however, it was different. There were great expectations from the co-operation between the two countries. More, India just did not expect this of the French with whom a very special relationship had been built up since 1980, much to the chagrin of other European countries, with an eye on India's vast market, especially for arms and weaponry. The intensity of the Indian reaction to the presence of a French spy (and possibly one or two more Frenchmen) is commensurate with the trust India had in the French. There is far more anger at the betrayal of a good friend than the betrayal of an acquaintance.

While the visit to Delhi of Polish premier, General W. Jaruzelski takes place (the Polish spy notwithstanding) there is now apparently some doubt over Rajiv Gandhi's proposed trip to Paris at the beginning of June to inaugurate the year of India in France. "The visit is under a cloud," confided a bureaucrat. Obviously, the Indian government is waiting for some gesture of atonement from the French. One of the techniques the French might try is to have President Francois Mitterrand stop by in New Delhi on his way to Indonesia this fall. The French have to come up with something fast and special to thaw Indo-French relations. Meanwhile, it is reliably learned that Colonel Bolley is being interrogated in France and has been kept under surveillance.

Meanwhile, back in India, there is a feeling that many of the future joint projects and ventures with France will be affected. It is fairly clear that the on-going projects will not be touched. But the French are likely to loose out on some of the contracts for which they stood a good chance. The first to go is the 155-mm gun contract involving over a billion dollars for which the French were number one on the list because their AUF-I 155 mm self-propelled gun as well as their 5.56 mm Fames (the latter is considered the most advanced self-service rifle in use by NATO) are considered to be of the best quality.

Incidentally, the Swedes, Austrians, the British and the Italians (the last two in a collaboration) are also contenders for this major contract. While there is a great deal of speculation in New Delhi (which has almost overnight become a centre of international intrigue with diplomats disappearing into the night), the Russians were the most pleased ones about the French embarrassment, but the British are no less enthusiastic. Both these countries have faced fierce competition from the French. The Russians started becoming a bit envious of the blue-eyed status of the French after the sale of the Mirage-2000 by France to India. The British became uncomfortable in the Eighties because the French soon started to bag contracts in what the British had considered their preserve, even in the Middle East. The Mirage, important contracts in the fields of telecommunications (particularly the CIT-Alcatel contract) and energy were going the French way (overall commercial trade between India and France has shown an average increase over the past five years of more than 15 per cent a year).

One of the biggest French bonanzas in India is, of course, the CIT-Alcatel telecommunications project which orginally envisaged a million lines in the first two years, The contract for setting up electronic switching and microwave digital transmission factories involves over Rs 400 crores. An electronic switch factory has already been set up at Gonda. The one at Worli which will cater to Bombay and parts of Maharashtra was recently inaugurated. But the contract for the factory at Bangalore has yet to be signed—and therein lies the rub.

This project might be put in deep freeze, as might the contracts with the French Compagnie Francaise de Petrole for the back-up technology for ONGC's operations in Bombay High. The two governments were also in the process of negotiating the purchase of French helicopters for the Bombay High operations. India has already bought 40 Mirage-2000 aircraft and the decision not to manufacture this plane in India was taken before the spy scandal. The contracts concerning the weaponry and avionics tied up to the plane are likely to continue.

Since the Five Year Plan has a massive outlay for energy, telecommunications and irrigation, there were already several big projects ready for discussion on the growing Indo-French platter. A major project for hydel power, yet another for high voltage switches in Bangalore, and the setting up of more ports in the country were already being discussed. These projects might be adversely affected if Indo-French relations remain at the present stage. One of the reasons why the Indians were inclined to opt for joint ventures and collaborations with the French is that they offered soft loans (this was the case in the CIT-Alcatel project) and they were willing to transfer their technology. Thus, while the Swedes and the Japanese might have had more advanced digital technology, the French offered softer loans. One of the most recent contracts signed was between the department of electronics and a French concern, Antiope, for equipment to transfer text by telephone.

Although the French were on a good wicket in India it is not fair to say that they were getting all the best deals. British Aerospace managed to sell its Sea Harriers, for which it had offered India special rates. The Russians came through finally with their MiG-27s and MiG-29s. The "French bias," if that is what it may be called, actually did India some good. When the negotiations for the Mirage-2000 had begun in all earnestness, the Russians woke up. It may be recalled that Indian officials were not previously allowed to enter the MiG factories in the Soviet Union and they met in offices outside the factories. It was an angry Jagjivan Ram who returned from Moscow in a huff, when he was defence minister in the Janata government, because he was not allowed to see a MiG-23 factory. Later the Russians promised the MiG-29 (when it was still on the board) simultaneously to both the Indian Air Force and to their own air force. The Russians obviously had a change of heart after the Mirage and the Jaguar deals came through.

This year—1985—is the year of India in France. The year was also going to be important for many important projects: French industry has made several proposals for the transfer of technology in some of India's high-priority areas. In the field of energy they have offered technology for the processing of poor quality coal with high ash content, longwall mining equipment, hydel power generation, oil exploration and production. In electronics and data processing, main frame computers and supermini computers, in telecommunications, private telephone exchanges and microwave digital transmission.

The French embassy in New Delhi

The French connection is not really that old. It really began in 1980 when President Giscard d'Estaing visited India. It was the first visit of a French head of state to this country. The French interest in the east had stopped in Iran, skipped India and concentrated on China. The first real contact had taken place in the 1960s when the French helicopter, Alouette, was purchased. George Pompidou visited India in 1965, as General de Gaulle's PM.

The next important visit was of Jacques Chirac in 1976 when he was Giscard d'Estaing's Prime Minister. Cooperative ventures soon began to be signed. But the turning point came with President Giscard's 1980 January visit—an important visit—the fallout of which was the projects for bauxite in Orissa and a coal project. But what was for the French conservative government a desirable, potential relationship became a reality when the Socialists came to power in May 1981. The process of the wooing of India was accelerated To begin with the French laid out the red carpet for Mrs Gandhi when she went to Paris on 12 November 1981. Interestingly enough, President Giscard was scheduled to have come to India in 1979. But, it seems he had doubts about the Morarji Desai government. When Mrs Gandhi returned to power, it was not too long before the French President made his way to India. Even Mrs Gandhi initially had her doubts about going to Socialist France in the winter of 1981. She was irked about the members of the Socialist government hobnobbing with Indian socialists like George Fernandes in the days when she was out of power.

India in its attempt to turn away from both of the superpowers had begun in the late Seventies to look towards western Europe, particularly to the French and the West Germans. Politically, France was important, for the country was a symbol of Europe's quest to be independent. The French connection, therefore, blossomed, But the relationship did not escape the evil eye. There might not be anything major unearthed during the course of the investigations into the espionage ring, but India will for the time being at least be extremely weary of any hand offered in cooperation.

India might gradually turn away from both the French and the British (the Indian government is very angry with Britain's Pakistan connection, as well as its attitude towards the extremists based in its country). There is also apprehension about the French intelligence agencies sharing their information with Nato intelligence agencies. The Indian government has kept its options open: the French were the ones who happened to get caught but the Indians realise that closer political ties with France are in the interest of this country.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

Jumping the Queue

C.R. Krishnaswamy Rao Sahib, cabinet secretary, retires from service on 28 February. The post is on a tenure of three years, like the chief of army and air force, as decided by the Janata government under the prime ministership of Morarji Desai. This means that even a day before attaining the age of superannuation, that is 58 years, a serving IAS officer can be appointed cabinet secretary for a period of three years. Of course, it was the other way round for Rao Sahib. He would have retired from IAS on 28 February this year in the normal course. By becoming cabinet secretary on 30 April 1981, he completed the tenure of three years on 29 April 1984. When there was a strong rumour that he was about to go last year, it seems he invoked the normal rules of retirement and continued in his post. Tenure rule was, therefore, given a new interpretation by the government for the future.

Till the selection of Rao Sahib, succeeding N. K. Mukarji, the convention was that the seniormost civil servant became the cabinet secretary. When Mrs Gandhi became the Prime Minister in 1980, Rao Sahib continued as the secretary to the Prime Minister. In the combined list of IAS officers from 1948-1981, he was fifth from the top. Yet, he was made the cabinet secretary, creating a new convention. It was said at that time that the newly-appointed principal secretary to the Prime Minister, Dr P.C. Alexander and G. Parthasarathy had a big hand in such an out of turn selection for the highest civilian post in the country. Gone were the days when the seniormost civilian could look forward to the day when he could become the cabinet secretary, whether he was in Delhi or out in one of the states. For example, B. Shivaraman, then chief secretary, Orissa, came to Delhi as the secretary in the ministry of food and, after a short while, became the cabinet secretary. There was neither any political clout nor long stay close to the centre of power in Delhi to get such an appointment.

Since mid-January, many names came up for the post of cabinet secretary. The most talked-about names were those of K.V. Ramanathan, secretary, planning and P.K. Kaul, secretary, finance, both in service in Delhi. There were, however, 17 other officers who were eligible.

In order of the all-India seniority list of IAS officers, there are three officers in the 1949 batch of the IAS, same as Rao Sahib's,who should have been considered for the post of cabinet secretary: G.K. Bhanot, presently chairman, Board of Revenue, Rajasthan, posted in Ajmer and K.S. Ramachandran belonging to the Orissa cadre, now on long leave. It is learnt their service records are not so bright and they are out of sight from Delhi as well. Both of them would be retiring from service on 31 March and 30 June this year, respectively.

But, also belonging to the 1949 batch of the IAS, G. Ramachandran went to serve as the executive director, Asian Development Bank, Manila. Before going there, he was secretary, finance, in Delhi. Earlier, he had a stint as joint secretary for economic affairs in the Prime Minister's secretariat. His date of retirement is 31 July 1985. The other officer is B.P.R. Vithal who has just returned from a posting with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) as fiscal adviser, Sudan, and is now principal chairman, Board of Revenue in Hyderabad. Though he came through the extension scheme in the states and got into the IAS in 1950, there is a similar precedent: S.S. Grewal came into the IAS in the same way and became the cabinet secretary earlier.

Both Ramachandran and Vithal are excellent officers with international exposure in finance planning and overall economic administration.

Combined list (as on 1 January 1984) of IAS officers from 1948—1981 who were eligible for the post of Cabinet Secretary on 31 January 1985.

Name	Year of Allotment and State	Date of Retirement
C.R. Krishnaswamy Rao Sahib, Cabinet Secretary	1949 AP	28.02.1985
G.K. Bhanot, Chairman, Board of Revenue, Ajmer, Rajasthan	1949 Rajasthan	31.03.1985
K.S. Ramachandran on leave	1949 Orissa	30.06.1985
G. Ramachandran, Executive Director, Asian Development Bank, Manila	1949 Tamil Nadu	31.07.1985
B.N. Raman on leave	1950 AP	28.02.1985
B.P.R. Vithal, Chairman, Board of Revenue, Hyderabad	1950 AP	31.07.1985
K.V. Ramanathan, Secretary, Planning, New Delhi	1950 Tamil Nadu	31.07.1985
A.S. Gill, Secretary, Petroleum, New Delhi	1950 Gujarat	31.07.1985
B.C. Gangopadhyay, Secretary, Food, New Delhi	1950 AP	28.02.1985
Mohinder Singh, Secretary, Mining, New Delhi	1950 Rajasthan	31.05.1985
S.P. Srinivasan, Vigilance Commissioner-cum-Administrative Reforms, Hyderabad.	1950 Tamil Nadu	31.07.1985
P.K.V. Bhiman, Member, Board of Revenue, Lucknow UP	1950 UP	30.06.1985
K.P.A. Menon, Chairman-cum-MD, National Seeds Corps.	1950 West Bengal	28.02.1985
K.S. Chandrasekharan, Principal Resident Commissioner, Orissa	1950 Orissa	31.05.1985
V.K. Sreenivas, Member, Secretary, Advisory Board of Energy, Cabinet Secretariat, New Delhi	1950 Gujarat	30.04.1985
K.N. Swarup, Secretary, Non-Conventional Energy, New Delhi	1950 UP	30.06.1985
K. Subramaniam, Director, Institute of Defence Studies	1950 Tamil Nadu	31.07.1985
R.C. Sreevastava, Chairman, [illegible]	1950 Kerala	31.07.1985
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
P.K. [illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]

Both these officers are senior to Ramanathan. They have been left out, perhaps, because they are also out of sight so far as Delhi is concerned. Among the regular recruits in the IAS in 1950, K.V. Ramanathan, secretary, planning, belongs to the Tamil Nadu cadre and A.S. Gill, secretary, petroleum, belongs to Gujarat. Ramanathan retires on 31 July 1986 while Gill is going to retire this July. Ramanathan has been given the rank of a minister of state, and elevated as member-secretary, Planning Commission, while P.K. Kaul was elevated to the rank of cabinet secretary. The case is similar to that of Thirumallai who was made a member of economic administration reforms commission with the same rank when Rao Sahib superseded him. The selection procedure follows the same pattern since them. The only difference between then and now is the whole list of officers in the 1950 batch IAS has been given a go-by, as Kaul belongs to the 1951 Uttar Pradesh cade. To top it all, he occupied the eighteenth position in order of seniority. Thus, Rao Sahib jumped the queue as did Kaul, over 17 officers. The irony is that these 17 officers, quite a few of them in the states, are not even chief secretaries.

This queue jumping in the states, on considerations other than seniority in service, has become more of a rule than an exception. This is especially true in the selection of chief secretaries. Perhaps they are also following the same ground rules as is followed in the centre for the selection of the cabinet secretary. Andhra Pradesh for example has set an all-time precedent by changing four chief secretaries in one year, as N.T. Ramarao was unable to work with them since he became the chief minister. Finally, he decided not to have any chief secretary at all. Though six officers in the IAS are still serving in the state, all senior in service to the principal secretary to the chief minister, Shravan Kumar is the one who is also looking after the work of the chief secretary. In Bihar, K.K. Srivastava has jumped the queue over four senior colleagues serving there. The story is the same in Kerala, Madhya Pradesh, Maharashtra, Tamil Nadu and some other states.

Some of these IAS officers have been given very distinguished designations, perhaps, to compensate for missing the post of the chief secretary. For example, the first senior officer in the civil list of the IAS in Kerala is the chairman, Trivandrum Development and Calicut Development Authority. Next to him is the vice-chancellor, Kerala Agricultural University. Then comes the chief secretary. In Tamil Nadu two officers senior to the chief secretary are the chairman, Tamil Nadu Cooperative Oilseeds Growers' Federation Ltd and the other one is the principal government liaison officer, International Crops Institute for Semi-arid Tropics in Hyderabad.

P.K. Kaul is the second seniormost IAS officer in the city of New Delhi but the list of seniority of civil officers is kept at an all-India basis by the government of India. To be cabinet secretary at the centre or chief secretary in a state, seniority in service is immaterial. He should be acceptable to the political masters and as near to the ruling coterie as possible, with maximum visibility to them. In the case of the present-day chief secretaries in the states and also in the appointment of P.K. Kaul, superseding 17 colleagues in service, these conditions have been fulfilled once again. P.K. Kaul's appointment, however, has been generally welcomed by the bureaucracy.

A Special Correspondent, New Delhi

"I'm supposed to watch my cholesterol level–at 34 ?! Does this mean I have to change my whole lifestyle ?"

No, you don't. With Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls.

Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls help to reduce high cholesterol levels. Because they contain pure garlic oil that has been recognised by Ayurveda, and modern medical science, to have great curative properties.

Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls also help in relieving gas and indigestion, easing joint pains, preventing recurring coughs and colds.

Just two Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls twice a day keep you in good health.

RANBAXY'S GARLIC PEARLS

All the cures that nature put in garlic without the smell.

DBM 9260

Sukur Bakhia's Latest Escape

"Sukur Seth" remains as elusive as ever

Sukur Naran Bakhia has, ever so quietly disappeared again. If the June 1982 escape from the Fort Aguada jail in Goa was a sensation that hit the national headlines, this was a programmed low-key performance. Few know when Bakhia escaped or how. Nobody seems aware of his whereabouts. Nobody knows what this son of smugglers is up to now. On 18 December 1984, Sukur Naran Bakhia alias Sukur Naran Tandel was convicted for the first time in his life. (Tandel is his caste name; tandels are fishermen). Justice R.M. Christi, additional city sessions judge, Ahmedabad, awarded three-and-a-half years' rigorous imprisonment to Bakhia in a ten-year-old case of financial fraud filed by the income-tax department.

The very next day Bakhia got himself admitted to the Ahmedabad civil hospital complaining of cardiac and blood-pressure problems. A week later, on 27 December 1984, he filled in a personal bond of two lakh rupees and two sureties of one lakh rupees each to get himself released conditionally. He was not to leave Ahmedabad city without the prior permission of the commissioner of income-tax (Gujarat central) and was to report to the nearest police station every alternate day. But the lordly Bakhia promptly despatched a letter to the police headquarters requesting them to send a policeman for his rollcall "as I am admitted as an indoor patient in the civil hospital." Thereafter suddenly Bakhia became silent. And the police could not find him anywhere. "The official position is," explained Mr Bhargava, Ahmedabad's assistant commissioner of police, "that Bakhia is missing. We have no record of him after 4 January 1985 and we are writing to the court about it."

This was on 22 January, more than two weeks after Bakhia had slipped out. Surprisingly enough, neither the police nor the intelligence authorities seemed to have made any headway in the case by then. Indeed, their attitude suggested that they could not care less. That a man as notorious as Bakhia had disappeared without trace did not seem to bother them at all, as if not Bakhia but some petty thief had run away. Y.B. Jhala, Ahmedabad's police commissioner, seemed to know little about the entire affair. He did not have much to say other than stress: "There are no cases against Bakhia as such." When contacted, police intelligence personnel also shrugged. It was evident that Sukur Naran Bakhia was not even under cursory watch. Bakhia is never the man to miss such an opportunity. He can walk out of maximum security prisons and the escape from the civil hospital must have been like an evening stroll. But where is Bakhia? All kinds of stories were floating around: he was staying under a fictitious name at hotel Natra, allegedly his favourite haunt in Ahmedabad; he had fled across the Sabarmati, he was hiding in the labyrinthine old city and moving around quite openly, meeting friends and recultivating contacts. One rumour even had it that Bakhia had left Ahmedabad for his favourite haunts on the coast. In any case, within ten days of his first conviction in life Bakhia was a free bird again.

Bakhia being taken by the police to a metropolitan court in Ahmedabad in August 1982 — Bhudev Bhachech

It is somewhat ironic that the first sentence against Bakhia had little to do with smuggling. This frontline smuggler who, in his heyday, was said to be netting annual profits worth Rs 20 crores, has successfully dodged several big traps set for him. But he was caught in what is certainly a petty affair by his standards. In 1968 a man called Navnitlal S. Patel floated a crossword puzzle and a "literary competition" called Shad Hariphal from Ahmedabad, which offered large, unheard of amounts of prize money. The basic idea behind it was to convert blackmoney into white and the brainwave was Bakhia's. What actually happened was that Bakhia and his 21 associates filled up several of the entries each and sent them in to Navnit Patel. With the entries went lakhs of rupees in cash to Patel who manipulated the results so that only Bakhia and his associates were the winners. Keeping a commission worth four to ten per cent of the amount for himself, Patel used to revert the amounts in cheques as "prize money." The laundering of money from black to white was complete. Between January 1968 and June 1969, Rs 41,89,533 had been converted from black into white. But soon Shad Hariphal, a racket that had spread to the neighbouring union territory of Daman and to Rajasthan, came to the notice of the income-tax department. They captured some records, persuaded Navnit Patel to turn approver and filed a suit against Bakhia and his 21 associates in 1974. The racket was squashed but the case could be brought to its conclusion only in December 1984 since the main accused were in detention under other provisions. Giving his judgment which convicted Bakhia and 12 other associates, Justice R.M. Christi observed that, "By this conspiracy they (the accused) had tried to save tax through a bogus crossword competition."

Shad Hariphal was only a small experiment that failed. Bakhia's main interests lay in his smuggling empire which he built up slowly. But once it had been established it ranked among the best in the business. Assisting him were his four men—Hari Naran, Markan Naran, Arvind Naran and Jiwan Naran—all of whom are said to have operated in and around Daman. Naranbhai Govanbhai Machhi, his brother-in-law, managed his Dubai operations. He headed a front organisation called Meena Trading Agencies which also had a branch in Kowloon, Hong Kong. Another brother-in-law, Hari Vallabhdas, was an ex-Congress(I) MLA from Goa who acted as Bakhia's political godfather. Bakhia himself is a man of extensive contacts. He knows the underworld like the back of his hand and has a formidable reach in the establishment. Police and customs officials, income-tax officers, other bureaucrats, MLAs: he has often used them at will in the past. Even intelligence reports on him admit that he "wields considerable influence in official and political circles." One senior customs officer at Ahmedabad plainly admitted that several of his men are "in Bakhia's pocket."

Daman, the former Portuguese colony off Bulsar and Vapi in south Gujarat, is Bakhia's base of operations on the Arabian Sea. Daman is a

The Hero of Daman

The man, rogue criminal to the world, guilty of legal and human outrage, is a hero in Daman. He is a legend, the local Robin Hood and he is referred to as Ganapati, "Badshah Bakhia," "Sukur Seth." And when they talk of him they always praise him. "Sukur Seth hamara sarkar hai fishe Daman ko upar uthaya (Sukur Seth is our master, he made Daman prosper)." Bakhia is extremely popular—and not without reasons. Bakhia brought the boom to Daman, placed it at the head of the contraband market in India and within no time the results began to show. Overnight, the large community of Damanese fishermen—the Machhis—who have cooperated with Bakhia's clandestine operations along the coastline, became wealthy. Many of them pulled down their huts to build pucca houses, others invested in business. And whenever they were in need of money Bakhia donated freely.

It was a good investment for him. Daman was at his feet. He has succeeded in creating a sort of [illegible] operation, a private [illegible] of his own, closed to questions from outsiders. How difficult it is to probe into smuggling which is rampant in Daman would be clear from a note a customs officer had made earlier this year. "Since the whole population of Daman is involved in the activity, there is no leakage of any information in regard to Bakhia's hideouts."

Even today, when Bakhia's activities are extremely low-key, Daman has the same regard for him. His repeated detentions, arrests and escapes make no difference. "Hamara idhar ka siraf do cheez famous hai, hamara fish aur hamara Sukur Seth (We have only two famous things in Daman, our fish and our Sukur Seth)," said Gaju Tandel, a typical Damanese fisherman, with pride.

But while the majority of the Machhis is devoted to Bakhia, the Catholics, mainly descendants of the Portuguese living in the fort area of Daman, are somewhat dispassionate about the local Don. The reasons might be purely economic. Says Mr Tomas, a local businessman, "At first we had only the concrete houses. Now in a matter of years they (the Machhis) have bigger houses...they have become the saabs." But even this section of society would not go to the extent of saying things against Bakhia, at the most they would take you in a corner and tell you a few well-known things about Bakhia "strictly off the record." A wizened old lady, Mrs D'Silva, who spoke only Portuguese, in fact maintained that Bakhia was very "liberal" and was helping the Machhis and the Catholics alike.

Smuggling, somehow, does not seem to be taboo in Daman. It is almost treated like a celebrated sport. It is something that brings in more money, something that brings more gin and feni, more happiness. Smuggling is something that "hamara Sukur Seth" does.

Sankarshan Thakur

Wine and Women

Bakhia is a Bacchus with added talents. He likes his wine and women. His added talents have brought him enough wealth to savour the first two 'W's—even while in jail or "recovering" in a hospital. This man of lavish habits has got what he has wanted: the finest Scotch whisky hidden in the meals or girls garbed as nurses. It did not matter if he was a slightly unattractive proposition—just five feet three, blowzy and bald—for money has got him his desires.

Sukur Naran realised the power of money early in his days of apprenticeship. Daman was then still under Portuguese control and Bakhia a mere carrier. One day he was apprehended with contraband goods but was soon out of custody after his employer made a payoff. Whether it is accomplishing a risky mission or avoiding detection, prolonging investigation or escaping from custody, money has been Bakhia's chief instrument. It had led him up the ladder of crime.

Not less helpful, however, has been his sharp mind. From the very beginning of his criminal career, this son of a fisherman called Naran showed promise: he was cool, calculating, ruthless. What was more, he was extremely ambitious. Lallu Joghi, another big-time smuggler from Daman, according to some locals Bakhia's mentor, started off smuggling potatoes and onions from India into Portuguese-controlled Daman. Bakhia went straight on to gold and silver.

He may be illiterate, he may mumble in a strange mixture of Gujarati and the Machhi dialect of Daman but Bakhia knows the law thoroughly, the manner of police operations, the way to manipulate both. So many times has he given the law a slip, on so many occasions has he left policemen pink and red that Bakhia inspires awe in many.

There seems to be some disputes as far as his genial nature and behaviour are concerned. Intelligence records describe him as a man who is "arrogant, rough and proud" but officials who have arrested and questioned him have found Bakhia rather congenial and mild-mannered, even given to humour. When customs superintendent L.G. Fitter had gone to Bakhia's palatial Daman residence to arrest him in 1982, he had found him sipping Indian whisky. On being asked why he was drinking an Indian brand, Bakhia remarked, "I don't trust smuggled Scotch. It's all adulterated stuff these days." Then he changed and walked with Fitter without any qualms. The only question which Bakhia had asked one of his men before going with the police was, "Tian daru maise (Do you get liquor there, in jail)?" Bakhia went to jail confidently thereafter. Perhaps, because he is always confident he would not have to spend much time in custody. In any case he always made a comfortable pad for himself wherever he went. All the Scotch and all the flesh for which Bakhia (54) still hungers for. Sukur Naran Bakhia should not have been born in a temple in Nani Daman.

Sankarshan Thakur

tiny place surrounded by muddy backwaters and vast marshes. A rather secluded place but at the same time just five hours by road from Bombay and only four days away from Dubai by a dhow. At first sight Daman looks like a one-street township wrapped in the smell of fish and buzzing with bars where even little boys sit and gulp gin and cashew feni. But off the street begins the real Daman—the Daman built by the smuggling boom, the Daman of Bakhia. You realise how fast prosperity has come when you see large concrete houses smelling of nothing but fish and inhabited by lungi-clad fishermen. The little boy working in a cycle repair shop wears a glittering imported watch, the man sitting on the street, knitting a net listens to a Japanese stereo cassette recorder and in what is almost the size of a big village there is a surprisingly large number of three-wheelers and taxis—all this the meharbani of Sukur Seth (as Bakhia is known).

The coast of Daman is ideally suited to Bakhia's purposes. Dotted with creeks and inlets, it is also shallow and marshy, making it almost impossible for customs vessels to chase the small canoes used by smugglers for depositing contraband on the coast. A broad inlet, locally called Daman Ganga, in fact, flows right through Daman, dividing the sea face town into two: Bada Daman and Chhota Daman. Bakhia has used the Daman Ganga as his private port for dumping contraband. And when the Daman Ganga was not safe for landing, his boats would simply take a detour and park themselves in one of the several landing stations Bakhia had fixed up: most of the time it would be behind his ice-factory in Daman. Its location is ideally suited for landing. The ice-factory itself is one of Bakhia's main godowns where he stores silver for shipment abroad and dumps the contraband that his boats bring in.

Bakhia uses three categories of boats in every operation of his. The first leg of the journey from Dubai is covered by 600 horse power Arab dhows which are fitted with more than one engine and can do upto 30 knots. They bring the contraband—mainly electronic goods, wristwatches and fabrics—to within 20 kilometres off Daman where the entire consignment is loaded on to small motorboats, also capable of high speeds. These carry the goods to a distance, five kilometres away, from the coast where Bakhia's canoes are waiting. Once these small boats set-off for the coast, there is little that can stop them. In water that is often only three to four feet deep, only expert hands can operate and most of them work for Bakhia.

After landing, the contraband is loaded onto trucks and driven down to Bombay. Every truck is piloted by armed escorts. At one time when Bakhia was doing exceptionally good business entire armies were deputed for the safe passage of his contraband from Daman to Bombay: almost 90 men accompanied his trucks in cars. If intercepted by customs officials, and that was rare, they would resort to violence.

No less than 5,000 people were said to be in Bakhia's employ at one time. His network operated not only along the upper western coast but also in Dubai, Hong Kong and Singapore. At one time it was said to be the best-organised smuggling network in the country but even today Bakhia knows more about the police than most policemen themselves. Daman is his eyes and ears. It is said that the moment a stranger enters Daman he is under watch. If anything suspicious is noticed it would immediately get to the Don. Active support from the local population—fishermen who help his operations, the man on the street who keeps a watch—has been one of the main factors for Bakhia's success. Daman is a place where information comes in regularly but seldom goes out. That is the reason why Bakhia has been able to avoid snares or slips out of them with such ease and frequency. But on occasions the information machine does trip.

One such failure occurred in 1982 and resulted in Bakhia's arrest. Led by customs superintendent L.G. Fitter and armed with a detention order under the Conservation of Foreign Exchange and Prevention of Smuggling Act (COFEPOSA), a team of customs sleuths was able to pin him down to his plush farmhouse in Daman on 8 April 1982. For once they had outwitted Bakhia: they got a detention order not from Valsad (Bulsar), the nearest customs office, but Goa, slipped quietly into Daman and knocked at his farmhouse.

They lodged him in the Fort Aguada jail, Goa, but it took him less than two months to take sweet revenge. On 30 May 1982 the COFEPOSA review committee decided to let Bakhia go but officials of the Gujarat customs were ready at Fort Aguada to welcome Bakhia with fresh orders for detention. Bakhia had other ideas. Perhaps, he knew well what awaited him. He took his release order, walked quietly out of the main gate and boarded a bus to Bombay from where he returned to his favourite haunts around Daman. The customs officials were shown a clean pair of heels.

Bakhia has been playing hide-and-seek with the customs and the police for more than a decade-and-a-half now. He runs. they follow. Bakhia started giving them headaches in the late Sixties when he was doing a hefty illegal trade with his counterparts in Dubai. The first big catch was on 30 September 1969 when a customs vessel, MVS Mayavati, intercepted an Arab boat called Almashoor off Daman and seized Rs 14,79,190 worth in foreign currency. A penalty of Rs four lakh was imposed on Bakhia which has still not been realised. On 5 May 1970, silver worth Rs 4,34,018 was found in a pickup van (MRD 9101) near Daman and a penalty of Rs ten lakhs was clamped on Bakhia. He was again fined Rs ten lakhs when gold, wristwatches and fabrics worth Rs 9,61,189 were seized from Jalaram Vishwas, a motorised vessel used by Bakhia, on 16 February 1971. But such was his infrastructural strength and his hold on the market that he continued to flourish despite such losses.

In fact, it was during the early Seventies that Bakhia spread and strengthened his empire. He set up a team around him, prominent among whom were Jogibhai M. Tandel and Haribhai M. Tandel. He sent his brother-in-law, Naranbhai Govanbhai Machhi, to manage his operations in Dubai and opened a bogus firm called Meena Trading Agencies there, established links with politicians and officials, bought seacraft and a fleet of cars and trucks and became the biggest employer in Daman. And his generosity won him many friends. By 1973 he had become the Don, the feared and respected Sukur Seth.

After hoodwinking the authorities

Bakhia: A Pauper on Paper

On paper Sukur Karan Bakhia is a pauper—a humble fisherman from Daman who also owns a tiny farm and an ice-factory, with little else besides. Someone who finds it difficult to make two ends meet with "five families to support," someone who used to file Rs 275 as annual income-tax return.

Yet, entire economies have depended on Bakhia. Wattle he flourished, Nani Daman was transformed from a seaboard frontier into a prosperous township dotted with concrete houses, air-conditioned hotels, bars and cinema halls. His arrest in 1982 caused a shock in the political corridors of Delhi, Ahmedabad, Surat and Bombay.

filing Rs 275 as his income-tax return is itself an indication. Bakhia has followed an old maxim. He owns little of what he possesses. Most of his property is registered in the names of either his associates or relatives. Among the properties he is said to possess are:

- House No. 876(B) right opposite the official residence of the deputy superintendent of police in Nani Daman. This property is registered in the name of one Harmosji M. Vaid.
- A bungalow at Katchhigam, Daman, in the name of Jogibhai Tandel.
- A large plot of land and a building in Kathiria in the name of B. Khalpa, B. Baghla, Damu Bewala and Kesher Jalla.
- A house at Parkota, Sheri, in the name of Laxmiben Tandel.
- Land inside the Nani Daman fort area in the name of Ramiben Naran Tandel.
- Two buildings and an orchard near the Marwad Civil Hospital in the names of Mansinh-Dipsinh and Gangaben Tandel.

In addition, he is said to own several wadis (orchards) in and around Daman, a bar-cum-restaurant in Chhota Daman, a [illegible] near Pune and no-less [illegible] in Bombay. Bakhia also has [illegible]

cluded in it are 43 motor vehicles, one of which is a Mercedes and another a Cadillac, half a dozen trucks and a fleet of dhows all of which are registered in the names of other people.

Of late some people have begun to believe that Bakhia's fortunes have taken a dip and that because he has spent most of his time shuttling between jails and hospitals since 1982 he has lost his grip on the market and his credibility. "He is ruined financially, finished," remarked a customs official in Ahmedabad. But there are indications that point to the contrary. Bakhia is currently waiving personal and surety-bonds worth four lakh rupees. Besides, there are other penalties (in lakhs) imposed earlier that are yet to be released. Does Bakhia care? "Why should he?" asks a senior police officer. "A few lakhs don't bother Bakhia. It is peanuts for him."

It would be naive to believe that Bakhia is a spent force. Even if his stock in the market has touched a new low, he still is the master of an enormous benami empire. And how much time would it take him to re-establish his "fallen-prestige" among his brethren? After all, everyone in this business knows that this poor fisherman from Daman is any day capable of hauling in a good catch.

Sankarshan Thakur

Fort Aguada jail where Bakhia was lodged earlier for years, during which time he became the biggest buyer of gold in Dubai and a prominent member in the smugglers' big league, Bakhia was finally detained under COFEPOSA in December 1974. His release in April 1975 by the Delhi High Court did not really give him freedom for he was rounded up in that swoop on smugglers a week after the proclamation of Emergency. But even the Emergency could not keep Bakhia within four walls. He got himself certified as a chronic heart patient and spent the months of detention in Bombay's King George's Hospital. It was a long lull. But no sooner was the Emergency lifted than Bakhia began his nefarious activities.

He moved frantically on the Daman-Vapi-Valsad-Bombay circuit, met hundreds of people including Hari Gallabhdas, the ex-Congress(I) MLA from Goa and reactivated his links in Dubai. Customs intelligence was only beginning to suspect that Bakhia might launch his operations soon when he went and bought S.V. Rama Sagar, a motorised craft for Rs two lakhs on 30 September 1977. Bakhia was in the market again. Curiously, customs intelligence does not seem to have suspected it. A spate of reports filed on his activities in the latter half of 1977 are intriguing. One such report, filed on 19 October 1977 said : "It appears that the biggest gang of Bakhia is absolutely inert and inactive." Another, sent in on 6 December 1977 read: "Bakhia is found busy on his farm and his ice-factory. No suspect person visits him." Customs authorities had almost concluded that Bakhia had retired, that he was ruined financially and not worth much in the market.

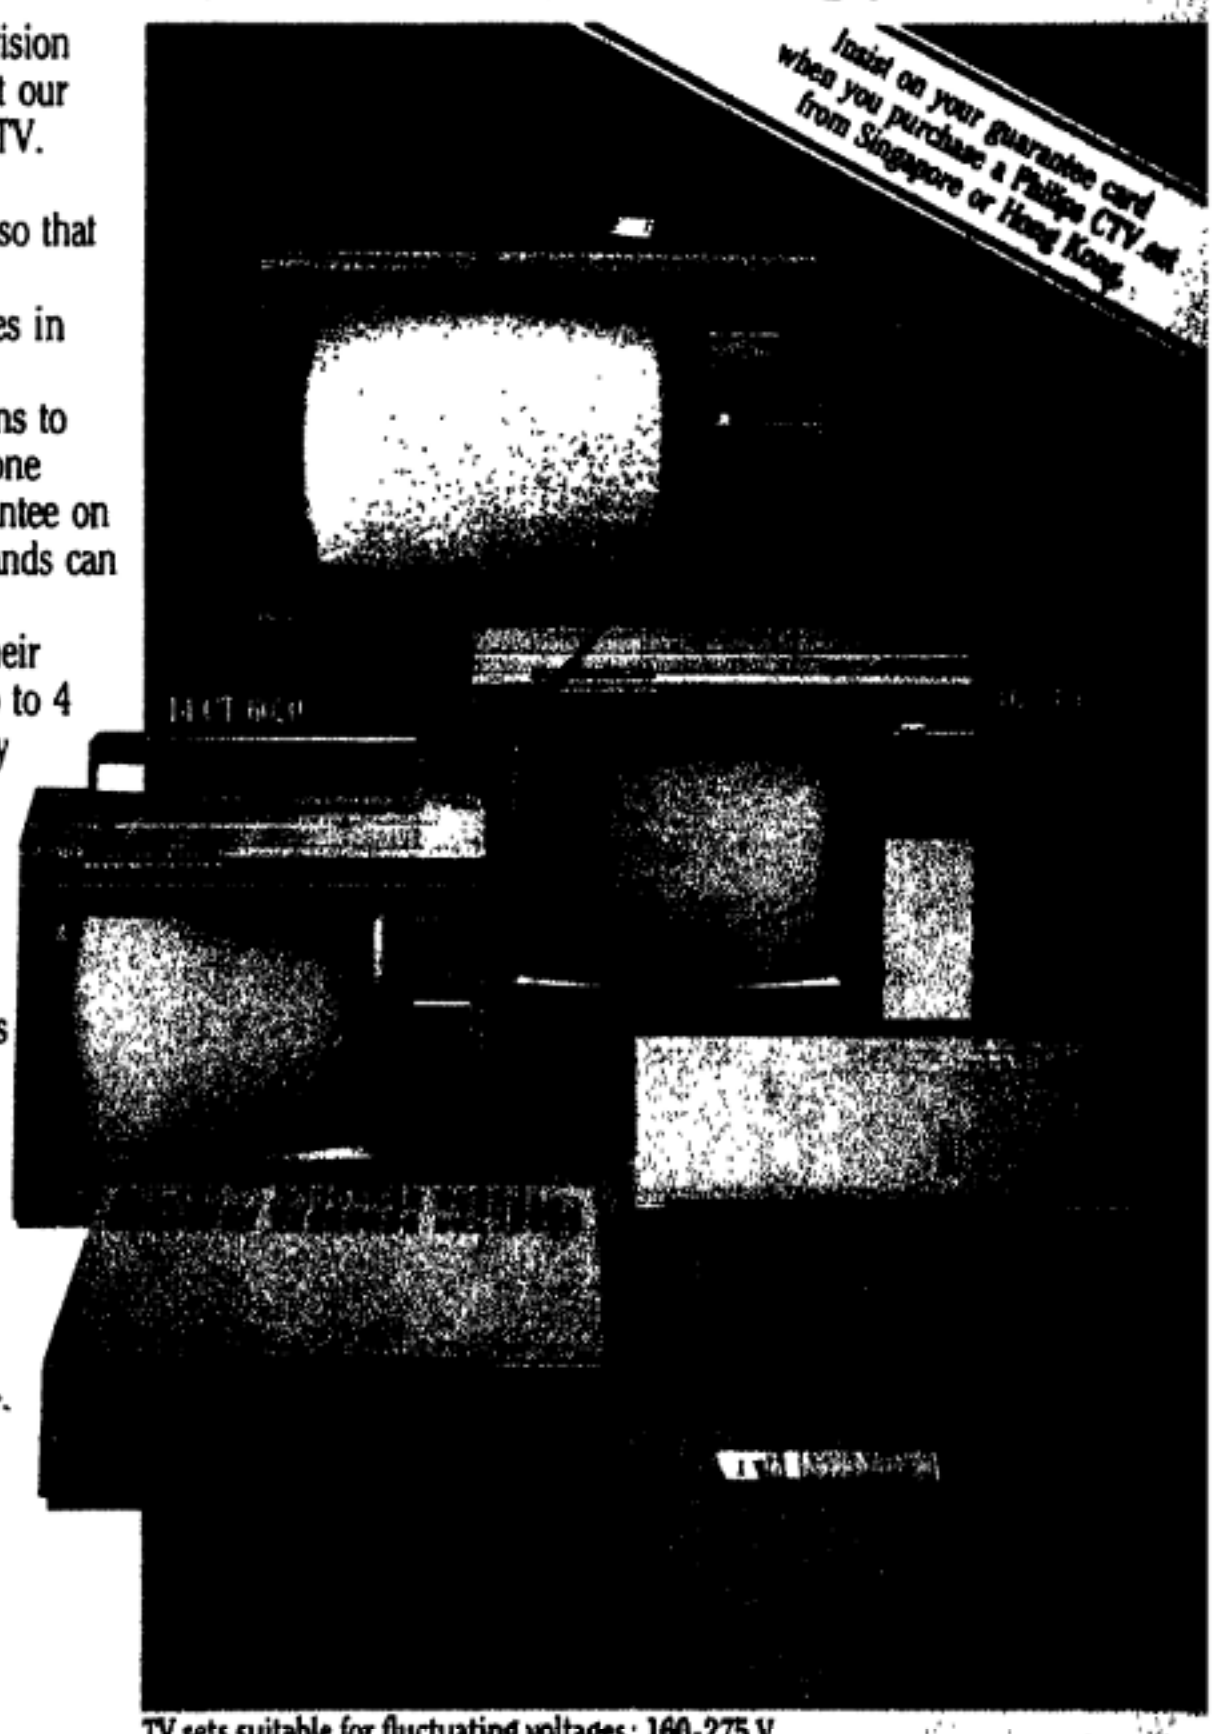
It was a grave mistake. For, Bakhia was then making hectic preparations for getting back into business. On 12 January 1978 two of his boats—Dharia Dolat and S.V. Rama Sagar—left for Bombay to collect "cargo." And Bakhia was afloat. This time he was not only into gold, silver and electronic goods but also drugs. And so important did he become on the drug circuit in a short time that he drew the attention of David S. Daub, then assistant narcotic attache (United States department of justice and drug enforcement administration) at the US embassy in New Delhi. In a letter to the customs authorities dated 28 March 1978, he wrote: "Indian opium is allegedly moving from dhows from Daman to Muscat. Opium is being taken by small boats to sea where it is loaded in dhows. The principal individuals involved at Daman are said to be Lallu Joghi and Sukur Bakhia... A review of our files indicates that the above names are certainly familiar and will be no surprise to you." If Bakhia was at all in a financial mess in 1977, he soon made it all up and by 1980 was once again hoarding huge quantities of silver. The customs, which by now had realised it had made an error of judgment, noted the increased activity in his camp and the fact that he was avoiding checkposts. For this in July 1980, he purchased a white station-wagon which resembled an ambulance. Only a month later silver worth Rs eight-and-a-quarter lakhs was seized from one of his cars. The landings continued, business flourished. Thereafter, in 1981, Bakhia took a dhow to Dubai to strike a business deal and landed back on the Dandi coast with a huge contraband. After his Dubai visit, there was a spate of landings on the Gujarat coast. Then disaster struck for Bakhia. On 10 January 1982, Bakhia's vessel Chandrasagar, loaded with contraband worth Rs 90 lakhs, was intercepted by the customs.

While it gave Bakhia a jolt it also sent the customs authorities running after him. Orders for his arrest under COFEPOSA were issued by the governments of both Gujarat and Goa. On 8 April 1982 he was taken into custody and sent to Fort Aguada. After his sensational escape from Fort Aguada Bakhia has spent most of his time between jails and hospitals. Rearrested on 31 July 1982 in the border town of Bhuj in Gujarat, he has consistently managed to either obtain bail orders or get out using his standard excuse: heart and blood pressure problems. Even when the Shad Hariphal case hearings were to begin in September 1984, Bakhia was in Daman feigning sickness. A special public prosecutor had to make a trip to Daman and bring him to Ahmedabad where he was put behind bars in the Sabarmati jail. Now he is again a free man, operating quietly from somewhere and perhaps reorganising his gang. In Ahmedabad, however, authorities maintain he is no more what he used to be. The talk that he is financially ruined has gained currency in customs circles. Besides, they say, he is physically too drained to be active now. But Bakhia remains a man of resources, and it would take him little time to beckon success again. As far as his physical condition is concerned, Justice R.M. Christi had remarked while delivering his judgment in the Shad Hariphal case on 18 December 1984 that Bakhia looked in good condition.

Sankarshan Thakur, Daman

STOP PRESS: PHILIPS HAS PRODUCED ITS 100 MILLIONTH TV SET. IT'S ANOTHER GUARANTEE FOR PROBLEM-FREE VIEWING.

Philips have made a 100 million television sets, so naturally we know more about what our customers want and appreciate in a colour TV.



For example, every Philips is FULLY TROPICALISED against heat and humidity, so that you can enjoy problem-free viewing.

What's more, all Philips service centres in India* are fully equipped with sophisticated instruments, with overseas-trained technicians to care for your Philips if you happen to buy one from Singapore or Hong Kong. Plus a guarantee on after sales service that none of the other brands can match!

Philips VCRs come in two models: Their features include high-speed video search, up to 4 hours recording, auto play-back, time display and pre-programming for one event 7 days in advance.

For colour televisions, a range of models are available from 14", 16" or 20", with or without remote control. All the models have these common features: Philips famous natural colour from our equally famous Hi-Bri picture tube, Quickstart, and higher brightness level for more contrast, VCR adaptations on all channels, 4 watts sound output, Automatic Fine Tuning for sharp pictures, low power consumption.

Plus superior quality and service that comes from being the largest TV manufacturer in the world.

TV sets suitable for fluctuating voltages: 160-275 V.

* Philips service centres in India:
39/43 Nesbit Road, Mazgaon, Bombay 400 010. Tel: 8725528.
2 Heysham Road, Calcutta 700 020. Tel: 473621.
3 Haddows Road, Madras 600 006. Tel: 812341/7.
66 Janpath, New Delhi 110 001. Tel: 321125.

Released for information only by:
Philips Singapore Pte. Ltd., Lorong 1, Toa Payoh, Singapore 1231 and Philips Hong Kong Limited, 27th-29th Floor, Hopewell Centre, Hong Kong.

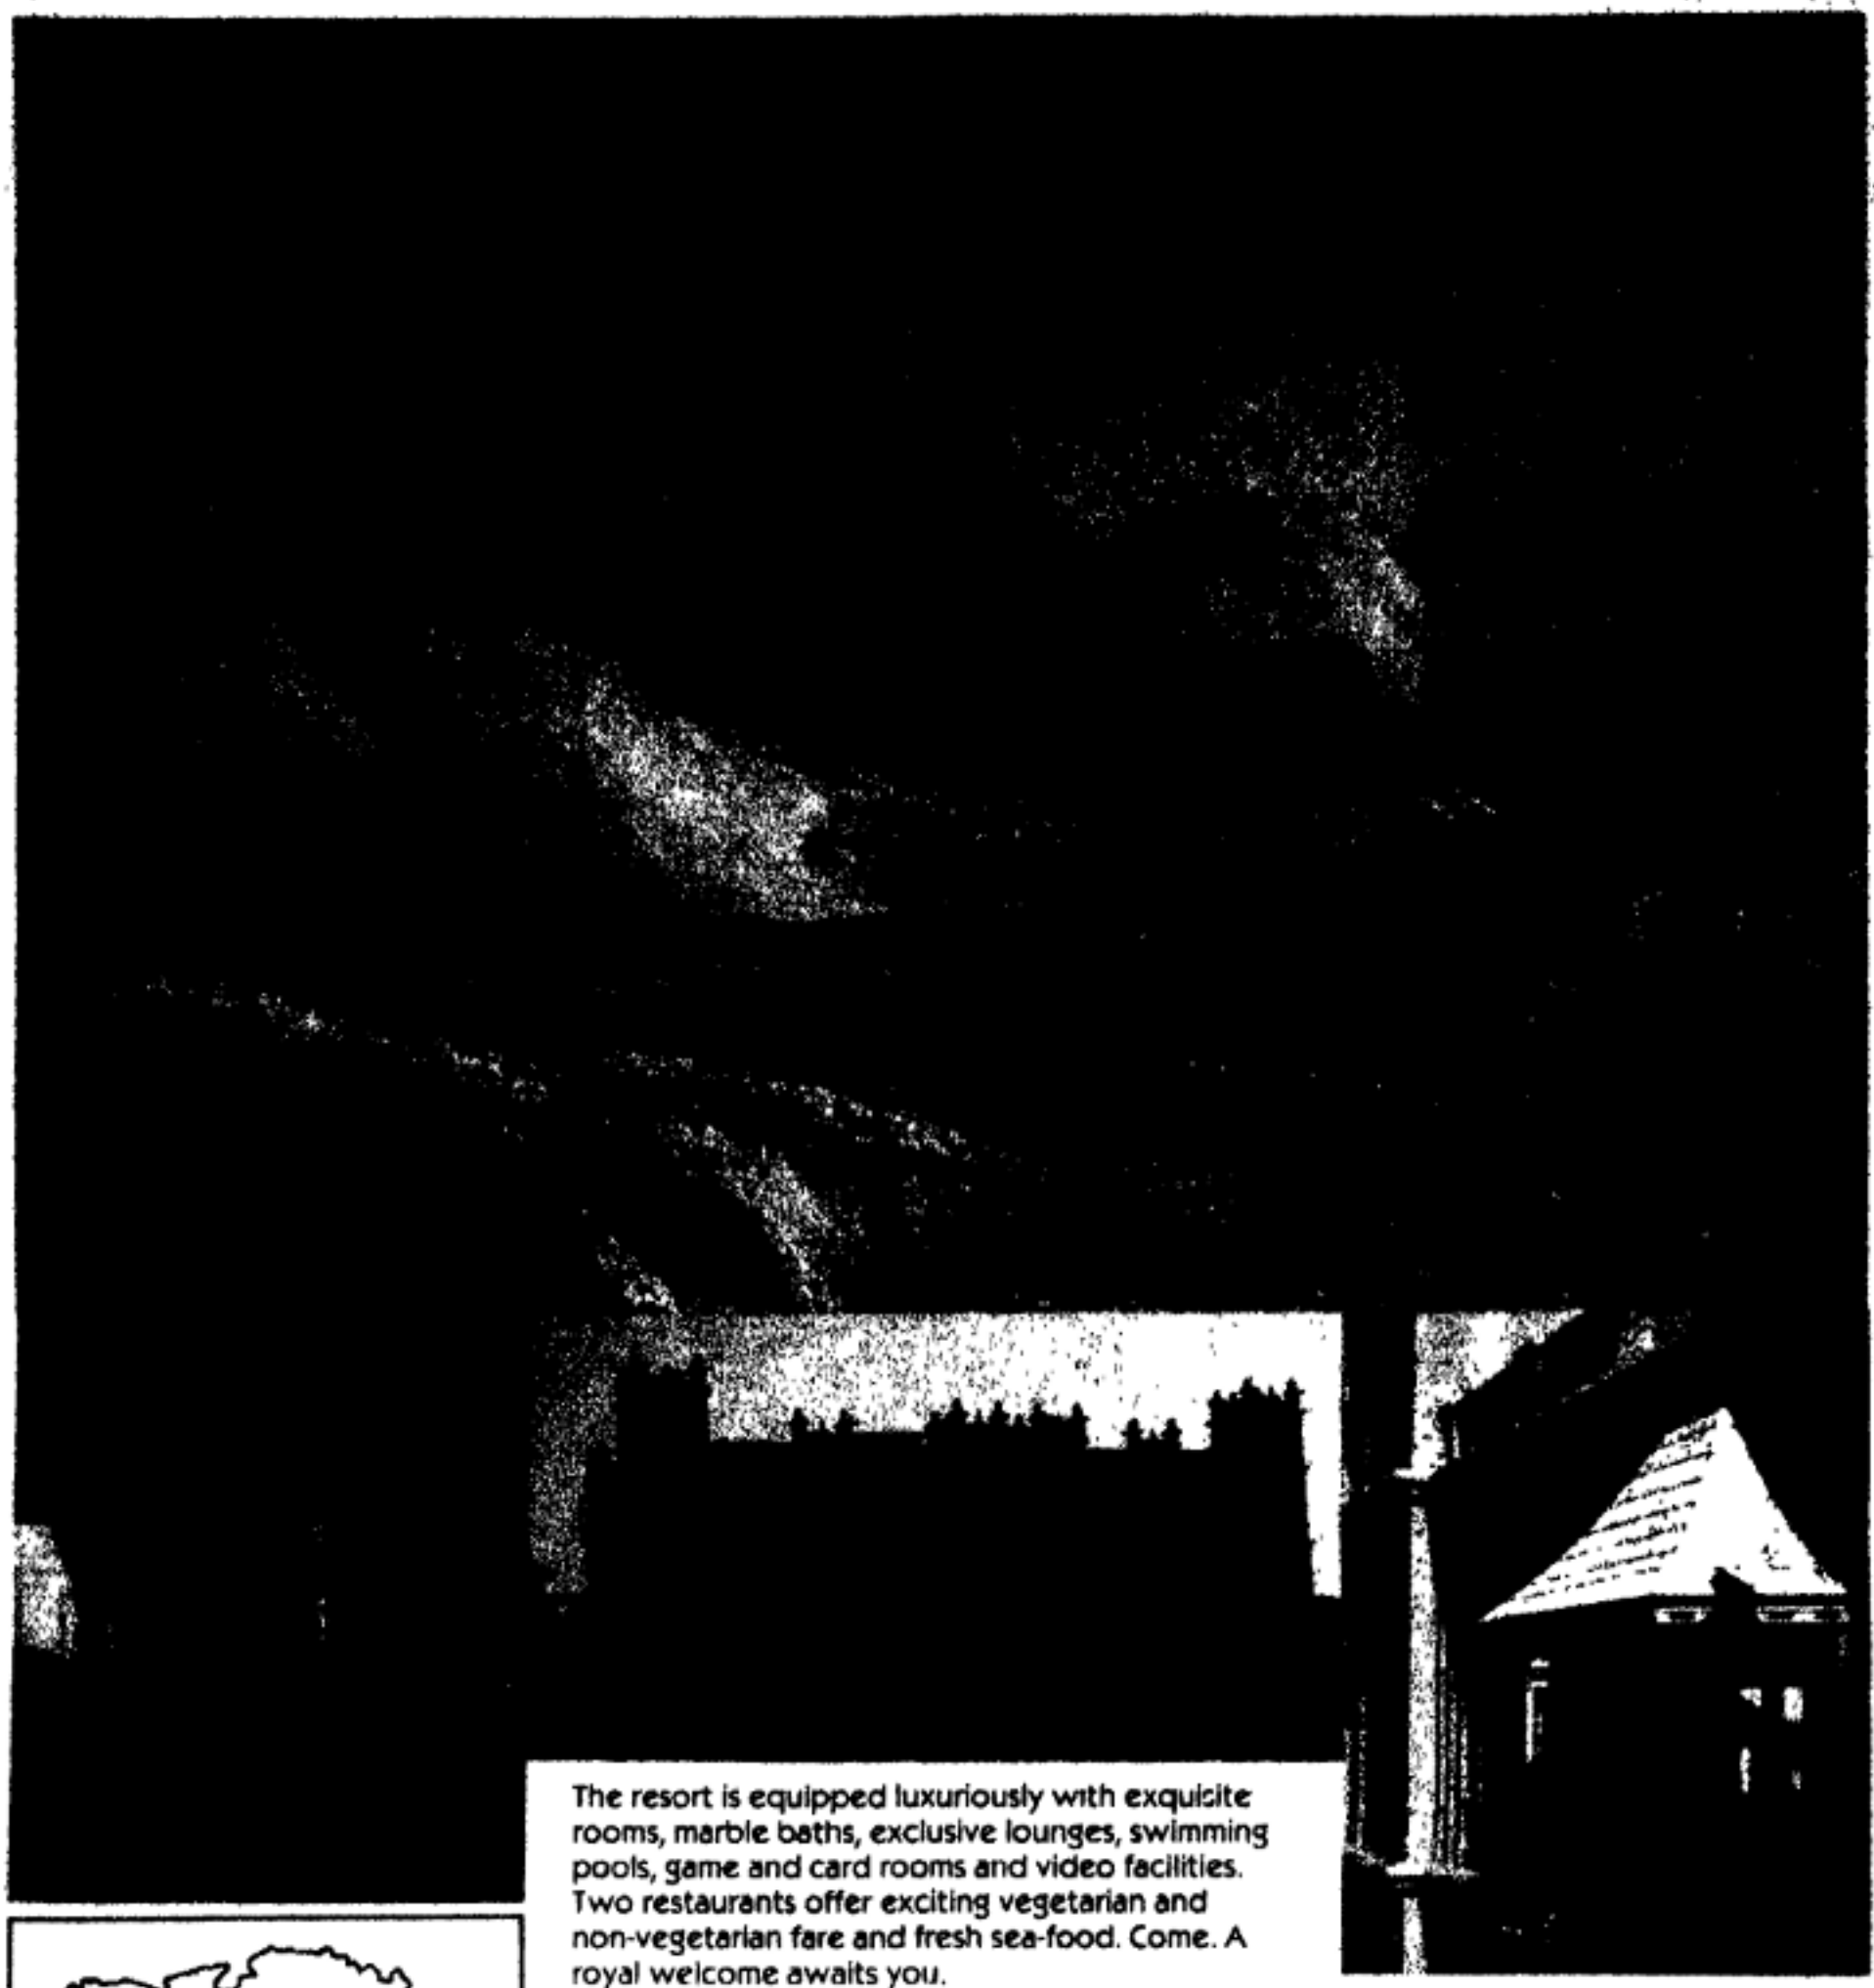
PHILIPS

"It's ... and easy to take off. I'm sure it must have been designed by a woman."

It takes the bumps and potholes with care and respect for the rider. It reacts instantly to the brakes. And I love the way it comes to such a stable halt. My husband says it's because of a new suspension that transfers the impact of sudden braking, from the front wheel to the rear.

LONIA MACHINES LTD.
AND PIAGGIO OF ITALY.



and he can rattle off over twenty reasons why its a superior machine.

I don't remember all of them, but I'm sure of one thing. Its such a considerate two wheeler... it must have been designed by a woman.

My husband, of course, characteristically disagrees.

the vespa XE
from Lohia Machines Ltd
and
Piaggio of Italy

Chorwad – one of Gujarat's loveliest beaches, where thundering surf, golden sands and swaying casuarina complement the timeless graciousness of the Palace.

At Chorwad, you can spend sun-filled days lazing in the sand, horse riding or sight seeing.

The resort is equipped luxuriously with exquisite rooms, marble baths, exclusive lounges, swimming pools, game and card rooms and video facilities. Two restaurants offer exciting vegetarian and non-vegetarian fare and fresh sea-food. Come. A royal welcome awaits you.

Accommodation : 75 rooms to suit every budget – a choice of palace, cottage, deluxe and economy rooms.

Business facilities : Conference Hall with secretarial facilities.

How to reach : Nearest airport is Keshod, 38 km which is linked to Bombay. Nearest railway station is Chorwad Road. Transport to and from airport and station is available.

Nearby places of interest : Somnath – 38 km, the renowned shrine with the foremost jyotirlinga; Sasan Gir – 80 km, the natural habitat of the Asiatic lion; Porbandar – 80 km, the historic town where Mahatma Gandhi was born; Ahmedpur-Mandvi –125 km, a beautiful beach resort with modern facilities; Diu – 125 km, the earlier Portugese colony, has an ancient fort and an excellent beach.

Gujarat . . . Like nowhere else in India

For further information and booking, contact :

GUJARAT TOURISM

Tourist Information Bureau
Tourism Corporation of Gujarat Ltd.
H.K. House, Off Ashram Road,
Ahmedabad 380 009
Phone : 449683, 460640
Telex : 0121-549 TCGL IN Regional Offices :

Dhanraj Mahal, Apollo Bunder,
Bombay 400 039
Phone : 2024925 Telex : 011 9484 GUJT IN

1/847 Athugar Street, Nanpura,
Surat 395 001 Phone : 96586

Rang Mahal, Diwan Chowk,
Junagadh 362 001 Phone : 684

212 Kanishka Shopping Plaza, 19, Ashoka Road, New Delhi 110 001 Phone : 302102

By Directorate of Tourism, Gujarat State

MGR Takes Charge Again

After an incredible recovery from the brink of death, MGR is back to rule

MGR waves at his supporters

Photographs by Subha News Photo Service

Nearly a million awe-struck people of Tamil Nadu witnessed their beloved leader M.G. Ramachandran's triumphant return to their midst at the dawn of 4 February after waging an incredible battle against death that outshone even the most perilous of his celluloid adventures. The popular impression that MGR has divine strength became a belief as the multitude gazed with worshipful eyes at the leader who looked fresh and buoyant. For the millions the four-month life-and-death struggle had been only a nightmare that dissolved with the soft rays of the rising sun.

On 5 November 1984, MGR, on the brink of death, had been flown to New York strapped to a stretcher, breathing through a tube. His lungs had collapsed, he had diabetes, a paralytic stroke and a damaged kidney. Three months later he returned, walking jauntily on his own feet. Apart from the speech impairment, there were no tell-tale signs of serious ailments that would have permanently crippled, if not killed, most people.

At 6.55 am on 4 February, MGR was spotted sitting on the back seat of his official blue ambassador car TMQ 4777. The car was driven up the specially constructed ramp to the rear of the podium. Opening the door himself, MGR bounced out, and unaided walked into full public view with the characteristic spring in his gait. A full-throated cheer of joy and relief rent the morning sky. People watched with open-mouthed wonder at this vision of MGR—the same old fez cap, the same old glasses, the same old crisp white kurta and dhoti, the same old gestures and smiles. Yes, the same old MGR was back. No one had dared hope for such a miracle. The first thing MGR did was to bow his head deeply and fold his hands in a humble, vannakkam—the Tamil equivalent of namaste. With that touching gesture, MGR conveyed his humility and sincere gratitude much more effectively than a 100 words. Women wept unabashedly. MGR then lifted his right hand high up in the air, his characteristic gesture of greeting. The verve and ease with which he did it sent spirits soaring and the assemblage waved their hands in wild abandon. The vigorous way in which he kept waving his right hand (which was afflicted by the paralytic stroke) vanquished the fast evaporating doubts about MGR's recovery. But on stage, MGR demonstrated not only his remarkable physical recovery but also his mental alertness—the crucial aspect that was the topic of fervid debate. Scanning the huge crowd, he soon spotted his partymen, beaming with happiness in the VIP enclosure. Like a fond father, he summoned them on stage and even elderly AIADMK partymen, who could barely restrain themselves, leapt up on stage like schoolboys. MGR warmly embraced speaker K. Rajaram and a few others. That he had missed them all intensely became apparent, when MGR overcome with emotion, wept like a baby. But as he has proved so many times, he is a man with a steel will and quickly composed himself.

Remarkable also was the fact that unlike his wife, Dr Sreepada Rao and others accompanying him from New York, MGR did not even look jetlagged. Contrary to the photographs taken in the Brooklyn hospital in which he looked old and haggard, his face now looked taut, bright and fresh. Of course the half hour make up session in the aircraft after he landed at the Madras airport helped but the fact that struck a chord in every heart was not just the unchanged face but the inner strength radiated by MGR. The brief simple public reception shorn of unnecessary melodrama and ostentation lasted for 20 minutes after which MGR strode back to his car and drove off to his house—not to rest but to meet partymen, officials, well-wishers and the Governor. The man whom most had not expected to come back alive, had begun the third phase of his life.

For the people the darshan was more satisfying than any of his films. On 3 February people had begun pouring into the city from all over the state, to witness the historic moment. Nearly two lakh people had thronged the Mohite stadium, 12 hours before the scheduled darshan. Lavish and meticulous arrangements (a tribute to R.M. Veerappan's organising skills) had been made to provide the basic needs like food, water, and toilet facilities. Little bonfires, excited chatter, vendors yelling their wares, the screening of five evergreen hits of MGR (significantly none of them were Jayalalitha starrers) all lent a carnival atmosphere to the stadium. Multicoloured welcome arches, banners, buntings and posters decorated the premises. Most posters showed a flower-bedecked Janaki Ramachandran standing next to MGR (till now one had never seen posters of her).

Investigations by SUNDAY reveal that there are only two things that MGR need to worry about regarding his health. He has to be guarded against infection. Due to the administration of cyclospirin the drug that controls the antibodies to check rejection of the donated kidney, MGR's natural resistance to infection has weakened. This was why a bubble top chair had been organised for MGR to travel in. In the sterile atmosphere of a New York hospital one need not have worried about infection, but not so in the steamy heat of Madras. There is cause for alarm as MGR insists on meeting various people, many of whom may be silent carriers of infection, unknown to themselves. Further, MGR will not hear of quarantine.

The other aspect that might create trouble is the possibility of a psychological problem which could arise due to his inability to speak. His words are still indistinct and the inability to converse freely may lead to frustration and depression, according to Dr Sreepada Rao.

The alacrity with which Governor Khurana declared that MGR was "physically fit and mentally alert" established the fact that sometime during the end of January the centre became fully aware of MGR's spectacular recovery. The Governor would not have issued the statement without consulting Delhi. This also explains why the Delhi trip had such a sobering effect on Mr Thirunavukkarasu, the minister who was divested of a few of his portfolios. Thirunavukkarasu who blamed a "group" in the party for the shoddy treatment meted out to him and who had asserted that the decision was not MGR's, clamped up completely on his return from Delhi.

The crowd at the Mohite Stadium waiting to see MGR

MGR's Decision-making Power Has Not Been Affected'

Dr T. K. Sreepada Rao told SUNDAY

Dr T. K. Sreepada Rao, the nephrologist from Downstate Medical Centre, New York, has been treating MGR and accompanied him to Madras. Anita Pratap spoke to him on the day MGR landed in Madras. Excerpts:

Q: Can Mr Ramachandran attend to the onerous task of chief ministership at this juncture?

A: Yes. You see his decision-making power has not been affected at all. But it will take a little while for him to be active the way he was before illness. For instance, it would be totally inadvisable for him to start touring the state immediately. We want him to come back to normal life gradually, over a period of time, say about two to three months. While he does not require bed rest it would not be advisable for him to put in ten to twelve hours of work daily. But his recovery is fantastic. He is a medical marvel. I mean at today's public function he wanted to keep going and I had to stop him. All of us were so tired and I was half asleep and he was fully awake. My God, the [illegible] looking forward to his [illegible] touching. For the last [illegible] been literally counting [illegible] would [illegible] off the day. And as the [illegible] closer he was [illegible] will it take for him to [illegible] Well, he [illegible] words now like [illegible] you, enough [illegible] the words are not [illegible] of course, by means [illegible] and gestures he is [illegible] very well. He [illegible] understood [illegible] speech [illegible] a [illegible] drug MGR is being administered to ensure that his kidney is not rejected) works by neutralising the antibodies, which is what causes the rejection. But then antibodies are required to fight infection. Does not the supression of antibodies make MGR vulnerable to infection? Should he not be kept away from people?

A: Yes, you are right. He is vulnerable to infection due to Cyclosporin. That is why we have kept the dosage low. It is a risk and we do worry about it. All we can do is to keep a watch on a regular basis. But I don't think it's necessary to keep him away from other people. I am sure people with any kind of infection however mild, will keep away from him automatically. Gradually over a period of time he will develop natural immunity.

Q: MGR is a very charismatic person, a legend in his lifetime. Don't you think the inability to speak may create certain psychological problems?

A: That is a possibility. He realises that it is a weakness. But I am sure he will get over it.

Q: How would you rate his power of comprehension?

A: Good, extremely good.

Q: Can you narrate some instances to establish this?

A: Well, he always wanted to know what each medicine is for. He refuses to be satisfied with perfunctory explanations. He will demand an answer that satisfies his curiosity. Another instance that comes to my mind was his reaction to Mrs Gandhi's assassination. He actually cried. It was very hard for him to absorb the shock. He was depressed for several days and it took a visible effort for him not to dwell on it. It took many days for him to return to his normal state of cheerfulness.

Q: What do you have to say about [illegible]

[illegible]

The political fallout of MGR's triumphant return is the vindication, in a sense, of the coterie. It is now clear that Mr Ramachandran was fully aware of the developments vis-a-vis Jayalalitha and Thirunavukkarasu. This was proved in no uncertain terms in full public view by Mr Ramachandran himself. Among the many AIADMK partymen who had clambered onto the stage was Mr Thirunavukkarasu. MGR was seen communicating by means of gestures to Thirunavukkarasu indicating that now that he (MGR) was back, "there was nothing to worry." He also indicated to Thirunavukkarasu that he wanted to meet him the same day. Obviously MGR would not have communicated in this fasion to Thirunavukkarasu if he had been ignorant of the goings on. The minister met MGR thrice in three days. Mr Thirunavukkarasu told SUNDAY that he apprised Mr Ramachandran of all the developments during his absence. Significantly, he said he was convinced that Mr Ramachandran was aware of him being divested of his portfolios. No amount of persuasion succeeded in getting Mr Thirunavukkarasu to talk further about his meetings with MGR. As he told SUNDAY, "Now I know that MGR was aware of the situation. As I have said before, I am prepared to accept any decision of MGR's."

Coming from one of the prominent persons who had earlier raised doubts about decisions being taken on behalf of MGR by a "group" in the party, the statement is highly significant. It is clear, therefore, that MGR took the decisions himself. But this still does not answer the question why he took the decision, when it is well-known that he went into hospital, favourably disposed to both Jayalalitha and Thirunavukkarasu. Why then were these two singled out for axing?

A person close to MGR who was with him in New York told this correspondent that the coterie had been manipulating MGR, ever since the election results were out. The coterie, very cleverly, made no direct contact with MGR, but through politicians, industrialists and a leading Tamil writer, all of whom told MGR two things to turn him against Jayalalitha. First, that Jayalalitha had begun hobnobbing with the Congress(I) leaders in Delhi, a fact that had even earlier begun to worry MGR. The other information fed to him was that she and Thirunavukkarasu were having an affair, which accounted for Thirunavukkarasu openly supporting her. Later when Neduncheziyan went to meet him in

Yes, on the day of her marriage, Sudha discovered, her husband was already married... to the bottle!

Now, while it's the drinks for him, for her it's tears.

A happy married life nipped in its bud, when it ought to have bloomed, as alcohol takes its toll. For the newly-wed wife it becomes a nightmare.

The signs are unmistakable:

★ The peace, prosperity and happiness of family start to take severe punishment.

★ The husband staggers home at irregular hours.

★ All that the wife gets are bitter quarrels. And beatings...

Let not alcohol rob you of a loving wife. Avoid drinking. All it needs is the intention ... and a bit of will power.

It's liquor ... or your married life

SAID/1/85

Issued in public interest by Ministry of Social & Women's Welfare, Government of India.

MGR with his wife Janaki Ramachandran

New York he was informed of happenings more or less along the same lines. Nedunchezian pressed for the removal of Jayalalitha and MGR agreed, for a reason that proves his shrewdness.

According to the source, in the Brooklyn hospital MGR was docile and nodded agreement to a lot of things. This for the simple reason that he was fully aware of his helplessness. He caught on to the fact that the coterie was operating in full swing. Sitting in New York, still in the process of recovering, MGR decided it was best to play along with the coterie as he realised that the group was in control of both the party and the government. Any provocation or confrontation with the coterie would have precipitated a situation in which he would have lost total control of the party as well as the government. Astutely he realised that even if he played along with the coterie, he could always rectify the situation on his return, when he could be in direct physical control of the party and government. The minute he was in home territory, MGR began asserting himself, starting with the refusal to climb out from the aircraft into the bubbletop chair and special van. Contrary to doctors orders, he summomed all his partymen on stage where in full view of others he directed Thirunavukkarasu to meet him, obviously fully aware that the latter would otherwise be denied a chance to meet him. Ever since MGR returned and began asserting himself, Nedunchezian and Veerappan have clearly been looking uneasy.

MGR is now in full control of the situation and has ensured that like before all party and government-related decisions are taken by himself and no one else. He proved that the ministry-making exercise was his own effort. In meeting Thirunavukkarasu thrice it is clear that he is well on to the path of patching up all the differences in the party. At the same time, SUNDAY learns that MGR is very angry with Jayalalitha because of her intemperate comments in the press about the coterie, his wife and himself. Even so the situation has not reached the point of no-return which is evident from the fact that MGR refused to even suspend her from the party as requested by senior ministers. Apparently, MGR is waiting for passions to cool and will take a decision regarding Jayalalitha in about a month's time. Till such time status quo will be maintained: neither will Jayalalitha be reinstated nor will she be expelled. Even though MGR is angry with Jayalalitha for her harsh remarks, according to sources, he is unlikely to throw her out of the party. They point out that even a person like Edmund who defected from the AIADMK when the MGR government was dismissed in 1980, and rejoined when it won a is well known that MGR's attitude to errant party members is: "If I throw them out of the party, where will they go?"

Her anger spent, Jayalalitha has once again chosen to become a recluse. Earlier it was power that made her inaccessible. Now it appears to be obstracism. The flag of revolt that was raised by Thirunavukkarasu in the AIADMK was unfurled by Jayalalitha. In raising doubts about MGR's (her own mentor's) mental alertness, Jayalalitha appears to have alienated the sympathy of a large section of people. The popular feeling is that she acted immaturely, rashly and hastily. "She could have at least waited till MGR returned before she blew her top. She would not have cut such a sorry figure now," is the refrain now. However, there is a section, particularly women, who feel sorry for her. They point out that she was after all a loyal party worker, which she so effectively demonstrated at the time of the election campaign. While they also cannot condone her from her trenchant outburst, they feel that that the hard work put in by her for the AIADMK should stand her in good stead in this hour of crisis.

In the Fifties, after a string of flops, MGR's film career was thought to be finished. But he reached the pinnacle of success in the Sixties and reigned supreme till he quit. When he floated his own party in 1972, everybody scoffed at him. He had the last laugh when he trounced the DMK and won 132 seats in the Assembly elections in 1977. In 1980, when the MGR government was dismissed it was felt that the nonperformance of the AIADMK government would smash MGR's charisma. He became chief minister for the second time and his charisma was strengthened with the introduction of the noon meal scheme. The recent ailment was MGR's second brush with death. The first time was when he was shot in the neck from point blank range by screen villain M. R. Radha. Then too he made a spectacular recovery, with only a slight blurring of speech. There is a popular saying in Tamil: Dharmam thalai kakkum (acts of charity will protect you). MGR is popularly called ponmanachammal (man with the golden heart) as his munificence is legendary. The MGR legend rests on the belief that because MGR is such a good man, whatever the odds against him, whatever the combination of of evil forces ranged against him, MGR will fight and triumph in the end. The legend lives on.

Anita Pratap, Madras

Victor's March

Will A Passage to India prove to be the actor's passage to Hollywood?

Victor Banerjee playing Dr Aziz offers a helping hand to Judy Davis playing Adela in a still from David Lean's A Passage to India

Balanced. That's the first thing that strikes you about Victor Banerjee. That he is balanced.

He is not curt or arrogant, as widely rumoured, but he is decidedly outspoken. Yet he rarely loses his equilibrium and it is easy to see how he could be equally impressive as the strong and quiet Nikhilesh (of Satyajit Ray's Ghare-Baire) as well as the jumpy Dr Aziz (of David Lean's A Passage to India).

When this correspondent met him, however, Victor Banerjee looked harassed. He was waiting: for an urgent overseas call to come through, for his air ticket to LA, for his passport and Reserve Bank clearances, for the various documents he was required to be equipped with for business abroad and finally for a breath of relief. He wasn't even sure whether he was leaving for Los Angeles the same night or the next morning.

Victor's plans were part of a piece: his agents abroad were alreay doing the rounds of the Hollywood studios for him. Will A Passage to India then prove to be Victor's passage abroad?

"No" came the reply, "thanks to you, the press for overpublicising A Passage to India, I won't be out of work in India so soon." But surely his trip abroad would mean some more foreign assignments in the years to come? "Well, there is no such film in the offing yet, if that's what you mean. If I do get a good offer, I'll surely accept it, why not? Ideally, of course, I would like to work in one or two Indian and/or Bengali films every year."

What does the latest 'star' of Indian cinema have to say about his success? The answer is well framed and prepared, which is only expected from a candid and fluent speaker like Victor Banerjee and possibly more so because he's had to go over it so many times ("There's been a spate of interviews of late"): "Success is a fortunate juxtaposition of the part you play and the film you work in. Yes, of course, you have to possess the minimum requirements, but there's no way really you can manipulate the future."

"Let's put it this way. Had A Passage to India been a Merchant Ivory production, it would have been inconsequential. I feel that people attribute a lot less to luck than they

Director David Lean on location for A Passage to India

Nemai Ghosh

Victor Banerjee in Ghare-Baire

should. Success, after all, doesn't happen every day."

It was 15 March last year, as Victor recalled, that he walked into Sir David's room in a Delhi hotel—script in hand, a hypothetical dialogue well rehearsed, his nerves on edge and simply dying for an affirmative nod.

Success had found him out that day itself, catapulting him to international horizons. What has happened since is history. It is, however, not just the mention of his "electrifying" performance in A Passage to India in Time magazine that has turned the heads of a homegrown audience, as Victor believes rather disdainfully. The film has not even been shown in India.

The credit for his current high goes, no less, if not more, to his brilliant portrayal of the idealist aristocrat, Nikhilesh in Satyajit Ray's Ghare-Baire. And as a viewer remarked while coming out of the theatre where the film is currently showing in Calcutta: "Ghare-Baire is Victor Victor all the way."

In the very essential balance with which he has rendered the two "diametrically opposite characters," lies the evaluation of Victor Banerjee's versatility. As the actor related, Dr Aziz of Passage and Nikhilesh of Ghare-Baire stand on "two different sides of the graph." While Nikhilesh brings out an introspective tragic hero, Dr Aziz is an incredible character: "a comic role which rises to tragic heights to straight forward arrogance and ends on an absolute equilibrium."

Bringing that improbable character down to a level of credibility that would be comprehensible to an American audience was an acid test of the actor, which Victor Banerjee passed with flying colours.

But then, Victor Banerjee is no novice at acting. On stage from the age of five, Victor has been nurtured by theatre through his growing years. He was associated with leading English theatre groups both in Calcutta and Bombay. It was only in 1977 that he made his debut in cinema with a meaty role in Satyajit Ray's Shatranj Ke Khilari. Many others followed though not with the rapidity of a Jeetendra but covering a wide variety of roles in Hindi and Bengali. Pikoo's Diary made by Ray for the French television, Shyam Benegal's Kalyug and Aarohan were the most noteworthy.

Although Aarohan stills remains to be seen commercially, Victor Banerjee is as much remembered for his portrayal of the haughty zamindar in this film as for the stern and untenable industrialist in Kalyug. Victor himself, however, does not consider Kalyug a very satisfying film as far as his role is concerned—"in the sense that mine was not the only or singular contribution to the film. I was only a part of the team and Dhanraj (played by Victor in the film) was equal to as many as four others in the production."

Then, perhaps, it was because of a dearth of satisfying roles that Victor was not interested in more Hindi films? "Oh no," replied Victor, "I'd love to work in Hindi films (provided, of course, the role is good) but not many producers-directors have really got in touch with me. Perhaps, they can find many a younger and good actor in Bombay itself," Victor added with an innocent smile.

But, in any case, the commercial cinema world of Bombay is not Victor's cup of tea. What perturbs him "is the irresponsible attitude adopted by these filmmakers. They ought to realise the deep impact they make on a gullible and uneducated public."

What of Left Front cinema? Could that be included under better cinema: Victor's reply came quick: "Of that genre, I am afraid, I am extremely tired. Left Front cinema only depicts the oppression of the poor by the richer classes. There are far more gnawing problems in the country that do not, in any way, concern the disparity between the haves and the have-nots.

"None of these filmmakers realise this. There are exceptions alright, but almost all their films are about the poor in relation to the rich. Why don't they ever deal with the poor alone?" According to Victor Banerjee, the only motivation that works in them is the desire to join the bandwagon to international awards. "At the head of it all, is the tragic trend of promoting and strengthening the established views of those foreign film critics who refuse to look at any other aspect of India other than what is popular in the west. They simply love to see it (the seamier side of life in our country."

Victor is positively livid as he recalls meeting a few foreign film journalists in Calcutta at the last Filmotsav. For persons who had been associated with films for so long Victor Banerjee thought it appalling that "it was only when they saw the films here that those pompous fools realised that English films shown in

Victor Banerjee playing Dr Aziz joyfully stretches out from the train's footboard to impress Adela

India are screened without subtitles."

Just when we were wondering if there was any subject on which Victor Banerjee was less than forthright, we asked him to comment on the directors he had worked with. For the first time, he was non-committal. "Ajoy Kar is one fine gentleman I've worked with. In terms of stimulation and providing a rewarding experience, Ray stands head and shoulders above all the others. Shyam Benegal is a natural filmmaker and has a most amiable unit. And as for David Lean, he is perhaps one of the greatest people one can work with."

Despite the many versions one has heard about Victor's initial differences with Lean, the actor does not hesitate to admit that he has learnt a lot while working with Lean. "You can differ with any director, for that matter. They only difference in this case was that Lean is a man with a positive and too perfect an approach and the argument got prolonged." The argument was on the question of the accent Victor should employ to suit his characterisation of Dr Aziz. "But it was blown out of proportion by a reporter who spoke to me. Nevertheless, says Victor, "working in a Lean film makes you a very ruthless and unkind judge of works made by lesser filmmakers."

David Lean, as Victor would put it, is a perfect auteur—""an excellent editor, a wonderful photographer and absolutely the actor's director. Besides, in a Lean film, there is not a single mediocre performance, which is a challenge in itself. Then, you are given almost the same footage as others, which also makes standing out a little more difficult." Yet, Victor feels satisfied and rewarded enough when he thinks aloud: " A Passage to India was a great experience indeed."

A Passage to India, Victor Banerjee feels, has found so many people overreacting to it because "it's come as a tremendous relief in the midst of a spate of sci-fi films and special effect movies. No one is going to walk out of this film. The script is excellent and well drafted and the film itself is beautifully shot and edited. The nine pages devoted to it by Time which also bills it as the best picture of 1984 is a tribute to the return of the classic films."

How does Victor rate Ghare-Baire? Victor comes straight to the point. "As far as this film is concerned, it has to be seen more than once to understand the level it operates on." The actor does not agree with critics who believe that Ghare-Baire does not sum up Ray as Fanny and Alexander does Ingrid Bergman. "I don't think so at all. In fact, I feel it is very accurately representative of Ray as he thinks and observes things today." Besides, says Victor, every artiste has the right to vary his style from film to film. "This just shows

BOMBAY DYEING

NEW YEAR DISCOUNT SALE

15% OFF

ON POLYESTER
SUITINGS AND SHIRTINGS.

15% OFF

ON POLYESTER AND COTTON SARIS, DRESS PRINTS, RUBIA, CAMBRICS, LAWNS.

15% OFF

ON POLYESTER AND COTTON SHEETS, TOWELS, FURNISHINGS, BLANKETS, QUILTS.

Sale open at 500 approved retail stockists all over India.

15% OFF ON THE FULL RANGE OF BOMBAY DYEING FABRICS

OFFER OPEN FOR A LIMITED PERIOD

Mrs Moore (Peggy Ashcroft) and Aziz (Victor Banerjee) establish an immediate rapport when they first meet in the mosque that our critics have not developed at all."

Regarding the inevitable and unflattering comparison being drawn between Ghare-Baire and Ray's earlier masterpiece, Charulata, Victor fails to gauge the reason. "It's like accusing Tagore of rewriting a story under a different name. The only thing common between the two films is Tagore and the basic material perhaps."

Victor's empathy with filmmakers is understandable: he too is a filmmaker, having made An August Requiem in 1981. The film is yet to be seen commercially but Victor is hopeful. "Very soon, at last, my film will be cut and made to swim in the baths of chemistry. When it was first screened here, I hadn't even seen the film myself. I was busy earning money and sending bankdrafts to Bombay so that more prints could be made."

Victor doesn't seem too keen right now to launch another film, though he does talk about a script he has written himself. Another six to eight months' work on it and it'll be ready for filming. "It's a universal subject and the theme has no socio-geographical constraints. I would like to make it in a language that can reach out to maximum number of people," is all that Victor wants to reveal right away.

Isn't he keen to become a director: Victor's reply comes without any hesitation. "Of course. An actor in a film is, after all, only a minor cog in the entire system. Films are a director's medium. I definitely find directing more satisfying than acting. Given a choice between acting and directing, in terms of channelising my creativity in a certain direction, I would choose to direct films any day. But right now I have other things to see to. Once I can provide the right security for my family, it'll be easier for me to switch over."

No, Victor has far from forgotten his beginnings in theatre. He has all plans to go back to it with same vigour for "it's a very satisfying experience."

"A lot of the magic would disappear from the glamour world of films if the superstar concept did not exist. What is objectionable is their supercilious attitude and the way they run the industry." Then, explaining the difference between an actor and a superstar, Victor pulls in the name of Amitabh Bachchan. "Take him for instance, I'm sure he never went to Bombay with the intention of becoming a superstar. He wanted to be an actor; what he did become eventually was a star never really appreciated as an actor. I, for one, feel it's because of a sense of frustration that he has turned to politics."

But hasn't Victor ever aspired to reach that star-status: "No, I'll never be able to. I come from a totally different discipline in which I've trained far too long to allow my second nature—to respect others—to get wiped out."

And, in any case, Victor Banerjee has enough on his hands to keep him safe from the threat of an ivory tower existence—an art collector himself, he has an art gallery, Calcutta's first, to promote many a painter who searches an outlet for exposition and an association for the welfare of needy and neglected junior artistes, condescendingly called 'extras' in film jargon.

Victor Banerjee remains through all his successes and glories a down-to-earth man, as deeply involved with his family affairs, his wife Maya and his daughters, Dia and Keya, as with his career. Everything has its place and time.

Sunanda Gupta, Calcutta

ASSEMBLY ELECTIONS

Revolt in the Congress(I)

Widespread unhappiness over distribution of tickets

Shivajirao Patil Nilangekar lies in a room in the deserted Maharashtra Sadan in New Delhi. He has a high fever and his mind is agitated. A senior minister in the Maharashtra government who has figured in successive ministries headed by A.R. Antulay, Babasaheb Bhosale and Vasantdada Patil, he was often regarded as a contender for the chief ministership of the state. But suddenly, to his chagrin, he has been denied a ticket for the Assembly polls. Obviously, one of the ten commandents of the AICC for selecting candidates has hit him between the eyes. Now, he finds his political career being eclipsed. So pitiable is his condition that visitors sympathise with him when he says that he has not been able to meet even a single member of the decision-making Congress Parliamentary Board, leave alone persuade them to review his case. The only consolation to Nilangekar, if he values it at all, is that his son, Dilip, has been given a ticket.

Nilangekar epitomises the plight of an average Congress(I) minister who has been denied a ticket. There are at least 62 others like him. And many more if one takes into account that most chairmen of state corporations are also bestowed with ministerial status. State party functionaries, like three general secretaries of the Uttar Pradesh PCC(I), who also enjoyed high privileges and powers, have been dropped. In the final tally, there are 800 new faces and nearly 1,000 sitting MLAs have been axed. However, in the selection of the candidates two guidelines have been flouted by the CPB. One relates to selecting 20 per cent of the party nominees from women candidates. The actual percentage of women selected comes to less than nine. It is a matter of regret that the Mahila Congress has not been able to exploit their guideline which would have, for the first time, brought women into politics in a big way. Women have missed the bus this time, if we are to believe chief ministers who say that they were unable to provide this quota because there were not enough women applicants.

The more controversial violation of an AICC(I) guideline relates to choosing people with a clean image. Eyebrows have been raised over the choice of Dr Jagannath Mishra in Bihar and the dropping of Mr R. Gundu Rao in Karnataka. While two former chief ministers of Rajasthan, Mr Jagannath Pahadia and Mr Harideo Joshi, have been asked to contest, Mr Babasaheb Bhosale, former chief minister of Maharashtra, has been sidelined. There was no question of giving a ticket to Antulay as he is no longer in the Congress(I). Again, while the less active and quieter ex-MPs like T.M. Sawant and Z.N. Kahandole of Maharashtra have been asked to contest for the Assembly polls, frontline politicians and sitting MPs like Shalinitai Patil and Yeshwantrao Mohite have been denied tickets even though they made vigorous efforts to be included

C.K. Jaffer Sharief

Rajiv Gandhi's desire to keep out meddlesome and troublesome legislators out of state politics stems from the bad image the party acquires because of persistent reports of dissidence from various states. The seniors in the party think that in such a large organisation as the Congress, some degree of dissidence is inevitable. But Rajiv Gandhi has seen this disease spreading in an almost epidemic form. There have been umpteen number of delegations of dissidents to New Delhi over the last five years urging the central leadership to throw out one or the other chief minister. The net result of this as seen in the current selection process is that while the chief ministers have survived and may even flourish, their ministerial opponents who stoked and nurtured dissent have had to eat humble pie.

Yet another interpretation can be given to this particular decision of keeping out ministers and their supporters. And that is: Rajiv Gandhi may decide to have an entirely new person as the chief minister. This would imply that such an incumbent would be dependent on New Delhi for assistance. The old policy of not allowing any chief minister in any state to become all powerful and a satrap can then be said to have been continued.

If, on the other hand, Rajiv Gandhi allows the present set of chief ministers, or most of them, to continue for another term, then it will indicate his desire to stamp out dissidence and allow the harmonious functioning of the state government and the organisation. The reason why Rajiv Gandhi attaches such great importance to quelling dissidence is that he wants development projects to make speedy headway in all the states. Since the main theme of the Congress(I) manifesto for the Assembly elections is going to be the progress and development of the states, Rajiv Gandhi has to make sure that the ground is prepared for implementation of all development programmes. He does not want time and energy to be wasted on internecine quarrels.

To return to the problem of sitting MLAs being dislodged, it must be said that not all those who have been dropped are dissidents or corrupt or incompetent or lazy. In many cases, where the chief minister or some other influential person has been wanting his own nominee to be chosen, trumped-up charges have been levelled against sitting MLAs. Take the example of Bhoodhar Narain Mishra, a sitting MLA from Kanpur Cantonment. It was made out that he is a drunkard but the fact remains that he is a teetotaller. Mishra was the man who helped minister Arif Mohammed Khan to win from Kanpur by looking after his electioneering there. He has not filed his nomination and has reportedly informed Rajiv Gandhi that he would not mind waiting his turn as he is only 42 years old and has a political career ahead of him. Another such example is Satish Chaturvedi, a young MLA from Maharashtra's Vidarbha region who was a junior minister in Antulay's government. His opponent, N.K. Tirpude, had levelled the charge that in one of his foreign visits, Chaturvedi had tried to "smuggle" in various items. The fact is that the customs officer had issued a press statement that Chaturvedi had not tried to go through the green channel, had declared whatever items he had brought and had left them at the airport as he had no money to pay as duty. He had collected them three days later on payment of duty. Have Vidarbha MPs like Saroj Khaparde not gone abroad and returned loaded with goods? Since when has it become a crime to buy foreign goods?

One of the biggest "midnight massacres" took place in Maharashtra. Vasantdada Patil and PCC(I) chief N.K. Kamble read out to a handful of correspondents around midnight the list of 288 candidates as cleared by the CPB(I) around 11 pm. As many as 13 ministers were axed. They were the ones whom Dada had been wanting to throw out from his ministry in the wake of former deputy chief minister Ramrao Adik's peccadillo on his infamous Air India flight to Frankfurt. The 13 ministers had come out in Adik's support and Dada was in no mood to tolerate this act of indiscipline. While minister Awade is out, his son is in. Another compromise is that while Pratibha Patil is out, her husband Devi Singh Shekhawat has managed a ticket. Pratibha Patil is not a Maratha as her name might suggest. She is a Rajput. She too tried her level best for a ticket but was frustrated.

Whether it is revenue minister Shiv Kumar of Himachal Pradesh or finance minister Raghunath Patnaik of Orissa, the treatment given to them by the CPB is the same. Even senior ministers in UP and Bihar have been axed. Invitations are now being extended to them by the Congress(S) and the Janata Party. In the aftermath of the denial of tickets, MP and former minister of state for irrigation, C.K. Jaffer Sharief resigned his membership of the Lok Sabha on 10 February 1985. While about a dozen of the 63 ministers who have been denied tickets have submitted their resignations on "moral grounds," it is not yet clear if they will file their nominations as independents and leave the Congress(I) to contest the polls. A report from UP suggests that A.R. Khan Nashtar, a minister hailing from Kanpur, is among those who has filed his nomination. If he does not withdraw in time, he will be among those to be dubbed a "rebel" and expelled from the Congress.

One of the strategies adopted by the chief ministers to ensure their own nominees' inclusion is to have allowed their opponents to include their names in the list while panels were formed in the preliminary selection by the state panels. They did not offer resistance at this early stage. In the second stage where the sub-committee of the CPB(I) discussed the list, the chief ministers saw to it that the candidatures of their opponents were rejected. In the final stage when the CPB(I) took up the lists, it was easier for the chief ministers to have their say. Madhya Pradesh chief minister Arjun Singh has effectively used this strategy and has as many as 200 of his men in the list. Vasantdada Patil, Madhavsinh Solanki, J.B. Patnaik, Shiv Charan Mathur and Virbhadra Singh followed the footsteps of Arjun Singh. The gherao outside North Block of Vishwanath Pratap Singh and Narayan Dutt Tiwari, the arbiters of the destiny of partymen aspiring for tickets from UP, was symptomatic of the mood of the aspirants from all states.

Babasaheb Bhosale

Interestingly enough, one reason for the CPB(I) delaying the consideration and finalisation of the lists was to see that there was no violence or law-and-order problem in New Delhi because of the widespread discontent and resentment in the party generated by the selection of candidates. Hundreds of thousands of aspirants had converged on the capital during this period and as the last date for filing of nominations drew near, they made a beeline for their constituencies to be able to at least file their nominations in time. It is only when the crowds of ticket-seekers had thinned that the AICC announced the lists, gradually.

The lists sought to conceal more than what they revealed. There was no mention of "sitting MLA" against the names of those who had been given renomination. Nor were the ages of the nominees stated. This left AICC general secretary Srikant Verma, the party's bright boy on publicity, tongue-tied on issues like how many sitting MLAs had been dropped, how many youths were included or what professions were represented. Even in the matter of the women figuring in the list, Verma continued to maintain stoically that the AICC guidelines had been strictly adhered to when in fact they were grossly violated. As against 20 per cent representation stated in the guidelines women got only 8.64 per cent.

While ministers in Congress-ruled states who have been dropped in the final lists have been stung by the stigma, former ministers in Andhra Pradesh—as many as 17 of them—have emerged as clean and virtuous: they are all in the list of nominees. While in office, many of them had serious allegations levelled against them, a fact being conveniently forgotten now. But now the Telugu Desam has to be fought and better Congress candidates are apparently hard to find.

To be fair to the party, the Congress(I)'s chances in neighbouring Karnataka are far better. The exclusion of Gundu Rao may help the Congress considerably as far as projecting a clean public image is concerned. There was a lot of controversy during his chief ministership and Rajiv Gandhi obviously does not want to revive bad memories. The man who helped Gundu Rao become the chief minister by dislodging Devaraj Urs—H.C. Srikantiah—has also been excluded.

But even while the party leadership will cope with these internal problems and take measures to stem the tide of resentment, if not revolt, the more serious challenges will come when the elected representatives and the new state governments get down to the task of development of the state. Nationwide, there is a feeling that development should take place in each constituency along the lines of Amethi and Rae Bareili, the VVIP Lok Sabha constituencies in the country. Over Rs 700 crores have been invested in Amethi in setting up new industry and improving irrigation for boosting agricultural production. Crores of rupees have been invested in Rae Bareili too. While these may be "models" of progress, the main issue is whether similar investments will be made in other constituencies. Where will such massive funds come from? Great expectations have been aroused among the masses. If they are not fulfilled, at least partially, what will be the fate of the Congress(I)?

Gopal Mohite, New Delhi

CIVIL AVIATION

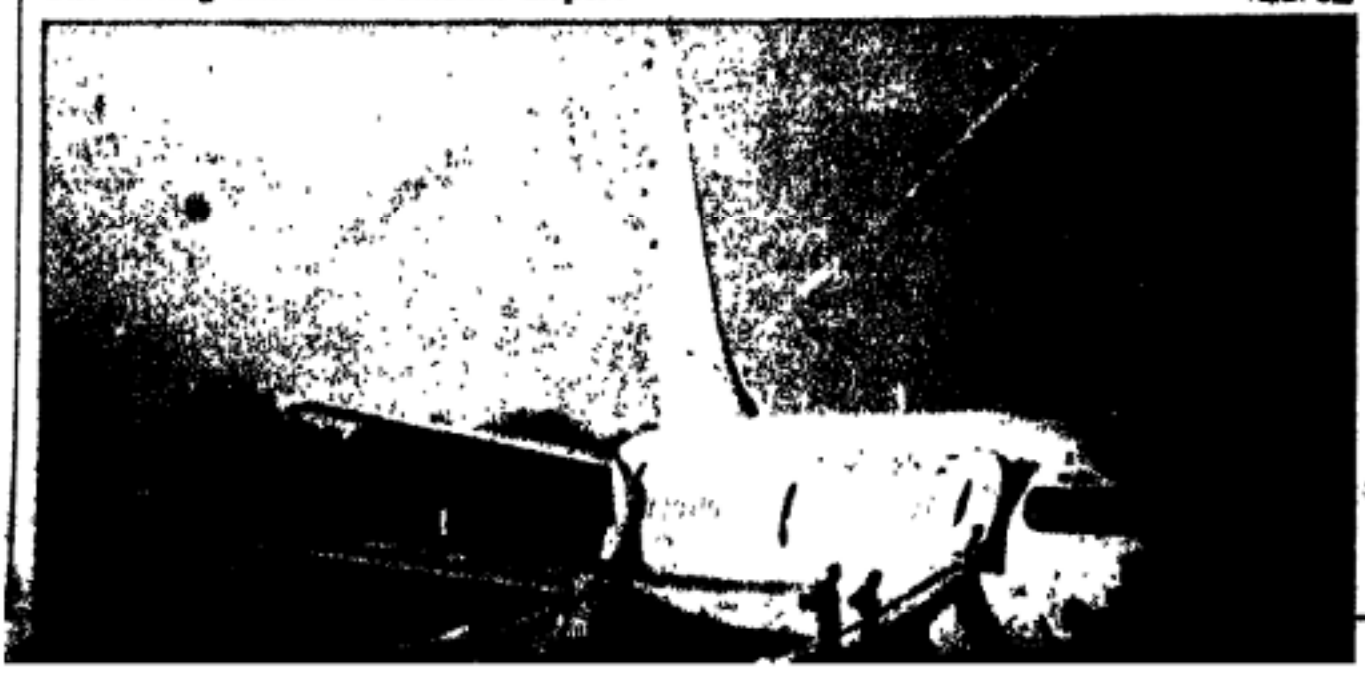
Is the Boeing Deal Off?

The Boeing-Airbus war hots up

Has the Indian Airlines decided to reconsider its decision to buy a dozen Boeing-757 aircraft? The deal, valued at around Rs 700 crores, had been finalised during the tenure of Khurshid Alam Khan as the minister for tourism and civil aviation last year. The new minister, youth leader Ashok Gehlot, in the light of the queries raised by the Public Investments Board (PIB) has asked Indian Airlines to reconsider the deal. The accident of the Kathmandu-Calcutta Boeing 737 flight of the airline, which occured at Dumdum airport near Calcutta on 8 February, has further complicated matters. In this accident, the undercarriage of the aircraft is understood to have given way, ripping open the engines. It was a miracle that the passengers survived. As the Boeing 757 is just an extended version of the existing 737s with a new engine and a longer fuselage, the Dumdum accident will also be viewed while reevaluating the Boeing-757 deal, according to the civil aviation sources. Apart from the 31-point query sent by the PIB, the Planning Commission too is understood to have expressed reservations about the deal. Till the transfer of the civil aviation secretary, M. M. Kohli (who has been shifted to power), the mood in the civil aviation department, as reflected by the thinking of minister Gehlot and secretary Kohli, was that the Boeing-757 deal should be scrapped. The new secretary, S. S. Sidhu, is a seasoned bureaucrat, who has served in the steel and defence ministries and was sent to Punjab as adviser last year. It has to be seen if the change of guard will affect the rethinking process in the ministry.

Two deals worth Rs 1,000 crore were finalised by the civil aviation ministry last year. The Indian Airlines were asked to buy a dozen Boeing-757s to replace their present Boeing 737 fleet and Air India opted for six Airbus A-310 (longrange version) for its Far East, Africa and Gulf routes. This deal was worth Rs 300 crores. The letters of intent in both deals were issued in 1984. In the Indian Airlines deal, till the last moment, Airbus Industries, the French-British-German-Spanish conglomerate of European manufacturers, tried to push its short and medium-haul version of the A-310. This, however, did not impress the selection committee.

The Boeing-757 is a narrow bodied, twin engine, 206-seater aircraft. It is based on the aircraft technology of the mid-Seventies. The A-310 too not being a latest technology aircraft, the Airbus Industries lost out to the American competitor. However, in November 1984, the European company offered the Indian Airlines a futuristic twin engine aircraft (164-seater), which is expected to enter service by 1988. According to civil aviation sources, the A-320 now offered by Airbus Industries may be able to last out the requirements of Indian Airlines till the end of the century. The A-320, based on technology of the mid-Eighties is more fuel efficient than the Boeing 757 and the A-310 which were considered by the Indian Airlines last year. The 31 point questionaire of the PIB is said to have been prepared in the light of the new offer from the Europeans.



The review of the deal, however, is said to have caused a lot of heartburning in Airlines House, the Indian Indian Airlines' headquarters in New Delhi. Some of the junior officers assigned the task, are said to have dragged their feet initially. But constant reminders from the then secretary, M. M. Kohli, opened up the issue. The report of the Review Committee was sent to the ministry from the Airlines House in the first week of February. According to sources, the evaluation team has reported that if the A-320 replaces the Boeing 757, it would save the airlines Rs. 277 crores in capital investment. The new European aircraft is evaluated to be seven per cent more fuel efficient than the American aircraft chosen last year. The panic which the study has created in the American market can be judged from the fact that suddenly the Boeing company has offered a new aircraft, Boeing-7-7, which it hopes to produce by 1990.

India seems to have become the battleground for the American and European aircraft manufacturers now. As Rs 1,000 crores are at stake, it is understandable that major manufacturers should woo India. The Europeans have lagged behind in technology over the last two decades after European aircraft —Comet, Trident, Viscount, Fokker, Vanguard and later Caravelle had dominated the scene in the Sixties. Indian Airlines had chosen the Caravelle as its first jetliner. In the early Seventies, when Dr Karan Singh was the aviation minister, the Boeing-737s were chosen. Ironically, the then chairman of the Indian Airlines, Mohan Kumaramangalam, (who later became the steel minister) died in the first Boeing-737 crash of the Indian Airlines in May 1973.

Boeing has recently received some setbacks in their home market in North America. The Trans-World Airlines (TWA) and Air Canada recently cancelled some orders with the Boeing company. Pan American Airways (PANAM) has placed an order for 40 aircraft with the Airbus Industries in September 1984. These setbacks at home are bound to affect the American manufacturer. Of late, major sales of the Boeing company have been in the North American market and of the 401 Airbus A-310s sold the world over till the end of 1984, 295 (74 per cent of total sales) were exports. In the case of Boeing-767, 133 of the total of 188 sold (71 per cent of total sales) were in North America and only 29 per cent of the sales were exports. The European-American war in the civil aviation skies is hotting up. The decision of minister Ashok Gehlot to open up the files finalised by his predecessor Khurshid Alam Khan, have brought India into the centrestage of this war.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

The Boeing crash in Dumdum airport Tapan Das

INDIAN UNION MUSLIM LEAGUE

Nationalists or Secessionists?

Senior leaders issue controversial statements in Pakistan

Two visits undertaken by leaders of the Indian Union Muslim League (IUML) to Pakistan last year have caused anxiety in the foreign office. A few days before she fell to the assassins' bullets, Indira Gandhi had asked the IUML president, Sulaiman Sait, to explain a stand taken by him during these visits. With Mrs Gandhi's death, the matter was not pursued. The CPI(M)-led opposition front in Kerala tried to censure the IUML leaders in the Lok Sabha elections. Both Sulaiman Sait and G.M. Banatwala, however, managed to retain their seats, Manjeri and Poonani, respectively with the support of the Congress(I). (The IUML is a partner of the ruling front.) The leading Malayalam daily, Mathrubhumi which reported about the activities of Sait and Banatwala in Pakistan on the election eve, has been bearing the brunt of attacks from the IUML supporters after the elections. The offices of the daily have been attacked, copies of the newspaper burnt and efforts have been made to sabotage the sale of Mathrubhumi in the Gulf states, which have a sizable Malayali migrant population. The Muslim League leaders have joined issue with Mathrubhumi and have tried to deny the allegation that the IUML leaders took unsavoury stands during their visits to Pakistan. The controversy, however, has not blown over, though the first of the two controversial visits took place in February last year.

In September 1984, IUML president Sulaiman Sait and the DMKP leader from Uttar Pradesh, former union minister, Mohd Yunus Saleem, went to Pakistan to attend a seminar on "Islamic solidarity for world peace." This seminar adopted a resolution which advocated the "right to self-determination" of the people of Jammu and Kashmir. Sulaiman Sait was no ordinary participant in this seminar. By his own admission (in a rejoinder to Mathrubhumi) he was the moderator of one of the commissions set up during the seminar (commission number two). According to Sait, this committee never discussed the question of Kashmir when he or Mohammad Yunus Saleem were present. According to Sait, when the statement on Kashmir was being passed, he was in the Indian embassy and thus he was unaware of the deliberations of the plenary. This explanation can be accepted, though one wonders why the president of the IUML, who also happens to be a Member of the Indian Parliament, should not have been alert about the deliberations of the plenary. The scope for mischief against India, especially on the issue of Kashmir, in a seminar held in Pakistan should not be unknown to Sulaiman Sait.

What is interesting is that while Sait says that he was not a party to the deliberations in the plenary, no denial or protest by him on the Kashmir resolution adopted by the seminar was published in the Pakistan press. This is not to suggest that the Pakistan press blacked out the views of the two Indian delegates. Mohd Yunus Saleem issued a strong rejoinder against the reference to Kashmir and expressed his personal opposition to such a reference. This statement was made at Karachi and the Pakistani press carried it in full. Sulaiman Sait says that immediately after he learnt about the statement on Kashmir, he issued a note of dissent and contended that the IUML's position was that Kashmir was a part of India. This note, somehow, seems to have been ignored not only by the seminar but also by the Pakistan press. The Indian embassy, where Sait is said to have been at the time of the passage of the controversial statement by the plenary, too, seems to have ignored the dissent note. Otherwise, how does one explain the fact that after he returned to India from the foreign tour, Indira Gandhi sought clarifications from him in writing about the happenings in Pakistan?

Sulaiman Sait

During the visit to Pakistan in February 1984 by Sulaiman Sait and G.M. Banatwala, the Pakistani newspapers had given them a lot of publicity. Sait was reported to have praised President Zia for his efforts for Islamisation of Pakistan. The Pakistan press quoted Sait as having said that Muslims in India were suffering because of the acts of Hindu communalists, like the RSS and "other anti-social elements in the society." Sait had alleged that a section of the police and administration was hand-in-glove with Hindu communalist organisations. In the same meeting, Banatwala is reported to have said, "Pakistan was created for the sake of Islam. Muslims all over the world rejoice in its prosperity."

President Zia-ul Haq took note of these statements by the IUML leaders. Addressing a public meeting at Karachi, the Pakistani President quoted the two Members of Parliament from India. According to Gen Zia, Sait and Banatwala had told him, "Allah had given blessings to you and to Pakistan. General Saheb you must understand that this very special blessings should not be frittered away lest Allah's curse be on you. Pakistan has already been divided and the other half (meaning the existing Pakistan) should be carefully protected. Pakistan is the fortress of all Muslims. We in India are loyal to our country, but yet we are Muslims and have a spiritual relationship with Pakistan."

The statements of the two IUML leaders also received wide publicity in the Pakistan press. The widely circulated Urdu daily, Jung quoted them as having said that secularism had failed in India and that no secular party could protect the interests of the Indian Muslims. This task, according to them, could only be carried out by a Muslim party. The headline in the leading English daily Dawn was, "Muslims cannot be sabotaged, says Sulaiman Sait." The Urdu Nawa-E-Waqt headline read: "Indian Muslim leaders praise Islamisation." The Jasrat quoted Sulaiman Sait as having said that "twelve crore Muslims of India are fighting hard for their religious and cultural identity. The constitutional rights of the Muslims in India have not yet been implemented."

Both Sait and Banatwala have reacted sharply to the expose by Mathrubhumi and the CPI(M)-led front's political campaign during the Lok Sabha elections. They have sought to deny the allegations. But the fact remains that they did not contradict the press reports in Pakistan. Fortunately for India, a vast majority of the Muslims had refused to be indoctrinated in the two nation theory before partition. Muslims are part and parcel of independent India, which is secular. Every Muslim who rejected the creation of Pakistan and stayed back in India has more right to be called an Indian. In 1947, they opted for India as against Islamic Pakistan. The Constituent Assembly, recognised the contribution of these Muslims by proudly proclaiming India to be a secular state. Secularism was the natural corollary of the Indian freedom movement. It was the creed of the Indian National Congress, which dominated the subcontinent since the early part of this century. The leaders of the Indian Union Muslim League do not seem to have appreciated the mood of the Indian people. Otherwise they would not undertake trips to Pakistan and make statements which they cannot either contradict in Pakistan, nor defend in India.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

KARNATAKA

Gundu Rao is Grounded

The former chief minister is refused a ticket

The fruits of loyalty can also go sour as the ebullient R. Gundu Rao, former chief minister of Karnataka, discovered recently. He was not given a party ticket to fight the forthcoming Assembly elections from Karnataka. Gundu Rao's political journey that began in the famous glass house of Lalbagh, Bangalore, during the Congress split of 1969 came to a shattering end.

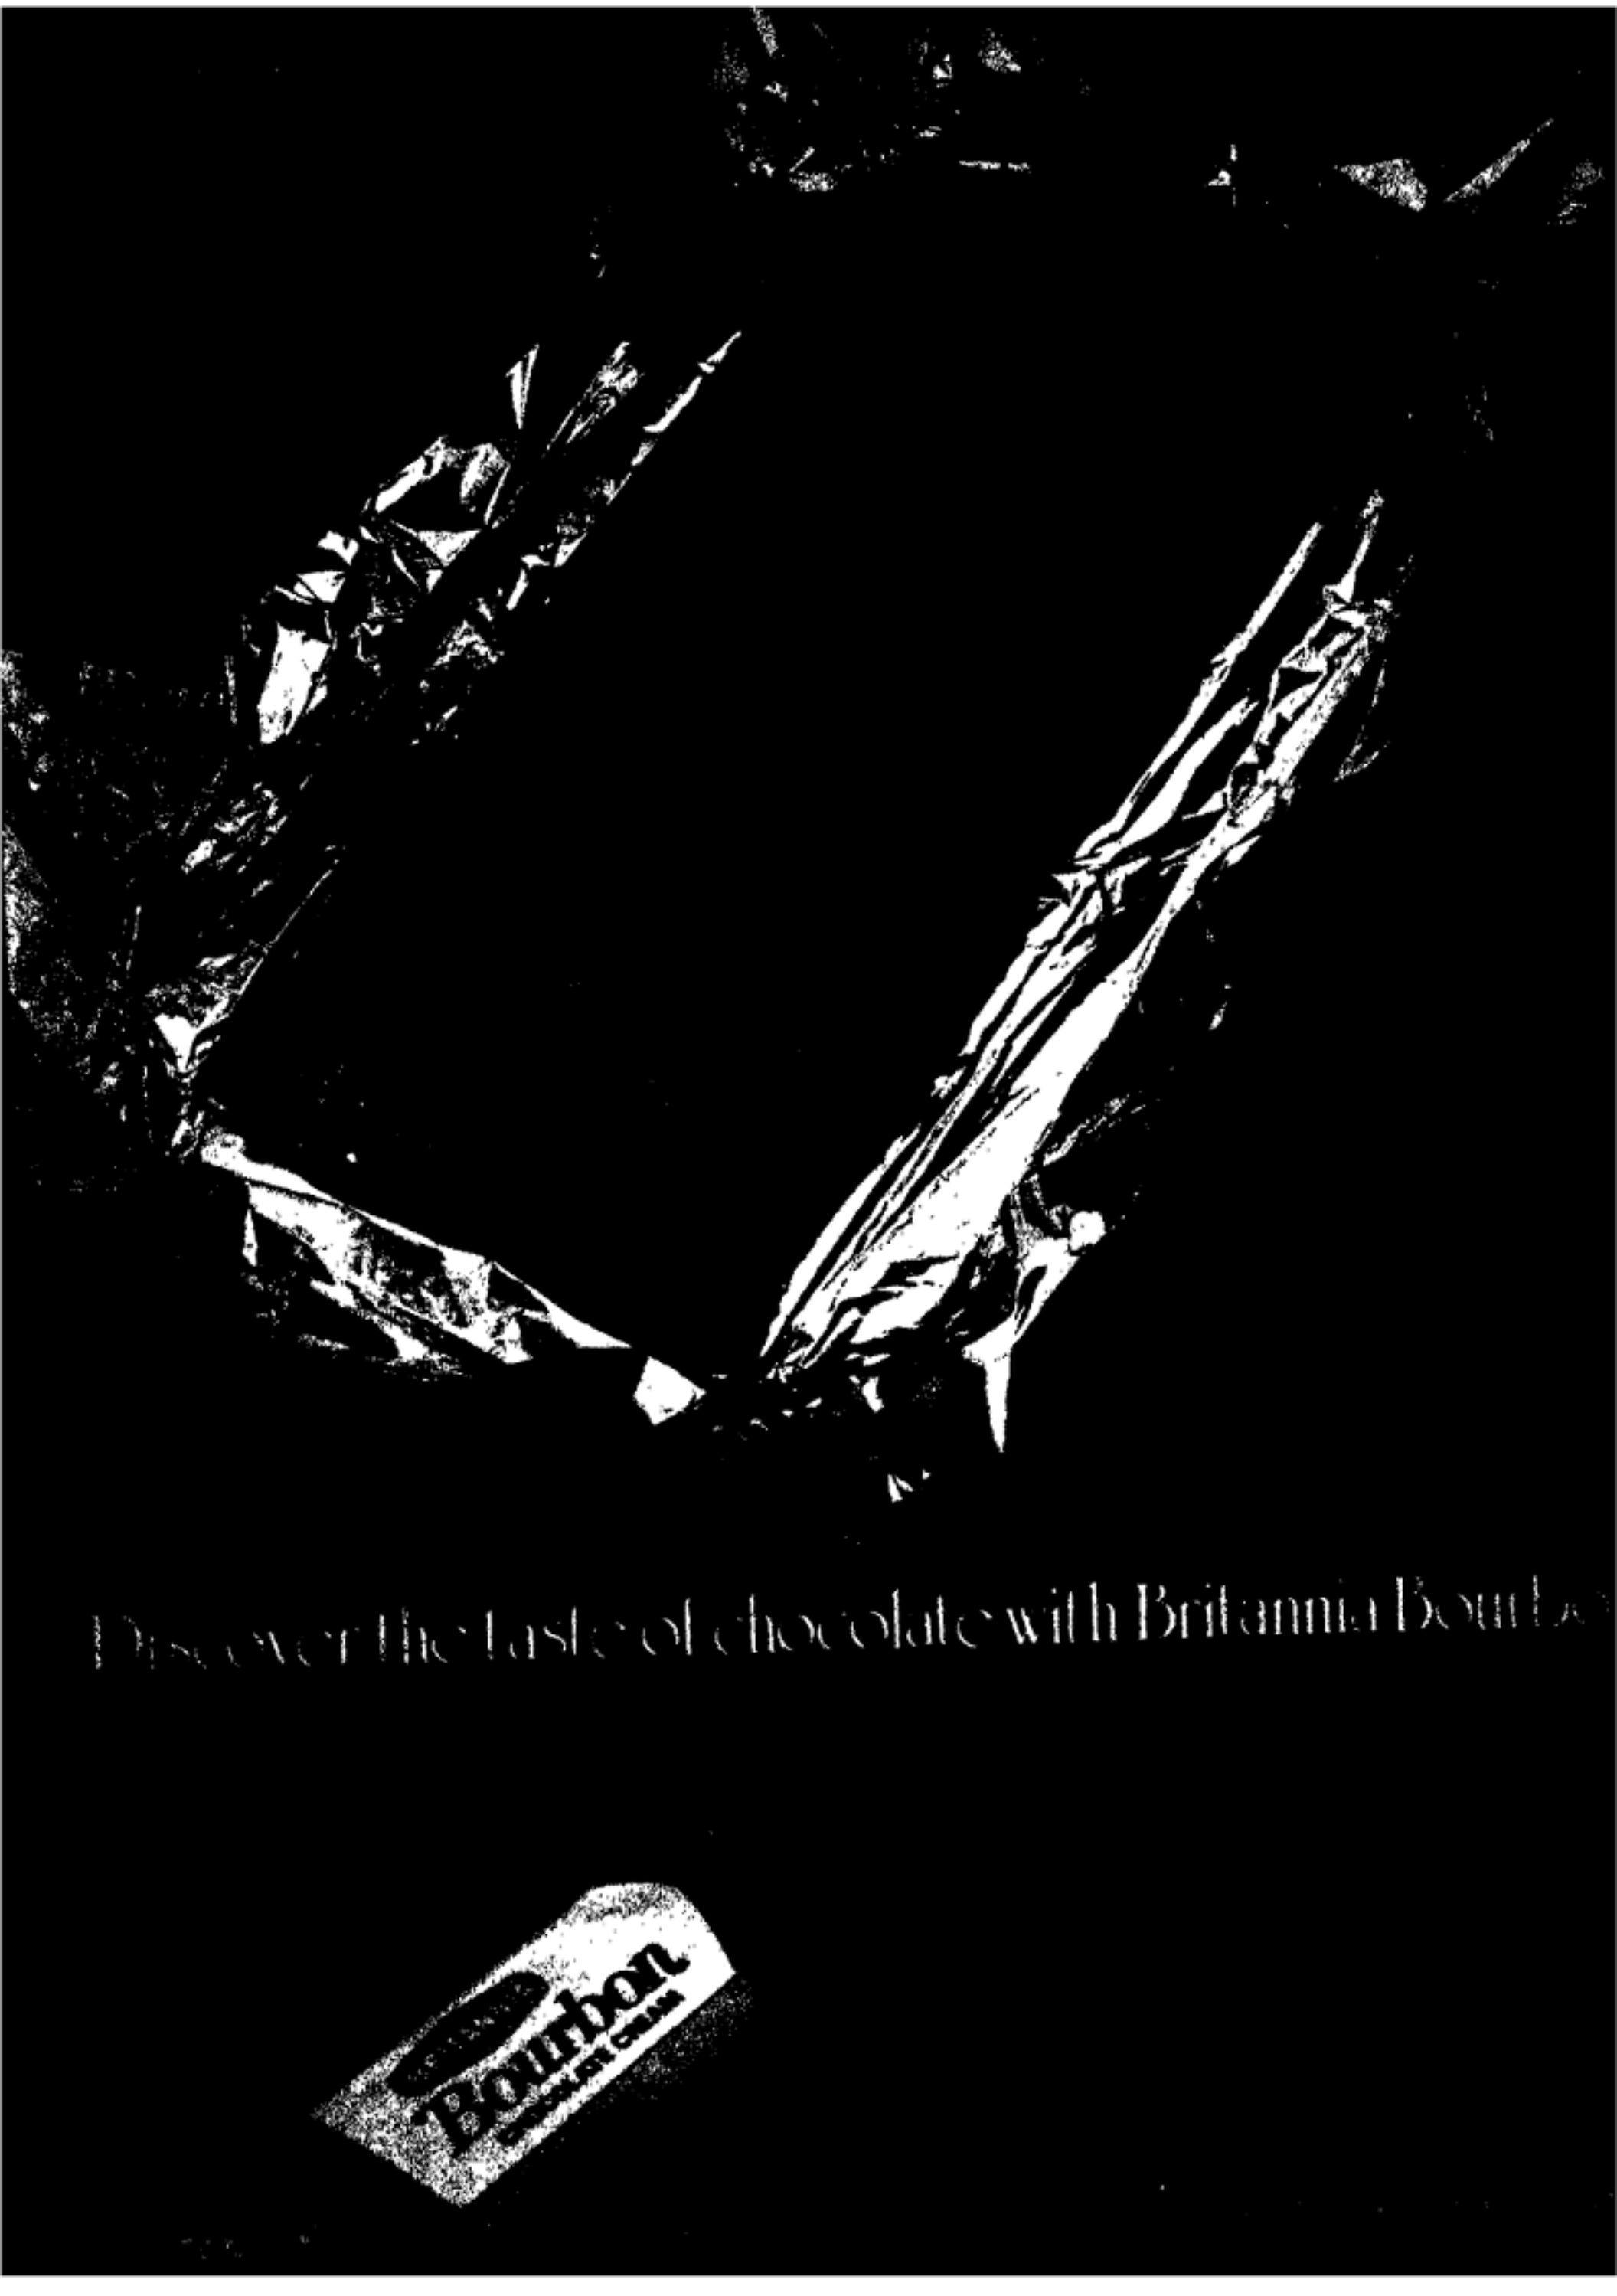
The eclipse was even more bitter since many of his followers from the state also failed to secure tickets. To rub it in, his rivals within the Congress(I), Veerappa Moily and K. H. Patil, whom he had bossed over for years, secured tickets for themselves and their supporters. Known for his inane mirth, Gundu Rao had once said that not even his "dead body would serve under any other chief minister." But the party high command has made sure that Gundu Rao will not come anywhere near a ministership, let alone be the chief minister.

The immediate reason for the axing of Gundu Rao is that the Congress(I) would like to project a clean image in the coming elections. But there is an obvious fallacy in the explanation since both Gundu Rao's rivals, Veerappa Moily and K. H. Patil have a public image that is only marginally better than Gundu Rao. Moily was part of the infamous "tape scandal," while Patil was involved in a tax raid that was never fully explained. Both of them played a subversive role in the two years the Janata Party was in power in their anxious bid to grab the reigns of power. All through their attempts Gundu Rao remained circumspect.

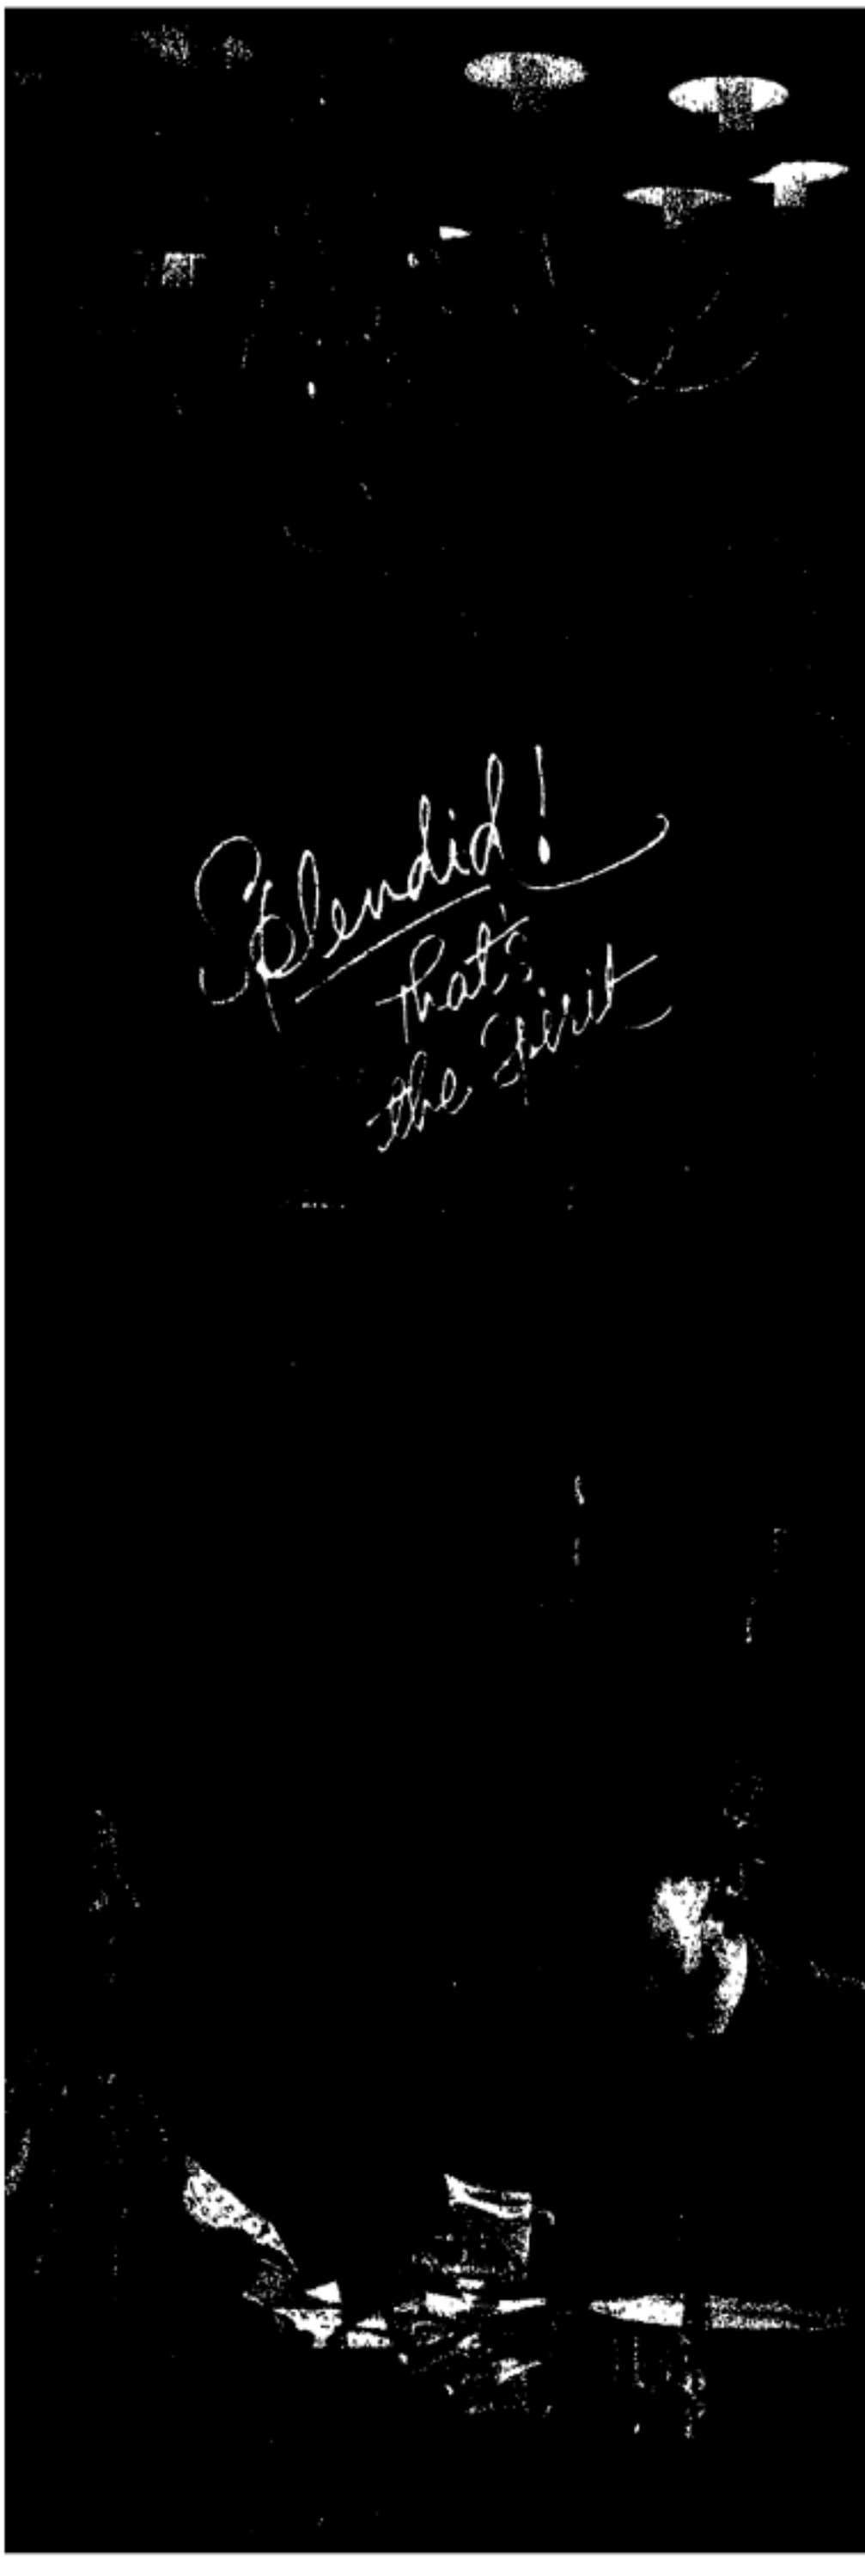
But Gundu Rao's albatross was F. M. Khan. Since the Seventies, Gundu Rao and Khan have been close friends. When Khan was expelled from the Congress(I) last year, Gundu Rao never really came out with a denouncement of his old friend, which would have pleased the party higher ups. Instead, he unsuccessfully tried to fight Khan's case and get the expulsion revoked.

Another reason why Gundu Rao was refused a ticket is the lack of control the former chief minister exercised over his tongue. Though Gundu Rao has sobered over the past two years, he is still known to make reckless statements, especially in front of a large audience. On public platforms, he is often the subject of mirth and he projects a negative image.

Gundu Rao's political career is now at the cross roads. He has not gone the Antulay or Khan way, but he is not favourably placed like Jagannath Mishra. The state Congress(I) now awaits his next step. But he still has considerable clout within the party in the state, but whether he will chance his arm against Rajiv Gandhi is yet to be seen. Even on the last day for filing nominations, there was no sign of a revolt either by Gundu Rao or his supporters who were denied tickets. Gundu Rao himself did not return to Bangalore, preferring to sulk in Delhi. But he may be biding his time.



The Congress(I) high command also denied a ticket to another powerful dissident leader, H. C. Srikantiah. This was an obvious punishment for Srikantiah's stringent campaign against the state Congress(I) leadership and his alleged links with the Janata Party. But at least some of his followers have been given tickets. Even though the Congress(I) made some sweeping changes while nominating large number of new faces in Karnataka, they have not hesitated to bypass the guidelines set for the selection of candidates. Political expediency and pragmatism is alive and well in the Congress(I), even under the new Prime Minister.



Chidanand Rajghatta, Bangalore.

Durgaprasad

Gundu Rao

Discover the taste of chocolate with Britannia Bourbon
Bourbon

DELUXE

Splendid!
That's the Spirit

RICH MATURE MELLOWS
TO BLEND SMOOTHLY WITH YOUR STYLE

BIHAR

Congress(I) Divided Before Polls

Many sitting MLAs to contest against party nominees

On the eve of the Assembly elections, the Congress(I) in Bihar hardly looks the picture of a house united. Following the denial of party tickets to over 70 sitting MLAs, including seven ministers and the Speaker of the Assembly, Radhanandan Jha, more than 20 MLAs have already quit the party and many more are expected to join them. Some of those who have left the party will either be fighting the elections as independent candidates or on the symbols of other parties. The resignations would not have posed as big a threat to the ruling party had it not been for the fact that they have the blessings of some senior leaders who are still in the party and fighting elections as the ruling party's candidates.

The rebels were led by Raghunath Jha, the powerful minister in the former chief minister Jagannath Mishra's cabinet. He submitted his resignation with the signatures of 12 MLAs to the state party chief Bindeswari Dubey, protesting against the "arbitrary" selection of candidates. After the efforts of Dr Jagannath Mishra failed to get his men renominated to contest the elections, he, it is believed, gave them the green signal to quit the party. Shortly after Dr Mishra's return from Delhi on 7 February Mr Jha announced that he had resigned from the party along with 12 other MLAs and immediately got in touch with the Janata Party. Though the Janata Party was divided on the issue, Raghunath Jha and others including Rajo Singh, another Mishra supporter, managed to get an assurance from the Janata Party leaders that they would be granted the party's symbol to contest the elections.

This was followed by a defiance of the party whip by over 35 MLAs during the byelection to the Rajya Sabha on 11 February. (Of the 194 MLAs, only 156 were present during voting in the Assembly though the party had issued a whip for all MLAs to be present.) And among those who did not vote that day was Dr Mishra who was busy conferring with his supporters who were sulking at having been denied party nominations.

The criteria adopted by the party for allotting tickets were not clear. It was initially believed that young members with clean images, who were not related to sitting MLAs would be considered for nominations. About sitting legislators it was said that the Lok Sabha results in the legislators' Assembly segment would decide his fate. This meant that MLAs of the constituencies where the Congress(I) had a lead over the opposition would be given tickets. But these guidelines were not strictly followed. Ramashray Prasad Singh, an efficient minister, was denied a ticket on the ground that the Congress(I) Lok Sabha candidate at Jehanabad had lost to the CPI. However, what was not mentioned was the fact that the party had established a lead of over 10,000 votes in Mr Singh's Assembly segment. Moreover, Mr Mahendra Prasad, a defeated party candidate was elected to the Rajya Sabha, which according to many party leaders was due to the special efforts of Mr M.L. Fotedar. Similarly, Mr Braj Kishore Singh, the minister of state for health, was replaced by his 80-year-old father at Madhuban.

Jagannath Mishra DV Jayner

But perhaps the most humiliated Congressman was the Speaker, Mr Radhanandan Jha who was denied a ticket for his Madhepur constituency, and was instead replaced by his son, Raghubar Jha. But within hours his son too was replaced by Harkhu Jha. This was probably because of Mr Jha and his son's names had been dragged into the infamous "Bobby" case in 1982. Others like minister of state Karuneshwar Singh and Dudhnath Paswan, a sitting MLA whose names had also figured in the same case have been denied party tickets. (The CBI has, however, dismissed the investigation of the Patna police involving them.)

The education minister, Nagendra Jha, was denied a ticket because the party's Lok Sabha candidate, Harinath Mishra had lost in Darbhanga as well as in Nagendra Jha's Manigachi Assembly segment. Another minister to be denied a ticket is Jagnarain Trivedi even though he had helped in the victory of the party's candidate, K. K. Tiwari, in Buxar during the Lok Sabha elections.

Buddhadeo Singh, another minister was dropped though the chief minister earlier refused to drop him when his name was being mentioned in a murder case last year. The deputy minister Ranjit Sinha was also dropped on the allegation of Dr C.P. Thakur, a party MP from Patna, that he had worked for Lt Gen S.K. Sinha (Retd) during the Lok Sabha elections. Similarly, the chief minister himself was cleared in the last moment.

There were also rumours that the list was being reviewed and that there were to be more changes which increased the confusion in the party. Sadaquat Ashram, the state party headquarters remained under siege as the supporters of those denied tickets squatted there for hours. The PCC(I) chief and the chief minister were gheraoed and in some cases, the pressure tactics succeeded. Ashwini Kumar Sharma, the sitting MLA from Lakhisarai who was not in the first list got through in the second one after about 1,000 of his supporters came from Lakhisarai and gheraoed the chief minister. A beaming Mr Sharma came out of the chief minister's room and was seen being patted on his back by the CM.

Nagendra Jha, the education minister, however, said he would abide by the party's decision. "The party knows that we are the Congress people and we cannot go anywhere," he said. The party also gave tickets to people who have not worked in their constituencies. For instance, the PCC(I) vice-chairman L.N. Jha got a ticket from Jalle though he wanted to stand from Madhubani. But all candidates lack clean records. Mrs Mala Devi, a party candidate from Fatuha constituency has a warrant issued against her under Section 86 of the Criminal Penal Code. Sagir Ahmed who was dropped from the Jagannath Mishra ministry after his name was involved in smuggling cases, was given a nomination. Similarly, relatives of sitting members were also nominated. The husband of Mrs Prabhawati Gupta MP was given a ticket. Ram Lakhan Singh Yadav whose son is an MP was also given a ticket.

Yadunraj Gidwani, Patna

JANATA PARTY

A Crippling Blow

Senior leader resigns in protest in Gujarat

The Janata Party in Gujarat was further weakened in the last week of January with the resignation from the party of Mr Ghanshyam Oza, a former chief minister and thrice Member of Parliament. Although Mr Oza was never openly identified as a dissident belonging to the Parivartan group of the former finance minister, Mr Dinesh Shah, his resignation came within a week after Mr Shah left the party. A number of party workers left along with him.

Their departure has demoralised the Janata Party workers, especially those who once belonged to the old Congress. Although these leaders have not publicly stated the reasons behind their resignations, their actions seemed to be a protest against the dominance of the Patel lobby in the state Janata Party. The party leadership has been trying to reduce the impact of the resignations by remaining silent on the issue, but it was clear that the party leadership had been taken by surprise. Talking to SUNDAY, Mr Oza repeated Mr Shah's statements saying he had not acted because of political ambitions nor was he contemplating joining the Congress(I). But it has become increasingly clear that the dissidents in the Janata Party, annoyed with what they called "plummeting credibility of the local leadership" were gradually coming to the conclusion that there was no way but to leave the Janata Party altogether. According to insiders, some more Janata Party men may quit very soon.

The feud between what is known as the Patel lobby, headed by the former chief minister, Mr Chimanbhai Patel, and old Congressmen like Mr Oza and Mr Shah is not a new one. The diehard old Congressmen have never accepted the entry of Mr Chimanbhai Patel, who was ousted as chief minister in 1974 by the Nav Nirman agitation against corruption in public life. They had never thought that Mr Chimanbhai Patel would rise in stature in the Janata Party and threaten to capture its leadership, which is what he has done in the last four years.

However, it was only Mr Babubhai Patel, Janata chief minister between 1975 and 1980 who dissociated himself from the Janata Party about three years ago, seemingly in protest against the entry of "doubtful elements." Those who stayed on realised later that the Patel lobby was growing in strength Matters came to a head before the election for state party president a year ago when Mr Indubhai Patel's candidature was supported by the Patel lobby against the wishes of old Congressmen including former Prime Minister Morarji Desai. Mr Chimanbhai Patel and his group threatened that if Mr Indubhai Patel who had already completed two terms in office was replaced, Mr Chimanbhai Patel himself would stand for elections. The dissidents felt it would be better to have Mr Indubhai Patel as "a lesser evil" and agreed to a compromise. The accord between the two groups, according to the dissidents, was that Mr Indubhai Patel would resign after two months in office in favour of a candidate amenable to all sides.

Mr Indubhai Patel later claimed that there was no such understanding and refused to quit. In September last year, one more attempt at a compromise was made after the dissidents grouped themselves into a forum named Parivartan. They published a charter of demands calling for "a reassertion of standards of cleanliness in public life." The Patel lobby accepted the charter, passed a resolution at the Patel lobby-dominated Janata State Council lauding the call for a return of the spirit of 1977. But, according to the dissidents, it remained only on paper.

The Lok Sabha electoral accord among the Janata Party, the BJP and the DMKP left the dissidents further disillusioned. A noted dissident leader, Mr Motibhai Choudhary, the lone sitting MP of the opposition from Gujarat, who was elected from Mehsana was denied a ticket because this "safe" seat was allotted to the BJP. "The Patel lobby conspired to deny tickets to both Mr Choudhary and Mr Oza who wanted to contest from Surendranagar, to ensure that whatever happened they did not go to Parliament," said a dissident leader.

Ghanshyam Oza

Mr Oza who was a minister in the former state of Saurashtra right from 1950 has been a public worker with a clean image. The 73-year-old Mr Oza was made the chief minister of Gujarat in 1972 by Mrs Indira Gandhi when the state Congress party won a landslide victory at the polls but could not decide who should be the chief minister. He was at that time the minister of state for industrial development and his rivals in Gandhinagar averted the leadership war for a while. But in 1973, Mr Chimanbhai Patel engineered a coup of Congress legislators against Mr Oza to become chief minister himself. Many observers feel that the toppling of Mr Oza began the feuds in the Congress party. In less than a year, Mr Patel himself was ousted as a result of the Nav Nirman agitation.

Recently, Mr Oza was critical of the way in which the Congress(I) installed Mr Rajiv Gandhi as Prime Minister after the death of Indira Gandhi but has become an admirer of the young Prime Minister after Mr Gandhi began his crusade against corruption, inefficiency and indiscipline in public life. He said it was vital for democracy to have a healthy opposition but unfortunately, no major party nor an individual leader has emerged. In Gujarat, the credibility of the present leadership of the Janata Party is on the decline. The Congress(I) in Gujarat, according to him, is full of corruption and other evils. But, Mr Oza hoped, the Congressmen would strive to get rid of these under the leadership of Mr Rajiv Gandhi.

Mr Oza felt that the opposition had to adopt a three-pronged strategy put forth by the Sarvodaya worker and associate of late Vinoba Bhave, Vimalatai. This involved abjuring the path of perpetual confrontation, cooperation wherever possible and an alertness to protect the democratic rights of the people. As such, these ideas are not new, but now such a bold outburst by Mr Oza, just before the Janata Party fights the Congress(I) in the state Assembly polls due on 5 March, cannot but harm the party.

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

EDUCATION

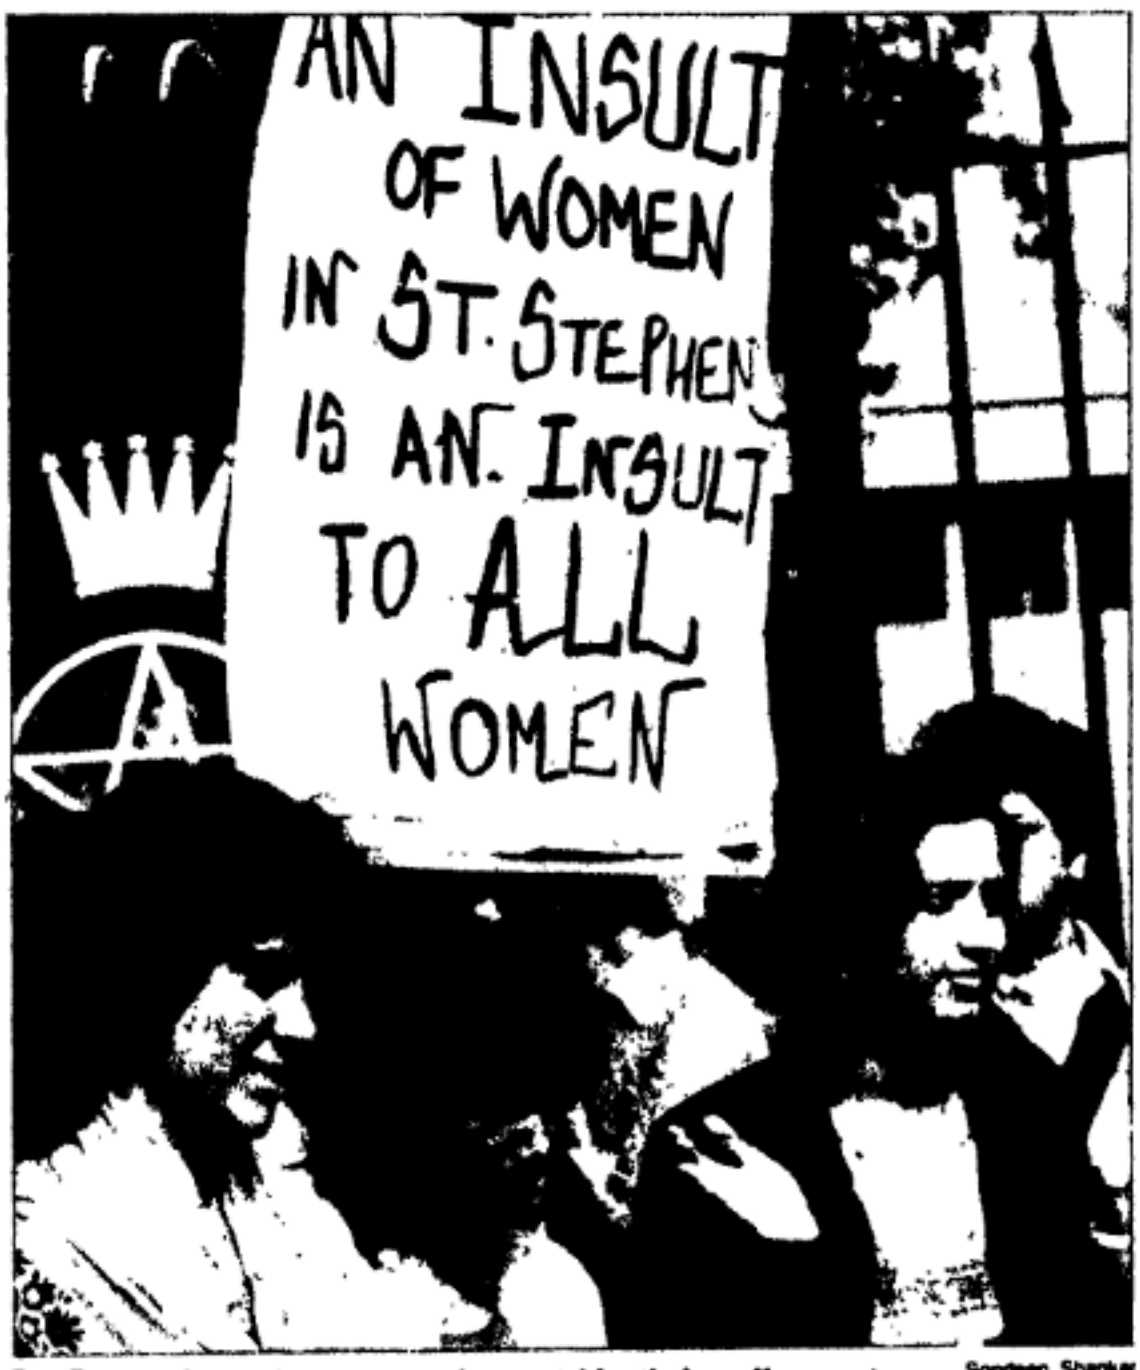
St. Stephen's Male Chauvinists

Female students of the college are up in arms

Two T-shirts and an undergarment are hardly things that can spark off a controversy. But when they belong to ladies and are hung for public viewing on the high cross of a chapel in a place like Delhi's prestigious St. Stephen's College, they can make a bit of history. Which is exactly what happened on the morning of 31 January, the day Arun Shourie lectured in the college about "Gandhi's ways and ours." To add to that were obscene slogans on the walls of the ladies common room which had been broken open to obtain the two sky-blue T-shirts and the white undergarment swaying on top of the cross. Within hours the entire campus of Delhi University was in uproar.

A group of irate girls, on learning what the boys had done, took a shrill procession to the office of the principal, Mr John Hala and while the campus was still descending on St. Stephen's, Nandita Narain, a lecturer of mathematics in the college and an active campus feminist, informed the press. At this point the situation went out of control. Boys of the college, including a Rhodes scholar, gave the press a hostile reception. Some were abused, others roughed up, film exposed by photographers there was snatched away. Mr Hala did not intervene. He said the press had no right to interfere in a "family matter." Mr P.K. Dwivedy, the dean of students welfare of the college, expressed pride at what his boys had done.

The next morning St. Stephen's College was on the front pages of the capital's dailies. For an institution that shies away from anything that can be controversial (St. Stephen's is not officially a member of the Delhi University Teachers Association nor does it participate in the Delhi University Students Union elections) it was an uncomfortable time. In fact, so concerned and nervous was newly-appointed principal Mr Hala about the "reputation" of the college that in one letter which he wrote during the days of the row, he marked all the dates as 1984 instead of 1985.



His college was a sight to see. Entry of outsiders into the premises was banned by Mr Hala on 1 February and it was surrounded by jawans of the CRPF and the helmeted riot-police. Inside, the authorities imposed what some Stephenians called "martial-law." Talking or moving in groups was banned, loitering around on the lawns prohibited and the girls were asked to keep "either to their classes or the library." There was also a kind of semi-official censorship. Students were "advised" not to talk about the incident, specially to "outside agencies." For some days St. Stephen's College was known as the "campus-cantonment."

St. Stephen's had been a male bastion of the Delhi University till 1975 when the late W.S. Rajpal, then principal of the college, decided to open the gates for ladies: a step that is said to have been unpopular specially with the staff whom principal Rajpal did not take into confidence. It was a society of males and with the arrival of the women, it became male-dominated. How else could something as noxious as "chick-charts" have become an "accepted custom?" Boys regularly pinned up on the college notice-boards the names of "ten Stephenian beauties" along with their vital statistics. It was a corridor-norm but never received any official opposition.

The opposition came finally from the girls themselves, from a militant group that had emerged after the infamous "holi-incident" of 1980 when a group of "revellers" molested a girl-student. They protested regularly but the staff took no action. When, after a spate of such "chick-charts" in November last year, the girls made an organised protest, the boys said they lacked a sense of humour. Even after the 31 January incident, the boys stuck to their guns. A meeting of resident students and senior staff members was organised on 1 February but those who tried to speak for the ladies were "shouted down" and there were a lot of indirect hints that things were not going to change too much. Even though under pressure from the campus and the press, the authorities ordered an enquiry into the incident and three boys were expelled from the hostel, the male Stephenians refused to bow down. On the day the clothes were hung on the chapel cross, P.K. Dwiwedy confronted the press insisting that "no woman has been victimised." Instead, girls who had spoken to reporters were singled out and threatened with expulsion.

But the girls were in no mood to compromise. With the support from other women's and students' organisations, they have organised several demonstrations protesting against harassment and the "history of victimisation of women in St. Stephen's"

Sudarshan Thakur, New Delhi

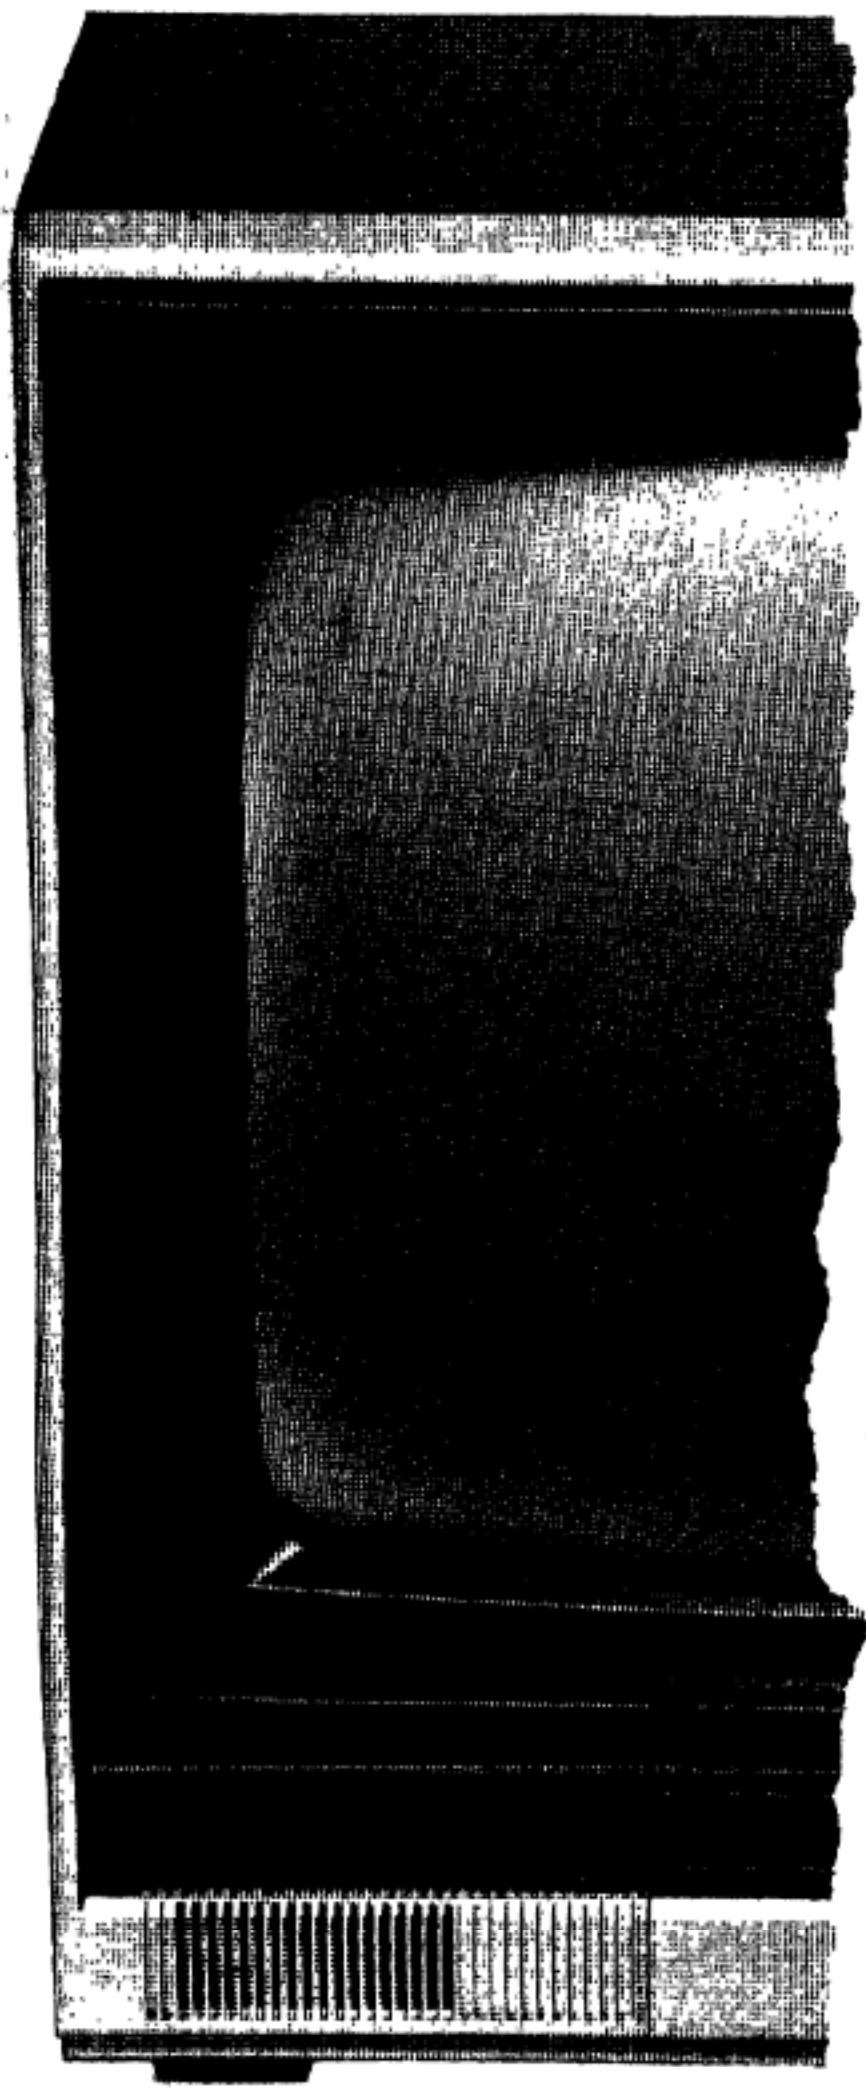
St. Stephen's students protesting outside their college gate — Sandeep Shankar

If you've already bought your colour TV, better don't read this ad

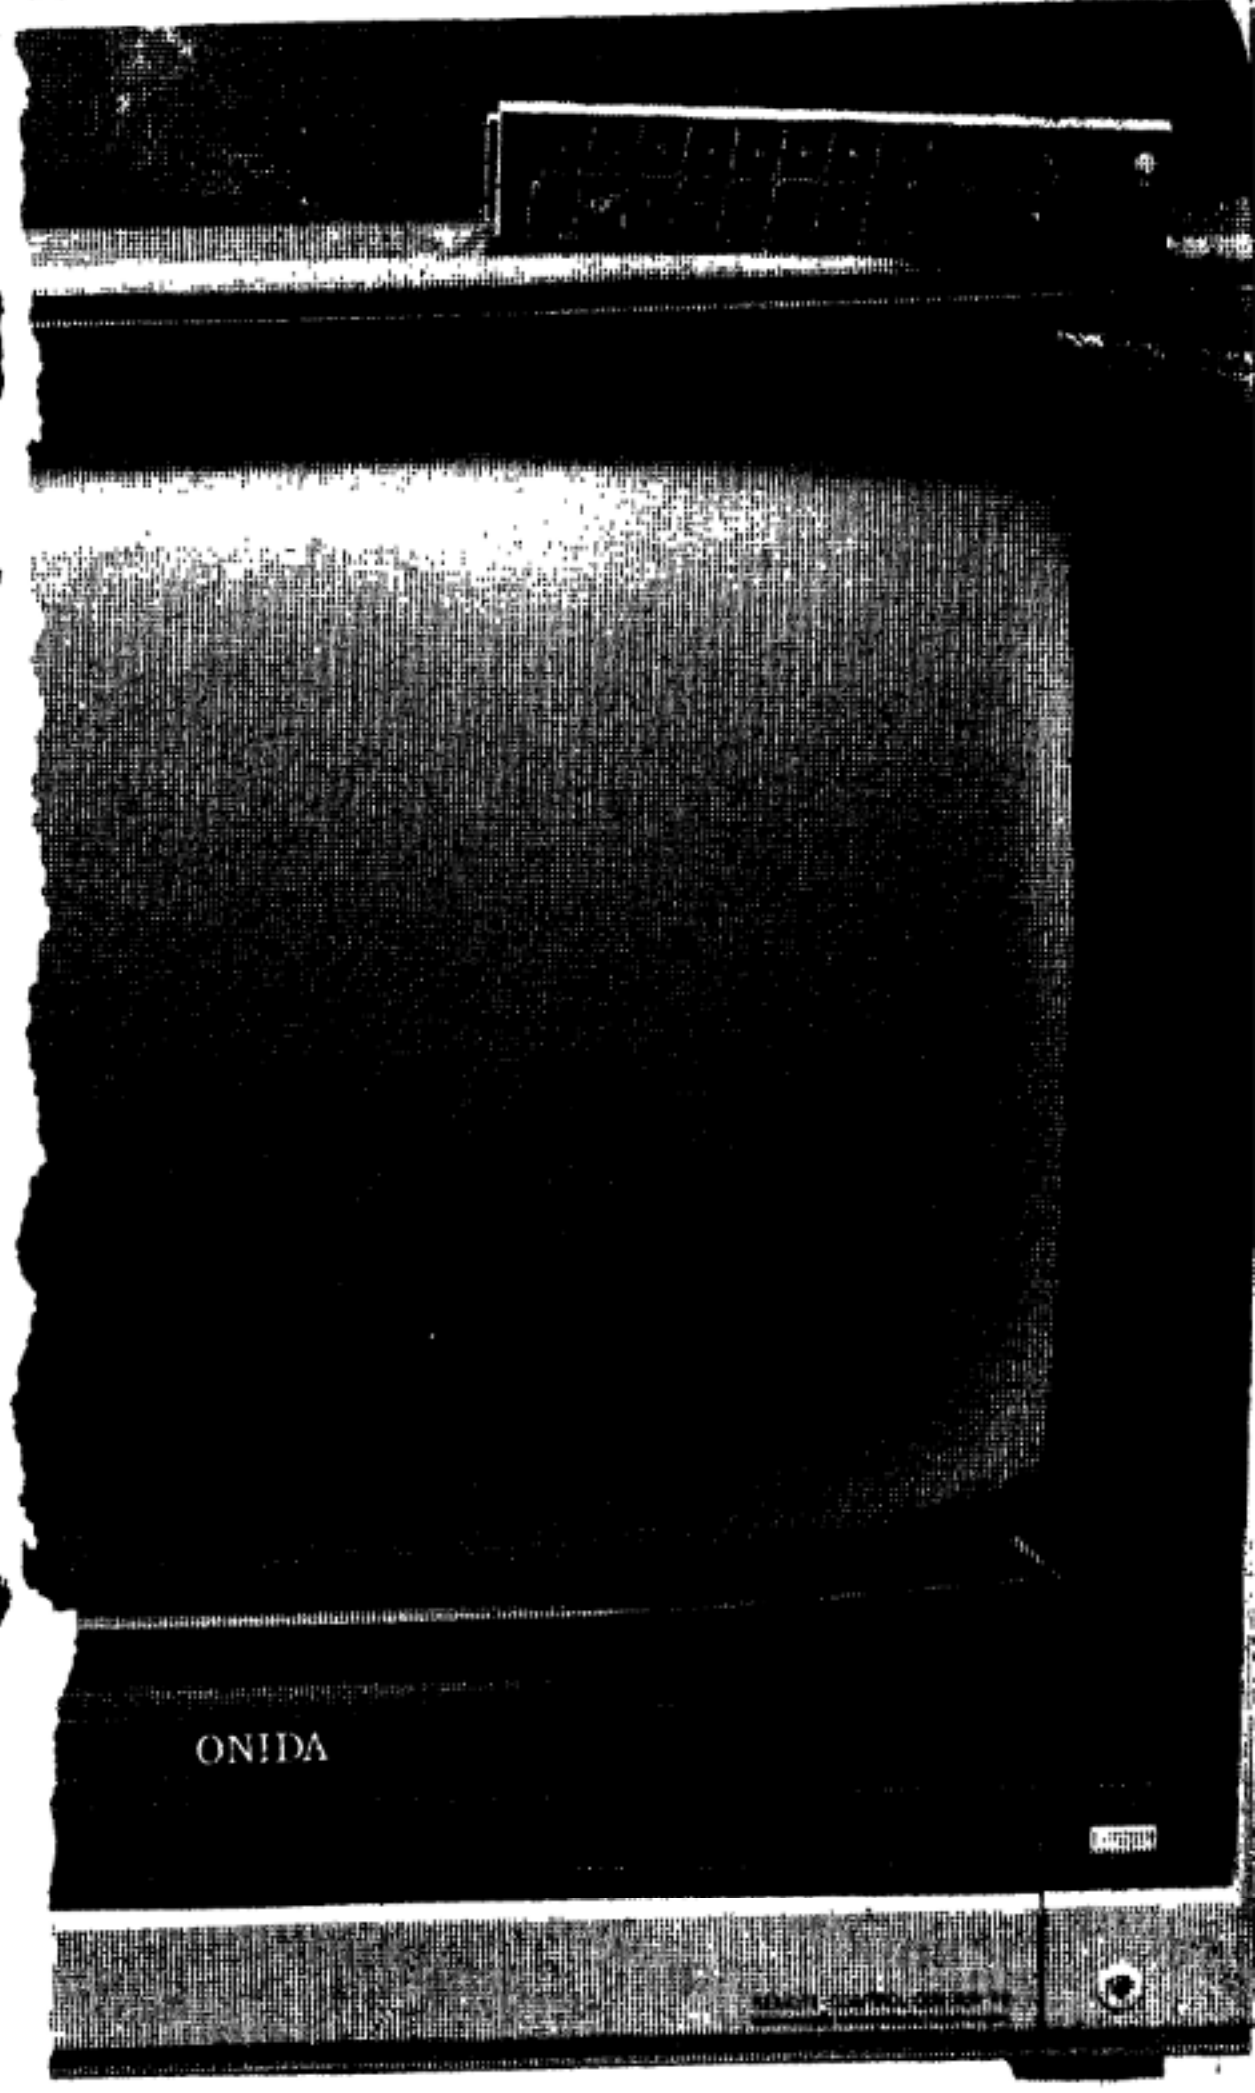
Because this communication is exclusively for those who've been patient and discerning enough to have waited for the very best colour TV. For others, who've quite rightly bought the lesser brand, this ad could only be cruel to envy and frustration.

Because ONIDA holds the key to true colour. The picture white as it is in real life colour TV can achieve. And any dealer worth his weight will tell you that ensures the exact natural proportions of colours without red-faced distortions or washouts.

Because only ONIDA has just touch-button, microprocessor controlled circuit for sleeker looks, easier operation, and most important, amazingly sharp picture.



Because while all other colour TV sets continue to look the same with panels at the side, ONIDA has an obviously classy and futuristic design.



Because ONIDA has an Electronic Memory, for presetting channels and an on-screen display of channel and volume.

And because ONIDA has many more features to pleasantly surprise you at every turn.

Now tell us, weren't we right about who should read this ad and who shouldn't?

ONIDA is the Authorized Service Centre of JVC Japan. In case you want more details rush to the nearest Dealer.

20"colour TV with cord less remote.

ONIDA It's been worth waiting!

Avenues Ad

THE SIKHS

The Nightmare Continues

Widespread indifference to measures to rehabilitate victims

The six-member Uttar Pradesh Sikh Relief and Rehabilitation Committee which visited riot-affected areas of the state to assess the progress of official rehabilitation measures has returned to Lucknow, bitterly disappointed. Despite the Prime Minister's well meaning assurances, Sikhs in the state continue to be ill-treated expecially by policemen and politicians. The committee is unhappy with the amounts fixed for compensation to riot victims which besides being grossly inadequate vary widely, specially in Kanpur which saw the worst of the rioting and the rest of the state.

Many people said that they were surprised to find that they were not even entitled to any compensation because they could not produce FIRs. "Does the administration realise that at the time of the violence, Sikhs were as terrified of the police as they were of the rampaging mobs and, even if they picked up the courage to go to the police stations, the police refused to register their complaints," said Jagjit Singh Chandok, the committee's general-secretary. "It is true that the DIG has gone to Punjab to persuade those who have migrated, to come back but that is not enough because low-ranking policemen are still humiliating Sikhs," he added, but cautioned this correspondent from writing about such humiliation for fear of the consequences.

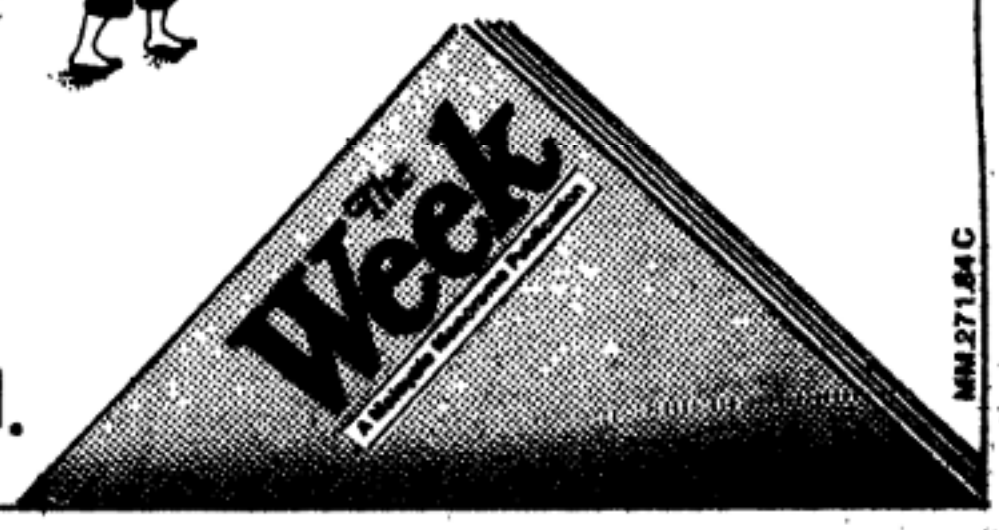
Mr Chandok gave the example of a Sikh dhaba owner in Lucknow who was abused by a police sub-inspector for asking him to pay for his food. In most places, landlords do not want Sikh tenants and Sikh tenants who fled from their rented flats are being refused entry by the landlords. At Lalitpur in Nawabganj, Gonda district, the landlords have even forcibly taken possession of shops from Sikh shopkeepers. Mr Chandok also cited the case of a Sikh family who live in a small three-roomed house in Bhola Khera in the Krishnanagar police station area and who are at the mercy of thieves who come daily to their house, break open doors and windows and walk away with whatever they can lay their hands on. "The police are of no help and the Sikhs are vastly outnumbered in their localities and are still very insecure," Mr Chandok said. According to him, the government was paying up to Rs 2,000 for each house that had been burnt, looted or damaged in Kanpur, although actual damages far exceed that amount since a large number of VCRs, TV sets, cars and scooters were looted from the houses.

A shop belonging to a Sikh looted after Mrs Gandhi's assassination

For shops, it is more or less a flat rate of Rs 17,000. However, in Lucknow, the district magistrate is allocating only Rs 500 to Rs 1,000 for houses and the Rs 17,000 compensation for shops which is insufficient in any case is not being given to everyone. For the dead, Rs 20,000 is being given, according to the old government norm relating to communal riots but this is only being given to persons who have recorded complaints in police stations. Disbursal of payments is also progressing slowly. A Sikh gentleman who wanted to remain unnamed complained. "They (the officials) are sending us from one department to another and now they are saying there is no money." Red-tapism has become a major difficulty for insurance claimants and for getting soft loans from banks. However, only five per cent of the Sikhs, mostly the affluent sections, are covered by insurance.

When asked what the damage for the whole of Uttar Pradesh was, a spokesman of the committee said that the losses suffered in Kanpur alone amounted to nearly Rs 30 crores. Of this, the damages to schools and gurdwaras was Rs one crore, damages to shops and houses Rs seven and a half crores each, damages to cinema halls and factories Rs one crore and Rs seven crores, respectively. Commercial vehicles including 250 insured trucks and buses (yet to be totally computed) and private vehicles including 250 cars and 400 scooters were over Rs 4.25 and Rs 1.22 crores respectively.

These figures mentioned in a letter from the Sikh Relief and Rehabilitation Committee, Kanpur, addressed to the union agriculture minister, Mr Buta Singh were apparently based on written records and documents and hence deflated. According to a spokesman of the Sikh Relief and Rehabilitation Committee, Lucknow, their estimate of the total loss suffered by the community in Uttar Pradesh would be twice the figure of Kanpur and roughly Rs 60 crores.



The committee which was finalising its report after it had held discussions with sangats (groups) all over the state revealed a number of incidents which had occurred during the riots in Chillawan under the Sarojini Nagar police station. Eight members of a family were burnt alive at about 10 am on 2 November 1984. Sadly, the head of the family "Bhapaji" Surjit Singh had gone to the police

Never a dull Week

Through The Week, you can follow every move on the political chessboard. But that's not all. In the pages of The Week you'll meet every type of person.
From the most talked of world leader to your best loved comic characters.

Read about The Week correspondent's harrowing experience on board a hijacked Indian Airlines flight. Or a balanced, unbiased analysis of the LIC-Escorts story. Meet the amazing ninetythree-year-old Raghavendra Swamiji — doctor, wrestler and 'beggar'. Or enter the haunting, mellifluous world of Pankaj Udhas, renowned ghazal singer.
You'll find them all in The Week. People and events that make news. Brought to you with in-depth analyses. And always ahead of time. So it's hardly surprising that in just two years, The Week's circulation has crossed 1.5 lakhs: something of a record.
Today, more and more people are discovering The Week. And putting their faith in it. Because they know that whatever happens — to their favourite sportsman, to Asterix in Spain, or to Tintin in Tibet — they're bound to read the best of it in the next Week !

Never a Week behind.

NM271.84C

station and recorded a statement after he had been attacked on 1 November when his moped was looted and valuables worth Rs two lakhs were stolen from his house. He had requested the officer-in-charge to save his six children but the police did nothing and a mob broke into his house and burnt the whole family alive. The police who have closed the file and disposed of the bodies now claim that Bhapaji and his family have fled to Punjab.

In Dehradun, a businessman, Mr Rajan, who had used his gun in self-defence against the marauders was taken into custody under Section 302 of the IPC and the National Security Act. He was released after two months and that too after the High Court's statement that the police should reward such persons for defending themselves against criminals. In Haldwani, in the district of Nainital, about 150 shops of the Sikhs were looted and 70 trucks burnt in Allahabad and Rae Bareli. Almost all shops of Sikhs were looted and burnt in Moghalsarai and Varanasi. About 90 shops were looted and trucks burnt in Mirzapur. In Gitapalli, Captain Vohra, a retired army officer was disarmed by the police and handed over to a furious mob. His two sons were also arrested under Sections 302 and 307 of the IPC.

Defending the official relief and rehabilitation measures, Mr Subodh Nath Jha, the Uttar Pradesh relief commissioner said, "We have no problem of money. The government had fixed a budget of Rs two crores. Up to now a total of Rs one lakh 70 thousand has been disbursed, all of which is non-refundable. In addition, Rs 1.5 crores has been given out by the nationalised banks on soft-loan terms (12.5 per cent interest) to the riot-hit area on an earlier borrower preference basis. General insurance companies too have given out between Rs 1.5 to two crores to cover the damages. But what of the allegations of continuing discrimination against Sikhs? Mr Jha said, "Well, peace committees have been set up and I went to Kanpur and visited Sikh gurdwaras. Over Rs seven lakhs have been spent in Kanpur alone. Where Sikhs are isolated and insecure, the army and CRP are on guard, the Union government and the chief minister have assured them of protection. We sent the IG, Mr A.P. Mishra, to Punjab. He spent a week there and convinced 150 of the 350 families who migrated to return." Mr Jha said that the state government had assured Sikhs of 100 per cent safety. "But if in somebody's mind there is still fear and insecurity, it can only be due to their sense of guilt.

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

GYMKHANA CLUB

Heavy Lobbying Before Elections

Arms dealers and soldiers rub shoulders at Delhi club

Normally arms dealers cannot get close to senior defence officials and the top military brass. But this necessary distance in this city of dangerous liaisons, as was revealed in the wake of the spy scandal and Coomar Narain's varied connections, could have been easily bridged during the hectic lobbying for the annual general elections to Delhi's exclusive Gymkhana Club which took place on 9 February.

The first week of February saw a series of parties to introduce air marshal L.M. Katre who was contesting for president and the 16 aspirants to the committee memberships. One of these parties was hosted by Mr Vipin Khanna, an ex-army man now in the arms trade and lives in Greater Kailash. Yet another was held at the house of Bhai Mohan Singh of Ranbaxy, at Aurangzeb Road whose son Dr Parvinder Singh—on that list of 16 is also in the arms trade.

Air marshal Katre is a highly respected man and he was the unanimous choice of the members of the club. But many of them think that the air marshal was misled by some of the members of the previous committee into attending these parties. Hence resentment is increasing in the club. The club members have objected to the growing politicisation of the club: last year saw the beginning of this process when there was heavy canvassing for the outgoing president, Kanwar Natwar Singh, former secretary in the ministry of external affairs and presently minister of steel, who set the precedent of a 16-member slate of candidates (syndicate as the critics call it).

Officials of Air India and the Indian Tourism Development Corporation (ITDC) gave several parties to introduce the aspirants. This year canvassing is outwardly less visible, but some of the members who usually receive little mail suddenly found themselves flooded by letters from the aspirants. Much of the canvassing took place over the telephones and a significant amount during the lunches and dinner sessions.

Last year, pressure was put on three of the candidates who tried to stand for president to withdraw (a cabinet minister and a powerful person in the Prime Minister's office tried some gentle pressure tactics which worked). There was no second presidential aspirant this time. But Mr Vinod Nair, an expert in textile engineering stood for president to protest against the system of a 16-member slate. A member of the club said: "We were quite surprised last year when Mr Natwar Singh announced his cabinet before the elections...."

Although there has been no "arm twisting" for the current elections, many of the club members are perturbed by the polarisation taking place in the club. Some of them have been circulating letters criticising the administration of the club, particularly the induction of members. There are over 9,000 members on the waiting list of the club, many of whom are trying to edge their way in, through the main and side doors. Usually about two members are taken in each month, which means that a non-government applicant would have to wait a hundred years.

Some of the club members have complained that over 100 people were made members out of turn in the "eminent category" during the course of the last year. One of the circulars asks, "How would one explain the induction of a private secretary to a minister, a deputy secretary in the government of India, and a manager of a bank in this category? The eminent category is supposed to include judges of the Supreme and High Court, ministers, secretaries to the government and chairmen of public sector undertakings. Strangely enough in 1984, a deputy general manager of a bank was made a member whereas the waiting list includes several chairmen of banks. Each member of the committee is allowed to induct two members. The circulator states that last year's committee inducted over 900 members whereas the committee of 1983 brought in only less than 200. The politicisation of this club includes the practice of these circulars and whips to vote, according to one of the counter-circulars in what has become a circular war of pamphlets.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

HUMAN RIGHTS

The Princess with the Whip

Arab princess sentenced for assaulting maids

Since the oil-rich Arab princes, princesses, Sheikhs and potentates began to frequent Britain 15 years ago, they have brought a new element on the social scene of this country: not only their habit of throwing away money by way of expensive shopping expeditions and buying expensive properties but more pertinently their feudal ways. One peculiar aspect of this is their cruel treatment of their servants. As a result, from time to time, cases come to light of servants being maltreated, or beaten up by their Arab masters or mistresses, which often end up in British courts.

The latest of such cases was a particularly gruesome one, in which a Kuwaiti princess beat up her two maids—one an Indian and the other, a Sri Lankan—for which she was fined on 4 February 1985, Rs 500 and given a suspended jail sentence in a London court. The judge also ordered the princess, Sheika Faria Sabah (30), to pay Rs 1,250 as compensation to the girls.

Judge Hayman of Knightsbridge Crown Court told the princess: "Your conduct was disgraceful, verging on barbaric. You have escaped a prison sentence by the skin of your teeth." The princess pleaded guilty of whipping the Sri Lankan maid, Mrs Samsul Ariffa (20), with an electric flex and burning her hand by pressing it on a hot plate. She also admitted beating her Indian maid, Mrs Laxmi Swami (40) of Madras and giving her a black eye.

During the trial, the prosecution counsel told the court that the ill-treatment of the two maids came to light way back in July 1983 when a local shopkeeper noticed numerous injuries on Mrs Ariffa: he helped her to escape from her Kuwaiti mistress's house and she took refuge in the Sri Lankan high commission. On the basis of the information given by her, British police raided the house of the Kuwaiti princess in Bayswater and found an electric flex and a riding whip which had been used to beat up the maids. They also found a blood-stained dress belonging to Mrs Ariffa.

The prosecution counsel said that the two maids had been struck frequently for what they considered to be no misdemeanours, such as "looking out of the window or sweeping too slowly." The counsel for the defence ruled that the princess was a "person of some standing in her own country," and had voluntarily returned to Britain twice to attend the proceedings. She had been under stress in bringing up her four children without her husband as well as caring for her sister who was ill. She had also been running her business and a construction company in Kuwait and was thus under considerable strain. The counsel said that things were "very much on top of her."

The two maids are now being looked after by their friends. Mrs Laxmi Swami was not available for comment.

Peter Pendsay, London

MHATRE MURDER CASE

Guilty

Two JKLF men sentenced

A little more than a year after the Birmingham-based Indian diplomat, Ravindra Mhatre, was kidnapped and killed, the Crown Court of the city concerned has reached a conclusion on the crime. In a judgment delivered by Mr Justice Bristow on 7 February, the court sentenced two Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF) activists, Abdul Raja (28) of Paris and Mohammad Riaz (24) of Leicester, earlier found guilty of murder by a jury by a majority verdict of eleven—one, to imprisonment.

However, allegedly the main culprit, Mohammad Musserat Iqbal, who is said to have fired the three shots near a farmhouse in Leicestershire which brutally ended Mr Mhatre's life, has apparently escaped, and is thought to be in Pakistan, which has no extradition treaty with Britain. Two other accomplices, Aslam Mirzan, Riaz's brother, and Azhar Mahmood, are at large and Zubair Ansari, "world" secretary of the JKLF, is also absconding.

It is understood that the British government has requested the authorities in Islamabad to deport Iqbal, Mirzan and Azhar Mahmood. But thus far it has drawn a blank, and it is generally felt that Pakistan is unlikely to cooperate. Indeed, it is gathered that the Pakistan government has already pleaded no knowledge of the whereabouts of the three accused.

Mr Mhatre, a relatively minor functionary in the external affairs ministry, and posted as number two in the assistant high commission in Birmingham, was abducted near his home on the outskirts of the city in February 1984 and silenced two days later. Justice Bristow described the kidnapping and murder as "an act of international terrorism" but "a pretty pathetic operation." It seems that the assailants picked on Mr Mhatre at random and were amateur enough not to tackle a more senior and well-guarded official.

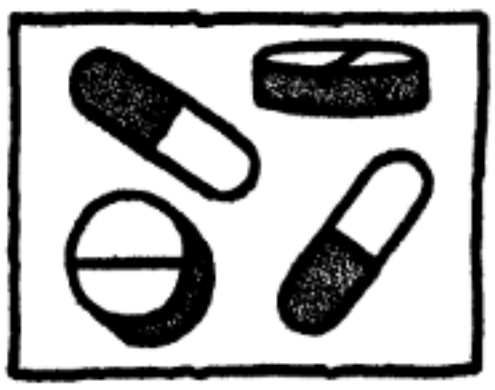
Ravindra Mhatre

There was, however, a motive: to pressurise the Indian government into releasing Maqbool Butt, founder of the Liberation Front in 1968, who was under sentence of death. In fact, Mr Amanullah Khan, chairman of the JKLF, which was formed in Britain in 1977 after its mother party was liquidated and its leaders were arrested, wishfully thinks the plan could have succeeded. "It was due to the very unreasonable attitude of the Indian high commission in the days after Mr Mhatre's abduction that he died," he maintains.

The outcome of the Mhatre case is a matter of some relief to the British government, which has been facing a certain amount of coldness from New Delhi for the former's inactivity pertaining to anti-Indian agitations by British Sikhs, particularly the utterances of the self-styled leader of Khalistan, Dr Jagjit Singh Chauhan. On the other hand, the decree is embarrassing for Pakistan, whose embassy in the United Kingdom has, reportedly, indulged in covert contacts with the JKLF.

Ashis Ray, London

No Threat to Babies



Ultrasonic scans used on pregnant women pose no threat to their babies, according to Lancet magazine. An ultrasound machine uses sound waves to produce a picture of the unborn baby on a screen. It can show multiple pregnancies, possible handicaps and the sex of the child. There have been fears that such scanning could increase the risk of childhood cancers. But two experiments carried out in England prove otherwise. In one study, researchers compared 1,731 children who died of cancer with an equal number who did not. They found that an exposure to ultrasound did not differ between the two groups, and concluded that "ultrasound is safe as regards the risk of childhood cancer." In another experiment, 555 children with cancer were compared with 1,110 healthy children. The observations revealed "no significant association between exposure to ultrasound examination in pregnancy and the risk of childhood cancer."

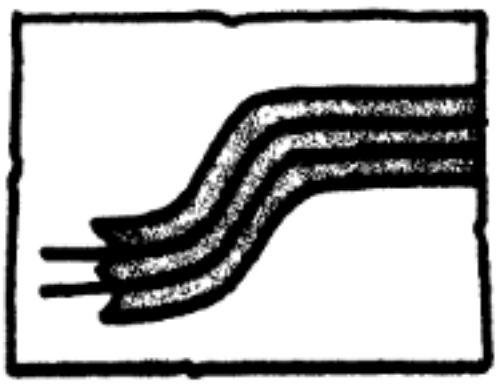
Mobile Unit for Heart Patients

Every year more than 6,000 people in Northern Ireland die from coronary diseases, alarming statistics indeed. This was the main reason why Dr Mahen Varma, a consultant cardiologist at the Erne hospital in Enniskillen, decided to pioneer Britain's first mobile screening unit to check heart patients. The unit is manned by hospital staff who can screen up to four people an hour. Dr Varma explains, "Using the mobile screening unit we felt we could encourage people to come in off the street on a random basis to have a general checkup, especially those people between the ages of 35 and 60 who are most at risk." The unit has screened more than 400 people and, at least, one potential diabetic and a leukaemia patient have been identified. About 25 per cent of those screened had a very high level of blood fats.

Deafening Drugs

Keep away from streptomycin and aspirin: they might make you deaf. Researchers at Keele university in the English Midlands, Britain, are of the view that very strong doses of antibiotics, particularly of the streptomycin family, and large doses of salicylates such as aspirin damage microscopic hairs on the sensory cells in the inner ear, which pick up sounds and transmit them via the nerves to the brain. Dr Carole Hackney, a cell biologist, is attempting to find out how drugs change the inner ear structure and give an insight into how inner ear cells receive and convert sounds. Using special dyes to stain individual nerve cells, the connections of the auditory nerve will be investigated to see how the more central parts of the brain change during deafness.

Karate for Insects



Scientists of the plant protection division of Britain's Imperial Chemical Industries (ICI) group have discovered a new insecticide, which has a high degree of environmental acceptability. Interestingly, the substance has been named Karate, though in UK and certain other countries it will be known by some other name. It controls a wide range of pests, including caterpillars, beetles, weevils aphids (plant lice or greenflies) and other sucking pests. Its major uses are in the control of foliar pests in agriculture and for the control of public health insect pests. Birds, earthworms and bees will not be affected by the insecticide.

The Multipurpose Magnetic Card

In France, the magnetic card (a payment card with a magnetic strip) has been doing wonders. It is possible to pay shopkeepers and stores, hotels, travel agencies, means of transport (trains, car rentals, flights). The business concerned simply has to be affiliated to one of the networks issuing its clients cards. The principle is simple. You give your card to the shopkeeper, for instance, and he prints a bill. The bill is signed and the card returned to the holder. For purchases by correspondence, the (confidential) number on the card is simply written on the back of the order form. Cash can be taken any time, either from automatic cash-dispensers, or from banks. With just one material support, the owner can carry out as many transactions as he likes, according to the balance of his bank account, of course.

Mention must be made of the memory card too, a French invention about a decade old. A microchip is simply inserted inside the plastic card which remains just as slim. It is a complete microprocessor incorporating a calculator and a storage memory. This enables it to be lined up to a central payment unit. The card makes it possible for the bearer to be identified, confidentially and inviolably.

Plastics that Conduct Electricity

Britain's Science and Engineering Research Council is providing over £15,000 for research into certain plastics that have an ability to conduct electricity. Plastics are more usually used as insulators of electricity, for example, a plastic-coated electrical cable. Recent discoveries that plastics conduct electricity are arousing a lot of interest since plastics are tough, light, cheap and can be processed easily. By suitable chemical or electrochemical treatment called "doping," the electrical properties of a number of plastics can be changed from those of a typical insulator to those of a semiconductor like silicon and, ultimately, to that of a true metal.

Illustrations: Prabir Sen

While this gentleman is very much at sea level behind his smile is an aircraft flying 25,000 feet high!

That's overnight Skypak service for you!

There are times, often enough, when we do visualize the reassured and smiling face of a customer whose valuable and urgent document is speeding to its destination on time. And it gives us a lot of satisfaction. Especially when we recall his worried, anxious face when he enquired with us whether it was really, physically possible to meet his deadline!

Speed and dependability. That's the essence of any courier service. And our hallmark. TNT Skypak is one of the largest and most trusted courier service companies in the world. With 26000 people on their toes, in 48 countries!

But being large and resourceful doesn't mean we take things for granted. We still depend on basic human qualities like efficiency and accountability. And care. It's your urgency that seems to lend us wings!

SKYPAK

when it's wanted yesterday!

203, Jolly Bhavan No.2, 7 New Marine Lines, Bombay 400 020 Phone: 253703 294454 Telex. 011 3339 SAI IN

- Ahmedabad: 443053 • Bangalore: 568869 • Baroda. 52285 • Bombay: 294454
- Calcutta: 431660 • Cochin: 69019 • Delhi: 6414830 • Gandhidham: 3414
- Hyderabad: 38237 • Kandla: 7437 • Madras: 475091 • Mangalore: 26226
- Mysore: 30894 • Mapusa: 2440 • Margao. 2447 • Pune: 54595 • Panjim: 5763
- Trivandrum. 65861 • Vasco: 2403

TNT SKYPAK
THE WORLDWIDE COURIERS

...we don't carry non-commercial and personal material.

Avenues SC/ 139/85

VARIETY

THIS INDIA

Illustration: Devadatta Deb

CALCUTTA: The process of governing West Bengal ground to a temporary halt due to a cat and an owl. The owl and the pussycat had taken up residence in Writers' Buildings, the seat of the state government, and their escapades resulted in the suspension of all work. On the night of 29 January the cat scaled the inner wall of the building and slept on a ledge under an airconditioner projecting from the room of the cooperation minister, Mr Nihar Bose. But in the morning it could not get down. By the afternoon of 30 January its plight had moved an official to summon the fire brigade. A fire tender, manned by eight helmeted and gloved firemen, arrived promptly and an impressive ladder was propped against the wall. A fireman rushed up only to find the cat avoiding his reach. Finally, a stick was called for; on seeing it, the cat jumped to the ground and sped off, leaving the fireman stranded sheepishly on top of the ladder. On 29 January itself, the owl did what owls are supposed to do—it slept. However, it chose as its bed the beam across the main entrance to the area. All through the day, curious clerks and newsmen stood staring up at it and held serious discussions on the astrological implications for the Left Front government. The owl, however, remained least bothered—The Telegraph (Jude Mitra, Calcutta)

BANGALORE: Elephants are shrewd creatures no doubt, but have they developed a fascination for studies? A herd of 11 elephants, including two calves, had strayed from a nearby forest. The animals had lodged themselves in a mango grove right behind the R.V. College of Engineering on the outskirts of Bangalore. Though the pachyderms have not threatened the residents of the area as such the people seem to have been unnerved by the sudden landing of so many elephants nearby —The Hindu (C. S. N. Murthy, Bangalore)

THANJAVUR: Anyone driving through the lush green Thanjavur delta, where the Samba harvest is gathering momentum and the Thaladi harvest work is due to begin shortly, will be surprised by the hundreds of red flags fluttering in the fields. The flags have not been planted by any political party. The flags have been put up to indicate that the paddy field is under distraint and that only with the permission of the authorities can the crops be harvested. The large number of red flags indicate that a huge amount of kist is in arrears which total Rs 16 crores—The Hindu (R. Venkatesan, Tiruchirapalli)

NEW DELHI: Does this country, like Holland, have two Prime Ministers, instead of one? That would seem to be the case, according to the New Delhi telephone directory. For in this volume, while Mr Rajiv Gandhi is listed as the Prime Minister in the entries under the PM's secretariat, department of atomic energy and the ministry of electronics, Indira Gandhi continues to be Prime Minister and minister-in-charge in the lists of ministries under the heads 'ocean development, science and technology.' What makes the confusion even more intriguing is the legend: "Corrected up to 30.6.84"—The Times of India (Saroja Simhan, New Delhi)

JAMNAGAR: Blue films appeared on television screens in many drawing rooms here on 24 January, leading to utter surprise and amusement. Inquiries showed that this happened when the local television got tuned in to a short-range transmitter of the naval training institute, INS Valsura, here. While some believed it was a deliberate mischief played by someone in the navy, and demanded a high-level probe, one navy officer reacted sharply, saying that the civilians should have switched off their sets if they did not like the programme—Indian Express (Vibhas Srivastava, Dehradun Cantt)

HYDERABAD: A dental surgeon and a young man were rounded up by the police when they roamed nude in different areas here in the city on 24 January. The doctor was arrested while moving without clothes in Narayanaguda, while the other, a native of Sircilla, was held in Ramkote area—Indian Express (Dhanpatrai Agarwal, Tadepalligudem)

WITHOUT COMMENT

You can abuse me, slander me, call me a defector, but you have no right to take Jammu and Kashmir out of the map of India. That will happen only over my dead body—G. M. Shah, J & K chief minister, in Indian Express

A cabinet of thieves, contractors, rapists and swindlers—Biju Patnaik, on the J. B. Patnaik ministry, in The Telegraph

How can a man who is afraid of even a lizard, work against the country?—Mrs Geeta Narain, on her husband Coomar Narain

Why don't you say that Rajiv Gandhi might end up in my party? Is it strange that leaders of two parties should agree on certain issues or on certain values? Is it necessary that they should differ on every issue?—Ramakrishna Hegde, on the speculation that he would join the Congress(I), in The Week

We deal with India, not with Sikhs—Gen Zia-ul Haq in an interview to Prem Bhatia

Fantasies are realisable—William Kennedy, author of Pulitzer Prize winning novel, Ironweed, in Life

I have very little respect for actors like Amitabh Bachchan. Even a dog wipes the ground with its tail where it sits, but most stars are just parasites of the medium—Om Puri in Cine Blitz

Smita Patil says she is the best. Rekha announces she is the best. You have to make your choice between these two ladies. I am nowhere in the running—Shabana Azmi in Stardust

VARIETY/SUNDAYWEEK

BEGINNING 17 FEBRUARY 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) If you take care of your health, the week ahead promises to be lucky one for all of you On the economic front most of you will gain money or property through an unexpected source Professionals and businessmen will make steady progress The period is also favourable for lovers you can materialise marriage plans. Friends and relatives will contribute to your happiness

Good dates: 18 20 and 22
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 8
Favourable direction: East

LEO (15 August—14 September) Financially, this is not a very good week and unless you keep your expenditure to a minimum, you will run into debts Businessmen should avoid risky ventures However, professionals will make headway during this phase Lovers will also find this period favourable Friends and relatives will keep you busy during the week end Keep a sharp eye on your health and diet

Good dates: 19, 20 and 22
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: West

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) Minor problems may crop up this week but with a bit of diplomacy you can easily overcome them All will be well on the professional and domestic front This is also a good period for artists and sportsmen Students should make the most out of this lucky phase. If you are in love and intending to get married this is the opportune time to do so Watch your health

Good dates: 19 22 and 29
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North-west

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) This is an exceptionally favourable week for those in business investments made during this period will fetch rich dividends in future The phase is equally favourable for professionals a promotion cannot be ruled out For bachelors, this is the ideal time to get married. However, the financial front is not all that encouraging

Good dates: 17, 19 and 21
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 9
Favourable direction: North

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) This is not a good week to solve legal problems Postpone all important plans. Businessmen are advised not to take hasty decisions Politicians should be cautious while dealing with the masses However, this is a good period for those in love and intending to get married but do not get carried away by your emotions. A letter will bring good tidings

Good dates: 20, 21 and 23
Lucky numbers: 1, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: South

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) This is not a good period for politicians and lawyers Businessmen should guard against deception You may lose heavily if you gamble or indulge in speculative ventures However, this is a favourable week for those employed in the public sector Creative artists and sportsmen will also benefit from this lucky phase

Good dates: 17, 20 and 21
Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: West

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) Businessmen and professionals should be wary of enemies. do not take even your close friends and relatives for granted. The period is also bad for lovers avoid adventurous plans and do not take hasty decisions However, the domestic front will provide you with all the inspiration to overcome this bleak period. A journey towards the week end will relieve you of all tensions

Good dates: 19, 21 and 23
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 4
Favourable direction: South-west

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) The stars fortell a bright week for all of you The economic front will look up but avoid extravagance. Businessmen and professionals should not hesitate to undertake responsibilities. At home your children will be a source of joy Friends and relatives will keep you busy throughout the week but do not neglect your work. Your health will deteriorate further.

Good dates: 17, 19 and 20
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: South-east

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) This is not a good week for courtship and marriage negotiations an affair may come to an end Avoid legal disputes during this phase However, this a lucky period for those in government service a promotion is in the offing. At home, the health of your wife is likely to bother you Those above the age of 45 should be extra-vigilant about their health and diet

Good dates: 18, 22 and 23
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: North

CANCER (15 July—14 August) There is good news for those of you who are unemployed a job is in the offing The phase is also favourable for professionals some of you may be posted to a place of your choice Students should not fritter away the chances that come their way. Lovers will also find this week a lucky one. The domestic front will remain inspiring. However, do not neglect your health

Good dates: 18, 19 and 21
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: North-east

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) The stars do not shine very brightly on your financial front. On the domestic front one of your close relatives residing with you may suddenly fall sick adding to your financial burden. Love and marriage are ill signified try and avoid arguments with your beloved Your health will add to your worries Avoid undertaking pleasure trips

Good dates: 18, 20 and 21
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: East

PISCES (15 March—14 April) You will come in contact with an influential person. Matters relating to property will be resolved in your favour. On the professional front you will make steady headway Businessmen will also prosper. The domestic front will remain inspiring. However, this is not the opportune time to get married A journey towards the middle of the week will prove financially profitable.

Good dates: 19, 20 and 21
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 3
Favourable direction: South-west

For those born on the 18th, 19th or 20th of any month:

You are emotional by nature. At times you get carried away by your emotions to such an extent that you find yourself in trouble. Some of you are also endowed with an artistic temperament: you will do well if you choose the creative arts as your profession. Most of you are social by nature and you love to be surrounded by friends and relatives. Women born during this period make ideal housewives.

VARIETY

CHESS

n Iceland, people take their chess seriously. A nation of docile warriors, they are temperamentally well suited to the concept of bloodless struggle, their tenacity at the board being matched only by their humility away from it.

The spirit of Icelandic chess is embodied in Fridrik Olafsson, grandmaster, ex-President of FIDE and national hero. The wealth of talented young players in Iceland is naturally going to be the source of his successor, and none is a more obvious candidate than 21-year-old Johann Hjartarsson. He has recently turned in some beautifully polished performances which mark back to the young Olafsson, whose early games displayed the same classical fluency.

White: Ree. Black: Hjartarsson. Queen's Gambit Declined.

1 P–Q4	N–KB3	2 P–QB4	P–K3
3 N–KB3	P–Q4	4 N–B3	B–K2
5 B–N5	P–KR3	6 B–R4	0–0
7 Q–B2	P–QN3	8 BxN	BxB
9 P–K4

A dangerous-looking attempt to exploit the temporary instability of two white diagonals viz. 9 . . . PxKP 10 QxP P–B3 11

Hjartarsson (Black) to move

Ree (White)

B–Q3 P–N3 12 P–KR4 or 9 . . . PxBP 10 P–K5 B–K2 11 Q–K4 P–QB3 12 BxP followed by B–Q3 and P–KR4 etc.

9 . . .	N–B3!	10 0–0–0	PxKP
11 QxP	B–N2	12 P–KR4	R–QN1
13 B–Q3	P–N3	14 Q–N4	B–N2

The first wave has been successfully thwarted so White tries from a new angle.

15 B–K2	N–K2	16 P–R5	P–KN4
17 N–K5	N–B4	18 B–B3

DIAGRAM

Planning to plant pieces on the QB6 square. Hjartarsson rudely disrupts his horticultural aspirations.

18 . . .	P–B4!	19 PxP	Q–B2
20 N–Q7	BxN	21 PxB	PxP
22 NxKR	Q–R4	23 K–Q2	N–Q5!
24 K–K1

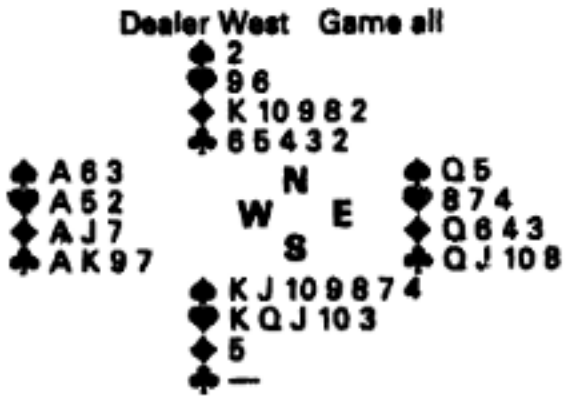
A choice of hopeless alternatives. If 24 BxB RxB 25 K–K1 QxP+ 26 K–B1 QxP+ 27 K–N1 N–K7+ winning the queen.

24 . . .	NxB+	25 K–B1

Or 25 PxN QxP+ 26 K–B1 BxP 27 Q–N3 Q–Q6+!

25 . . .	Q–R5!	26 R–Q6	P–B4

27 Resigns.



On 27 Q–N3 QxBP+ is mating.

MICHAEL SIEAN

BRIDGE

This is a deal from the Woolwich Spring Foursomes, with the same hands played in both the Northern and Southern sections.

Dealer West Game all

In the Northern heat between Shek and the holders, Teltscher, the auction at one table was on Blue Club lines:

South	West	North	East
—	1 ♣	No	1 ♥
4 ♠	No	No	dble
No	No	No

The opening one club showed about 16 points upwards and one heart was semi-positive. West's pass of four spades was a scientific move inviting partner to name a long suit, but East could only double. At the other table East-West bid a simple 2NT – 3NT, and the final contract was again four spades doubled.

West led a club, ruffed by South. At one table South laid down the king of spades, losing four tricks, at the other the king of hearts. The defence did not make the mistake of winning, so again the contract was defeated.

At another table South made the better play of a low heart at trick two. West played low and dummy's ♥ 9 provided an entry for the critical trump finesse.

The same sequence of events was followed at two tables in the Southern quarter-final, South at one table leading the king of spades from hand, at the other trying the low heart successfully.

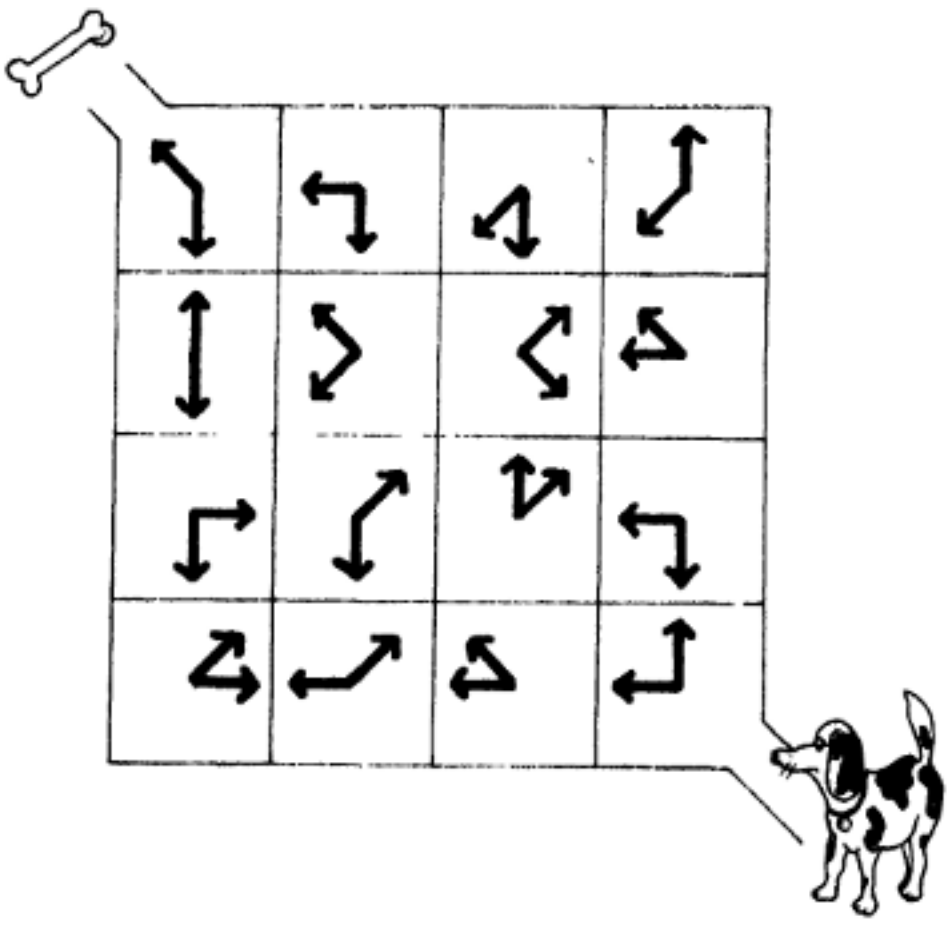
The final, between teams captained by Mayo and Shek, will be played during the Brighton Congress in August.

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

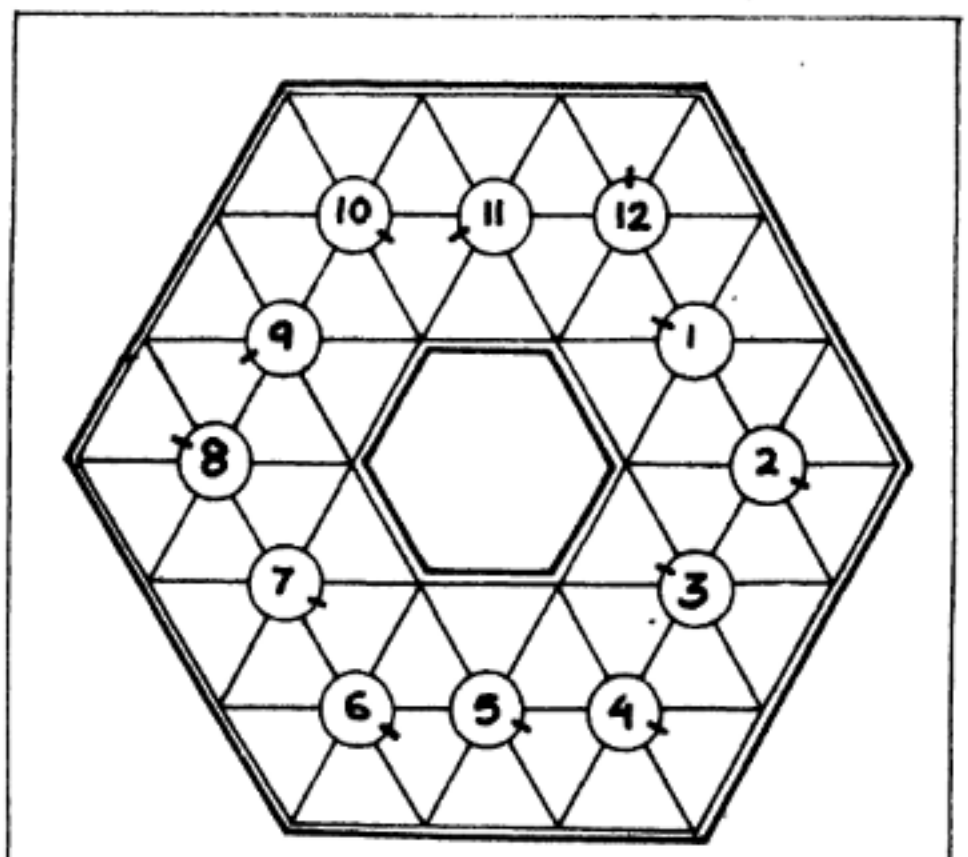
1. Name the famous scientist who first developed a vaccine to prevent the occurrence of polio?
2. Which city in North America is known as the city of magnificent distances?
3. Who was the first woman to climb Mount Everest?
4. In astronomy, what are the bodies formed from the collapsed remnants of supernova explosions called?
5. What is the collective noun for kangaroos?
6. USSR is the largest country in the world. Which is the second largest country?
7. How is Nitrous Oxide better known as?
8. Return to Earth is the autobiography of a well-known astronaut. Name him.
9. Name the "lost continent" described in detail by Plato which is believed to have subsided after it was struck by a meteorite, over 11,000 years ago.
10. Red Rackham's Treasure, Black Gold, The Black Island and The Blue Lotus are comic books with a young reporter as the hero. Name him.
11. Who was the first Indian to be a member of the British Parliament?
12. Which country receives the highest number of tourists every year?
13. When is Teachers' Day in India?
14. Where in the human body is the Von Ebner's gland?
15. Mao ze Dong wrote the Red Book. Who wrote the Green Book?



ANSWERS

1. Dr Jonas Salk.
2. Washington D.C., the capital of the United States.
3. Mrs Junko Tabei of Japan in 1975.
4. Pulsars.
5. A troop.
6. Canada
7. Laughing gas.
8. Edwin Aldrin, the second man on the moon.
9. Atlantis.
10. Tintin
11. Dadabhai Nacroji.
12. Spain.
13. 5 September.
14. In the tongue.
15. Col. Gaddafi of Libya

TEASERS

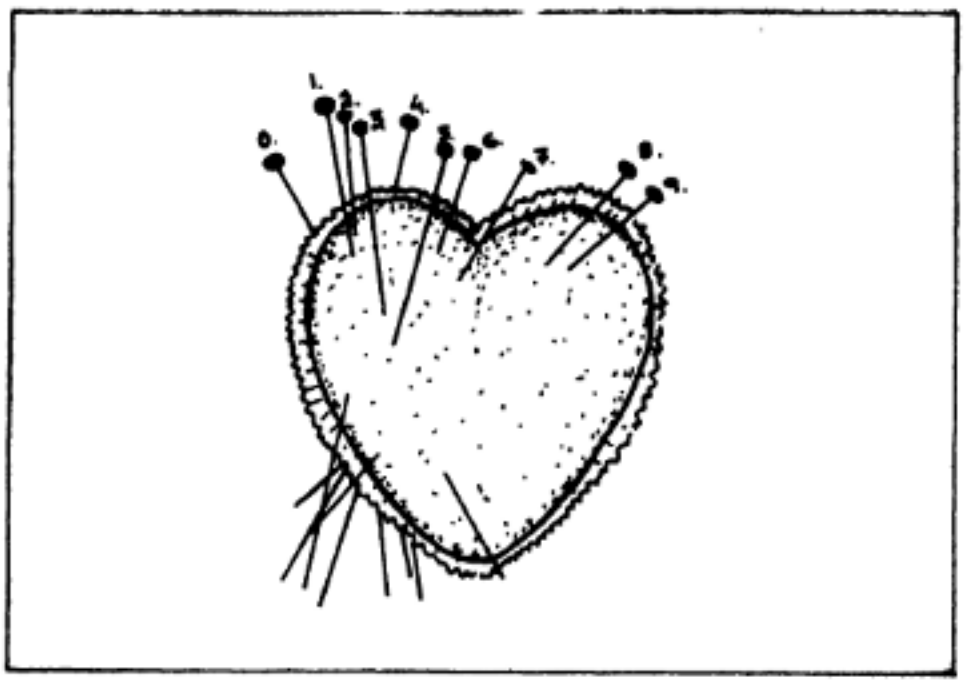


BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Mind Bender

Can you get the puppy to the bone? You can enter from one square into another only along the direction of the arrows. Obviously, you must find the shortest route.

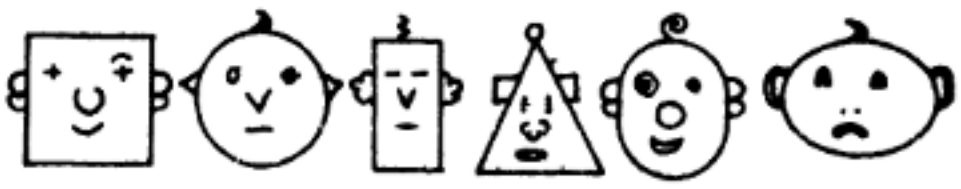
Wordplay



This word maze will contain 12 words, when completed, one letter per space, reading in EITHER clockwise OR anti-clockwise direction. The clues to the words are given below:

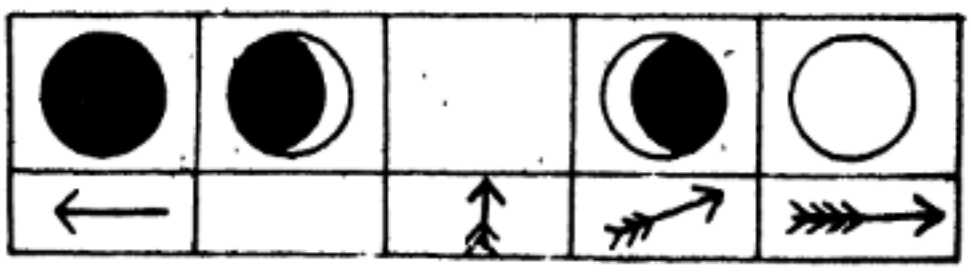
1. A quiver 2. Hearsay 3. Heavy load 4. The highest point 5. Striped wild cats? 6. Decline 7. Mildew 8. A container, for feeding animals 9. In good health 10. Scuffle 11. Delicate 12. Traced, around.

Quick Think



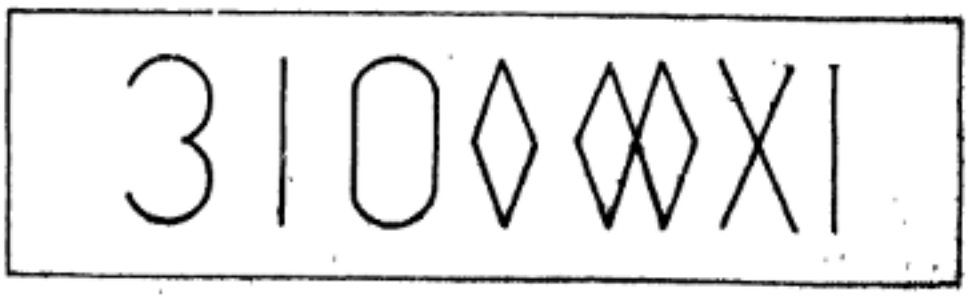
The year 1984 may have been a year of catastrophes, but it wasn't an upside down year. The last two upside-down years were 1691 and 1961. How quickly can you find the next upside-down year?

Eye Wash



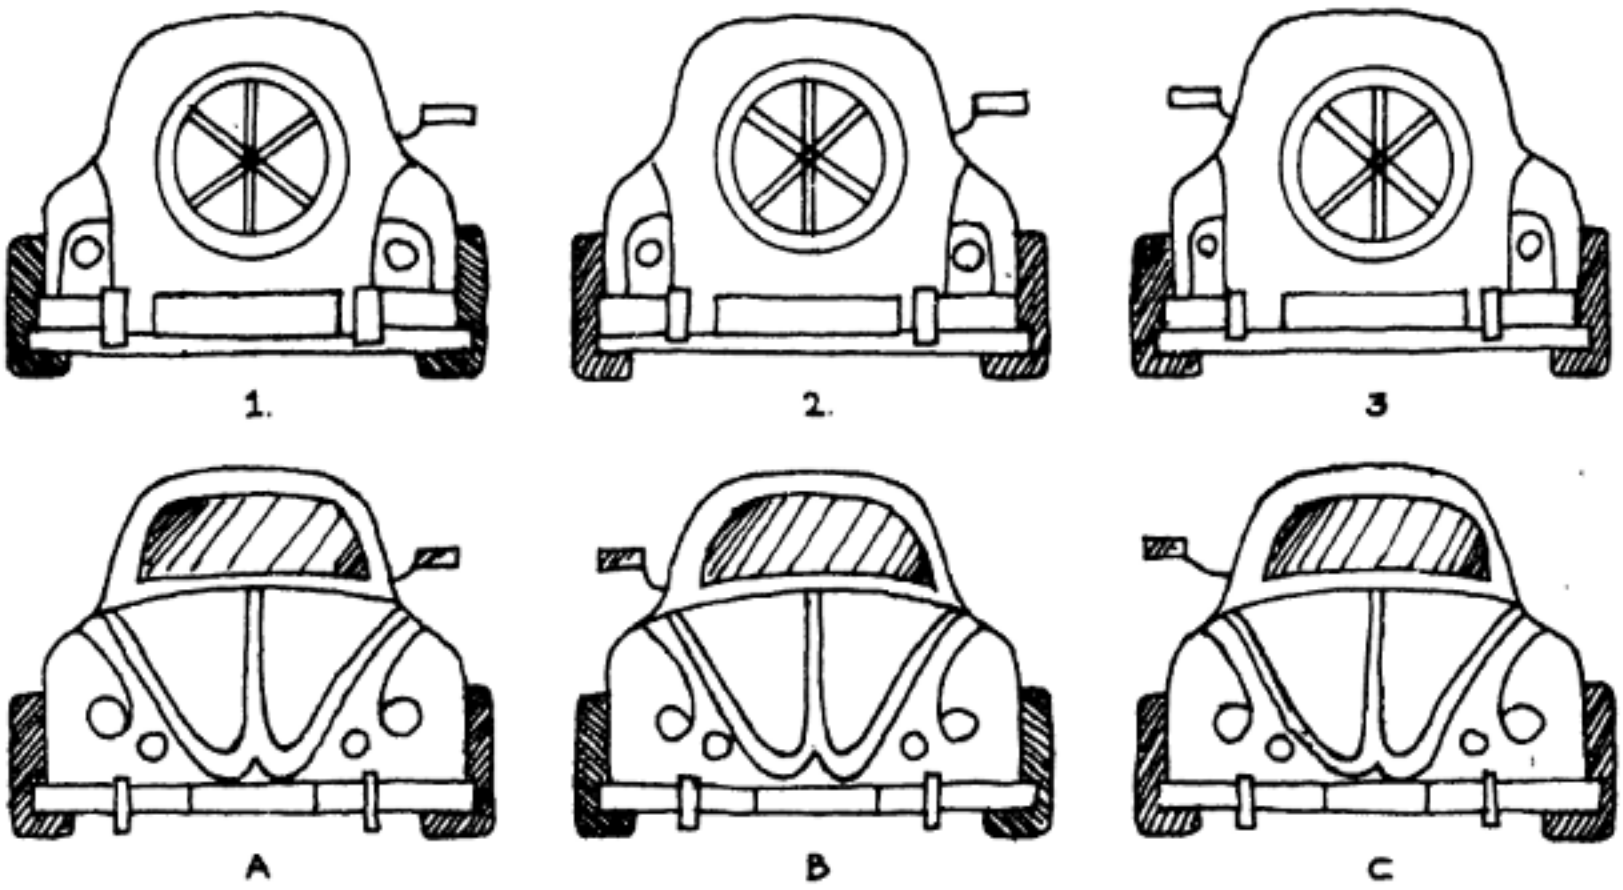
There are ten pins which have gone into this pin cushion and only nine come out. Which pin got stuck?

Face Facts



Which face is entirely different from all others in every single detail?

Mindbender



Draw the appropriate figures in the empty spaces.

Quizzbizz

What is the next symbol in this series?

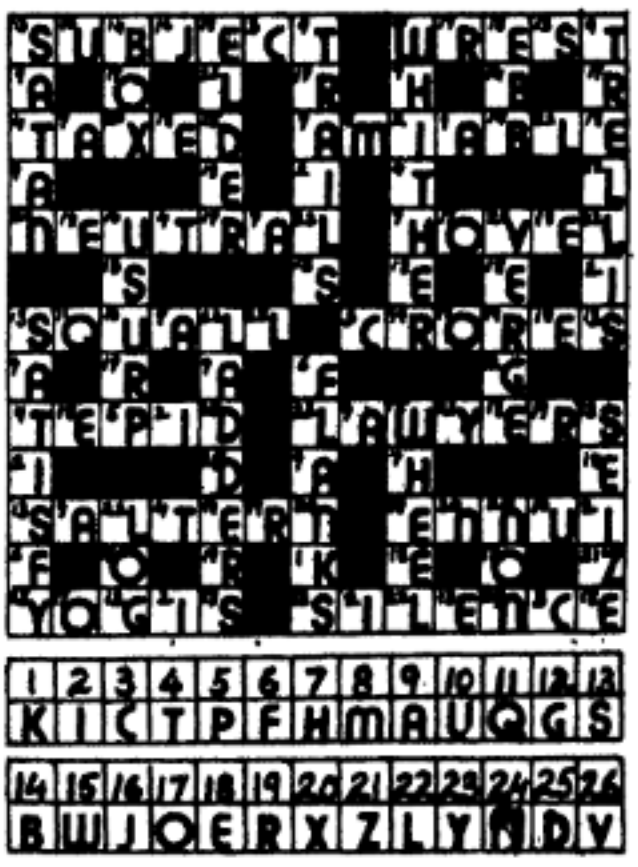


Figure it Out

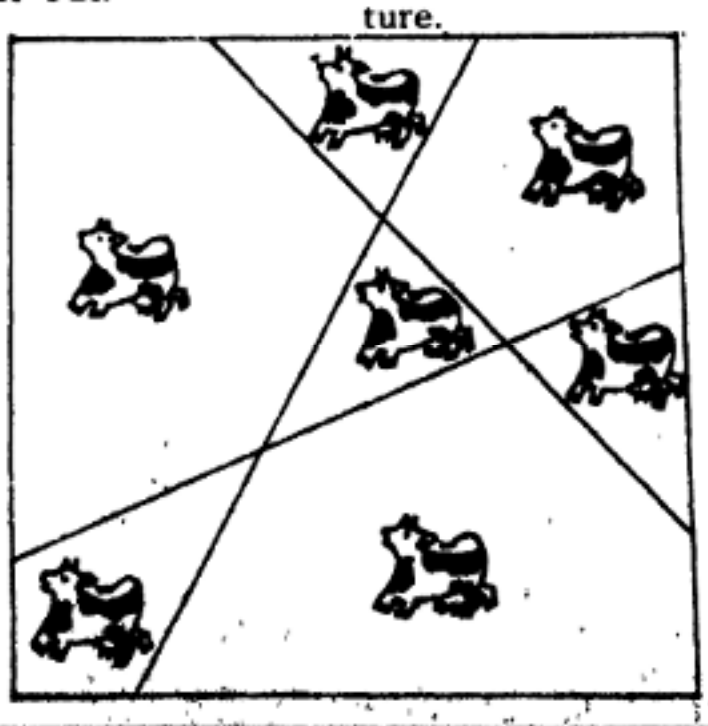
Tricky treads, these. Match the backs of these cars to the fronts.

Solution to last week's Teasers:

Cryptocross:

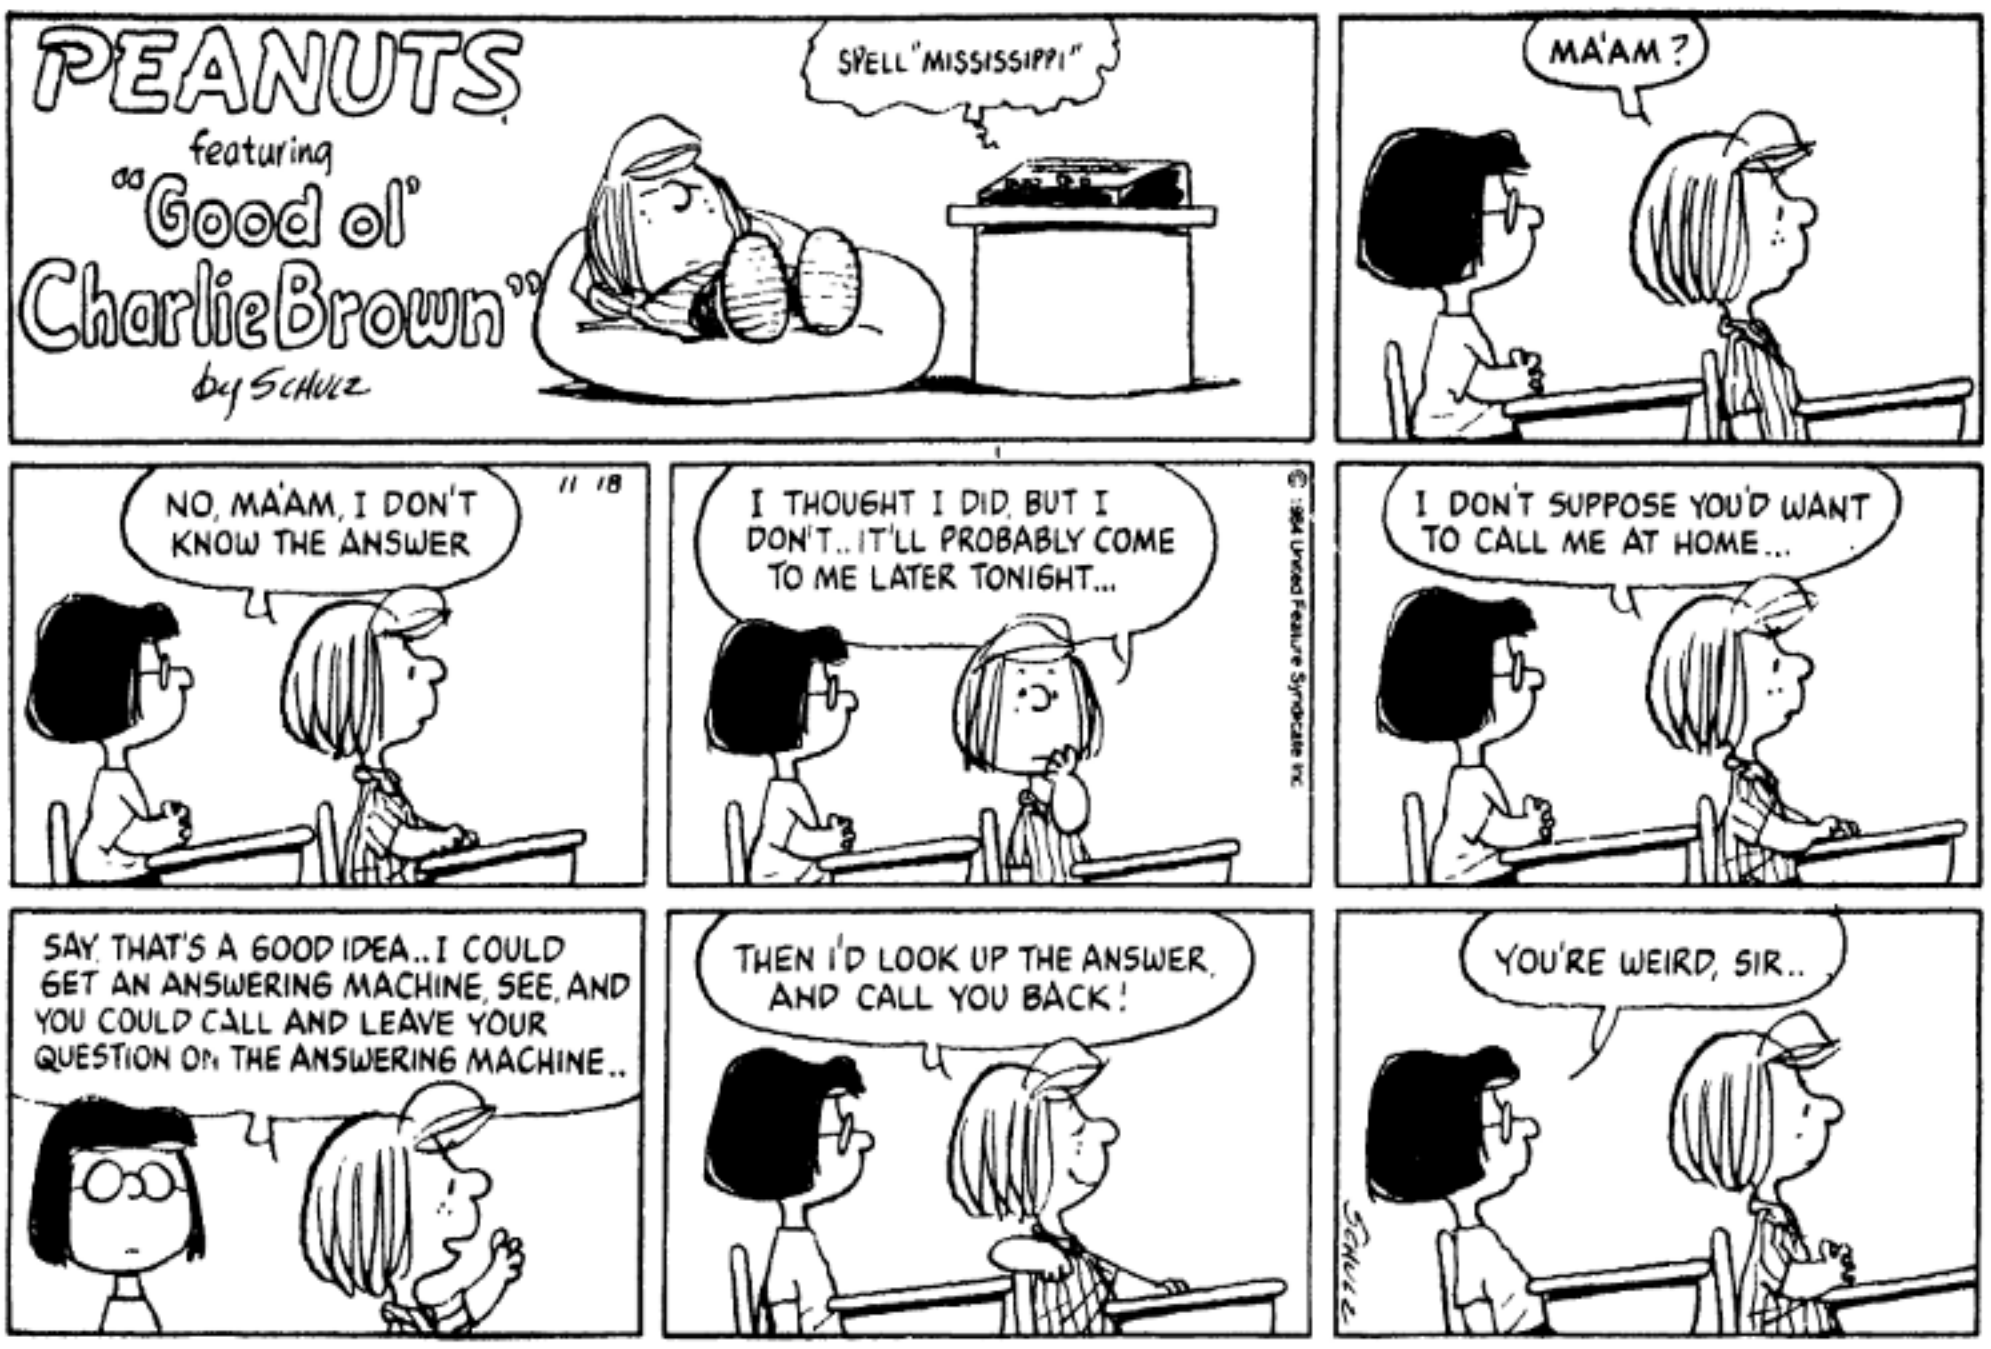


Quick Think:
The five cats catch five mice in five minutes, that is one mouse per minute. Therefore, in 100 minutes, the five catch 100 mice, and there is no need for any more cats.

Witsharpener:
Mr Sen obviously had no knowledge of mathematics (clue a) and so could not have taught it. Mr Das did not know enough geography to teach it and since Mr Rao did not know the Devnagiri script, he could not have taught it. Therefore, Mr Sen taught English, History and Hindi; Mr Rao taught Mathematics, Geography and History and; Mr Das taught English, Mathematics and Hindi.

Blockbuster:

Figure it Out:



Quick Think:
1. T (miss 1, miss 2, miss 3...)
2. U. V, W, X, Y, Z (1, miss 1, 2, miss 2, 3, miss 3...)

What's in a Word:
Revere, Legible, Orator, Insulin and Edited.

Scrambles:
Bleat, Raced, Enrol, Cruet, Askew, Brace.

Shape Sleuth:
E (One stable shape is followed by two unstable shapes)

Eye Wash
There is an extra line in the frame of the lower picture.

Nathaniel Brassey Halhed
A Grammar of the Bengal Language
100 00

Atulya Ghose
The Split
10 00

P.K.S. Kutty
Laugh with Kutty
35.00

Dr. Sisir Kumar Basu & Birendra Nath Sinha
Netaji: A Pictorial Biography
65 00

Barun Sengupta
Last days of the Morarji Raj
35.00

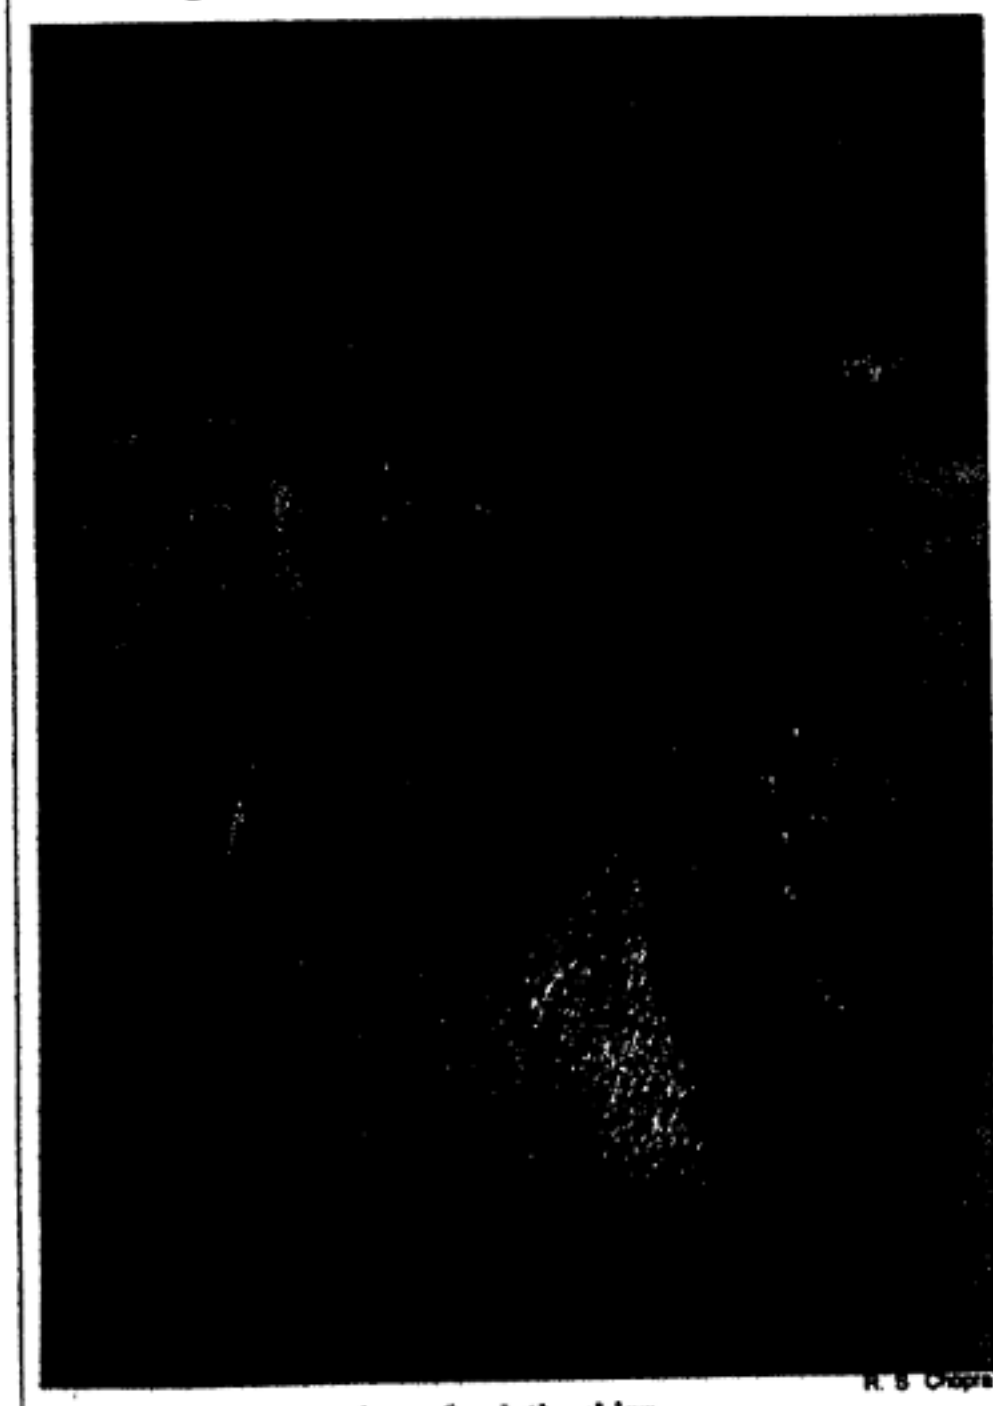
Shiv Narayan Roy
The world her village
50 00

Gourkishore Ghosh
Let Me Have My Say
25.00

Arobinda Guha
Unpublished Letters of Vidyasagar
25 00

Ananda Publishers Private Limited
45 Beniatola Lane Calcutta 9 Phone 344362

JAYANTA GROUP OF INDUSTRIES
NOW BRING YOU INTERNATIONAL TECHNOLOGY.. WORLD-CLASS PRODUCTS



JAYANTA GROUP OF INDUSTRIES
Main Office : 32, Ezra Street, Room No. 22 & 23 Calcutta-700 001

JG-4/85

VARIETY/KHAAS BAAT

Sridevi, with her impeccable manners, is slowly showing signs of change. She has started behaving badly not only with the people in the industry but also with the press which gave her the boost she badly needed. Recently, she forced Subhash Ghai, one of the respected names in the Bombay film world, to throw out a group of photographers because she was dressed in a one-piece swimming suit. Complained a senior photographer: "She has been doing all kinds of vulgar things on the screen. But why is she playing difficult with us? I hate such double standards."

Anita Raaj: no wrecker of relationships

Everyone is talking about the sizzling hot scenes in photographer-turned-filmmaker Akash Jain's Seepiyan. The talk centres around the bedroom and other such scenes between Debashree Roy and Kanwaljeet. The last time Debashree hit the headlines was when she almost stripped "because the scene demanded" in Aparna Sen's 36 Chowringhee Lane. She would never do it again, she had promised. But that was a long time back.

Remember Salim and Javed, the most successful of writers in Hindi films? Almost overnight they became stars—producers and directors queued up at their doorstep to sign contracts for they were the makers of many a superstar (Amitabh Bachchan was their creation). The duo churned out one hit after another till one day the inevitable happened. Salim and Javed got involved in a major war of egos and finally called it a day. Javed went his own way and wrote the scripts for films like Betaab, Mashaal and Duniya, which did not do too well at the box office. Poor Salim found no work. The good news is that the two have at last realised their folly and decided to come together again.

Debashree Roy: broken promises

The tussle between Jackie Shroff and Anil Kapoor has reached a very interesting stage. While filmmakers are busy trying to rope them, the two are playing their own clever games of each trying to outwit the other. Anil Kapoor has been facing troubled times. Three of his films—Latla, Andar Bahar and Love Marriage—fared badly and gave him a bad name. Jackie on the other hand had a phenomenal success in Hero. The fate of the two will depend on the two films due for release: Saaheb with Anil Kapoor in the title role and Jackie as the hero in Mera Jawab.

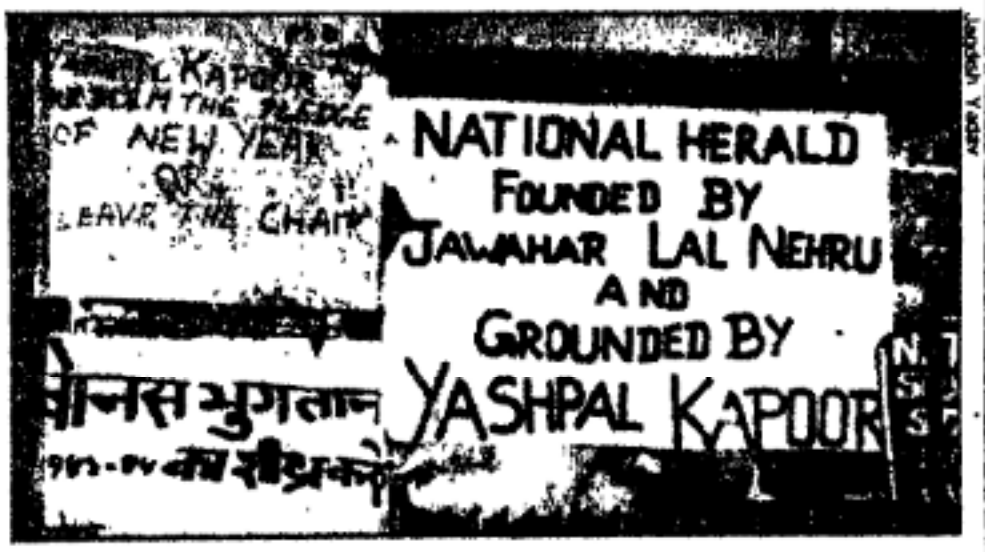
Some actresses like Hema Malini never give up. It's ages since she dazzled on the screen. Some directors and writers are now busy trying to bring her back and Hema is all too willing to help. She has even reduced her fees. Desperation can often sober stars.

DELHI DIARY

First Workman



Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is the first "workman" to have become the head of government in India. The "workman" here refers to the definition laid down by the Industrial Disputes Act. Commercial pilots and working journalists, though akin to the white-collared employees, are in fact blue-collared in the eyes of law. These two categories of employees can never be deemed to be executives, howsoever high their salaries may be. The Congress(I) may or may not be able to provide a "government that works," but it certainly has given the country a "workman" PM.

Successor, Not Son

A refreshing aspect of Rajiv Gandhi's speeches has been the fact that he avoids referring to Mrs Indira Gandhi as his mother. Mrs Gandhi used to often refer to "my father, Jawaharlal Nehru" in her speeches. Rajiv Gandhi refers to his mother as the "late Prime Minister, Shrimati Indira Gandhi." Perhaps rightfully the young Prime Minister feels that he is the successor to Mrs Gandhi's political legacy and not merely her son.

Grounded?

Graffiti in India is plentiful, but rarely is humour noticed. The strike at the National Herald in Delhi has produced some: "National Herald: Founded by Jawaharlal Nehru and grounded by Yashpal Kapoor." The reference is to the decline of this pioneering daily under its present editor-cum-managing director.

Technical Choice?

Krishnaswamy Raosahab

Who will be the next cabinet secretary? Krishnaswamy Raosahab is to retire soon. The seniormost member of the IAS is the planning secretary K.V. Ramanathan. But Mr Ramanathan's name, while being on top of the civil list, was dragged into controversy in 1980. He was the then secretary for petroleum, chemicals and fertilisers and the award of the consultancy contract for the Bombay High gas-based fertiliser units at Hazira and Thal-Vaishet was being discussed.

The matter had been considered by two high-power committees for over three years. The American firm, C.F. Braun, represented in India by the former sheriff of Bombay, Narendra Kapadia, was on the top of the shortlist on both occasions. In 1980, Italy's Snam Progetti suddenly jumped into the fray with political patronage and overruling technical opinion, this firm which had not even been shortlisted, got the contract. Mr Ramanathan opposed this and came in conflict with his minister, P.C. Sethi.

Later, while deposing before Parliament's estimate's committee, Mr Ramanathan was asked whether the award had been changed due to some superior technical grounds. He replied that the new deal had been guided not by technical, but "superior extra-technical" considerations. Now this upright officer is on the threshold of getting the best job an IAS member can aspire for. Will he make it? In all likelihood another good officer, P.K. Kaul, finance secretary, who is next to Mr Ramanathan in seniority, will be the next cabinet secretary.

